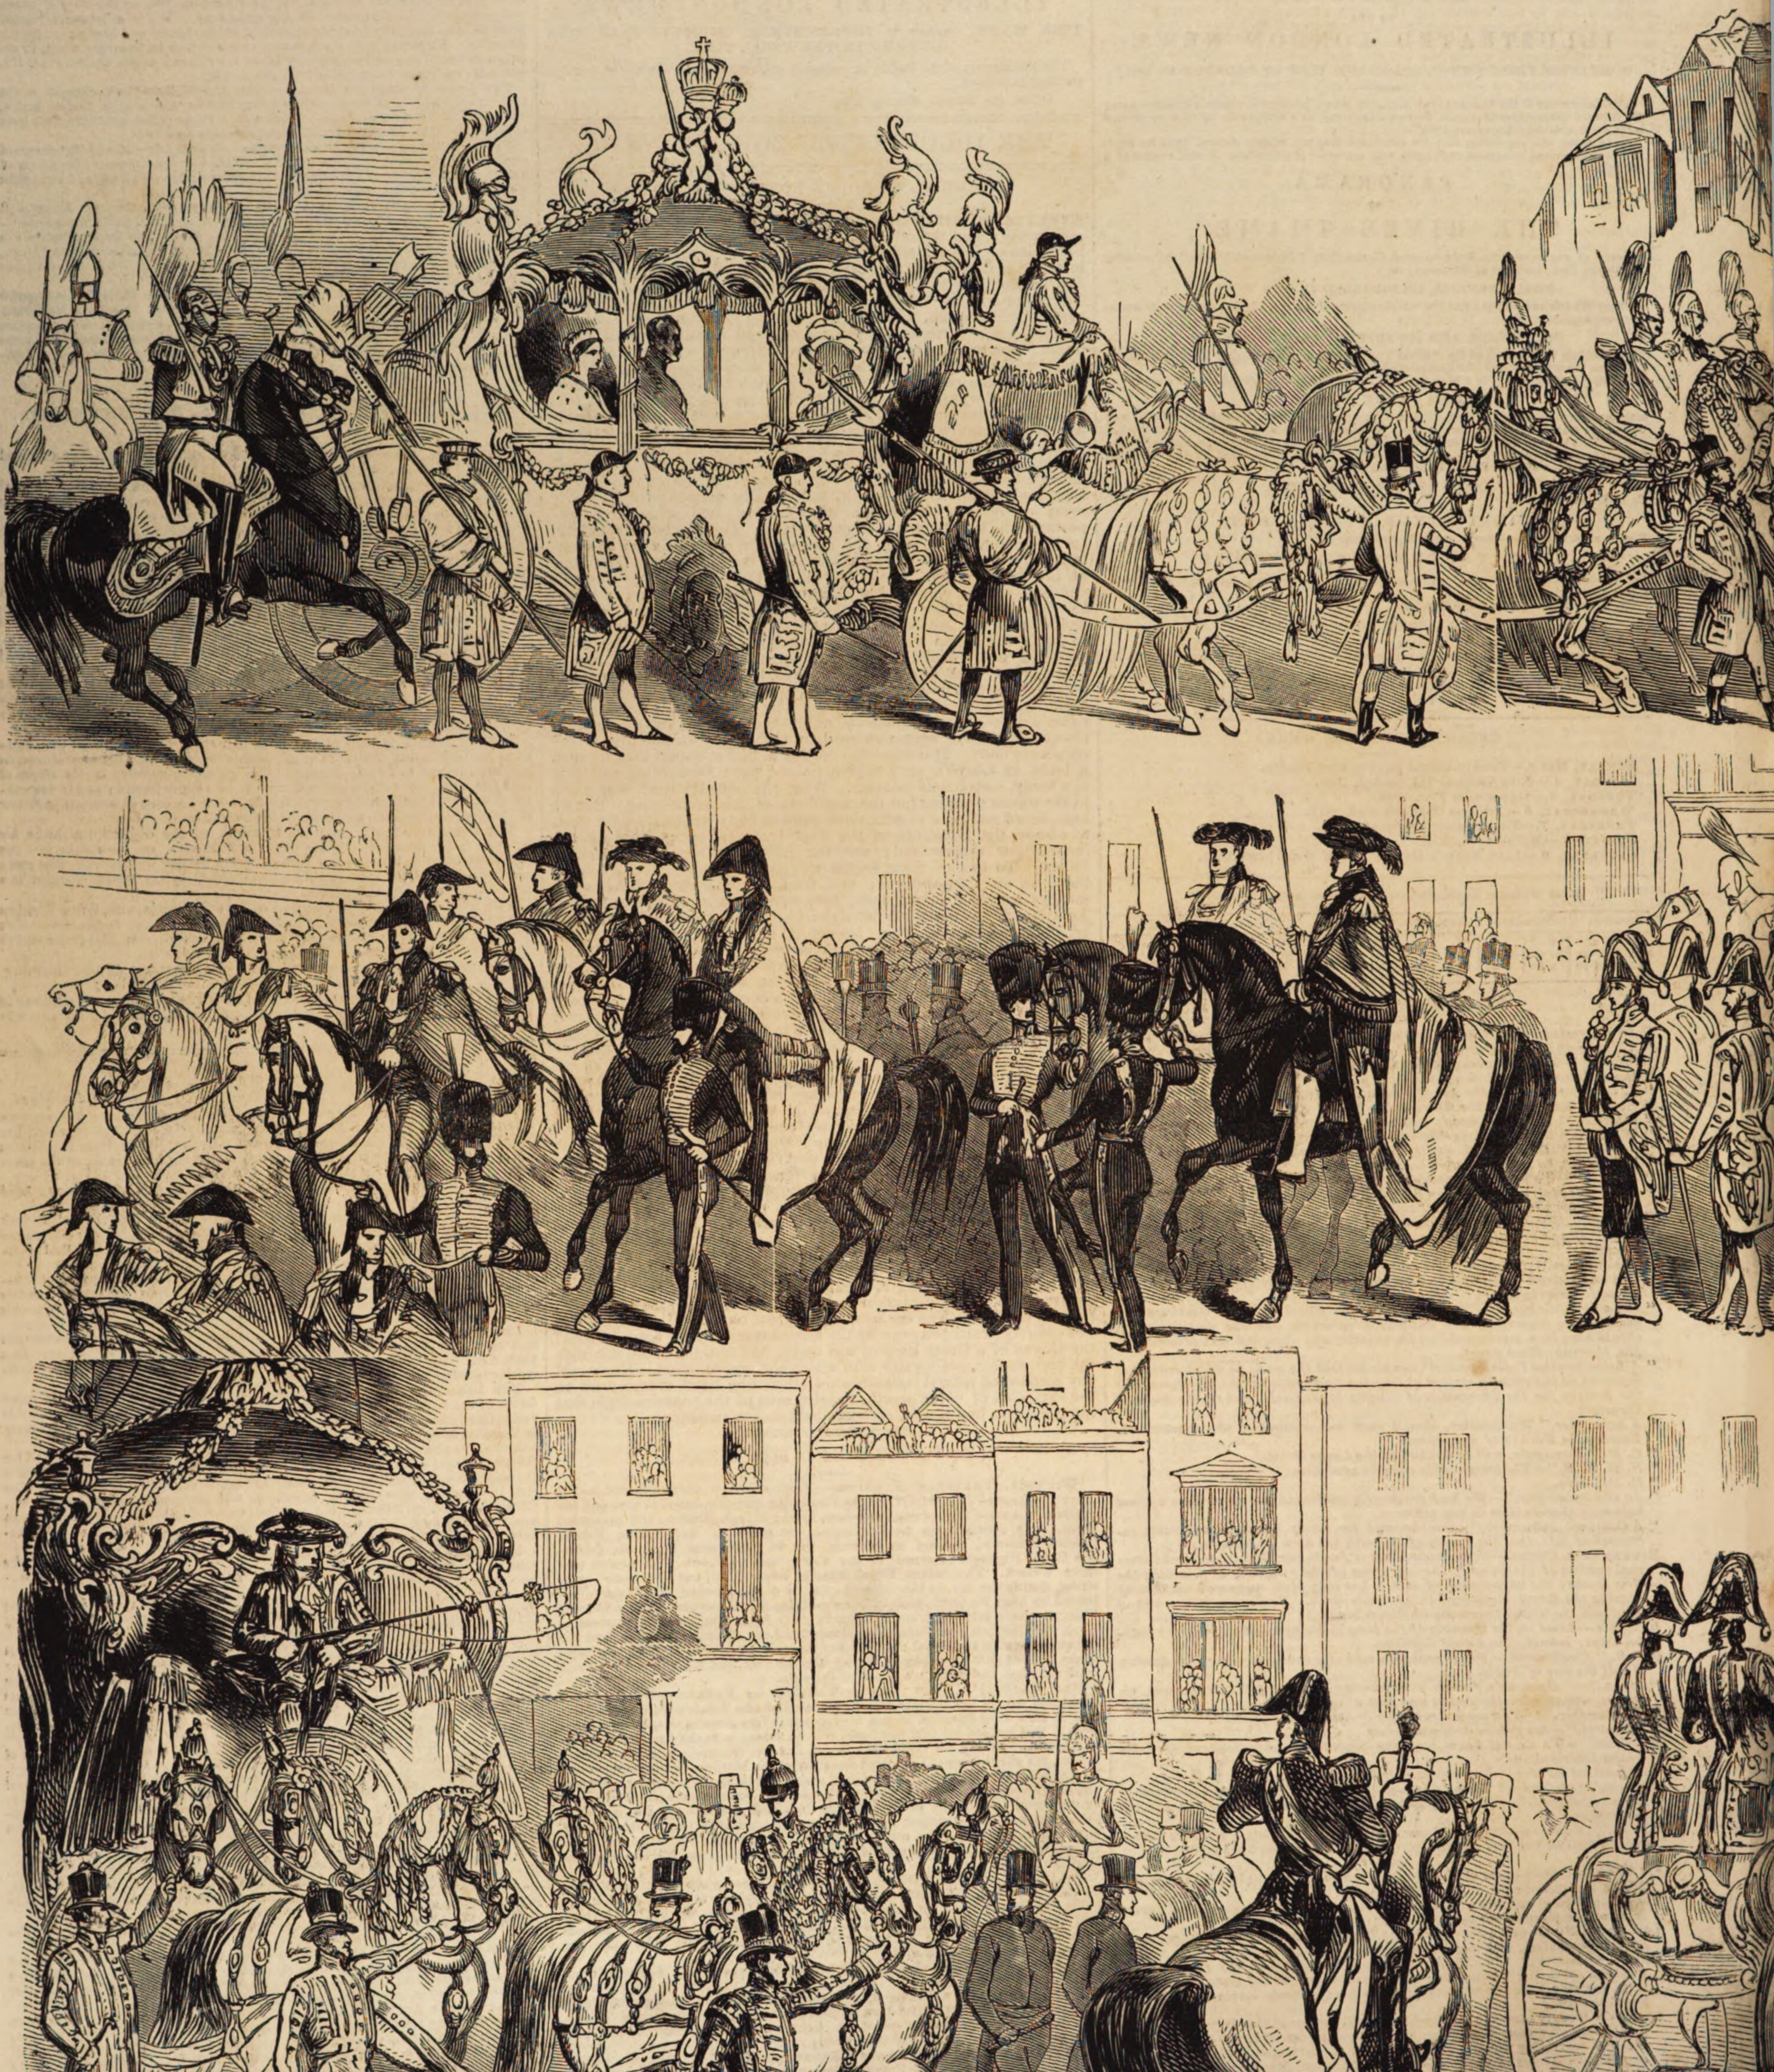
Insurrection in Spain.—An express has arrived from Madrid with the news that there has been another conspiracy. On the 27th an attempt was made to assassinate General Narvaez at the entrance of the French Embassy, where he dined. General Prim had been arrested, and there were also other arrests. Riots had taken place at Barcelona. Two police-officers had been stabbed, and an attempt had also been made to assassinate the Baron de Meer. Many arrests had taken place.

Portugal.—The steamer Pasha has arrived from Lisbon, with accounts to the 28th ult., but they are unimportant. A coalition between Costa Cabral and the Miguelites was talked of.

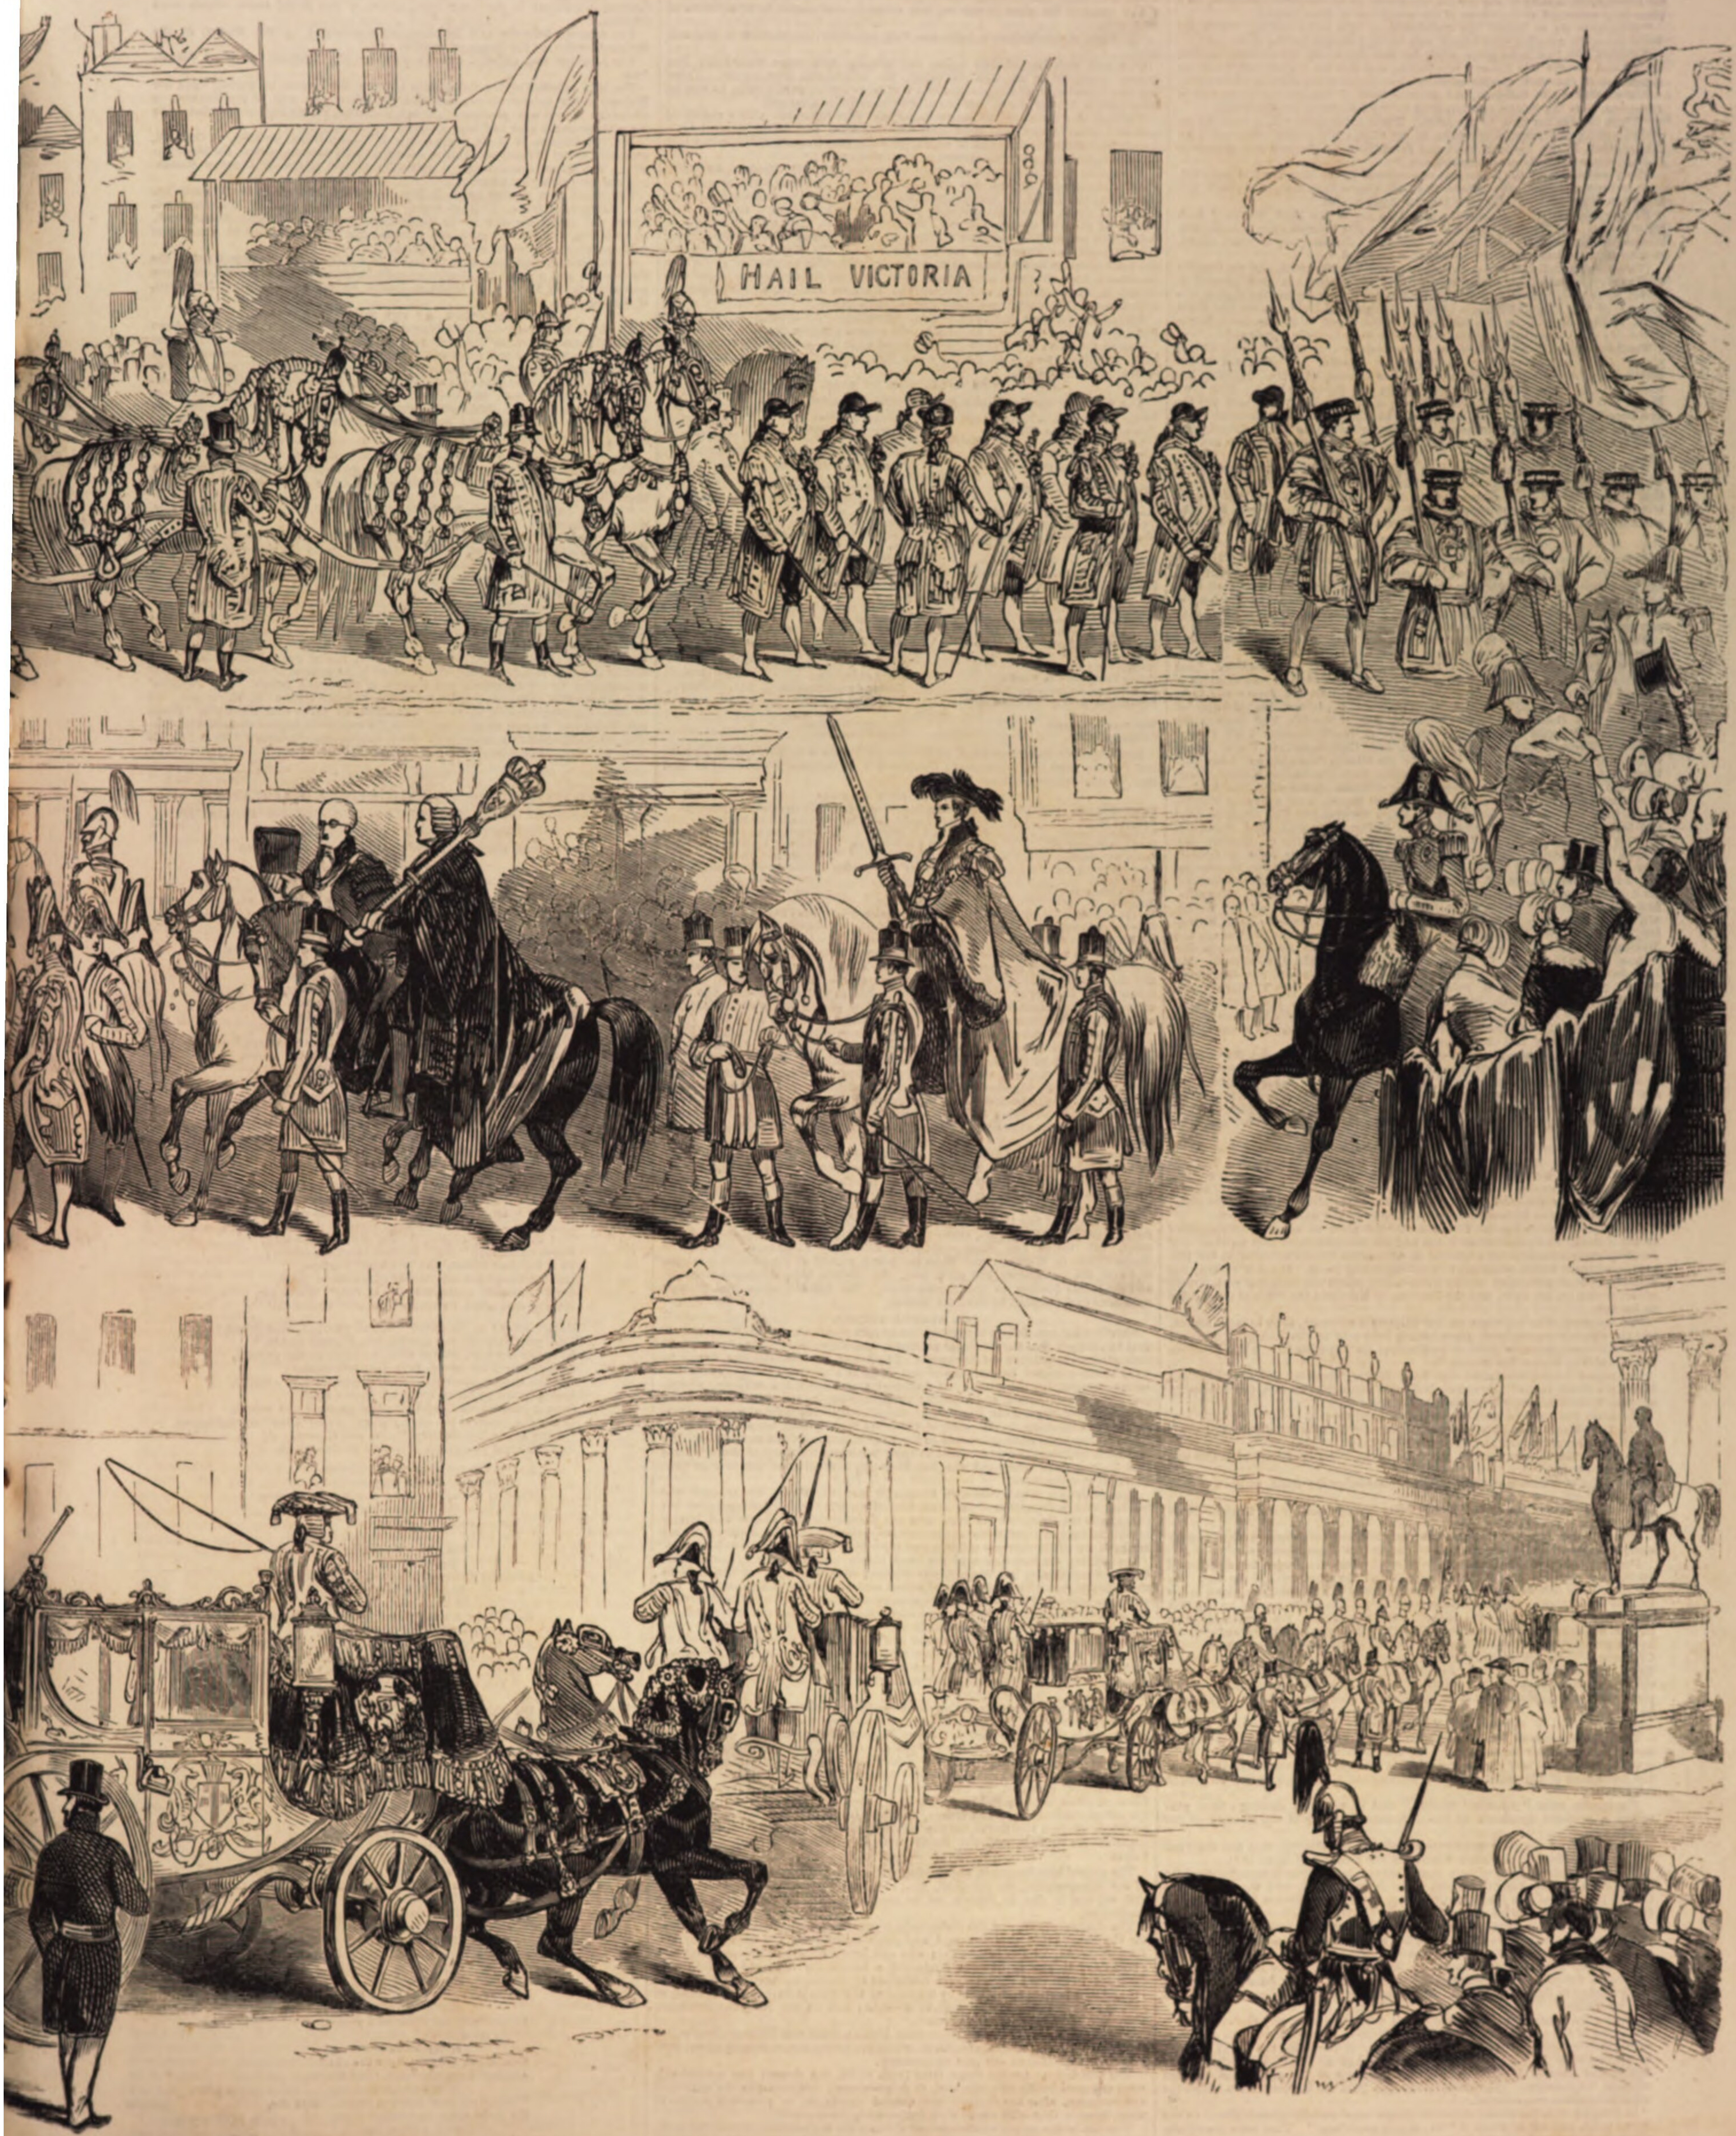
Safety of Dr. Wolff.—The Indian mail has brought accounts from Constantinople, which state, on the best authority, that advices have been received of the arrival of Dr. Wolff at Meru, on his way to Teheran. Having thus crossed the frontier of Bokhara, his personal safety has been insured, and his return to the civilised world will be hailed with general satisfaction.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS — PROCESSION



NEWSPAPER

F HER MAJESTY TO OPEN THE NEW ROYAL EXCHANGE.



HAIL VICTORIA

the affectionate loyalty of my people, presented on an auspicious occasion in a place long renowned as the centre of the commerce of these realms.

"It delights me to behold the restoration of this noble edifice, which my Royal ancestors regarded with favour, and which I esteem worthy of my care.

"Within the last three years, when fire had destroyed the ancient building my beloved consort laid the new foundation, and this day I gladly celebrate the completion of the work, quickly executed, but grand and perfect in all its parts.

"The relief of the indigent, the advancement of science, the extension of commerce, were the objects contemplated by the founder of the Exchange.

"These objects are near to my heart. Their attainment will, I trust, be recorded among the peaceful triumphs of my reign; and I shall rejoice if I am thus enabled, by the blessing of Divine Providence, to promote the prosperity and happiness of all classes of my subjects."

The Presentation of the Address is represented in the Engraving at page 285.

At an intimation from the throne, the Lord Mayor then stepped forward and knelt before her Majesty, who gave him her hand to kiss.

Her Majesty was then graciously pleased to say to the Lord Mayor, "It is my intention, Mr. Magnay, to confer the dignity of a baronet upon you, to commemorate this event." Her Majesty, looking to the Secretary of State, added, "Sir James Graham, see that the patent is prepared."

[This gracious intimation has already been carried into effect, and the Gazette of Tuesday contains the announcement that the Queen has been pleased to direct letters patent to be passed under the Great Seal, granting the dignity of a Baronet of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland unto the Right Hon. William Magnay, of Postford-house, in the county of Surrey, Lord Mayor of the city of London, and the heirs male of his body lawfully begotten.]

The Lord Mayor made an obeisance to her Majesty and returned to his former place. The Lord Mayor then again stepped forward, and presented to her Majesty Mr. Lambert Jones, the mover of the address, and Mr. Harrison, the seconder, who both had the honour of kissing her Majesty's hand. The Lord Mayor also presented Mr. Aston, the Master of the Mercers' Company, and the two Sheriffs, Messrs. Sidney and Hunter, who also had the same honour. Mr. Tite, the architect of the Exchange, was also presented to her Majesty by the Lord Mayor, and her Majesty was graciously pleased to give him her hand to kiss.

Both the sheriffs were prevented from taking any part in the Royal procession within the Exchange through being shut out at the western entrance. It appears that some of the mounted aldermen were equally unfortunate. Whether to attribute this accident to mismanagement on the part of the officials, or to the awkward horsemanship of the civic functionaries, it is impossible to determine.

THE DEJEUNER.

As soon as this ceremony had been performed, the Corporation, the Ministers, Ambassadors, and others who had been present in the throne-room, retired to the banqueting-room, where they immediately took the seats which had been assigned to them. Her Majesty, accompanied by the Prince, the Duchess of Kent, and the Duke of Cambridge, retired to the private apartments, where they remained for nearly twenty minutes.

Among the members of the Corporation were, besides the Lord Mayor, Sir Claudius Hunter, Mr. Alderman Farebrother, Mr. Alderman Brown, Mr. Alderman Gibbs, Mr. Alderman Musgrove, Sir John Pirie, Bart., Sir Peter Laurie, Mr. Alderman Moon—indeed, nearly the whole of the Court of Aldermen; also the Recorder, the Common-Sergeant, Mr. Sergeant Merewether, the Town-Clerk, the Remembrancer, and nearly all the deputies of wards.

Her Majesty's arrival in the throne-room took place at about twenty minutes to one o'clock. The presentation of the address occupied about half an hour, and her Majesty remained about a quarter of an hour or twenty minutes in the private apartments before returning to the banqueting-room. On her return, her Majesty at once proceeded to the cross-table, where she took her seat, Prince Albert sitting on her right, and the Duchess of Kent and the Duke of Cambridge on her left.

The company, who had risen on her Majesty's entrance, then became seated, and the déjeûner commenced, grace having been said by the Bishop of London, thus—"O Lord, grant us grace to be thankful for Thy gifts and mindful of the benefits of Thy Divine Providence."

The repast having concluded, the Lord Mayor, standing at the right of her Majesty's chair, said—"I have her Majesty's permission to give you the health of 'Her Most Gracious Majesty Queen Victoria.'"

The toast was received with every mark of loyal honour.

The Lord Mayor then gave, in the same terms, "The Health of Prince Albert," which was also responded to enthusiastically.

The Lord Mayor next gave, in the same terms, "Albert Prince of Wales and the Royal Family."

The Duke of Cambridge stood up to acknowledge the toast, which was duly honoured.

The Lord Mayor then said, "Her Majesty has commanded me to give 'Prosperity to the City of London.'"

It is unnecessary to say that this toast was received with every mark of honour and enthusiasm by all the guests, as well as by the hosts themselves.

During the repast Mr. Lambert Jones went round the tables and distributed among the guests a medal commemorative of the great event of the day. On the one side of this medal, which is about the size of a two-shilling piece, is the head of her Majesty, with the inscription "Royal Exchange opened by her Majesty Queen Victoria, Oct. 28, 1844." On the reverse are presented three shields, with these arms respectively—the Gresham arms at the top, surmounted by the grasshopper; the City arms on the left; and the arms of the Mercers' Company. These are surrounded by an inscription—"First stone laid by his Royal Highness Prince Albert, January 17, 1842." The medals given to the chief guests were of gold, the others of silver; but some of the latter (those given to the chief officres) are to be replaced by gold ones, as soon as they can be struck off.

THE ROYAL TABLE.

The appointments of her Majesty's table were entirely of gold, and the dinner service was expressly manufactured for the occasion. This consisted of three courses, and was of very chaste and elegant design. The handles of the knives and forks were of the most elaborate workmanship, and represented knights in full armour.

The spoons were "Apostles' spoons," and of exquisite chasing; they presented a splendid specimen of the elaborate finishing of the chasing of the middle ages.

This portion of the plate appeared to interest her Majesty, who was observed to direct the attention of Prince Albert and the Duchess of Kent to it.

The dessert plates were of very costly china, also expressly manufactured for the occasion. They bore the Royal arms in the centre, and the arms of the City of London, of the Mercers' Company, and of Sir Thomas Gresham round the border. The colour of the porcelain was Royal purple.

The doyleys were unique. They were of peach-coloured satin, with corners of white satin, in which were very beautifully worked a crown and sceptre, a grasshopper, and the arms of the City of London.

The dessert glasses for the use of her Majesty displayed the same good taste. They were delicately engraved with the same arms that we have described as being worked in the doyleys. The other glasses were in a similar style, but no two were alike.

Among the wines placed upon the Royal table was some very choice Sherry—viz., some of the same butt from which his Majesty Ferdinand Seventh of Spain, on his visit to Xeres, in 1824, was entertained. It was from the finest produce of the best wine in the most celebrated vineyard in all Spain, Macharnudo, and was at the time of Ferdinand's visit to Xeres one of the oldest and choicest wines of the country. The sum of £630 was paid for the butt from which the wine in question was selected.

In keeping with the choice character of this wine were the glasses placed on the Royal table, and out of which it "was drunk sparkling." They were beautifully chaste in design and elaborately engraved, and were, as well as a passing glance would enable us to judge, in the Venetian style.

Immediately behind the Royal table the wall of the room was covered with crimson cloth, with the Royal arms in the centre, and flags on either side. Here there was a sideboard of costly plate. Among the many massive gold dishes were two deserving a few words of description—one representing the adoration of the Magi, an exquisite piece of workmanship; and the other representing the battle of the Gods, in bold relief.

Upon the long tables there was a profusion of gold tazzas and ornaments, which were filled with flowers. These gave a very pleasing effect to the tables.

The value of the plate in use on this occasion was stated to be upwards of £100,000.

The menu of her Majesty's table was very tastefully illuminated in blue and gold.

On a gold dish immediately before her Majesty were some remarkably fine grapes, presented by Mr. Geo. Crawshay, the well-known iron-master. There was also a profusion of strawberries of a very large size upon the table, as well as some natural flowers of very rare description beautifully arranged.

The four long tables of the banqueting-room were decorated with a variety of gold and silver ornaments, filled with very beautiful and choice flowers, both natural and artificial, the value of which, perhaps, may be gathered from the fact that the ladies took away the greater portion of them.

The giving of the last toast mentioned above concluded the déjeûner, and after a few minutes had elapsed, her Majesty rose from her seat, and proceeded, escorted by the Prince, to her private apartments, where she remained a short time. At about twenty minutes after three o'clock her Majesty returned, and proceeded towards the door of exit, through the two lines of gentlemen and ladies, and preceded by the Lord Mayor and the members of the Corporation. Her Majesty was cheered on leaving the room. The Royal party proceeded down the staircase to the quadrangle, where a considerable number of ladies and gentlemen had obtained admittance. The band of the Grenadiers were stationed in the quadrangle, and played the National Anthem, on her Majesty's appearance. The Coldstream band was at the entrance.

During the déjeûner, the band played—Overture, "La Syren," Auber; "Le Potpourrie, Don Pasquale," Donizetti; and several popular airs.

Among the more remarkable dishes on the table was a magnificent baron of beef, weighing upwards of twenty stone, and surmounted by a figure of St. George and the Dragon.

Previous to her Majesty leaving the Vestibule, it was the scene of the very interesting ceremony engraved at page 285. Her Majesty, the Prince Consort, and suite then proceeded down the staircase to the Merchants' Area, where a considerable number of ladies and gentlemen had gained admittance. The band of the Grenadier Guards were stationed here, and played the National Anthem on her Majesty's appearance. The Coldstream band was at the entrance.

In the centre of this quadrangle, on the spot where the statue of her Majesty, by Mr. Lough, is to be placed, a very impressive ceremonial was performed. This was, the naming of the Royal Exchange by her Majesty. The Lord Mayor, as he preceded her Majesty, stopped when he reached this point, and the members of the Corporation, together with the chief Ministers of State, formed a circle round her Majesty, who then in an audible voice said, "It is my Royal will and pleasure that this building be hereafter called the Royal Exchange." The engraving at page 284 shows this imposing consummation of "the Opening of the Royal Exchange."

This ceremony having been performed, the Queen, leaning on the arm of the Prince, proceeded, amidst the cheers of the spectators, to her carriage, on her return to Buckingham Palace. It was some time before the whole of the guests left the quadrangle. The Duke of Wellington was received with a loud and hearty cheer, and Sir R. Peel also came in for his share of the general enthusiasm.

The Yeomen of the Queen's Body Guard, in full coronation costume, were on duty at the Royal Exchange, under the command of the Earl of Beverley (Captain), Sir George Lee (Lieutenant), Mr. Ellerthorp (Adjutant), and Captain Sadler (Exon in Waiting), and lined the grand portico of the western entrance, and area, the ambulatory, the great area, the eastern area, the grand staircase, and the rooms leading to the throne-room. The officers, exon, and yeomen were afterwards regaled by the Lord Mayor.

THE QUEEN'S RETURN.

Shortly after one o'clock the guard were again under arms, but it was not till past two o'clock that the six Royal carriages, now drawn only by two horses, took their stations in front of the Exchange. In place of the state carriage, drawn by eight cream-coloured horses, one of her Majesty's private carriages, with two horses, awaited her departure. At half-past two o'clock her Majesty, accompanied by Prince Albert, and attended in procession by the Civic functionaries, descended the steps of the Exchange. Her Majesty's appearance was the signal for renewed cheering, in the midst of which her Majesty took her seat in her carriage, taking leave most graciously of the Lord Mayor and Civic authorities. Her Majesty's attendants having walked to their carriages, the troop of Horse Guards took their stations before and after her Majesty's carriage, and the cortège then drove off at a smart trot.

Her Majesty's return through Cheapside and St. Paul's Churchyard was marked with a repetition of the same cordial cheering which distinguished her progress to the City. At the turn into the churchyard the cheers and huzzas became so loud and enthusiastic, that her Majesty acknowledged them by putting her head out of the carriage window, and repeatedly bowing to the crowds around.

On quitting the jurisdiction of the Lord Mayor, and on entering her ancient city of Westminster, her Majesty was received with a flourish of trumpets by the military, and with loud shouts of joyous acclamation by the populace. The carriages proceeded at a very rapid rate along the Strand, Pall-mall, and through the Park to Buckingham Palace; and along the whole route the same demonstrations of respect were exhibited as had been shown during the day. The crowd in this part of the metropolis did not appear at all to have diminished in numbers. It was about a quarter past three o'clock when her Majesty arrived at the Palace. The escort which had accompanied the procession during the morning then filed off, and a detachment of the 17th Lancers shortly afterwards drew up.

About half-past four o'clock the royal cortège, consisting of three carriages and four, escorted by the Lancers, started from Buckingham Palace at a fast pace towards the railway station. Many respectable persons had assembled in the Park, on Constitution-hill, at Hyde-park-corner, Cumberland-gate, Cambridge-terrace, and more particularly in the yard of the railway station, by all of whom her Majesty was loudly cheered. At twelve minutes before five o'clock the carriages, preceded by outriders in scarlet liveries, and escorted by the Lancers, drove into the Paddington station, where her Majesty was received by the railway authorities. The Queen, having descended from her carriage, immediately entered the Royal railway carriage, and in a few minutes the train departed for Slough, and the Royal party soon afterwards reached Windsor Castle.

The several appointments, accessories, and commemorations of the ceremonial of the inauguration, the déjeûner, &c., have been executed with so much taste, that we feel it due to British art to enumerate such of the details as have reached us.

The dessert-plates, and the elaborately engraved dessert-glasses and ice-plates for the Royal table were designed and manufactured for the occasion by Mr. George Smith, of Conduit-street; who also executed a pair of tall goblets to commemorate the event—one contained a beautifully engraved medallion of Neptune in his car; the other, a medallion of Britannia, borne by figures of Ireland and Scotland; backed by a group of the Fine Arts; on the reverse of each is the royal crown, encircled by wreaths; and on the foot, the Gresham, City, and Mercers' Company's arms.

The amphitryons of the déjeûner were Messrs. John and Thomas Staples, of the Albion Tavern, Aldersgate-street, whose recherché menu, already given, renders any encomium on our part unnecessary.

The wax flowers for the Royal table (with which the dessert was garnished), were executed by Messrs. Mintorn, of Soho-square; and such was the anxiety of the company, after her Majesty had quitted the table, to possess a portion of these flowers, that £30 worth were destroyed in the scramble.

The handsome carpet which was laid down in the Ambulatory, across the Area, in the Lobbies, and on the Grand Staircase, was made by order of the Gresham Committee, by Mr. Hadley, of Abingdon, Berks; the material is a silky fibre from the East Indies, and the pattern, alternate diamonds of crimson, purple, and gold colour.

The whole of the interior decorations, the chair of state, and the ornamental furniture of her Majesty's retiring-rooms and toilet were executed by Mr. Herring, of Fleet-street, upholder to the Honourable Corporation of the City of London.

The chair in which her Majesty sat at the déjeûner was in the style of Louis Quatorze, elegantly gilt, and finished in rich purple and gold embroidered silk, forming a contrast to the other eight chairs at the Royal table, which were crimson.

The Armour, Banners, and Trophies, were arranged by Mr. Stacey, of the Ordnance-office, in the Tower of London.

The Awnings and external fittings were by Mr. Orchard, of West Smithfield.

The lady selected by the Committee to have the honour of waiting upon her Majesty in the private rooms, was Mrs. Bradshaw, the wife of the Banker; to whom the Queen was graciously pleased to express herself highly satisfied with the arrangements that had been made for her reception.

Mr. Masterman, M.P., in the name of Mr. John Baird, jeweller, of Cornhill, presented to her Majesty and Prince Albert, superb medals struck for the occasion. The Queen's medal bore a grand front view of the Wellington Statue and was very richly embossed.

The bill of fare, printed by De la Rue, was much admired by her Majesty before rising from table. It is of a very tasteful design, and richly illuminated. Above the menu is a view of the Exchange, with the Wellington Statue, with, on each side, "V.R." in gold and colours: the bill is enclosed in a border of gold, purple and crimson, and satin fringe.

A silk handkerchief has been printed with a view of the Eastern front of the Exchange; and a proof impression on satin, trimmed with gold-lace, has been presented to her Majesty, at Windsor Castle, by the manufacturer, Mr. Tent, of Birchin-lane.

CELEBRATION AT THE MANSION-HOUSE.

The Lord Mayor and the Lady Mayoress received between 400 and 500 visitors at the Mansion-house, in the early part of the day, to witness the magnificent spectacle, and entertained them in the most hospitable and elegant manner; in the evening his lordship and the Lady Mayoress gave a grand ball and supper to about 500 more. The banquet at the Mansion-house was supplied by Messrs. Birch, of Cornhill; who also splendidly supplied the tables of the Merchant Tailors' Company, the Mercers' Company, the Fishmongers' Company, the Clothworkers' Company, and some other companies, to the number, in the whole, of nearly 4000 individuals.

THE ILLUMINATIONS.

The illuminations were not of a sufficiently general and brilliant character to deserve a detailed description. We therefore borrow the following account of them from the Times:—

"At the Cathedral Hotel, St. Paul's Church-yard, was a brilliant gas star, six feet diameter.

"Westward of Temple-bar the illuminations were few, and confined chiefly to the tradespeople of the Royal Family. In Fleet-street the principal one was at the office of the Anti-Corn Law League, where the words 'The Union of all Nations: Free Trade,' brilliantly shone forth, ornamented with the letters 'V. R.' and a crown in oil. At Proctors', the tobacconist's, there was a fine display of lamps, forming a crown and star, with the words 'A Fair Exchange.' Mr. West, the optician, exhibited his well-known 'grand spectacle.' Beyond Temple-bar, the first illumination of any brilliancy was at the office of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, where 'V. R.,' a Grasshopper, and the words, 'Victoria, Queen of Commerce,' were exhibited in jets of gas. Punch came forth on the occasion in a fine transparent (when is he opaque?) Portrait of Himself surmounted by a large crown and framed in variegated lamps. The Farmers' Assurance-office exhibited a splendid crown with the letters 'V. R.' in gas. At Wyld's, the geographer's, there was a transparent globe with the words 'Peace and Happiness' written upon it, and below, 'Victoria' in large ornamental letters. The other illuminations consisted of stars, crowns, and the letters 'V. R.' in all their varieties, but are not worthy of any particular notice."

THE OPENING OF THE ROYAL EXCHANGE,

BY ONE OF HER MAJESTY'S LOYAL IRISH SUBJECTS.

AS DESCRIBED BY NED RATTIGAN

TO HIS DISCONSOLATE GRASS-WIDOW IN DUBLIN.

(From a Correspondent.)

DEAR PEGGY,—I send you—you'll read it to Kitty—
An account of her Majesty's trip to "the City,"
And the hullabalo that she riz in the place
(I wish you'd a peep at her pretty round face,
With her forehead so fair, and her peepers so blue—
'Pon my honour and conscience she's something like you).
'Twas on Monday. I rose with the song of the lark,
And poked out my way down the Strand in the dark;
The nailing, the screwing, the sawing of timber,
Till the day of my death I shall ever remimber.
Such twisting of gimlets, such boring of awls,
From the west of St. James' to the east of St. Paul's.
'Twixt the noise, and the lights, mix'd with darkness, I swear
That I feared I'd gone down to—I need not say where.
The day, although foggy, was frosty and dry,
And the sun look'd like one half asleep—so did I;
But soon as the Queen came, with six of her chaises,
Both Sol and myself were as fresh as two daisies,
And no wonder. I've been at the meeting at Tara,
Mullaghmast, and some others, with Tom M'Namara,
But may I be—blest, if I ever, on one day,
Saw half such a crowd as I did upon Monday.

'Twas twelve—oh! 'twas more—it was one I dare say,
When the Sheriffs and Mayor came in civic array,
And the Aldermen mounted on Batty's old stud,
Pirouetted and showed off their choice "bits of blood."
Oh! shade of Gambado, if thou couldst have seen,
Those equestrian "cits" in their robes mazarine;
Or if my poor friend, the late Andy Ducrow,
Had witnessed this Gilpin-like gingerbread show,
He'd have cried as the chap did of old, "Woe is me,
Having seen what I've seen, now to C what I C."

Bang! bang! at the gate—"Sound trumpet, beat drums!
Take your hats off, you rascals, her Majesty comes."
So spoke the Lord Mayor when he knelt on the ground,
And deliver'd his sword, as in duty was bound;
But the Queen, like old Louis Philippe (and he's right),
Being fonder by far of a "lark" than a fight,
Gave it back to his Lordship—then curtsied and bowed,
While the "ears of the groundlings" were "split" by the crowd.
"Long life to her Majesty!" one and all cried,
And the royal procession moved on to Cheapside.

Lo! in the yet unopened[*] 'Change
Graham and Punch together range,
Tasting the wines—they're not bad judges—
Whilst in the "ambulatory" new,
Accompanied by one or two,
"The Duke" in solemn silence trudges.
Full, face to face,
I met his Grace,
Awaiting Brunswick's royal daughter,
And like a brick
(I think on tick)
He called for two "goes" of gin and water.
Scarcely had we drank our lickur
And very few could do it quicker,
When Albert and the Queen drove up;
"Hah!" cried the Prince, "I'm sure," said he,
"You've kept a little drop for me."
"The devil a sup!"
On which the architect polite,
I think his name was Misthur Tight,
Said he'd send out!
And having clubb'd his browns together,
With fourpence lent by Merewether,
Got in some stout!
Of which the Duchess of Buccleuch,
And many others whom I knew,
Most heartily partook;
Whilst half a dozen I won't name,
Mawkishly mutter'd "What a shame!"
They couldn't touch it—with a hook![†]
Now roared the Heralds, loud as as they were able,
"Ladies and Gents, the grub is on the table!"
Oh! what a clatter;
Fish, flesh, and fowl,
Lay cheek by jowl
On every platter.
Sir Peter Laurie, and Whittle Harvey, Got both so glorious-
ly uproarious,
The stewards had to call a jarvey,
And threw them in it;
Others tumbled from their places,
Truly lamentable "cases,"
Every minute—
Meantime, Victoria from the chair,
Address'd our excellent Lord Mayor,
Who stood before her.
"Down on your marrow-bones," says she,
He dropt upon his bended knee,
As if t'adore her,
And after that,
Took off his hat,

[*] It seems rather strange to say, that her Majesty went to open a place whose doors were wide open for her reception.

The papers all agree together,
He wore a "Spanish" hat and feather,
But 'twas as shabby a caubeen
To wear before a Royal Queen
As any that I've ever seen,
For four-and-nine in Temple Bar[*]
I've often bought a better far—
Having laid a sword upon his shoulder,
Neither the good and great Queen Bess or Any other predecessor
Could do it bolder,
(He looked so silly)
And then distinctly she repeated
"A Baronet your'e now created Rise up, SIR BILLY!!!"
Next turning on her heel about
"Graham you'll make his 'Patent' out,
Soon as you please."
"My Liege, there shall be no delay,
But first you know, he'll have to pay
The office fees!"—
"Allowed"—
Now the crowd,
Soon began to disperse, for 'twas then getting late,
So the coaches were order'd—the Queen and her mate,
Having punished a bumper or two of Champagne,
"Cut their luckies" to Slough, by the three o'clock train.

Youv'e got all the news now, so Peggy, my honey,
If you want any more, you must out with your money,
Tho' you'll read nothing else in the most of the papers,
But of peelers, and lancers, and guards cutting capers,
Of cheers, waving handkerchiefs, flags, and all that;
Which, between you and me, is exceedingly flat.
If you want the "raal thing," Peg—I don't overrate it—
Buy the "NEWS" with the pictures, "THE GREAT ILLUSTRATED!!"

Let me know in your next how gets on the Repayle,
And "the boys," are they well since they got out of jail.
No more for the present—I'm murdhering dhry,
So must send for a drop of the native.—Good by!

THE THEATRES.

Although the present month is proverbially considered the dullest one in a theatrical point of view, yet the lessees of the different establishments have small cause for complaint. All their new pieces have met with very fair success; and they have been filled each night with good average audiences. Activity has certainly been shown in the arrangements of all, and there is novelty yet to come. Mr. Bourcicault's five act comedy has been read, and will be produced within ten days at the Haymarket. Its present title is "Old Heads and Young Hearts." The cast comprises Messrs. Farren, Charles Mathews, Strickland, Howe, Tilbury, Miss Julia Bennett, &c. Several new farces are accepted at the Lyceum, and another burlesque is on the stocks. Messrs. à 'Beckett and Lemon are underlined as the authors of an extravaganza at the Strand, to be called "The Knight and the Sprite; or, the Cold Water Cure;" founded, we believe, on "Ondine;" and a farce by the latter gentleman is also announced. We begin to look for something new from Drury-lane. "The Syren" cannot be called a great hit, with all its excellence; and "The Bohemian Girl" is now somewhat worn out. Mademoiselle Plunkett, however, has been well received in the "Revolt of the Harem," which, for the off-nights, is a vast improvement upon the "Deserter of Naples" and "Three-fingered Jack."

HAYMARKET.

Mr. Marble appeared here on Monday evening, and was well received. As we noticed this gentleman's clever acting at the Strand, and as the piece in which he played was the same—"Yankee Land"—there is no occasion for further remark.

LYCEUM.

A pleasant comedietta, called "Watch and Ward," was produced here on Monday evening, and with perfect success. It is a translation from a French piece "Le Chevalier de Guet," and was adapted to the English stage about three years ago, by Mr. Planché, at Covent Garden, under the title of "The Captain of the Watch." On the present occasion, however, a trifling alteration has been made in one of the principal characters. This is the plot: the Baron de Brissac (Mr. F. Mathews), an old beau, who, in spite of his years, believes that he is still captivating, has a fair ward, Isabel (Miss Farebrother), in love with a young officer, Victor de Lunell (Mr. Kinloch.) Taking advantage of the guardian's absence, who goes to visit a gay widowed Countess, the servant, Louise (Mrs. Wigan), contrives to inform the lover that the street-door will be left open, if he chooses to come, and see the lady of his affections. Meanwhile, an Irish officer in the French service, Captain O'Donnell, having got into some scrape in the city, is making his escape from the guard, of which he is the captain; and seeing the door open walks in. Just at this moment the Baron returns, and finding O'Donnell, insists upon knowing who he is; upon which the ready-witted Irishman makes up a diverting story about his having killed some one who had deceived his sister, which so touches the old gentleman that he insists upon his remaining. Night comes on and O'Donnell is left alone, when Louise comes to ask for Victor, and finding an officer, takes him for the real lover in the obscurity and conducts him to her mistress. Isabel is thrown into a dreadful state of alarm, as well as her servant, when they discover the mistake: and as the uncle is heard approaching, there is no resource left but to hide O'Donnell in Isabel's chamber. Meantime ,the real lover has come to his appointment, and the old man finding him there, and still taking him for O'Donnell, brings him into the house, that he may find a shelter for him from the police. A very amusing equivoque now takes place, in the course of which O'Donnell's hat is discovered, forming the best situation in the piece; and the mystification at last assumes a serious aspect by O'Donnell's appearance from Isabel's room. But this accident ultimately leads to the eclaircissement, and then all is explained, and the piece concludes with leaving everybody satisfied, including the audience. The performers acquitted themselves excellently well; and Mr. Wigan's quiet humour and capital brogue as the Irish Captain, kept the house in high spirits from beginning to end. Mrs. Wigan had a character exactly suited to her, in the intriguing servant, which she played with great archness; and Miss Farebrother was a very charming Isabel, in a powdered head-dress of the Marie Antoinette style. It is unnecessary to say aught of Mr. Frank Mathews' admirable personation of old men: he performed with his usual ability, and that is the highest praise we can award him. At the conclusion of the piece, Mr. A Wigan—whose maiden effort in dramatic authorship it was reported to be—announced it for repetition every evening until further notice.

ADELPHI.

On Tuesday night, a piece called "The Mysterious Stranger," was brought out at the above theatre, and achieved a complete success. It is a translation, by Mr. Charles Selby, of a comedie vaudeville which has attained a great degree of popularity in the French capital, termed "Satan; ou, le Diable à Paris." The adapter has had the good sense not only to mention the name of the original drama in the bills, but those of the authors, Messrs. Clairville and Damarin—a practice, which, in justice to our neighbour dramatists, ought to be generally followed. The plot is most ingenious, albeit somewhat improbable, and highly interesting; and, although rather complicated, may be easily followed. It turns on the plans of a "Mysterious Stranger," represented in the bills by five asterisks, and popularly supposed to be Satan (Madame Celeste) to open the eyes of a young French nobleman, Count de Beausoliel (Mr. Hudson), by showing him the utter heartlessness of all those by whom he is surrounded—his friends, and even his intended; and preserving his fortune. To effect this, the Evil One first appears as a "gentleman in black;" and then successively as a strange princess at a party, a gamin of the low quarters of Paris, an officer, and a young lady; finally, gaining her end in proving herself the guardian angel of Beausoliel, instead of the fiend, confessing that after all she is but mortal, and winning his heart and hand by her devotion. In working out this idea several situations are brought round which are peculiarly effective; and the interest of the piece never flags once, but is kept up by the plottings of a rascally banker, two fashionable scamps, a gang of passport forgers, a heartless worldly girl, and a circle of double-faced acquaintances.

Great credit is due to Madame Celeste for her personation of the various characters presumed to be sustained by Satan—perhaps the best being that of the gamin, at the end of the first act. It was a perfect realization of the idling rogue of the Quartier à Antoine, the aspirant to the fellowship of the tapis franc; and the bit of dancing with which she accompanied the chorus was inimitable. The first dress of the gentleman of the present day was also most effective, as was her acting. She was, to our thinking, less impressive in the female characters: especially in the more impassioned scenes, where, from her accent and rapidity of utterance, you lost nearly all the words. In fact, as a gentleman by us remarked, listening to her put him in mind of reading a very blotted manuscript; he considered himself lucky if he caught a word here and there. This must not, however, detract from Madame Celeste's general conception of the character, which was most excellent. Mr. Hudson's Beausoleil was, also, a very clever piece of acting; and he sang a ballad in the second act with such taste that it called forth a unanimous encore. Wright and Miss Ellen Chaplin had to sustain a pleasant underplot, which they did to the entire satisfaction of the audience; and Mrs. F. Mathews, certainly the most careful actress in the theatre, made a very great deal of a very little part. O. Smith's manner of playing the master of the subterranean estaminet was also an artistic "bit" of acting. The intended of Beausoleil was performed by a Miss E. Harding, whom we recollect at another theatre as Miss Floyd: she is a remarkably pretty young lady, with a remarkably ineffective voice. Mr. Selby threw great spirit into the part of the swindling Count de Vanille; but his companion, Gasconade, should have been told not to call Beausoleil Bosullell, nor to appear at a dinner-party and ball in white trousers. The "Polka des Salons," introduced in the first act, was very pretty at first, but entirely spoiled by degenerating into a silly and conventional ballet figure at the end. If there was a necessity for dancing it, and it was supposed to take place at a ball in a banker's house, why could it not be done as it is usually seen in society? Ladies and gentlemen do not pair off, and chassez, and divide, and throw their legs and arms about, as they were taught to do in this "Polka des Salons" of Tuesday evening.

The piece was, as we have said, throughout successful, and indeed deserved to be so. At its conclusion, the principal performers were called before the curtain, and subsequently Mr. Selby, who announced it for repetition every evening. It will, we think, draw money.

STRAND.

The chief difficulty which the regular play-goer now experiences, does not consist in discovering at which theatre the ubiquitous "Don Cæsar de Bazan" can be witnessed, but rather where he cannot. The Princess' commenced the fureur: this was followed by the Haymarket and the Adelphi on the same evening: then came the Surrey and Victoria; then a tribe of wonderfully remote houses, of whose existence we were only informed by perceiving long bills hanging in pork shops or pasted upon oblong boards, with stars, whose names we know not, figuring in all the pride of big type: and on Monday evening the little Strand, resolved not to be outdone, brought out its own version; and with the same success which has attended its production at other establishments, being announced for repetition amidst unanimous applause. It was well acted throughout, and got up with great care: indeed, it is remarkable what good management can effect on this very limited and inconvenient stage; there being, as we believe, only fourteen feet between the proscenium and the back wall.

SURREY.

As we predicted, "Don Cæsar de Bazan" has crossed the Thames and made his obeisance to the audiences of two of the "transpoutine" houses. The adaptation of the Surrey version has been entrusted to Mr. C. Z. Barnett, a gentleman who has already put forth several successful pieces at this theatre. The plot is carried somewhat beyond the incidents as played at the Princess' and Adelphi, but does not lose thereby: besides, an extra spice of melodrama is always acceptable to the audiences of the Surrey. The hero was excellently played by Mr. H. Hughes, the Minister by Mr. Hicks, and the King by Mr. Johnson, whilst the rest of the cast includes the principal members of what is perhaps the best working company in London for the class of pieces required. Mrs. R. Honner's truthfulness as the gitana, Maratana, drew down warm applause from the audience; and Mrs. Vining's Lazarillo was very gracefully acted. Little Miss Terry had to bustle through the character of a domestic, and look plump and good-tempered. The manner in which the piece has been brought out, under the direction of Mr. Honner, deserves the highest commendation. Every thing is in good keeping down to the most trifling property, and the scenery, from David Roberts's "Views in Spain," by Mr. Brunning, really beautiful.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

"All the world is a stage," says Shakspeare; what if we pronounce the world of the current week to have been all a race? Let us to our hypothesis. Needless is it for this poor feather to jot down the right courtly, costly, gorgeous, and goodly doings to the which it gave existence and immortality in the metropolis of the world—London. Their record is written elsewhere in this fair sheet, whose monument is sculptured to them worthy the occasion, and which shall share its fame. Upon our especial pen devolves the task of narrating in what fashion the chivalry of the isle made tryst at Newmarket. Look then, most courteous of readers, on this picture: see ye not the aldermen mounting for the Corporation "plates"? And look on this: note you not how our merry men are making play for the Cambridgeshire "stakes," and is it not one great tableau of a race?

Never did sun rise more fittingly on a morning of account than that which ushered in the dawn of Monday last. Brilliant was its reception on the banks of the Thames; cordial its welcome on the sides of the green Warren Hill. There, brushing the early dew away, were coursers with speed which despised the wings of Pegasus, and courtly dames and cavaliers that had arisen from their couches at the hour in which elsewhere it is their wont to seek them.

In the memory of man there never was such a meeting as this Houghton now in discussion: its career has been watched by that aristocratic crowd, "the mob of gentlemen who live at ease"—and by a multitude of minor pretension—the mob which lives by its ways and means—or starves, as the case may be. The attendance, however, taken as an average, was excellent—the sport, in quantity, extraordinary—in quality, though not so good, quite satisfactory. The principle of centralization prevails too much in regulating the details of racing: here, during the present week, the whole of the interest, so far as the public were concerned, was crammed into the first day. On this, besides a host of small engagements, were to be disposed of, the Cambridgeshire handicap, the last hope of the betters round for the present year of grace—and the Criterion, to which we have often looked, and not in vain, for a crack winter favourite at Tattersall's. With what fortune these events, big with so much fate were decided, we proceed to state.

As we shall give an article exclusively to the Ratan affair, so soon as it is rife, we pass by all allusion to it, for the nence, and confine us to the matter of the course. Foigh-a-Ballagh having done a greater thing in winning the Cæsarewitch than was, probably, ever done by a racer—became forthwith the favourite, at odds on him, as we have seen, for the final great handicap of the season. For this cause (because it should have been just the reverse), people went forth to witness the result of the Cambridgeshire, in much such wise as they would to a feast of milk and water. At noon the business of the beath opened with a course of petits plats, and it was not till three P.M. that the note of preparation for the great cavalry manœuvre was sounded. The rush was then to the Duke's stand, where the ring was formed, and the semblance of betting began. Foigh-a-Ballagh's nominal price was five to four on him, but it was scarcely laid or taken at all. Seven to one was quoted about The Cure, but he had neither friends nor foes. Several animals were done upon for small sums at various odds; Evenus being laid against once in our hearing, at 500 to 10, and three sovereigns were accepted to return 100, if he won. The sight of the starting-post was a very animating one, for the sun shone, and the bright silk jackets glanced about like segments flying from a rainbow. Nineteen eventually mustered for the essay, and, with an indifferent start, were launched for the goal. As soon as they were on their legs, Walpole jumped to the front, and went away from his horses by some six or eight lengths; The Cure, Algernon—Col. Peel's colt out of Jason's dam, and Counsellor forming the division nearest his heels. The favourite got badly off, and when they reached the weighing-house, and commenced the hill for home, he was so completely disappointed, that here, most probably, the race was decided, A ruck of horses lay before him, through which he did not break till almost abreast of the Duke's Stand, where Evenus was leading at a killing pace, Walpole next, and Foigh-a-Ballagh an indifferent third. He was struggling however, gallantly, and soon beat Walpole. At this moment Bell began to punish him—the noble animal answered every stripe, but all would not do; Evenus, one of the speediest horses at Newmarket, was in his tremendous stroke, and all was over; he won by two lengths—full of running—and would have run further, had it been required of him. The Criterion brought out eleven—the winner being Lord Lonsdale's colt by Jerry, out of Turquoise—disqualified for the Derby by the death of the Duke of Grafton, by whom he was named. The remainder of the week's racing was all of a temporary interest, save the proposed match between Alice Hawthorn and Foigh-a-Ballagh, appointed for yesterday—but too late for our impression, should it have come off.

DEATH OF MRS. HENRY SIDDONS.—It is with regret that we announce the death of this talented lady. Mrs. Siddons had left Cheltenham, where she had been staying for the benefit of her health, and on arriving in London had a surgical operation performed, which she survived only two days.

RAILWAY ACCIDENT.—A guard on the Great Western Railway, named Hancock, met with a shocking and fatal accident on Sunday evening. The up goods train had just started from the Western Road Station at Bath, when the deceased jumped on the step to proceed with it; and, missing his footing, fell under the carriages, and was dreadfully mutilated. On being extricated from his frightful situation, he was still alive, though an arm and a leg were nearly severed from his body; he died in a short time afterwards.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE (Friday).—We have had a fair arrival of English wheat since Monday, yet the stands to-day were by no means heavily supplied. The demand for that article was tolerably steady at full prices. There was a fair retail inquiry for foreign wheat, the value of which was supported. Owing to the large supplies of barley, that article was very dull, at a decline of quite 1s. per quarter. The quality of the foreign arrivals is very good. Malt, oats, beans, and peas, were in moderate supply and fair demand, at late rates.

Flour, American, 22s to 24s; Baltic, 24s to —s per barrel. Town made, —s to —s.

The Seed Market—Linseed and rapeseed have commanded full prices, but in all other kinds of seeds very little has been doing.

The following are the present rates:—Linseed, English, sowing, 52s to 58s; Baltic crushing, 38s to 42s; Mediterranean and Odessa, 40s to 42s; hempseed, 35s to 38s per quarter; coriander, 15s to 18s per cwt.; brown mustard seed, —s to —s; white ditto, —s to —s; tares, —s to—s per bushel; English rapeseed, £23 to £25 per last of ten quarters; Linseed cakes, English, £10 10s to £11; do., Foreign, £6 15s to £7 per 1000; rapeseed cakes, £5 10s to £6 6s per ton; canary, 54s to 56s per quarter.

Tea.—Decidedly more business is doing in this article, yet we can notice no improvement in value. Common congou is selling at 10d to $10\frac{1}{2}$d per lb.

Sugar.—Fine qualities of West India sugar are in request, at full prices. In all other kinds of sugar very little is doing, and the rates are with difficulty supported.

Coffee.—The supplies of coffee offering in the market are not very extensive, yet the demand for all qualities is in a sluggish state, and prices have a downward tendency. Good ordinary Ceylon may be had at 51s to 51s 6d per cwt.

Rice.—Bengal is in good request, at full prices. Low has sold at 10s to 10s 6d, and middling white, 11s to 11s 3d per cwt.

Coals (Friday).—Adair's, 16s 6d; Hasting's Hartley, 18s; Holywell Main, 19s 8d; Ord's Redheugh, 16s 3d; Townley, 17s 6d; Wylam, 17s; Killingworth, 20s 9d; Belmont, 21s 9d Caradoc, 21s; Lambton, 23s 6d per ton.

Hay and Straw.—Coarse meadow hay, £3 10s to £4 10s; useful ditto, £4 12s to £5s fine upland ditto, £5 3s to £5 10s; clover hay, £4 10s to £6; oat straw, £1 8s to £1 10s wheat straw, £1 11s to £1 13s, per load.

Oils.—This market is tolerably steady, and prices are fairly supported.

Tallow.—Very little business is doing in this article, yet prices rule about stationary. Old P.Y.C. is 40s 6d to 40s 9d; and new, 41s to 41s 3d, on the spot. Town Tallow is in request, at 42s, net cash Provisions.—The inquiry for Dutch butter is heavy, at 96s for the best Friezland. In Irish butter very little is doing, at 82s to 89s for Carlow, 86s to 88s for Clonmel, 80s to 82s for Cork, 80s to 84s for Limerick, and 76s to 80s for Waterford—all landed. All other kinds of provisions rule heavy.

Hops (Friday).—Since our last report we have had a very active demand for all kinds of fine colory hops, at full prices; indeed, in some instances, Sussex pockets have advanced from 2s to 3s per cwt. In old and inferior hops a good business is doing, at our quotations Duty, £130,000. 1844's:—Sussex pockets, £6 10s to £7 12s; Wealds, £6 18s to £8 0s Mid Kent, £8 to £10 10s; East Kent, £7 7s to £8 10s; Choice ditto, £10 0s to £12 Farnhams, £10 0s to £11 0s.

Wool.—This article is in very limited request, and the rates are barely supported.

Potatoes.—The supplies of potatoes being large, the sale rules heavy, at from 60s to 80s per ton.

Smithfield (Friday).—Although the supply of beasts offering here to-day was by no means large, we have to report a very dull inquiry for that description of stock, at barely Monday's quotations. There were on sale 135 beasts, and 100 sheep, from Rotterdam, besides 100 Scots, from Aberdeen. The numbers of sheep were small, yet the mutton trade ruled heavy, and previous rates were with difficulty supported. The veal trade was excessively dull, at a decline of 4d per 8lb. Prime small porkers were quite as dear, but other kinds of pork were very dull. Milch cows sold at from £16 to £18 10s each.

Per 8lbs to sink the offal:—Coarse and inferior beasts, 2s 4d to 2s 6d; second quality do. 2s 8d to 3s 0d; prime large oxen, 3s 2d to 3s 6d; prime Scots, &c., 3s 8d to 3s 10d; coarse and inferior sheep, 2s 6d to 2s 10d; second quality ditto, 3s 0d to 3s 4d: prime coarse woolled sheep, 3s 6d to 3s 8d; prime Southdown ditto, 3s 10d to 4s 0d; large coarse calves 3s 0d to 3s 6d; prime small ditto, 3s 8d to 4s 0d; large hogs, 3s 2d to 3s 6d; small porkers, 3s 8d to 4s 0d; sucking calves, 18s to 32s; and quarter old store pigs, 16s to 20s each. Beasts, 647; cows, 180; sheep, 4650; calves, 213; pigs, 380.

Newgate and Leadenhall (Friday).—We had only a moderate supply of meat here to-day yet the demand was heavy, on the following terms:—Per 8lb., by the carcass:—Inferior beef, 2s 4d to 2s 6d; middling ditto, 2s 8d to 2s 10d; prime large ditto, 3s 0d to 3s 2d; ditto small ditto, 3s 2d to 3s 4d; large pork, 2s 6d to 3s 6d; inferior mutton, 2s 6d to 2s 10d; middling ditto, 3s 0d to 3s 4d; prime ditto, 3s 6d to 3s 8d; veal, 3s 0d to 4s 0d small pork, 3s 6d to 3s 10d.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS FOR THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

There has been very little worthy of remark during the week in any of the markets. Monday was of course a strict holiday, in consequence of her Majesty's opening the Royal Exchange. The business of Tuesday in the English market was very limited, Consols quoting $99\frac{7}{8}$ to par for money, and 100, buyers for account. Wednesday's market was steady, with little doing. The public have not been purchasers to any extent lately; and the speculators are dealing very cautiously in every description of security at present. Money continues to maintain its advance, and Exchequer Bills have displayed consequent symptoms of depression. Loans have been done lately upon the security of Consols at Two-and-Three-Quarters and Three per Cent, a satisfactory proof of the increased value of capital. Thursday's market was firm, without any increase of business; and Friday, being the 1st of November, was a close holiday at both the Bank of England and the Stock Exchange. Prices at the close of the week quoted Consols for money $99\frac{7}{8}$ to 100, and $100\frac{1}{8}$ for time. Reduced Three per Cents, $99\frac{1}{8}$ New Three-and-a-Quarter per Cents, $101\frac{7}{8}$ to $102\frac{1}{8}$; India Stock, 287 to 288; Bank Stock for Account, 204.

The Foreign Market has been rather flat during the week, from the absence of business and the effect of the English Market. Spanish, on Wednesday, was a little in demand, and the price advanced a shade in consequence; the Actives quoting $23\frac{3}{8}$ to $\frac{1}{2}$; Three per Cents., $34\frac{1}{2}$ to $\frac{5}{8}$. On Thursday a report of the marriage of the Queen of Spain to the son of Don Carlos, with all the preliminaries, was circulated, which tended to make the price of Spanish flat. The allotment of the Scrip on the New Belgium Loan has been made by Messrs. Rothschild. The price quoted in the market is (nominally) one. premium. The Stock closed at $104\frac{1}{4}$. Dutch Five per Cents., $98\frac{7}{8}$; Spanish Actives are $23\frac{1}{2}$; Three per Cents., $34\frac{3}{4}$; Dutch Two-and-a-Half per Cents., $62\frac{5}{8}$; Mexican, $34\frac{1}{4}$ to $\frac{1}{2}$.

The Share Market has been tolerably quiet during the week, the only event of importance being the settling, which passed off easily. London and Birmingham have advanced to 215 to 217; Great Western, to 13 3 to 138; Midlands, to $108\frac{1}{2}$; and York and North Midlands, to 114. The French lines are firm, and closed as follows, Paris and Rouen, $40\frac{1}{2}$; Orleans, Tours, and Bordeaux, $3\frac{3}{8}$; Rouen and Havre, $9\frac{1}{2}$ to 10, premium; Eastern Counties closed at $13\frac{5}{8}$; Sheffield and Manchester, 98 to 99; Glasgow and Dumfries, $\frac{1}{4}$ discount; Edinburgh and Glasgow, 60 to 61; Ely and Bedford, $1\frac{1}{4}$; Chester and Holyhead, $6\frac{5}{8}$; Birmingham and Derby, 79; Dovers, $42\frac{1}{4}$; Newcastle and Darlington, $48\frac{1}{2}$; Greenwich, $9\frac{7}{8}$.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

Remand of One Insolvent and Re-committal of Another.—At the Bankruptcy Court on Tuesday, the adjourned examination of William Bromley took place. We stated the circumstances of his case on the previous examinations. He was a solicitor in extensive practice at Lincoln's-inn, and was found to have used trust moneys of his clients to the amount of many thousands, of the use of which he was required to furnish an account at the last hearing. This account, however, was not now forthcoming, and after a lengthened conversation, he was adjourned sine dine (without protection), but with leave to apply to the court again.—The case of another insolvent, Mr. Sawyer, was also disposed of. He carried on business as a solicitor, at Bow-lane, Cheapside, and his debts appeared from his schedule to be £6610, his credits £3320, but upon an analysis of the latter it was found that they would not realise more than £100. At the previous hearings, evidence at great length was adduced to show that he had improperly, if not fraudulently, obtained from a widow lady, named Rokes, a sum of £2400 which stood in her name, and which he induced her to sell out upon a threat of "transportation." The Commissioner (Sir C. F. Williams) went over the circumstances, and after intimating his opinion that the insolvent had acted fraudulently, refused to name a day for the formal order, and the insolvent was therefore remanded to prison.

There is something to please all inquirers."—Times. "We assert it to be the most attractive Exhibition of its class which has yet been opened in London."—Morning Post. "A visit to this Museum will amply reward the most sanguine expectation. It is an exhibition quite unique."—Morning Chronicle. COD LIVER OIL.—Read the following Undeniable Testimony of the extraordinary value of this natural remedy in the CURE of GOUT, RHEUMATISM, SCROFULA, DISEASED JOINTS, SPINAL and GLANDULAR AFFECTIONS, LUMBAGO, SCROFULOUS ULCERS, and other external Diseases:—

Gentlemen.—If my case is of any value to you I beg you will make the best use of it, as I have suffered too much from Gout and Rheumatism not to have the strongest sympathy for all who may be similarly afflicted. I purchased only one bottle of your Cod Liver Oil, and after a few applications was completely cured. I could say much in praise of this miraculous remedy, and shall be happy to reply to all enquiries.

I am, Gentlemen, your thankful and obedient servant,

Moore's Picture Gallery, St. Martin's-lane, London.

Gentlemen.—About 4 months since I was attacked with a disease of the legs, for which I was admitted into St. Thomas's Hospital, and remained there a month subject to all kinds of treatment. I left the hospital to try the advice of several medical men, and all without the least benefit. I was at length advised by a friend to try a small bottle of your Cod Liver Oil, and from the very first application experienced relief, and before using the whole of the small bottle, was perfectly cured and have remained in perfect health to this day.

OPENING of the NEW ROYAL EXCHANGE.—Future English Historians have a fine field for elegant narration in recording the gorgeous spectacle of Queen Victoria opening the New Royal Exchange. The tens of thousands who witnessed this ever memorable event, when they beheld their Queen, it was as if the very windows spoke; such eager looks, such vivid, sparkling, animated eyes, gazing with rapture on the glorious scene! while the all-attractive charms of the fair actresses shone resplendent in their power, and the white and swan-like neck, the rich, luxuriant tress, and the pearly set of teeth, formed admirable trophies of the Inestimable Qualities of ROWLAND'S KALYDOR, ROWLAND'S MACASSAR OIL, and ROWLAND'S ODONTO The august patronage conceded by our gracious Queen, and the several Sovereigns of Europe, together with the beauties which adorn the circles of princely and regal magnificence; and the confirmation, by experience, of the infallible efficacy of these creative, renovative Specifics, have characterised them with perfection, and given them a celebrity unparalleled. They have proved the theme of the poet; they are celebrated in the periodical literature of the whole civilised world: the lays of Byron, and the voice of the universal press, have proclaimed the incomparable virtues of the "Oil Macassar," and of its accompanying preparations.—Evening Paper.

"Few were aware," he said, "of the injury inflicted on the sight by too much or too little light, and by a sudden transition from gloom to light. He had tried several experiments, with a view to procure a light of a medium description. He commenced with two common candles, alternately snuffing and leaving them unsnuffed, and measuring the intensity of the light. The result of this experiment was, that he found that the candle well snuffed gave eight times the light of that which was unsnuffed. He then proceeded to a process of weighing, and found that one pound of the snuffed candles gave as much light as nine pounds of the unsnuffed candles."

Mr. Hawkins further found that a pound of candles, to burn (like PRICE'S PATENT CANDLES) without snuffing, gave the same light as four pounds snuffed in the usual way—say every ten minutes—and the same as eleven pounds unsnuffed altogether. After alluding to further experiments with Candles, and also with Oils, he concluded by recommending the Self-snuffing Candles in preference to Oil Lamps.

PRICE'S PATENT CANDLES have for some time past been advertised as more economical than common tallow ones, because, not requiring to be snuffed, they give so much more light. The Patentees now publish the above extract as a remarkable confirmation of the truth of their assertions. Those who still persist in burning tallow moulds, or dips, in the idea that candles at sixpence per pound are necessarily cheaper than those at a shilling per pound, may now learn how much real economy there is in such a course. Four pounds of the snuffed candles giving, as above shown, the same light as one pound of the self-snuffing ones, those who burn tallow candles at sixpence per pound are doing the same thing as if they paid two shillings per pound for Price's Patent Candles; for they pay four sixpences for that quantity of light which one pound of these candles will give. They suffer, moreover, the bad smell, dirt, and annoyance, arising from the use of the snuffers every ten minutes, and the injury to the eyesight, stated above, to follow the sudden transition from gloom to light when the candles are snuffed.

PRICE'S PATENT CANDLES are sold by respectable dealers in most parts of the kingdom, but care must be taken to insist on being supplied with the real ones, as many imitations are made at low prices for the shopkeepers, which, on account of the greater profit, some of them endeavour, and with too frequent success, to palm upon the public as "just the same as the Patent Candles." The trade may obtain them wholesale from EDWARD PRICE and Co., Belmont, Vauxhall; or from PALMER and Co., Sutton-street, Clerkenwell.—From the Athenæum of Saturday, 19th October, 1844.

THE HAIR.—Of the numerous compounds constantly announced, for promoting the growth or reproduction of the Hair, few survive even in name, beyond a very limited period, whilst ROWLAND'S MACASSAR OIL, with a reputation unparalleled, is still on the increase in public estimation. The singular virtues of this successful invention for Restoring, Preserving, and Beautifying the Human Hair, are too well known and appreciated to need comment. The very facts of the high and distinguished patronage it enjoys, its general use in all countries, together with numerous testimonials constantly received in its favour, are authorities which stamp its superior excellence and title over all attempts of a similar nature. Being universally preferred, its consequent great demand excites the cupidity of unprincipled shopkeepers, who vend the most spurious trash as the "GENUINE" Macassar Oil; whereas, the genuine article is wholly the invention and property of A. ROWLAND and SON, and the amalgamation of its costly exotic materials (solely imported by them) renders abortive any attempt to discover its component parts—thus proving the imposition of all other articles bearing the title of "Macassar Oil." The genuine article has the words ROWLAND'S MACASSAR OIL engraved in two lines on the Wrapper; and on the back of the wrapper nearly 1500 times, containing 29,028 letters.—Price 3s. 6d., 7s.; Family bottles (equal to four small), 10s. 6d.; and double that size, 21s. per bottle.— All others are FRAUDULENT COUNTERFEITS!!!

BELLS FOR THE HOURS AND CHIMES.

BELLS AND CHIMES OF THE NEW ROYAL EXCHANGE.

Every reader of the details of the destruction of the late Exchange must recollect the mention of the chimes, which, by a singular coincidence, were playing the air, "There's nae luck about the house," until the flames reached the loft in which were the chimes themselves.

In the new Exchange, chimes have not been forgotten; but they have been constructed with advantages not hitherto attempted in England. Chimes generally consist of a set of bells, tuned to the modern musical scale, and struck by hammers acted on by a pinned cylinder or barrel, which revolves by means of clockwork. Now, in this instance, Mr. Dent has, by the mechanical arrangement of the chimework, succeeded, for the first time in this country, in producing harmony in bells. The airs have been arranged by Mr. E. Taylor, the Gresham Professor of Music; which Mr. Dent has applied on the chime-barrel. The airs are:—

A Psalm tune, by Henry Lawes, the friend of Milton; it is in the key of B flat, so as to exhibit the capability of the chimes to play in different keys.

2. God Save the Queen, in E flat.

3. Rule Britannia.

4. An air selected by Professor Taylor to exhibit the power of the bells. The key in which the bells are set, is E flat. There are 15 bells, and 2 hammers to several, so as to play rapid passages. There are frequently 3 hammers striking different bells simultaneously, and sometimes 5. The notes of the bells are as follow:—B flat, A flat, G F E flat, D D flat, C B flat, A A flat, G F and E flat; the first bell, B flat, weighs 4 cwt. 26lb., and its cord 8 cwt. 2 qrs. 5lb.; the four bells, A flat, G F and E flat, weigh severally, 10 cwt. 1 qr. 9lbs.; 12 cwt. 2 qrs. 27lbs.' 15 cwt. 2 qrs. 14lb; and 23 cwt. 2 qrs. 24lb. The united weight of them is 131 cwt. 1 qr.

By certain new points of mechanical arrangement in the chimes, all irregularity of force is avoided by driving the chime-barrel through wheels and pinions. There are no wheels between the weight that pulls, and the hammer to be raised. The "lifts" on the chime-barrel are all epicycloidal curves, so that the force of the action is as equal as it is possible to produce for the regularity of the music. There are about 6000 holes pierced upon the barrel for the lifts, so as to allow the tunes to be varied at pleasure.

The original intention of having the same number of bells (nine) as before the fire has been abandoned, and the number increased to 15. The alteration was at the suggestion of Mr. Dent, who, having visited Brussels and other parts of the Continent to obtain information as to the arrangement of carillons, for which the artisans of Flanders have acquired a well-deserved celebrity, was induced to recommend that the number should be so, that a more harmonious chime might be gained. Professor Taylor advised the committee to increase them to fifteen, which would then allow of playing in three octaves, thereby increasing the melody. They have been cast by Messrs. Mears, the bell-founders in Whitechapel. The largest is also the hour bell, and bears the following inscription:—"Cast for the Royal Exchange in the year of grace 1844; Richard Lambert Jones, Chairman of the Gresham College Committee; Daniel Watney, Master of the Mercers' Company; Ebenezer Trottman, Assistant; William Tite, Architect; Charles and George Mears, founders." The others only bear the words "Royal Exchange, 1844."

ROYAL VISIT TO TOTTENHAM-PARK.—The Marquis and Marchioness of Ailesbury have had the honour of entertaining their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess of Cambridge and the Hereditary Grand Duke and Grand Duchess of Mecklenburgh Strelitz at Tottenham-park, their splendid seat near Marlborough, Wilts. Their royal highnesses have now returned to town.

The Duke of Norfolk, who came expressly to town from Arundel Castle, to attend as Earl Marshal at the opening the Royal Exchange on Monday, has returned to his seat.

EXTRAORDINARY MODE OF SUICIDE.—On Tuesday Mr. Baker held an inquest at the Three Compasses, Brick-lane, Spitalfields, on the body of George Dixon, aged thirty-six, late potman at a house in Broad-street, City. Frederick Grover, of 5, Old Montague-street, Whitechapel, said deceased and his wife resided in the same house, and were in very destitute circumstances, owing to his having disease of the lungs, which prevented him from working. On Thursday afternoon deceased came into witness's room in a wild state, and drank with avidity four cups of tea, and whilst witness was getting him some more, he seized a long knife from off the table, and thrust it down his throat and gullet, so far that only part of the handle protruded from the mouth. Witness immediately struck deceased's hand from the haft of the knife, and pulled it from his throat, upon which deceased exclaimed, "I am determined to do it, and may as well do it first as last." Mr. Foster, the parish surgeon, was called in, but, despite his efforts, deceased died in three hours afterwards. Mr. Foster spoke to deceased's great destitution, and said that he died from the combined effects of the wound in the throat, causing internal hemorrhage, and inflammation of the lungs. Verdict—"Temporary insanity."

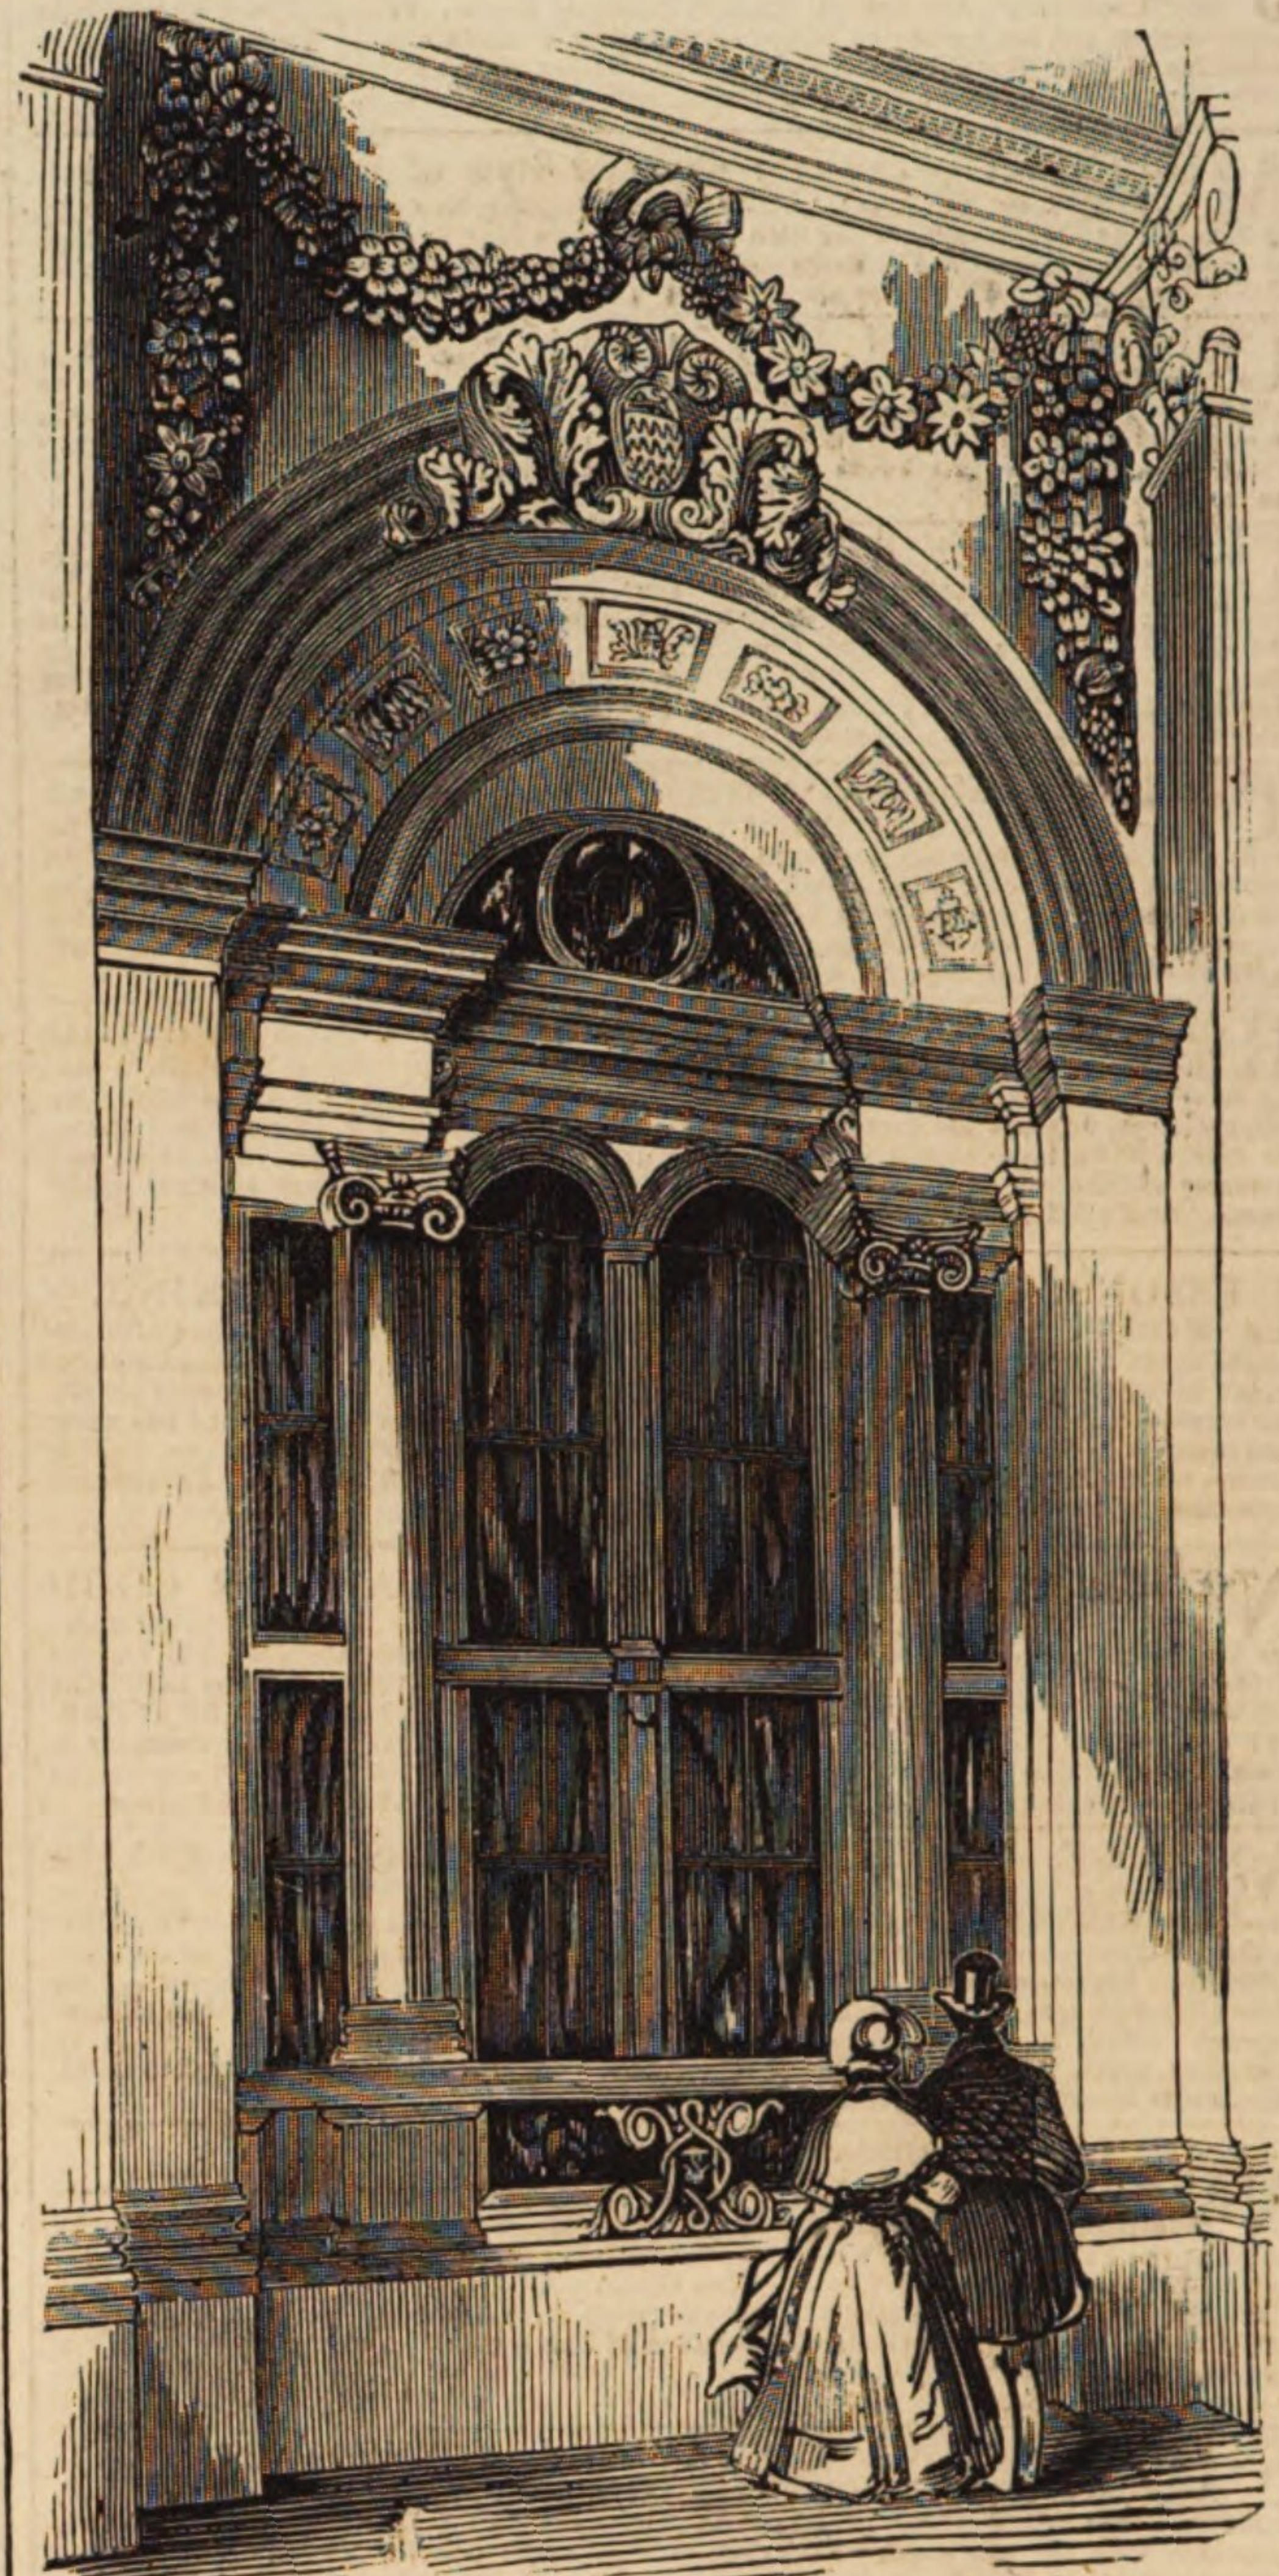
DREADFUL DEATH OF A CHILD BY FIRE.—On Wednesday evening Mr. Higgs held an inquest at St. George's Hospital, on the body of Abraham M'Donald, aged five years and a half, whose parent, a widow, resides at No. 12, James-street, Kensington. It appeared by the evidence of a man named Walker that, on Tuesday evening, he was passing through the above street, when he saw a burning mass rolling on the pavement, and directly after a child's moans proceeded from it. He went to it, and found it to be deceased, with all his clothes on fire, and nearly burned off. With assistance he extinguished the fire, and the child having been first seen by Dr. Merriman, of Kensington-square, it was removed to that hospital, in which it died in a few hours. The mother of deceased said she had only left her room to fetch some beer, and thought the accident was caused by the child endeavouring to take some potatoes from a saucepan on the fire. Verdict—"Accidental death."

THE EXPERIMENTAL SQUADRONS.—The experimental squadrons, composed of three first-rates and eight brigs, are now at sea, and our naval annals do not present an instance of a similar effort having been made by any former naval administration justly to test the relative merits of ships of different construction, from the highest to the lowest classes of British men-of-war. The first squadron consists of three three-deckers—Caledonia, 120, bearing the flag of Rear-Admiral Bowles, C.B., the St. Vincent, also of 120 guns, the Queen, 110, and the Albion, 90 guns, which ship will join the others during their cruise. The second squadron, consisting of the eight brigs, is placed under the command of Captain Corry, in the Firebrand steam-frigate. It is expected that a severe trial for a period of about two months will take place before these vessels will return to port, or be dispatched to respective stations.

THE NEW ROYAL EXCHANGE.—WEST FRONT.

THE GREAT WESTERN PORTICO.

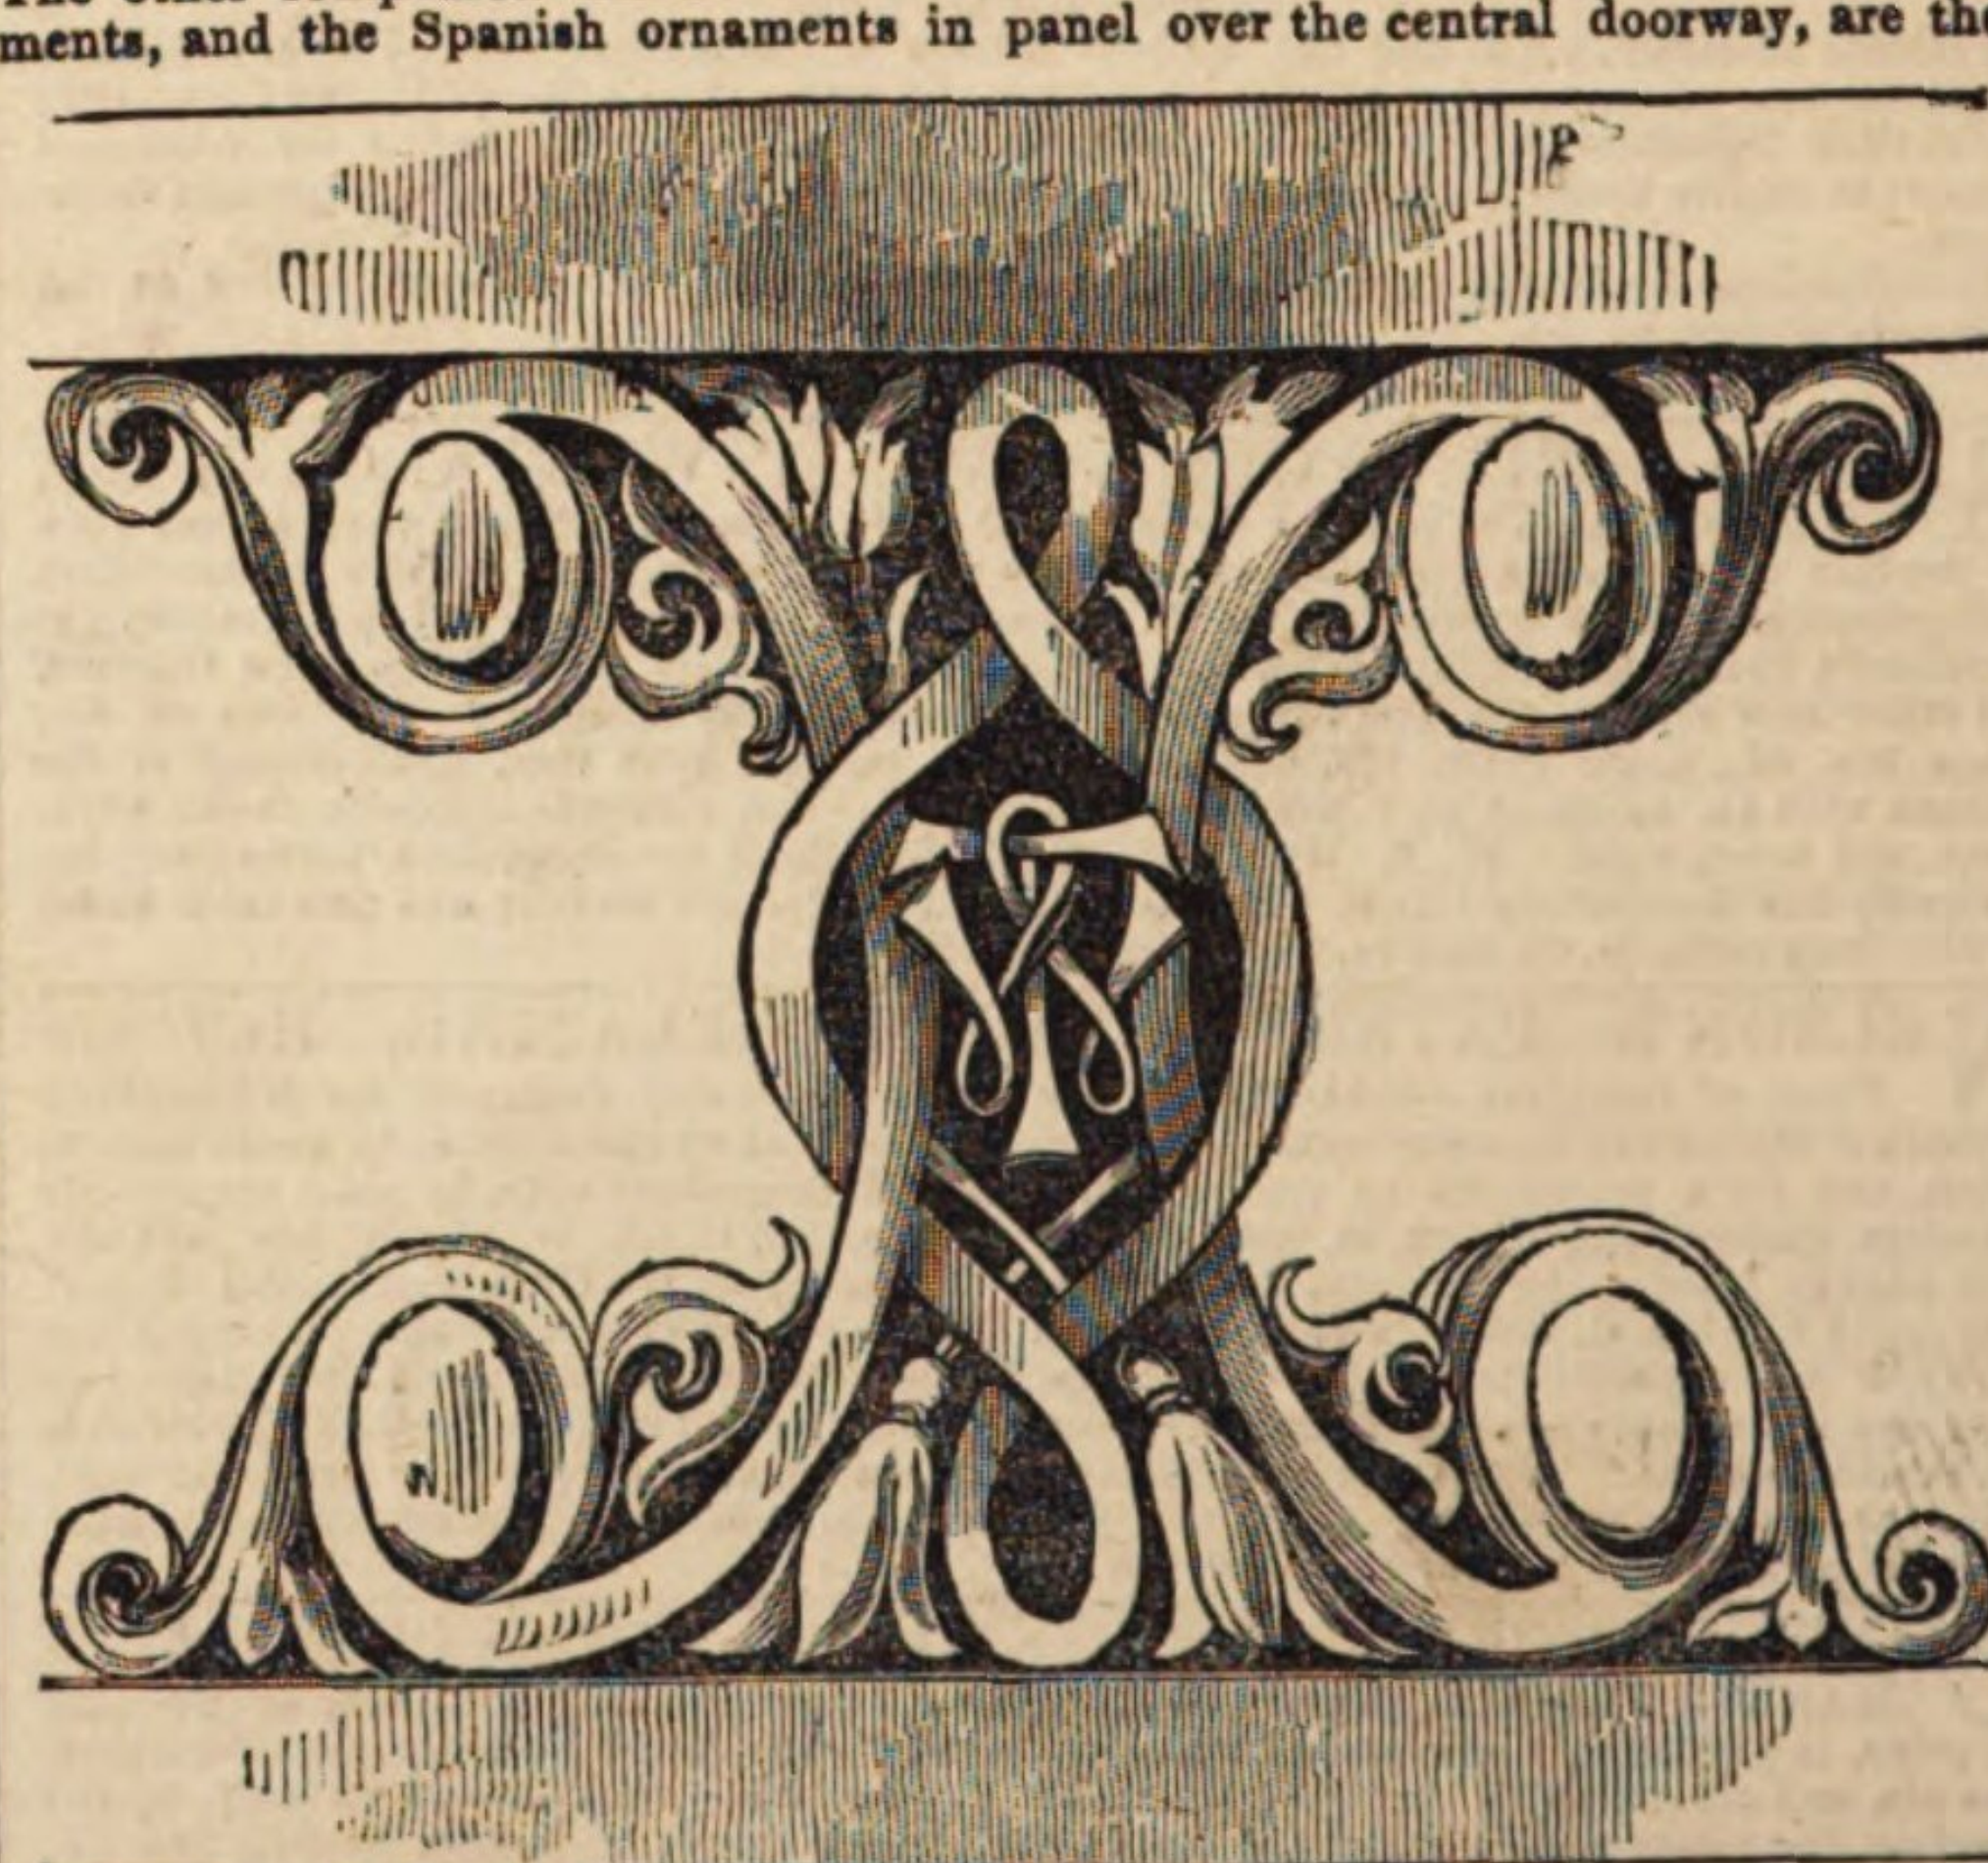
In our journal of last week we detailed the external façades of the New Exchange, reserving, for the present occasion, a few of the characteristics of the great Western Portico, and its interior; which, as Mr. Tite observes, "is very superior in dimensions to any in this country, and not very inferior to any in the world." The columns are 4 feet 2 inches in diameter; their height, including the base and capital, is 41 feet; the capitals, by the way, are composite, of the architect's original modification. The principal western entrance is under this portico, which is ascended by thirteen granite steps from the level of the street. The whole west end is appropriated to the offices of "The Royal Exchange Assurance, for assuring Shipping, Fire, and Lives;" the entrance to these offices being on the right and left of the great western entrance. The interior of the portico is strikingly magnificent; more especially the vastness of the columns, and the beauty of the roof, which consists of three lofty arches, enriched after the manner of those of the Roman palaces. Nor must we omit to notice the two lofty Venetian windows flanking the principal entrance, and reminding us of Sir Robert Taylor's elegant windows in the garden front of the Bank Parlour. We have engraved one of the former, with the architect's monogram, which is ingeniously introduced in the façade, beneath the window.



VENETIAN WINDOW, WEST FRONT.

VENETIAN WINDOW AND MONOGRAM OF THE ARCHITECT.

Of the sculptural embellishments of this front, we must detail a few. In the compartments on each side of the portico are sculptured panels 7 feet 10 inches by 5 feet, of drapery and initials, and the sculptured masses of foliage and fruit, with imperial crown in the centre, 12 inches in relief, 7 feet by 4 feet 6 inches. The other sculptured enrichments on the archivolts, and the festoon enrichments, and the Spanish ornaments in panel over the central doorway, are the only remaining portions of the west front in which the sculptor has been employed, but it would far exceed the limits of this condensed notice to enter fully into their description. Over the central doorway is the Royal arms, sculptured by Carew. From the position selected, the sculptor has laboured under much disadvantage, as the limits of the opening are neither high nor wide enough, which gives a cramped and insignificent appearance to the Regal arms.



THE ARCHITECT'S MONOGRAM—W. T.

A special train left Southampton on Monday morning, at a quarter past seven o'clock, arriving at Vauxhall at ten o'clock, with twenty carriages filled with parties to witness her Majesty's procession on the opening of the Royal Exchange, and giving them the option of returning to Southampton on or before Wednesday—at one fare there and back.

The Journal des Chemins de Fer states that it forms part of the arrangement between the Saint Germain Railroad Company and the Government on the atmospheric railway from Nanterre to the terrace of St. Germain, that the various systems of Messrs, Clegg, Hallette, Perquem, Chaineroy, &c., shall be tried for a certain time before the opening of the road to the public, in order to test the advantages of each.

CONQUEST AND COMMERCE.

MUCH benevolent activity is expended in this busy land, we are sorry to say it, with little or no result. Men go to and fro, and knowledge is increased—that is to say, the knowledge of the evils that afflict us; but for the remedies, though not slow in being devised — every man and every society of men seem having their separate plan—they are very tardy in taking shape and substance. Our expedients evaporate in discussion, and are talked about so long that at last they "lose the name of action." But, if a nation has a bad or doubtful purpose to work out, the alacrity of its movements and the extent of power it displays are truly wonderful. We can only afford a few pitiful thousands for the great task of National Education, but we can sink millions in an Affghan war. Nor are we alone in our miscalculations of what is best for the good of the general mass. We have just been most forcibly struck with the mingled criminality and foolishness of the manner in which the French are wasting their national resources, pouring forth their millions of treasure, and, what is more precious still, the blood of thousands of men, upon the desert sands of a conquered territory, that not only returns no material profit, which a nation of heroes would perhaps despise, but does not yield even that military glory which we know they so highly rate. We allude, of course, to the French occupation of Algiers. The past history of their rule in that country, and the latest accounts of the state it has produced, alike show the miserable results of a mere war of conquest; the evils of which fall first on the people invaded, and then recoil on the invaders. The French have arrived at the second act of the bloody drama: they were first the sacrificers—they will be the victims.

Algiers, Morocco, and the French have lately occupied much space in the minds, or we should rather say perhaps, the journals, of all men. You could read about nothing even if you wished it, but the French and Mogador, unless it was, by way of variety, the French and Otaheite. On the whole, however, Joinville and his squadron carried it. The speculations about what the French had not done, and what they intended to do, could only be exceeded by the commentaries that were made on what they did do at last. And what was that? A number of ships, provided with all that men, money, and modern skill in the art of destruction could furnish, fired for some hours at the rotten walls of a Moorish town, battered them considerably, as might have been expected, landed for a short time on an island on the coast, spiked a few guns, and then sailed away—the latter being a movement which was not expected. What was the purpose of all this sound and fury signifying nothing? An Arab Chief had made himself, probably without invitation, the guest of the Moorish Emperor, and by appealing to the fanaticism of the said Emperor's subjects, was no doubt raising a force that might have been exceedingly troublesome to the French troops in Algiers. So to compel the Emperor to expel the Arab from the interior of his dominions, it was thought necessary to bombard a town on the sea-coast, the inhabitants of which had little to do with the matter in dispute, one way or other. This, so slenderly expedient as it was at first, was done after it had ceased to be expedient at all; for when the cannon were firing, negotiation had already done the work of war, and the poor Emperor had agreed to accept the conditions required of him, and, if he could, to comply with them. So all the battering was a sheer loss of shot and powder; but the Prince had resolved on having a bombardment, and would no more have denied himself the gratification to be derived from it than a schoolboy would have given up his squibs and staid away from a bonfire. And what has been the result of all the noise and excitement? As far as France is concerned, things seem to be pretty much as they were before. Not an inch of territory has been gained—a little plunder perhaps, including a tattered tent and a worn-out parasol, which gave Paris matter for two days laughter, but nothing more. Abd-el-Kader, the first casus belli, is again at large, hovering round the skirts of the French colony, ready for mischief as ever, and almost as likely to take the Emperor as the Emperor is to take him. It is evident the Arab will do just as he pleases, not what French treaties stipulate he shall do. Then, the condition of the French army of occupation is wretched; the men are worked and harassed, and subjected to greater deprivations than they were, except in occasional emergencies, under Napoleon. The policy of seizing an extensive territory, with only strength enough effectually to defend a small one, has multiplied isolated posts and stations, which require collectively a large number of troops to hold; ravage and waste have made what was once fertile, a desert, and scarcity to the verge of famine adds to the ravages of disease; beneath them both, more victims perish than fall beneath the sword of the wild sons of the desert. And as if all this was not enough, the French have needlessly plunged into a quarrel with the Kaybiles, a powerful mountain tribe, fiercely proud of the independence they have hitherto preserved from the Roman, the Turk, and the Moor, and they will perish rather than yield it to the French. They are eighty thousand strong, their whole district is one rocky fort, and they are wealthy withal, being more civilised—if coining money and making arms be civilisation—than the Arab tribes of the plains, who have been compelled to submit to the invaders. The Kaybiles were willing to be at peace and trade and traffic with the French—indeed they partly supplied the market of Algiers; but with that want of common sense which makes the mere soldier incapable of appreciating anything but absolute rule and passive obedience, the military governor insisted on their paying a tribute—the mark all over the East of submission. To the French demand of payment the reply of the mountaineers is, "come and take it;" and it seems as if the first attempt on the part of the French to do so, had ended rather unsatisfactorily. The accounts speak of an advance of a column to "reconnoitre" a village, of determined resistance on the part of the natives, of a retreat of the said column, and the loss of men and officers. Thus much may be gathered even from the French dispatches, which of course put the affair in the best light. The consequence of these hostilities will be, the French will have a powerful tribe for enemies instead of friends, the trade they have carried on with them will be suspended, and a series of engagements may be expected, in which both sides will suffer by the amount of bloodshed that is inevitable. Devastation, famine, slaughter, disease, deadly hatreds, and the possession of a land without any enjoyment of it—such have been the consequences of the invasion of Algiers by the French; they are the results of every war which is merely one of Conquest.

It is in no spirit of boasting that we contrast with this the results that have generally followed the occupation of foreign territories by the arms of England. We have invaded, descended on, and subjugated other countries, but the military power was generally made to subserve other objects, which, when accomplished, turned to the benefit of both parties. Since the great continental war, which was one of defence, we have scarcely been involved in any hostilities that have not been caused by attempts to interrupt our trade, and they have as generally been followed by an extension of it. For mere glory we care little; and it is the pride of our army that it has been a chief instrument in the spread of civilisation. It has been, in fact, a mighty engine, directed, not by the mad lust of Conquest, but by the humanising spirit of Commerce. Look at India. The destructive and brutalising system pursued by the French in Algiers would never have built up such an Empire as that we possess in the East. At the present moment, the condition of the natives is far superior to what it was under their own chiefs; life is more secure, property more safe, and they have every confidence in the integrity of English Judges; the native troops are our best forces, and the confidence they have in the good faith of the Company in the matter of pay and pensions has rarely been shaken. Our Empire, in short, has been extended as much by a wise policy as by arms. Again, in the more recent instance of China, we have gained territorial possession of the Island of Hong-Kong. A French army would have destroyed the trade of the place as a matter of course, for they effect that everywhere they settle; we have increased it tenfold, and the Chinese are flocking to the island to settle, preferring the safety and protection of the British laws to the corruptly-administered government of the Mandarins.

We conquer, but we carry with us also the qualities of good colonists and traders; the French conquer also, but they never settle; they have had Algeria some fourteen years, and they now hold it by mere force, having so ruined it that it has become not worth the holding. They have destroyed its agriculture within and driven away its trade from without, the army being a mere garrison in an enemy's country, continually liable to attack, and often suffering defeats at detached points, though superior military skill gives it always the advantage in a pitched battle. But what a disgrace is such a state of things to a civilised and Christian nation, occupying a splendid country on one of the shores of the midland sea, and within little more than a few days' journey from the Capitals of Europe! It will bring its own punishment with it; it is even now beginning to be felt, and in the national embarrassment which must be caused by this frightful drain of money and men, France will feel the evils which spring from that rage of Conquest that can only destroy; may it teach her a better appreciation of that spirit of Commerce which humanises and creates!

ADEN, "THE GIBRALTAR OF THE RED SEA."

By the Bombay Mail, received on Monday last, we are furnished with some interesting intelligence of our newly-acquired key to the Red Sea, the importance of which has been thus illustrated by the Hon. Mr. Cushing, American Commissioner to China.

"In taking possession of Aden, in Arabia," says Mr. Cushing, "the English Government has recently acquired a very important military post on the southern shores of Arabia, near to the Straits of Babelmandel, which commands the Red Sea and the Sea of Arabia, as Gibraltar does the Mediterranean and a portion of the Atlantic. Aden is, even more than Gibraltar, a castle of nature's own construction. At Gibraltar, England has excavated for herself a citadel in the heart of a limestone mountain. At Aden, she has planted herself in an ancient crater, and sits secure within the primeval fortress formed by the lofty sides of an extinct volcano."

Our object in this new acquisition is to protect our interests from the Arabs, Aden being the point on the Red Sea where the overland passengers to India embark from Bombay.

We gather the following details of the place from a letter recently published in the Courrier Français:—"Aden, which was formerly called 'Portus Romanus,' is a town of the Yemen, which, from its position and on account of its recent occupation by the English, promises to become an important commercial and military station, particularly now that Egypt is advancing towards the period when she will become a British colony. The town is built in the crater of an exhausted volcano, and is situate at the extremity of a small peninsula formed of volcanic matter, and attached to the continent solely by a low neck of land from 500 to 600 yards wide, and which might be easily isolated by a canal. The harbour is a magnificent basin, capable of containing an immense fleet, and is entered by a narrow passage between two other craters. It would be easy to establish defensive works on the rocks surrounding these craters, which would place the port in safety against any attack. One redoubt has been already raised as a security against the Arabs, ever ready to attack the English in their position. From this point to the gate of the town has been recently traced a road of about a league in length, by which the defile is reached, which forms the entrance to Aden. This defile, which is being fortified at this moment with a gate evidently constructed to resist other attacks than those of the Arabs, is about 100 yards long and four or five wide. It is cut out of a rock which stands 150 yards above the level of the sea. A formidable battery, commanding the entrance of the town, is in process of being erected above the rock on the left of the defile. A covered way with an arch thrown from one rock to another unites the system of defence which the batteries commenced on the summit of the rocks on the left will complete. The other side is absolutely unassailable."

The writer then confesses his astonishment at finding the harbour so easily defended, and this impregnable position surrounded by a natural girdle of bastions, which only wait to be armed to be capable of annihilating the most formidable fleets. "Aden has the advantage over Gibraltar of possessing a harbour which is perfectly secure, and capable of containing the most formidable squadron, and, consequently, of holding the key of the Red Sea against any power that exists. Last year, three British officers of Engineers came to Aden to study general system of defence, of which the works executed at the entrance of the town are the commencement." All this the correspondent asserts to have been done to resist the formidable attacks of some plundering Arabs, who would otherwise have realised enormous fortunes by stealing the English coal. At present the rocks of Aden are crowned with cannon. The only entrance to the town is fortified, and the garrison is already composed of two regiments of infantry and two companies of Indian and European artillery.

The intelligence just received from Aden, dated October 8th, is not very promising. The weather was then cooler than usual, but not a tree or green thing was to be seen; the vestiges of verdure being confined to a creeping plant or two, an occasional cactus which peers from the crevices of the surrounding rock, and a third description of plant not unlike in form and flavour the mustard plant. Thus much for the botanical features of our hardly-earned key to the Red Sea.

Of the 47th, which arrived in April last, about 1100 strong, 40 died, 70 were sent home, and 108 remain in hospital.

No acute diseases are here known; small-pox is unheard of; and vaccination will not take, as though nature had implanted discretional powers to adopt or reject measures of alleviation or prevention, as the system might need or could dispense with them.

The sickness arises rather from exhaustion and gradual reduction of strength, with exposure to the sun, which is not always avoidable. Dropsy and depressed spirits are the prevailing characteristics. It is, however, a necessary adjunct to British possessions, and must be retained even at a sacrifice.

The Times correspondent continues:—"In despite of sickness and desolation, Aden has its charms if the increase in the population of the suburbs may be taken as an indication of such an impression. When first occupied, the population did not exceed 4000; it is now upwards of 30,000; and every morning at daybreak you will see from 50 to 200 camels coming into the town laden with the produce of the interior—provisions, vegetables, &c.—to console and comfort the otherwise benighted occupants of this extinguished crater. The fact is, the security to property afforded by a residence within the limits of British possession and influence has contributed in no inconsiderable degree to this outward sign of prosperity and thriving appearance. Among other passengers by the steamer who are proceeding direct to England, is Mr. Stephenson, who has been engaged collecting information and materials for the guidance of a company in the construction of railways in India; and who is expected to return to India again very soon, to begin operations."

Our view shows the harbour and forts from the sea, and illustrates, in a striking manner the impregnable character of the military positions.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

PARISIANA.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Paris, Wednesday.

The Braves Belges have just had an original inspiration: a club of both sexes has just been established at Brussels, under the title of "Il far niente"—(the "Do Nothing Club")—and it only numbers 55 members. Now, in Paris, on the contrary, it would amount to hundreds of thousands, at this moment particularly. Paris is nothing but an association of this description on a gigantic scale. Even pleasure is at a stand still, except at theatres and public places, thanks to the increasing ascendancy of fashion and imitation of aristocratic habits à l'Anglaise. Every one is as ashamed to begin to give balls, routs, and concerts, as fashionable fops are to arrive the first at a dinner party. In the mean time, we amuse ourselves in smaller coteries with on dits—fictions and facts of the moment. Of these, the following are samples:—

The other day, on the fête of St. Hubert, the Prince de Wagram invited his friends to a grand chasse in the park of Gros-bois, to be given in honour of the patron saint of the chace. The saint, however, was destined to be far more honoured than had even been intended, for whilst the sport was to be confined to much smaller game when the party sallied forth, their guns loaded only with small shot, great was their astonishment and dismay when, as they were endeavouring to raise a covey of partridges, a herd of nine wild boars rushed from the spot! The Prince killed two, point blank, with small shot, at the first fire. This exploit made the well-known general justly remark, that it was a new feature, and an odd one, to hunt for partridges and bring home wild boars.

M. de Lamartine is returned from Italy to his Chateau of St. Prout. The most contradictory rumours have been afloat concerning the motive of his journey; some affirming that he had gone to cull, from the romantic scenery of Ischia, new inspirations for another poem; others, that he had been sent there, on a special mission, by Government. Neither of these rumours has any foundation. M. de Lamartine is engaged in an undertaking more consistent than either of these with his political situation and his mature age. The Duchess de C. told me yesterday, that M. de Lamartine says, "he never writes poetry now but par distraction," and she knows on the best authority (his own), that his forthcoming work is on the subject of the famous revolutionary faction of the Girondins. Paris will not lack mental food next month, since at the same time they will have "Jacqueline Pascal," by Victor Cousin; 'Modern Literature," by Remusat; "The History of the Empire," by Thiers; and this work by Lamartine. A curious fact is that all these authors are great political characters, and three of them have been Ministers.

That very clever female diplomatist, Princess Lieven, so well known in England, where she was so long ambassadress of Russia, is the greatest puzzle imaginable to the volatile members of high society here. She is now advanced in age, but time has only perfected her acumen. She is the sister of General de Beckendorf, Minister General of Police in Russia, and the confidant of the Emperor, who is so much opposed to France. From the Autocrat the Princess receives a large pension as widow of an ambassador; still she has been long residing in France, the confidant and intimate friend—the adviser and Egeria of M. Guizot, whom she followed to England, and with whom she returned to France in 1840. During the recent absence of M. Guizot in England, Princess Lieven has been at Champlatreux, on a visit to M. Molé, the rival and sworn enemy in politics of the great Doctrinaire! By-the-by, General Beckendorf has very recently and very suddenly died. He was the father of Countess R. Appony, the wife of the son of the Austrian Ambassador at this court.

High society in Paris has just sustained a great loss in the Marquise de Pange, who died after an illness of a few hours, at her chateau of Pange, near Metz. The noble marchioness was the mother of the beautiful Countess de Marescalchi, wife of the Secretary of Embassy at Vienna, a son of the celebrated Florentine diplomatist and ex-Minister, the bosom friend of the Emperor.

The day before yesterday took place the consecration of the monument erected to the memory of Admiral d'Urville, who, after having distinguished himself in his researches and discoveries in the Polar Seas, returned home to perish in that dreadful accident of the Paris and Versailles Railway, in 1842. The wholesale destruction in which this celebrated savant and navigator perished does not injure railroad interests, whilst the short trains round Paris are thronged daily by a greater number. The speculation in new railroads is wild and terrible, involving the comparatively poor as well as the rich, the married as well as the unmarried, the young and the old.

FRANCE.

The French papers are unusually deficient of news, and their political commentaries are for the most part upon the subject of the lately detected conspiracy in Spain. They appear to consider the failure of the plot as a proof that Narvaez is sufficiently strong in public opinion to maintain himself in power. Louis Philippe returned from Fontainebleau to the palace of St. Cloud, on Sunday evening.

The Patrie announces that the committee charged with the reorganization of the Polytechnic School had proposed the exclusion of seventeen pupils from the institution, and that the Ministry had sanctioned the measure. All the others were to be invited to re-enter the school and undergo the examination, agreeably to the provisions of the ordinance of reorganization.

It was reported in Paris that the Prince de Joinville intends to conduct the Princess his wife, to the Brazils in the course of next year, for the benefit of her health, and to remain several months at Rio Janeiro with his brother-in-law, the Emperor.

The Moniteur publishes a Royal Ordinance authorising the establishment, in the Royal College of La Rochelle, of four chairs—of hydrography, of the theory of naval construction, of the elements of maritime law, and of commerce and commercial geography.

The Journal des Débats states that the Portuguese officers who emigrated to Spain with Count de Bomfin, in consequence of the insurrection of Almeida, passed on the 24th ult. through Guadalajara, on their passage to Talavera de la Reyna, the town allotted to them for their residence. The individuals implicated in the conspiracy of Valladolid were forwarded on the 24th ult. to the capital.

The Constitutionnel contains an account from Dellys of the 29th ult., of a battle between a division of troops under Marshal Bugeaud and 3 to 4,000 Kabyles. The affair lasted a long time, but the Kabyles were defeated with great loss. The French had only eight or ten men killed.

The Madrid correspondent of the National continues to affirm that the alleged conspiracy to assassinate Narvaez was entirely an invention of the police.

SPAIN

According to our latest intelligence from Madrid, the conspiracy, which had for its object the assassination of General Narvaez, had been defeated, and the promptitude and decision of the Government appear to have inspired confidence that the occurrence will rather strengthen than endanger the present Cabinet.

The Chamber of Deputies has been engaged in discussing the address in reply to the speech from the throne, the first three paragraphs of which were adopted without any amendment. In reply to a question, addressed to him by M. Perpina, respecting the non-recognition of Queen Isabella by the northern powers, General Narvaez observed, that although the Government abstained from taking any step calculated to compromise the national dignity, he hoped that the Queen would ere long be recognized by the powers which had hitherto ceased all diplomatic relations with her Government. "All the nations of Europe," he said, "are anxious to live on friendly terms with us, and are only awaiting the establishment of order in the kingdom and the adoption of laws which will offer them guarantees. Our negotiations with the Court of Rome are progressing satisfactorily, and we have every reason to hope that our relations with that court will soon be re-opened." M. Lara having subsequently asked "what measures had been devised by Government to obtain satisfaction for the outrage committed by the British against the Spanish flag at Gibraltar?" General Narvaez assured the hon. member that the Ambassador of Spain in London had presented a note to the English Government on the subject referred to by M. Lara, and the Ambassador of England at Madrid had assured him that his Government would give full satisfaction for that unfortunate occurrence.

The 4th paragraph, relative to the modification of the constitution, was then read, together with the amendment of M. Isturitz, who moved that the consideration of that question should be adjourned to another session. This subject excited a long debate, which was not yet terminated.

The Barcelona journals state, that more than 30 individuals had been arrested during the riots of the night of the 27th, to which we have already alluded, and imprisoned in the citadel.

GREECE.

According to accounts from Athens of the 21st ultimo, the King and Queen of Greece had returned from their visit to Eubœa and the frontier. His Majesty has received the petitions of his subjects, and heard their complaints of the tyranny of Griziottis and other chieftains; and he has promised redress. But he had no sooner quitted Eubœa than a secretary, named by Griziottis, and approved by the Ministers, was dispatched thither, who will soon convince the suffering people that it is easier for the King to make promises than to keep them.

The brigands are becoming more numerous and daring, and everywhere commit acts of the greatest atrocity. They make frequent excursions from province to province, plundering houses and driving off cattle. In Lacedemon, a band of 500 suddenly attacked a village where there was a great store of grain, which they carried off. Not far from Athens seventy-five cattle were driven off to the mountains in the night. The house of a priest was broken into, boiling oil poured upon his breast, and his wife put into a barrel, which the villains threatened to set on fire unless they confessed where their money was hid. Another band in Acarnania assailed the house of a small farmer, cut off the breasts of his wife, so that she bled to death, and murdered the maid-servant, and left the man dead as they thought, and then carried off his money and all that was valuable. Every province has similar tales of horror to recount.

CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.

We have received Cape of Good Hope papers to the 30th of August. The latest accounts from the eastern frontier state that the Lieutenant-Governor had disposed the military along the frontier of Caffer land, so as completely to command it, and to place every kraal within twenty miles of the line of boundary, entirely within reach, should any attempt be made to conceal the parties concerned in a recent inroad, by which a farmer named De Lange lost his life. The destruction of a small gang of Caffer robbers had also been effected, and although some of the tribes are represented as being hostilely disposed, the majority of the chiefs seemed friendly, perhaps from policy, as they were not equal to any decided resistance to the colonial government.

Upon the whole, the state of the colony is satisfactory. As an instance of the progressive advance of the colony, it may be stated that a joint-stock company had just been formed to run a coach from Graham's Town to Cape Town once per week.

There had been a heavy gale from the south-east, along the African coast, from the 20th to the 23rd of August. No damage was sustained by the shipping in Table Bay, but in Algoa Bay, a Brazilian slaver, sent in by her Majesty's ship Cleopatra, was driven from her anchors on the beach, and was a total wreck.

INDIA AND CHINA.

The Bombay mail of the 1st October has arrived, and although some of the intelligence brought by it was anticipated by the Hindostan Calcutta steamer, there are some points of interest. The Punjaub is by no means in a tranquil state. Goolaub Singh, the uncle of Heera Singh, has now thrown aside the mask which had hitherto concealed his real intentions. The preparations he has been making seem to be on an extensive scale, and no less than 80,000 men are said to have joined his standard, while his nephew has not been idle in making those vast preparations for war which are still carrying on, but the real object of which has hitherto remained a mystery.

The southern region of the Mahratta country was also disturbed. The people had taken possession of some forts, and the efforts of the British, under Colonel Wallace, to displace them, had not yet, by the last news, been crowned by success. The Bombay Presidency was even taking precautions, as if the state of the country would require more troops.

The accounts from Scinde are every way satisfactory. Another affray with 500 Beloochees has lately taken place, Captain M'Kenzie having marched to the attack, a distance of thirty miles from his camp at Khangur, and succeeded in completely routing them, leaving two hundred of them dead on the field.

A considerable loss of human life has been caused lately within the kingdom of Indore. The king having, as is usual at the festival of Gunputtee, given notice for the assemblage of all the Brahmins to receive his alms, an immense concourse of the caste assembled, when a staircase through which the multitude crowded gave way from the load, when upwards of 190 persons lost their lives.

The Bombay Courier notices in strong terms the hostile spirit evinced by the officers of the French navy, and states that an English vessel, the Samarang, had been fired into by a French vessel. The particulars had not transpired.

Serious riots took place at Surat on the 29th of August, in consequence of the popular dissatisfaction on account of the increase on the salt-tax from half a rupee to one rupee (2s.) per maund of 80lb. Troops were promptly sent there by the government, and the disturbances ceased.

The accounts from China come up to August 1, but contain little news of interest. Several disturbances had lately been occasioned by attacks on the American factories at Canton, but these were headed by the very lowest of the Chinese. Robbery and piracy were still prevalent to a great extent, but, despite the efforts of the authorities, it seemed next to impossible to prevent their recurrence, and business remained exceedingly dull.

COUNTRY NEWS.

Birkenhead Speculations.—One gentleman, at Birkenhead, in a small way, has cleared £12,000 by land speculations; another is said to have cleared £13,000 in a fortnight; a third bought some land several years ago for £3,000, and thought he did exceedingly well to sell it some years after for £10,000, but his successor has actually resold the same land lately for £80,000.

Fearful Accident and Loss of Life at Derby.—An accident of a very serious and fatal description took place on Tuesday, at Derby. A few weeks ago the Town Council and Commissioners of the Borough agreed to arch over the Glitting mill-brook, in the Morledge, with the view of adding a large plot of land to the Cattle Market. Accordingly, a Mr. Sims entered into a contract to carry out the extensive work, in connection with the large sewer just completed, at a great expense to the town. The works were commenced a few weeks back, and one portion of the arch over the brook completed, all but removing the centres. About eight o'clock on Tuesday morning Mr. Sims's labourers commenced removing the centres, and whilst in the act of taking away the last prop, the whole mass of material fell in, burying the unfortunate men in the ruins. News of the sad calamity was soon in all parts of the town, and thousands of people rushed to the spot. Every possible exertion was made to remove the materials, but from the immense quantity which had fallen (the arch being an expansive one), this was a work of some time, notwithstanding there was no lack of willing hands. The first body found was that of the contractor's son-in-law, and as the mangled remains were disentombed, a thrill of horror passed through the immense crowd. Six dead bodies, all of them more or less mutilated, were afterwards extricated. The bodies presented a sad spectacle, and the melancholy event has cast a gloom upon the town. It is supposed that the centres of the arch were removed too early, the late heavy rains having prevented the materials "setting" sufficiently firm to allow of the taking away the centres. At the inquest, which was held on Wednesday, the jury delivered in a verdict of "Accidental death," with a deodand of 1s. upon the centre of the arch.

Lamentable Accident at Stockport.—On Tuesday morning a fatal accident occurred at the Churchgate factory, Stockport, belonging to Messrs. Elkanah and Samuel Howard Cheetham, by the falling of a large chimney attached to the works there, and which, in its descent, unfortunately caused the death of two men, and seriously injured two or three others. The chimney stood in the yard behind the Churchgate factory, as seen from the public road. It and the surrounding buildings have probably been built between forty and fifty years.

Incendiarism in Berkshire.—On Tuesday evening a fire broke out at Hill-house Farm, Bucklebury, in the occupation of Mr. Hayward, which resulted in the loss of a large quantity of corn, and the destruction of several farm buildings. The farm is situate about half a mile from Bucklebury Church, and is the property of Winchcombe Henry H. Starkey, Esq., lord of the manor. A labourer has been apprehended on suspicion of being the author of the mischievous calamity.

The Double Suicide at Kilmarnock.—According to a Birmingham paper, the man and woman who lately committed suicide at Kilmarnock, under the singular circumstances already mentioned, were a Mr. Joseph Barker, formerly of that town, and his wife. Mr. Barker was one of the firm of John and Joseph Barker, Cromford-court, who were largely engaged in the German trade, and failed somewhere about the year 1814. Mr. John Barker, we believe, died very shortly afterwards, but Mr. Joseph Barker subsequently resided in London, and more recently travelled for some time for a house at Birmingham. This employment he left a few months ago, with a view to a connexion with a house in London, in which, however, he did not succeed; and it is supposed that disappointment on this score, and probably the exhaustion of his resources, led to the commission of the fatal act. It has been ascertained that the individuals came to Ayrshire about the time when the Burns Festival was held. No letters or papers came to them at any of their abodes, and they paid their bills with extreme punctuality in all the inns. The landlady at Ayr heard them once mention their names, and thought it commenced with a "B." They represented themselves to be from London, but they gave no address. In the afternoon, when setting out on their fatal evening excursion, in going along the passage, the gentleman observed, in a hearty manner, to the landlady of the Commercial Inn, at Kilmarnock, "We are going to take an evening walk. My wife is fond of a moonlight walk, and we are going like young people when they go out night courting." The woman, taking the arm of her husband, turned about and said, "I'll court no more—my courting days are over." Although they must, ere this, have fully resolved upon effecting suicide, they appeared to be in good spirits, and more like persons going to a social party, than individuals who had determined to "shuffle off their mortal coil" in the strange and yet most deliberate manner in which they accomplished it. From five o'clock, the time when they left the inn, to half-past eight o'clock, when there is every reason to suppose they immersed themselves, it is ascertained that they spent part of their time in a public house at Gateshead, which they entered and called for a gill of whisky, but of which they did not partake.

Alarming Conflagration at Strathaven.—The Glasgow Chronicle states that yesterday week a fire broke out in the quiet little town of Strathaven, by which upwards of forty houses, with a brewery and tan-work, were burned to the ground, nearly one hundred poor families thrown destitute to the street, and the annihilation of the entire town seriously threatened. The conflagration commenced at the south end of the town a little away beyond a place named Todd's-hill, where the population are chiefly weavers, and the wind being high at the time, and blowing from the south-east, rapidly spread the flames from house to house on both sides of the street, until, in the space of a few hours, notwithstanding the efforts of a body of the inhabitants who turned out to check the flames, forty houses were completely destroyed, in addition to the brewery of Mr. Vallance, and the large tan-work of Mr. Semple, where it is alleged that not less than £2000 worth of property has been consumed. One account states that about 53 houses in all have been destroyed, and 104 families deprived of the means of livelihood, or made dependent for shelter and support upon friends, relations, and neighbours. It is calculated that from 50 to 60 looms, with webs, principally belonging to Glasgow manufacturers, have been consumed.

Alleged Murder by a Boy.—Evan Lloyd, a boy, aged about nine years, has been committed to Carmarthen County Gaol, charged with having, on the 13th of September last, at Coedlanney, killed one Daniel Jones, a little boy, aged about seven years, by inflicting divers blows on the right side of his head with a stone. The poor deceased child, it appears, had been walking out with the prisoner, who arrived home by himself. As deceased did not make his appearance, search was made for him, and he was found lying on a heap of stones, by the road side, weltering in his blood. Many of the stones were covered with clotted blood and tufts of the poor child's hair. He had just strength left to state who his assailant was, when death overtook him. An inquest was held on the body, when, although the facts of the matter were well known to all, the jury returned as their verdict that the deceased had died, but from what cause, and by whose means, they had no evidence to determine. Notwithstanding this verdict, the prisoner was apprehended, and was committed for trial at the assizes.

WINTER FASHIONS,

(Abridged from Berger's "Ladies' Gazette of Fashion.")

We never recollect a season in which so many striking and beautiful novelties have appeared in every description of costume as the present (says the "Ladies' Gazette of Fashion.") The most important novelties are the royal winter dresses, patterns of which are given exclusively in the "Ladies' Gazette," and which, from their unequalled novelty and beauty, are sure to become the favourite dresses of the season. Dresses, cloaks, pelisses, bonnets, all have undergone a complete revolution in forms and materials: but to our notes, commencing with CHAPEAUX and CAPOTES, the favourite materials for which are velvet, velours epingle, and satin. Feathers of the lightest and most elegant kinds, will be more in vogue for trimmings than flowers. Velvet panachees will be the favourite flowers. Drawn Bonnets of velvet will be very fashionable. A new style of trimming, composed of nœuds of shaded velvet ribbon and blonde lace, will be in vogue.

CLOAKS, PELISSES, &C.—Cloaks of rich black silk will be very fashionable; also the Manteau Russe and the Paletot Grec, made either of satin or velvet. The favourite form for Pelisses is the Robe Amazone, descending on the hips, in the jacket style, and trimmed with favour velvet.

PROMENADE ROBES are made in the pelisse form, with the corsage slightly opened, showing the rich embroidery of the chemisette. Close corsages will increase in favour as the season advances. They will be braided and trimmed with velvet bands and buttons, also velvet ribbons. Silks, Pekins of Thibet down, basino de laine, tartanelles, and merinos of various kinds, will be the favourite materials. Furs will be much worn.

EVENING DRESSES will be made generally with low-pointed corsages, and round at the bosom, sleeves short, but not near so short as they have been. Velvet Robes have the sleeves much shorter. Flounces will be in vogue; also ruches, and other garnitures of ribbon. Demi-trains will be worn. For Ball Dresses, an embroidery in straw, of a very light and novel description, will be introduced; also, fringes of gold and silver, and net-work of small pearl beadheads.

CAPS retain their vogue. The new trimming is a chicoree wreath of ribbon in five different shades. Wreaths of oak leaves for evening caps. The turban Algerienne, composed of a gold or silver gauze scarf, ornamented with diamond epis, will be the favourite turban. Hats of crape decorated with feathers of the lightest kinds will be very fashionable. Colours, pomona green, dark blue, ruby, violet ponceau, pearl grey, chocolate, and neutral tints will be most used.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

A CHILD KILLED BY A FERRET.—A child about three years old, named Charles Flitton, was killed by a ferret at Whittlesford, Cambridgeshire, last Sunday night. The mother occupied a room in the old workhouse, and left the child asleep in bed about seven o'clock in the evening, at which time a ferret belonging to Joseph Brett was in the room, in a box through the lattice of which he could pass. On her return about a quarter past nine o'clock the mother found her child so wounded by the ferret that he died a little before three in the morning.

SINGULAR AND SERIOUS ACCIDENT.—On Monday a plumber, named Lawrence, assisted by another man, was standing upon a wall about 10 feet high, at a house in Sloane-street, Chelsea, pulling up, by means of a rope, a water butt. As the butt was ascending, the rope snapped asunder, and the impetus thus given to the unfortunate man's body precipitated him with great force upon a covered water-butt, filled with water, in the yard of the next premises. The cover was smashed to pieces, and the poor fellow's head and body became immersed in the water. He was conveyed to St. George's Hospital in a dangerous condition.

SINGULAR DEATH.—On Tuesday Mr. Baker held an inquest at the London Hospital, on the body of Thomas Stiles, aged 50, of Winchester-street, Bethnal-green, carman, who died under the following singular circumstances:—On Monday week the deceased was leaving the Woodman public-house, when he struck his right arm against an open door; the blow was so slight that he took no notice of it until two days after, when it became very painful, and he applied to a medical man, who attended him until Friday, when, becoming worse, he applied and was admitted into the hospital, where he died on the following day. The house surgeon said death was caused by mortification and delirium tremens, brought on by the shock the system had sustained, and deceased's previous habits of intemperance. Verdict accordingly.

AN OLD LADY KILLED IN THE STREET.—An inquest was held on Saturday, before Mr. Wakley, at the Elephant and Castle, opposite St. Pancras Workhouse, on the body of Mrs. Mary Anderson, aged 70 years, who met her death by a cart being driven over her, on the previous Wednesday evening, near Kentish Town. The evidence went to show that a young man named Coke, a carter in the employ of Mr. Gilbert, chandler, of Howland-street, Tottenham-court-road, and a shopman in the service of the same person, were in their master's cart on the evening in question, when the unfortunate occurrence took place. Both parties were apprised of the accident, but instead of stopping, the horse was urged on at a rapid pace, and, but for a female, who was in the vehicle at the time, they would have escaped. The female, it seems, mentioned the occurrence, and they were apprehended. The jury viewed the conduct of the men as highly reprehensible, and returned a verdict of Manslaughter.

SINGULAR SUICIDE OF A TRADESMAN'S WIFE.—Last Saturday, Mr. Higgs held an inquest at the Royal Yacht Tavern, Stanhope-street, Clare market, on Mrs. Sarah Anne Willeter, aged 22 years, wife of Mr. Willeter, tallowchandler, of Clare-street, who committed suicide under the following circumstances:—Mr. G. A. Walker, surgeon, of Drury-lane, said he was called to attend deceased on the afternoon of Thursday. On his arrival he found the deceased vomiting excessively. Upon making inquiries deceased told witness that she had taken twopennyworth of arsenic, but she refused to tell of whom she had purchased it. Witness attended her the whole of that day until nine o'clock in the evening, when she died. Charlotte Allen, one of the servants to deceased, said her mistress complained on Thursday morning of having a violent headache. Shortly after breakfast she sent witness for a pennyworth of sal volatile, which she divided, and drank one part herself and gave the other to her husband. About ten minutes subsequently she sent witness to Mr. Walker's for a pennyworth of magnesia; on her return she sent witness down stairs to ask her husband for a glass of brandy. As she entered the room again she observed deceased drinking what she thought to be the magnesia, but no sooner had she swallowed it than she was seized with sickness, which continuing, her husband requested to be allowed to send for medical assistance, but deceased replied, "Oh, never mind, I shall soon get better; it is only the bile." Witness could not tell what induced deceased to destroy herself, for she always appeared exceedingly cheerful, and lived upon very happy terms with her husband. After taking the poison she said, "I took it to die, and I hope I shall;" and then added, "Oh, Lord, have mercy on my soul." The jury returned a verdict of "Temporary insanity."

ANOTHER ACCIDENT ON THE BRIGHTON RAILWAY.—Another melancholy and fatal accident occurred on the London and Brighton Railway, near Hayward's Heath tunnel, about three o'clock on Thursday week. A man of the name of John Hobbs, who was stationed as a signal man to a number of men employed in removing a quantity of earth from the line where a slip has lately taken place, was knocked down by an engine working the waggons used in removing the earth, and dreadfully bruised on the head and many parts of the body. He was conveyed to Brighton immediately by the engine, and placed in the hospital. Hobbs has stated, it is said, that he knew the engine was coming, but he thought not on the rails by the side of which he was walking, and that on looking round, and perceiving his dangerous position, he was very much confused with fright. Hobbs is since dead. He is not a married man.

SUICIDE OF A GIRL.—On Tuesday evening a young woman named Mary Garwood, about 23 years of age, residing at No. 9, Leamouth-place, Blackwall, committed suicide by throwing herself into the river Lea.

VERDICT OF MANSLAUGHTER.—Several investigations have taken place at the Europa Tavern, Rotherhithe, into the death of William Everest, a waterman, who, as already stated, was drowned by his boat being run down by the Waterman steamer, No. 6, near the Thames Tunnel, on the 25th ult. The jury, after four hours' discussion, returned a verdict of Manslaughter against Samuel Sims, the master of the Waterman steamer.

FATAL ACCIDENT AT HACKNEY.—A lamentable accident occurred yesterday week at Cooke's Circus, at Hackney. The high wind suddenly snapped the ropes of the awning, and the centre pole fell with great violence into the pit, striking a Mrs. Isbetter with such force that she died soon afterwards. Her head was literally crushed, both eyes were terribly swollen, and her face altogether presented a most appalling spectacle. Near her was sitting Mrs. Laws, a relative, whose child was knocked out of her arms, and conveyed home in a dangerous state. Mrs. Law's child has since died. An inquest was held on the bodies on Monday evening, at the Crooked Billet, Clapton; and after some witnesses had proved the above facts, Mr. Baker, the coroner, summed up, expressing an opinion that there was nothing to prove that Mr. Cooke had not exercised due caution in erecting the pole and tent that had fallen. Verdict, "Accidental deaths."

THE NEW ROYAL EXCHANGE.

We now proceed to complete our description of the New Exchange, from page 288 of our journal of last week.

The great western entrance has been already noticed. The other external façades have been detailed. The cornice, which is remarkably bold, is throughout crowned with an attic and balustrade. The circular story of the tower in the east front is crowned by a dome carved in leaves. The vane is the famous grasshopper that surmounted the old Exchange; it was not much injured by the fire, and has been restored. It is of copper gilt, and is eleven feet long; the height, to the top of the vane, is 177 feet, and not 170 feet, as already stated.

THE INSCRIPTIONS

on the exterior may be quoted here from a well timed and neatly compiled volume just published by Mr. Effingham Wilson, who will speedily locate himself in the shop at the south-eastern corner of the Exchange.

"There is on the frieze of the portico the following inscription, recording the foundation of the original building in the 13th year of Queen Elizabeth, and its restoration in the 7th of her present Gracious Majesty:—

ANNO XIII. ELIZABETHÆ R. CONDITVM. ANNO VIII. VICTORIA R.
RESTAVRATVM.

Occupying the key-stones of the three great arches, there are in the centre the merchants' mark of Gresham; and on the key-stones of the side arches the arms of the merchant-adventurers of his day, and the staple of Calais. North and south of the portico, and in the attic, are the emblems of the City—the sword and mace, with the respective dates of Queen Elizabeth's reign and the present year; and in the lower panels, mantles bearing the initials of Queen Elizabeth and Queen Victoria, respectively. Over the three centre arches, on the south side, are the arms of Gresham, the City, and the Mercers' Company; and the same arms are repeated at the east end, on the entablature. Over the three centre arches of the north front are the following mottoes, viz.—in the centre that of Sir Thomas Gresham, in old French, Fortun à my; on the dexter side, the City motto, Dmne. dirige nos; and on the sinister, the motto of the Mercers' Company, "Honor Deo." (There is, by the way, an error in Gresham's motto which a correspondent of the Times has decided should be Fortvn Amy—"Fortune, my friend;" the arms, crest, and merchants' mark, still existing on the remains of one of Sir Thomas Gresham's residences.)

THE SHOPS.

The number of shops in the present building is not greater than the number of individuals claiming a right to reinstatement. There are, we believe, 46 of these habitations: the average height of the shops is 14 feet, the basement floor 12 feet, and the mezzanine 10 feet. Each shop has a cellar below, and, with very few exceptions, a mezzanine over. All the shops are secured by party walls, and made fire-proof. The mezzanine belonging to each shop is reached by a circular staircase of cast iron.

THE INTERIOR.

Having described the external appearance of the New Exchange, it only remains to notice the interior.

THE MERCHANTS' AREA,

or Great Quadrangle, is entered from four arched openings in the centre of each side. Its form, as that of the building, is parallelogram, and the inner area exactly a double square. Mr. Tite observes, with regard to this particular part of the building and its form:—"This form has many advantages, both in point of convenience and elegance over the old form; and it is also better adapted to the shape of the ground." The lower story is a colonnade of the Doric order, each column being about 34 inches in diameter. The upper order is Ionic. The area, or quadrangle, is 115 feet long and 58 in the general breadth; the width of the colonnade, or ambulatory, being upwards of 20 feet. The principal floors of the building have here windows looking into the court, three at each end, and five on each side; the windows being not in recesses, giving them a noble appearance from the court below. There are round that part of the building sculptured shields, in addition to numerous sculptured ornaments, of the arms of different nations having commercial intercourse with this country. The four façades of this internal court are surmounted by a pierced, or ornamental, and carved parapet, the balustrades giving a finish of considerable effect to the other architectural enrichments. The area exposed to the weather is covered with tesselated pavement, in various colours and uniform designs. In the centre of this area is intended to be ultimately placed the statue of the Queen, by Lough. The only other statues in the merchants' area are those of Queen Elizabeth in a recess in the north-east corner of the colonnade, recently completed by Mr. Watson; and Charles II., in a similar niche in the south-east corner. This statue, which originally adorned the centre of the quadrangle of the late Exchange, and which escaped destruction at the calamitous fire of 1838, has been carefully restored. The object in these two statues is to commemorate the opening of the first Exchange by Queen Elizabeth; and the laying the first stone of the Exchange of 1667, by Charles II.

THE AMBULATORY,

or Merchants' Walk, has, for its great feature, the encaustic paintings executed under the direction of Mr. Sang, of Munich. Their style is Italian and Arabesque; and of the devices, our engraving at page 277, conveys some idea. These paintings are not confined to the ceiling of the colonnade alone, but the divisions of the walls are likewise adorned round the whole ambulatory; the compartments being divided by pilasters, corresponding with the columns of the colonnade. The ceiling is separated into numerous compartments, the dividing beams of which are pendant and enriched with ornamental parts, so coloured as to accord with the colours and embellishments in the spaces, beautiful floral designs and masses of fruit being gracefully introduced. In each of the larger compartments are the emblazoned arms of the various nations trading with this country, so arranged as to be placed at the 'walk' belonging to the merchants trafficking with that particular country. As you enter the colonnade by the west, the arms of the British empire, with those of Austria on the right, and Bavaria on the reverse side, arrest your attention in the three divisions. Then in rotation are the arms of Belgium, France, Hanover, Holland, Prussia, Sardinia, the Two Sicilies, Sweden and Norway, the United States of America, the initials of the Sultan of Turkey, Spain, Saxony, Russia, Portugal, Hanseatic Towns, Greece and Denmark. The arms of Edward the Confessor, Edward III., Queen Elizabeth and Charles II. are emblazoned in the compartments of the four corner angles. In some of the union and irregular divisions are trophies, exclusively appertaining to subjects of a commercial and trading character. The borderings of the compartments are of colours harmonising with the figures, &c., introduced by the artist, all the grand work of the chief compartments containing the different national arms, being of a delicate colour, so that the emblazonments are seen in relief, and give a transparency to the whole of the colouring. The side walls are bordered with beautiful paintings of flowers and fruit, and in the centre of those divisions is a small chocolate-coloured tablet, on which the respective "walk" is to be written in English characters, so as to avoid confusion in the ambulatory to parties resorting there for the purposes of their trade. In eight small circular panels are introduced the arms of the three Lord Mayors, viz., Pirie, Humphery, and Magnay; and also the three Masters of the Mercers' Company, Pooley, Sutton, and Watney, who have respectively held office during the erection of the building. The arms of the Chairman of the Gresham Committee, Mr. R. L. Jones; and of the architect, Mr. Tite, complete the heraldic embellishments.

The roofs of the three principal entrances, north, south, and east, are completed in real penetrating frescos. The ambulatory is paved with Yorkshire stone, markedout into panels by margins and lines of black stone, called Castle-hill, with squares of red Aberdeen granite at the intersections.

The open area is laid with a tessellated pavement, after the best Roman examples. The tesseræ of which this pavement is composed, are burnt to great hardness, and having cast-iron channels to carry off the water, will always yield a dry and clean surface.

As may be imagined in a building devoted to business purposes, convenience and utility are the main objects to be gained.

The offices of the principal story are to be occupied by Lloyd's, the Royal Exchange Assurance, and London Assurance Companies.

LLOYD'S.

The apartments required by this important establishment are situate at the eastermost part of the Exchange, and the quarter portion of the north. It is on the principal or first story, and its entrance is by the east end, through the small or east area, an open space between the eastern entrance, over which is the tower, and the east entrance to the merchants' area. The apartments are approached by a spacious flight of stone stairs, the roof of the lobby being supported with handsome columns. From the lobby at the top of the stairway communicate the different rooms as follow:—

THE COMMERCIAL ROOM.

This spacious and elegant room ranges along the north side of the inner court, from which it is lighted by five windows in addition to five sky-lights in the roof. At the extreme ends are two columns of polished Sienna marble. Its dimensions are 87 feet long by 40 feet wide, and height in proportion. A cornice runs round this apartment, enriched with scroll work and tablets, on which are the ciphers of Lloyd's.

On the right, on coming up the staircase, occupying the north-east corner, is which has been admirably arranged for the convenience of those persons resorting to that particular department. The fittings are elegant, but are void of anything like extravagance.

THE SUBSCRIPTION ROOM

occupies the entire of the eastern side of the merchants' area, and is lighted from three principal windows from that side, as well as six raised skylights. The paneling of the walls is in accordance with the Italian style of the whole building, and the united shield of the arms of the City of London and Trinity Corporation are among the conspicuous ornaments seen in the room. Its dimensions are 98 feet long, by 40 feet.

THE LIBRARY, OR READING-ROOM

is lighted from the roof. A cast iron gallery surrounds the room, half way from the floor; it is intended above this gallery to arrange the maps for the inspection of parties desirous of seeing different localities. This room abuts on the south-east corner, and communicates with a suite of waiting-rooms and offices along the eastern front, until the captains' room terminates the range. There are altogether ten apartments appropriated to Lloyd's on this, the principal floor.

LONDON ASSURANCE.

The rooms required for this establishment are entered from the south, and the apartments occupy the whole of the south portion of the principal floor.

THE ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE OFFICES are situated on the principal floor of the west front, and occupy the entire extent of that front.

The apartments at the north-west portion of the building are unoccupied, and are termed "unappropriated" from that circumstance.

"Lloyd's rooms," as they are called, may be pronounced the finest apartments ever devoted to commercial purposes. In designing them, the architect has given a just and noble expression of the purposes to which they are to be devoted. Simple, massive, spacious, and brilliantly lighted, they strike the spectator at once with an idea of fitness—of adaptation to the exact wants of a great trading community. The style used is Venetian, modified to suit the circumstances of the edifice, and enriched after the best Roman models. The whole establishment comprises a subscription-room, of which we have given an engraving, as it appeared on the occasion of the banquet given to her Majesty.

Next is a Commercial Room, which we have engraved from a view sketched during its recent exhibition to the public, after the inauguration of the building; a Captains' Room, of small dimensions, but very highly enriched; a Library, also of small size, but very conveniently arranged, and chastely decorated. Besides are various committee and officers' rooms, one of which, on the south-east angle of the building, was used as the private drawing-room of her Majesty. The approach is by a fine Italian staircase, and a spacious vestibule, flanked on the north side by a piazza of novel and beautiful construction. It will be seen from this general description, aided by our very accurate cuts, that the whole arrangements are on a scale commensurate with the dignity of that vast naval empire which our merchant-princes will here direct; and that in their details, the progress of civilization has been most aptly represented, by the use of every available ornament which the progress of science and the fine arts have presented to the selection of the architect. They stand thus a picture of the age, and a proud monument of its wealth and genius.

Our cuts make any minute description of the great rooms unnecessary. We beg, however, to call attention to the manner in which, by an enlargement of the coveing of the ceiling of these rooms, a breadth and grandeur have been given to the design, which an ordinary right-angled cornice would not have commanded. The piercing of the cone for lights is also a very beautiful contrivance, and has an admirable effect. The only drawback on the proportions of both these rooms is found in a want of base, and, consequently, of apparent support to the upper members of the design—a defect, which we believe may have been occasioned by the monstrous space occupied by the tubing placed beneath the floors for the circulation of hot air. And, if we were disposed to be captious, we should find very serious fault with the staring yellow pillars—sienna marble, according to the newspaper reports—but paltry scagliola, in fact—which disfigure the Commercial-room.

The room used by her Majesty, and in which she inspected Mr. Tite's models, appeared to great advantage, fitted by Mr. Herring's splendid pattern furniture. In the centre of the room, Mr. Herring, knowing her Majesty's fondness for marqueterie, placed a table of that manufacture—but by English hands—which, for beauty of design and variety and richness of materials, has never been equalled; and around the room, as if to show the illustrious guests the superior genius of her subjects, was arranged several of the finest specimens of old French marqueterie. In other respects, the room had much the character of one of the gorgeously furnished apartments of Windsor, in which gilded chairs, enormous glasses, heavy curtains, rich carpets, &c., would seem to rival the tints of Rubens in variety and harmony. Her Majesty's toilette-table, in an adjoining room, was much admired.

Thus far the Exchange. The festivities, however, of the day, were not wholly confined to its noble halls; for at the Mansion House, and in the numerous halls of the city companies, splendid banquets and other entertainments were given. The one which was most numerously attended was, of course, at the Mansion House, where a grand ball was given to the chief of her Majesty's attendants, and the officers of the various regiments who were present in the City, and at the Exchange; the chief civic dignities, and a splendid train of handsome and accomplished women. The ball was given in the famous Italian Corridor, so deservedly admired for its size, and the beautiful arrangement of its colonnades; the supper in the Egyptian Hall; and the subsidiary enjoyment of beautiful books, prints, chit-chat, and coffee, in the Venetian and Wilkes' parlours. Our Engraving exhibits a portion of the corridor near the entrance of the State Rooms, as it appeared during the first set of quadrilles.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 9, 1844.

ONE of those events which are sure to put party pens in motion with more vigour than any other, has occurred this week. A Judge was to be appointed to the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Mr. Justice Erskine, and for some days the journals were quarrelling with each other about who ought to be chosen, and who ought not. Each paper had its favourite candidate, or, at the least, was able to find fault with the one proposed by its opponent. The question has at last been settled in the only way such a matter ought to be disposed of—by the appointment of a very able lawyer, Mr. Erle, to the vacant seat on the bench, irrespective of all political considerations whatever. The great object to be kept in view by the public at large, is having the administrators of the law able in their profession, and of unblemished character. Those great requisites secured, political opinions, unless they are particularly fierce and rabid, which, in a man of clear sense and judgment they are not likely to be, ought not to be made a disqualification.

THE intelligence from India is not what is generally called interesting; it brings nothing but accounts of the continuance of tranquillity and the quietude with which the new Governor-General has commenced his functions. The news from China speaks of some anxiety on the part of the English merchants at Canton, and their dissatisfaction at being left without the protection always derived from the presence of a British ship of war; they have lately, by some oversight or mismanagement, been left without one, and have been in some degree dependent for security on the influence of the American flag. This ought surely not to happen, and we trust it has by this time been remedied. Business continues active at Hong-Kong, but the troops are sickly.

ALDERMAN GIBBS is this day installed as Lord Mayor of London. He abstained from joining in the civic procession that accompanied the Queen to the Royal Exchange, in consequence of a letter from Sir W. Magnay, expressing some apprehensions that the unequivocal voice of public opinion that would probably greet him might not be agreeable to her Majesty. There has, therefore, been considerable speculation as to how he would escape in the procession in which he must unavoidably take so prominent a part. We have no wish to join in the controversies bandied about respecting this gentleman. For all the obloquy with which he has been visited he has nobody but himself to blame. If the charges against him are unfounded, he has managed to give them every appearance of being true, by an obstinate refusal to perform an ordinary duty, which most men are as eager to discharge as he has been reluctant. What has been said of another virtue holds good also with respect to honesty. It is not enough to be honest in this world; care must be taken not to appear the reverse. This care Alderman Gibbs has not taken, and though it is possible the pending decision of a Court of Law may clear him of the real blame, it cannot free him of a culpable obstinacy, and a disregard of public opinion, that have produced all his unpopularity. If he could have avoided it and would not, he must take all the disagreeable consequences. At the same time we must protest against the violent course recommended, by insinuation, if not openly, in a leading journal. The ruffianism of London needs no encouragement to outrage, and we dislike to see the mob incited to become the judges of matters in respect to which they have no evidence, and would not examine it if they had. The Times of Wednesday contained an advertisement for the supply of a large quantity of "rotten eggs," the allusion being evident. Perhaps the advertisement was actually sent and paid for, it is very possible; but a journal is bound to use discretion in this department as in every other, and the insertion in this case, the object being so palpable, should have been refused. We hate anything like an approach to "Lynch law," and here we have seen it, by implication, advocated. If Alderman Gibbs is really blameable, the Corporation and Livery of London have betrayed their trust in putting him in so prominent a position. A little of the most ordinary exertion would have left the man to sink into obscurity. Their folly, quite as much as his own seeking, have placed him on a pedestal, made him the head of the city and the chief figure in a pageant. Having done so, it is their duty, not only to abstain from pelting the idol they have created, but to prevent others from pelting him also. The dogged obstinacy of the man has involved him in a cloud of public suspicion, and we are not at all prepared to say he does not deserve it. But the citizens of London made him their chief magistrate with their eyes perfectly open to all his follies and faults, and they are bound to make the best of their bargain. As for the brutal violence contemplated in the advertisement we have above alluded to, we hope we shall hear nothing of it, and that Lord Mayor Gibbs may be permitted to go through the day in peace. A more uncomfortable Chief-Magistrate, probably, never rode in state from Westminster to Guildhall; luckily, half the day's work at least is done by water; however strong may be the support he derives from that mens conscia recti, which we hope he bears within, though he scorns to prove its existence otherwise than by the compulsion of law, yet we imagine he will more than once during his few hours of full-blown dignity exclaim with Falstaff "Would it were supper-time and all were well."

THE "lull" in Irish politics has been slightly broken this week by Dr. Maunsell, the proposer of the occasional sitting of the Imperial Parliament in Dublin, as a remedy for the social ills of Ireland. His plan was pretty generally laughed at, but the Doctor, like most men who have a crotchet, is not easily discouraged. He has just published the speech in the Town Council, in which he brought forward his scheme, and he has appended to it a "note" on the present state of the country, in which, it will be sufficient to say, he repeats something of his old arguments, again insists on the efficacy and practicability of his proposal, and traces back the present confused state of Irish party to the breaking up of the Orange Lodges. Neither his plan nor his arguments would be of much importance, but for the fact that they are put forward by a Protestant and a Conservative. On the other side of the question, O'Connell is quiescent at Darrynane, while at Dublin there are some slight symptoms of difference of opinion between the Federalists and simple Repealers, which will probably disappear so soon as O'Connell descends again into the arena; this, at least, is the opinion of Dr. Maunsell.

THE Spanish Moderados are going into excesses that altogether belie their name, and that have something of the absurd mixed with their ferocity. Thus, an order issued by the authorities at Barcelona prohibits any number of persons exceeding five from standing together in the streets, those not dispersing on being commanded to do so, to be shot or bayoneted at the pleasure of the soldiery. The same proclamation also forbids any one from carrying a stick in the streets of greater diameter than that of a real de veillon, which, as nearly as we can reduce it to our measure, would be about the diameter of a silver threepenny piece! We never heard of a revolution being effected by walking canes; but the heroes of Barcelona ought to know best what weapons are to be avoided. If sticks are so dangerous, Narvaez may thank his stars he has not got Tipperary to deal with; the "boys" and their "shillelaghs" would be the death of him.

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

WINDSOR, Sunday.—The Queen and Prince Albert, the Court, and the domestic household, attended divine service in the private chapel of the Castle. The Holy Communion was afterwards administered. The Honourable and Rev. Charles Leslie Courtenay officiated.

WINDSOR, Monday.—This morning her Majesty, attended by Lady Portman, promenaded in the pleasure-grounds and the Home Park for some time. In the afternoon her Majesty and Prince Albert took equestrian exercise in the Riding-school, attended by Colonel Arbuthnot and Colonel Wylde. His Royal Highness Prince Albert, the Duke of Bedford, the Earl of Lincoln, Colonel Wylde, and Mr. Anson, left the Castle soon after half-past nine o'clock, to shoot in the royal preserves at Bagshot.

WINDSOR, Tuesday.—The Queen and Prince Albert walked out in the course of the forenoon in the grounds adjacent to the Castle. In the afternoon her Majesty and Prince Albert again promenaded in the pleasure grounds. The Earl of Morton has arrived at the Castle, and has relieved Lord Byron from his duty as Lord in Waiting on the Queen; and Captain Meynell has succeeded the Hon. Captain Duncombe as the Groom in Waiting on her Majesty.

WINDSOR, Wednesday.—The Queen and Prince Albert took their early morning walk in the pleasure grounds and the Home Park. On the return of her Majesty and her Royal Consort, his Royal Highness went to shoot in the Royal preserves, attended by the Earl of Morton, Colonel Wylde, Captain Meynell, and Mr. Anson. In the afternoon her Majesty and Prince Albert promenaded in the Home Park for some time.

WINDSOR, Thursday Evening.—(From our own correspondent.)—This morning, shortly after nine o'clock, her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert left the Castle, and proceeded across the private grounds and the Home Park on foot to her Majesty's dog kennel, to inspect the progress of the model, now in course of execution, of her Majesty's late favourite hound Eos. The Queen and the Prince afterwards walked to the royal aviary, and returned to the Castle between ten and eleven o'clock. The Prince Consort hunted this morning with his Royal Highness's pack of harriers, in the vicinity of Slough and Salt-hill. Colonel Wylde and Mr. G. E. Anson were in attendance upon the Prince. Their Royal Highnesses the Prince of Wales, the Princess Royal, and the Princess Alice, were taken for their usual airing this morning in the Home Park: the Prince of Wales and the Princess Royal, riding on their Shetland ponies. The Dowager Lady Lyttelton was in attendance upon the infant Royal Family. This afternoon her Majesty, who was accompanied by his Royal Highness Prince Albert, and attended by Colonel Arbuthnot, took equestrian exercise in the New Riding School. Thursday next is the day which has been definitively fixed upon for the departure of her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert from the Castle, to honour with a visit the Marquis and Marchioness of Exeter at Burleigh House.

HER MAJESTY'S VISIT TO THE MARQUIS AND MARCHIONESS OF EXETER.—Her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert, according to the present arrangements, will leave Windsor Castle on Tuesday next for Burleigh House, on a visit to the Marquis and Marchioness of Exeter. During the short absence of the court from Windsor, which will not extend beyond a period of four days, the infant royal family will remain at the Castle, under the care of the Dowager Lady Lyttelton. The preparations for the reception of her Majesty and her royal consort are nearly completed. The gorgeous state bed is elevated upon a platform two steps from the floor, from which it is raised by a tripodial pedestal, upon which there are three lofty columns, elegantly carved and gilt. Above these is a spacious dome, surmounted by the crest of the noble house of Cecil. In the centre of the cornice is the coronet of an earl in highly burnished gold. The hangings contain 250 yards of beautifully striped coral coloured velvet, of British manufacture. These are lined, together with the tester, head, &c., with 900 yards of white satin, the whole interspersed with ornaments in gold. Deep silk fringe coral coloured trimmings, tassels, &c., give a finishing effect to the drapery attached to this superb and costly couch, which, from the ground, stands upwards of 20 feet in height. In the room in which the state bed intended for her Majesty and her illustrious consort is fixed, the late Duke of York slept on the 6th of January, 1821, on his return from a visit to his Grace the Duke of Rutland at Belvoir Castle. The ceiling in this room is most magnificently painted. It is one of Verrio's best works, and the subject it represents is "Mars Presenting Romulus to Jupiter to be Deified." There are also in this room sixteen other paintings by the first masters. The apartment is 23 feet 8 inches long, 23 feet wide, and 24 feet high. Three pieces of ancient tapestry adorn this room, each of which is 15 feet square. The following are the subjects illustrated by them: "Æolus, God of the Winds," "Vulcan at his Anvil," and "Neptune with his Trident." Latin inscriptions are attached to each of these beautiful pieces of work. Adjoining the above room is the state dressing-room, 21 feet long by 13 feet broad, and 16 feet in height. This room, now completely renovated, was thoroughly fitted up in 1789, and cost £2,100. The ceiling was painted by Verrio, and around the spacious apartment hang paintings by Rubens, Caracci, Poussin, and other masters. A superb suite of silver-gilt dressing plate, formerly belonging to William the Third, and a commode, variegated most richly with tortoise shell ornaments, form a portion of the sumptuous fittings of this ante-room. Next to these, and upon the same floor, is the jewel closet, a repository of the most rare and valuable articles. The expected visit of the Queen to Northampton has caused the greatest excitement in the town, it not having been visited by a Queen Regnant since the days of Elizabeth. The Corporation have voted an unlimited sum towards celebrating the event, and are going to meet her Majesty in robes, which will be the first time they have worn them since the Municipal Bill passed; and, in anticipation of the Queen coming from Weedon, the ruins of the ancient castle are to be restored by temporary erections, so as to give it the appearance it had when the Henrys and King John held their Parliament there. Triumphal arches will be erected, the poor feasted, and a subscription opened for the purpose of erecting a dispensary, to be called the "Victoria Dispensary." Many other preparations are in contemplation. Some misapprehension exists as to the exact locality in which Burley or Burleigh house is situated. It is not in the county of Lincoln, but in the parish of Stamford St. Martin, in the adjoining county of Northampton; so close, however, to the border, that Peck, the historian of Stamford, Lincolnshire, has thought it necessary to include a description of the building, &c., in his interesting work. Burleigh house, again, is only a mile distance from the town of Stamford, in Lincolnshire, a circumstance which may have induced the supposition that it was really situate in the latter county. The manor-house is undoubtedly the same as that possessed by the great William Cecil, the Chief Minister of Queen Elizabeth, who created him Baron of Burleigh, or Burghley, in the year 1571.

The Duke and Duchess of Sutherland, and lady Caroline Leveson Gower, have arrived on a visit to the Marquis and Marchioness of Lorn at Roseneath House, N. B., from Dunrobin Castle, whence their graces proceed to Lord and Lady Blantyre's seat, Erskine House, en route to the south.

INTENDED MARRIAGE OF MISS BURDETT COUTTS.—There is a report that Miss Burdett Coutts intends at length to bestow her hand and her immense wealth upon a young surgeon, the junior partner of a house at the west end. Miss Burdett Coutts, after a lengthened absence in Germany, has returned, and is now at St. Leonards.

Viscount and Viscountess Palmerston have arrived from Germany, and are now at Brockett hall, on a visit to Viscount Melbourne.

FUNERAL OF THE LATE COUNTESS OF BERKELEY.—We last week announced the death of the Countess of Berkeley, at Cranford House, near Hounslow. On Tuesday, the mortal remains of the late Countess were interred in the family vault, under the chancel of the parish church of Cranford, Middlesex, in which vault repose the remains of the Earls and Countesses of Berkeley, for upwards of two hundred years past.

DEATH OF LORD WESTERN.—Lord Western, the well-known agriculturist, died on Tuesday morning, at his seat, Felix Hall, Essex. His lordship was at one time an active politician, attached to the Whig interest, but for some years he had retired from public life, and long since he expressed his determination never again to mix himself up with the turmoil of politics.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

THE ROYAL EXCHANGE.—The Royal Exchange will not be opened for public business until after Christmas. Workmen are now busily engaged in removing the decorations used at the opening, and fitting up Lloyd's, the insurance departments, shops, &c.

NEW COMMON COUNCILMAN.—At a wardmote held in Broad-street Ward on Monday, Mr. Henry Marriott was elected to the Common Council in the room of Mr. Moon, lately elected Alderman of the ward of Portsoken.

KING WILLIAM THE FOURTH'S STATUE.—It is expected that the pedestrian statue of our late monarch will be ready for erection within a fortnight. Mr. Nixon, to whom its execution is entrusted, says that it would have been long since erected, but that in consequence of its having been cut out of a solid piece of granite, it required several touches of the chisel even after he had, as he supposed, completed it.

MR. ALDERMAN GIBBS AND THE OPENING OF THE ROYAL EXCHANGE.—The present Lord Mayor (Mr. Alderman Gibbs) has published an explanation of the reasons which induced him not to appear in the civic procession at the opening of the Royal Exchange. It appears that his lordship received a letter from the then Lord Mayor (Sir William Magnay), in which his lordship stated that there was likely to be an unpopular demonstration against Mr. Alderman Gibbs. Sir William made the intimation in these terms:—"As chief magistrate of this city, entertaining the deepest anxiety that no circumstance should occur to interrupt the harmony which ought universally to prevail on this happy occasion, I deem it my duty to convey to you a knowledge of the opinion which I have heard expressed in so many quarters, that you are likely to be the object of a demonstration of unpopular feeling, which the consciousness on your part of its being undeserved can form no justification for you unnecessarily placing yourself in a situation to call it forth, particularly so as your position in the procession, so near to her Majesty, would unavoidably make her acquainted with the existence of a feeling but little in harmony with the sentiments the occasion should inspire."—Mr. Alderman Gibbs, after citing the letter from Sir William Magnay, appeals to the good feeling of the public to judge whether he should not have been wanting in respect to the chief magistrate of the City, and in loyalty to her Majesty, if he had indulged his own inclination, after the receipt of such a letter from the Lord Mayor.

Early Closing of Shops in London.—On Wednesday night a public meeting of the assistants of London employed in various trades, was held at the Percy Hotel, Rathbone-place, Oxford-street, Mr. Lancaster in the chair, for the purpose of forming a new London Association of all trades, on the principles of the Linendrapers' Association, to procure, if possible, an earlier closing of their respective warehouses and shops. Resolutions of a mere formal nature were agreed to, the society was formed, a committee appointed, and several members enrolled. The chair was not taken until 10 o'clock, and the parties, in consequence of the present system, were not able to exemplify the principle of early closing.

Increased Value of Property in London.—From a recent return made by order of the vestry of St. Marylebone with respect to assessments in Oxford-street, it appears that in the year 1777 a house, situated on the north-side of Oxford-street, near Orchard-street, was rated in the parish books at £15 per year. In the present year the same house lets at £220, and is rated in the books of St. Marylebone at £120.

Appointment of Mr. Erle, Q.C., as a Judge.—On the retirement of Mr. Justice Erskine from the bench, Mr. Erle, Q.C., has been appointed to the vacant justiceship in the Court of Common Pleas. Mr. Erle, as our readers are no doubt aware, was a Whig, and some of our contemporaries express great astonishment that he should be selected. By some of them the appointment is considered as a proof that there was no Conservative barrister of sufficient character and attainments to fill the office. Mr. Erle was on Thursday morning sworn in before the Lord Chancellor as one of the Judges of the Court of Common Pleas, after having gone through the ceremony of being made a Sergeant-at-Law. He was introduced by Mr. Sergeant Wilde and Mr. Sergeant Talfourd. The learned judge afterwards proceeded into the other Courts, and went through the usual formalities.

London and Dover South-Eastern Railway Company.—On Thursday a special general meeting of the proprietors of this company was held at the terminus, London-bridge, for the purpose of authorising the formation of the Canterbury, Ramsgate, and Margate Line, and of adopting resolutions authorising the raising of additional capital, to the amount of £1,400 000. Mr. Richards, chairman of the Board, presided. It was proposed that the £1,400,000 should be raised by the issue of 42,000 new shares, of the nominal value of £50 each, to parties who shall pay for the same £33 6s. 8d. A very lengthened discussion ensued; but the resolution for raising the capital in the above manner was unanimously carried. It was next resolved that the mortgaged debt of the Company should be capitalised.

A Curious Wedding.—On Tuesday a marriage took place at the parish church of St. George-in-the-East, Cannon-street, which attracted much curiosity. The bride was Ann M'Cormack, an exceedingly pretty girl, who belonged to Rains's £100 School, and the bridegroom William Chanray, a smart young fellow, belonging to the Wellclose-square division of the Fire-brigade. The benevolent donor had by his will left a sufficient sum of money to support forty girls, to be elected from the parochial schools, for four years. At the end of that period they are sent out to service, and upon attaining the age of nineteen, and their characters being irreproachable, they become eligible to draw in a lottery for a husband. Two marriages take place in every year, namely, one upon the merry first of May, or "Sweeps' day," and the other on the 5th of November, or "Guy Fawkes day," and on the morning of each of those days a drawing takes place for the 1st of May, or 5th of November, as the case may be, and Miss M'Cormack having drawn the prize on the 1st of May last, was of course the next for preferment. When the lucky ticket is drawn, the next thing to be done by its fortunate owner is to seek out for an eligible partner (not a Roman Catholic, for they, according to the will of the testator, are ineligible) in the parishes of St. George in the East, St. Paul, Shadwell, or St. John of Wapping, and this being done, notice is given to the trustees for their approval. In this instance, Miss M'Cormack's choice fell upon the "Waterman-fireman," and the trustees finding no reason to find fault with his good looks or fair fame, nothing more was left but to go through the happy ceremony. In the evening, according to the usual custom, a dinner took place at the institution, at which the bride and bridegroom, and several of their friends, attended, and after the health of the happy couple was given, the chairman presented the bridegroom with one hundred new sovereigns in a bag, as his bridal portion from the institution.

Robbery at Lambeth Chapel.—On Wednesday morning early, or late on Tuesday night, some thieves entered Lambeth Chapel, and abstracted all the communion service plate and other valuable property.

IRELAND.

The Earl of Besborough.—We are happy to announce a decided improvement in the case of Lord Besborough, and that no serious injury has been sustained by that excellent nobleman.

Death of the Hon. Mrs. Blennerhassett.—The demise of this respected lady took place on Tuesday, at the residence of her grandson, Frederick Blennerhassett, Esq., of Blennerville. The Hon. Mrs. Blennerhassett reached a very advanced age.

The Repeal Association.—On Monday, at the meeting of the Repeal Association, a resolution was unanimously passed, urging the people of Ireland to use all their energies to augment the collection of the O'Connell tribute, which was to be made on the 17th instant. Some letters were read from Mr. O'Connell, upon the subject of Federalism, but they did not present any feature of interest. There was also a letter from the hon. and learned gentleman, warning the Repealers in Scotland against a society there, called the Order of Rechabites, the members of which, he said, were liable to transportation. The amount of the week's rent was £289 15s. 4d.

Storm and Loss of Life.—The gale of Friday and Saturday last has been productive of a number of shipwrecks on the Irish coast. The Shannon of Whitehaven was driven ashore about half a mile belew Balbriggan, at a place called Louther Lodge, and, such was the fury of the wind and waves, that she was at once dashed on the rocks, and fell over on her beam ends. Her crew consisted of eight hands, three of whom—the captain, his brother, who was mate, and a seaman—were washed off the wreck, and drowned, notwithstanding every exertion was made to save them. Another fatal casualty occurred at Clogher, about seven miles from Drogheda. A large brig, name unknown, laden with wheat, supposed to be from Wexford, and bound to Liverpool, was totally wrecked, and all hands supposed to be lost, as there was no account of any of them. Another wreck took place at Annagasson, near the same place. Name of the vessel unknown. She was dashed to pieces. The Drogheda Railway did not sustain the slightest damage, although the trees and bridges adjoining the line suffered severely from the severity of the hurricane. Several cabins at Donabate were blown down and unroofed. A steamer was lost on Saturday morning off Lambay, and all hands perished.

Another Murder.—On Friday week a party of young men met at a dance in the townland of Doneen, Sligo, within a few miles of Ballina. Some dispute arising, they attacked two men, brothers, named Foody, and beat them severely. Immediately after, another brother rushed into the party with a knife, and killed one of them on the spot, by stabbing him in the heart. He also wounded several others, who are so dangerously ill that their lives are despaired of. It is surmised that the meeting was an assembly of Ribandmen, as they had signs and passwords.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

The Absconding Bankrupt.—In the Bankruptcy Court on Wednesday, Robert Bannister, the bankrupt who had carried on business as a draper at Portsea, and who absconded to Madeira with a large sum of money, was examined. It appeared from the account he gave that he had sold various parcels of goods at sums infinitely below their cost. He had received £6931 from the time he commenced business till the opening of the fiat. He said he threw himself upon the mercy of his creditors, and that he had not a shilling in the world. Among other items the sum of £210 was put down for personal expenses for fourteen weeks. The bankrupt said he spent a good deal of it in the theatres and saloons, and those sort of places in London generally. He frequently went to the Opera, and he must confess he had been rather gay. Mr. James urged Mr. Goulburn to commit the bankrupt on the ground of not having presented satisfactory accounts, but his Honour said he could not commit till the whole case was investigated. The bankrupt law held that it was never too late to establish a locus penitentiæ. If the bankrupt should fail to come up on the day of adjournment, he would then be proclaimed as an outlaw. The investigation had better stand adjourned. Another examination of the bankrupt has since taken place, the result of which was, that Mr. Commissioner Goulburn gave his opinion that the accounts were most unsatisfactory, and not only adjourned the final examination indefinitely, but issued an order for the prosecution of the bankrupt, under the provisions of the 5th and 6th Victoria, cap. 122, for obtaining credit under false pretences, and improperly making away with and embezzling property.

Extension of Earl Dundonald's Patent.—In the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, on Thursday, the Earl of Dundonald (formerly Lord Cochrane) appeared in person to pray an extension of the patent of his rotatory engine. His lordship stated that he had incurred an expense of about £16 000 in bringing out the patent, and applying it to boats, &c. No opposition was offered the Crown and acquiesced in the extension. Their lordships granted an extension of the patent for the term of fourteen years.

The Baron de Bode v. the Queen.—In the Court of Queen's Bench on Thursday Mr. M. D. Hill moved for a rule to show cause why certain issues found for the Crown should not be set aside, and a verdict entered for the suppliant. The Court granted a rule.

POLICE.

Ingenious Smuggling by the Stoker of the Ocean Steamer.—An immense crowd, in the midst of which it was evident there were several smugglers, attended at the Mansion House, on Tuesday, to hear the examination of William Slack, a stoker on board the Ocean steam-vessel, from Rotterdam, who was charged with having been found on board that vessel in the port of London, the same vessel having concealed in her one hundred and forty pounds weight of tobacco, upon which the duty had not been paid.—C. Atkinson Davis, officer of the Customs, stated that, in consequence of information which he had received that a large quantity of tobacco had been brought to the river by the Ocean, from Rotterdam, he proceeded on board that vessel, at Blackwall. He and a brother officer had waited her arrival, and she came into the river, not in consequence of stress of weather, but in the regular course of business, bringing her Majesty's mails. Witness proceeded directly to the prisoner Slack's berth, and asked him to produce all the tobacco he had in his berth, or concealed near his berth. The prisoner produced three pounds of tobacco, and a small quantity of spirits, from the back of his berth, and said that was all he had. Witness told him that if that was all he could produce, he should suffer no hurt, for that was but a small quantity; but he (witness) was sure a large quantity was concealed in that vicinity. Witness told the prisoner to wait the issue, for no harm could come to him for what he had produced, and proceeded to take up some flooring boards adjoining the engine. The prisoner started up the ladder as quickly as he could, left the vessel, and went to the pier, but witness hallooed "stop" after him, pursued, overtook, and brought him back, and told him he must wait the issue of the search. The vessel then having landed her mails and passengers, went on to London, and witness proceeded with the search. After about three hours' search he found, on the starboard side, above the prisoner's berth, that a piece of board had been, with great art, made the means of concealment. Behind the two planks which passed up to the beam of the engine-room a piece of timber was fitted in and puttied, and painted over like the rest. That piece, which appeared to the eye to be part of the solid mass, was capable of being removed by the application of a screw. Upon the removal of that little door the timbers of the vessel were to be seen, and between the timbers of the vessel was a hollow space leading down to the bilge. A string was attached, from which a great number of packages were suspended, encased with lead, in such perfect security that they might lie in the bilge water without sustaining the slightest damage. The contents were tobacco, and from the manner in which it was deposited it equally defied injury from steam or salt water. Some of the packages were hung between the timbers to a depth of ten, others to the depth of eleven feet in the space, and some were four pound and others one pound packages. There was no possibility of discovering that tobacco was in the vicinity of the place of concealment, for the incasement was not only impenetrable, but the cord attached to each package, and communicating with the beam, was strongly impregnated with pitch and tar.—The Lord Mayor observed that the time occupied in preparing and depositing the contraband articles must have been considerable.—The witness said there could be no doubt of that, as after he had found out the place of concealment he was occupied two hours and a half in removing the packages. They had been wedged in by a forcing instrument. He found the screw which opened the secret door upon closely searching one of the berths.—The prisoner's solicitor cross-examined Davis, but did not elicit anything particular. The Lord Mayor said there appeared to be no mitigating circumstances in the case at all. It was quite evident the prisoner must have had guilty knowledge that the tobacco was on board, if he were not a participator in the fraud. It was evident, too, from his behaviour when the officer went on board, as well as from the fact that a great deal of time must have been occupied in depositing the tobacco, that he was perfectly aware of everything connected with the offence. The prisoner was adjudged to be guilty, and to pay the penalty of £100.

The Odessa Journal announces, that on the 15th of September last three shocks of an earthquake were felt at Kichnieff. On the same day a similar sensation was felt at Odessa.

The Hungarian Diet has come to a resolution that the nobility shall contribute a subsidy towards the expenditure of the State, but that the Government is not to have the application of the money. The amount of subsidy is only equal to 6,395,000 francs, which is said to be a very small sum, considering the immense territorial possessions of some of the nobles.

We are glad to state, that the accounts received from Carmarthen relative to the state of health of Major-General Sir William Nott, are much more satisfactory. The severity of the attack which he experienced has passed away, and the physicians who pronounced his case at first to be hopeless are now sanguine in the gallant General's early restoration to health and strength.

It comprehends, also, several other persons. The dates are from 1747 to 1755. These portraits are engraved after Mieveldt, by Tanse Honbraken, and other artists of the school of Brunswick. The plates are in a perfect state of preservation, and the engravings are of the greatest beauty.

POSTSCRIPT.

Preparations for the Queen's Reception at Stamford.—The Stamford Mercury says:—"Great preparations are making by the Marquis of Exeter for the reception of the Queen. All the tenantry, amounting to 400, have received orders to meet at Wakerley-ford Bridge, at three o'clock in the afternoon of the 12th, to escort her Majesty to Burghley, and the tenantry will afterwards dine at the different public-houses in Stamford, at his lordship's expense. Triumphal arches will be erected on different parts of the Marquis's property. The christening at Burghley is to take place on Wednesday. The cake is about four feet in circumference, and weighs nearly sixty pounds, without the silver ornaments with which it is tastefully decorated. There will be a dinner, at which the new Mayor will preside; and the committee appointed for arranging further demonstrations of loyalty are zealously fulfilling their duties.

The New Judge.—At the sitting of the Court of Common Pleas yesterday morning (Friday), the oaths of allegiance and supremacy were administered to Mr. Justice Erle, after which his lordship took his seat as one of the Judges of the Court. During the ceremony the other judges and all the members of the bar were standing, and at its conclusion bowed respectfully to the newly-appointed judge.

In the Court of Exchequer, yesterday, a rule was granted to show cause why there should not be a new trial in the case of Wood v. Leadbitter. The case, which excited some interest in sporting circles, was an action brought by the plaintiff against the defendant, for forcibly ejecting him from the Grand Stand at Doncaster on the first day of the races. On the first trial the verdict was for the defendant.

Another Agrarian Murder in Ireland.—Letters from Dublin announce another frightful murder, which took place about a mile from Limerick, on Monday last. It appears that Mr. Arthur Gloster, a wealthy landholder, returning from his farm, near Kilkeshen, county Clare, to his house, within a mile of Limerick, was murdered in the evening, at the early hour of five o'clock, by two ruffians, armed, who lodged slugs in the body of the unfortunate gentleman. According to report, Mr. Gloster had served notices to quit on some of his tenants, and this was the motive for the murder.

Swearing in of the New Lord Mayor—According to annual custom, the Lord Mayor elect was yesterday (Friday) sworn into his office of chief magistrate of the City of London, at Guildhall. Sir William Magnay, Bart., the retiring Lord Mayor, being a member of the Stationers' Company, that body took a conspicuous part in the ceremonial, as did also the Fishmongers' Company, of which the Lord Mayor elect is a member.

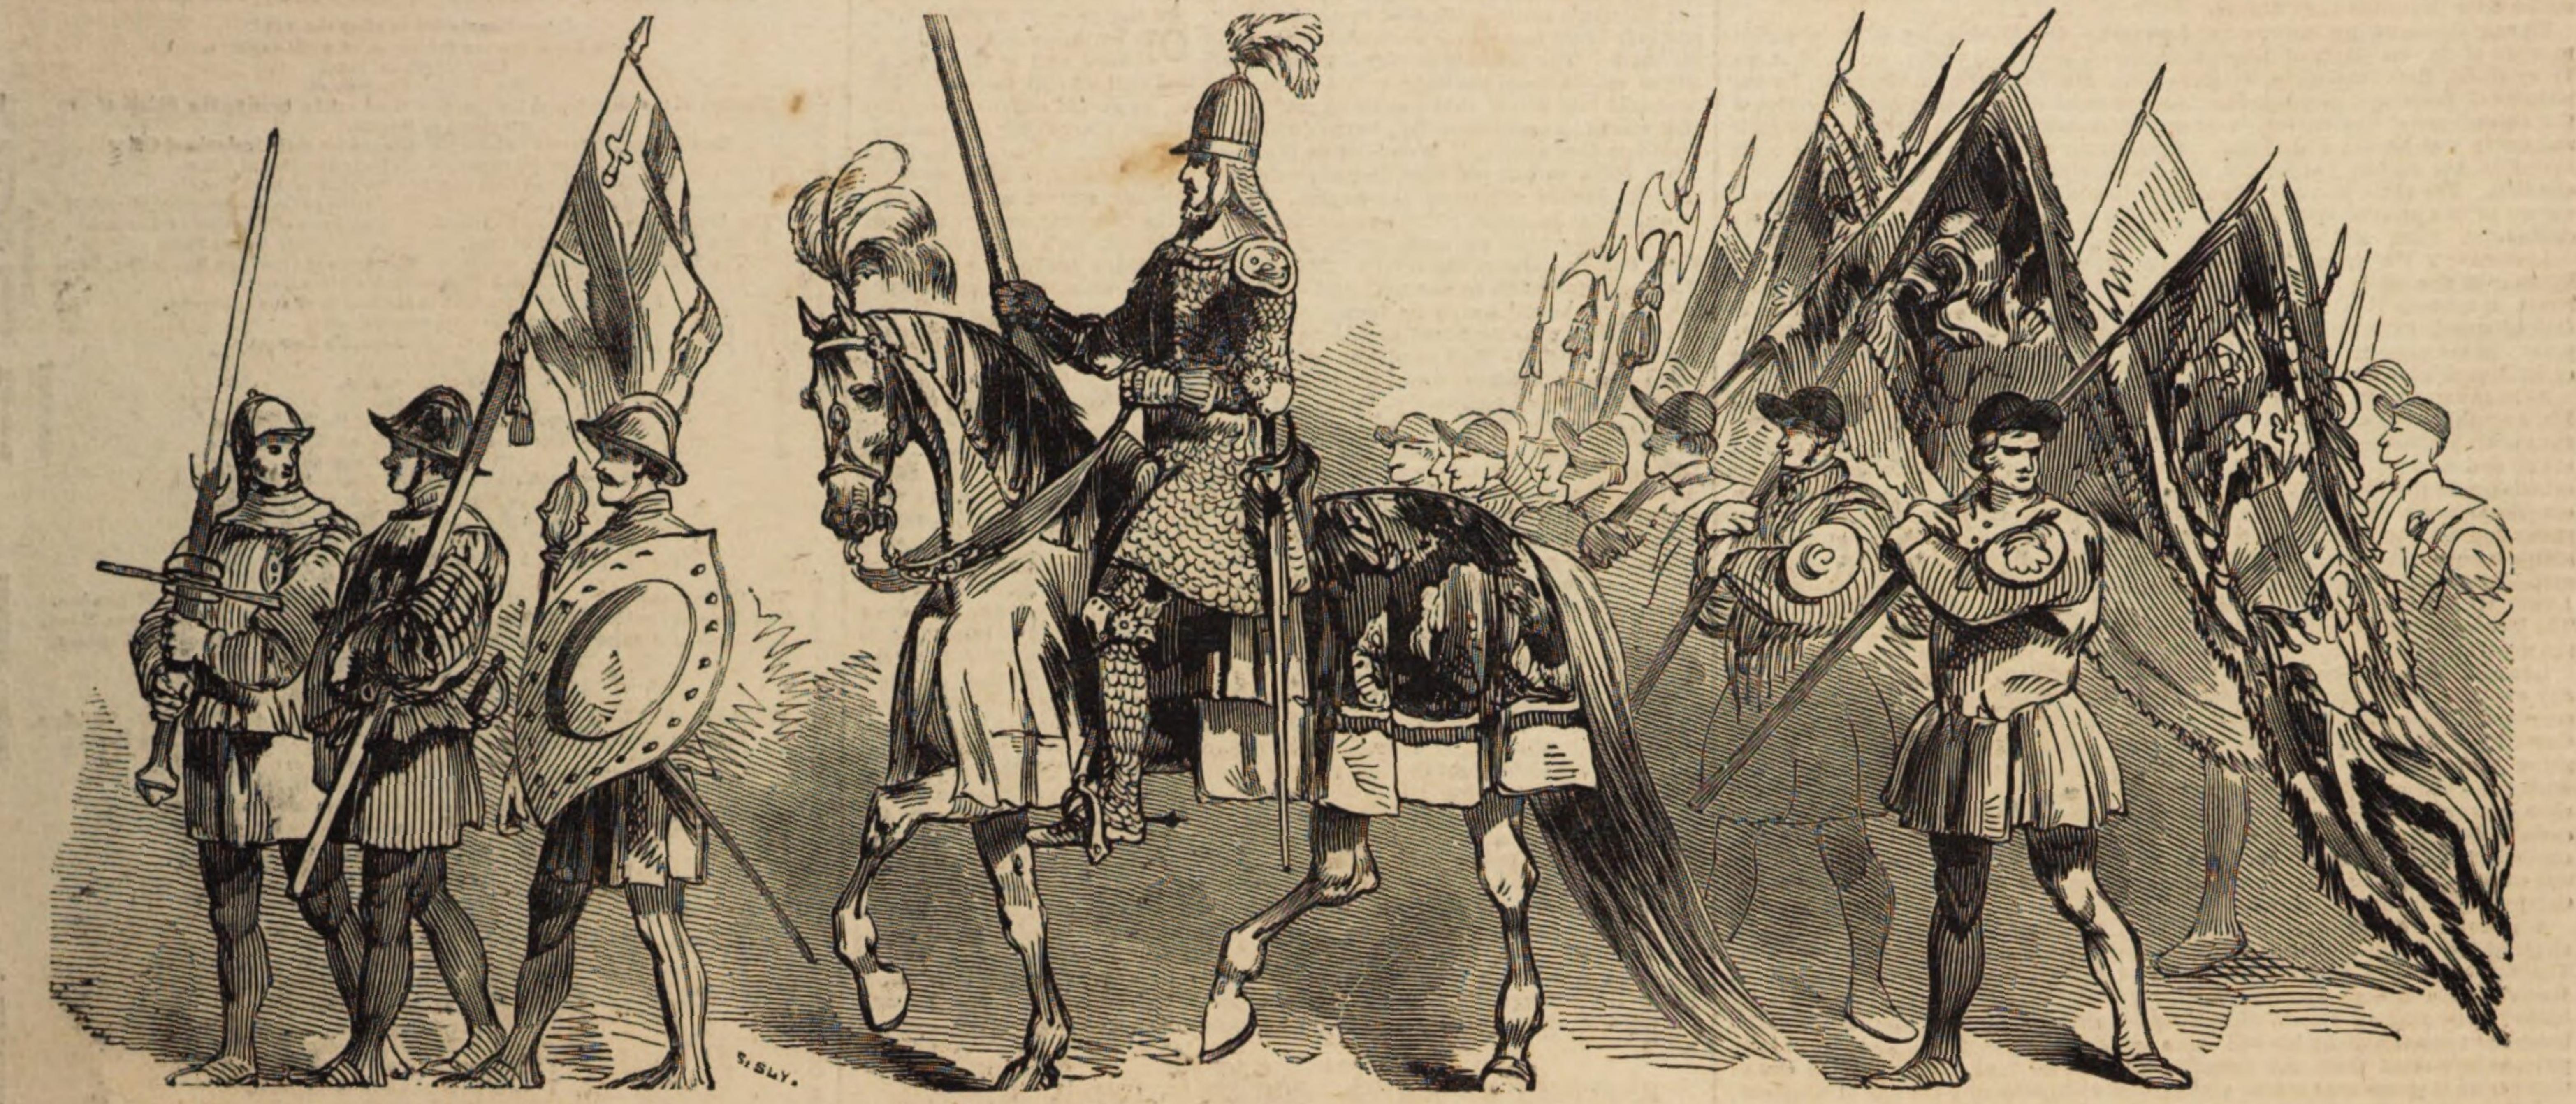
In a Court of Common Council yesterday, the Queen's answer to the address recently presented to her was read amidst much applause, and was ordered to be entered on the journals of the Court.

Death of General Edward Dunne.—Information has reached the Horse Guards of the demise of the above officer, at his seat in Queen's County, Ireland, in his 83rd year.

A Girl Committed for Poisoning her Father.—A young woman of 20 has been committed for trial to Chester, charged with poisoning her father, Mr. Gallop, a respectable working man, who had lived at Knutsford. What makes the thing more appalling is, that about six months ago her mother cut her throat with a joiner's plane-iron. It appears the deceased had amassed about £400, to obtain which it is supposed had prompted the daughter, that she might bestow it, with herself, upon a young man to whom she was much attached.

FOREIGN.

Spain.—Accounts from Madrid to the 31st ult. state that the Ministers obtained a majority of 98 on the amendment to the address proposed by M. Isturitz and consequently their continuance in office is secure for the present. This division may be regarded as decisive of the fate of the proposed modification of the constitution. The Débats denies the truth of the reputed matrimonial alliance between Queen Isabella and the son of Don Carlos. The Barcelona journals of the 31st ult. contain the particulars of the execution of the four unfortunate men sentenced to death by court-martial on the 29th.



LORD MAYOR'S SHOW.—THE MAN IN BRASS.

ILLUSTRATIONS OF THE MAYORALTY.

The 8th and 9th of November, falling on the days of our publication, we are prevented from giving any representations of the events of the great civic ceremonies of those days; but, as we are familiar with the observances of past years, and by the favour of the public officers, fully acquainted with the details of those which are at this moment passing before the public eye, we may safely introduce a few sketches of the more remarkable points of the successive pageants, without identifying them with the persons through whom they may happen to be conducted. These points will embrace the inauguration of the new Lord Mayor; the procession of the "men in armour," and the costume and official decorations of my Lord Mayor.

I.—THE INAUGURATION OF THE LORD MAYOR.

This ceremony takes place in the Guildhall on the afternoon of the CEREMONY OF SWEARING IN

PORTRAIT OF THE RIGHT HON. MICHAEL GIBBS, LORD MAYOR.

8th, and is, in all respects, a most solemn and imposing one. To understand its character, the spectator should be fully informed of the nature of the wonderful corporation whose representatives are then assembled before him. Without this we have known the observant Köhl himself look on in vain, and declarethat London was the only city he found it difficult to comprehend. The Corporation of London consists of the whole body of citizens, under the style of "Mayor, Commonalty, and Citizens." The ministerial, judicial, and legislative management of the affairs of this Corporation devolve on the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Common Council. The Courts of Aldermen and Common Council are distinct, but the Aldermen sit in the Common Council as of right, and its sittings are held under the presidency of the Lord Mayor. The Aldermen are elected for life, the Common Councilmen are elected annually, in their respective wards. The companies or guilds of London, are to the Corporation what the halls and colleges of Cambridge and Oxford are to their respective universities; each complete within itself, each an independent institution, yet component parts of the whole. The Guildhall is the public place of the Corporation, as representing the Commonalty of the City of London; each company has its own hall, or its own place of meeting, for the transaction of the business of the company. Eighty-nine companies are enumerated in the Corporation List, but of these eight are practically extinct. Twelve of the companies take precedence in rank and wealth; they are called the twelve great Livery Companies of London, which have large possessions in real property, money in the funds, and therefore in the receipt of large annual incomes. These are the Mercers, Grocers, Drapers, Fishmongers, Goldsmiths, Skinners, Merchant Tailors, Haberdashers, Salters, Ironmongers, Vintners, and Cloth-workers.

On the 8th of November, the multitudinous members and representatives of these venerable fraternities, each one arrayed in the garments of his tribe, assemble at a "court of hustings," to receive from the old Lord Mayor a resignation of his office, and to tender the oaths to the new one, on his acceptance of the vacant chair. The scene presents us with a model of the entire framework of the British empire, as represented by Sovereign, Lords, Commons, and all classes of people. The wards of London send their twenty-six Aldermen and 240 Common Councilmen to gaze on the transmigration of the Lord Mayor. The state that surrounds the Corporation is a type of the state that surrounds the Monarchy. In the annual election of the "King of the City," we have a memorial of the time when the king of the land was elective. In the meeting of the Corporation within Guildhall, we see a shadow—and a magnificent shadow—of the time when the entire commonalty met and acted together; yes, we have a memorial of the time when the Lords occupied the upper end of the chamber of Parliament, and the Commons humbly stood below. The Aldermen are types of the Barons; the Common Council of the Commons; while in the liverymen of the companies, who have the privilege, above their brother freemen, of electing the civic functionaries, we have a type of the constituencies of Britain. We may see, too, a miniature of the judges of the land, in the attendant Recorder and Common Sergeant; while the Sheriffs, Under-Sheriffs, Town Clerk, Remembrancer, Pleaders, Secondaries, Attornies, Auditors, Wardens, Clerks, Officers of the Lord Mayor's Household, City Marshals, and the host of minor functionaries, who pour in among the crowd, give the ceremony an imposing air of grandeur.

The last hour of the Lord Mayor's reign approaches; but the Lord Mayor never dies—his spirit is immortal. Two chairs—a small and a large one—are therefore placed (see our engraving), that, in the presence of the representatives of the eighty-one existing guilds of London, the transformation may be seen, and the Corporation be proved to live for ever. But, before this important act takes place, a more important one is transacted—the Lord Mayor elect is sworn. This is a ceremony of high religious import. Low, on his knees, before a table covered with the City Charters, and other formal documents, his hands placed on the Gospels, he is devoutly pledged to "keep faith and a good conscience" in the maintenance of his state and dignity. This done, the departing Mayor exchanges seats with him; and, lo! the power of the Lord Mayor has passed from one body to another! Sword-bearer, Mace-bearer, Purse-bearer, advance with threefold obeisance, and lay their emblems of office on the table. They retire, and stand among the crowd, sunk to the level of common humanity. But the new Lord Mayor speaks; it is the voice of law—it is the command of authority. Sword-bearer, Mace-bearer, Purse-bearer, advance once more; they resume their insignia of office, and start up official beings. Such is the initial act of the new Lord Mayor; "now is Mortimer lord of the city." The Ex-Lord Mayor, seated on a low chair, denuded of the collar of S, the jewels, and all the outward and visible signs of supreme power, then receives the congratulations of the company, and, after him, the new Lord Mayor, in like manner, the same.

II.—THE SHOW—MEN IN ARMOUR.

The show, as arranged by the Lord Mayor and Sheriffs' Committee, is a poor one. A different result might have been expected, as the Lord Mayor belongs to the wealthy Fishmongers, and is reputed to have made a great deal of money by his civic connections. Be that as it may, the men in armour are always interesting, and they are to ride in the show. We have, therefore, by permission of the Board of Ordnance, had a series of careful sketches made of the steel suits, shields, swords, &c., which are kept in the Tower; and these we have grouped together in the way in which they are exhibited to the public in the procession. For the

we are indebted to Mr. Marriott, of Fle[illegible]eet, in whose custody, as the [illegible]d and representative of the Braziers of London, he is ordinarily kept.

The "ancient knights," as they are called, who ride in the array, are shadows of the mighty champions who once challenged all comer in defence of the City rights in general, and of their lordships' privileges in particular. Silent and powerless now, they pass in mute eloquence through the crowded streets, and serve no better purpose than to grace a joyous holiday. Individually, however, they possess many claims to attention. The steel suits are real suits, and have been worn by great men in our country's history. The first one belonged, originally, to Sir Henry Lee, Master of the Horse in 1570, and is a fine specimen of strong plate armour. His sword and shield are borne by two cavaliers of the time of Charles I. The second group exhibits a nobleman of the time of James I., cased in plate armour, with epauldrons on the joints. His attendants are knights of the time of Elizabeth, in half armour. It will be seen that in these associations, strict chronological truth is set at defiance; but this, in a Lord Mayor's Show, is not to be looked for. The man in brass is not a man in armour at all, as the brazen envelope is of no period, and could not be worn in action. He is said, by courtesy, to be dressed in "scale armour;" but the scales are more of the brazier's than the armourer's fancy. He is, however, a very grand fellow, and much admired by the people.

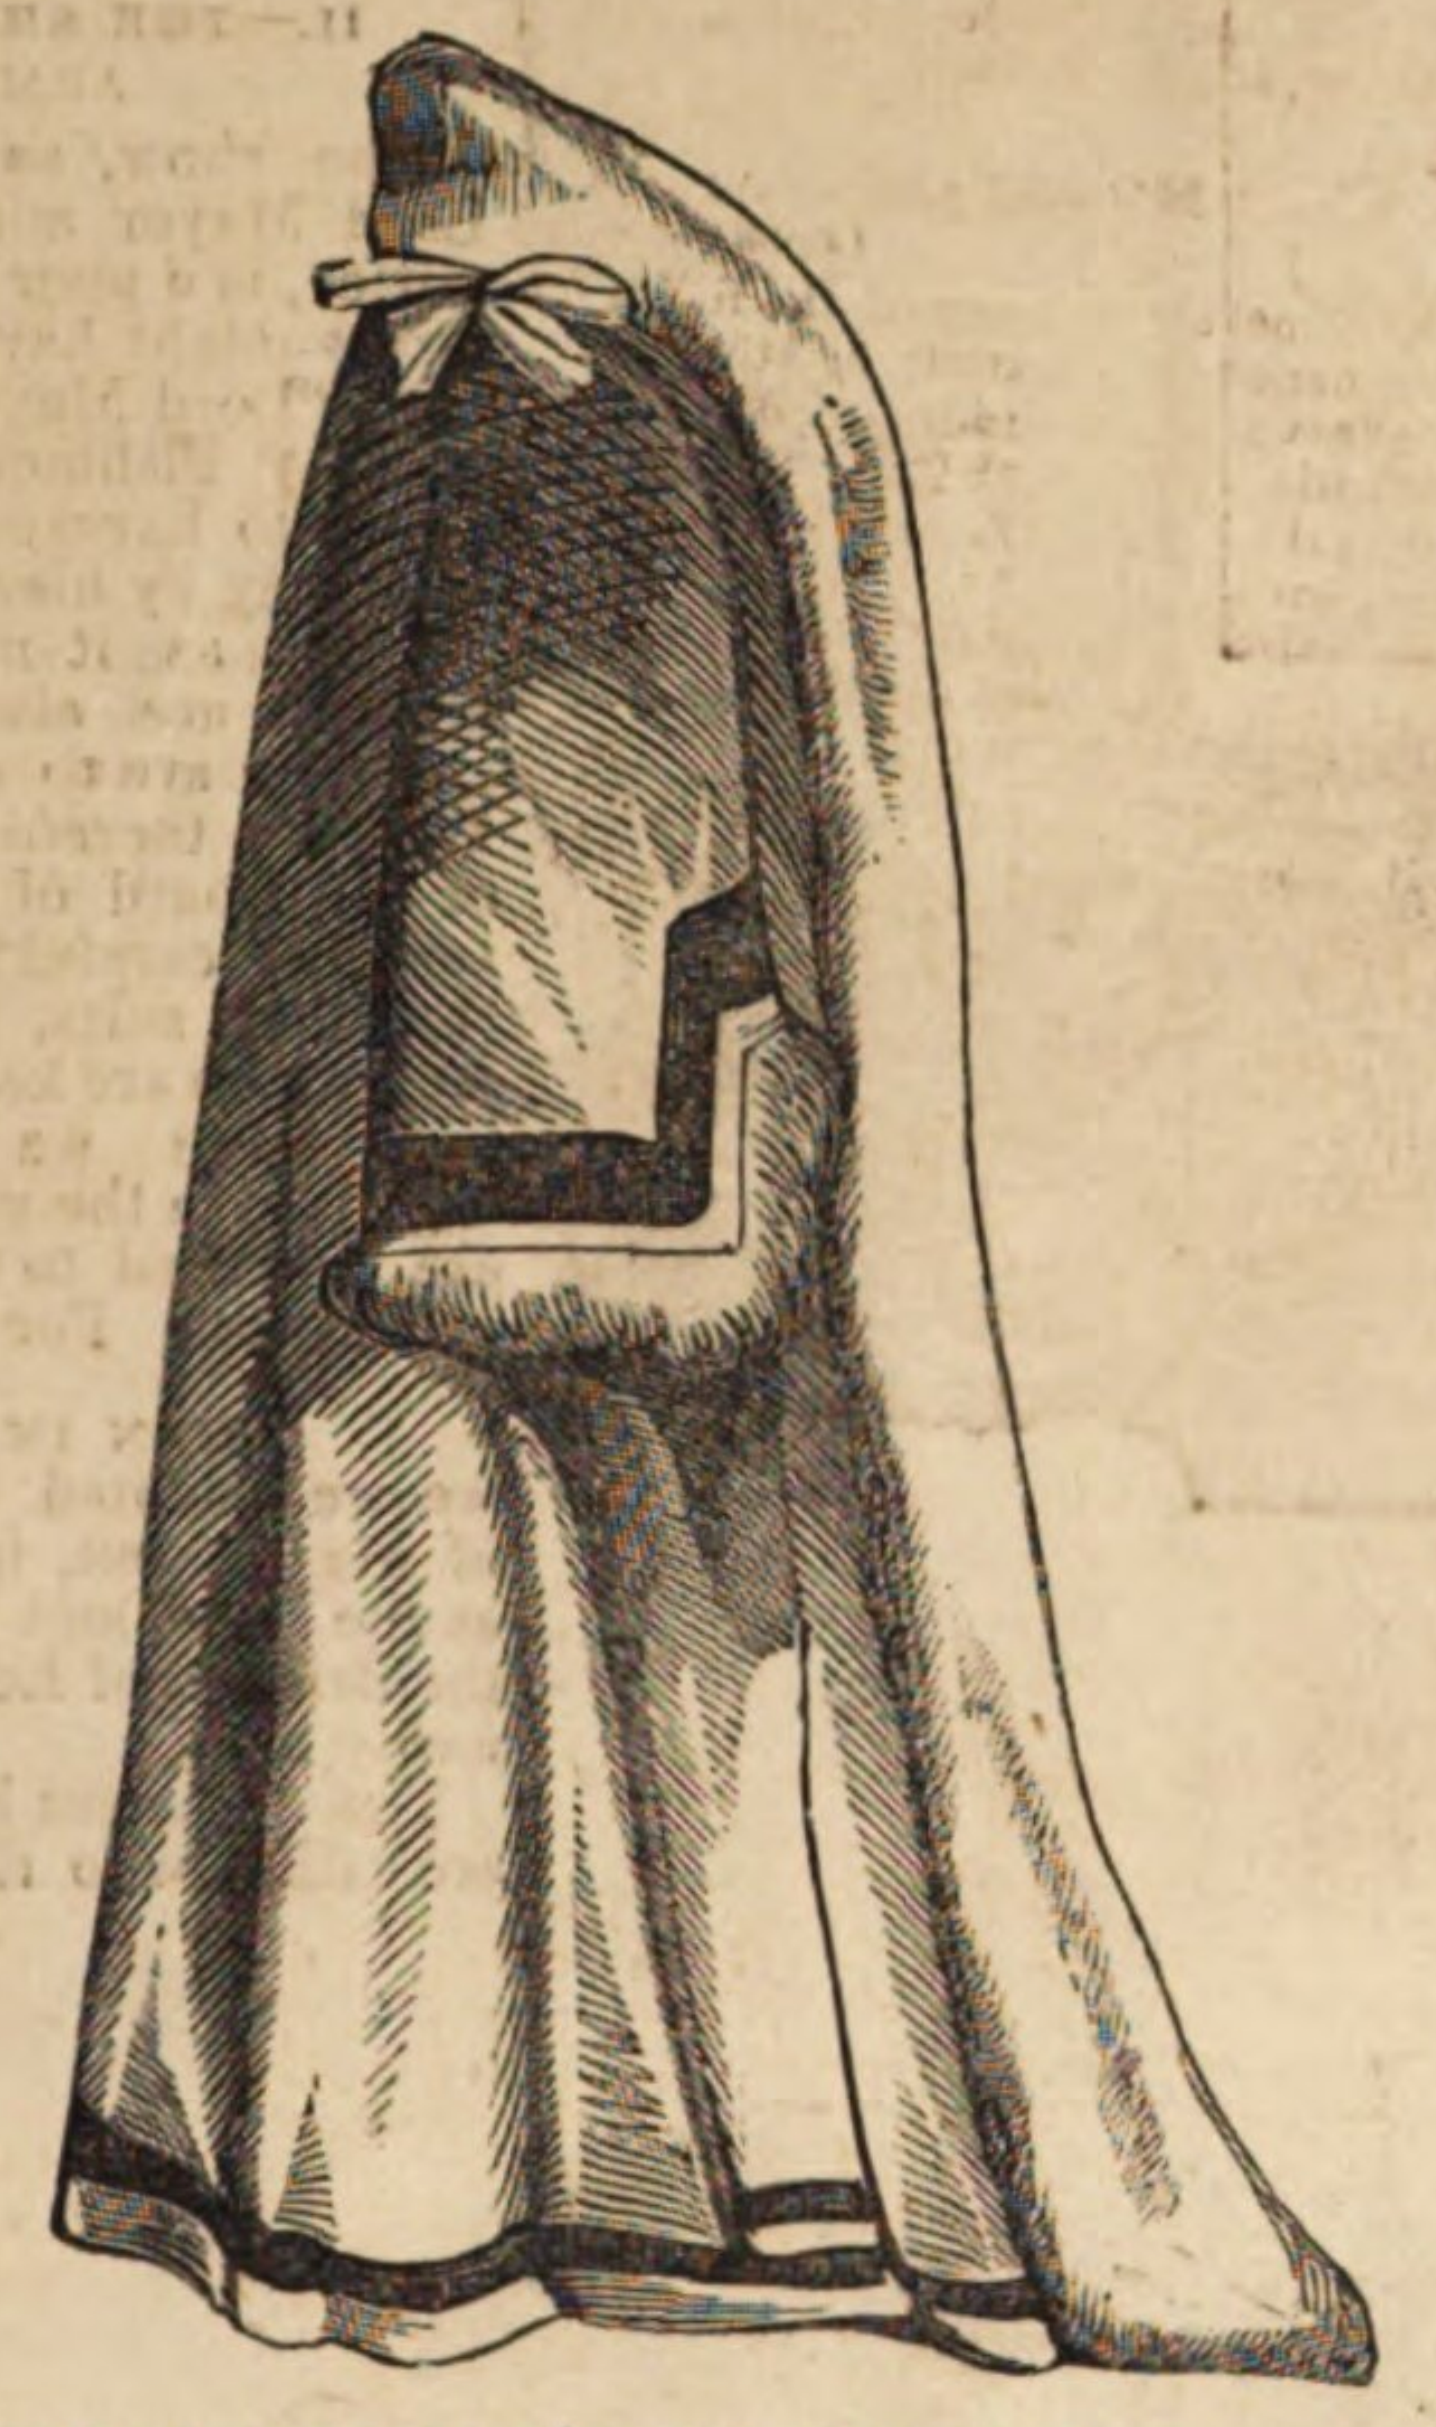
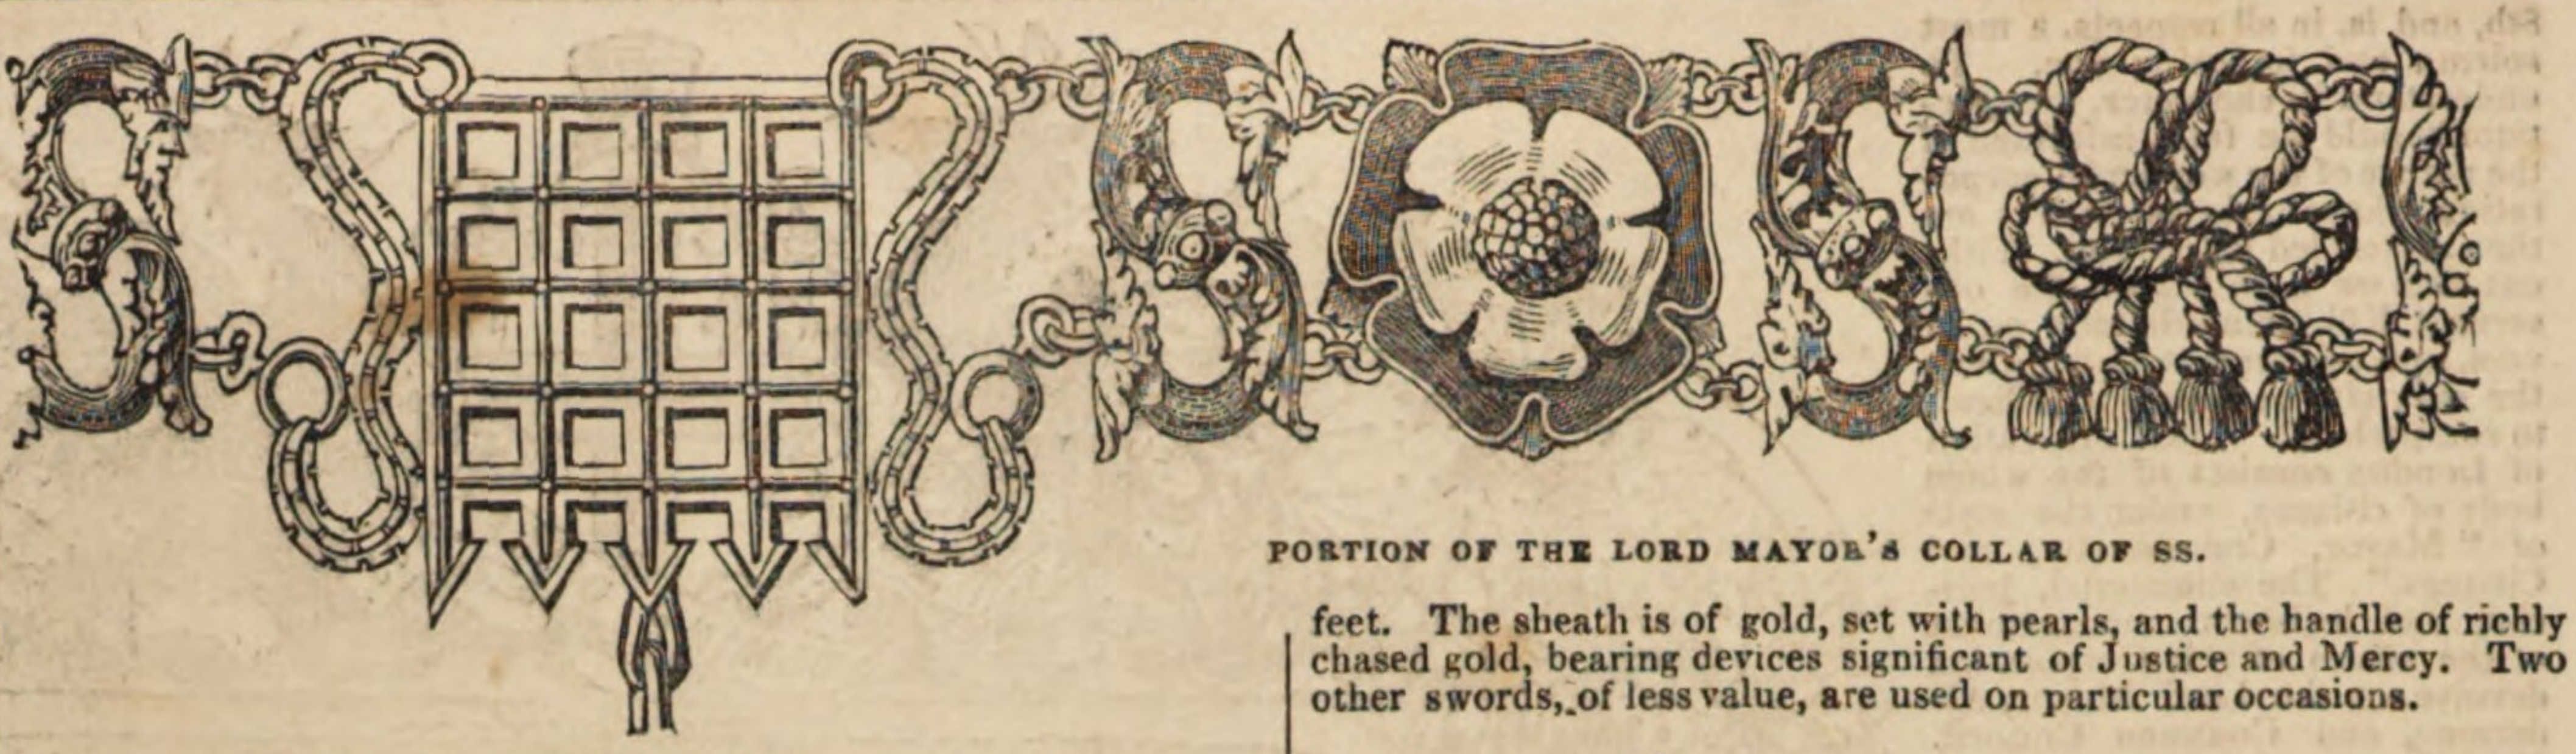
THE LORD MAYOR'S BLUE ROBE.

III. THE COSTUME, DECORATIONS, AND INSIGNIA OF THE LORD MAYOR.

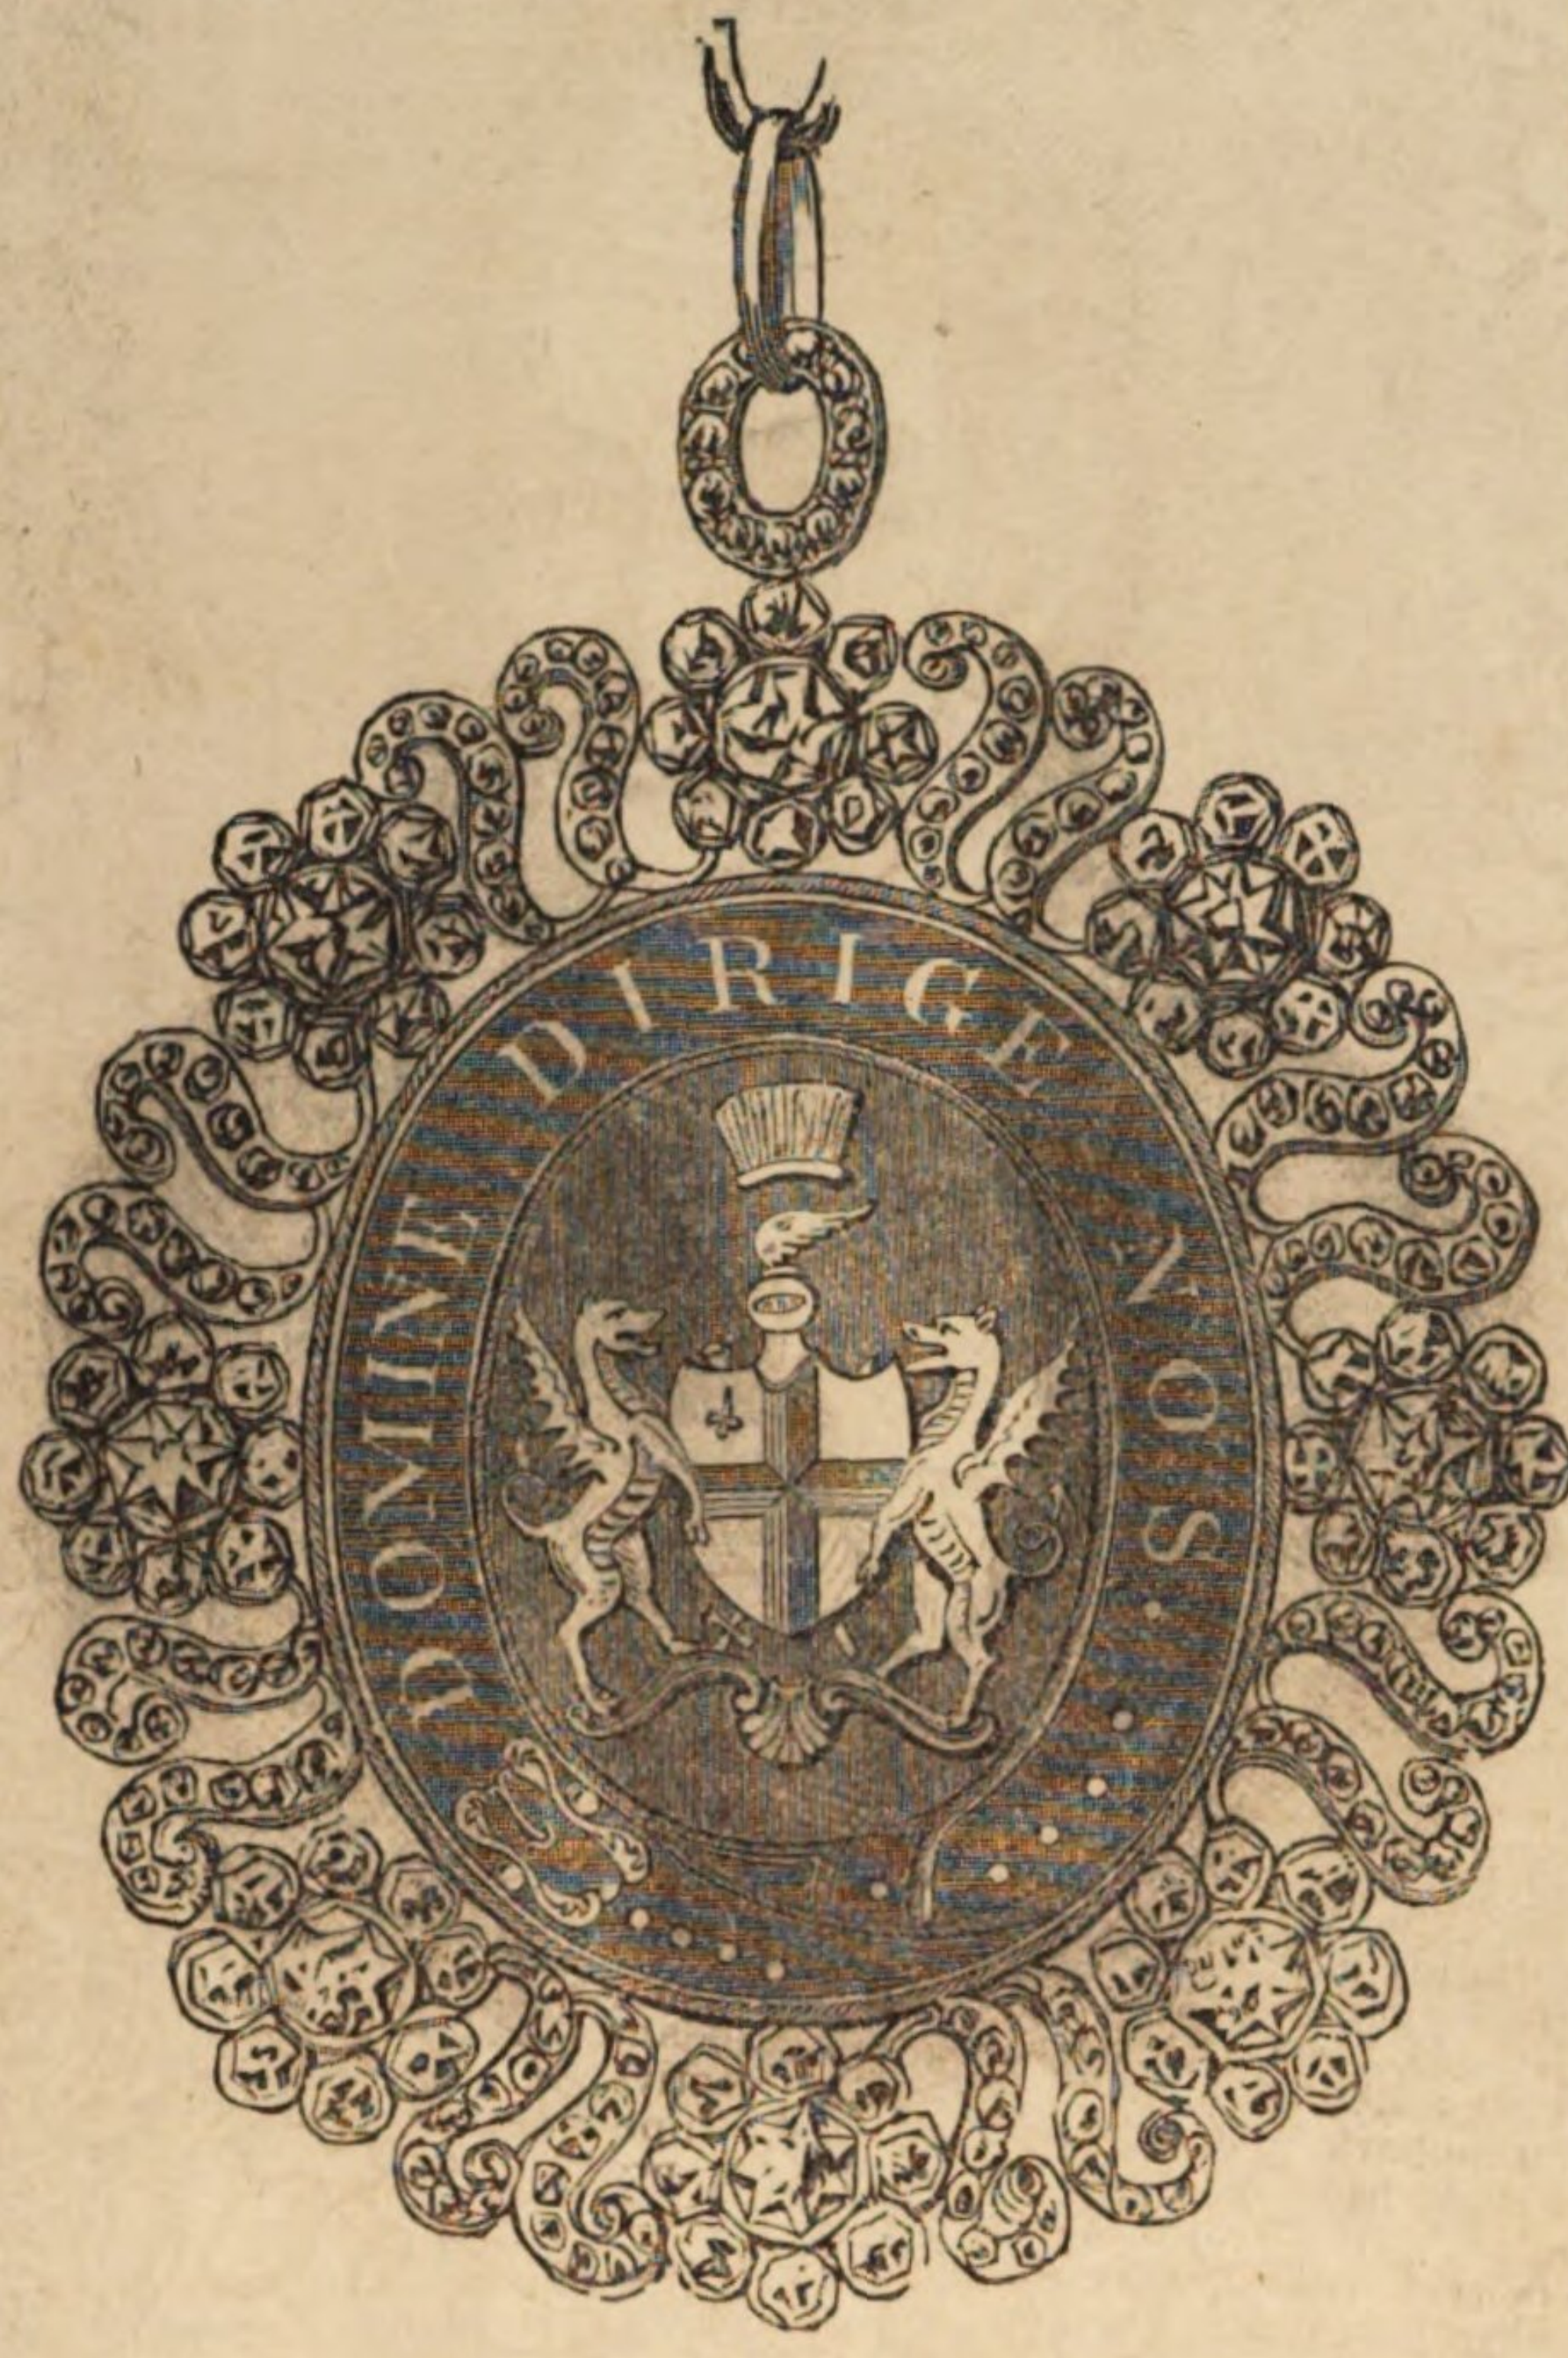
It cannot be complained of the Lord Mayor, as it was objected against the times of Elizabeth, that an "excess of apparel" disfigured all officers of the state. He wears neither suits of gold nor silver tissue, "bepowdered with jewels;" nor do his servants parade it in "murrey and plunkett," as did his predecessors. On the contrary, he is plain but stately in his attire. In public or ordinary state occasions, he wears a massive black silk robe, richly worked with embroidery; and, beyond his collar and jewel, has no other distinction. In the Courts of Aldermen and Common Council, and other civic meetings, he is dressed in a blue silk robe, furred and barred with black velvet; and on the bench, at the Mansion-house and in the Central Criminal Court, he is attired in a scarlet robe, furred and bordered with black velvet. The crimson velvet robe worn in conducting the Sovereign through the City is so rarely used, and differs in form so much, according to the taste of the wearer, that it can hardly be considered to form part of the official costume of the Lord Mayor. Our cuts show the scarlet and blue robes; the portrait shows the black robe.



THE LORD MAYOR'S SCARLET ROBE.



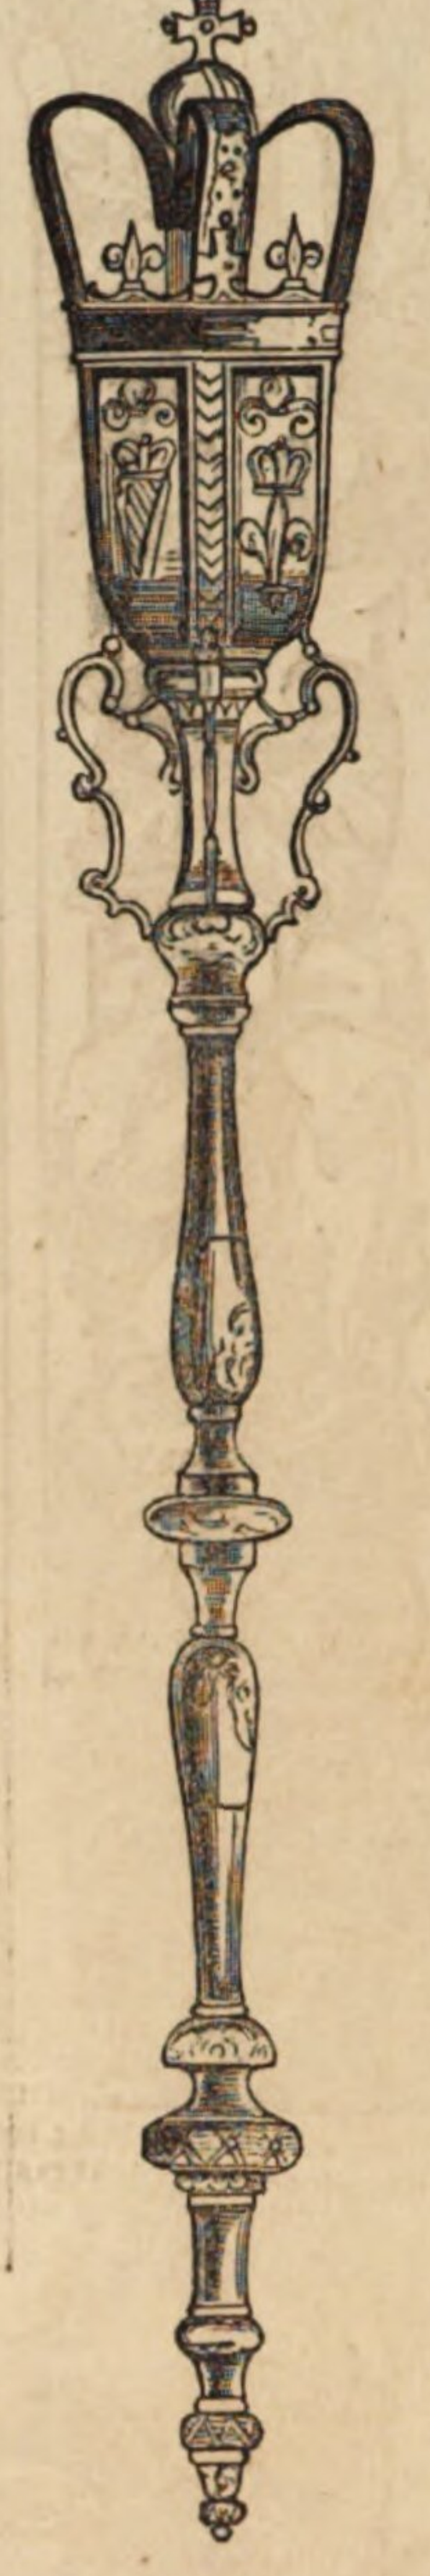
PORTION OF THE LORD MAYOR'S COLLAR OF SS.



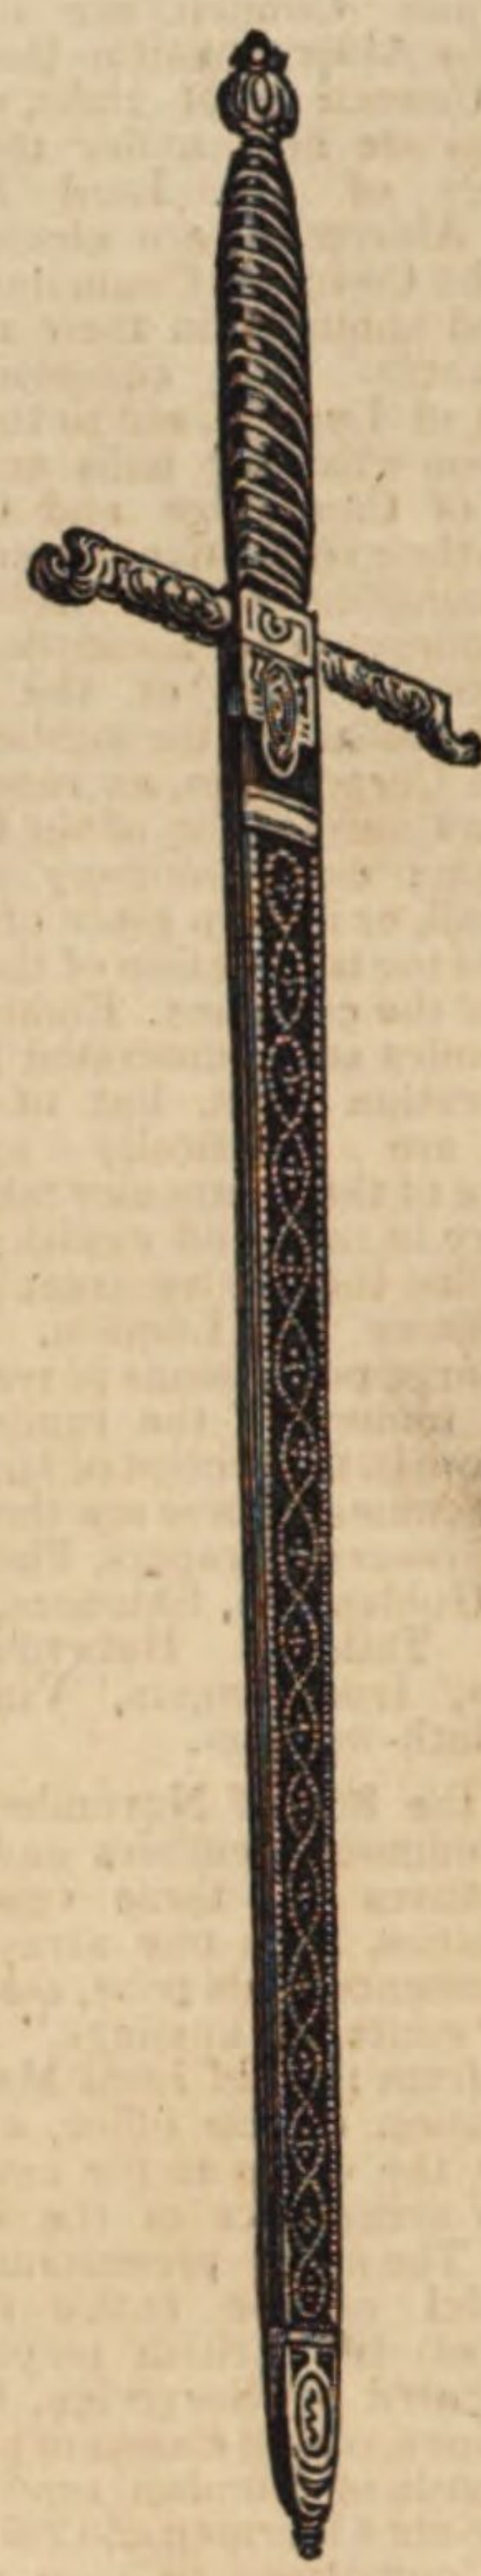
DOMINE DIRIGE NOS.
THE LORD MAYOR'S JEWEL.

The collar and jewel are badges of great beauty. The former is formed of pure gold, and is composed of a series of links, each one formed of a letter S—which formerly signified squire or gentleman—a united York and Lancaster, or Henry the Seventh rose, and a massive knolt. The ends of the chain are joined by the portcullis—the celebrated badge of Henry the Seventh—and from the points of it, suspended by a ring of diamonds, hangs the jewel. The entire collar contains 28 SS, 14 roses, and 13 knolts, and measures 64 inches. The jewel contains, in the centre, the City arms, cut "in cameo," of a delicate blue, on an olive ground. Surrounding this, a garter, of bright blue, edged with white and gold, bearing the City motto, "Domine Dirige Nos," in gold letters. The whole is encircled with a costly border of gold SS, alternating with rosettes of diamonds, set in silver.

These constitute the official vestments: but, without the mace and the sword, the presence of the Lord Mayor would not, in due etiquette, be complete. The mace represents the delegated power of the Crown, which he holds as her Majesty's representative; and the sword—the gift of the Sovereign—symbolizes the exclusive jurisdiction which, as chief officer of the Corporation, he exercises within the city walls. These interesting objects have never been engraved; by favour of the Lord Mayor, we are able to present faithful copies of them. The mace measures five feet three inches; it is formed of silver gilt, and is embellished by a crown and regal emblems. It was presented, we believe, by Charles II. The sword measures four feet. The sheath is of gold, set with pearls, and the handle of richly chased gold, bearing devices significant of Justice and Mercy. Two other swords, of less value, are used on particular occasions.



THE MACE.



THE PEARL SWORD.

As a pendent to the annexed portrait of the newly-elected Lord Mayor, we quote the following from the Recorder's address to the Lord Chancellor, at the presentation on Saturday morning:—

"With regard to the fitness and ability of Mr. Gibbs to fill the high office of Lord Mayor, there cannot be a doubt. In early life, he was engaged in successful commercial transactions, and as far back as the year 1818 he was chosen a member of the Court of Common Council, and his re-election was never opposed. Mr. Gibbs was, in 1838, elected alderman of Walbrook Ward, and he has performed the duties of a magistrate of the city of London with the greatest credit to himself and to the satisfaction of the public. After the passing of the New Poor Law Bill, Mr. Alderman Gibbs was elected chairman of the city of London Poor Law Union, which contained no less than ninety-two parishes. Mr. Gibbs has given the greatest satisfaction in performing the duties of that responsible office, and has every year been re-appointed; that was not all, for eight years the Lord Mayor elect has been chairman of the Commissioners of Sewers; he was annually elected, and his services were not only duly appreciated, but he has received the thanks of the Commissioners for his zeal and attention. Mr. Gibbs has also served the high and important office of Sheriff of London and Middlesex with the greatest credit to himself, and with satisfaction to his fellow citizens; as, on his retiring from that office, he received an unanimous vote of thanks from the livery in common hall assembled. It is after 25 years' experience that the livery of London have sent Mr. Alderman Gibbs's name to the Court of Aldermen for Chief Magistrate, and that Court confirmed the choice."

THE MAGAZINES FOR NOVEMBER.

The Magazines, this month, yield a fair average crop, wherewith to enliven the natural chill and gloom of the season. It is true that they do not invariably "rain fatness;" but, the modicum of humour and sentiment is fair, with an occasional sprinkling of vigour and novelty.

The ILLUMINATED MAGAZINE commences its fourth volume, and a new series, with several new contributors, among whom Mr. Carleton (Craven) is entitled to prime notice. His contribution is the commencement of "A Tale of Two Epochs," entitled "Fatherland;" the aim of which, as far as can be judged from these opening pages, will be to illustrate our present high-pressure system of life and manners. Accordingly, we have, within these few pages, some admirable sketches of aristocratic living (we do not mean in the bad sense of the phrase) in which the decadence of "Merry England," and the numbering of its days, are unmistakeably shown up. Still, the language is not that of an ill-natured censor on the other hand, Craven is one of the best-natured moralists, and liveliest of sentimentalists; his scenes, too, are life-like, and full of the experience of the man of the world, relieved by an accomplished style, which is altogether untinged with the affectation of the silver-fork school. We quote a specimen or two, commencing with the opening of the tale:—

"There was a time, when, though my path was rough,
The joy within me dallied with distress;
And all misfortunes were but as the stuff
Whence fancy made me dreams of happiness:
For hope grew round me like the twining vine,
And fruits and foliage, not my own, seemed mine."—COLERIDGE.

It was the close of a rich autumnal day, towards the end of September, when a youth, in the dawn of manhood, handed his fowling-piece to a game-keeper in attendance, and motioning him to call off a brace of noble spaniels that were in no hurry to obey the summons, entered one of those venerable mansions so characteristically designated "the stately homes of England." By a lawful conceit, the hall of entrance might be called a prologue to the house and household. The florid architecture proclaimed its date from days when men poured forth their broad pieces to embellish their broad lands, while store of sylvan trophies, grim warriors, and gallant hunters, hung around, bore record that the pursuits and tastes of its lords lay alike in war and woodcraft.

He who crossed its threshold, carried with him assurance of his lineage. His glance and bearing bespoke pride of place; his step and gesture, the bold grace of a pupil trained from childhood to the boon exercises of flood and field. Perhaps, it might have been as well if his hazel eye had flashed less haughtily, and his small sweet upper lip had not curled with quite so much contempt; but liberal allowance must be made for the descendant of the terrible-looking gentleman suspended over the entrance of the eastern corridor, in a slashed doublet and jack-boots, a rapier in his hand as big as a ploughshare, and looking more fierce than fifty furies. As he entered, the young man gazed around, as if to study the family biography which encircled him; his look anon settling on a most gentle page of the volume—a portrait of a girl, of the time and style of Lely. He appeared to peruse it with deep emotion, for the traces of strong feeling passed rapidly over his cheek and brow.

"How like! how wondrous like!" he murmured; "I could almost imagine it was herself!" And then he turned slowly, and passed again through the door by which he came in.

Fair was the scene that spread on every side before the terrace by which the mansion was surrounded. In the fore-ground, gently swelling lawns, clothed with turf soft and sheen as velvet, were studded with noble trees—patriarchal oaks, giant beeches, and majestic cedars, the plumed monarchs of the forest. There, too, wound a limpid river, bright as hope, and tranquil as content; while, in jocund herds, the slim deer cropped their fragrant banquet, or slept beneath the canopy of some blossoming chesnut. But fair and calm as the scene was, he who looked upon it seemed little influenced by its spirit. He paced the broad terrace with uncertain steps, now pressing onward, as if moved to some sudden purpose, and then abruptly pausing, as though it were abandoned or forgotten. His age, as already said, was early manhood; and yet the complexion of youth belonged not to his expression or bearing. Both bespoke a forced maturity; that exotic moral ripeness to the attainment of which the modern system of education acts as the guide, but not as the philosopher and friend. Ah, surely not! for what can they give the dawn of existence in return, who rob it of its freshness, its bloom, and its hopefulness? The experience of life brings with it a bitter compensation for all its advantages; it puts an end to simplicity of character. The moment that melancholy companion joins us, woe to our pilgrimage! In vain we attempt to rid ourselves of its society. The heart, whilom clear as crystal, through which the sunbeam passes bright and cheerful as when it left its home in the heavens, is covered with a dark veil. No longer does our voyage lie on the bright waters of hope, that sparkle around us like rivers of stars. We have learnt to materialize: a sad alchymy—to transmute feeling into solicitude; nature's blithe instinct, that life is a license for happiness, into the world's sad knowledge—how hard it is to live!

For more than two centuries the Nevilles of Oversley had ranked among the leading aristocracy of the county of Kent. Their ancestors, who had been gentlemen of account there before the Revolution, disappeared during the Protectorate, but returned with Charles the Second. The representative of the family, who, at this period, unfurled its banner in the garden of England, had held high rank under the merry Monarch—and, better still, enjoyed his high favour. That the kindness with which the Sovereign endowed him was in some degree the offspring of a fellow-feeling, there is reason for believing, because all existing memorials of the old Royalist General represent him as a roystering gallant that devoted to wassail the days which remained to him from war. With him the Castle of Oversley, and the domains attached to it, came into the family, which had previously been more indebted for its social position to ancestry than acres. The ancient cavalier was a patriot to the backbone; as it has been said of Pitt, "he loved England as an Athenian loved the city of the Violet Crown—as a Roman loved the city of the Seven Hills." Like Pitt, also, he showed his attachment in his peculiar fashion; he hated a Frenchman—as Lord Collingwood declared was the moral obligation and social duty of every British officer—"like the devil;" and poured forth libations to Church and State, as if he held the appointment of chief priest of loyal sacrifices and oblations. The stock from such a source was not likely to possess a turn for domestic management or systematic economy. Each of its generations, indeed, was the drop of water on the rock, which, in process of time, should wear away; and the hour was fast at hand when the heir of that distinguished name was destined to succeed to no portion of its honours—except the name.

The future lord of a barren heritage looked abroad upon the glorious regions before him in much such sort as we contemplate a scene in the consciousness that we are dreaming. Hill and valley, wood and water, house and home, appeared to him as an unsubstantial vision—an unreal mockery—from which he should presently awake to the bitter assurance that all was a delusion. Like almost every young Englishman of condition, his spring of life had been divided between a public school and the university. When scarcely more than a child he departed from his father's roof, to which his visits had hitherto been but as those of a stranger; and now, for the first time, he found himself an inmate of his father's house as one to whom it was a home.

The following sketch of rural life is in another vein:—

The village of King's Oversley is just the sort of place you would wish, and expect it to be—quiet, comfortable, old-fashioned, and essentially English. Turn which way you will, you meet something that reminds you of home and fatherland! That antique and homely church is an emblem of the faith you profess: that picturesque cottage, of the abode which you have assigned to comfort and content when haply a sojourner in far-off lands. As you turn from the hawthorn-sheltered lane that leads from the high road into the rural street, there > stands in front of you the village ale-house, with its sign waving in the breeze, as if beckoning you to enter. Hah! you recognise that rosy-gilled veteran, whose seat that old oaken bench has been from time immemorial. A walking biography is he of the heroes of Minden, and the worthies of the Flanders war. He's fond of beer indeed—very fond—but then, poor fellow, recollect how those sixteen years in the Punjaub must have evaporated the moisture out of him. I tell you, another guess man is he from that Hoskins, the higler, who could never pass the door without stopping at it to guzzle till he fell out of his cart. And do not the gardens smell sweetly! though autumn is no longer young, the fragrance of summer breathes from that tiny plat there, just before you reach the Cross. The villagers call it Fair Rosamond's Bower; it's where Rose Kennedy lives with her father, the parish clerk. Bless you, it isn't much larger than a flower-pot, yet never a day of the year is there but you might gather in it a nosegay fit for a queen.

Among the other noticeable contributions are a few which embellish the events of the day; such are the papers on the visit of Louis Philippe, by Doctor O'Toole (the Irish Whiskey-drinker); "Some 'Points' for a New 'People's Charter'" glancing at Young Englandism;" a paper on the "Xanthian Marbles" illustrating the latest arrival of those gems of art; "The Three Royal Exchanges" telling gossipingly, yet factorially, at the history of the respective edifices; and "The King of the French in the Old Home of his Exile," in a lively, rattling string of reasons why Louis Philippe should have come to England. A paper on "The Swedish Poet, Vitalis," is enriched with some graceful translations; and among the Reviews is a very interesting and extended notice of W. Thom, "The Inverury Weaver." The illustrations are more numerous than usual; and there is a novel energy throughout the number which is highly satisfactory. By the way, the group of Irish life, by Phiz, at page 13, is a masterpiece of character.

Fraser this month presents us with a Number of unusual variety. "A Fine Day at Stratford-upon-Avon" is written by a real enthusiast—fresh, chatty, and, withal, with marks of good reading. We were sorry to find the article would not be completed for another month. "The Smiths" is a pleasant passage in the lives of some members of that large family, containing some capital "bits" of description; and the "Hints on the Modern Governess System" will awaken public attention towards the miseries of that estimable class of girls, whose interest it takes up with so much natural force. "The Luck of Barry Lyndon," and "The Classics of the Table," are continued with their usual attractiveness; and there is a perceptive review of Kohl's "Scotland and England."

Hood's Magazine is a sparkling number. The editor's "Lay of a Labourer," is introduced by some finely graphic prose. "The Brace of Birds," is another main attractive story. As usual, there is some genuine poetry; and the under-current of the grotesque humour flows towards the exposure and correction of some social abuse.

Blackwood's Magazine opens with a paper of thirty pages, on "The O'Connell Case,—Was the judgment rightly reversed?" It is a most elaborately argumentative affair, relieved by springy illustration of character—for example:—

> We waited with great interest to see the course which Lord Denman would take upon the great question. He is a man of strong natural talents, of a lofty bearing in the administration of justice, and an uncompromising determination on all occasions, to assert the rights and protect the privileges of the subject. Nor, though a man of unquestionably very strong Whig opinions are we aware of his ever having allowed them to interfere with his eminent and most responsible judicial duties. Whatever may be our opinion as to the validity of his conclusions on the subject of the challenge to the array, it was impossible not to be interested by the zealous energy, the manly eloquence, with which he vindicated the right of the subject to the fullest enjoyment of trial by jury, and denounced what he considered to be any, the slightest, interference with that right.

Two papers—on Miss Barrett's Poems and on Lamartine—relieve the somewhat too strong political cast of the number.

Bentley's Miscellany introduces a new contributor with "The House in the Teurain; a Painter's Adventure in Paris." It is vigorously written, in the right keep-moving magazine spirit, with an untiring picturesqueness of detail—a most essential acquisition for this magazine, which frequently verges on the vapid. "Caninology" is a very dull attempt to witticise the history of the dog. "Eton Scenes and Eton Men" contains some interesting reminiscences of the boyhood of several master-spirits of the day. "The Private Secretary" is a characteristic sketch of "that most speculative and least plebeian" calling. The "Scattergood" papers have for their attractions the marvels of an itinerant showman, drawn from the life; and fresh indignities heaped upon poor Clara, the governess, contrasted with the affected frippery of a bal costumé: in all which the writer maintains his reputation for nicely observing minor points of character and conduct.

The Metropolitan has attracted our notice by a paper of "Recollections of the late Thomas Campbell," penned with excellent feeling. Tours, tales, and poetry, and political economy (!) fill the remaining pages.

The New Monthly Magazine opens with "Scenes of Society—Jack Grandison's Marriage," the said Jack being a brilliant scamp, and magnificent adventurer: neither of these epithets, however, apply to his written career, which scarcely has the vulgar merit of being smart. "Peter Priggins's First Meet of the Season" is not high-mettled, but lively enough. "The Talleyrand Papers," part VIII., appear to be reaching an extent characteristic of the long-protracted life of the hero. The continuations are—"The Lover's Rock," "Social Piracy," "The Robertses on their Travels," and "The Philosophy of Waltzing," in all of which there is abundance of amusement for these dull November nights. The "Conversations with Mr. Beckford" (who, by the way, was a pupil of Sir W. Chambers, while he was building Somerset-house,) continue to be very attractive.

Tait has an excellent paper on Niebuhr, from a forthcoming translation of his "Memoirs." The reviews of a batch of "Recent Poems," and of Mrs. Shelley's "Rambles," are admirable.

The Dublin University Magazine opens with a severe castigation of certain of our book making generation, designated "Twaddling Tourists in Ireland:" in this paper, the "mock impartiality that results from selfish and ignorant indifference" is fearlessly exposed. Next is a very interesting and well-written paper on Etruscan Art. The tales are "The Year-Market in Ravensburg" and a Captivity, a Fête, and a stirring Abbey scene, in "The Nevilles of Garretstown."

Ainsworth's Magazine is nearly half filled with the Editor's contributions: of these, "The Revelations of London, Part II., The Dog-fancier," with its details of St. Giles's Rookery and Dog-stealing, is, from first to last, a coarse piece of Jack Sheppardism—the nest-egg of an unenviable popularity. Mr. W. F. Ainsworth, we perceive, brings his "Winter Wanderings" to a stand-still—though, at the end of ten grave pages. To the relief of the number, however, comes "Another Leaf" from Drinkwater Meadows' Theatrical Recollections. Some thirty pages are occupied by the Editor's "Saint James's; or, the Court of Queen Anne."

The New Edinburgh Review contains a rambling article on "Young England and the Political Economists:" the paper is really entertaining, but lacks method: still, the spirit is good; and the number is lively throughout.

The North British Review, No. III., contains eight masterly papers, of well-varied interest. The opening article, "On the Political Economy of the Bible," teems with important truths, among which stands most prominently, the vindication of the paramount authority of Scripture, by demonstrating the full and unexcepted harmony between the word of God and the works of God. There are two articles of intense scientific interest—on the life of Sir Humphry Davy, and the Earl of Rosse's Reflecting Telescopes. In elaborate detail and eloquent illustration these papers have, perhaps, never been surpassed. Backhouse's Visit to the Mauritius and South Africa, and the Condition of the United States of North America, are the subjects of two other papers; and the Number is wound up with an intrepid attack upon the shabby Post-Office Espionage, which is not a string of unsustained assertions, but a severe examination of the Lords and Commons Reports upon this very damaging business.

The Polytechnic Review and Magazine continues its papers on Projectile Weapons of War and Explosive Compounds, and Captain Warner's inventions; in which, however, little novelty is elicited. A somewhat better method or system in this journal would materially add to its influence as a scientific record.

The Bankers' Magazine contains an exposé of "The Grinding Tyranny and Unprincipled Rapacity of Money-lenders," though the remedy proposed—"the re-enaction of the usury laws"—is very questionable. "The Regulation of the Currency, and Suggestions for Decimal Money," are among the other striking novelties of this number.

Simmonds's Colonial Magazine is chiefly noticeable for the "Journal of a Voyage to Port Philip," and an anonymous attack from Monte Viedo, on "Rosas, and the Atrocities of his Dictatorship," in which crimes are catalogued in a frightful array of figures. "A Visit of Ningpo," by an English lady, is a neat picture of Chinese domestic life.

Maxwell's History of the Rebellion in Ireland, in 1798, Parts XII. and XIII., details "The Progress of the Union through the British and Irish Houses of Commons;" "Summary of Opinions pro and con the Union;" "State of Ireland in 1801;" and "The Trial of Robert Emmet." The illustrations, by Cruikshank, are well sustained.

The Love Match, by Henry Cockton (Part II.), progresses with "The Hero's Expedition in a new character;" "The Bans;" and "Consequent Flight;" full of bustle and incident.

The New Sporting Magazine is rife with seasonable novelties—in papers on Hunting, Pheasant-shooting, the Newmarket Meetings, &c.

The Funny Almanack for 1845, by Momus the Younger, illustrated by Phiz, is a calendar of mirth and matter-of-fact, broad grin and quaint conceit. Besides the calendar, to each month is an engraving of some comic incident, with poetical illustration, and a few quips and puns; wound up with a comic chronology of 1844. The whole is very amusing; and the price (6d.) a marvel of cheapness.

The West of England Miscellany, No. I., printed at Bath, proves sub-division of letters as well as labour, to be the taste of the day. The opening paper denotes the work to be a scion of Young England.

Punch's Pocket-book for 1845, is an opera semi-seria, as they say in the Haymarket. The first part contains the customary Pocket-book Lists of the State, Legislature, Population, Law, Taxes, Commerce, an Almanack, Diary, and ruled columns for "stubborn things." Thus far, the fact; then come the entremets—the fun, with a poetic index:

> 'Tis said an index is a prosy thing:
> Punch, to re-verse it, will his index sing.

The papers, alternate prose and verse, are mostly in the style of the Swiftian Directions to Servants; "The Stranger's Guide to the Great Metropolis" is one of the best specimens. Among the other subjects so quizzed are the Police, Fancy Balls and Fairs, Ramsgate, Popular Authors, the Syncretics, the Bill System, Public Dinners, Farming for Ladies. The whole is amusing drollery, so that those who lose their temper over the facts and figures of Part I., may recruit their humour with Part II. We suspect that many a small wit invests half-a-crown in the purchase of Punch's Pocket-book, as a refresher for his own scanty store of jokes!—the investment is, doubtless, a profitable one, until detection, when he may be amenable to the excise for smuggling spirits. The steel illustrations, by Leech, are clever, especially the coloured frontispiece, "Farming for Ladies," and the vignette; the wood-cut head-pieces, too, are the quintessence of drollery.

THE THEATRES.

HAYMARKET.

A very funny performance took place at this house on Monday evening. We say funny, inasmuch as the humour was principally sustained by the audience instead of the actors. A comic drama, called "Sam Patch," was produced, which proved so complete a failure, that the spectators having gone through the various condemnatory stages of inattentious sibilation and indignation, at last became jocose, which fatal mood for any audience to fall into, soon decided the fate of this unfortunate production. Sam Patch was a man, who, if we recollect aright, used to leap down from Goat Island into the cauldron of the Falls of Niagara, but, as is usual in such cases, took the jump once too often, and was never heard of again. An attempt to represent this feat was introduced in the last scene of the play by the aid of some revolving stage water and a shaking cloth, which increased the merriment of the spectators to the last pitch of derisive jocularity.

The bringing out of this unlucky affair was principally to be regretted, for the sake of the chief performer, Mr. Marble; of whose quaint acting we have before had to speak in high terms: and who certainly did all that could be done with a silly part in a sillier play. He is, without doubt, the best American comic performer we have ever seen—natural, quiet, yet forcible—and delivering his odd sayings with a sly dry humour, far more effective than the most outrageous buffoonery. But we hope he will not appear too much in pieces written for his performance alone. Such productions are always weak; and when the principal actor is off the stage, nothing can be more inane than the dialogue or situations resembling those dull scenes, in what are termed "personation pieces," whilst the chief performer is changing dresses.

The piece was repeated on Tuesday, and, from some alterations, certainly went much better; but altogether only lived three nights. We wonder that Mr. Webster, with his general acumen in dramatic matters, brought such a trashy affair forward, especially at the Haymarket. Not but that some of Mr. Marble's sayings were very droll: his account of the manner in which one of his acquaintances got up an effect on illumination nights, by lighting the tail of a fat pig until all the lard was burnt out of him, produced a roar of laughter.

LYCEUM.

A dramatic sketch, entitled "To Persons about to Marry," was produced here on Monday. The plot turns upon the contrivances of a nephew, to make his uncle, Mr. Pimony Codlums (Mr. Frank Matthews), a rich old bachelor, approve of his clandestine marriage. The old gentleman, having tried boarding-houses, lodgings, and all other refuges for the destitute, at all of which he finds himself robbed, advertises for a respectable widow as housekeeper. Accordingly his house is besieged by applicants, to his extreme terror, and in the midst of his confusions the nephew introduces a young widow, who, in an interview with Mr. Codlums, so captivates him, that he at last wishes she could always remain there. Of course the lady proves to be his nephew's wife: and all is ultimately arranged to their general satisfaction. It will be seen that the materials of this little farce are very slight, but they served to keep the audience in high good humour for half an hour. Mr. F. Matthews had a part admirably suited to him, which he played very carefully; and Mr. Meadows, and Mrs. Wigan, as two pilfering servants, gained a great share of applause from the audience. The piece was entirely successful.

SADLER'S WELLS.

Massinger's play of "The City Madam" was brought out here last week (at a period too late for us to notice it in the ensuing number), and added another successful production to the legitimate dramas hitherto represented under this praiseworthy management.

"The City Madam" is one of the thirty-seven plays written by this last of the great dramatic poets of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries; of which only eighteen are extant, owing to the culpable carelessness of Warburton. It was first acted May 25, 1632, and published 1659—twenty years after his death, so affectingly chronicled in the parish register of St. Saviour's. It was revived at Drury-lane in 1782; and in 1810, the alteration by Sir J. Burges was brought out at the Lyceum. Since then it has been performed several times at different houses, Mr. Macready being the latest representative of Luke.

The play, as now acted at Sadler's Wells, is not Burges's adaptation—at the same time it certainly is not Massinger's original comedy. Considerable liberties have been taken with the text and the construction; and, independently of omitting the coarser scenes, which would be found objectionable at the present time, the natures of the characters have been in some instances entirely changed. The daughters, brought up, in the original, in all their mother's overbearing pride and tyranny, sink down to two mere walking ladies; and the great character of the play, Luke, retaliates upon his sister-in-law and nieces, for the indignities so long suffered, not in the pride of power and affluence which bursts upon him, but in a moment of madness, brought about by his change of state. Nevertheless, the play, as now produced, acts exceedingly well; although the impression left at its termination is certainly unsatisfactory—not as regards its performance, but as relating to its story and characters

Mr. Phelps exhibited great judgment in the part of Luke: and was warmly applauded throughout, more especially in the scenes where he pleads for the decayed merchants, and where he returns from visiting the room in which his wealth is contained. If there was any fault in his performance it was that of being somewhat too energetic towards the end of the play. Mrs. Warner's Lady Frugal was excellently acted—the spirit of the haughty purse-proud city madam broke forth in every speech and gesture, contrasting admirably with her humbled manner after her supposed reverse of fortune. The other characters deserve commendation. We were happy to see the house literally crowded by a superior and intelligent audience: the presence of a large school was a pleasing proof that the exertions of the management are approved of, not merely by the playgoers, but by those intrusted with the education and moral culture of youth. The applause was loud, and what was better, judicious, throughout; and the principal performers were called for, and warmly cheered at the conclusion.

THE MARKETS.

Corn Exchange (Friday).—Since Monday, the arrivals of English wheat up to our market have been very scanty: hence, the stands to-day were poorly filled with samples. Most descriptions were in steady request, and previous rates were supported. The best kinds of foreign wheat were in fair request, but other qualities were inactive, at late rates. The show of barley was not very large; yet most kinds were rather dull, at about previous figures. The best kinds of malt were quite as dear. In other descriptions, very little was doing. Oats, beans and peas, found buyers at full prices.

The Seed Market.—Comparatively little has been doing in this market since our last, and we have no variation to notice in prices.

The following are the present rates:—Linseed, English, sowing, 52s to 58s; Baltic crushing, 38s to 42s; Mediterranean and Odessa, 40s to 42s; hempseed, 35s to 38s per quarter; coriander, 15s to 18s per cwt.; brown mustard seed, —s to —s; white ditto, —s to —s; tares, —s to—s per bushel; English rapeseed, £23 to £25 per last of ten quarters; Linseed cakes, English, £10 10s to £11; do., Foreign, £6 15s to £7 per 1000; rape-seed cakes, £5 10s to £6 6s per ton; canary, 54s to 56s per quarter.

Imperial Weekly Averages.—Wheat, 46s 0d; barley, 35s 7d; oats, 21s 2d; rye, 37s 3d; beans, 36s 8d; peas, 35s 1d.

Duties on Foreign Corn.—Wheat, 20s; barley, 4s; oats, 6s; rye, 5s 6d; beans, 6s 6d; peas, 9s 6d.

Tea.—There has been more business doing in this article, and in some cases rather more money has been obtained for both black and green. The stock is now 29,478,000 against 29,733 000 lbs at the same time in 1843.

Coffee.—There has been a good inquiry for most kinds of coffee, the rates of which have ruled quite as high as last week. Ceylon (good ordinary) has sold at 55s per cwt.

Provisions.—There is a better feeling in the demand for Dutch butter, which is now selling at 92s to 94s for Friezland, and 96s to 98s for Kiel. The sale for Irish is active, at an advance of from 1s to 2s per cwt. Carlows, landed, have sold at 78s to 90s; Cork, 80s to 84s; Limerick, 77s to 83s; and Sligo, 77s to 76s per cwt. In bacon very little is doing, and prices are barely supported. Lard is the turn lower. In barrelled provisions very little is doing.

Hay and Straw.—Coarse meadow hay, £3 10s to £4 10s; useful ditto, £4 12s to £5; fine upland ditto, £5 3s to £5 8s; clover hay, £4 10s to £6 0s; oat straw, £1 8s to £1 10s; wheat straw, £1 11s to £1 13s, per load.

Potatoes.—We have to report a very inactive demand for potatoes, at from £2 10s to £3 15s per ton.

Tallow.—The market has a quiet appearance, yet prices are supported. Old P.Y.C., on the spot, is quoted at 40s 6d, and new, 40s 9d to 41s per cwt.

Hops (Friday).—Although our market is fairly supplied with most kinds of new hops, the demand for all descriptions is active, and prices are still on the advance. Duty called £130,000 to £135,000. 1844's:—Sussex pockets, £6 17s to £8 0s; Wealds, £7 0s to £8 8s; Mid Kent, £9 0s to £11 11s; East Kent, £9 15s to £12 0s; Choice ditto, £12 12s to £13; Farnhams, £10 10s to £13 0s.—1843's: Sussex pockets, £6 18s to £7 10s; Wealds, £6 18s to £7 7s; Choice ditto, £9 15s to £12 0s; East Kent, £9 15s to £12 0s; Old Kent bags, £7 7s to £9 15s.

Smithfield (Friday).—Although our market this morning was but moderately supplied with beasts, we have again to report a very inactive demand for beef, at prices barely equal to those obtained on Monday last. We had on sale 60 beasts and 64 sheep from Rotterdam, and 100 Scots, by sea, from Aberdeen. The numbers of sheep being limited, the inquiry for them was firm at very full currencies, and, at which, a good clearance was effected. In calves, the supply of which was tolerably good, exceedingly little was doing, at barely late rates. Pigs were a dull sale, and prices were not supported. Milch cows sold at from £16 to £19 5s each.

Per 8lbs to sink the offal:—Coarse and inferior beasts, 2s 2d to 2s 4d; second quality do. 2s 6d to 2s 10d; prime large oxen, 3s 0d to 3s 6d; prime Scots, &c., 3s 8d to 3s 10d; coarse and inferior sheep, 2s 6d to 3s 0d; second quality ditto, 3s 2d to 3s 4d: prime coarse woolled sheep, 3s 6d to 3s 10d; prime Southdown ditto, 3s 10d to 4s 0d; large coarse calves 3s 0d to 3s 6d; prime small ditto, 3s 8d to 4s 0d; large hogs, 2s 8d to 3s 6d; small porkers, 3s 8d to 3s 10d; sucking calves, 18s to 32s; and quarter old store pigs, 16s to 20s each. Beasts, 619; cows, 170; sheep, 3840; calves, 217; pigs, 370.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

The general tendency of the funds during the week has been to advance, in consequence of a scarcity of stock on the part of the jobbers, and the increased purchases of the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt. Consols, on Monday, left off at 99¾ ⅞ for money and 99⅞ to par for Account. This price improved on Tuesday, and on Wednesday, the Government Broker took 15,000 Three-and-a-Quarter per Cents, and 15,000 Three per Cents, the latter purchase being on account of the South Sea Guarantee Fund. These purchases of course tended to raise quotations, and reduce for the moment the value of money in the house. Exchequer Bills, however, have not partaken of the improvement of prices, continuing to quote 63 to 65 premium. Several investments have lately been made in Annuities, terminating in 1880, a stock that has till lately been rarely dealt in. The price is about 21⅝. Bank Stock remains at 204. Three per Cent Reduced closes at 99⅜ to ⅝; Long Annuities, 12 1-16; India Stock, 288; India Bonds, 85; Consols for Money, 100⅜; for Account, 100½ to ⅝.

The operations in the Foreign House have been limited during the week, the only feature worthy of remark being a rise of two per cent. in Portuguese Stock. Spanish has been fluctuating to the extent of about one per cent. according to the wishes of the party who manœuvre these securities. To the uninitiated, the stock appears to rise when it should fall and fall when appearances are in favour of a rise. Mexican remains at 34¾ to ⅞, and Dutch Two-and-a-Half per Cents. close at 62⅝ ¾. The new Dutch Four per Cent. Stock quotes 96⅞. At closing, the price of Spanish was, for the Actives, 24⅛ to ¼; Three per Cents., 35½ to ¾; Portuguese, 55½ to 56; Brazilian, 84½; and Belgian, 102.

The Railway Market has been rather flat during the week, with very limited transactions. The Paris and Rouen Railway shareholders have agreed to a dividend of 24f. 70c. per share, payable from this date. At a special meeting a resolution was carried to issue 18,000 new shares, for the purpose of extending branches to Elbeuf and Louviers. The Rouen and Havre Railway directors express themselves very confident of opening their line in the autumn of 1846. The Grand Junction Railway shareholders declare their usual dividend of £2 10s. per share. The Chairman declared the company had nothing to fear from competing lines. At a special meeting of the Birmingham and Gloucester Railway it was resolved to construct a deviation line to Worcester, and thence to Droitwich and Wolverhampton reserving their main line to the south of Stoke Prior. Ten thousand shares of £50 each, are to be issued for this purpose. The prices of the shares most dealt in are, (where neither premium nor discount is mentioned), as follows:—Edinburgh and Glasgow, 59 to 60; Sheffield and Lincoln, 39s to 40s; London and Birmingham (Stock), 213½; Bristol and Gloucester, 39⅞; Chester and Holyhead, 5½; Churnet Valley, 3¼; Eastern Counties, 13½; Ely and Bedford, 1¼; Lancaster and Carlisle, 13; Croydon, 16; Manchester and Leeds (chief shares), 46; York and North Midland (Scarboro' branch), 37½; Dover, 42½; Orleans and Vierzon, 9½; Paris and Orleans 39⅞; Paris and Rouen, 39¾; Rouen and Havre 22⅛; Paris and Strasbourg, 2¼.

Saturday Morning.—The market was firm yesterday for the English Stocks. Bank Stock was done at 205, and Old South Sea Annuities advanced one per cent., closing at 98½. Consols close at 100¼ ⅜. In the foreign house Spanish advance a point, in consequence of the denial by the Spanish finance minister that any clandestine issue of Three per Cents Bonds had been made, or was intended. The Actives closed at 24¾. Three per Cents, 36. The share market was rather flat. Sheffield and Manchester quoted 99 to 100; Glasgow and Dumfries, ½ dis to par.

SCENE FROM "THE CASTLES OF THE SEVEN PASSIONS."

The Illustration shows a scene from the successful new drama of "The Castles of the Seven Passions:" it may be termed the tableau of Avarice, where Mr. Keeley (Canuche) and Mrs. Keeley (Regaillette) are tempted into the Lion's mouth in quest of Gold and Silver in stupendous vases, whence leap forth the pair of demons shown in our Engraving. The terror of the pair of mortals is admirably depicted:—in the expression of this terror—mixed up with the ludicrous—the Keeleys have no parallel upon the stage.

NEW MUSIC.

Hamilton's Modern Instructions for the Pianoforte, &c. R. Cocks and Co.

We do not fully comprehend this title, or why the word "modern" should be used; the first chapter or section on "Musical Notation" is abstruse enough to vindicate its claims to antiquity. The rest of the book is carefully compiled, but presents nothing of any very startling novelty.

The Barefooted Friar. Sung by Herr Staudigl. The words by Sir Walter Scott. The Music by Edward J. Loder. Purday.

A quaint and clever composition, admirably expressive of the words, to which Mr. Loder is always attentive. Staudigl must have made it highly effective.

The Rage of Paris. A Series of Polkas. Arranged by Augustus Meves. R. Cocks and Co.

It is much to be deplored that this "Rage of Paris" should ever have become the taste of London. Mr. Meves has contrived to invest the music with some charm by his clever arrangements, as is his custom ever; but of the Vandal dance, which it is intended to accompany, we can only say, with Prior,

> So ill the motion with the music suits,
> So Orpheus fiddled, and so danc'd the brutes

Evening. A Duet. The Poetry by J. J. W. Mould; the Music by W. S. Rackstraw. Balls and Co.

This duet, the ornamental title-page informs us, is from the opera of "De Weldon," and has been sung by Miss M. Smith and Miss S. Flower. There is considerable poetry and feeling in the composition, but a restless anxiety to harmonise every note mars the grace of its progress. Moreover, the two voices are frequently made dependent upon the instrumental bass for anything like "concord of sweet sounds;" they are too loose. Of the words, all we can say is, that words were never cast in such a queer mould before: they are utter nonsense.

SCENE FROM THE "MYSTERIOUS STRANGER."

The accompanying sketch embodys one of the most effective scenes of this spirited piece. The Satanic tormenter of the puzzled Count Beausoleil (Mr. Hudson) has fully performed all his predictions. The Count has lost his fortune, and with his fortune his friends and his mistress. On a rumour, however, that his runaway banker has been arrested, his mistress returns, for there is then a chance of the fortune being recovered, explains away her desertion, and renews her vows of fidelity. At this nick of time his mysterious persecutor enters, declares all the lady has said to be false, and proves it by putting the Count into a closet, declaring that the banker has escaped beyond the possibility of arrest, that the fortune is lost, and that he himself, being rich beyond calculation, will marry the lady himself; and she consents, to the great horror of the Count, who rushes forward maddened, seizes the pistols from the case his visitor has brought, with an offer of being his second in the duel that must inevitably take place with his dearest friend, for whom his mistress has deserted him, and fires! As the weapons had probably been prepared for such a catastrophe, by the agent who brought them, he stands in the doorway harmless, thus again turning a natural cause into a proof of his supernatural power; the cleverness with which this is done throughout is the great merit of the piece.

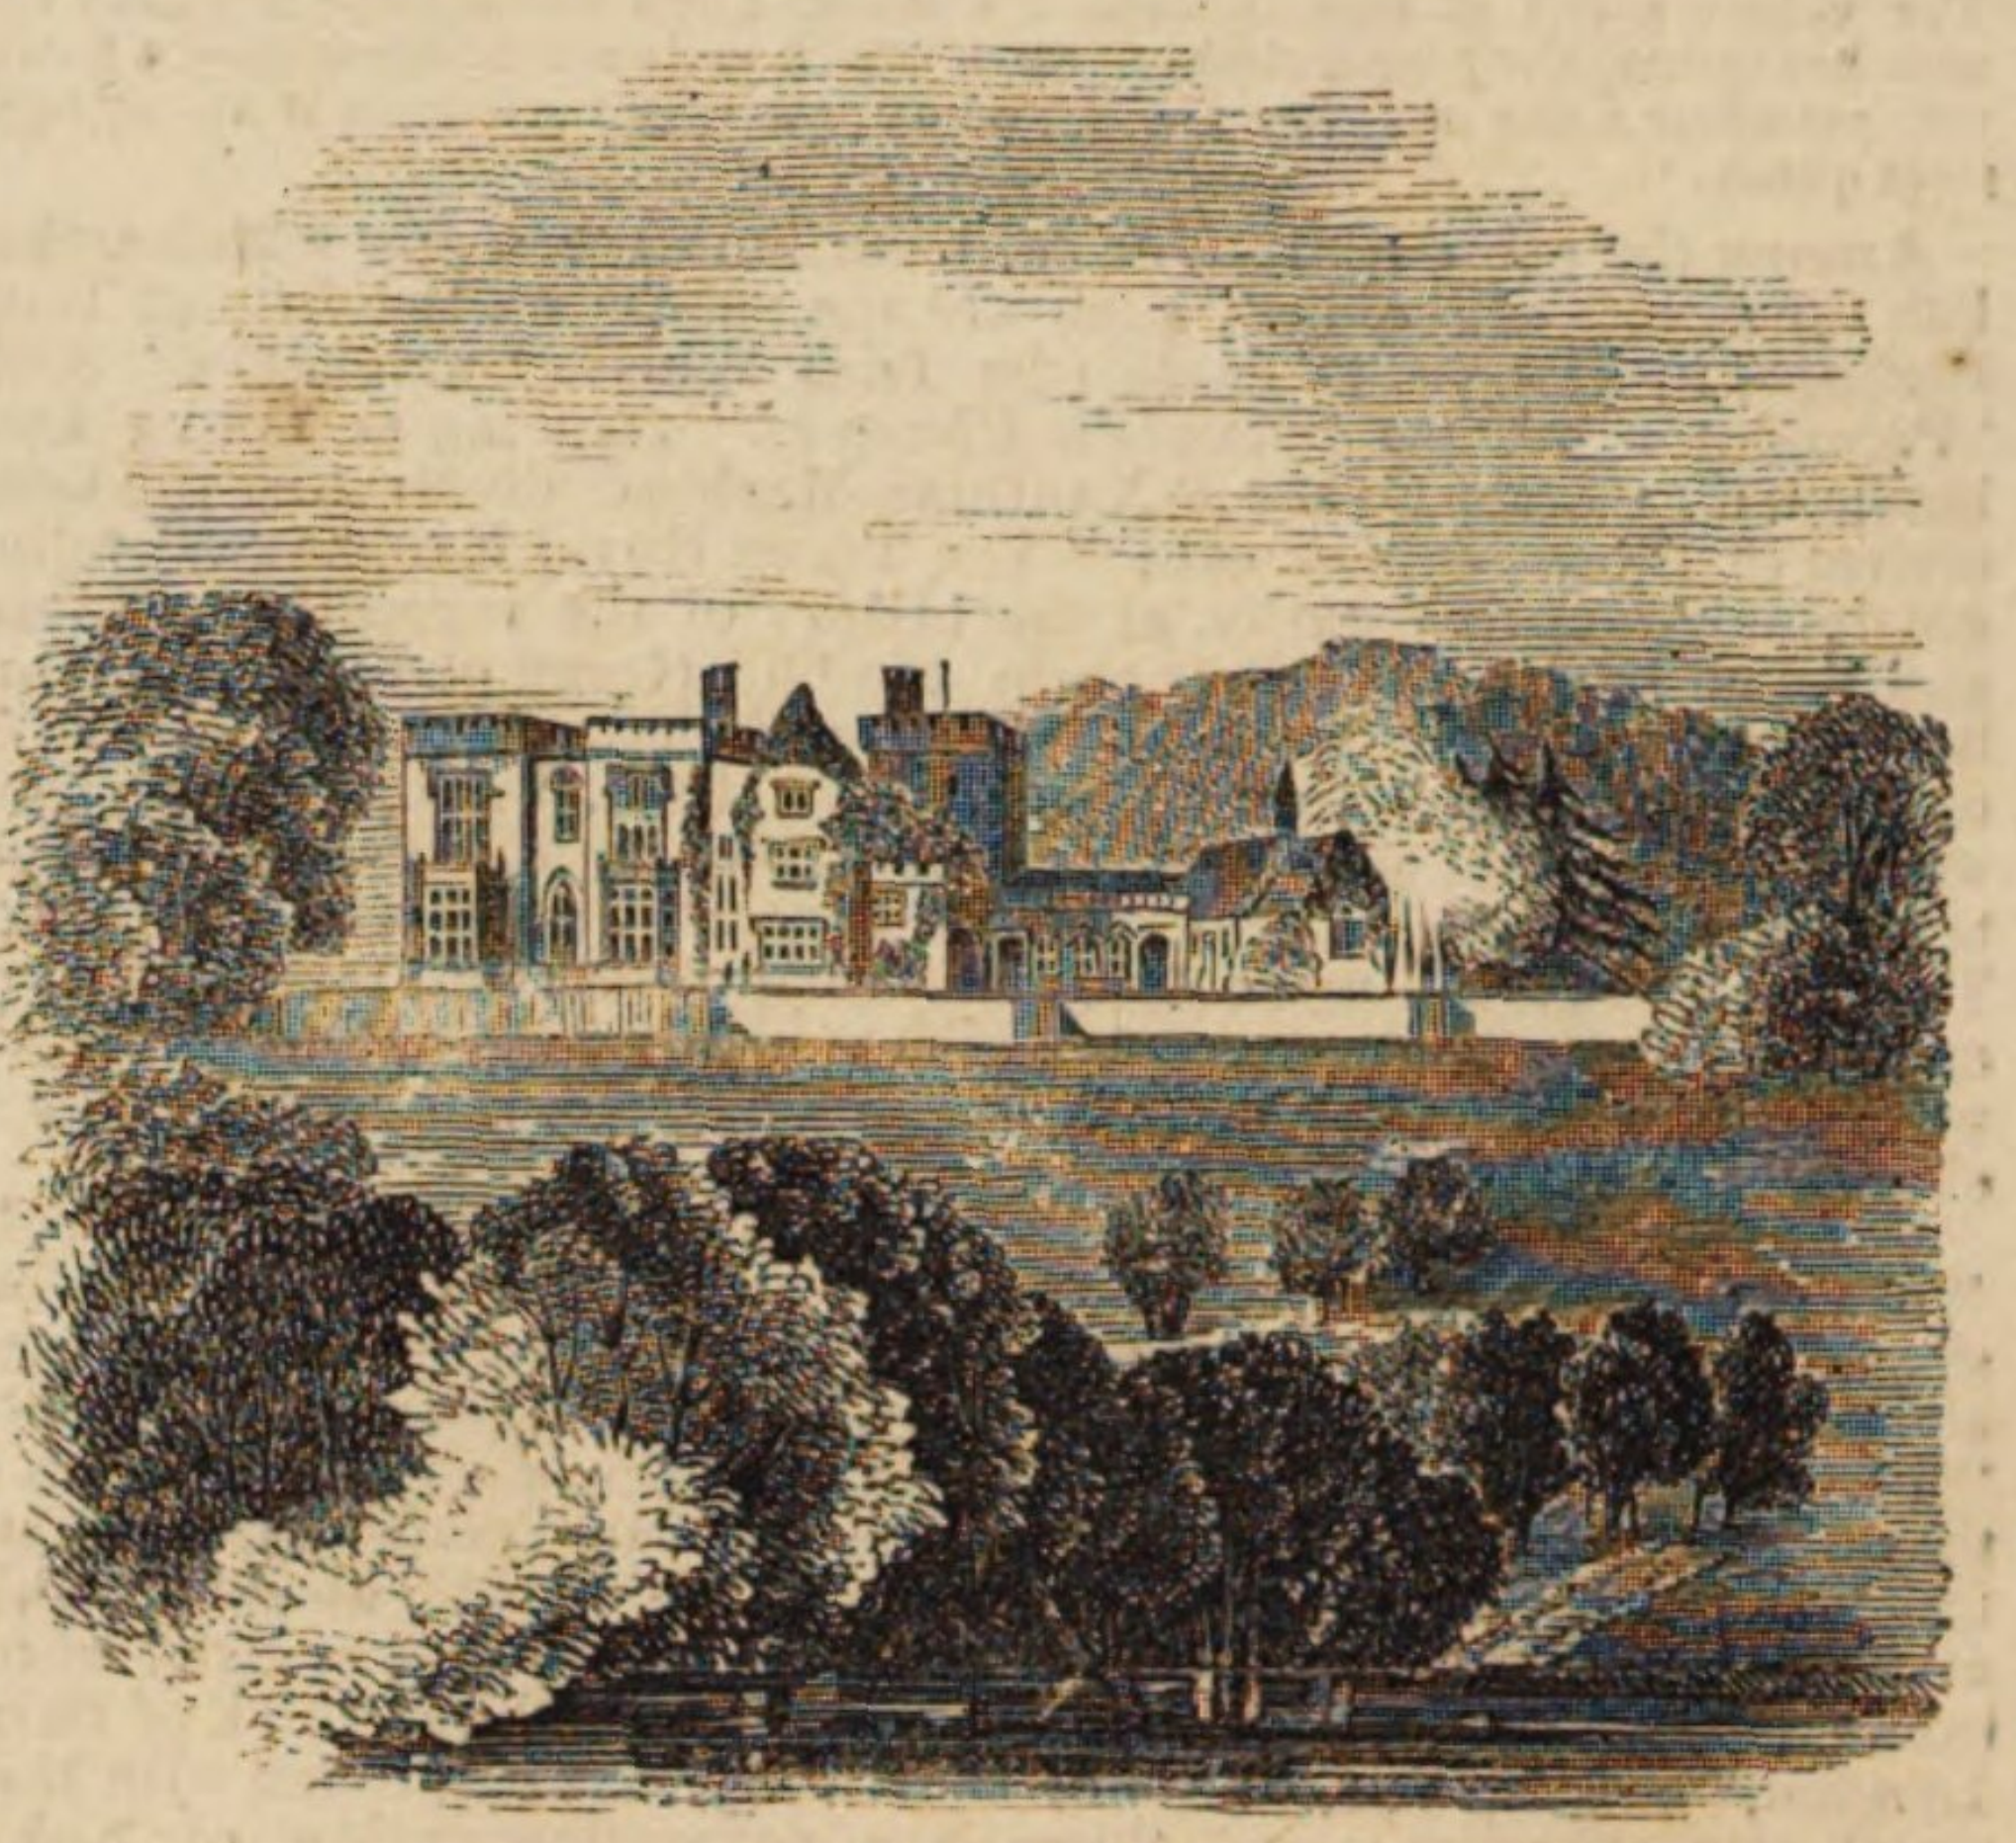
NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD ENGLAND.

LYPIATT PARK, GLOUCESTERSHIRE.

This locality is interesting, from its association with the memorable Gunpowder Conspiracy.

The beautiful domain of Lypiatt is situated about three miles from Stroud, and one and a half from Bisley, upon an eminence commanding an extensive prospect of the undulating surface of the Cotswold range.



LYPIATT PARK.

The approach from Stroud is somewhat secluded; but the avenue at the entrance being passed—whether viewed near, in connection with its antique and richly-carved details, or seen from the park, as represented by our artist, with its exquisite little chapel, its bastioned terraces, and ivy-covered walls, and its grey towers and battlements peering between lofty and thickly-studded elms—this venerable mansion is, certainly, a very fine example of the ancient domestic architecture of this country.

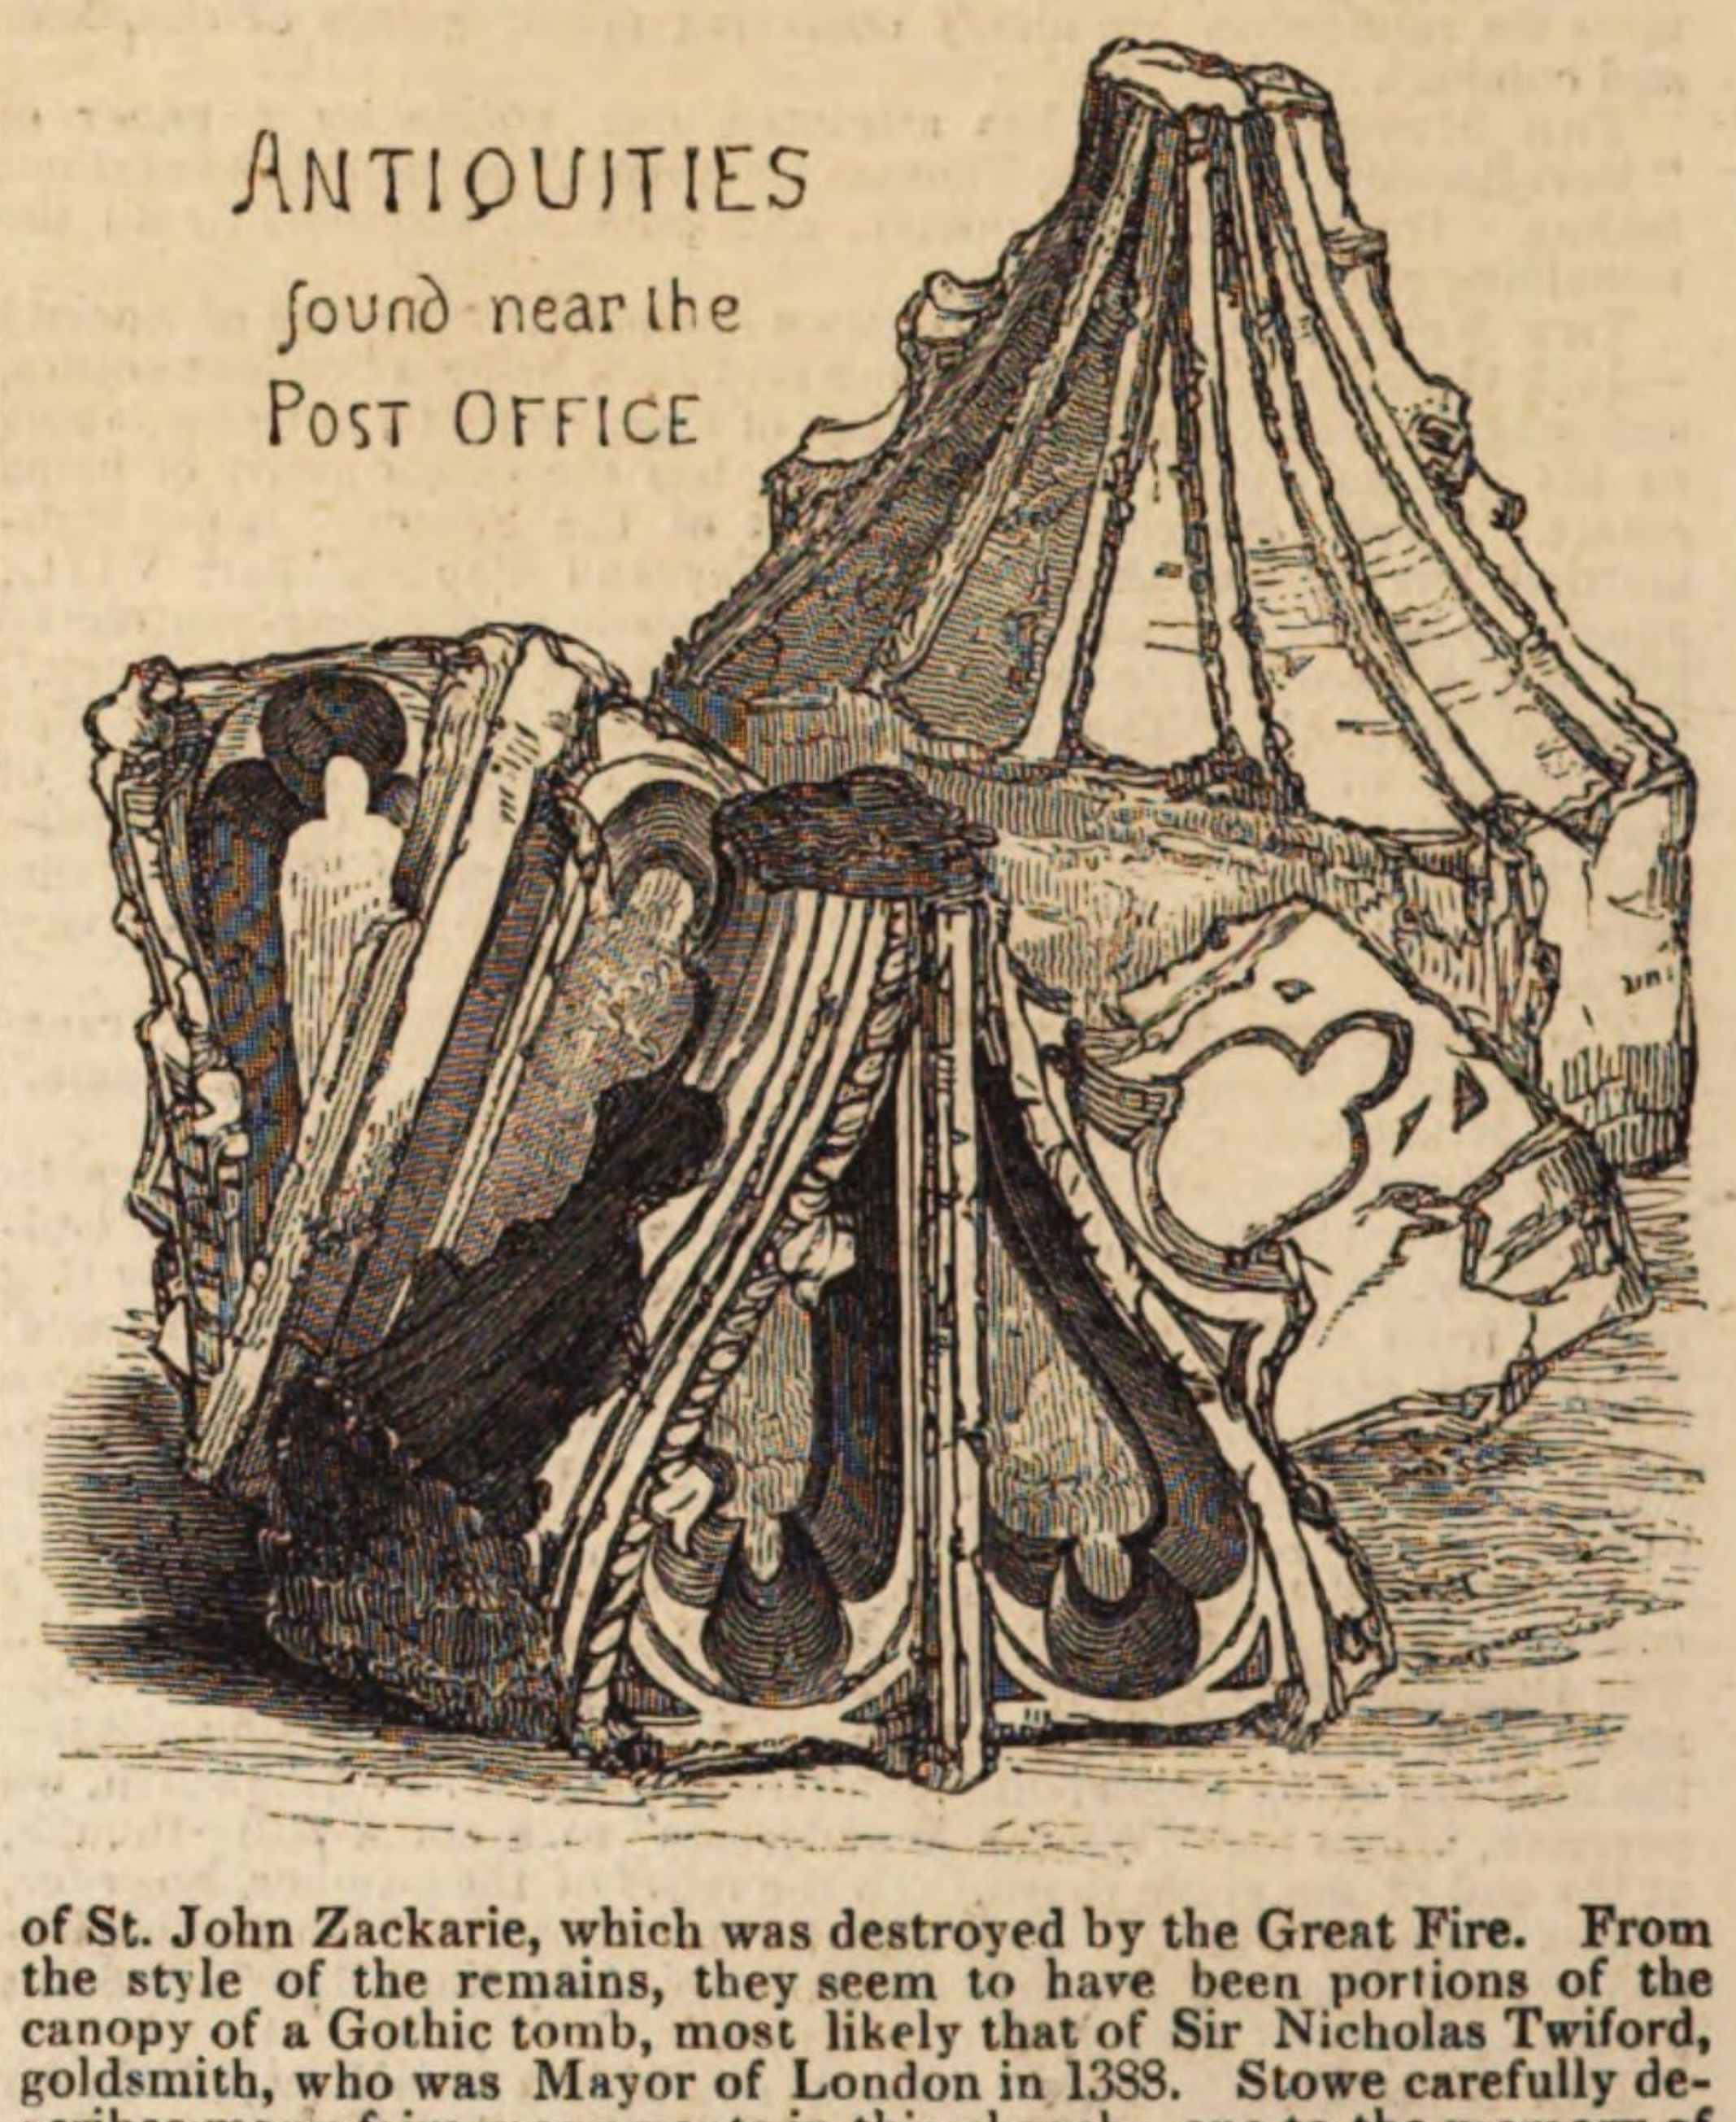
It was originally tenanted by Mortimer, the unfortunate paramour of Isabella, Queen of Edward the Second; the property afterwards fell into the possession of the Throckmorton family, who occupied it in the eventful reign of James the First, and who figured so conspicuously in the Gunpowder Plot. The apartment still exists in which the Conspirators met to discuss their diabolical design. It is a small, wainscotted, square room on the ground floor, and may be noticed in the gable compartment on the right hand side of the principal front in our sketch.

Another source of interest in this building is in the fact of its having held out against the troops of Cromwell, under Charles II., after the siege of Gloucester; and the mark of cannon still exists upon the external surface of the walls. The property has successively belonged to the family of Stevens, the Earl of Ilchester, Mr. Delamere, Sir Paul Baghott, Mr. Lewis; and, finally, Samuel Baker, Esq., the present spirited owner.

There are many interesting and romantic legends connected with the spot, with which the peasantry delight in entertaining strangers: among other things, a subterranean passage is said to exist between Bisley Church, and a concealed entrance in the family chapel, though for what reason does not appear; and the curiosity of its possessors has not yet led them to explore this hidden mystery. Since the property came into his possession, Mr. Baker has made extensive additions and alterations, from the design, under the able superintendence, of Messrs. Dankes and Hamilton, architects, of Gloucester; which, while strictly maintaining the ancient character of the building, have converted it into a spacious mansion, adapted to all the purposes of modern domestic life.

ANTIQUITIES FOUND NEAR THE GENERAL POST-OFFICE, ST. MARTIN'S-LE-GRAND.

The accompanying antiquities have been discovered while making a sewer near the General Post-Office, on the former site of the church of St. John Zackarie, which was destroyed by the Great Fire. From the style of the remains, they seem to have been portions of the canopy of a Gothic tomb, most likely that of Sir Nicholas Twiford, goldsmith, who was Mayor of London in 1388. Stowe carefully describes many faire monuments in this church: one to the memory of Robert Traps, goldsmith, 1526, which bears the following singular epitaph:—



> When the bels be merriely rung,
> And the Masse devoutly sung,
> And the Meate merriely eaten,
> Then shall Robert Traps, his Wife
> And children be forgotten.

The church of St. John Zackarie was situated at the corner of Maiden-lane, and was built during the reign of Edward II., and re-founded by Nicholas Twiford, 1390.

Extraordinary Dispatch of Newspapers from the General Post Office.—On Saturday evening one of the largest dispatches of newspapers from the Post-office in St. Martin's-le-Grand took place. So great a glut of newspapers has not been known in the General Post-office since the memorable night of the coronation of her Majesty the Queen, upon which occasion it is estimated that at last 130,000 newspapers were posted. The number on Saturday evening last did not fall far short of that quantity.

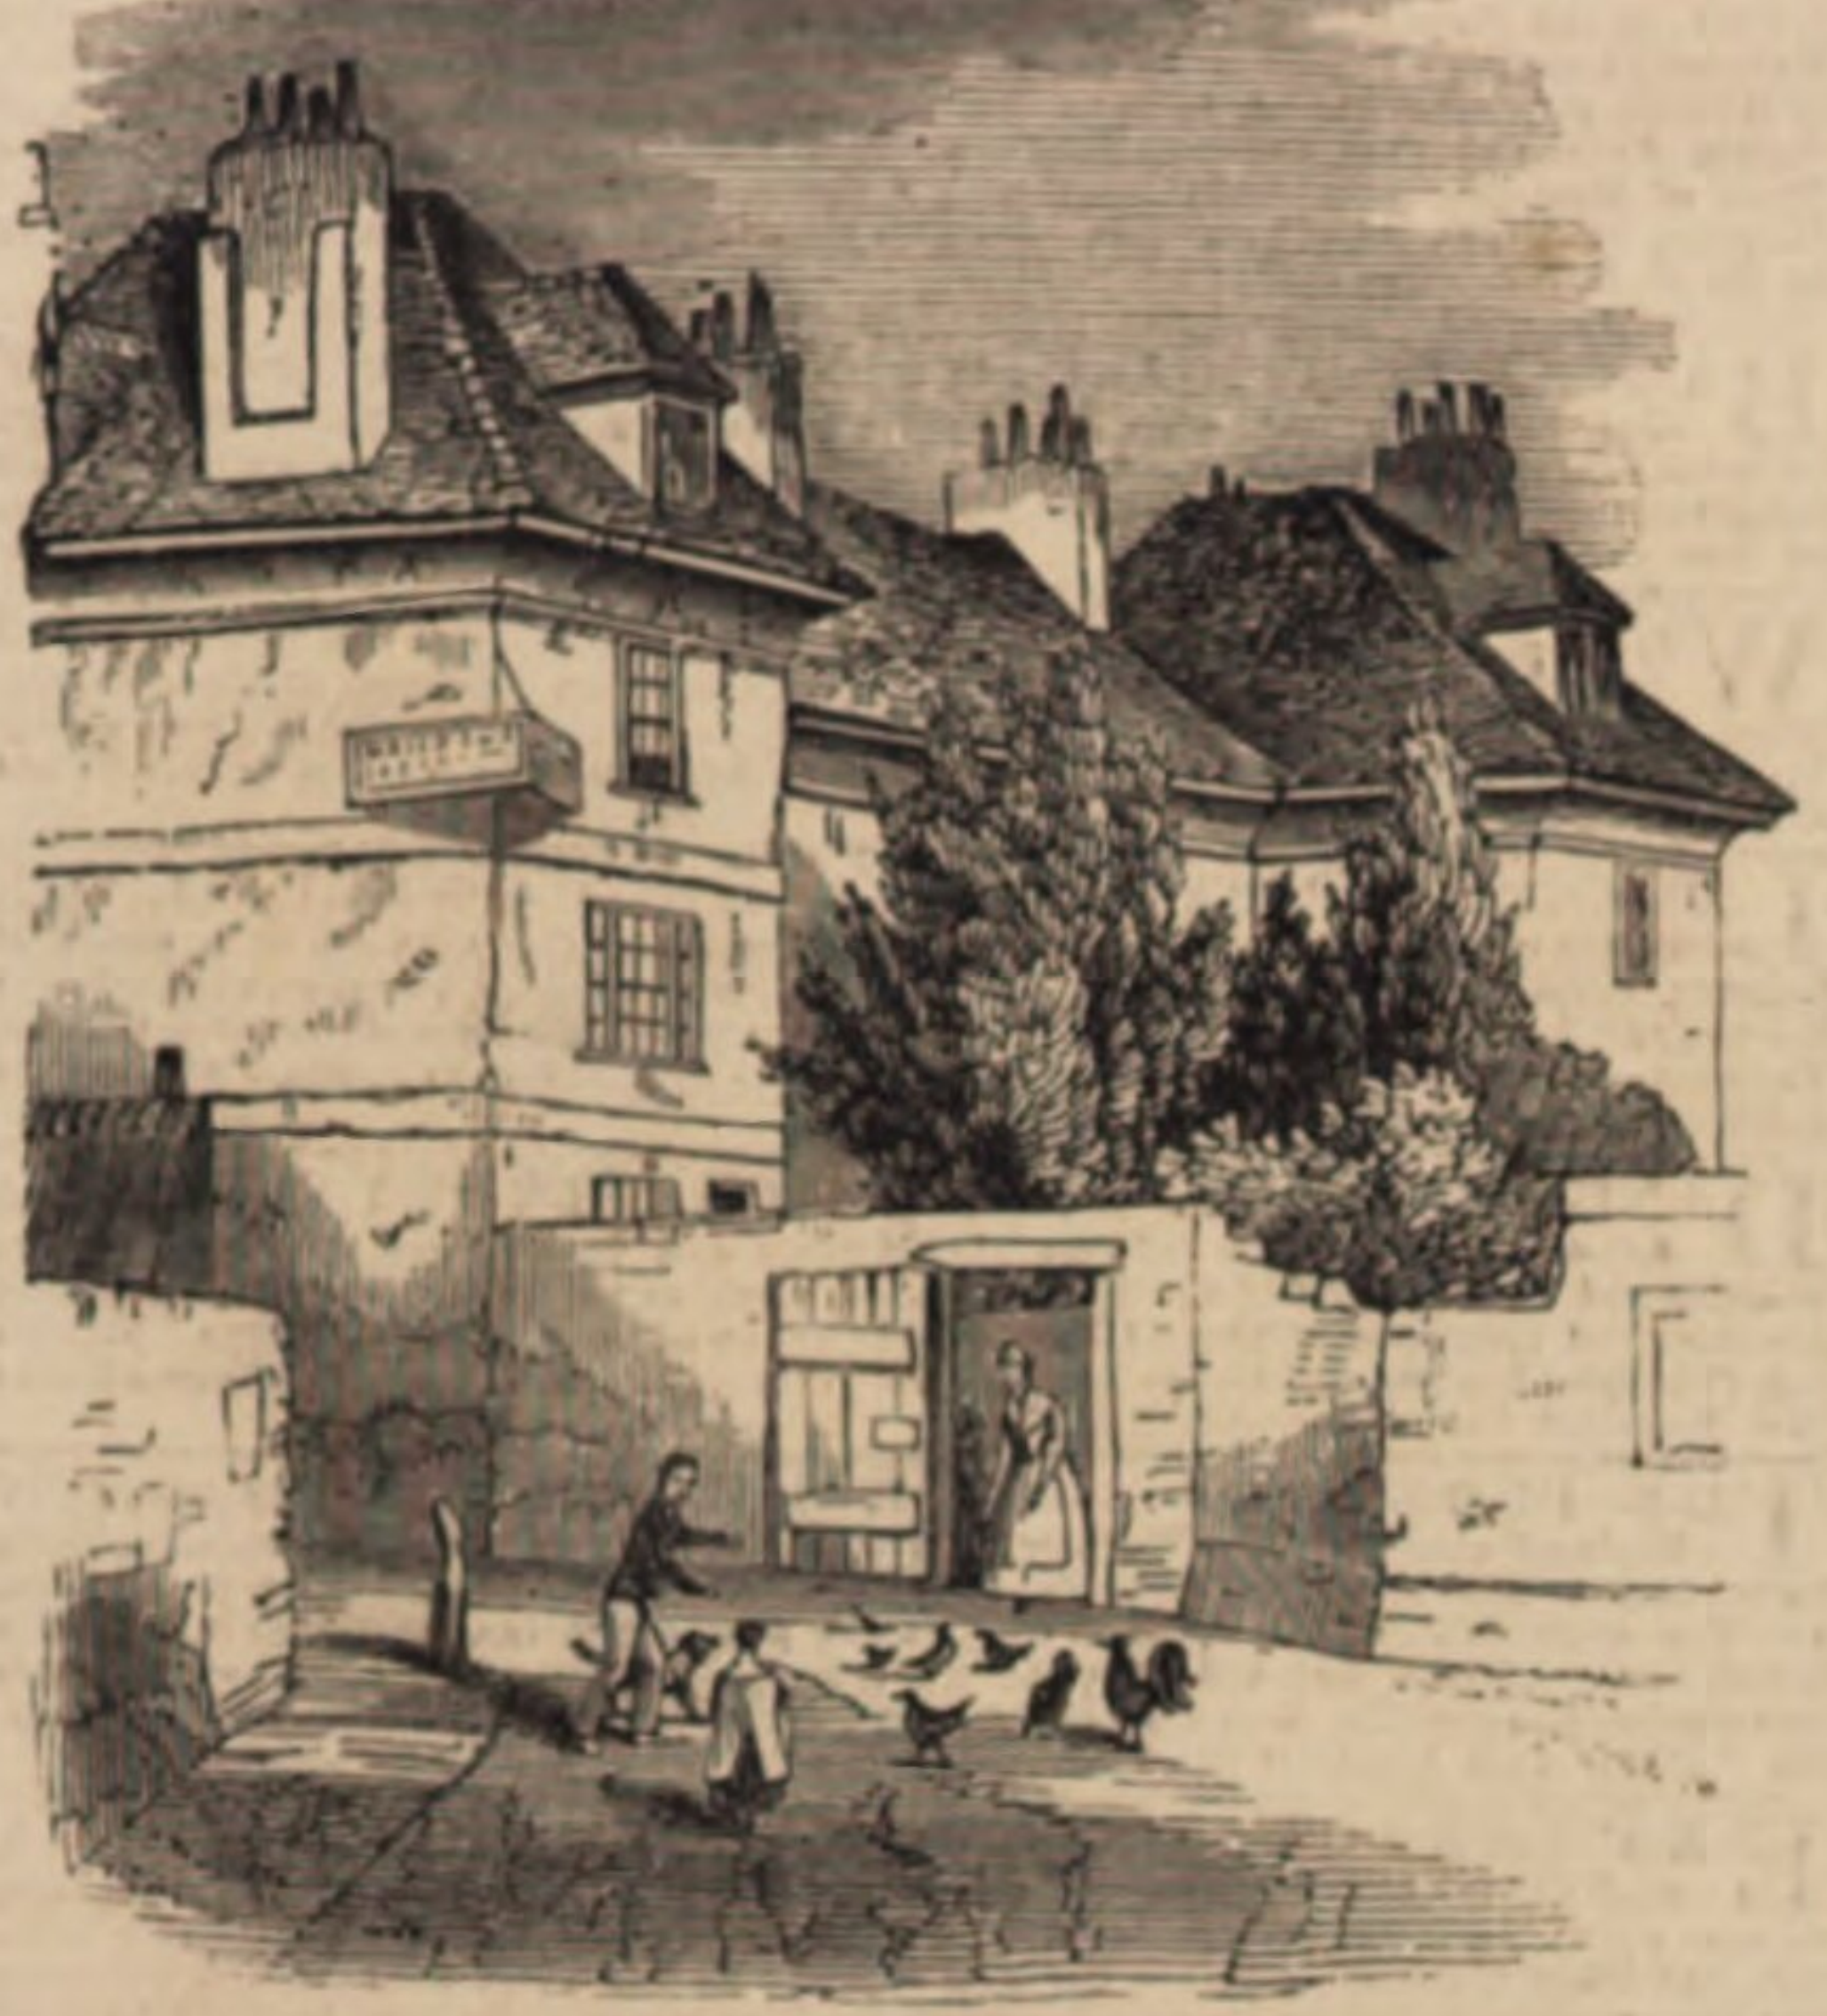
Baths and Wash houses for the Labouring Classes.—The Queen has sent £200, and Prince Albert £100, in aid of the funds required. The poor are already anxiously inquiring at the office in Crosby-square when the wash-houses will be opened.

Signs of Winter.—On Tuesday, London, and the country for some miles around it, were enveloped during the whole day in a dense fog, and business generally had to be carried on by artificial light. The navigation of the river was very much impeded. In some of the hilly parts of Surrey on that morning, snow fell. There was also a fall of snow in Kent, at Folkestone, and other places. On Sunday last the snow was full a foot deep on the ground. On Sunday night and Monday there was a copious fall of snow in the north of France, Belgium, and Holland.

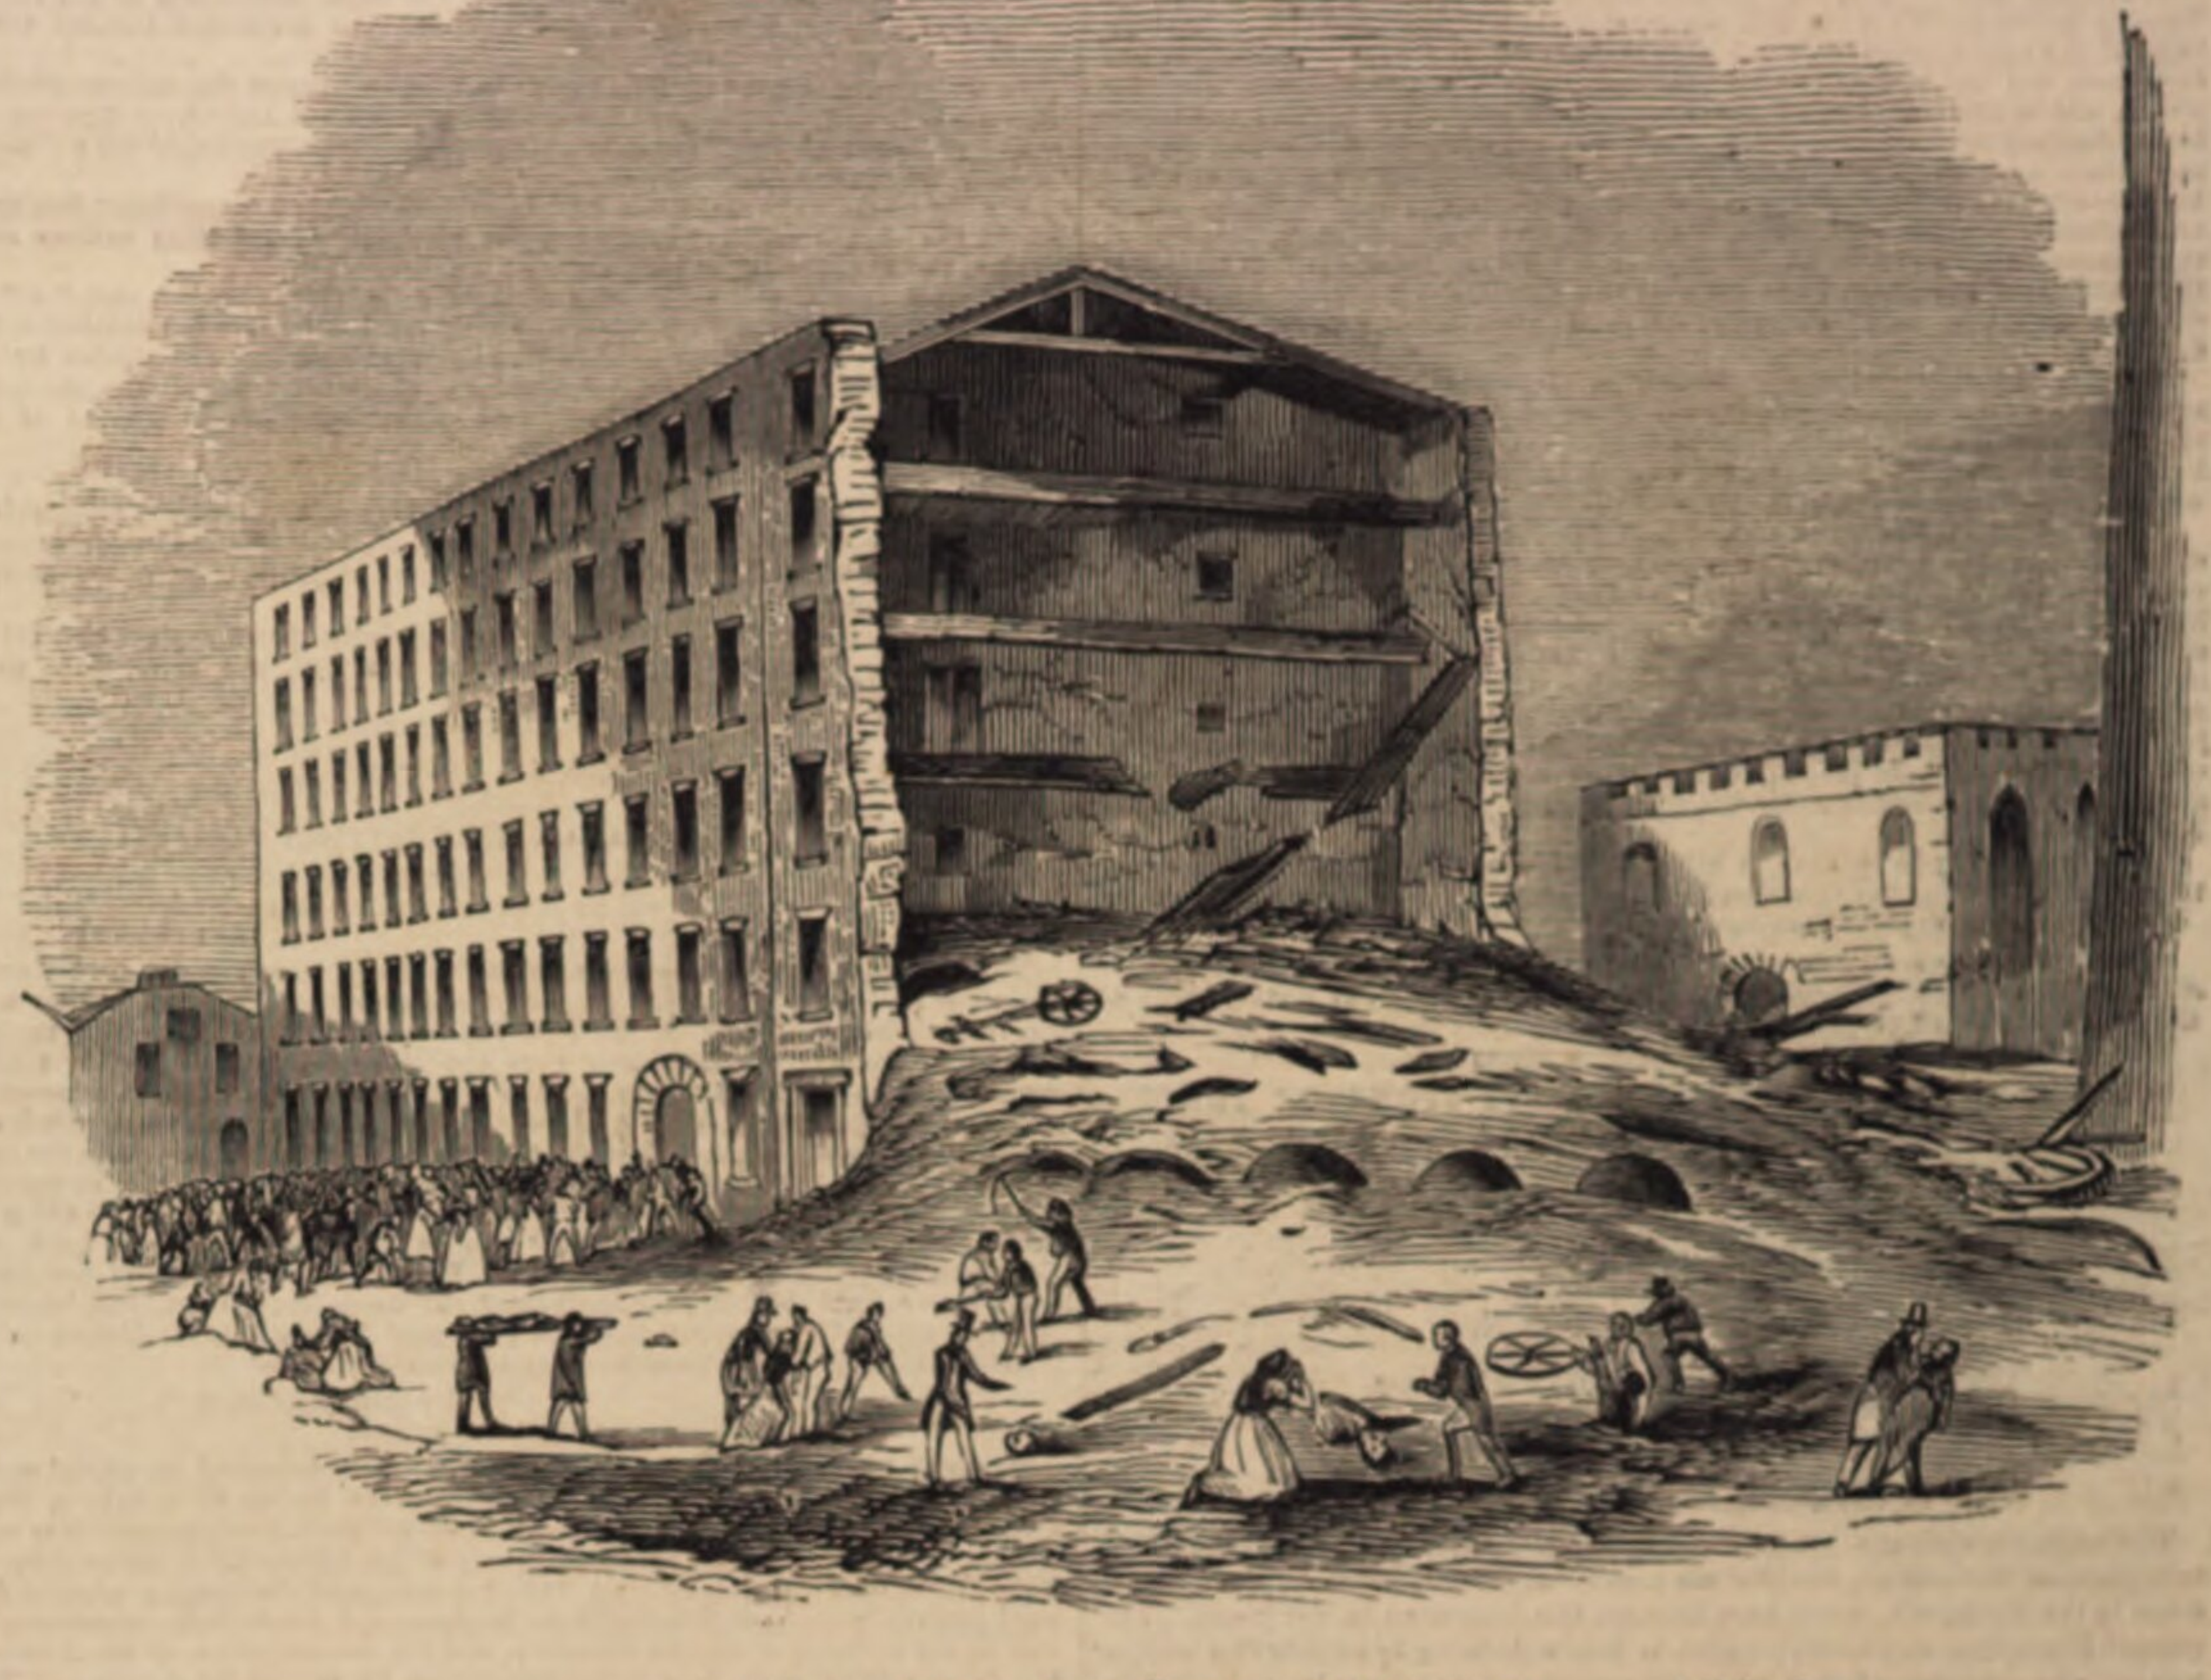
M. Libert, one of the chief clerks of the War Office in Paris, recently, without the aid of a written note, extracted in six minutes the square root of 20,511,841, and in a quarter of an hour also worked without notes the multiplication of 379,625,348 by the same figures, giving the number of 144,115,404,844,121,104. This may be recorded as one of the most remarkable instances of headwork in calculation hitherto recorded.

"BONNER'S HALL," HACKNEY.

During the week, pursuant to notice served on the respective tenants, considerable progress has been made towards the formation of "Victoria Park," Workmen have been occupied in forming Old Ford-lane into a straight line of road, and a row of houses, called King's Arms-row, has been levelled. Within the last three weeks, upwards of 700 loads of rubbish have been brought from the works in the formation of the new road at Whitechapel, to fill up the excavations, and for other purposes. A circle has been staked out in the Grove-road, which is to form one of the principal entrances into the park, and some progress has already been made in the drainage of many of the fields. The chief part of the tenants inhabiting the houses forming the remaining wing of "Bonner's-hall" have vacated their occupancy, prior to the demolition of this interesting structure, which will commence at once. This is one of the most picturesque parts of the locality; the venerable trees which still remain showing it to have been the remnants of a formerly well cultivated park. Bishop Bonner is stated to have resided in the old structure, long known as "Bonner's Hall;" and here it is asserted that the bishop imprisoned and tortured the first Protestant martyrs. The building consists of a centre and two wings; and, with its heavy roofs, chimney-stacks, and dormer windows, presents the scene shown in our engraving.



"BONNER'S HALL."



RUINS OF THE LOWER-HOUSE MILL, NEAR OLDHAM.

LOSS OF LIFE AT OLDHAM.

In part of our impression last week, we gave an account of the falling of a newly erected mill, the property of Messrs. Radcliffe, and Co., near Oldham. Twenty persons were killed by this unfortunate occurrence, 12 males, and 8 females.

The inquest was held on Saturday last, at the Black Swan Inn, Mumps, before Mr. Molesworth. The inquiry was held on the (19) bodies of Joseph Tweedale, Robert Tweedale, James Tweedale, Susannah Wright, George Taylor, Mary Ann Hussey, James Ridgway, Ann Buckley, James Kershaw, Sarah Watmough, William Mannock, John Kershaw, William Butterworth, Edward Winpenny, Ann Ogden, Hannah Slater, Ann Hulme, Elizabeth Smethurst, and Daniel Dunkerley—in all nineteen, William Whitehead not having been found.

It was agreed to commence with evidence as to the identity of the elder Tweedale's body.

A witness named William Mills, living in Pipe-row, North-moor, being confined to his bed by his injuries, his evidence was taken at his own dwelling. He stated: I am a bricklayer, and was working at Lower House Mill, Messrs. S. Radcliffe and Sons. One of the arches in the flooring of the top story had given way about five inches in the crown, and I pulled about a third of it out, and put it in again. This was on Tuesday last. I took it out on Tuesday night, and on Wednesday it was got ready for me, and I put one length (of a third part) in on Wednesday night, and we just then had the middle part out. It was flagged over the top, and the flags of the next bay had given way, and I showed it to the master (Mr. Wrigley) and one of the master's sons. One of the ends of an iron beam had broken—I mean the ear where the clip goes on, and I showed it to Mr. Samuel Radcliffe, and he said it was a pity they broke that way. One had broken before. The beam had only lost one ear, and had not lost all its bearing on the pillar. I had just pulled the middle length out, when I saw the gable end fall. One of the men working near the end (Thomas Mellor) ran, and before he could reach it, it went down, and him with it. It went bay after bay, the roof following the floor, beginning with the gable (west end), and coming towards me, and I saw it going bay after bay, for perhaps a minute, and when it came to me, down I went with it. My head was badly cut, but I was never insensible. My leg is badly bruised and swollen, but not broken; the flags had not broken, but the joints had sundered a little.

By a Juror: The joiner only said that the bedding of the flagging had given way. It was about the fourth bay from the gable end, where the arch had given way. I think it was the pressure towards the gable, and to resist such a pressure the gable should have had strong buttresses. The gable was the only thing to keep it up. The arch had only an inch rise per foot.

Mary Tweedale, of Lower House, widow of Joseph Tweedale, the overlooker, stated that one of the bodies lying at her house was that of her husband; he was forty-four years of age. Another body lying in her house was that of Robert Tweedale, her son, aged seventeen years, a twister-in; and the third body lying there was that of James Tweedale, a younger son, aged twelve years; he was a reacher-in. The poor woman sobbed, and was quite overcome.

After some further evidence the jury adjourned until Monday.

On their re-assembling they were sworn in the case of William Whitehead, the last body missing, which had been found on the preceding day. They then went to view that body, and also to inspect the mill again. The following are the particulars as to—

William Whitehead, of Fouleach, engineer, who would have completed his twenty-second year at Christmas next. He had been in the employ of the firm twelve years. He was unmarried, and lived with his mother, who has six surviving children, of whom four are under twenty years of age; namely, two girls of eighteen and twelve years, and two boys of sixteen and ten years. The deceased's body was found, about ten o'clock on Sunday morning, outside the building, in the yard, near the chimney, under a heap of bricks; so that he had evidently been struck down, crushed and killed, while passing along the yard, endeavouring to escape.

On the return of the jury to the Black Swan, the first witness called—the inquiry being so far limited to the death of the elder Tweedale—was

Thomas Mellor, of Hey Side, in Royton, bricklayer, who stated:—On Thursday I was at work on the arch in the cockloft at Lower House-mill. We had taken one length out and keyed it, and had taken another length out, and I had taken a springer out (the spring-course), and was talking to the man working with me (William Mills), when I saw the beam in the same bay snap off at the collar, at the pillar; and I said "Billy, it's aw going!" and I set off as fast as I could to the door. I saw the arch next Greave's factory drop in (the second bay from the gable end). It was the centre beam of the three principal beams between the second and third bays that fell, dropping in. The different bays dropped as I quitted them, till I reached the last bay but one, next the old factory, when it fell with me.

By Mr. Fairbairn: When the beam fell, I saw the arch of the fifth bay from the old mill (the third from the gable end) give way and drop. The stage we stood on dropped with it. I jumped off the stage, and ran towards the old mill. The beam did not spring at all; but it snapped off at the collar, and fell straight down. I heard no previous noise. No arch had given way, except that which we were repairing, and which had previously dropped or sunk just four inches. The arches had a rise of twelve inches.)

After some further evidence of a similar character, the inquiry was adjourned.

PROBABLE CAUSE OF THE ACCIDENT.

From the above evidence, though the facts are somewhat scattered, may be gleaned what, in all probability, is the true cause of the fall of this mill. It seems that, on Saturday week, five days before the occurrence, an arch, in the sixth story, was observed to have settled or sunk as much as four inches, and this at a spot just under a place in the floor, above which some flaggers, who were laying the stone floors of the rooms, had used, as a sort of deposit for their lime and water, while mixing it for the purpose of grouting. The water, it is supposed, by its percolation through the brickwork of the arch, had considerably loosened the mortar, and thus caused the arch to give way a little. On the Tuesday before the fall of the mill, some bricklayers commenced taking out that third of the arch nearest the north side of the mill, and they rebuilt it They then took out the middle third of the arch, including that space between the pillars, and in this way took off the pressure from one side of each of the centre beams forming the bay. The lateral pressure on the beams of the two adjoining arches appears to have been too great for the beams to resist, and that beam nearest the east end of the mill was observed to break out at the collar, or end, immediately after the removal of the arch, and it fell instantly, followed, in rapid succession, by that of all the bays in the room, and the violent impact of the materials of the arches upon the next and succeeding floors, no doubt broke down all the beams, and precipitated the whole mass of materials to the ground floor.

Amongst the collateral circumstances, in all probability, contributing to the accident, may be enumerated—the greenness of the walls of the building, and also of the arches; the unusually large span of the arch which fell, and perhaps its insufficient rise; the nature of the wooden props between the arches, and the mode of applying them; and the form of the iron principal beams.

The adjourned inquest was resumed on Wednesday, when Messrs. Fairburn and Bellhouse gave in their report respecting the cause of the lamentable occurrence, viz., that it had arisen "from the falling of one of the arches in the first instance, or, what is more probable, from the breaking of one of the large beams supporting the transverse and longitudinal arches at the extreme gable of the mill in the other;" and this owing to "the weakness of the iron beams, which we consider as the primary cause of the accident." After a short discussion, the jury returned the following verdict:—"Accidental death, caused by the falling of the building; and the jury are unanimously of opinion that the causes of the accident are fully pointed out by the able report of Messrs. Fairburn and Bellhouse."

The cases, twenty in number, as before stated, were then submitted to the customary process of signing in melancholy succession.

All the bodies have since been buried.

Subscription at Oldham.—In about half an hour, it was estimated that £750 had been subscribed, forming a highly-gratifying proof of the liberality of the inhabitants when properly appealed to.

This imposing spectacle, or, as it has been aptly termed, "Grand Festival," took place on Wednesday, the 23rd ult.; and, but for the pressure of the splendid event in the Metropolis, would have been ere this illustrated in our pages. The present Engraving, we should premise, is from a drawing by a celebrated marine painter, who attended the Festival as the representative of our Journal. Before detailing the ceremony, it may be desirable to furnish our readers with a short account of its locality.

The fast rising township of Birkenhead, then, is situated on the Cheshire side of the Mersey, exactly opposite Liverpool, and Wallasey Pool, an estuary communicating with the Mersey, and is opposite the centre of the long range of docks on the Liverpool side. Not many years ago, a humble ferry-house on the beach, a goodly private house to the south, the old manor-house called the Priory (the ruins of a small Benedictine Monastery), a farm-house, and two or three scattered cottages, constituted the whole of the buildings in Birkenhead; and only recently, it was a perfect morass, with scarcely a street passable. The accommodation of steamboats on the Mersey, for the purposes of the ferry, having rendered this place much more easily accessible from Liverpool, its desirableness as a residence for persons engaged in business very soon suggested itself. It is not more than twenty years since the colonization began, and so rapid has been the increase of the place, that it now contains nearly 15,000 inhabitants. This progress was, of course, considerably accelerated by the formation of the railway from Chester, by which the communication between that ancient city and Liverpool, by way of Birkenhead, has been increased beyond all expectation. A town, the rise of which has been so recent, could hardly be expected to present much, if any, architectural beauty; but Hamilton Square may, we think, challenge a comparison with most of the metropolitan squares in point of elevation and general effect; and it possesses one advantage over them all—it is constructed of beautiful white stone. Besides this square several spacious streets are in progress, many of which will be of considerable extent, and all of which have the rare advantage of being laid down with reference to a general plan. A public market of the largest dimensions is nearly completed; a park of upwards of 70 acres is in rapid progress; and baths and a public cemetery are in contemplation at no distant period.

Public attention has, however, been directed to this place by a scheme which bids fair to make the commerce of the Mersey, great as it already is, even tenfold greater; our readers will anticipate that we allude to the proposed formation of Birkenhead Docks.

The plan for converting the Wallasey Pool into an immense floating dock was first suggested by the late Mr. William Laird, who may safely be stated to have been the founder of Birkenhead. His intentions are now being carried out by his son, and several other influential gentlemen of the place, it having been ascertained that, during two periods of thirteen years, the trade of Liverpool had been doubled, whilst the dock room had not increased in proportion. Only a few months since upwards of one hundred ships were lying in the river waiting for room in the docks. Accordingly, it was decided to extend the dock accommodation of Liverpool by constructing others at Birkenhead, and, singularly enough, upon that day twelvemonths the bill authorising the construction of the docks passed the House of Lords.

The deputation next consulted Mr. Rendel, the engineer, who has produced the present plan, which comprises a floating dock, covering an area of 150 acres, with a depth of nineteen feet water (being more than that of all the Liverpool docks combined), besides a tidal basin of sixteen acres, and a great low water basin of thirty-seven acres. A bill was submitted to Parliament last session, when, notwithstanding an opposition of unexampled activity, they succeeded by means of the evidence of the most scientific men from all parts of the kingdom, in convincing the committees of both houses, that by the proposed works, the navigation of the Mersey would be improved instead of being obstructed, as had been urged by its opponents.

Early on Wednesday, the whole population of Birkenhead were on the alert for the ceremony of laying the first stone of the Docks: there were the high-born aristocrat, the enterprising merchant, and the industrious operative; there were Odd Fellows and Good Fellows—Ancient Foresters and Modern Teetotallers—Printers and Pensioners—Druids and Draymen—Shepherds and Shipwrights—Masons and Mechanics—Sawyers and Sailors—Commissioners and Carters—Firemen and Ferrymen—Children in Carts and Gentlemen in Carriages—Equestrians, Pedestrians, Minstrels, and Musicians, all marching in most approved order. The procession having arrived on the shore, took up various positions adjoining the site at the entrance of the Wallasey Pool, where the ceremony was to take place. An immense platform had been erected for the accommodation of such parties as had been favoured with tickets of admission; it was graced with an elegant display of loveliness and beauty, as most of the gentlemen, who had received invitations to the banquet, were there in attendance with their ladies. In the enclosure immediately surrounding the spot, where the stone was to be fixed, the bands of the 5th Dragoon Guards, and of the 6th Regiment, as well as the Harmonic Band of the renowned Stubbs of Liverpool, were stationed, and played a variety of popular music during the preparatory arrangements.

The leading gentlemen having arrived on the ground, preparations were immediately made for laying the stone, by Mr. Rendel depositing a glass bottle, containing a copy of the Liverpool Courier of that day, a plan of the works, and one of all the current coins, in a cavity grooved out of the solid rock. Mr. Rendel then read the inscription on the brass plate, and deposited the plate in the groove prepared for its reception, the head being nearest the river; after which he presented the silver trowel to Sir Philip Egerton. This superb trowel was engraved and described in our journal of the 26th ult.: it was designed and modelled by Mr. W. A. Hopkins, sculptor, Bedford-square, and not by Mr. Meyer, as stated in the above Number.

The stone was then lowered to its place, the mortar added, examined by the level, and pronounced to be well and truly laid by the hon. baronet, who struck it three times with a mallet made of rosewood. The Rev. Alexander Knox, incumbent of Birkenhead, then offered up a prayer. Sir P. Egerton then addressed the multitude; after which their shouts, the music of the bands, and the roar of artillery, having announced the termination of this part of the day's proceedings, the vast assemblage dispersed to partake of the various festivities which awaited them at the different places in the township. The streets had all the appearance of one vast fair; and it is estimated that not fewer than 100,000 persons were congregated together on the occasion.

Our Engraving represents the spectacle at the moment when the stone has been lowered in its place, and Sir P. Egerton is receiving the trowel.

In the evening, a grand dinner took place in a temporary apartment, constructed in the covered station of the Chester and Birkenhead Railway, Grange Lane. The dimensions of the room were 100 feet, by nearly 40 feet. This hall was tastefully decorated with festoons, and, indeed, alcoves of flowers and evergreens, and brilliantly illuminated by Bude lights, and various stars and other ornamental devices in gas. The entire floor was covered with crimson baize, and the whole had a most splendid effect. Upwards of five hundred sat down to a dinner consisting of every delicacy in season. During the evening the bands of the 5th Dragoon Guards and the 6th Regiment of Foot played a variety of popular music, in most admirable style. John Laird, Esq., Chairman of the Dock Commissioners, presided.

The display of gold and silver plate upon the tables was most costly and superb, and indeed all the arrangements were worthy of a banquet for Royalty itself. Among the decorations of the room we must not omit to mention a beautifully painted portrait of the late Mr. Laird, the original projector of the Birkenhead Docks, which was suspended on the wall at the back of the Vice-President's chair. One of the novelties of the feast (novel, we mean, in the provinces) was the introduction of Mr. Toole, the celebrated London toast-master.

In the evening there was an elegant ball and supper at the railway station; at the latter, a superbly worked banner was presented to Lady Grey Egerton.

The pleasures of the "merry mingling dance" were prolonged till 4 o'clock, when the company finally departed.

For the amusement of the out-door crowds, there was a magnificent display of fireworks; and bonfires "making night glorious" blazed from various eminences, and at conspicuous points along the shore.

Immense as were the multitudes assembled on this occasion, and fearfully crowded as were all the ferry-boats and railways leading to the locality of the festival, we are delighted to observe that its brightness was not shaded by one misfortune, which could be interpreted by the most fanciful into an omen of future calamity. There were several minor festivities in honour of the occasion.

Accounts from Constantinople of the 17th ult. mention the arrival of a Tartar with despatches from the General-in-Chief of the Turkish army in Albania, announcing that he had entered the town of Dibra, after an engagement with the insurgents.

The total number of letters dispatched from Bombay on the 1st of August by the Akbar for England amounted to 38,277, and newspapers, 9257, filling 50 boxes.

THE RATAN INQUISITION.

By your good leave
These men will be your judges: we must stand
The inquisition. SOUTHERNE.

There is a certain fable, written a long time ago, in which a society of small frogs are represented as thus remonstrating with those from whom they were receiving injury—"What is sport to you is death to us!" During the last session of Parliament committees were appointed to inquire whether similar cause of complaint did not exist in the present day. Before those honourable tribunals every witness produced—persons of great experience and knowledge of the matter in hand—scouted the idea that any man ever had tort from the turf. On the contrary, from their showing, of all the employments of life, racing was the purest and most immaculate. On the heels of those inquiries, treading on their kibes, came the Ratan affair. To those who testified before the Lords and Commons touching the virtues of jockeys, trainers, betting men—et hoc genus omne—we submit the following analysis of the Ratan Inquisition, and, beseeching their attention to the doings and detailings of those whose revelations before it have been permitted to transpire, beg to observe—

By your good leave
These men shall be your judges.

To the "Racing Calendar" of Thursday last there appeared an official manifesto to the following effect:—"At a meeting of the Jockey Club, held at Newmarket on Wednesday in the Houghton Meeting, the following report was read by the chairman. . . . . The stewards of the Jockey Club, assisted by the Duke of Beaufort and Colonel Peel, having investigated the charges brought forward against Samuel Rogers and John Braham, and heard their statements, as well as the evidence of various witnesses, and the account given by Mr. Ives and Mr. Crommelin of their share in the transaction, by betting for Rogers and Braham against Ratan for the late Derby race, are of opinion that the plan originated in an agreement between S. Rogers and J. Braham to bet both ways about Ratan, under the impression, that the parties whom they might commission to bet for them against the horse, would be influenced, by their representations of the IMPOSSIBILITY of his winning, to lay such sums of money against him as to prevent their appearing on the settling day if Ratan won." To this succeeds sentence against Rogers and Braham, warning them off Newmarket Heath in sæcula sæculorum, and an expression of the committee's sense of the impropriety of gentlemen betting large sums of money for jockeys, trainers, &c.

Well, Rogers and Braham having offered proof that they are scoundrels, were very properly punished. How stand their commissioners? That their position may be rightly understood, it is proper to premise, that after his appearance in the Craven Meeting of this year at Newmarket, Ratan became, by the general fiat, first favourite for the Derby—as such his owner backed him heavily and so did the best judges of racing in the kingdom—from his form and public performances. Now, suppose the reader or any other of our dear public had gone to Messrs. Ives and Crommelin with a representation of the impossibility of his winning—what share of attention does any one in his senses suppose they would have attached to it? When all the prestige of practical turf-men went in his favour—when it was a household axiom at Newmarket, that the elder Rogers—his trainer—declared his conviction no three year-old, of his year, was within half-a-stone of him—when the younger Rogers, who was to be his jockey, and who had unrestrained access to his stable—came to them and represented it was impossible he should win—did not such a piece of information seem suspicious to those gentlemen? The system of the turf is understood to be based on the spirit as well as on the letter of honour: its debts are debts of honour—as regards the manner in which they may be incurred as well as their discharge.

The report is silent as to whether, after the representations of Rogers—(Braham, of course, was only considered his go-between)—Messrs. Ives and Crommelin betted, either on their own account, or any other, against Ratan for the Derby. The public have great cause to complain of this—they have grave reason to look with doubt and offence on the suppression of the evidence given before the Jockey Club, because it affords the members of that society a clue to the character of professional betting, which ought to be a common guide for the use of the racing community. Let the Gaming Committee of the next session call for the production of the short-hand notes taken during the Ratan inquiry, and they will find the turf not quite such a blaze of couleur de rose as the witnesses of the past painted it.

TATTERSALL'S.

Monday.—The leading feature of the Derby betting this afternoon was the advance of Idas, a dark horse belonging to the Earl of Stradbroke, that is reported to have achieved great things with Evenus. Brother to E O, Lord Glasgow's colt, and Anti-Repealer, were also backed at improving prices, and some reasonably heavy sums were invested on the principal favourites at the last Newmarket quotations. Col. Peel's horses continue at a discount. The settlement went off peaceably.

INTERESTING TO LADIES.
To Messrs. ROWLAND and SON, 20, Hatton-garden, London.
Percy place, Landport, Portsmouth, April 4th, 1844.
Gentlemen,—I think it but an act of justice to inform you of the benefit I have derived from the use of your admirable Macassar Oil. About six months ago I found my hair getting daily more weak and thin, and much discoloured from a practice I had adopted of wetting it continually; fearing that I should lose it entirely, and hearing of the efficacy of your Macassar Oil, I have for some time past constantly used it, and the result is, that my hair is now perfectly restored and much improved in appearance and colour, having become thick, dark, and glossy; it also curls freely without the use of paper, which it never did before. To all my friends I have warmly recommended your Macassar Oil as an excellent restorative and preservative for the hair. As I have an objection to see my name in print, I beg you will not publish it; but you are at liberty to show this letter, or make any other use you please of it, and refer applicants to me, if necessary, in proof of the efficacy of your Macassar Oil. Your obedient servant, * * * * * * * * * * *
ROWLAND'S MACASSAR OIL preserves and reproduces the Hair; prevents it from falling off or turning Grey; changes Grey Hair to its Original Colour; frees it from Scurf and Dandriff, and makes it beautifully soft and curly.

READ the following TESTIMONIAL in favour of PARR'S LIFE PILLS, which is sufficient to convince the most prejudiced person that they are all that is required to conquer disease, and consequently, prolong life.
To T. ROBERTS and Co.
Sirs,—I beg to hand you the following testimonial, which I have just received from Mr. Williams, Union-street, Nottingham. Yours, obediently,
G. BATTERS, Chapel-bar, Nottingham.
Sir,—Printing is a great blessing to mankind, for now I am enabled to make known, through you, a perfect Cure, by taking PARR'S LIFE PILLS, of extremely bad Indigestion, a Bilious disorder, and Sick Headache, which I have been subjected to for years; and money enough has been paid to physicians and surgeons, which now would have been a little fortune to me. I wish every fellow-creature clearly to understand that I was wonderfully relieved by taking one box of PARR'S LIFE PILLS. Accident threw a testimonial in my way of a miraculous cure of a bilious attack and sick headache. The second box enabled me to go about my business with spirit and alacrity; and by taking two or three more boxes, I am happy to add my humble testimony of a perfect cure of that dreadful disorder—bilious and sick headache, which rendered me, before I took PARR'S LIFE PILLS, unfit for business. Considering the loss of time and pain, persons would find that one box of PARR'S LIFE PILLS is worth, instead of 1s. 1½d., as many guineas. May all persons make trial of PARR'S LIFE PILLS, is the sincere wish of
Yours, thankfully, M. WILLIAMS, Union-street, Nottingham.
To Mr. G. Batters.
PARR'S LIFE PILLS are sold by all respectable Medicine Vendors. See the words "PARR'S LIFE PILLS," in White Letters on a Red Ground, on the Government Stamp.

COD LIVER OIL.—Read the following Undeniable Testimony of the extraordinary value of this natural remedy in the CURE of GOUT, RHEUMATISM, SCROFULA, DISEASED JOINTS, SPINAL and GLANDULAR AFFECTIONS, LUMBAGO, SCROFULOUS ULCERS, and other external Diseases:—
Gentlemen.—If my case is of any value to you I beg you will make the best use of it, as I have suffered too much from Gout and Rheumatism not to have the strongest sympathy for all who may be similarly afflicted. I purchased only one bottle of your Cod Liver Oil, and after a few applications was completely cured. I could say much in praise of this miraculous remedy, and shall be happy to reply to all enquiries.
I am, Gentlemen, your thankful and obedient servant,
Sept. 1844. HENRY W. PITMAN.
Moore's Picture Gallery, St. Martin's lane, London.
Gentlemen.—About 4 months since I was attacked with a disease of the legs, for which I was admitted into St. Thomas's Hospital, and remained there a month subject to all kinds of treatment. I left the hospital to try the advice of several medical men, and all without the least benefit. I was at length advised by a friend to try a small bottle of your Cod Liver Oil, and from the very first application experienced relief, and before using the whole of the small bottle, was perfectly cured and have remained in perfect health to this day.

HIGHLY FINISHED STEEL ENGRAVINGS OF PRIZE ANIMALS, AND NEW AND IMPROVED
AGRICULTURAL IMPLEMENTS.

Engravings of Animals and Implements, to which Prizes were awarded at the late meetings of the Royal Agricultural Society of England at Oxford, Cambridge, Liverpool, Bristol, and Derby, and at the shows of the Highland and Agricultural Society of Scotland, have appeared in succession in the numbers of this Magazine; and it is the intention of the Proprietors to adopt the same course with respect to the Animals exhibited at the Royal Agricultural Show at Southampton, and at the meetings of the Yorkshire Agricultural Society and the Highland Society.

Farmers, Graziers, and Breeders of Cattle thus obtain the twofold advantage of acquiring the readiest information in reference to the selection of Animals, either for purchase or hire, most likely to improve their stock, and are made early acquainted with all the practical improvements in Husbandry and farm management.

Immediate notice is taken of all new publications bearing directly upon or connected with Agricultural management in all its branches, and copious extracts of the most valuable parts given.

Improvements in Agriculture abroad are noticed from time to time, and extracts from foreign writers upon Agricultural subjects are translated and given, when found to be of practical interest.

The Agricultural articles are supplied by the most eminent practical Agriculturists of the United Kingdom; and all matters calculated to benefit the Practical Farmer which occur throughout the month are carefully compiled and inserted. Yours truly, ROBERT MEDCALF.

Extract from Dr Ure's testimonial, June 6, 1840:—"I find Mr. G. Nelson's Patent Opaque Gelatine to be at least equal in strength and purity, if not superior, to the best isinglass, for every culinary purpose; it is entirely free from any impregnation of acid, such as I have found to exist in other kinds of Gelatine in the London market." The Opaque Gelatine is an article well adapted for hotels, taverns, cabin use and ship stores, and a safe and profitable commodity for exportation.—Emscote Mills, Warwick; and 14, Bucklersbury.

COX'S PATENT SPARKLING GELATINE FOR MAKING JELLIES, BLANCMANGE, &c., stronger than Isinglass, at one-third the price, is particularly economical and convenient for the use of Families, Hotel-keepers, Invalids, and others, and a profitable article for Exportation.—Sold, in packets only, by the principal Druggists, Grocers, and Oilmen in the United Kingdom, at 9d., 1s. 6d., 3s., 5s., and 7s.; each packet bearing the Patentee's signature.—Extract from Dr. Ure's Testimonial:—"London, 9th February, 1844.—I have much pleasure in certifying that the Patent Sparkling Gelatine of Messrs. J. and G. Cox is prepared by an excellent process, which, while it preserves entire all the virtues of this alimentary substance, renders it equally pure and beautiful. Examined by chemical tests, it is found perfectly free from acid, and fully stronger than the best isinglass in the London market, and affords a Jelly (in a few minutes) equal in all respects to, if not richer and more crystalline than, that prepared from calves'-feet."—Agent in London, Mr. HENRY WATSON, No. 11, Old Fish-street, City.—Patent Gelatine Works, Gorgie Mills, Edinburgh.

FALLACY OF THE ORGANIC THEORY OF DOCTORS.—Compare the human body to a tree, with all its roots and branches, and then fancy doctors giving thousands of different drugs, among which are numbered prussic acid, opium, mercury, &c., with a view to eradicate diseases out of different parts of the body. Does it not seem an absurdity? Hygeists, on the contrary, treat the human body as they would a tree going to decay, viz., by draining its roots of stagnant impurities—the sole cause of its body and branches being withered and in a dying state. Let doctors, if they can, prove the fallacy of this analogy; doctors might just as well prescribe different remedies for the different branches of a tree gone to decay as prescribe different remedies for different parts of the body. Are not trees and plants treated as a whole? So should it be with the human body. Issued by MORISON and MOAT, of the British College of Health, New-road, London, for and on behalf of the body of Hygeists, who contend, that since all diseases arise from one cause, namely, an impurity of the blood, they can be cured by the VEGETABLE UNIVERSAL MEDICINE, which, being composed of innocuous ingredients, may be taken by any person without the aid of a doctor.

THE TIME BALL,

ROYAL OBSERVATORY, GREENWICH.

FROM "THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON ALMANACK," FOR 1845, JUST PUBLISHED.

The keeping of true time is important to all persons; but to those engaged in navigating the "trackless seas," it is of such consequence, that the government, since the time of Flamsteed, the first Astronomer Royal, have not hesitated to expend large sums of money for its discovery, preservation, and announcement to the world. The business is now concentrated in the Royal Observatory at Greenwich, where, from the beauty of the instruments, the exactitude of the observations, and the high scientific ability of the officers engaged, the once difficult problem of finding the precise instant when one o'clock touches the world's history, is no longer a matter of doubt or difficulty.

The present establishment at the Observatory, was brought into operation about ten years ago, when the resolution of the Lords of the Admiralty to publish the mean solar time at Greenwich, once in every day of the year, at one o'clock P.M., was first observed, and where the practice, without a single intermission, or the most trifling inaccuracy, has been continued ever since.

The sidereal time is ascertained from regular observations of the transits of certain stars over the meridian, whose places have been carefully determined; and from these, the proper data are obtained for finding the mean solar time

To go into the minutiæ of these operations would be beyond our province; we shall, therefore, confine ourselves, as far as matters of detail are concerned, to a description of the apparatus by which the regular publication of the time is effected.

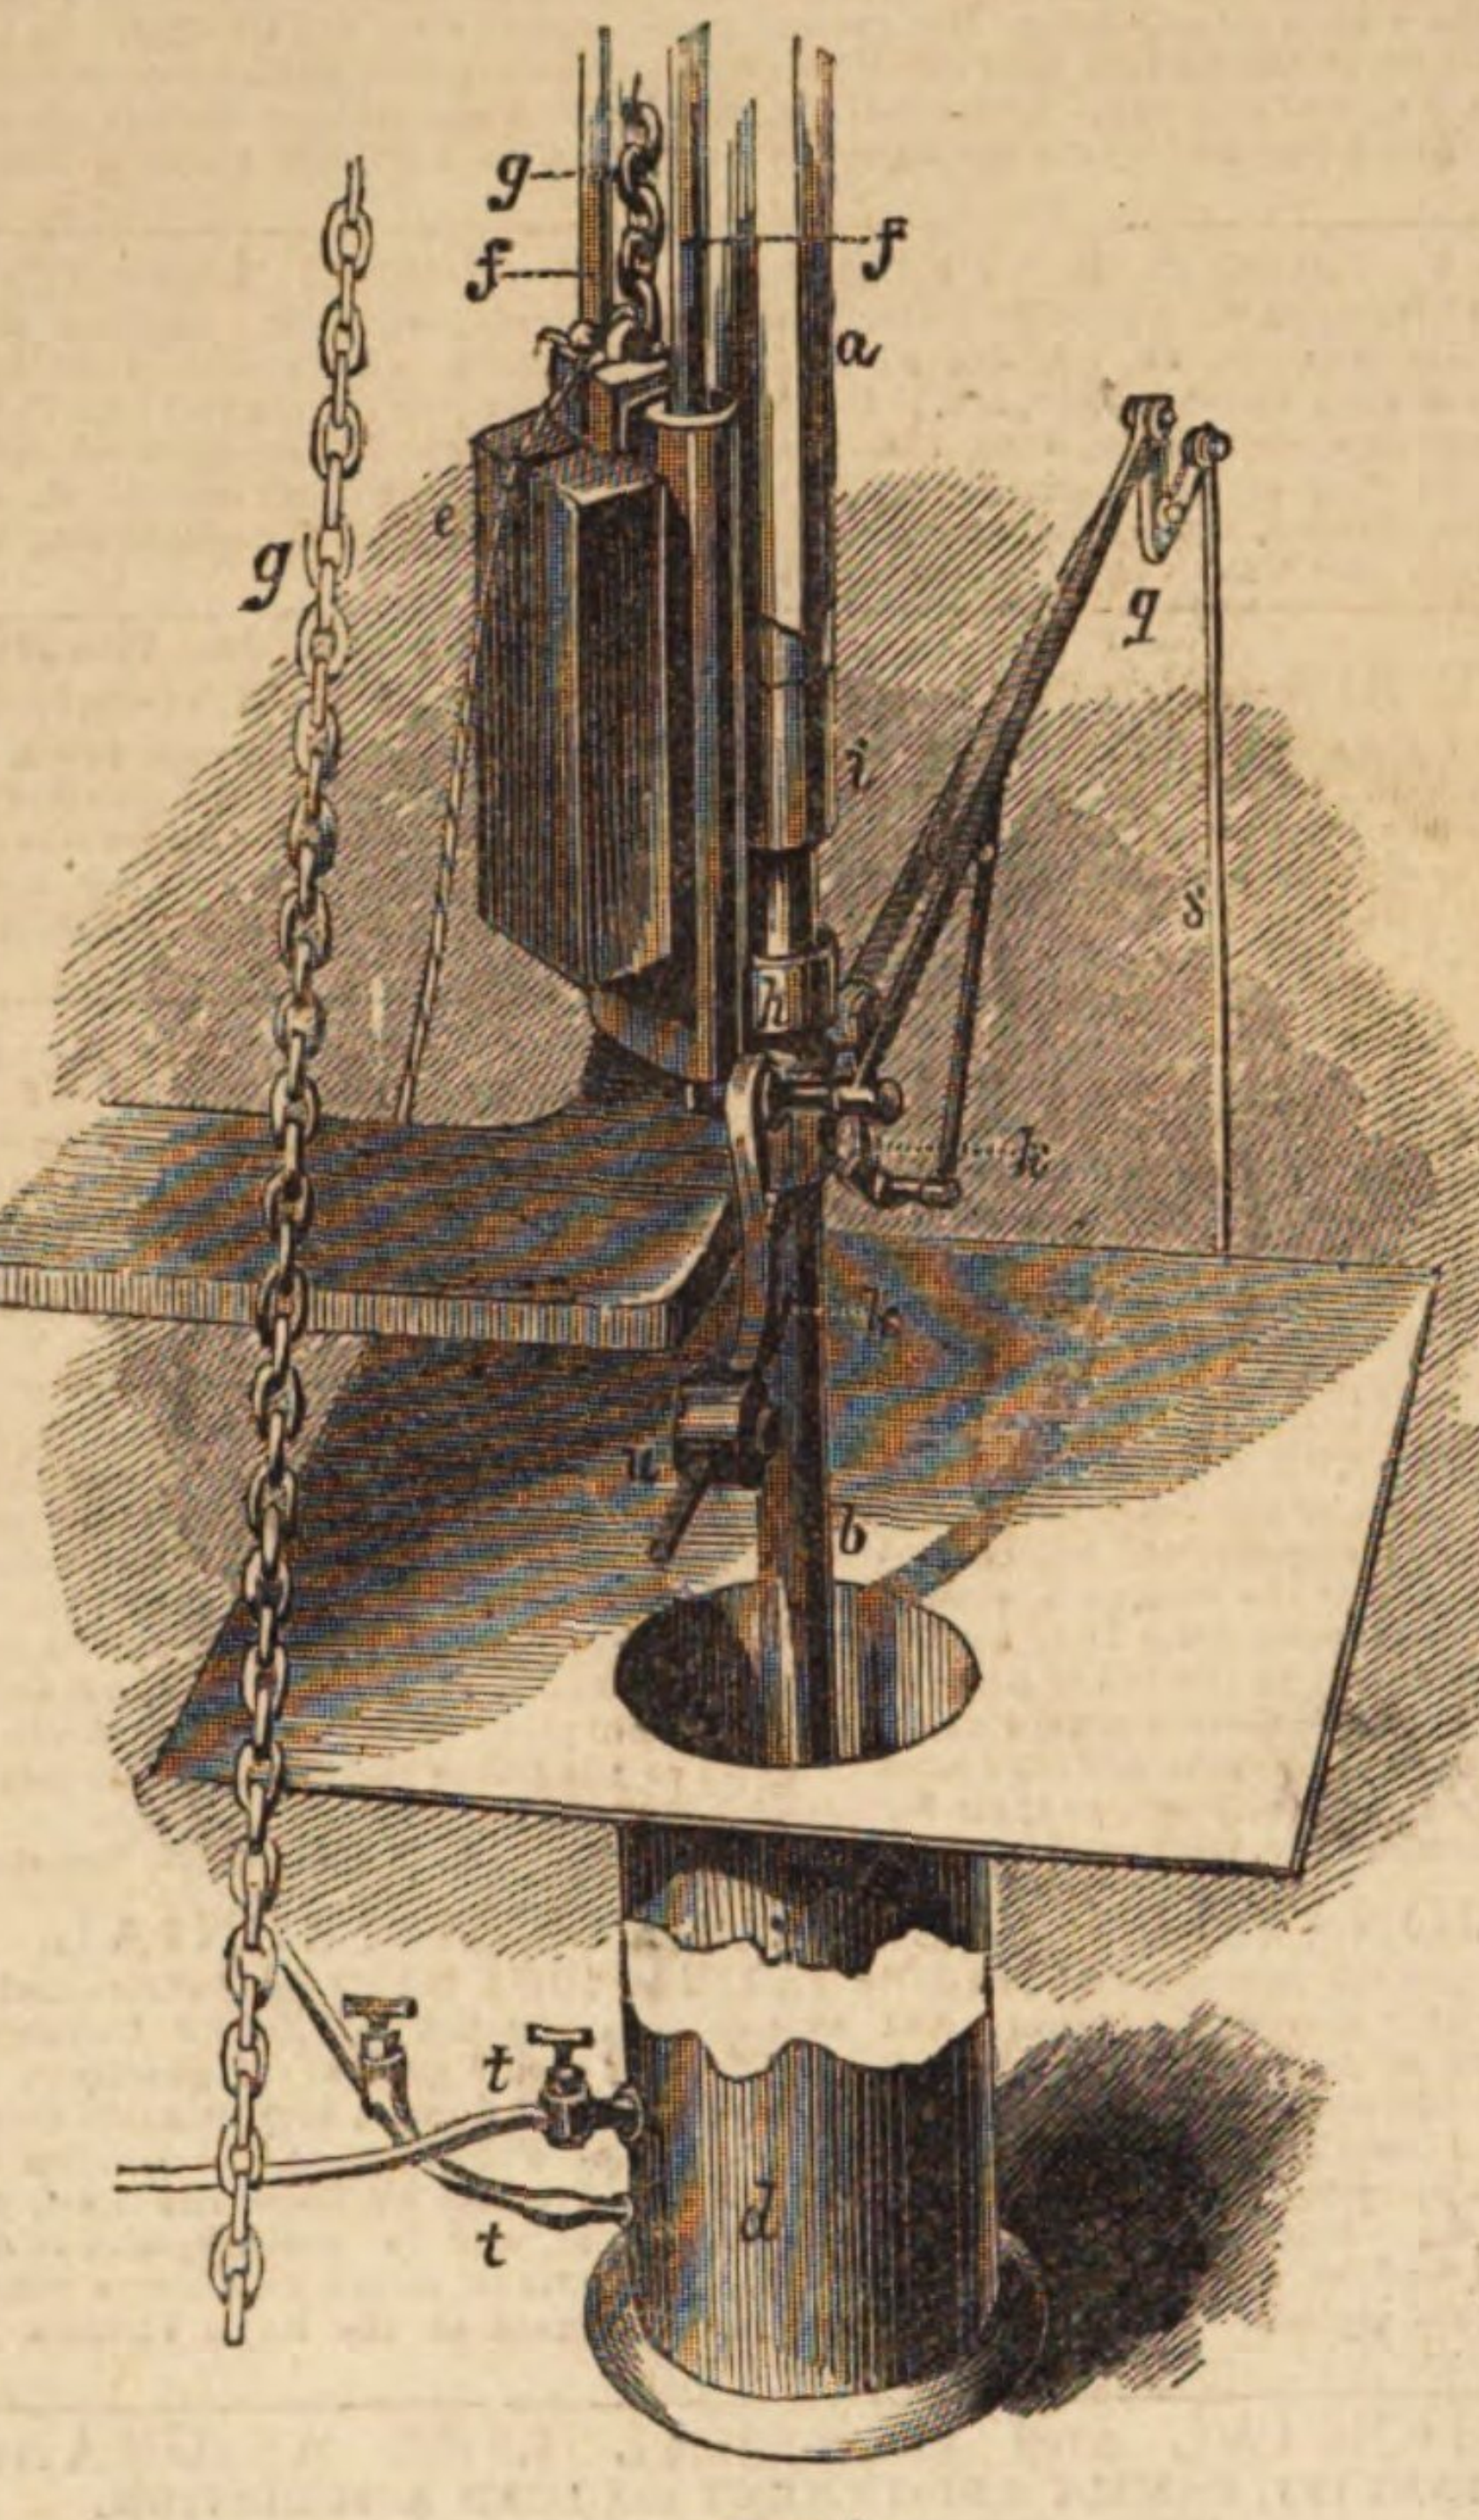

FIG. 4.

The hour of one o'clock is announced by the descent of a large black ball, from the summit of a pole, which surmounts the north-western turret of the Observatory; a position singularly favourable for its exhibition to mariners on their progress down the adjacent river Thames. The apparatus, described in the simplest terms, may be said to consist of a hoist for raising the ball, a trigger and discharging gear for its liberation, and a clock, regulated by observation, for giving the required moment of time. The cuts will make the mechanical arrangements intelligible. Fig. 1, exhibits an upright plan of the first, second, and third floors, on which the apparatus is placed, and a section of the turrets which carries the ball a a, the supporting shaft bearing the ball on its top and terminating below, at b, in a piston, which works in an air cylinder, d, and by which the too sudden descent of the ball is prevented. m, r, s, a combination of rods and levers connected with the discharging trigger.

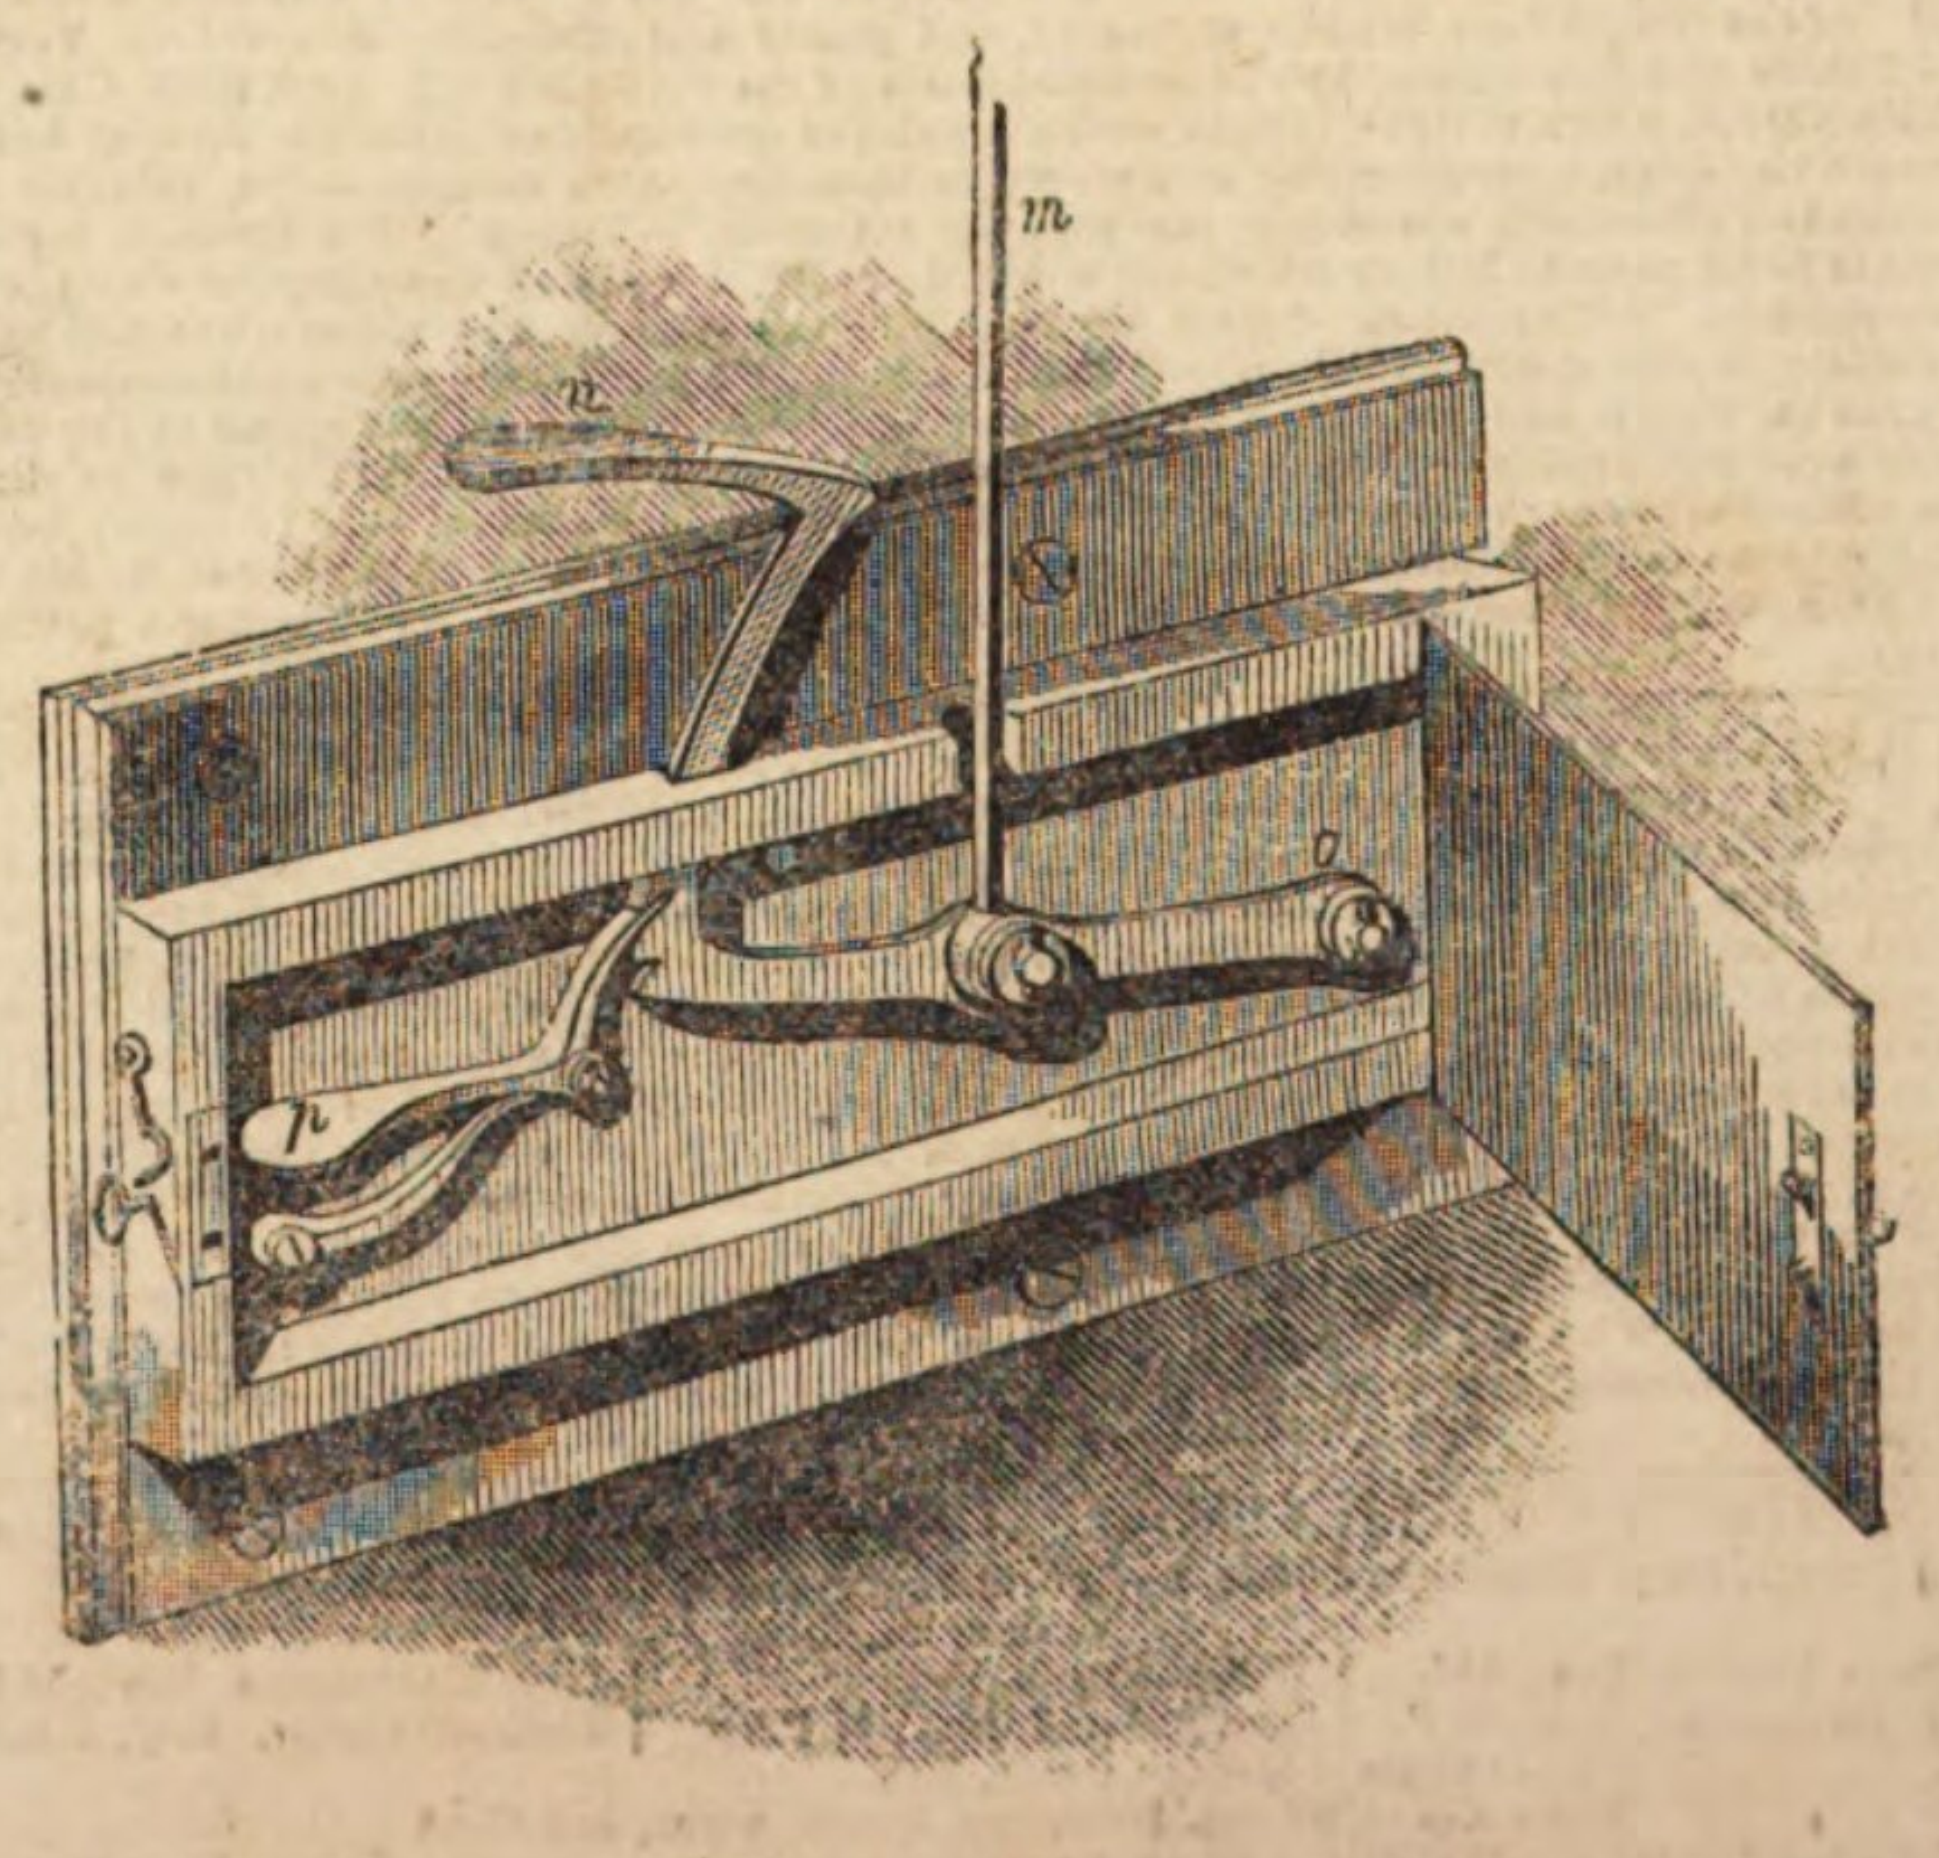

FIG. 5.

Fig. 2. The Ball Turret, viewed from the top of the Observatory, with the ball down.

Fig. 3. Apparatus in the Turret-house. a, the triangular supporting shaft; b, the pulley over which passes the chain for raising the ball.

Fig. 4. Apparatus of the second and third floors. a, triangular supporting shaft; b, piston rod; d, cylinder; e, a weight, having a collar h, which when raised by the chain g, elevates the supporting shaft; f, f, iron guiding rods; k, k, catches for fixing the piston, when the ball has been hoisted to the top of the pole; s, rod, by which the piston is set free from the grasp of the catches; t, t, cocks for regulating the discharge of air in the cylinder.

Fig. 5. The discharging trigger. placed in the first floor of the Time-ball apartments. m, iron discharging rod; n, trigger; o, axis of the trigger; p, spring for holding the trigger till the ball is dropped.

Fig. 6. Windlass placed in the second floor, for "winding up," or raising the ball.

Before elevating the ball at five minutes to one, a signal is made of the intention to do so, by raising it "half-mast high." Observers should then get their chronometers ready, and as the descent of the ball occupies several seconds, they should confine their attention to the moment when the ball leaves the top, as, it is that, only, which indicates the hour.

The uses of this practice are, as we have already hinted, both various and important. We have only to mention, that observations on the drop of the ball, repeated day after day, will give not only the error of clocks, &c., but also their daily rate. Thus, if your clock shows 1h. 3m. 5s. at the dropping of the ball, you will be assured that your clock is in error 3m. 5s., being that amount before Greenwich mean solar time. Again, if at the dropping of the ball your clock shows 56s, 55m. past 12, your clock will be also in error 3m. 5s., but it will be that amount after Greenwich mean solar time.

If on a certain day you have noticed your clock to show 1h. 3m. 5s. at the dropping of the ball, and the day after to show 1h. 3m. 7s., then you will know that your clock has gained 2 seconds in the 24 hours. But, if instead of 1h. 3m. 7s. your clock should show 1h. 3m. 3s., then it will have lost 2 seconds in the 24 hours.

The mean time at Greenwich being known, the mean time at other places may be ascertained, when the longitudes are known. Thus, the longitude of Portsmouth is 4m. 24s. in time, west of Greenwich; consequently, when it is one o'clock at Greenwich, it will then want 4m. 24s. to one at Portsmouth. The longitude of Cambridge is 23½s. east; therefore, at the moment of one o'clock at Greenwich the time at Cambridge will be 1h. 0m. 23½s.

SANATORY STATE OF THE METROPOLIS AND THE PROVINCES.—The quarterl returns obtained from 115 districts, 34 placed under the metropolis, and the remaining 81 comprising, with some agricultural districts, the principal towns and cities of England, the population having been 6,578,912 in 1841, show that the deaths registered in the last quarter, ending the 30th of September, were 38 784 or 141 less than the deaths (38 925) in the June quarter, and 1701 more than (37,083), the average of five previous September quarters. Allowing for the increase of population, the mortality will be found to be about the average of the summer quarter (July, August, and September); that quarter being now the least fatal in the year. The deaths in the metropolis amounted to 11,825, which are 354 more than were registered in the spring quarter, and 694 above the average uncorrected for the increase of population. In the country districts the most remarkable increase of mortality occurred in Cornwall, and the Redruth and Penzance districts. Small-pox has been epidemic in many districts all over the kingdom, and has proved fatal to great numbers, whose vaccination had been neglected.

THE THREE POOR LAWS.

IT REQUIRES but a slight degree of observation to perceive the immense importance acquired by what is known as the "condition of England" question. It was at first forced on the public by the successive years of commercial depression, from the deplorable effects of which we trust we are recovering; but the comparative revival of prosperity has not banished the recollection of what sufferings marked the years of adversity. And, indeed, it would be as difficult to forget, as it is impossible not to see, the many things that remind us, even in our rather improved state, of the immense mass of misery and destitution, the difficulty of providing for which becomes greater in proportion to the necessity of that provision. The difficulty is no new one; it has been the problem of all ages and of all countries; "the poor ye have with ye always"—such is the language of the book whose spirit is the spirit of truth. Those nations have been the happiest to whom the problem has been presented in the simplest form; none has ever been able wholly to escape attempting a solution of it. But on England that necessity seems to have fallen in the present generation, in the direst shapes it could assume. We are called on to provide for a destitution terrible in its degree of suffering, vast in the numbers over which it is spread, and complex in the forms it appears in. Nevertheless, we must not despair; our artificial state of society has imposed fearful obligations upon us, but it has also placed powerful instruments in our hands; destitution is no longer dumb, and distress and oppression find a thousand voices, which by spreading the knowledge of it far and wide, do much towards providing a remedy. We have the habit of co-operation in effort when zeal is once awakened, and we have a vast legal machinery, capable of being better worked, though the misconduct of those who put it in operation, have caused it to be, and not undeservedly, much abused. And, above all, we have wealth beyond most nations, a fact which makes the excessive misery of whole masses of our fellow beings seem a greater anomaly.

The pauperism of England differs from that of Scotland, and the destitution of Ireland differs in many points from both. We have, therefore, three systems of poor relief, which have grown up gradually, and have become national. We have, in fact, three Poor Laws, though their difference might not be easy to trace in the statute-book. What the English Poor Law is we all know; it has been introduced into Ireland, but there it neither is, nor will be, the same as on this side the Channel. And the system pursued in Scotland has but little resemblance to either. How have these differences arisen?

In England it is said the Poor Law is harsh, utilitarian, destructive of private charity. When the endowments of the Church were seized by the State, and ceased to be applied in charity at the very time when the amount of pauperism was altogether outgrowing the possibility of its being relieved from private sources, some provision for the poor became a stern necessity. Then came the Act of Elizabeth, not the first on the subject, but the one that threw our Poor Law into the form it took under what is called the old system. But those who think the legislation of that time, with respect to the poor, was directed either by a tender or merciful spirit, are greatly mistaken. Mendicancy, which was one of the most common forms of destitution, was more severely punished than theft; and any pauper demanding relief twice might be branded with a red-hot iron! The whippings and scourgings were also frequent; so that the reproach so often made to the present system—that it punishes poverty as a crime—is applicable with tenfold force to the laws of Elizabeth and her successors, for a return of whose golden days some philanthropists are sighing. These laws too were made by "our old nobility," whose virtues are so pathetically sung by the poets of the Young England school; for then the hard-hearted manufacturing system had not arisen, and Manchester and Birmingham were not. On the whole, then, we have improved; the defect of the present system is that it is too stiff and uniform, not varied enough to suit different circumstances and different localities, and that it causes much needless hardship by leaving too little to the discretion of those who have a local knowledge of local things. It centres all wisdom and omniscience at Somerset House.

This is an error, but a remediable one; and as we have to deal with an amount of population that the Legislators of the days of Elizabeth could not even dream of, it would be easier to adopt our present system more perfectly to present circumstances, than to go back to the barbarous and inhuman laws of our ancestors—though they contained the germ of that wise and necessary provision that has often saved this country from the most awful convulsions.

In Scotland, the property of the Church was confiscated and destroyed in the same manner as in England. But the country being more thinly peopled, there was less pauperism and less pressure on its resources. The manufacturing system was not developed there till much later, and then not to so great an extent, and something is also due to the frugal, hardy, and independent character of the people. But now the system of poor relief in Scotland is a very imperfect one—too imperfect it is rapidly becoming for the present state of things. In the rural districts of Scotland, the state of the destitute poor is no better than in England; in the great towns we have evidence that it is even worse. The system by which the Heritors and the Kirk Session determine the amount to be gathered, they, themselves, being often directly interested in keeping it as low as possible, cannot continue. The details of misery recently published from Scotland are far worse—considered as proofs of the working of a system—than those furnished by England.

BURGHLEY HOUSE.—NORTH FRONT.—See page 307.

In Ireland, till within these very few years, there was no Poor Law at all. The great mass of poverty and pauperism there is in the Catholic provinces, and the natural generosity of the people, increased by the merit universally attached to the act of alms-giving, gave rise to a system of mutual assistance, which, except in times of actual famine, was sufficient to support life. The poor shared their potatoe with the poorer, and hundreds could give relief in provisions, in this manner, who could not possibly pay a money rate. This is beginning to be discovered now; in several of the Unions the machinery of the law has been brought to a complete stop; the poor-rates, now, like the tithes of old, have to be collected by the aid of the soldiery, and it was considered lately, a rather good day's work when five shillings were gathered in—at an expense of twice as many pounds! There is a great absurdity in thus forcing a law which in some points works badly here, without modification, on a people among whom it is sure to work far worse. The rigid workhouse test is hated in England, but submitted to—there is no other resource. In Ireland it excites horror, and there being the old voluntary system to fall back upon, it is spurned. In England the property that can be rated to the poor is various in kind and immense in amount; in Ireland it is principally the land, and that, in the localities where poverty most abounds is in the hands of landlords, who notoriously squeeze the utmost penny from the tenant, leaving little for the poor-rate-collector; for after the shovel there is nothing for the rake. If no relief is to be given but within the walls of the workhouse, the law will be inoperative; if out-door relief is conceded, and if it is, as it probably will be, given in the shape of provisions, not money—what has been gained? The nation had already adopted a system that had the same effect, and in a more direct manner.

Thus the administration of the fund on which the wholly destitute are dependent in the three parts of the kingdom differs as much as the several countries themselves. Any attempt to force one uniform and similar system on all of them will fail, as it is now failing in Ireland. The centralizing tendencies of our governments may lead them to attempt to do it, and it may be useful to draw attention to the circumstances that will make the attempt a mischievous one. That some system will always be necessary, is a thing to be deplored; but, taking the whole of society together, we need not wish for the feudal times of our ancestors, nor the condition of Russia at the present day, as the price of an exemption from that system. We must not too readily believe all that is said about the superiority of the past. True we have a vast amount of poverty and destitution; but the soil of England supports more than ten times the population that it did in the days of serfdom and vassalage, when Poor Laws were unknown, and yet we are exempt from the famines that used periodically to visit the island in those "good old times." The Russian serf is fed and lodged—for the same reason that a roof and fodder are given to a horse or cow—because he is profitable; but we doubt if even the inmates of a Union-house would buy a security for food and lodging, with the liability, at the caprice of an Emperor, to be sent to be shot in the Caucasus, or to be knouted to death at the will of a drunken Boyard.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

PARISIANA.

(From our own Correspondent.)

PARIS, Wednesday.

Some days back I was, through especial favour, admitted within earshot of an assemblage of our conscript fathers of French literature, "the forty" of the Academie Française. They are, and have been for several years, engaged in the production of a new Dictionary of the French language. They proceed so slowly, that we are afraid for them, that before they have finished with the first letter, another Dr. Johnson will arise, and bring forth a modern dictionary, complete as Minerva issued from the head of Jove, and the doggrel satire will be revived about one Englishman beating forty Frenchmen. They have not got further than the letter C. Why they proceed so slowly may be easily explained by the following instance. On the first night of consultation, when the letter A was brought on the tapis, the former definitives, it was thought, would suffice, but Nodier arose and said, they had not as yet half described the properties of this letter. "A, pronounced in the French way, was the ruling sound of Nature's voice, heard in the murmur of the wind, the rushing of the sea, whispered amidst the silence of the primeval forest; and it was the language of many races of animals—for example, the sheep say A (ah)." But Count Molé, the ex-Minister, here rose, and protested against the latter assertion. "Gentlemen," said he, "in other instances, you may carry your disquisitions up to the seventh heaven, if you please, but I am an owner of sheep, and I maintain that they never say 'Ah'—but 'Bah.'"

Much curiosity is excited in Parisian society by a young pilgrim, a native of that country which is now becoming so interesting to France—Algeria. He is the son of Ben Salem, the chief of the Kabyles the fiercest race of Algeria—who has been lately fighting the French with success in the mountains of Delhi. This boy, only twelve years of age, ran away from his father's camp some time ago, because his father would not allow him to marry, and surrendered himself to Marshal Bugeaud, declaring that the motive which led to this step was a strong inclination for domestic life. Marshal Bugeaud sent him to Paris, assuring him that he would there see numbers of beautiful ladies, from whom to make his choice; but, to the indignation of the young aspirant to matrimony, no sooner was he arrived, than he was placed at the Arab school, from which he was only emancipated about a fortnight ago. At first his anger knew no bounds; but, upon reflection, he resolved to study, and acquire knowledge, in order to fit himself for the duties of conjugal life. It is the most amusing thing imaginable to hear him relate his adventures, which he does with great vivacity and wit. He was taken, in company with his countryman, Omar Roumeli, to the Opera Comique, where the brilliancy and novelty of the spectacle made him actually shout with delight. He is beginning to accustom himself to Parisian habits, but he takes no wine, to the great contempt of his countryman, who is far from being equally scrupulous in his adherence to the Mahommedan precept.

A very odd contretemps that has lately transpired, has caused smiles innumerable amongst the diplomatic celebrities. The day that M. Martinez de la Rosa transmitted the collar of the Golden Fleece to M. Guizot, decorations of the Legion of Honour were given to various Dons of the ancient Iberia. It so happened that de la Rosa wore upon the occasion, the red ribbon of Portugal, and M. Guizot, whose vision is not of the longest, imagined that Spain's late ambassador and present minister, was already in possession of the wished-for distinction; the error was, alas! discovered too late, but the order was ultimately dispatched to Spain. It is said, as a reward to the editor of the Presse journal, who was the first to notice the oblivion of our Minister of Peace, the same distinguished cognizance has since been accorded to the writer in that journal, who was the means of correcting the oversight.

A new militia of the church dominant has been formed, consisting of members of a religious order, whose real mission is the promulgation of peace and good will to man. It is intended to found three monasteries in Algeria, on the site of Mounts Athos, Carmel, and in some other adviseable spot. Their object is agriculture, and the conversion of the children of Mahomet to gospel credence. Each monastery to contain six hundred able-bodied brethren, to work the plough, and wield the sword in the good cause—a sort of agricultural crusade. A vast number of young men of the noblest families are about to enlist in the holy ranks of the cross.

Who that is familiar with French literature has not heard of the celebrated satirist M. Barthelemy, the poetic antagonist of Talleyrand—he who wounds with a trochee and slays with a dactyl? Well, he had retired from the field, but now his quiver is once more filled with shafts of satire on all things and on all matters, which are to be ejected through the columns of the Siècle newspaper. At a recent dinner at Véfour's, surrounded by a choice host of kindred spirits, he read a poem which he has called the "Reveil"—a sort of resuscitation of the old "Nemesis." He has taken his valedictory of his translation of Juvenal, as, with an ultra delicacy, he feared that the blushes raised by the anatomy of the old Roman's questionable subjects would cause his pages to appear too strongly tinted with couleur de rose. With these thoughts he has determined to awaken the long-sleeping "Nemesis." M. Barthelemy is now to add his powerful numbers to the stentorian lungs of the press. No longer centred in himself, his voice will be joined to the typographic chorus, and the rhythmic syllables which formerly met the eyes of the elect of intellect will now reach the gaze of the million readers of France.

The Russians of the present day are free from the intolerance towards their enemies which distinguished the Scythians of old, and amongst them Napoleon is now considered as a demi-god. All works tending to illustrate the history of this remarkable man, are devoured by them with inconceivable eagerness. The appearance of M. Thiers's "Histoire de l'Empire" is, therefore, anxiously looked for by them. Meanwhile, a new History of Napoleon, just appeared, by Polevi, enjoys immense success with the Russian public, and is voted by them as a work remarkable for its truth and impartiality, and is worthy of being translated into all languages. Crowds are flocking to the diorama, to see the new picture of M. Bouton, representing the deluge. This chef d'œuvre represents the town of Henach, seen under three different aspects. At first the louring sky, the increasing gloom, the fearful darkness which overspreads the scene, portend the fearful catastrophe—a sensation of horror comes over one's senses, as the sky, from moment to moment, becomes more red and fiery—the thunder rolling in the distance gradually approaches nearer and nearer,—lurid flashes of lightning succeed each other with increasing frequency: the rushing waters overtop their bounds by degrees, covering the most elevated points. To this fearful spectacle succeeds one of profound calm. The darkness is dissipated—the waters have dispersed—the sky is clear—the rainbow appears—the family of Noah kneeling on the summit of a mountain, are offering up their thanks and praises to the Creator. It is impossible to describe the effect produced by this magnificent composition.

In our letters new visitors are constantly announced. Amongst the northern stars who are coming to shed their brightness on the horizon of fashion here, is the Marchioness of Aylesbury, whose blonde chevelure and elegant four-in-hand expertness, as Racine has it, excites the emulation of all our sportswomen and lionnes.

"A conduire un char dans la carriere,"

You will say mine is a cuckoo note—our lament here is still the same. The amusements of the watering places, and the great hunts which have commenced at the Chateaux, still retain but too many of our fashionables, and the fair emigrants who hasten with such alacrity from the metropolis at the beginning of the month of May, only return slowly, and one by one. Such is the effect of the increasing influence of English fashion here. Meanwhile, we regret to say, that the news from the watering places is woeful; that gambling is going on with increased fury at all the fashionable resorts of this nature; and we hear, that at Homburg the losses of the banque de jeu have amounted to 250,000 florins (£36,000) in a fortnight.

The lamentable example of the rulers of Baden, Nassau, &c., has suggested the seeking of the same source of revenue by the poorer Princes. Homburg is one example. At Koethen, a miserable strip of land, placed at the meeting of boundaries of different principalities, and at the intersection of roads, has been let out at an immense rent for a gambling establishment. Great preparations are being made for winter concerts, balls, and fêtes here. Amongst the most brilliant, will probably be, as usual, those of the family of Mr. Thorn. They have just left their old quarters in the Rue de Varennes, which were let to them by the King's sister, Mdme. Adelaide, and have taken the magnificent hotel de Cossé Brissac. A dispute between the concierge and the inhabitants, in which the august proprietress is said to have taken part with the servant, is alleged as the cause of this change of residence.

The Princes have been giving grandes chasses à courre in the Bois de Compiegne, at which the élite of our young fashionables were assembled; whilst St. Cloud, new rooms of surpassing magnificence being added, passes in review his French Majesty's servants from the different theatres. But they are now on the wing to Naples, accompanied by Fourgons, charged with all the elegant knick-knackeries, perfumes, silks, and tissues, of every kind, the Duke d' Aumale's boundless wealth can evoke from the mysterious penetralia of our choicest artizans. The bride is worthy of the gift. Daughter of the Prince of the House of Naples, most distinguished by the elevation of thought and feeling, although petite in figure, she is a beautiful blonde, with luxuriant flaxen hair, of the most silvery colour imaginable. Her arrival in France will be a signal for festivities, which will begin on her landing at Toulon, and continue in Paris. And of these you shall have ample description in my weekly record,

FRANCE.

The only interesting incident of the week, mentioned in the Paris papers, is the announcement by the Ministry, that on the 9th of December next, 200 of the 300 millions of the loan of 1841 remaining on hand will be offered for competition by the Minister of Finance

The Moniteur gives, in the following terms, the royal ordinance upon the subject:—

"Art 1. Our Minister Secretary of State of the Finance is authorised to sell, with competition and publicity, and on sealed tenders, the amount of rentes Three per Cents. necessary to produce a capital of 200,000,000 francs. Those rentes will bear interest from the 22nd of December, 1844. The sale will be made to the company who shall offer the highest price for it, our Minister of Finance always reserving to himself the faculty of refusing any bidding under the minimum fixed by him.

"Art. 2. Agreeably to the provisions of the second paragraph of the 35th article of the law of June 25th, 1841, the dotation of the sinking fund will be increased from the 1st of January, 1844, by a sum equal to the hundreth part of the nominal capital of the rentes, which are to be negotiated in virtue of the above 1st article."

M. Barbet de Jouy, former tutor of the children of Prince de Polignac, has been appointed Consul of France at the Mauritius

The Presse of Tuesday contains some violent declamation against England and everything English. The main object of the Presse is to impress on the French government the necessity of abandoning an English union for the more rational and beneficial alliances of the Continental powers.

The National states, that the French Government, enlightened by the information received as to the causes which led to the late war with Morocco, are about to appoint a special agent to reside with the Emperor of Morocco, and to remain in constant communication with him.

A letter from Algiers, dated Nov. 6, says:—"Marshal Bugeaud returned here yesterday. The marshal found a great difficulty in quelling the Kabyle insurrection. At his approach they fled to the mountains, and made preparations for a vigorous defence. The marshal, not thinking it advisable to pursue them, ordered a general razzia, and the troops commenced by cutting down the olive trees. This so frightened the Kabyles, that they sent a deputation to the marshal, offering their submission; this, after some preliminary arrangements, was accepted. The marshal, however, places no reliance on the protestations of those savages, and an imposing force is to be sent into the neighbourhood of Dellys. It is reported here that Abd-el-Kader is strongly supported by the Kabyles of Morocco, and that he has succeeded in raising an insurrection against the Emperor. Should the ex-Emir succeed against Abderahman, it is his intention to pay a visit to the east of Algeria. Should this be so, and it is most likely, the submission of the Kabyles is of no great importance. Marshal Bugeaud leaves Algiers on the 15th for Marseilles."

The announcement of the new loan appears to have imparted vigour to the market in Paris.

The Moniteur contains the returns of the operations of the sinking fund during the third quarter of 1844, from which it appears that the amount of Rentes, Three per Cent., redeemed during that period was 253,380f. per annum, and the capital applied thereto 6,881,636f.

SPAIN.

A telegraphic despatch has been received in Paris from Bayonne, announcing that the Spanish Congress definitively voted its address on the 8th instant.

The discussion on the project of reform was to commence on the 9th.

Madrid was perfectly tranquil.

The court-martial for the trial of General Prim had held their first sitting, and after hearing the indictment read, and other preliminary matters, had decided that, on account of the irregularity of the proceedings, and the errors made in the drawing up of the indictment, a fresh examination should take place preparatory to another sitting, for which no day was fixed.

A letter from Valencia states that a riotous assemblage had taken place in that city, but which was put down without much difficulty by the military, who were ordered to the spot. Some arrests were made. A seizure of arms had been made in a house, the owner of which was arrested.

The Barcelona journals mention the execution, on the 4th, of Don Antonio St. Just, the son of the unfortunate General who was murdered some years ago in a riot at Malaga. St. Just had been condemned to death for participation in the Centralist conspiracy last year. He preserved to the last moment an admirable serenity; he made his will, wrote to several of his friends, and received the consolations of religion with edifying piety.

PORTUGAL.

Our Lisbon letters of the 5th instant are barren so far as news is concerned, but they state an important fact, indicative of the power of the Government to follow up the despotic course in which it has embarked. In spite of the strenuous opposition given to it, the Bill of Indemnity for the recent despotic decrees has been passed by the Chamber of Deputies by a majority of 72 against 26. Thus the Ministers are likely to succeed in restoring despotism. At all events, their power is more firmly established than ever.

A convention has been entered into between France and Portugal, for the establishment of a line of steam-packets of the Royal Marine of France, communicating monthly between port St. Nazario (near Nantes), Lisbon, Madeira, Fayal, St. Jago of the Cape de Verdes, Goree, Rio Janeiro, Monte Video, and Buenos Ayres. This convention may probably tend to increase the relations between France and Portugal.

UNITED STATES.

The packet-ship Rochester, has arrived at Liverpool from New York, with papers to the 24th ult. They contain an account of a dreadful hurricane on Lake Erie, attended with fearful loss of human life. The neighbourhood of Buffalo seems to have suffered the most severely. A letter dated Buffalo, Oct. 19, gives the following particulars:—

"After several days of rainy, disagreeable weather, the wind at the north-east, it commenced blowing pretty fresh last night about 11 o'clock. At half-past 12 it suddenly veered round to the south-west, and blew a perfect hurricane, crowding the water of the lake, which had been kept above by the previous wind, almost instantaneously upon the city.

"The flood on the flats is more destructive than any we have ever had, the water having risen in one hour over ten feet, sweeping off houses, barns, storehouses, tanneries, the track of the Utica and Buffalo Railroad for a mile, and drowning men, women, children, horses, cows, oxen, and hogs.

"The loss of human life is already ascertained to exceed 50; and as the gale has not subsided, it is feared there must be a great addition to the list.

"The number of houses blown down and unroofed will exceed 100. A house in Elk-street, which was deserted by the family as the water was heard coming in, was carried up to Seneca-street, and stands there precisely as when it started, not a single article having changed its position."

The Buffalo papers go on to describe a long list of disasters, as also of steamers and a large number of other vessels driven ashore high and dry on the banks of the lake. Hundreds of small craft are enumerated amongst the lost.

There is no political news in these papers. The excitement of the Presidential contest continues.

From Canada it is stated that the elections, as far as they have gone, are in favour of the Government candidates. The commercial intelligence is satisfactory. Most of the state stocks had improved in price.

The Acadia steamer has since arrived with later accounts from New York, but they do not present anything of importance.

The steamer Great Western, which sailed from Liverpool on the 12th ult., arrived at New York on the 26th, making her passage in fourteen days and a half.

The New York Papers have advices from Mexico which allude to an infamous outrage committed in the town of Tobasco on the person of a French subject, and which is likely to create some excitement in France. A French sailor had been arrested by the Alcade of the town, and taken to prison. It is not stated why or for what he was arrested; but when in prison he was asked if he was a Frenchman and answered in the affirmative; he was immediately ordered to receive two hundred lashes, attended by music; after which he was ordered to kiss the drummer's feet, and, on his refusal to do so, he was sentenced to receive 50 lashes more, and other indignities were committed upon his body, too horrible to mention; after which he was released, having become a maniac through his dreadful sufferings. In consequence of this outrage, the French Consul had refused all intercourse with the authorities, and had forwarded despatches to his government, respecting the treatment French citizens are subjected to in that department of Mexico. A French fleet was daily expected to arrive.

CHINA.

The following letter from a correspondent at Hong Kong, dated July 30, contains some information upon the subject of exports, which will, no doubt, be interesting to our commercial readers:—

Having promised in my last a few hints on exports, I now have pleasure in fulfilling that pledge.

Merchants must eagerly inquire what shall I send? Is the market not overdone? I propose to satisfy these demands at present.

Cotton goods, such as white and grey long cloths, are in demand, and pay well: and that is the staple article of our export. Tin, ratans, &c., &c., I believe, also go down; and iron, when it is low in England, may find a market here; but as it rises, the people fall back upon their own supply. I should mention for the information of printers, that the Chinese print on our white long cloths their own patterns very neatly. Broad cloth does not answer. Russia beats us. I have heard that samples of their cloth, with prices, have been submitted to our manufacturers at home, and that they confessed they could not compete. I know not whether the Russia trade enjoys a bounty. The consumption is limited—the poorer classes using cotton; the richer, silks lined with furs, and very magnificent affairs these armless cloaks are.

By the by, however, small quantities of a description suitable to the market may be produced at home, and sent with safety, I think; as if Russia gives a bounty, she will soon tire of that commercial system, as other countries have done.

But vast as the population of cotton manufacture consumers is, and far as we leave their native spinners behind, there is that at work, which must, ere long, limit our exports materially, unless cured.

I refer to the drain on the bullion of China, which was felt even before the late war, and which, without any new and aggravating circumstance, must continue oppressive; trade remaining the same.

Any man of business can at once see the very great danger in which our trade is placed, by simply considering that if that objection of the Emperor to opium, which led to the war, arose, as was shrewdly suspected, from feeling that the sycee was getting scarce, what must now be the state of affairs eight years or so after? each year showing in trade a balance of specie against China, to the amount of £1,500,000, and now a payment of near £5,000,000 in hard cash, to our Government, beside. Indeed, in some quarters, such is the feeling on the subject, that it is said China will not pay the ransom within the given time.

There is one means by which the undoubted intention of Providence, that one country should sustain another, may be fulfilled—our way, by which half the world, just discovered as it were, may not be lost to the other; and, if the spirit of Spain, that at one eagar clutch, without a single benefit to herself, wrung the life, energy, and substance, of centuries out of the new world, do not blight the councils of our nation, it will be adopted—the reduction of the duties on cheap teas.

The power to effect this reduction is yours; common sense is with you, the people are with you, the manufacturer of course, and the intelligent farmer also.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

SUICIDE OF MR. SERGEANT ANDREWS.—Late last week, an account was sent to us to the effect that Mr. Sergeant Andrews had attempted self-destruction, by cutting his throat; but as it was stated that the wound was slight, we were unwilling to give publicity to the rumour, in the hope that the act would not be attended with serious consequences. Unfortunately, however, the learned gentleman expired on Wednesday from the effects of it at his residence at Hampstead-heath. The melancholy depression of spirits, produced by long study in the legal profession, is the only cause assignable for the rash act. The learned gentleman was married, and has left a widow and two young children. The learned Sergeant, who was in his 73rd year, was the senior sergeant at law, and held his appointment by virtue of a patent granted in the reign of George III.

ALARMING ACCIDENT FROM AN EXPLOSIVE SHELL.—On Tuesday a dreadful accident occurred on Wimbledon-common to a man of the name of James Taylor, an old soldier, while assisting Dr. Ryan, of the Royal Polytechnic Institution, in a series of experiments on a new explosive shell, the invention of Mr. Buckingham. Two shells which ought to have exploded having remained for two hours, and it being imagined that the shell could be kept quiescent at the will of the inventor, Taylor took up one for the purpose of washing the earth off its surface. He was in the act of stooping when the shell burst, carrying away both the poor fellow's hands, and wounding him most dreadfully in the legs. A portion of the shell entered the right cheek, carrying away the lower jaw, and then passing out on the side of the neck; yet, strange to say, without injuring the carotid artery. Tourniquets were immediately applied to the arms and legs, and the sufferer was conveyed to St. George's Hospital, where he arrived, as may be expected, in a state of collapse. He rallied, however, in the course of the evening, and Mr. Tatham proceeded to remove the remaining fragments of the horribly fractured jawbone, and afterwards performed amputation on both arms just below the elbow. Notwithstanding these injuries, Taylor is perfectly sensible, and some faint hopes are entertained of his recovery.

INGENIOUS ROBBERY.—A few nights ago a robbery of a most ingenious description was perpetrated on the premises of Messrs. De Lisle and Co., bankers, No. 16, Devonshire-square, Bishopsgate-street, by the man-servant, who immediately absconded. It appears that the firm possess what is called a "well-safe," which is drawn up during the day by means of a chain from a brick vault, and when down is secured at the top by a strong iron lid. Being unable to pick the lock of this lid, the thief proceeded down below, and worked his way through the side of the vault, which was near two feet in thickness, and, coming at the safe, broke open a drawer containing near £800 in gold and small notes. In another part of the safe was £2500 in a box, which, however, he could not come at, and a pair of diamond earrings of immense value. He also broke open several of the desks of the clerks, from which he extracted some £20 more, and, proceeding to the drawing-room above, broke open Mrs. De Lisle's private cash-box, in which was deposited £33. The fellow's name is Charles Smith, and he is about twenty-two years of age; he has been employed by the firm for the last four years. The police are in active pursuit, but as yet have gained no clue. A reward of £100 is offered.

DEATH FROM CHOKING BY A PIECE OF MEAT.—On Tuesday, Mr. Baker held an inquest at the Prince Regent, Mile-end New-town, on the body of Samuel Knox, aged sixty-eight years. Elizabeth Knox, of No. 13, York-street, Mile-end New-town, a daughter of deceased, deposed that on Saturday last he was eating his dinner, which consisted of beef and mutton stew. In the midst of his repast he was suddenly seized with a fit of coughing. Mr. Todd, a neighbouring surgeon, promptly attended. Mr. Todd stated, that he found deceased quite insensible, as if from suffocation. He put his fingers down his throat, but could find nothing. He then passed a candle down his œsophagus without success, but upon a second trial with his fingers he found the top of the trachea open, and upon introducing his fingers he succeeded in drawing out a piece of gristle, about two inches in length, which had lodged in the windpipe. Death almost immediately ensued. It appeared that deceased was in the habit of "bolting" his food instead of properly masticating it. Twice before he had nearly met with a similar death. The jury returned a verdict of "Accidental death by choking with a piece of meat."

FALL OF TWO HOUSES IN THE LONDON-ROAD.—On Wednesday morning about eight o'clock, the inhabitants of the London-road, Southwark, were much alarmed by the falling of two houses, Nos. 32 and 33, on the west side of the street. It was at one time supposed that Mrs. Sears and her infant were buried in the ruins; but fortunately they slept in the attic, and the roof of the house falling outwards saved them, and they were extricated by the police. The houses that have fallen are tenanted by Mrs. Sears and Mrs. Cohen, both dealing in chinaware. The accident occurred by Mr. Sears having undermined his premises, for the purpose of extending them. The foundations were disturbed on Monday for the purpose of erecting a wall at the rear; and the heavy rain that has fallen since has been the principal cause of the falling in of the houses.

CAB ACCIDENT.—On Wednesday a horse which was attached to the cab 1471, whilst proceeding down Fleet-street, suddenly took fright, and proceeded at a railroad pace until he arrived at the avenue leading to St. Bride's Church, when the cab came in violent collision with the lamp-post, and was instantly upset, together with the horse. The cabman was hurled several yards from his seat into the road. The cabman sustained a fracture of the hip joint, and a dislocation of the right shoulder, and was much cut and bruised about the head and face.

TWO KEEPERS SHOT.—An encounter took place last week between a party of watchers and some poachers on the Ravensworth estate, about three miles from Newcastle, in which two of the keepers, named Grandy and Wallace, were dreadfully wounded, and now lie in a precarious state.

NINE LIVES LOST BY THE BURSTING OF A STEAM-PIPE.

On Tuesday afternoon a very distressing and fatal accident, involving the death of nine persons, occurred on board the steam-boat Gipsy Queen, lying at one of the Blackwall buoys off the Brunswick Pier. Seven of the unfortunate sufferers met with instantaneous death; and out of five others more or less injured by the unfortunate occurrence, and who were conveyed to the London Hospital, two have since died.

The vessel (the Gipsy Queen) is a new iron steam-boat, of about 500 tons burden, having two engines of 150 horse power each. The boat is the first built by the firm of Jacob and Joseph Samuda, who, within the last two years, took premises in Bow-creek. The engines, too, with which the Gypsy Queen is fitted are upon a new construction, being what are called "bell-crank" engines. At three o'clock in the afternoon the vessel left the creek for an experimental trip, having on board about 20 persons, including Mr. Jacob Samuda, the principal of the firm. She went down the river to below Woolwich in gallant style. On her return to Blackwall she was moored to one of the buoys, where it was intended she should remain all night. In a short time after the vessel had been made fast, an explosion was heard by persons on the Brunswick Pier to proceed from the direction of the steamer, and almost immediately afterwards cries for boats proceeded from the same quarter. Not a moment was lost in making towards the steamer, when the most heart rending sight presented itself. Five persons were found, apparently in a state of madness, running to and fro the deck, screaming with anguish, while their appearance showed that their lamentations were real. With all speed they were conveyed on shore, and met with every attention that could be afforded, by Captain Routh, managing director of the Blackwall Railway, and assistants. The agonizing cries of these unfortunate persons were said to be dreadful. They begged for cold water to quell the scalding heat they were suffering in their throats, and when the cooling fluid was applied to the mouths of one or two, the skin from their lips peeled off as though under the influence of a searing iron. They were all conveyed, without loss of time, to the London Hospital. The sufferers were in the engine-room, which was so filled with steam, that to get them out was impossible until the scalding vapour had escaped. In order, therefore, to facilitate their extrication, the decks were cut up with pick-axes, adzes, crowbars, and every sort of implement at hand that could be applied to the purpose. By this means the steam got a greater vent, and subsided much sooner than it would otherwise have done. As soon as the engine-room was sufficiently clear, a descent was made, and seven human forms, scalded to death, were there discovered, with features contorted with agony, some bleeding from the nose, ears, and mouth, and their flesh peeling from the bones at the touch. In fact, it may be said the clothing alone kept flesh and bone together. The bodies were taken ashore, and placed in one of the Blackwall Railway warehouses, where six of them were shortly afterwards recognized, and proved to be Mr. Jacob Samuda, the head of the firm; Henry Scobell, engineer; James Sclanders, engineer; Thomas Nugent, engineer; James Newman, fireman; Arthur M'Ghee, fireman; and Samuel Dodd, engineer. The names of those who were taken to the hospital are:—Mr. W. Ryley, foreman to the Messrs. Samuda; James Hill, boiler-maker; Charles Mills and William Donovan, stokers; and a third stoker, whose name could not be ascertained. It is conjectured that the main steam pipe to the engine became affected by a stuffing box in the junction-pipe, the giving way of which let the steam into the engine-room. It is also said that the boilers were made to stand a pressure of 40lb. per inch, and their working power was 25lb. per inch. This latter pressure had not been maintained the whole distance of the trip, but was up to that mark when the vessel arrived at the moorings. As soon as she was made fast, Mr. Lowe, principal engineer to the firm, was about to give instructions for the raking out of the fire, when he was requested by Mr. Jacob Samuda to go on deck to ascertain how she was blowing off. Mr. Lowe accordingly went upon deck, and had not got above ten feet from the engine-room entrance when the explosion took place. The preservation of this gentleman must be considered as almost a miracle—a few seconds later, and he most probably would have shared the fate of his unfortunate companions. Amongst those who are injured, and whose lives are saved, three were dragged on deck from the engine-room on the first alarm, and narrowly escaped with their lives.

INQUEST ON THE BODIES.

The names of the deceased on which the inquest was held on Wednesday, are Jacob Samuda, Henry Scobell, James Sclanders, Thomas Nugent, John Newman, Arthur M'Ghee, and Samuel Dodd.

The inquest was held at one o'clock, at the Queen's Head, Poplar, in the first instance, and afterwards adjourned to the Town hall, before Mr. Baker.

The jury having viewed the bodies,

Joseph Reed, Orchard-place, Blackwall, was sworn. He said he was a pattern maker. He recognised one of the bodies he had just seen as that of Jacob Samuda, engineer; he resided in Somner-street, Southwark, and was about 31 years of age. He also recognised Henry Scobell; he was an engineer, and resided at 14, Hale-street, and was 44 years of age; James Sclanders, 27 years of age, who resided in Poplar, engineer; Thomas Nugent, who resided at 157, Union-street, Southwark; he was 18 years of age, and an engineer; John Newman, who was a fireman, residing in Poplar, and 37 years of age; Arthur M'Ghee, who resided in Burford's-court, Robin Hood-lane, and was a fireman, 35 years of age; and Samuel Dodd, who was an engineer, residing in Orchard-place, Blackwall, and was 27 years of age.

The Coroner then addressed the jury, and said he was quite in their hands as to the description of evidence that should be adduced before them. Mr George Lowe, who was one of the engineers, was the first, but whether it would be expedient to examine him at the outset would be for them to determine.

The jury having said that they wished him to be forthcoming,

He was sworn, and deposed as follows:—Was in the employ of Messrs. Jacob and Joseph Samuda. Mr. Jacob Samuda was at the head of the firm, and is the deceased. Did not know whether the vessel was theirs; they built the boat and put the engines in for a company in Ireland. She was an iron steamboat. Messrs. Samuda were builders of iron steamboats at Bow-creek, Blackwall, as well as engineers. The vessel was called the Gipsy Queen. A ship of her size and dimensions is worth about £15 000, the engines being worth about £8000. There were two engines working together, coupled by two cranks without an intermediate shaft. They are different engines to those in ordinary use, and he believed they were worked under a patent. They are both direct-acting and beam-engines, and combine the two. They are placed fore and aft the ship. The two cylinders in a common beam engine stand athwart the ship: these stand fore and aft. The object of this arrangement, he believed, was to save room. He did not consider it any more dangerous than the common mode of placing them. The beam of a common engine revolves upon its centre; the beam of Messrs. Samuda's engine has its motion at the extreme end, instead of in the middle; the beam is in two parts. That constitutes the main difference.

The Coroner.—Do you think that difference of construction has at all contributed to the accident?

Witness.—No. Till this accident happened he had not the opportunity of seeing that part which had given way. It was kept from his view. He believed that the contract which Messrs. Samuda had was to work up all the old parts of an old steam-engine, which came out of an old vessel; and the steam-pipe which had given way appeared to him to be part of the old pipes; but he did not know whether they were or not. They were condensing engines, and never were worked higher than 10lb. to the square inch all the time they worked yesterday. He was out yesterday with the vessel, and had the management; and the engine gave about 20 to 24 strokes.

By a Juror.—The valve would not rise at 10lb. to the square inch. The power Messrs. Samuda intended to work them at was 40lb. to the square inch. The horse-power of the engines would depend on the pressure the boilers would bear. At the speed she was going yesterday he should suppose the engines were about 200 horse-power.

By a Juror.—The diameter of the cylinders was 45 inches.

The vessel left her moorings at Bow-creek at a little after three o'clock. The engines were tried for the first time on Friday last, whilst the vessel was at her moorings. This was her first trip. He was below, and did not know how far the vessel went, but he went on deck once when they were somewhere below the arsenal at Woolwich. He believed they went below Woolwich and back. They got back at about ten minutes past five o'clock, and the vessel was then moored off the East India Docks to a buoy, opposite the Brunswick pier, Blackwall. He wrought one engine, and Samuel Dodd, the deceased, wrought the other. Mr. Samuda was there giving directions. The steam power was kept up when she was fastened to her moorings. Mr. Samuda told him that would do for the engines. He (the witness) said, "Well, I will draw the fires, and blow the boilers off." That meant blowing all the water out of them. Mr. Samuda said, "No, do not do that; I want to see 25lb. to the inch on the boiler before you touch the boilers."

By a Juror.—The valve was a three-tailed valve. No person could get at the valve, as it was boxed up, except by a lever, which would only open it, and not shut it. The pressure could not go to more than 25lb., the valve being then fixed at that pressure.

Mr. Samuda said, "Fetch me a candle," which he (witness) did, and Mr. Samuda then went to look at the valve. When they looked at the gauge it was 10lb. to the square inch. Mr. Samuda told witness to go upon deck, and observe if the steam was blowing strong off. He (witness) ordered one of the firemen to go, but Mr. Samuda would not allow him; he said, "I have plenty of men, but I cannot depend on anybody but you," so he (witness) went away up the ladder, and had not gone four paces on deck to look at the waste steam-pipe when the explosion took place, by which the deceased lost their lives. They were scalded to death by the steam and water. He escaped.

The Coroner.—I suppose you cannot tell what caused the explosion?

Witness.—No, sir.

The Coroner.—Can you form an opinion?

Witness.—The pipes are joined with spigot and faucet.

The Coroner.—Had Mr. Samuda any power over the weight over the valve?

Witness.—No, sir: he had no power over it, it was fixed in a box. No steam could blow out of the valve till there was a pressure of 26lb. to the square inch on the boiler. It required this before the valve would lift. Very little steam indeed was blowing out when I went on deck; it was just oozing out.

At this stage of the proceedings, Mr. Pym, who introduced himself as treasurer of the Dublin and Kingstown Railway, stated that he happened to be in town on some business, and was known to Messrs. Samuda. The brother of the deceased was too ill to attend the present inquiry, and he (Mr. Pym) was, therefore anxious that the public should be set right with regard to the unfortunate occurrence, and begged leave to put a few questions to the witness.

The Coroner said he was quite at liberty to do so.

Mr. Lowe in reply, stated that neither the plan of the engines, nor the boilers, nor the quality of the materials, had anything to do with the accident, or at all contributed to it; it was occasioned entirely by the mode in which that joint was made. Witness could make a joint sufficiently strong to resist any possible pressure of steam that the boilers would generate by altering the form and materials, and it would be perfectly safe for the future. The boilers, to witness's knowledge, had been proved by water pressure, but he did not know whether they had been tested by steam.

At the conclusion of this witness's examination, the Coroner said it would be desirable that the inquiry should be adjourned, and, as he had received information that the two men, Riley and Donovan, had since died at the London Hospital, he should open the inquest upon them, and in the meantime some further evidence might be obtained, which would throw more light upon the occurrence, and afford more satisfaction to the public, who were deeply interested in inquiries of this nature.

The inquest was then formally adjourned until Saturday (this day).

ADDITIONAL PARTICULARS.

According to the latest report from the hospital, W. Riley, the foreman, and J. Donovan, stoker, were dead; and J. Hill, boiler-maker, was not expected to live. It was stated that C. Mills, stoker, might recover; another stoker had gone home.

The Gipsy Queen is still lying moored to a buoy off Brunswick-pier, Blackwall, and is uninjured. The boilers are uninjured, and the machinery unbroken. The cause of the accident was found to be the giving way of the joints of a large steam-pipe connecting the boilers with the cylinders of the machinery. It appears that the kind of joint used for such a purpose was not a proper joint, calculated to resist the force of steam, though such joints are very commonly used.

One of the joints is called a "flange" joint, the two ends of pipe to be joined being flattened out to a much larger diameter, and the flattened surfaces riveted together. This joint is as strong or stronger than the pipe, but will not yield to any vibration, and is therefore not so well calculated for steam-engines.

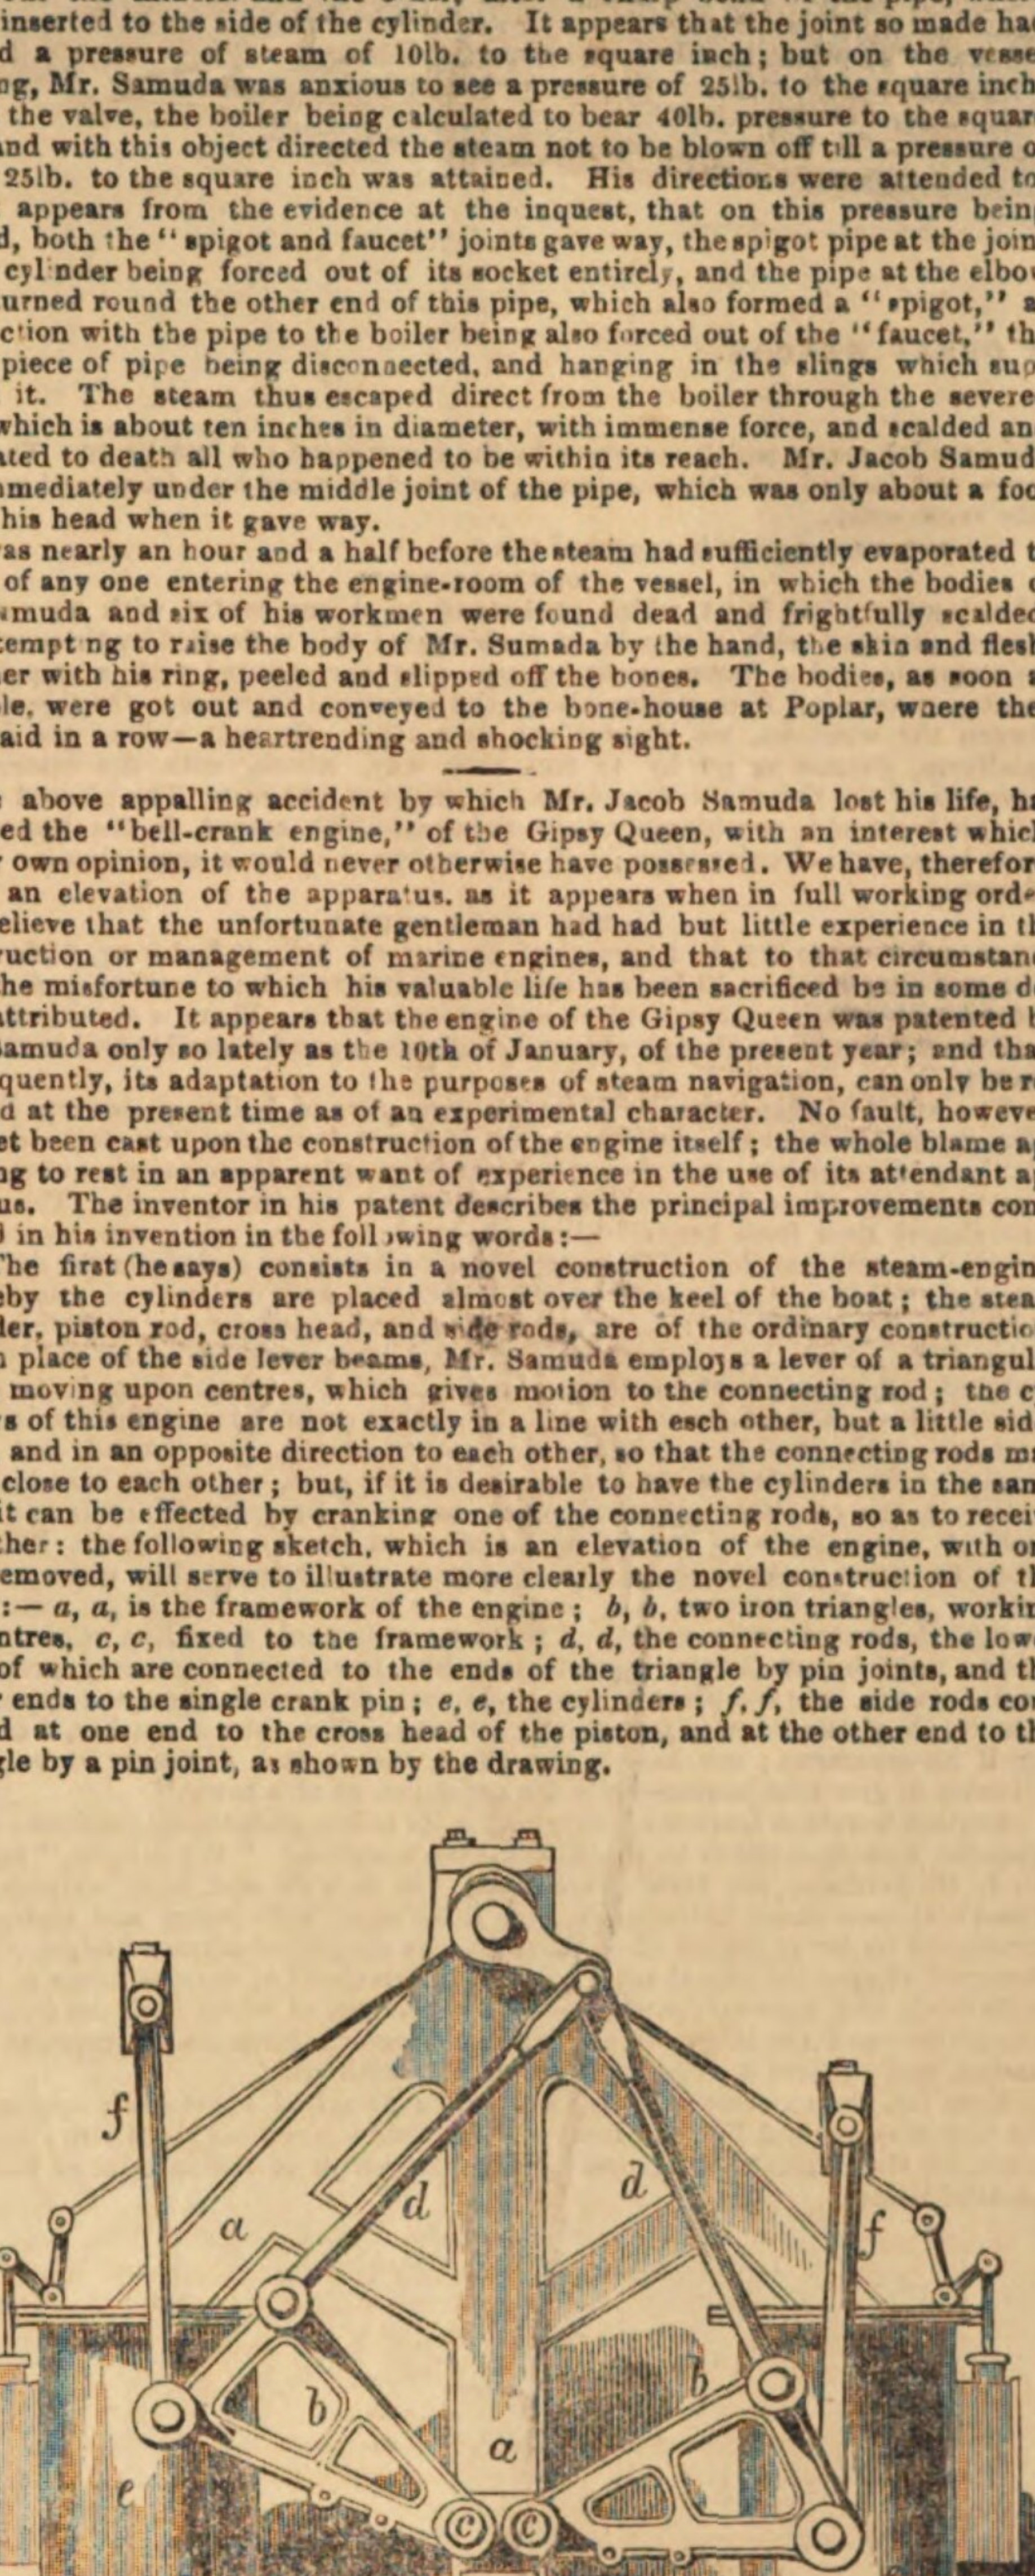
Another joint is called a "stuffing-box," in which one pipe is made to slide into the end of the other, which is made larger to receive it, the edge of the recipient pipe being then riveted to a collar on the inserted pipe. This joint is also quite safe, and yields a little to any vibration of the engine.

The remaining joint, which was the one used to connect the boiler with the machinery of the Gipsy Queen, is called a "spigot and faucet" joint, in which the end of one pipe is simply inserted a few inches into the end of the other, without any fastening whatever beyond a packing of hemp to keep it tight. The pipe connecting the boilers with the machinery was of considerable length, having two of these "spigot and faucet" joints in it, one about the middle, and the other, after a sharp bend of the pipe, where it was inserted to the side of the cylinder. It appears that the joint so made had resisted a pressure of steam of 10lb. to the square inch; but on the vessel stopping, Mr. Samuda was anxious to see a pressure of 25lb. to the square inch, to test the valve, the boiler being calculated to bear 40lb. pressure to the square inch, and with this object directed the steam not to be blown off till a pressure of about 25lb. to the square inch was attained. His directions were attended to, and it appears from the evidence at the inquest, that on this pressure being applied, both the "spigot and faucet" joints gave way, the spigot pipe at the joint at the cylinder being forced out of its socket entirely, and the pipe at the elbow bend turned round the other end of this pipe, which also formed a "spigot," at its junction with the pipe to the boiler being also forced out of the "faucet," the whole piece of pipe being disconnected, and hanging in the slings which supported it. The steam thus escaped direct from the boiler through the severed pipe, which is about ten inches in diameter, with immense force, and scalded and suffocated to death all who happened to be within its reach. Mr. Jacob Samuda was immediately under the middle joint of the pipe, which was only about a foot above his head when it gave way.

It was nearly an hour and a half before the steam had sufficiently evaporated to admit of any one entering the engine-room of the vessel, in which the bodies of Mr. Samuda and six of his workmen were found dead and frightfully scalded. On attempting to raise the body of Mr. Sumada by the hand, the skin and flesh, together with his ring, peeled and slipped off the bones. The bodies, as soon as possible, were got out and conveyed to the bone-house at Poplar, where they were laid in a row—a heartrending and shocking sight.

The above appalling accident by which Mr. Jacob Samuda lost his life, has invested the "bell-crank engine," of the Gipsy Queen, with an interest which, in our own opinion, it would never otherwise have possessed. We have, therefore, given an elevation of the apparatus, as it appears when in full working order. We believe that the unfortunate gentleman had had but little experience in the construction or management of marine engines, and that to that circumstance may the misfortune to which his valuable life has been sacrificed be in some degree attributed. It appears that the engine of the Gipsy Queen was patented by Mr. Samuda only so lately as the 10th of January, of the present year; and that, consequently, its adaptation to the purposes of steam navigation, can only be regarded at the present time as of an experimental character. No fault, however, has yet been cast upon the construction of the engine itself; the whole blame appearing to rest in an apparent want of experience in the use of its attendant apparatus. The inventor in his patent describes the principal improvements comprised in his invention in the following words:—

"The first (he says) consists in a novel construction of the steam-engine, whereby the cylinders are placed almost over the keel of the boat; the steam cylinder, piston rod, cross head, and side rods, are of the ordinary construction, but in place of the side lever beams, Mr. Samuda employs a lever of a triangular form, moving upon centres, which gives motion to the connecting rod; the cylinders of this engine are not exactly in a line with each other, but a little sideways, and in an opposite direction to each other, so that the connecting rods may work close to each other; but, if it is desirable to have the cylinders in the same line, it can be effected by cranking one of the connecting rods, so as to receive the other: the following sketch, which is an elevation of the engine, with one side removed, will serve to illustrate more clearly the novel construction of the same:—a, a, is the framework of the engine; b, b, two iron triangles, working on centres, c, c, fixed to the framework; d, d, the connecting rods, the lower ends of which are connected to the ends of the triangle by pin joints, and the upper ends to the single crank pin; e, e, the cylinders; f, f, the side rods connected at one end to the cross head of the piston, and at the other end to the triangle by a pin joint, as shown by the drawing.



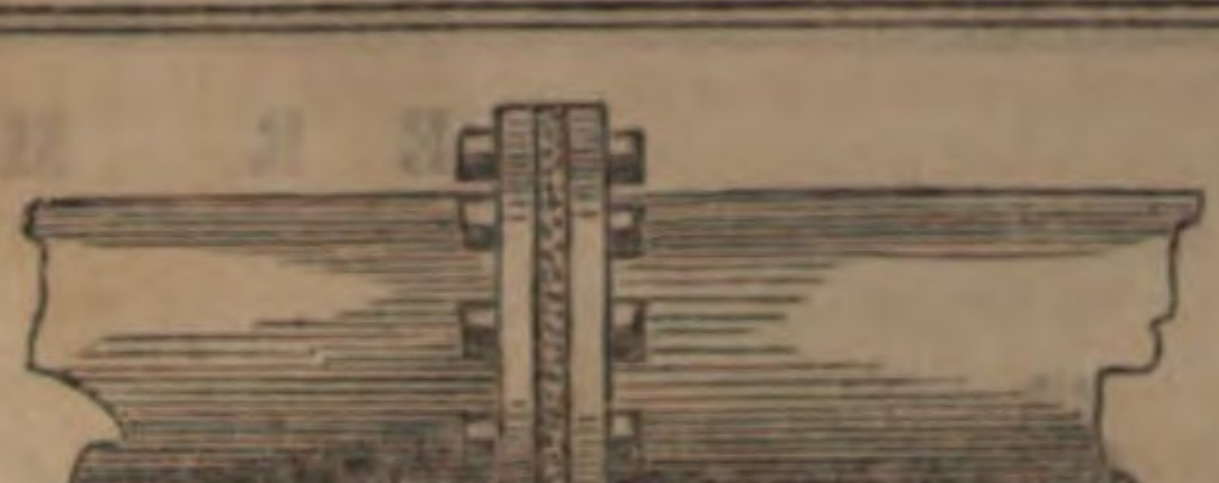
"The second part of these improvements consists in a modification of the above, but in place of one cylinder being employed at each end of the frame, there are two cylinders placed abreast of one another; in this case there are four air pumps employed, which are worked from the cross head, but if preferred one only may be employed, which may be placed in the centre of the frame and worked from the crank shaft; the condensers are underneath the bed plate of the engine. The cylinders in the third part of these improvements are elevated upon brackets cast or otherwise fixed to the framework, so that the pistons descend and are connected to the ends of the triangles by short links; the eccentrics in this case are fixed one on each shaft, and the crank pins are connected by a link, so that the engines, in case of an accident, can be worked independently of each other. The fourth part of these improvements shows the application of the above to vessels moved by submarine propellers. Some idea may be formed of this part by inverting the above sketch. In this case the triangles are placed above the main shaft, which latter passes through the stern of the vessel, and upon it is fixed a drum, having arms of plate iron made in a spiral form, so as to have the effect of forcing a very solid body of water through, the reaction of which has the effect of propelling the vessel. The fifth improvement consists in the arrangement of two vibrating cylinders inclined at an angle of 45 degrees, and an open topped air-pump placed between them, all of which are worked from one crank pin."

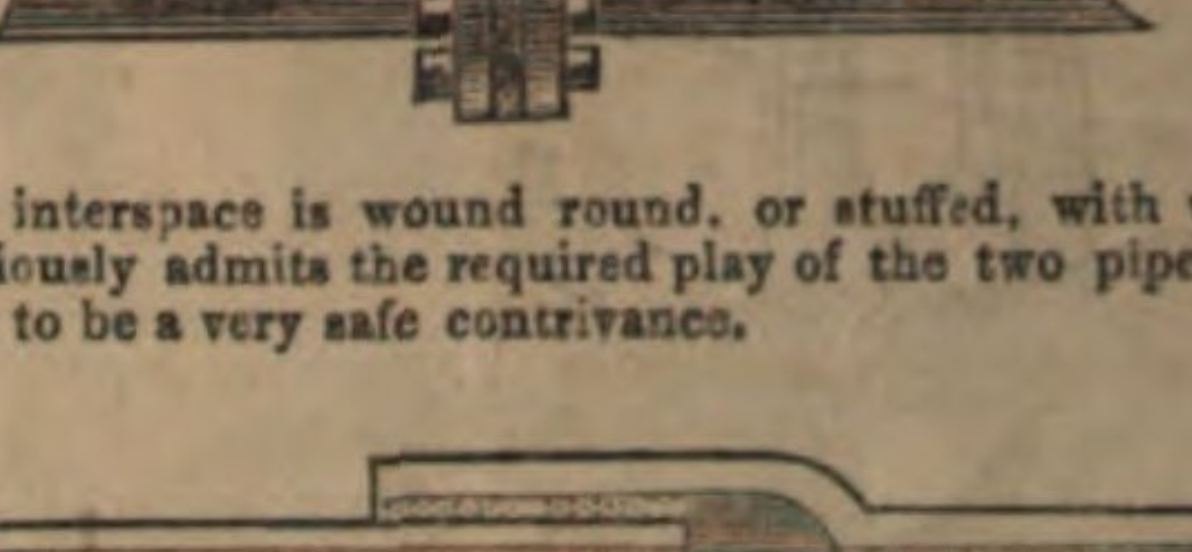
In popular language, these improvements may be summarily stated, as consisting in, first, a greater length of stroke, and consequently of increased power, combined with easy working; and, secondly, in the form of the engine permitting it to be placed wholly below deck, without mid-ship chambers for the rise of the piston.

The immediate cause of the accident, as well as the various parts of the evidence before the jury, in which it is technically described, will be best understood by a consideration of the following figures:—

The first represents a steam pipe with the ordinary flange joint, formed by the shoulders of each end of the pipe being riveted together. This form of joint is considered to be stronger even than the pipe, but as it is necessarily incapable of adapting itself to the expansions of the tube by heat, or the vibrations attendant on the working of a marine engine, it has latterly been held, notwithstanding its strength and safety, to be ineligible for boat machinery.

The second shows the form of joint in more general use; the "stuffing-box joint," as it is professionally named. In this mode of forming a junction between two pipes, the enlarged end of one is made, partially, to receive the end of the other, while the interspace is wound round, or stuffed, with wadding. This arrangement obviously admits the required play of the two pipes, and has been found in practice to be a very safe contrivance.





The third joint is the one which has obtained such a fatal notoriety, bearing the somewhat unintelligible name of the "spigot and faucet joint." The subjoined figures will at once make its construction intelligible. It will be seen, that in this form of joint the interspace is defended by a metallic packing ring, trebly bolted; and a little consideration will show, that should any deficiency occur in the wadding, this ring will have to bear the whole force of the steam, a contingency which seems yet to be provided for.

HER MAJESTY'S VISIT TO BURGHLEY HOUSE.

The precise locality of this fine old manorial domain is upon the northern or Lincolnshire border of the county of Northampton, at about a mile and a half to the south-east of the river Welland, which here forms the boundary between the two counties; and separates the borough of Stamford, in Lincolnshire, from Stamford Baron, in Northampton.

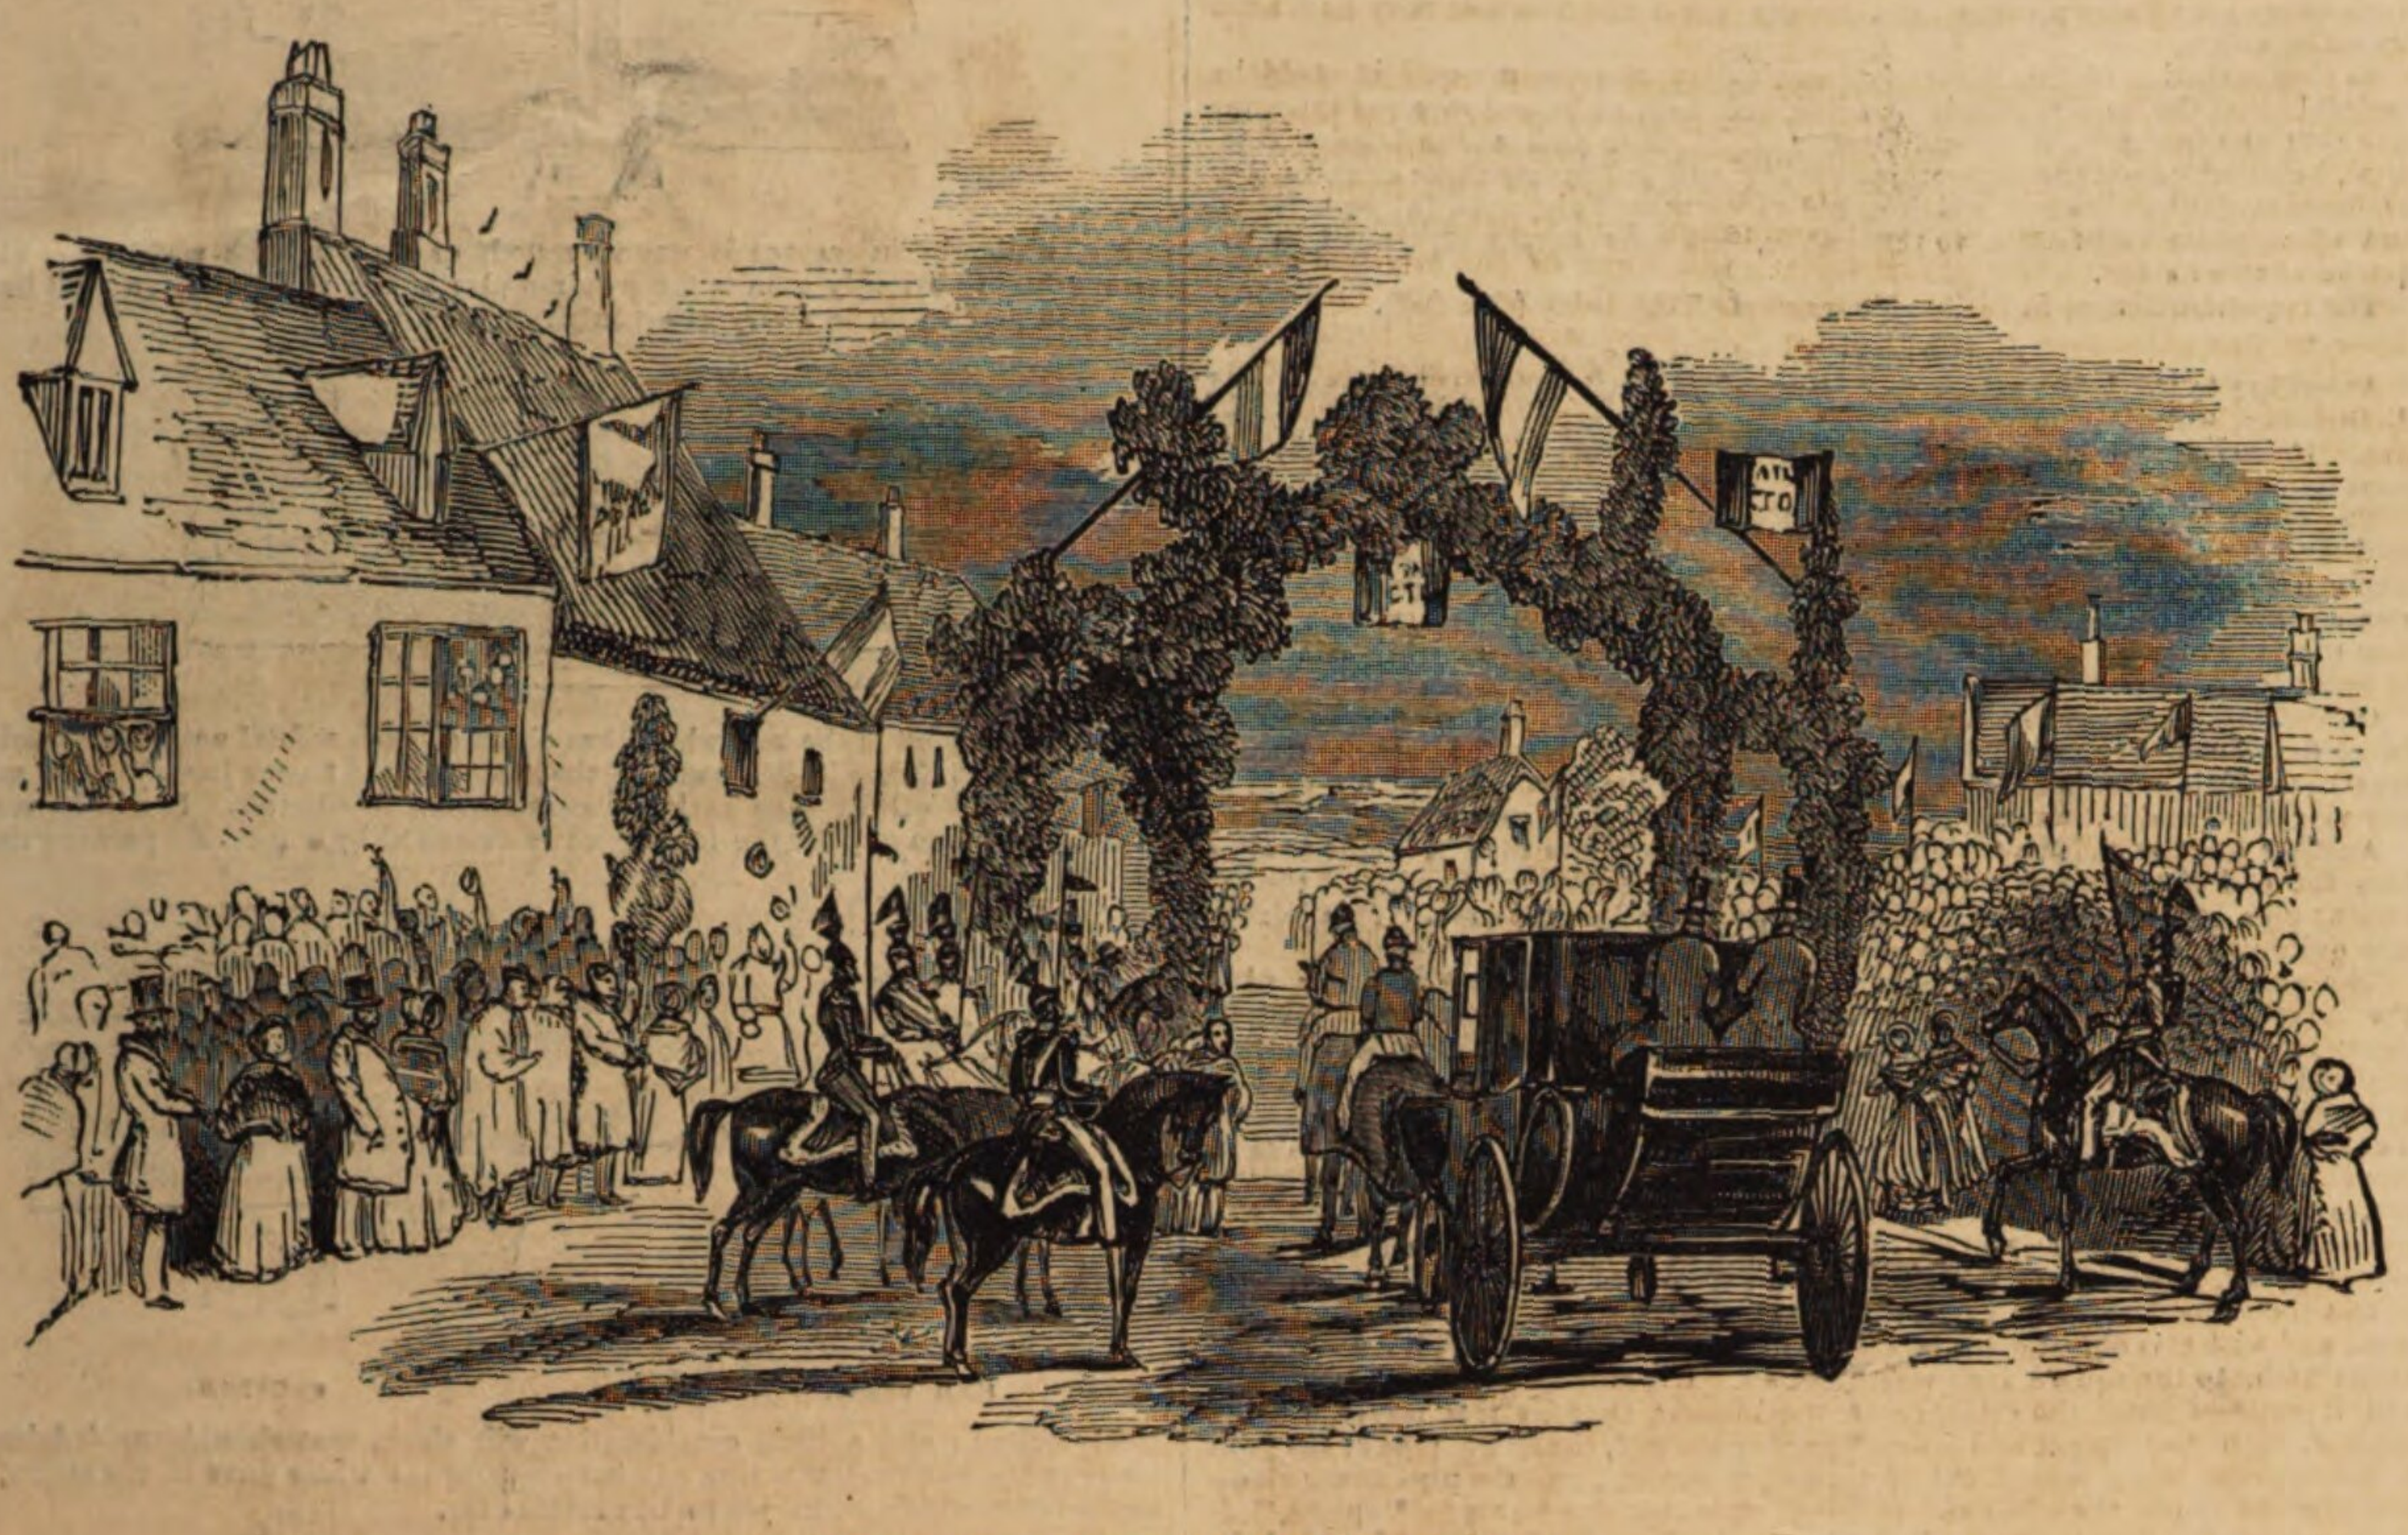
Northamptonshire, at the present day, contains nearly 150 seats, many of them in picturesque parks or grounds, and interesting for their architectural beauty, and historical associations. Indeed, the county has been, for centuries, celebrated as the abode of illustrious personages; and, during the reign of Elizabeth, there lived in the shire the Lord High Treasurer and Prime Minister; the Lord Chancellor; the Chancellor of the Exchequer; and the Speaker of the House of Commons.

The most important "proper house and home" in the country, either as regards extent or architectural character, is Burghley House, either built, or greatly improved, by the Lord High Treasurer Burghley. There has been some controversy as to the propriety of the name Burghley, or Burleigh; but, as a proof of the perfect coincidence and synonym of the title, it need only be mentioned, that in the arched roof under the passage to the court are escocheons of the family arms, in one of which is carved the inscription, "W. DOM. DE. BVRGHLEY. 1577." The author of a description of the manor, published in 1797, says that, "from ancient times to the present, both antiquaries and historians have written it 'Burleigh,' affixing to different orthography exactly the same sound." He goes on to say:—"It was sometimes written 'Burwell,' and sometimes 'Burley,' the manner in which the late Earl of Winchilsea spelt the name of his contiguous seat on the hill. To put it, however, entirely out of dispute, the Earls of Exeter commanded its true spelling to be carved in the arched ceiling at the western entrance, in the year 1577; and carved it was accordingly, in relievo, "Burghley," and not "Burleigh." This manor had been, after being held by a variety of persons, at length sold to Richard Cecil, the father of the great and first Lord Burghley. But, it must always be remembered, that the title was derived from the manor, and not the name of the manor from the title. It appears, however, from another statement, that the manor came into Richard Cecil's possession through his wife, Jane Heckington; and the Lord Treasurer writes himself in 1585, "My house of Burghley is of my mother's inheritance, who liveth, and is the owner thereof, and I but a farmer." A vulgar error was prevalent at one time that the manor-house was built at the expense of Queen Elizabeth. On the death of the Lord Treasurer in 1598, the manor devolved upon his eldest son, Thomas, the second Lord Burghley, who in consideration of his great merits and eminent services was made a Knight of the Garter by Elizabeth, and elevated two steps in the peerage by James I. with the title of Earl of Exeter. James I. on his journey from Scotland in April, 1603, to ascend the throne of England, came to Burghley on the 23d of that month, and passed Easter Tunday there. The youngest son of the Treasurer, the celebrated Minister, Sir Robert Cecil, was created Earl of Salisbury by James the same day that his elder brother was made Earl of Exeter; but he being created in the morning, and so before Lord Exeter, the descendants of the younger branch of the family had right of precedence over the elder. The first Earl of Exeter (Thomas Cecil) died in 1621.

The entrance to this noble domain is situated at the southern extremity of St. Martin, Stamford, of which street it forms a chief ornament. This entrance was built by Mr. Legg, of Stamford, under the superintendence of Henry, the tenth Earl of Exeter, in 1801, at an expense of about £5000. It consists of two stone octagonal turrets, each containing three stories of apartments, and crowned with cupolas; these turrets are connected by three arched gateways, between which is solid masonry, faced with three-quarter Doric columns, and niches, and surmounted by a frieze, cornice, and other embellishments. Upon the parapet, above the centre arch, are eight pyramidal ornaments, flanking the arms of the Cecil family. Above the two side arches are balustrading and two small arches, each of which is crowned with a pinnacle similar to those already mentioned, and encloses a carving of the family crest.

The park extends about two miles from north to south, and from half a mile to a mile and a quarter from east to west. The grounds were much improved by Brown, who transformed the several fields surrounding the house into the present spacious lawns and shrubberies. About a mile from the Lodges, is a lake three-quarters of a mile in length, across which is a stone bridge, of three arches, with palisades supporting four lions couchant, also by Brown. Next is the Dairy-house, and the Gamekeeper's Lodge—the latter a cottage in the old English style. This end of the park is somewhat unpicturesque, and presents but few features of that rich and beautiful scenery which is to be met with elsewhere, particularly near the Lake. As you approach the mansion, the trim beauties of lawns and fairy groves prepare you for the storehouse of art which they environ. Romantic grottoes and mossy cells, composed of Nature's rudest materials, appear on every side; and Fancy has almost exhausted herself in forming to these retreats Gothic doors of wild-grown limbs, and paving them with the small leg-bones of sheep.

HER MAJESTY'S VISIT TO BURGHLEY.



TRIUMPHAL ARCH AT GREAT WELDON.

A boat-house, and a Gothic temple of great beauty, may be enumerated among the other embellishments; and in a recess surrounded by evergreens, stands an elegant monument to Hannah Sophia Chambers, Countess of Exeter, bearing an inscription tributary to her excellence.

On this side of the house, at the distance of a few yards, is a large oval basin, 140 feet in circumference, for gold and silver fish. Adjoining other outbuildings leading from the east wing of the house, are the stables, composing three sides of a square of about 2500 yards, with indented parapets, pointed gateways, &c.

The first appearance of the mansion is extremely imposing: on approaching it from Stamford, after winding through the noble park, the stately pile suddenly opens upon the visitor from the north-west; where its singular chimneys, the variety of its turrets, towers, and cupolas, and the steeple of the chapel rising in the centre, give it the appearance more of a small city than a single building.

Before we describe the mansion itself, we must glance at the means by which the manor came to the Cecil family.

According to Walpole, John Thorpe, the palace-building architect of Elizabeth's reign, gave the designs for Burghley, and superintended the greater part of its erection. Cecil, however, appears to have taken upon himself to procure some of the materials, in which he was assisted by Sir Thomas Gresham, who procured them from Flanders, whence also he obtained the materials for his "Royal Exchange." Thus, in Gresham's Domestic Correspondence, in the State Paper Office, we find a memorandum of articles for the building of Burghley, as follows:—"Antwerp, Oct. 22, 1559: xvi little pillars of marbill for a gallery .... xvi li.—ix harthes for chimneys, at 24*s.* 4*d.* .... x*l.* x*s.* (?)—vi chaires of velvet, at iii li. the peece," &c. &c. Still, Cecil only erected a portion of the mansion; and, did not the several dates upon the building prove this, Cecil's inadequate income would warrant this conclusion. It is well known that Queen Elizabeth did not overpay her servants, and Cecil declared of himself, that, during twenty-six years of Elizabeth's reign, he had not "been beneficed" so much as he had during four years under King Edward. Again, Cecil, shortly after his promotion to the peerage, writes to a friend: "Your's, not changed in friendship though in name; and yet that not unknown to you, when you were with me nere Stamford. W. Burghley. My stile is Lord of Burghley, if you meane to know it for your wrytyng, and if you list to wryte truly: the poorest lord in England!"

Although Thorpe may have designed Burghley, there is evidence that Henryke, the architect of the Royal Exchange, procured some of the materials, more especially the "pavying stones" for one of the halls, and "a patron how they should be layd." Then we find Gresham recommending Henricke to Cecil, as "reasonable;" and, in January, 1563, Clough (Gresham's agent at Antwerp) was corresponding with Cecil respecting the fashion of his gallery and pillars for Burghley. Mr. Burgon, in his "Life and Times of Sir Thomas Gresham," states the property to have been carried into the family of Sir William Cecil by his mother, and to have been even regarded as the family seat, though Cecil made Theobalds his usual country residence, in consequence of its greater proximity to the metropolis. "He demolished the old house at Burghley, and on its site raised the magnificent pile to which his elder son, Thomas, succeeded, and which is at present inhabited by his lineal descendant, the Marquis of Exeter." In Mr. Drakard's copious "Guide," we find it stated that "the east and north ends (the part looking down upon Stamford), and the kitchen, are considered to be parts of the original structure. Admitting this account to be correct, the old building, upon which the present house was founded, must have been very inconsiderable, not only from the appearance of the existing mansion, but from the several dates observable on different parts of it."

Burghley is, altogether, a magnificent exemplar of the architecture of the reigns of Elizabeth and James I.; but many of its details are in objectionable taste, and overloaded with ornament. It is built of freestone, in the form of a beautiful parallelogram, which measures by the inner court 110 feet by 70. The chimneys are formed of Doric columns, connected at top by a frieze and cornice of the same order.

Upon our front page is engraved the showing the north front, which consists of an oblong centre, with an octagonal turret, crowned with a cupola, at each angle: this is flanked by three stories of apartments, and a tower nearly square, also surmounted with a cupola; the centre containing four stories above the principal entrance. On this side, between the windows, we observe the date 1587. On each side of the door is a platform, extending 90 by 18 feet each way, which, with the intermediate breadth of the threshold, completes a frontage of 200 feet. The pierced parapet of this front adds considerably to its richness. The ascent to the house is by nine large semi circular steps; and the entrance is by a semi-circular headed doorway.

THE INNER COURT,

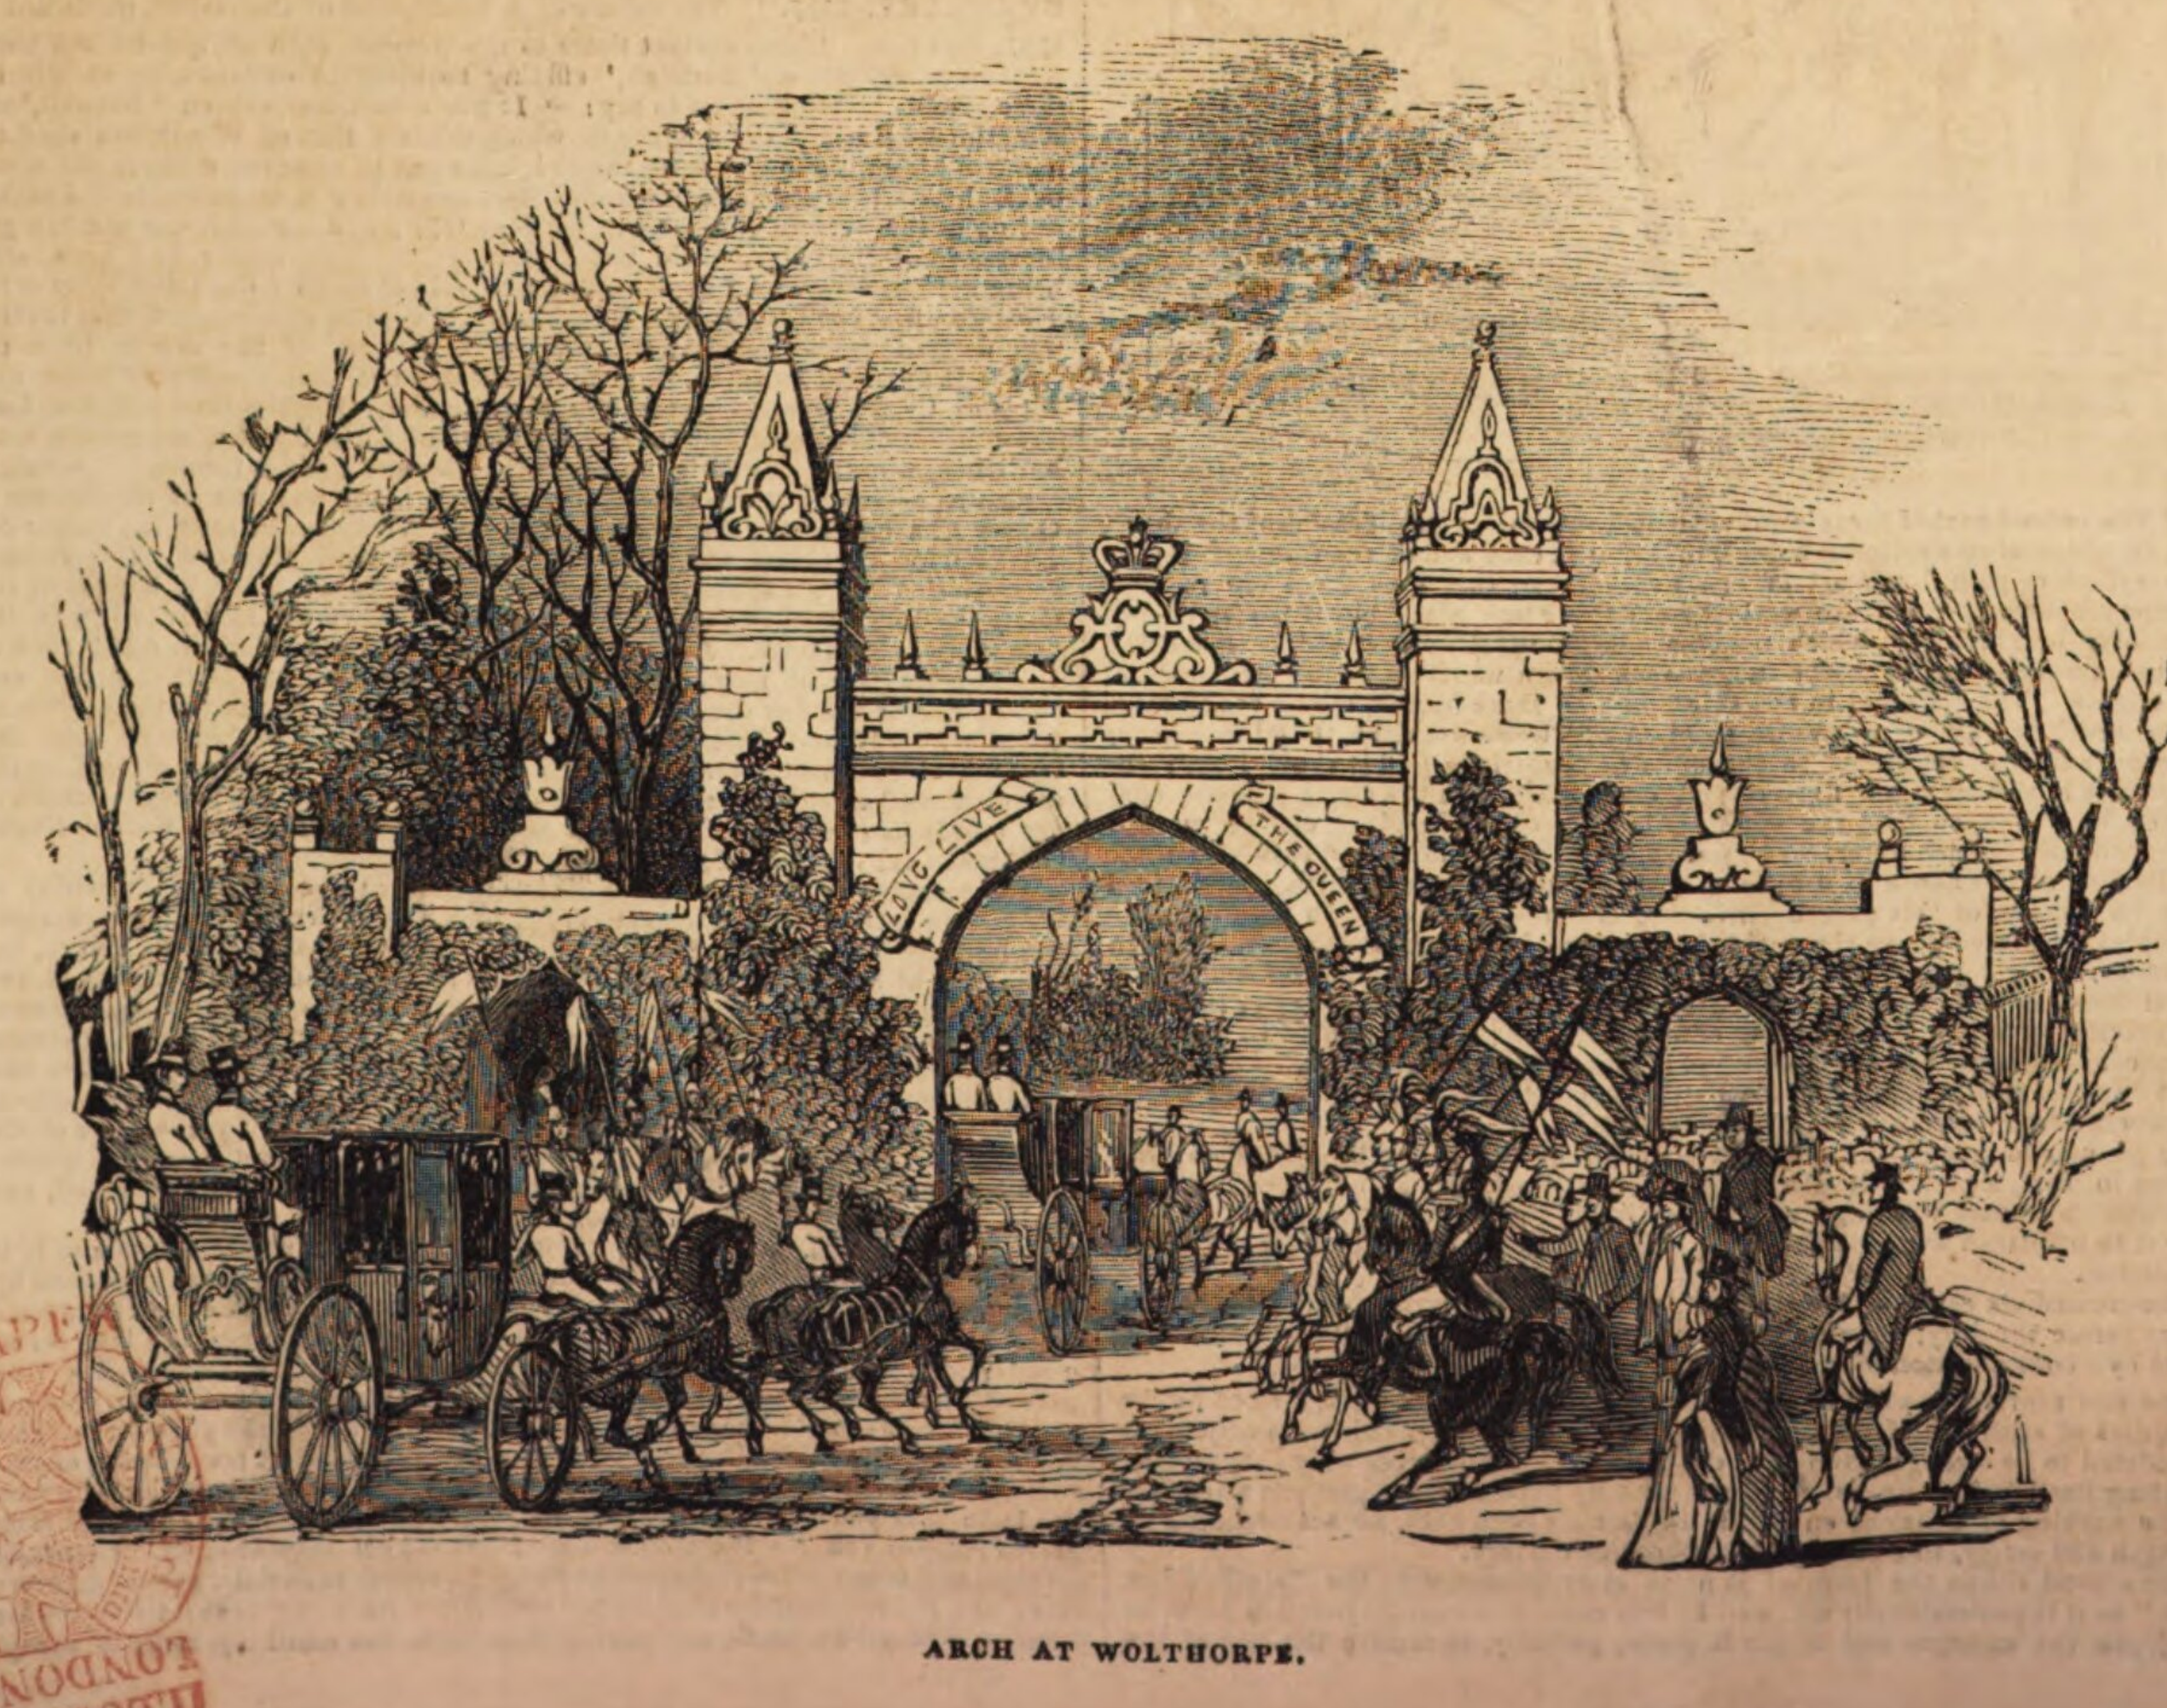
engraved at page 317, is approached by a grand hall, 48 feet long, 24 feet wide, the roof supported by 12 Ionic columns of imitative Sienna marble, and the floor paved with small squares of black and white marble. There is another entrance hall on the west side, though of small dimensions; and a similar hall in the south front.

The effect of this court, with its massive piles of building, is very striking. The three stories on the east side consist of Doric, Ionic, and Corinthian columns, flanking large niches; and above the Corinthian order, the uppermost of the three, are two large stone lions, rampant, supporting the family arms. The spire of the chapel rises from hence, which, although far from being ornamental, is of admirable workmanship. This part of the building appears, from the date above the dial, to have been finished in 1585. Over an arch, in front of the chapel, is a bust of King William III. The columns in the opposite, or western-side, are plain Doric; and the windows in the north and south sides of the Court are pointed. Four capacious gateways, with parallel corresponding folding doors behind them on the four sides, face each other; each extending in an elliptical arch, about nine feet in width, and the same in height. On the rail, and at the angles of the balustrades are several small stone urns, and water vessels.

Gilpin, the excellent artistical critic, says: "Burghley House is one of the noblest monuments of British architecture in the times of Queen Elizabeth, when the great outlines of magnificence were rudely drawn, but unimproved by taste. It is an immense pile, forming the four sides of a large court; and though decorated with a variety of fantastic ornaments according to the fashion of the time, before Grecian architecture had introduced symmetry, proportion, and elegance, into the plans of private houses, it has still an august appearance. The inside of the Court is particularly striking. The spire is neither, I think, in itself an ornament; nor has it any effect, except at a distance, where it contributes to give this immense pile the consequence of a town."

Another beautiful feature of Burghley is its fine architectural gardens—the invariable accompaniment to the Elizabethan mansion. "We delight," says Mr. C. J. Richardson, the tasteful architect, "in its wide and level terraces, decorated with rich stone balustrades, and these again with vases and statues, and connected by broad flights of stone steps—its clipped evergreen hedges—its embowered alleys—its formal yet intricate parterres, full of curious knots of flowers—its lively and musical fountains—its steep slopes of velvet turf—its trim bowling-green—and the labyrinth and wilderness which form its appropriate termination, and connect it with the ruder scenery without."

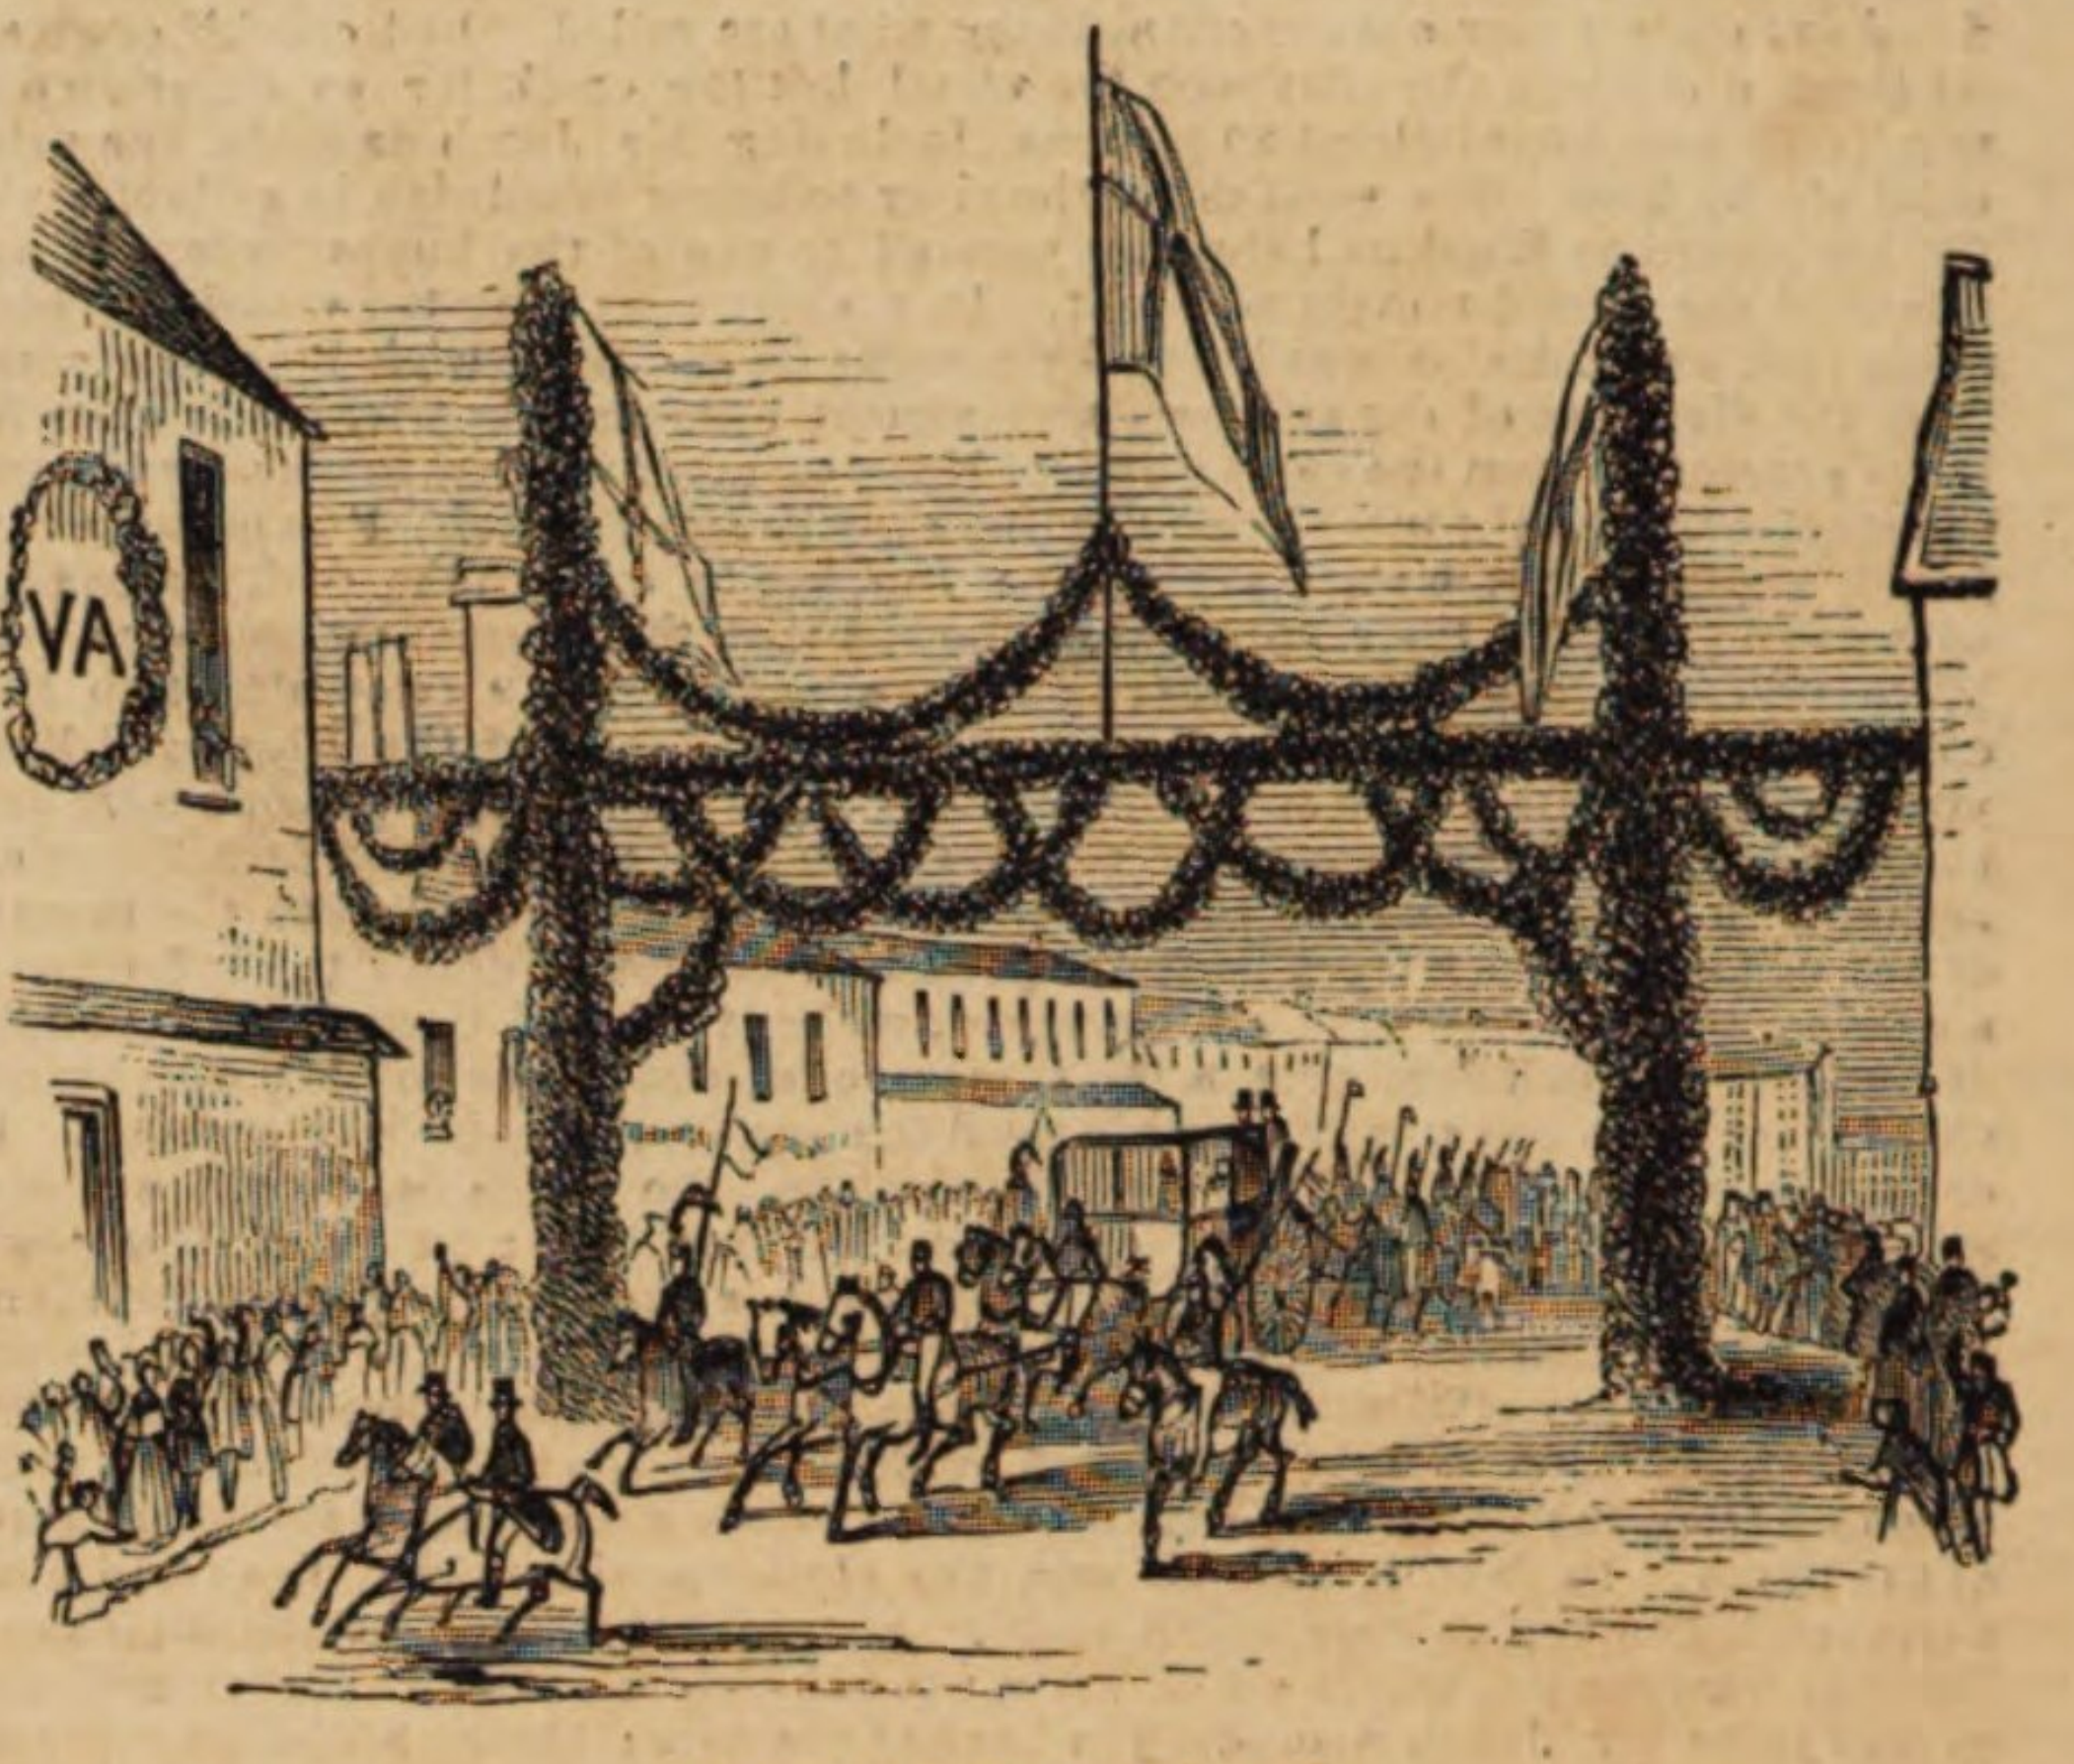
Thus far, the exterior of Burghley. The principal apartments appropriated for Her Majesty and Prince Albert will be found described elsewhere; and next week, we shall illustrate several of the curiosities of the interior of this truly palatial home.



ARCH AT WOLTHORPE.

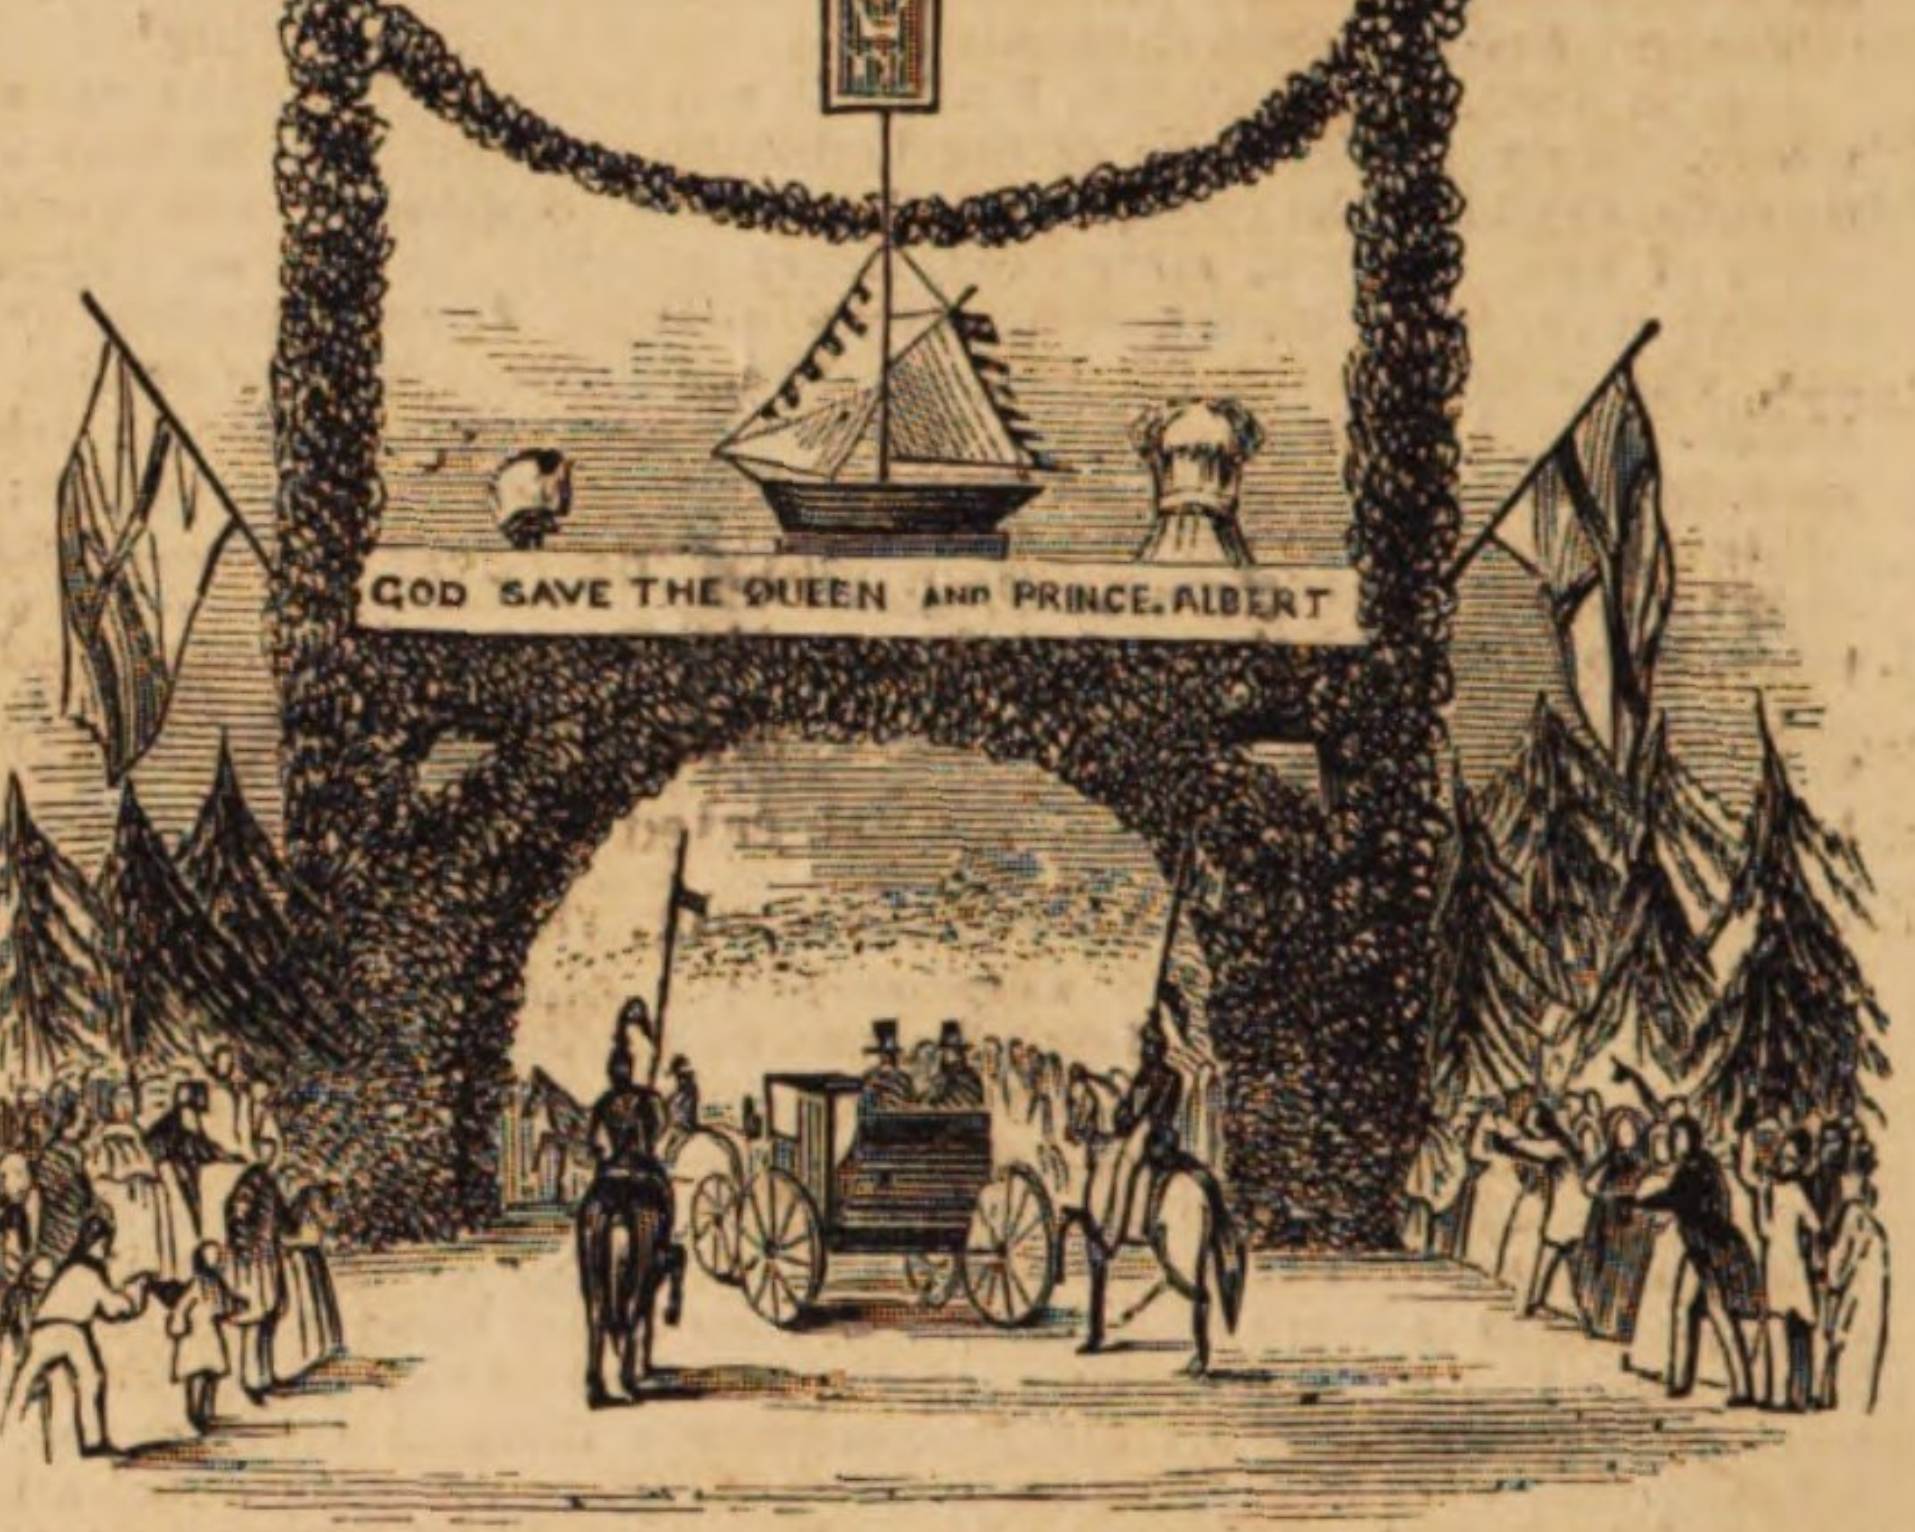
NEWSPAPER ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS

The ancient town of Stamford and the palace of Burghley, have been frequently honoured with visits by English sovereigns. In chivalric times, Stamford was the scene of tilts and tournaments; but its chronicle of splendour is dimmed with many a sad episode of battle and siege, persecution, and unjust triumph. Parliaments and councils of war have been held here; and so severely did the town suffer in the protracted strife of York and Lancaster, that it never afterwards recovered its ancient dignity. Turning to the more pacific and festal celebrity of Stamford, we find to have been entertained here, Edward IV., Henry VIII., Elizabeth, James I., and Charles I.; Cromwell's visit was a less agreeable event to the inhabitants, In 1646, Charles found a patriotic reception here, in his escape from "the Protector;" and the last night the poor King may be said to have slept a free man, was at Stamford. Elizabeth and James I. visited Lord Burghley's newly-built mansion; as did William III.; and George IV. (then Prince Regent), passed through the town in the winter of 1813.



ARCH AT KETTERING.

The visit of her Majesty and Prince Albert to the Marquis of Exeter, at Burghley, had been for some time contemplated; and, accordingly, the arrangements made for the reception of the Royal visitors have been extensive and complete. Of the magnificent mansion, a description will be found in another portion of our journal; so that we shall, in this place, confine ourselves to a detail of the Royal progress to the princely mansion, and a notice of every incident of the journey entitled to record.



GOD SAVE THE QUEEN AND PRINCE ALBERT

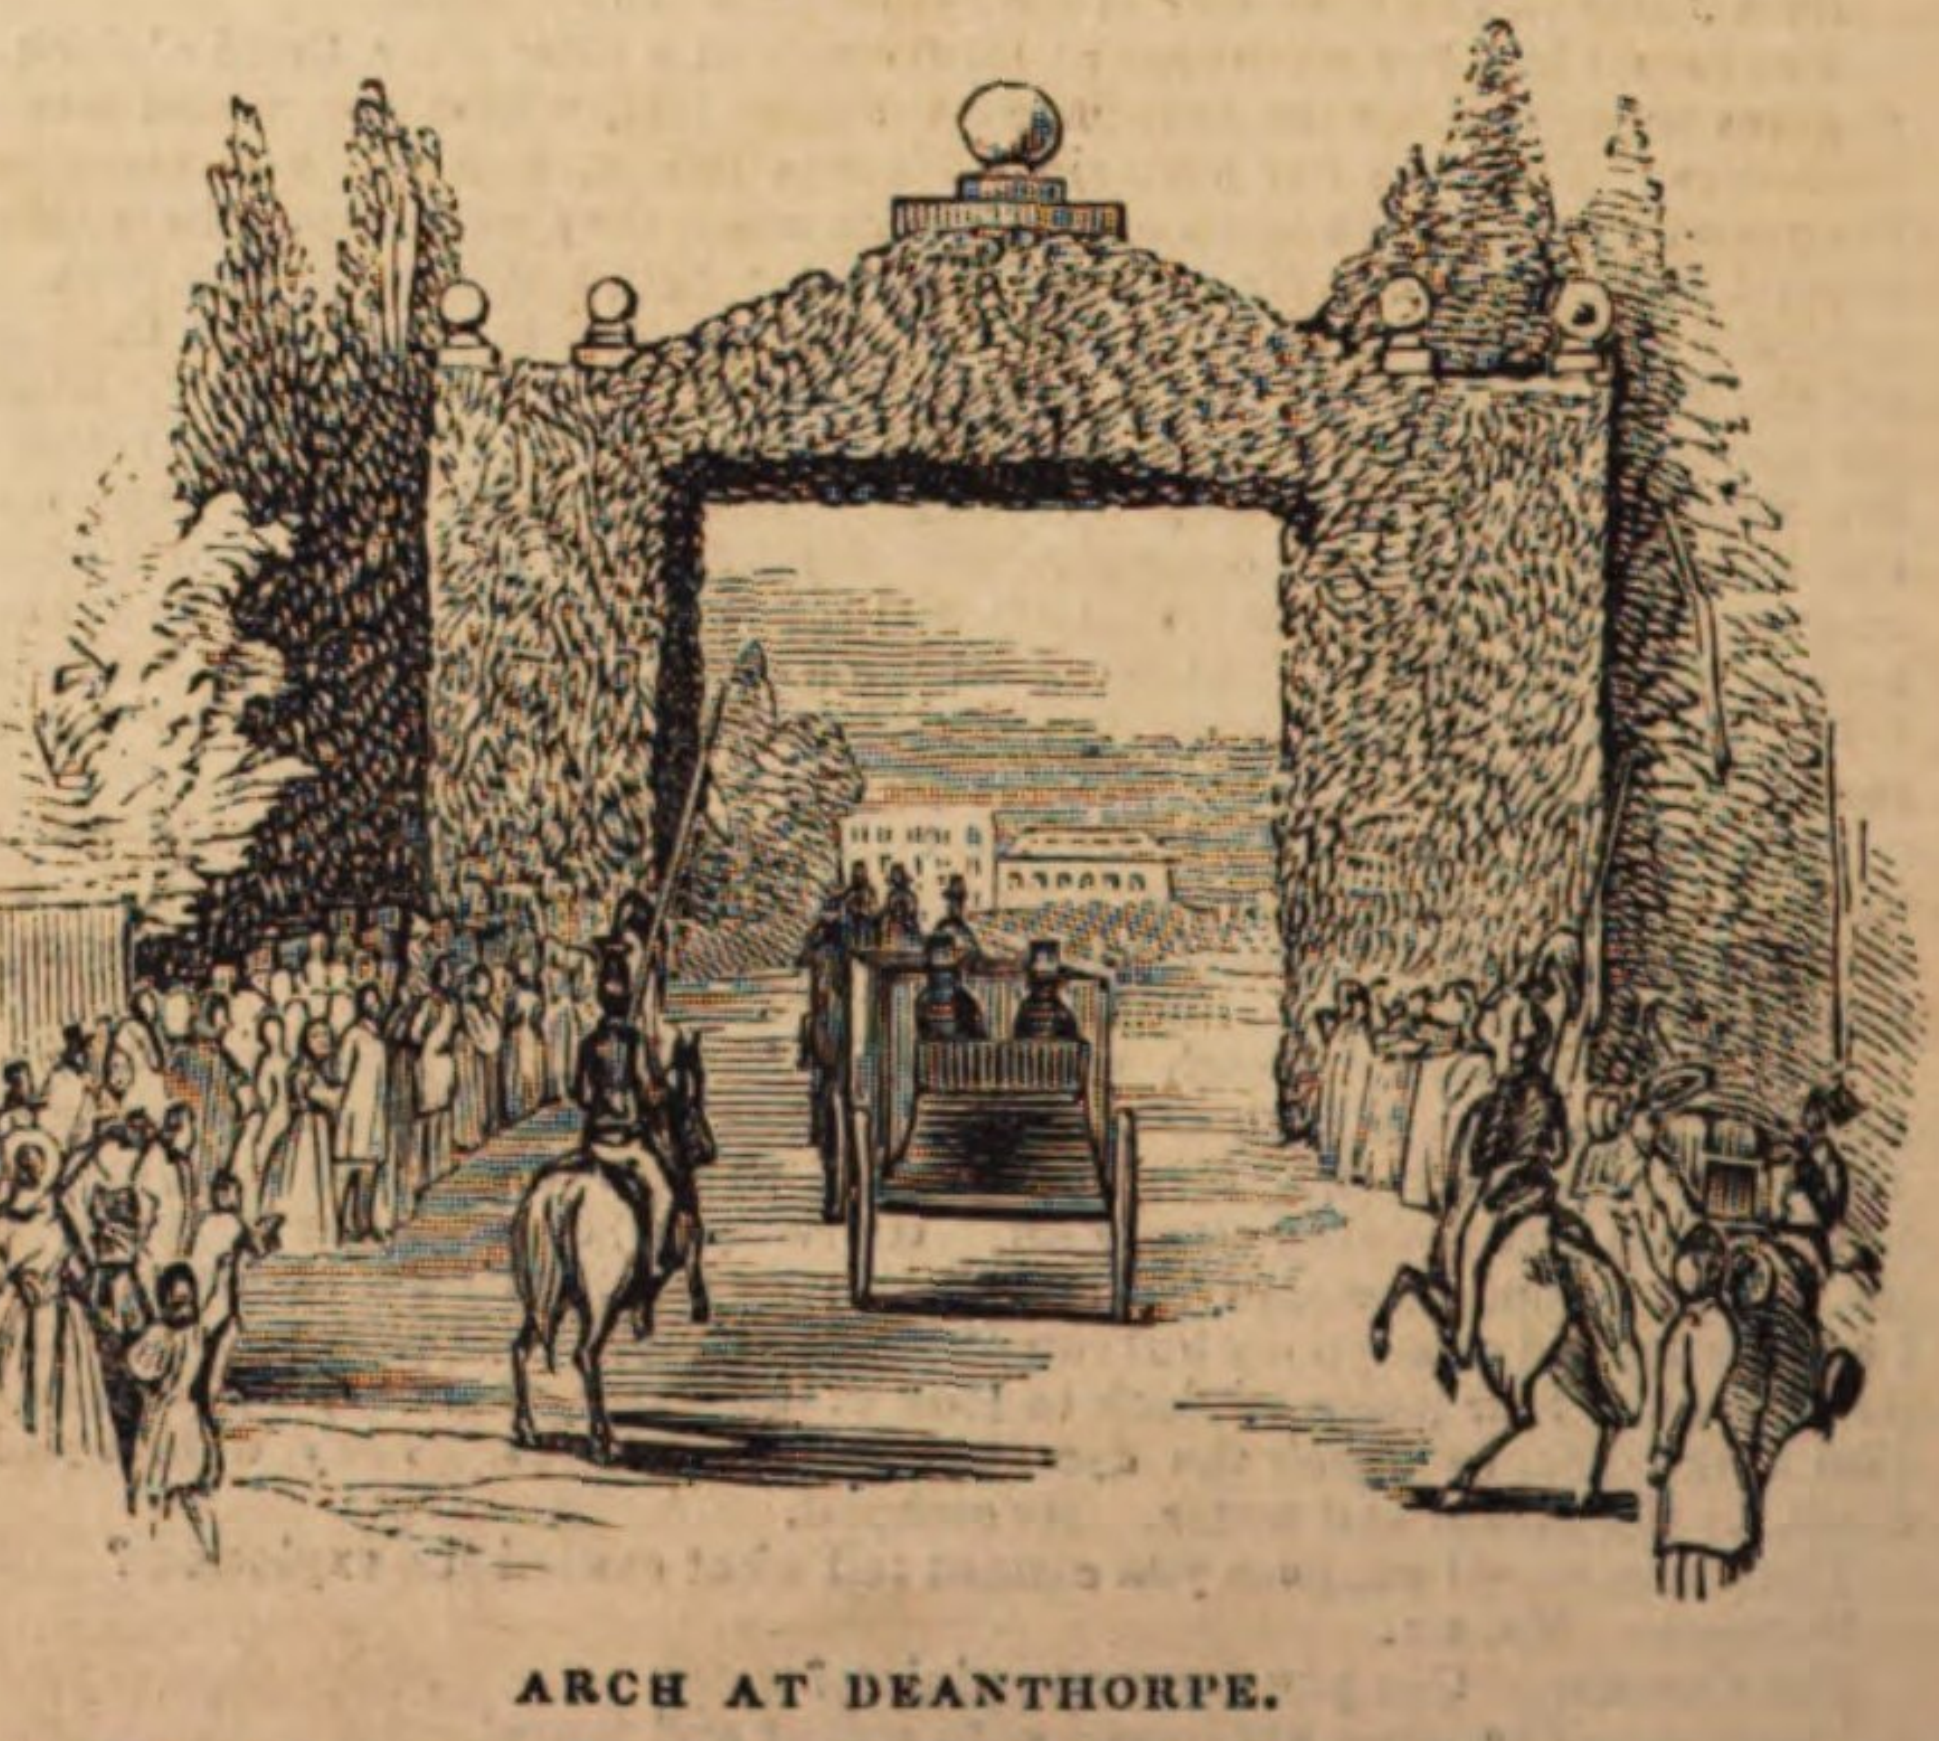
ARCH AT WEEKLEY.

We should mention, at starting, that the sketches for the severa illustrations have been, for the most part, made by Mr. Landells, who, during her Majesty's recent visit to Blair Athol, was honoured with the Royal command to execute two drawings of the above locality.

THE ROYAL DEPARTURE.

The Queen and Prince Albert left Buckingham Palace at five minutes before nine o'clock on Tuesday morning, in a carriage and four, escorted by a party of Lancers, for the Euston-square terminus of the London and Birmingham Railway.

Lady Portman, the Honourable Georgiana Liddell, Colonel Arbuthnot, and Colonel Wylde, followed in a second carriage and four; and the Lord Chamberlain and Mr. George Edward Anson followed in a third carriage and four.

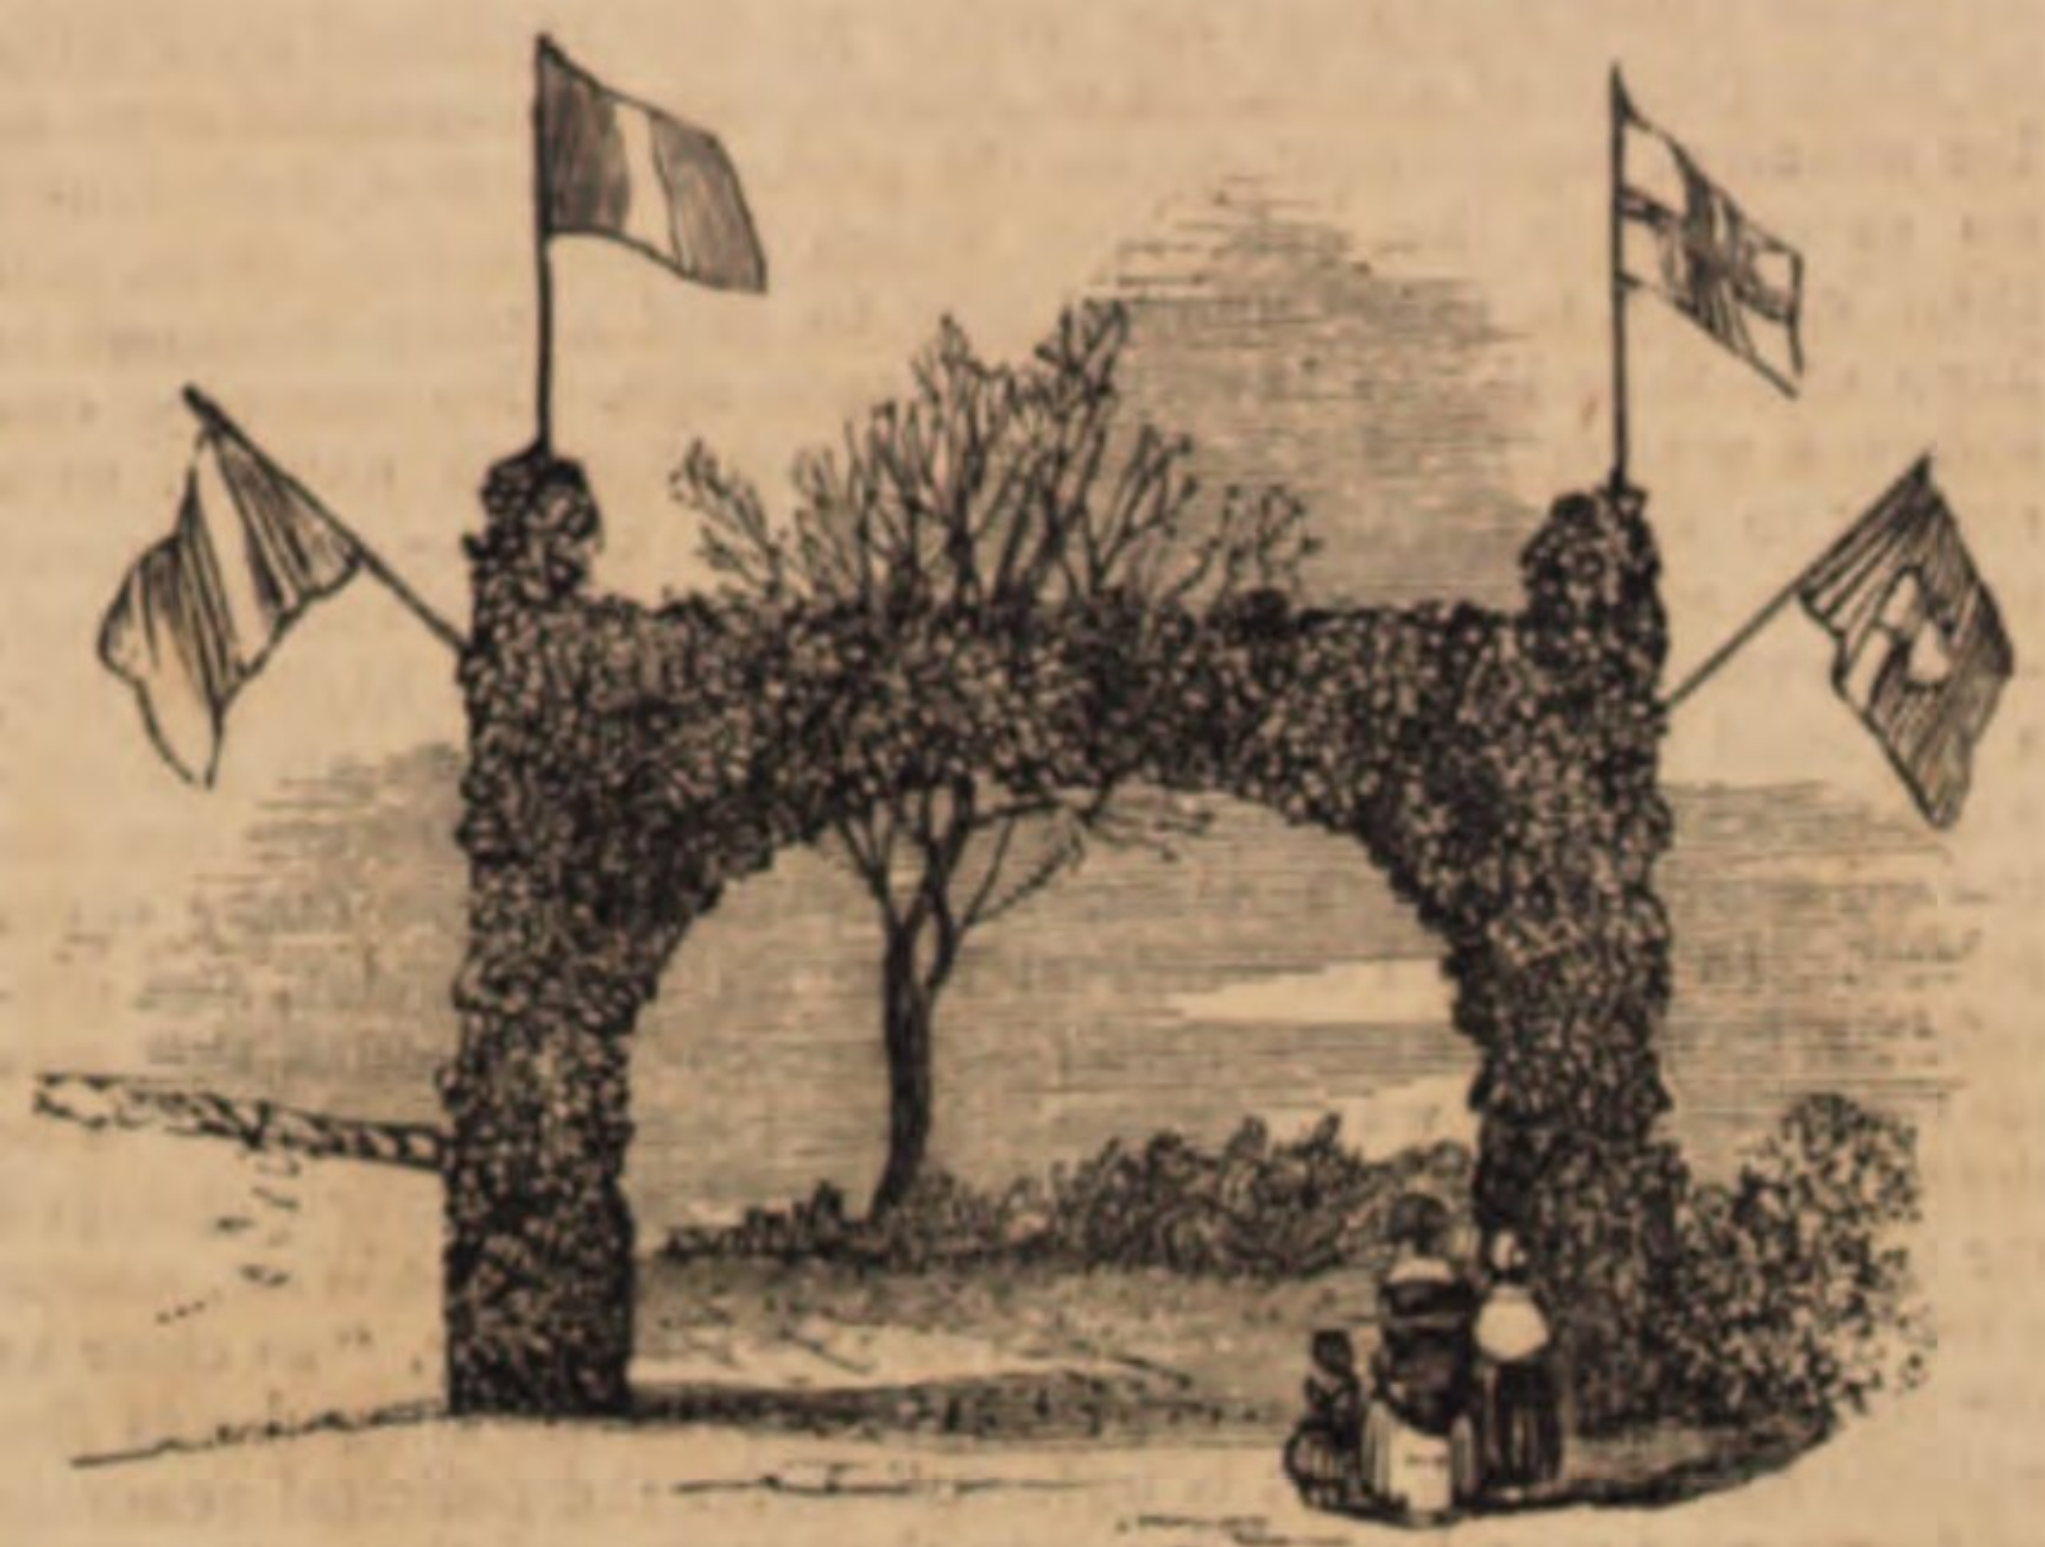


ARCH AT DEANTHORPE.

Her Majesty was attired in deep mourning, and appeared in perfect health. His Royal Highness Prince Albert, who also looked extremely well, was enveloped in a capacious travelling-cloak of a dark colour, lined with red.

The Royal travellers arrived at the Euston-square terminus at a quarter past nine o'clock, and her Majesty and the Prince, on alighting from the Royal carriage, were received by Mr. Glyn, the chairman of the railway; Mr. Ledsam, the deputy chairman; Mr. Young and Mr. Grenfell, directors; Mr. Creed, the secretary; and Mr. Bruyeres, the chief inspector of the line, and conducted into the state room.

HER MAJESTY'S VISIT TO BURGHLEY.



ARCH AT EASTON.

The luggage belonging to the Court had now to be properly disposed of in the carriages appropriated to the use of the suite. This was effected in a few minutes, and at seventeen minutes after nine o'clock her Majesty and Prince Albert left the state-room, and proceeded to the Royal carriage amidst the hearty cheering of a large and respectable concourse of spectators, who had been admitted within the station. Her Majesty and the Prince appeared to be in excellent health.

The Royal train, consisting of three carriages besides the Royal carriage, left the terminus at twenty-two minutes after nine o'clock, and was enthusiastically cheered while it remained in sight of those at the station. The engine, which had the Royal standard hoisted in front, was driven by Mr. E. Bury, the superintendent of the locomotive department.

The incline to Camden Town was passed up at a rapid rate, and upon getting out of the cutting and obtaining a view of the horizon, it was seen that her Majesty, whose "Royal progresses" have been almost invariably made "midst sunshine and smiles," would, on the present occasion, have but a dull journey, so fa: as the weather was concerned. A drizzling rain beat against the windows of the carriages, and the huge volumes of steam from the engine dragged, or rather rolled, their slow length across the country, lending an additional haziness to the atmosphere.

At the Camden Town works, belonging to the railway, the workmen had arranged themselves along the line, and gave her Majesty a "hurrah," which was none the less sincere for being most vociferous. The Primrose-hill tunnel was passed through at great speed (about one minute), and the train went at something like 34 or 35 miles per hour, with a fine easy motion—the carriages having had improved springs attached to them — and passing Harrow at twelve minutes to ten, the Watford station was reached at eight minutes to ten, and the long tunnel immediately beyond it passed through in a minute and forty seconds.

The train reached Boxmoor station about one minute past ten o'clock. To the platform of this station several persons had been admitted in order that they might have an opportunity of seeing her Majesty as she travelled on the railroad, but, considering the rapidity with which the train proceeded, it is hardly possible to conceive that their very natural curiosity could have been adequately gratified. It was, however, an unusual sight to see a special train of this kind at all. In the centre of it was a magnificent carriage surmounted with a Royal crown. The spectators knew that it contained their Sovereign and her Royal Consort; and this was some gratification, even though they might not be able to distinguish very clearly the illustrious individuals themselves. Indeed, many a labourer and farmer on the railroad side left the labour of the field to look at the Royal special train as it rushed rapidly along.

The drizzling rain which was falling at the time had not deterred a considerable number of persons from collecting together at Tring station. This station is situated 31¾ miles from London, and was reached at fourteen minutes past ten o'clock; and here the train halted for a few minutes, in order that the engine might obtain a fresh supply of water.

Among the persons assembled at this station were the juvenile members of the neighbouring population, boys and girls, who were drawn up in distinct rows, and who strained their tiny voices to the utmost in welcoming their Sovereign. Her Majesty appeared highly pleased with this specimen of infantine loyalty and enthusiasm. A sufficient supply of water having been obtained, the train again started on its course, at 18 minutes past 10 o'clock, but its onward ate was not now so great as when it started from Euston-square station. As the train approached its destination, the Weedon station, the speed became less and less, and the cause of this slackening in the progress of the train was understood to be her Majesty's desire not to arrive at Weedon station much earlier than a quarter to twelve o'clock.

At Wolverton station, which was passed by the special train at eleven o'clock, there was a large assemblage of persons on the platform, who all seemed most anxious to catch a passing glimpse of her Majesty, and who most cordially cheered her as the train passed along. At this station, several enginemen and mechanics employed by the railway company clambered upon some of the engines which were lying on the side rails. It seemed that they had not had much time to pay attention to their toilet, for they wore only their rough working dresses, and their smeared faces and hands gave sufficient proof of the nature of their hard toil. Loyalty, however, is not confined to any particular class in this country, and the energetic cheers raised by these sons of toil, expressive of their joy at beholding their Sovereign, seemed as heartfelt and as honest as they were lusty. At Roode station, which was reached 18 minutes past eleven, the special train passed the ordinary passengers' train, which had left London for Birmingham at nine o'clock.

THE ARRIVAL AT WEEDON STATION.

Precisely at twenty minutes to twelve o'clock, the appointed time to a second, the Royal train arrived in sight, and passed rapidly through the station.

Three of the Royal carriages had arrived from town by the eight o'clock train, and the horses having arrived from Northampton, were put to, and the whole was in readiness before her Majesty reached the station.

On the Royal carriage bringing up alongside the platform, the Marquis of Exeter advanced to pay his respects to the Queen and the Prince, her Majesty and his Royal Highness rising from their seats and greeting his Lordship.

Sir Henry Dryden, High Sheriff of Northamptonshire, Colonel Thorne, the Military Commandant of the district, and several magistrates of the county, were also present.

In the station yard a guard of honour of the 47th Regiment, consisting of 100 men, a sergeant, and a corporal, with band and Queen's colour, under the command of Capt. Haly, were drawn up, the remainder of the regiment forming in file through the village.

The Marquis of Exeter having received the Queen, and conducted her to the apartments fitted up for her reception, shortly after left for Burghley, to be in readiness to receive his Royal visitors. The Noble Marquis rode the whole distance on horseback.

On leaving the station, the Royal cortège drove slowly through the village of Weedon, over the principal street of which an unpretending arch, composed of evergreens, was thrown. The inhabitants were all at their doors and windows, and as the Queen and the Prince passed, they joined in loyal vociferations in honour of the Royal pair. Increasing the pace on leaving Weedon, the Royal cortège proceeded rapidly on, the first object on the route being Brock Hall, the seat of Mr. Thomas Reeve Thornton. The village of Floore was next reached. Here the people were all out in holiday attire to meet the Royal pair, and the houses were gaily decorated. The villages of Heyford and Harpole were next passed through in succession. At Duston, a hamlet, closely adjoining Stamford, and the property of Lord Melbourne, the preparations were upon an extensive scale, and the Royal pair were most enthusiastically greeted.

Entering the precincts of the town by St. James's end, the cortège soon arrived at the West Bridge, where the Mayor, and Corporation, with the Clergy, and numerous inhabitants, were drawn up.

ARRIVAL AT NORTHAMPTON.

Many a long year has passed since the ancient town of Northampton presented a scene of similar bustle and activity, the whole population appearing to be vying with each other in their attempts to honour the auspicious visit of their beloved Sovereign and her Royal Consort. Along the route through which it had been arranged for the Royal carriage to pass, every house exhibited more or less enthusiasm on the part of its inhabitants in giving effect to this feeling of loyalty and affection. Festoons of evergreens and flowers floated across all the principal streets, and no fewer than three magnificent triumphal arches, tastefully designed, were thrown across the road at different parts of the town. The first of these was situated just below the old castle hill, on the Duxton side of the river. The style of this arch was Elizabethan—in keeping with Burghley House. The design consisted of three arches, a large one in the centre and two smaller ones on either side. The span of the centre arch was about fourteen feet; that of each of the smaller ones measuring five teet. Three pillars supported this ornamental piece of architecture; the two great ones upon which the centre arch was formed were six feet square and twenty-eight feet high. The other two were four feet square and sixteen feet high. Including the decorative turrets the height of the two larger

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"J. C. R.," Liverpool.—From the returns ordered by Parliament, and other sources peculiarly our own, we have ascertained that the number of letters posted in the United Kingdom for six months prior to the 5th of December, 1839 the day upon which the fourpenny-rate came into operation (including franks) was, as nearly as could be ascertained, 37,500,000. During the corresponding period of the year 1842, the number of unpaid, paid, and stamped letters had risen to 103,500,000. Of these, the letters posted in London were increased about 70 per cent.; those delivered in London, about 65; and those passing through London, formerly an insignificant class, in consequence of the delay which took place in the Metropolitan Office, nearly 200 per cent. This large surplus is to be attributed to the increased promptitude of the day-mails, and the more frequent conveyance by railway transit of this description of correspondence. In the first six months of the current year, the letters were at the rate of 220 000 000 per annum, an increase of more than three-fold as compared with the number posted at the old rate of charge, with franks and official correspondence included.

Her Majesty's Visit to Burghley.—We regret to state that a pacquet of sketches made in Northampton and the neighbourhood, by mistake reached us too late to do justice to them in our present Number: but, next week will appear a series of Illustrations of the Loyal Reception of her Majesty at Northampton, executed in a style worthy of the highly-interesting occasion. We shall also, next week, complete our Illustrations of the Royal séjour at Burghley, with several Scenes from sketches made upon the spot, and engraved in the first style of art.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 16, 1844.

Her Majesty's visit to Burghley House has again called forth the loyalty of the inhabitants of the line of country crossed by the Royal party, in various kinds of demonstrations of respect; it has also again taxed the descriptive powers of the newspapers, which this time have had to contend with a disadvantage that has seldom accompanied her Majesty's excursions—the weather has been most unfavourable the whole time. But, fortunate as her Majesty is in general, sunshine in this—the gloomiest of English months—could not be anticipated:

November's leaf is red and sere,
November's blast is chill and drear,

And the old mansion of Burghley, "with many an oak that grows thereby," would have looked more smiling in the leafy time of June. The flags and banners, and arches would also have been more gay, and the fireworks more easy of ignition and explosion; all these outward manifestations would have been more brilliant and pleasing to the eye had the skies been more propitious. But it is cheering to remark that the loyalty and enthusiasm with which her Majesty is always received suffer no diminution from outward circumstances. The leaf may be in the "sere and yellow," and the breezes cold and cheerless, but the affection of the people for their Sovereign remains as cordial and as bright as ever.

Social questions continue to occupy the space usually devoted in the more stirring part of the year, to politics. Thus, the landed interest seems to be seriously turning its attention to what can be done towards the improvement of the soil; Mr. Pusey, the brother of the clergyman who has given his name to an influential party in the Church, is among the most active in this agitation. He says there is not a single spot in all England so well cultivated but it is capable of further improvement, and earnestly advises the landlords to set about making it; he sees clearly enough that among the majority of the tenant class, the means of effectually improving the estates on which they live, do not exist. He is alive, too, to the necessity of giving those who do possess the means a security of holding, an assurance that they shall be allowed to reap the advantages of their outlay. His views are clear and practical; they would, if adopted, work immense good in England; in Ireland they would effect much more. The tenant at will system in England is felt to be to some extent insecure; but the consideration paid by almost all English landlords to the claims of old tenants, would, in Ireland, be considered the greatest of blessings. Several instances have just occurred, in which landlords or their agents have fallen victims to the bad system they uphold and profit by. They deal in land just as the possessor of a hogshead of water might do on board a ship in which he was the sole owner and disposer of the great necessary of life. They take advantage of the struggles and frantic biddings of those who are famishing, each one offering more than the other, till the owner of that commodity without which they must perish, gets the maximum price. The old tenant is often turned out for no reason whatever, save that there is another who offers to give more. This is not, to the full extent, general among Irish landlords—society could not exist at all in that country, if it were; but it exists to an extent sufficient to produce those horrid deeds of revenge and murder unparalleled in any other part of the Christian world. The misery inflicted by the system is avenged upon those who benefit by it, or are employed in carrying it out, without regard to country or religion. The greater number of these victims are Irishmen, and in one recent case, the murdered man was not only Irish, but a Catholic. That it is revenge and some insane idea of checking oppression by this bloody means, which prompt to these murders, is evident, for the greatest care is taken to prove that nothing in the shape of robbery was the object; in one case, the gold watch of the murdered man, and his purse, containing money, were placed on the breast of the corpse! The misery of all this is, that by such means no effectual remedy will ever be found; the same wild hope of escaping from an always crushing, ever present oppression, has made the nobility of Russia assassinate three successive Emperors—yet the one they have over them now, is, perhaps, more completely, because more ably, despotic than any of his predecessors. Blinded by misery, passion, and the desire of revenge, men do not see that though they can destroy an individual, they cannot thus slay a system. To destroy that, is a work of time, and enlightenment, that first procures the substitution of good laws for bad ones, and then causes the good laws to be observed.

The Government of Spain seems to be settling down without resistance into a complete despotism; the very slight resistance attempted by General Prim has been altogether useless, and if he really employed the assassin as his instrument he deserved to fail, but this has not been proved by any probable evidence, and there is even a chance, from the difference of opinion among the members of the military court that tried him, that he may escape with his life. But the little attention that any violation of the laws, or what were laws, excites among the people, proves too plainly that what was the liberal constitutional party is extinct. The men in in whose name Riego and his brother patriots sacrificed their lives in consequence of a violation of sacred oaths, unequalled even in the annals of royal turpitude, on the part of Ferdinand, have found no successors in the generation which has succeeded them, and their country is more unfitted now to gain a constitution or to keep one than it was twenty-five years ago. No atrocity can waken a sentiment of disapproval in the Spanish nation; with respect to all the judicial murders, sudden arrests—with respect to all that surprises and shocks the people of France and England,—there reigns in all classes and ranks of Spaniards, high and low, a profound and almost inhuman indifference. In vain are the outward forms of free institutions given to a race who have lost the inward worth, honour, and humanity, that can alone make them prized. In this trial of General Prim all forms, codes, and precedents, have been disregarded; any evidence, and much that was no evidence at all, was admitted against a prisoner whose life or death hung on the issue. Times have evidently much changed for the worse in Spain since the days of Alphonso the Wise, whose code exacted proofs tan claras como la luz del dia, "as clear as the light of day," when the penalty of the crime alleged was the punishment of death. It is unfortunate for the policical generals of Spain who may have fallen into the meshes of the well-spread net of conspiracy, that they are tried by a privileged court, one of the fueros which the reformers have endeavoured in vain to abolish, and which by the new constitution, if it deserves such a name, are about to be continued in all their powers. This privilege, by which a soldier can be tried only by soldiers, and every officer by those only of his own rank, his equals, was anciently bestowed on the army when it was an imperium in imperio.

Don Diego Leon was tried by such a Court, and on the question of his death, the members were equally divided. In such a case, custom and usage had made it the practice for the President to give his casting vote in favour of the prisoner; but General Capaz, who presided at the trial of Leon, violated this rule, and gave his voice for death. By one vote alone, therefore, was this brave officer shot like a bandit! Prim will have a narrow escape from the same fate, even if he does escape at all. He is in the hands of men who treat the whole affair with great indifference, as we may perceive by the following:—

> The tribunal assembled in a large hall of the old quarters of the gardes du corps. It bore all the appearance of a genuine encampment. A small table, round which were seated the President, the six Judges, the Procurator Fiscal, and the Secretary, on wooden chairs—and two benches for the audience, formed all the furniture. Although the hall is spacious enough to hold 600 people, not more than 250 were present, and of these three-fourths were officers belonging to the regiments of the garrison of the capital, who were called upon to attend by an order of the day. The only things upon the table were four books; there was not even a crucifix. The charge had been prepared entirely out of Court by the Procurator Fiscal. The sitting was opened with a rapid reading of all the documents, the interrogatories, and charges. When this reading was finished, General Schelly presented the defence of General Prim; that is to say, he read a manuscript which had been given to him by the civil advocates of the General. As General Schelley, who is a brave and most commendable officer, has never occupied his mind with judicial questions, he read the paper in a monotonous tone, without bringing any of its arguments prominently out, and without any indication that he was impressed feelingly with what he read.

Thus the Revolution by which the Moderados effected the downfall of Espartero, is already, as was said of a greater one, devouring its own children—General Prim, who was foremost in the movement against the Regent, among the first. He took a prominent part in the pronounciamentos of last year, and was one of the earliest to raise the standard of revolt in Catalonia in favour of the majority of the young Queen. Verily he has his reward; the Queen is of age, and a monarch in her own right; Espartero is in exile, and his patron in rebellion, Narvaez, is Dictator of the realm. All for whom he laboured are in the blaze of power, and yet what is his portion? That room half filled with careless spectators, the hurried charge, and the slovenly read defence, with the not distant prospect of a violent death, or at best the life of a transported convict, must all combine to give him a stern lesson on the danger of making others strong, repenting of the deed, and seeking afterwards to destroy them, only to have the strength he has lent them used for crushing himself.

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

Windsor, Thursday Evening.—(From our own Correspondent.)—The continued and extremely unfavourable nature of the weather, it having rained during the whole of the day, has compelled the infant Royal Family to remain within the walls of the Castle. They have been prevented from taking their usual walking and riding exercise since Sunday last, from the same cause. The state apartments were re-opened to the public yesterday, after having been closed for several weeks. A notification reached Windsor this morning, that her Majesty would take her departure from Burghley House to-morrow morning, for Buckingham Palace, where the Court would remain till Saturday, and leave town that afternoon for Windsor. Should any alterations be made in this arrangement, timely notice is to be forwarded to the Castle. Preparations are also to be made for the reception of her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, at Frogmore House, on Saturday. The royal duchess will dine with her Majesty at Buckingham Palace, as at present arranged, on Friday evening. The only members of the royal household remaining at the Castle during the absence of the Court are the Earl of Morton, Lord in Waiting; Captain Meynell, Groom in Waiting; the Dowager Lady Lyttelton, Preceptress to the Princess Royal; and the Hon. and Rev. C. L. Courtenay, Domestic Chaplain to her Majesty.

Viscount and Viscountess Palmerston have arrived in Carlton-house-terrace from visiting Viscount Melbourne, at Brocket-hall, Herts, where Lord and Lady Beauvale, Lord and Lady Ashley, Viscount and Viscountess Jocelyn, and the Hon. W. Cowper, have been staying with the noble Viscount, who, we are happy to hear, is in the enjoyment of a far better state of health than for some months past.

Her Majesty the Queen has given £50, and Prince Albert £20, towards a fund now raising for the erection of a new organ in Windsor Church, the old one, which was given by King George the Third (having been taken from St. George's Chapel), being in a state of decay.

A Baronetcy has been conferred upon Vice-Admiral Sir William Parker, G.C.B., of Shenstone Lodge, Staffordshire.

The Duke of Norfolk arrived in St. James's-square, on Tuesday evening, from Arundel Castle, Sussex. We understand that his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge and a distinguished party will assemble at Arundel Castle in the ensuing week.

The Marquis and Marchioness of Ailesbury have abandoned their contemplated visit to Paris this winter, and will most likely remain at Tottenham Park until January, when the noble marquis and marchioness intend to go to Brighton for a short period.

Sir W. Follett and family left Milan on the 29th ult., for Genoa and Leghorn. The learned Attorney-General continued to improve in health.

Major-General Sir Leonard Greenwell, K.C.B. and K.C.H, after a protracted illness, expired on Monday morning. The deceased General, who was third son of the late Mr. Joshua Greenwell, of Kebblesworth, was born in 1781.

The Earl of Ellenborough has arrived in town from Southam House, Gloucestershire.

Death of Lord Saye and Sele.—We regret to announce he death of Lord Saye and Sele, which took place on Wednesday. His lordship was in his 76th year, and is succeeded in his title and estates by his only son, the Hon. William Twisleton Fiennes, who was born in April, 1798.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

Fire in the Westminster-road.—Last Sunday morning, about four o'clock, a fire broke out on the premises of Mr. Callaway, draper, near Astley's Amphitheatre. The female servant and a lad were taken from the first floor down by a ladder, and thereby escaped uninjured. Mr. Callaway, however, was not so fortunate, for thinking he could subdue the flames by the aid of a bucket of water, he ran down stairs to procure one, but he was met by a huge sheet of flame and smoke, which forced him backwards, destroying the hair on his head, and burning him about the face, neck, and ears. He managed to reach the kitchen area, nearly suffocated; and before he could be rescued, the iron grating over the same was compelled to be forced. The flames were extinguished by six o'clock; but not until the buildings and the stock-in-trade, furniture, &c., were nearly destroyed. The damage is very considerable, and will fall upon the Sun and Imperial Offices.

City Improvements.—A City Colonnade.—A plan is in contemplation in the City to form an avenue, or colonnade, from near the end of Bartholomew-lane, Throgmorton-street, to London-wall and Finsbury-pavement South, forming a branch avenue or colonnade, terminating at, or near to London-wall and Finsbury-circus. Though the intended alterations do not extend a very great distance, yet the various avenues pass through no fewer than six parishes, namely, St. Christopher-le-Stocks, St. Bartholomew by the Exchange, St. Margaret, Lothbury, St. Peter-le-Poor, St. Stephen Colman, and Allhallows, of London-wall.

Curtailment of Hours of Business.—On Wednesday evening a meeting of persons engaged in the various branches of the wholesale drapery trade, took place at the Gerard's Hall, Basing-lane, at which several speakers complained that those individuals had no time for mental culture or recreation. A resolution was voted to the effect that the wholesale drapers in the City and elsewhere should be waited on, and requested to close their warehouses at one o'clock P.M. every Saturday.

Mortality in the Metropolis—The mortality continues to augment, in the proportion of 1-34th. The deaths last week were 989; the week before, 960. The ravages of small-pox and scarlatina remain about double the average for the last five years. The number of violent deaths was last week 29—five more than the five years' average; of those a dozen were cases of drowning, nearly all of which, it is to be feared, were suicides; added to which are five or six cases of suicide by hanging.

Debtors in the Metropolitan Prisons.—There are now only 110 persons in Whitecross-street Prison, about the same number in the Queen's Prison, and only 25 in Horsemonger-lane Gaol, making the number of persons confined for debt in the metropolitan prisons about 245 Some time ago nearly 400 were confined in Whitecross street Prison alone. It is understood that the county prisons are in a somewhat similar position.

The Polish Ball at Guildhall.—Another ball for the benefit of the Polish refugees is to be given at the Guildhall on Tuesday next. The committee met on Wednesday last to make the requisite arrangements. Lord Dudley Stuart took the opportunity of stating that he had received the most encouraging assurances of support upon the occasion. The noble lord added that the long list of distinguished persons who had signified their desire to patronise the ball, headed by the illustrious lady who never failed them, her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, and graced by such names as the Duke and Duchess of Sutherland, Lord and Lady Wharncliffe, Lord and Lady Stanley, Lord and Lady John Russell, and not least in importance, Sir Robert and Lady Sale (cheers), was evidence of the favour with which their undertaking was regarded by persons in high stations of different parties.

Mysterious Disappearance of a Newly-Married Man.—On Wednesday week Joseph Ames, who has been for some years a bookkeeper at the Bull, Aldgate, was married in Whitechapel Church, to a young woman, several years his junior. On leaving the church, Ames, addressing his bride, said, "You want to go to the west-end of the town, don't you? But mind and be back in an hour, and then perhaps we may go out together." The bride promised to comply with his request, and was about to part with him for an hour, when her husband, as if recollecting himself, said, "Here, take care of this; you may want it, and it may be of some service to you;" and at the same time handed her a bag, containing 120 sovereigns, and also the marriage certificate, observing that the latter might be of use to her also. Mrs. Ames proceeded to the west end of the town, and returned within the specified time to a public-house which her husband had taken, and in which they were to commence business on the following day, when, to her great surprise, she discovered that her husband had not been there. She remained for some time in the greatest possible anxiety for his arrival, when a messenger brought her a note, written evidently in much haste by her husband, informing her that there was £130 in the bank, which she could have, together with some more money in his trunks, and stating that she might have all, as well as his clothes, and that, in all probability, she would never see him more. It seems that he has kept his word, for no trace of him has been discovered.

IRELAND.

REPEAL AND FEDERALISM.

At the meeting of the Repeal Association in Dublin, on Monday last, a long manifesto from O'Connell was read, chiefly upon the subject of Repeal. In the first part of his letter, however, he announces the receipt of £500 from the Repealers of New York. The learned gentleman proceeds to state that he shall be present at the meeting of the Association on the 25th inst., to discuss two topics of importance.

"The first involves the subject of an application to Parliament for an impeachment of the persons principally concerned in the late Monster Prosecutions, and, in particular, to consider deliberately the propriety of addressing the people of Great Britain, in order to procure their aid in enforcing on Parliament the necessity of such impeachment. If such an address shall be agreed upon, it will remain to be determined whether it shall take place by personal attendance in England of a delegation of the association, or through the medium of the press.

"The second great object for the consideration of the Association on the 25th, is one which has engrossed much of my thoughts, and from which my mind is full of anticipations of great utility, if it can be legally arranged—I mean the appointment of a Preservative Society of 300. It is quite true that the legal difficulties are very great."

Mr. O'Connell then discusses the questions of Repeal and Federalism. The result is that the hon. and learned gentleman admits that Federalism is an open question; but he thinks it better for the present to limit the exertions of the association to "simple repeal," which he thus defines:—

"Simple repeal, I take it, consists in this—

"First. On the preservation of the connection between Great Britain and Ireland, through the means of a sole executive and the golden link of the Crown.

"Secondly. In the Repeal of the Union Statute, 50th George III., chap. 47.

"Thirdly. In the restoration of the Irish House of Lords in all its integrity.

"Fourthly. In the reconstruction (upon Reform principles) of the Irish House of Commons, consisting of 300 members, distributed upon the basis of population, that being the basis adopted in the English Reform Bill.

"Fifthly. That the restored Irish Parliament should have all the powers which were vested in the Irish Parliament before the union; that is to say, complete legislative and judicial authority in Ireland.

"I think it right to state my thorough conviction, as well as my perfect determination, that we should never consent to receive less for Ireland than what is contained in these five propositions; this would be giving Ireland to the Irish; but it would give them no farther share in the advantages of British connection."

Another Murder in Clare.—A letter from Dublin states that the land steward of the late Arthur Gloster, Esq., whose assassination was announced last week, was murdered near Kilkishen on Sunday night week.

HER MAJESTY'S VISIT TO BURGHLEY HOUSE.

pillars were forty feet each, that of the two smaller ones about twenty-one feet each. The whole was surmounted by a crown, over which the Royal standard floated. The inscription, "Welcome Victoria and Albert," was painted in large characters at the upper part of the arch, and the lower portion was decorated with evergreens and flowers.

The second arch, even more colossal than the first, was situated at the corner of All Saint's Churchyard. The third arch was erected at the north-east extremity of the town, at the top of Abingdon-street, and nearly opposite the residence of Mr. Barwell, the present Mayor of the town.

In addition to these arches, a temporary wooden structure was erected on the site of the ancient castle, of which only a small portion of the walls remain, the extent and massive character of the fortification being gathered chiefly from the rising ground or eminence on which the original building stood.

This interesting scene, in some degree partaking of the scenic preparations for a tourney, will be engraved in our next number. The castle, which was thus theatrically restored, was built after the Conquest, by Simon de St. Liz, on whom the Conqueror conferred the Earldom of Northampton.

At the third arch the Royal cortège was met by the Mayor, Mr. Barwell, and the other civic authorities, in full costume, who, walking accompanied by their municipal insignia, preceded the Royal carriages from one end of the town to the other. The houses in this town, along the whole line through which her Majesty passed, were decorated in the gayest style. They were covered with evergreens, and banners floated from every window. A dense but most orderly crowd filled the streets, while the windows of every house were occupied by elegantly-dressed ladies. As her Majesty passed along, she was greeted with unceasing acclamations, in which all parties without distinction most cordially joined. The scene was, indeed, most animated and pleasing, and the gratification which it afforded her Majesty was plainly evident from the very kind and gracious manner in which she returned the vociferous greetings of the assembled multitudes. As her Majesty proceeded along, the streets were not only densely crowded by the inhabitants, they were also lined on each side by members of the different friendly societies of the locality, wearing across their breasts as the insignia of the different fellowships various coloured sashes, and bearing white wands in their hands, and, as the municipal authorities preceded the Royal cortège, so the members of these different societies followed in regular order. The number of them being considerable, the procession, as it slowly moved along the streets, amidst the cheering of men and the waving of handkerchiefs by the ladies, who filled every window from which a glimpse of the passing spectacle could be obtained, was one of the most animated character conceivable. Such a day, distinguished by the presence of her Majesty among her loyal subjects of Northampton, and marked on the part of the inhabitants by so much order, regularity, and enthusiasm, must ever be memorable in the annals of this town.

On arriving at the West-bridge, the outriders slackened pace, and the horses in the Royal carriage immediately pulled up, and proceeded at a foot pace up Black Lion Hill, the Mayor and Corporation, clergy and inhabitants, heading the cavalcade in the following order:—

	Superintendent of Borough Police.
	Twelve Special Constables.
25 Gentlemen with white wands. 25 Special Constables.	Four Trumpeters.	25 Gentlemen with white wands. 25 Special Constables.
	Flags.
	Bands of Music.
	Gentry.
	Clergy.
	Corporation Flags.
	Sergeants at Mace.
Constables of the Borough.	Coroner and Officers of Corporation.	Constables of the Borough.
	Town Council, Four and Four Magistrates, Four and Four.
	Macebearers.
	Town Clerk—The Mayor—Rev. W. Wales.

The Royal cortège consisted of three carriages and four, in the first of which rode her Majesty and the Prince Consort, the second and third conveying the lords and ladies in attendance.

These were succeeded by carriages and horsemen, the rear of the procession consisting of the members of the various lodges and societies bearing wands, and having white favours on their breasts.

Nothing could exceed the enthusiasm of the people as the party passed through the town. On arriving at the top of Gold-street, the Royal carriage halted for a few moments opposite the George Hotel, where the Mayor, by the express permission of her Majesty, advanced and presented the address of congratulation from the corporation and inhabitants of the borough, of which the following is a copy:—

TO THE QUEEN'S MOST EXCELLENT MAJESTY.

The humble address of the Mayor, Magistrates, Aldermen, and Councillors of the borough of Northampton.

Most Gracious Sovereign,—We, your Majesty's faithful subjects, the Mayor, Magistrates, Aldermen, and Councillors of the borough of Northampton, beg leave to approach your Majesty to hail your Majesty's auspicious presence in this ancient borough.

We beg to assure your Majesty of the devoted loyalty and attachment of this town, and that all classes of its inhabitants are deeply sensible of the benefits enjoyed under your Majesty's enlightened rule. We most earnestly pray, that under the protection of Divine Providence, your Majesty's reign may be long, prosperous, and peaceful; and that your Majesty's subjects may long feel the benignant influence of those private virtues which adorn your Majesty and your Majesty's illustrious Consort, and which endear your Majesty to the hearts of the people.

To this address her Majesty was graciously pleased to make an immediate reply, not reading from any previously prepared document, but framing her answer on the spot as she uttered it. Her Majesty's answer was to the following effect:—

Mr. Mayor,—We receive the address with great pleasure from the Mayor, Magistrates, and Corporation of this town. We are grateful for the reception we have met with from the inhabitants of this ancient borough. You will place the address in the hands of the Lord Chamberlain, and an answer will be sent.

Renewed cheers followed the conclusion of this ceremony, and then the procession moved forward in the same order as before, passing in its course under four large triumphal arches formed of evergreens. When the Royal cortège had passed through the last of these, and reached the Kettering road, the municipal authorities defiled off, remaining uncovered, while her Majesty proceeded towards Kettering, the horses of the Royal carriages resuming their former quick pace.

In the evening, the Mayor and Corporation, with the principal inhabitants of the town, dined together in celebration of her Majesty's visit, at the Angel Inn.

The Royal cortège soon reached Buckett's-booth, a spot about three or four miles distant from Northampton. This is not a village or a hamlet, but a place where a single road-side inn is situated; yet, as it was known that the horses of the Royal carriages would here be changed, a number of persons, naturally enough, were congregated near the place. Among these were the members of some friendly club belonging to a neighbouring village. They came to the spot with staves in their hands, attended by their band, and with colours flying; and while the horses of her Majesty's carriages were being changed, which was, of course, only an affair of a minute or two, the band of this society struck up "God save the Queen," which they executed with great spirit, evidently inspired by the enthusiasm and loyalty which manifested themselves in every quarter, and among every class. It is a curious circumstance that the day on which these villagers welcomed the coming of their Sovereign happens to fall in the week when their village festival or wake occurs, and which they are now keeping.

In passing on to Kettering the small roadside village of Broughton is passed. This, like all the rest of the places on the route, was most gaily decorated with triumphal arches, &c., and the inhabitants lined the streets, cheering her Majesty as she passed.

Kettering was reached by the Royal party about a quarter past two o'clock.

The inhabitants of this town had made extensive arrangements to demonstrate their loyalty.

The Kettering troop of yeomanry, under the command of Capt. Maunsell, M.P., were in readiness to receive her Majesty at the White Hart, and a portion of them escorted her to Weldon.

The élite of the town and neighbourhood crowded the windows of the hotel and the adjacent houses.

At the entrance to Kettering a handsome triumphal arch was erected, covered with laurel, and surmounted with a Royal crown.—(See page 308.) The words "Welcome Victoria," were figured on it, with various flowers. In front of this arch, ranged on each side of the road, was a great number of waggons, which were occupied by the juvenile population of the town of both sexes, who evidently, from their exclamations, were highly delighted at the opportunity thus considerately afforded them of getting a peep at their Queen. They raised their little voices in the most joyous exclamations. These applauders of their Sovereign were the boys and girls belonging to the different charitable institutions of instruction in the neighbourhood, including those of the church of England and every other religious denomination. Within the town itself the same loyal feeling was manifested as at Northampton. The houses were gaily decorated, evergreens and flowers being mixed together with admirable variety and taste. Here, as at Northampton, the inhabitants had resolved to make the day one of jubilee. The whole of the population lined the streets through which her Majesty passed. Her Majesty arrived at Kettering, as before stated, about a quarter-past two o'clock, having been preceded there by the Marquis of Exeter, who reached the place ten minutes sooner on horseback, and whose arrival in advance served as a signal to the multitude of the approach of their beloved Sovereign. Her Majesty's carriages drove up to the White Hart Hotel, where suitable preparations for the occasion had been made. During the change of horses which here took place, her Majesty and suite alighted, passing (in their way to the apartments which had been prepared for them) through the entrance hall of the hotel, which was lined with elegantly dressed ladies.

Her Majesty, during her progress through Kettering, was received with the most loyal acclamations; and on her alighting during the change of horses at the White Hart, the shouts of welcome with which she was greeted were deafening in the extreme. On her Majesty's alighting, the band of the Kettering Yeomanry struck up "God save the Queen," and simultaneously the whole of the multitude about the place joined in the chorus. The evening closed at Kettering as harmoniously as the day began; this occasion, which will never be forgotten by the inhabitants, being celebrated by a public dinner in the evening, at which the healths of the Queen and Prince Albert were toasted with the utmost enthusiasm.

About half-past two o'clock her Majesty left Kettering, amidst the cheers and blessings of the population, on her way to Weldon, escorted by a body of the Kettering Yeomanry, under the command of Lieutenant Booth.

At a distance of two miles from Kettering is the village of Weekley, on the right of which stands Boughton House, the ancient seat of the Buccleuch family. A fine view of the magnificent front of this mansion is obtained from the road. An arch was erected in the village.—(See page 308.)

The scenery here is extremely beautiful, and the attractions of the locality are much increased by the remarkably fine timber with which the domain is studded. It is estimated that on the Boughton estate there are avenues of elm trees extending to no less than forty miles, all of which, now in full growth, it is said were planted by an ancestor of the present duke, who, from his peculiar taste, obtained the soubriquet of "John the Planter."

Perhaps the most interesting locality throughout her Majesty's journey on Tuesday was that which immediately succeeded to the one just described.

At about one mile distant from Weekley is situated the village of Geddington, where still exists, in a remarkably fine state of preservation, one of those beautiful crosses erected by the pious zeal of King Edward, in memory of his beloved Queen Eleanor, at the different stages where her remains rested on their route from the north to the metropolis. Only three of those interesting memorials now exist—one within two miles of Northampton, one near St. Albans, and another is situated as above described, in the centre of the village of Geddington. The latter, however, unlike the other two, is in a perfect state of preservation.

The route from Geddington for a distance of five miles is rather uninteresting, and nothing occurred worthy remark till they reached the ancient town of Weldon—now dwindled to a village. Here the Royal party again changed horses. An arch of tasteful design was erected here.—See page 308.) It was gaily decorated with evergreens. At the King's Arms, where the horses were changed, a small arch of evergreens was erected, and no less than five flags hung from different parts of the premises. One bore the arms of the Winchilsea family, and one those of Lord Exeter. There was also a flag bearing a loyal inscription, and two others. Of course a vast concourse of persons had assembled here also, by whom her Majesty was most enthusiastically cheered. Both her Majesty and the Prince acknowledged the salutations of the people most kindly.

A little further on, between Weldon and Balwick, the Royal party passed the seat of the Earl of Cardigan, at Dean Park. Here a very large and handsome arch was thrown across the road. It was an imitation of masonry, and very happily executed.—(See page 308.)

But a more interesting sight here was the junction of Lord Cardigan's tenantry, who mustered in great numbers by the roadside, and fell in in with the Royal cortège. They saluted her Majesty with hearty cheers.

By this time the followers of the Royal party had very considerably increased. At every point on the wayside some few additions were made of horsemen or vehicles, and the appearance of such a large body, proceeding at so rapid a rate, preceded by the soldiers and the Royal carriages, with the out-riders in their scarlet coats, was particularly striking.

The next place of any importance which her Majesty reached, after leaving Weldon, was the village of Balwick, a long, straggling, winding street, not very favourable to the rapid movement of a large body of people. Here there was a triumphal arch (See page 309);—the houses were decorated, the wayside lined with people, and the windows swarmed with faces. As the Royal party passed through, the inhabitants cheered most enthusiastically. In the centre of Balwick there is a bridge over the Welland. Here also many people were collected.

Shortly after the Royal party passed the seat of the Earl of Carbery, Laxton-park, and a little farther on, Fineshade-hall, the seat of Colonel Monckton. At this place another party of Lancers was ready to escort her Majesty. They fell in, and the previous escort returned.

From Fineshade to Duddington, at which the property of Lord Exeter commences, the distance is short, the country flat, and not very interesting, except on the present occasion, from the numbers of people who, notwithstanding the rain, thronged to see the Queen. At a short distance on this side of Duddington, the Royal cortège received another accession. The Marquis of Exeter had requested the whole of his tenantry to mount and form in line at this place on either side of the way, to receive her Majesty. The nature of the road happens to be favourable to such a display, as it suddenly widens at this part. At Duddington, a very splendid arch had been erected by the noble Marquis. There were also two smaller arches. In the village itself there was a number of decorations, and the inhabitants assembled in crowds. The houses were decorated with evergreens and flags. The children of a large school were placed on a sort of platform in front of one of the houses, bearing flags and a banner inscribed "Long live the Queen, bless Victoria and Prince Albert."

As the Royal carriages advanced towards the appointed spot, the tenants, to the number of between 400 and 500, were seen drawn up. They presented a really imposing sight. Having saluted her Majesty with a hearty cheer as she passed by, they followed, headed by Mr. Higgs, Lord Exeter's steward, in the wake of the Royal carriages on to Burleigh.

With this immense accession, the Royal cortège had grown into an enormous moving column, swelled by the addition of multitudes of vehicles. The effect, as seen from a short distance, was really grand. On no occasion during these Royal visits, has her Majesty met with a reception or with an escort more worthy of the loyalty of the gentry and yeomen of England.

From Duddington to Stamford, a distance of about five miles, the road presented a continuous scene of excitement and enthusiasm. It is scarcely necessary to repeat that the wayside was filled, at intervals, with people and with vehicles of every kind, from the carriages of the gentry down to the humblest cart. The same scene that had presented itself all the way down was repeated here, except that it was on a much larger scale from the greater number of people collected.

At Easton, a small village close to Stamford, there was a triumphal arch; and at Wolthorpe there was a splendid triumphal arch erected at the expense of the Marquis of Exeter. There were spires to the turrets which formed the sides of the arch, and in the centre the Royal arms.—(See page 308.) This point commands almost the only good prospect on the road. There is a good view of a part of Stamford, and of the fine steeples of the churches, some of which are of particularly handsome architectural design.

From Wolthorpe to Stamford the distance is very short. At the entrance to the borough a handsome arch was erected, and also an enormous platform by the side of the road, for the accommodation of visitors and residents. It was surmounted by a flag, and inscribed, "Long live the Queen!" There must have been some 2000 or 3000 people there. It is needless to say that they cheered her Majesty most warmly as she passed. As the progress of the Royal cortège was necessarily somewhat slower, owing to the conflux of people, those who were stationed on the platform must have had a good view of the Queen. This platform extended to the corner of the road as it enters Stamford, the road to Burleigh turning off to the right.

STAMFORD.

The Mayor and Corporation of the borough of Stamford met her Majesty and Prince Albert at the boundary of the borough on the Worthorpe road to the Burleigh Lodges. The members of the clubs and lodges who accompanied the Mayor and Magistrates' procession, proceeded on the road towards Worthorpe, where they formed in single lines on each side. On the arrival of the Queen, the municipal authorities formed in procession and escorted her Majesty to the Burleigh Lodges in the following order:—The clergy, gentry, and inhabitants, four abreast; the members of the council, the magistrates, the mayor with his mace-bearers, and the several clubs and lodges, with their regalia and bands, bringing up the rear. When her Majesty arrived opposite the Burleigh Lodges, the procession filed off on either side of the road.

The poor of Stamford and St. Martin's were regaled at the expense of their more wealthy neighbours, who collected a fund for the purpose by subscription, and at the Town Hall, the Blue Coat School, and a large and vacant house in Broad-street, committees have been sitting to carry out the arrangements.

Of course the town of Stamford itself was in a high state of excitement. The Corporation held a meeting, at which an address was agreed to; and instead of an illumination, there was a subscription for an entertainment to the school children and the poor of Stamford, to which the Marquis of Exeter has given £50. The houses in Stamford, even where the Queen did not pass, were decorated with evergreens and hung with flags. There was an arch thrown across the street, opposite the George Hotel (Whincup's.)

In the evening about 150 of the chief tenants dined at the George, as guests of the Marquis of Exeter. A great number of the tenantry also dined by the Marquis's invitation at the other inns in the town.

At the other boundary of the town, on the way to Burleigh, there was a very beautiful triumphal arch, handsomely decorated and inscribed "Long live the Queen." Of course, the streets were filled with people, and the houses also swarmed with anxious and excited faces. From many of the houses handsome flags were hung, and the windows were decorated with evergreens. Her Majesty's reception here was most enthusiastic. At the boundary of the borough of Stamford, the Mayor and chief members of the Corporation were assembled to receive her Majesty. They formed, together with the trades of the town, carrying banners and different devices, a long procession. They preceded the Royal carriages at a walking pace round by Dr. Arnold's house, and so on towards Burleigh, to the other boundary of the town. The arch here was illuminated.—(Two of these arches, and the corporation procession, are engraved at page 309.)

A few hundred yards beyond this large triumphal arch is the entrance to the magnificent mansion of the Marquis of Exeter. The grand entrance-gate was very handsomely decorated. There was also the preparation for its illumination at night, with the words, "Long live the Queen," and a splendid crown in variegated lamps on each side.—(See page 312.)

ARRIVAL OF HER MAJESTY AND PRINCE ALBERT AT BURGHLEY.

A second time, ye ancient halls!
  A Queen hath been your guest—
How many a change since first your walls
  A monarch did invest!
A blotted page in History's book
  Stands 'twixt that day and now,—
But Mem'ry must not pausing look
  On it; but let Hope's brow
With her bright star VICTORIA, beam
  And dissipate all gloom—
The present makes the past a dream,
  Resentment's in the Tomb,
And nothing lives throughout the land
  But one, wild joyous song,
In which all bless with heart and hand
  Our Queen! may she live long!

W.

THE QUEEN and Prince Albert arrived at Burghley House at half-past four o'clock in the afternoon. They were received by the noble marquis and marchioness, whose guests they are to be. The Marquis of Exeter arrived nearly three-quarters of an hour in advance of her Majesty, having, after meeting her Majesty at Weedon, preceded her Majesty at a rapid pace in order to be in time to receive her at Burghley.

Immediately on her arrival, her Majesty was conducted by the noble host and hostess to the apartments prepared for her reception. Altogether this reception of the Queen in Northamptonshire has been as gratifying as any her Majesty has received in her different progresses. Nothing could exceed the loyalty of the people all along the line. Even the unfavourable state of the weather did not deter the people from assembling, although of course they were not in such numbers as they would have been.

Her Majesty saluted the Marchioness very affectionately on her arrival.

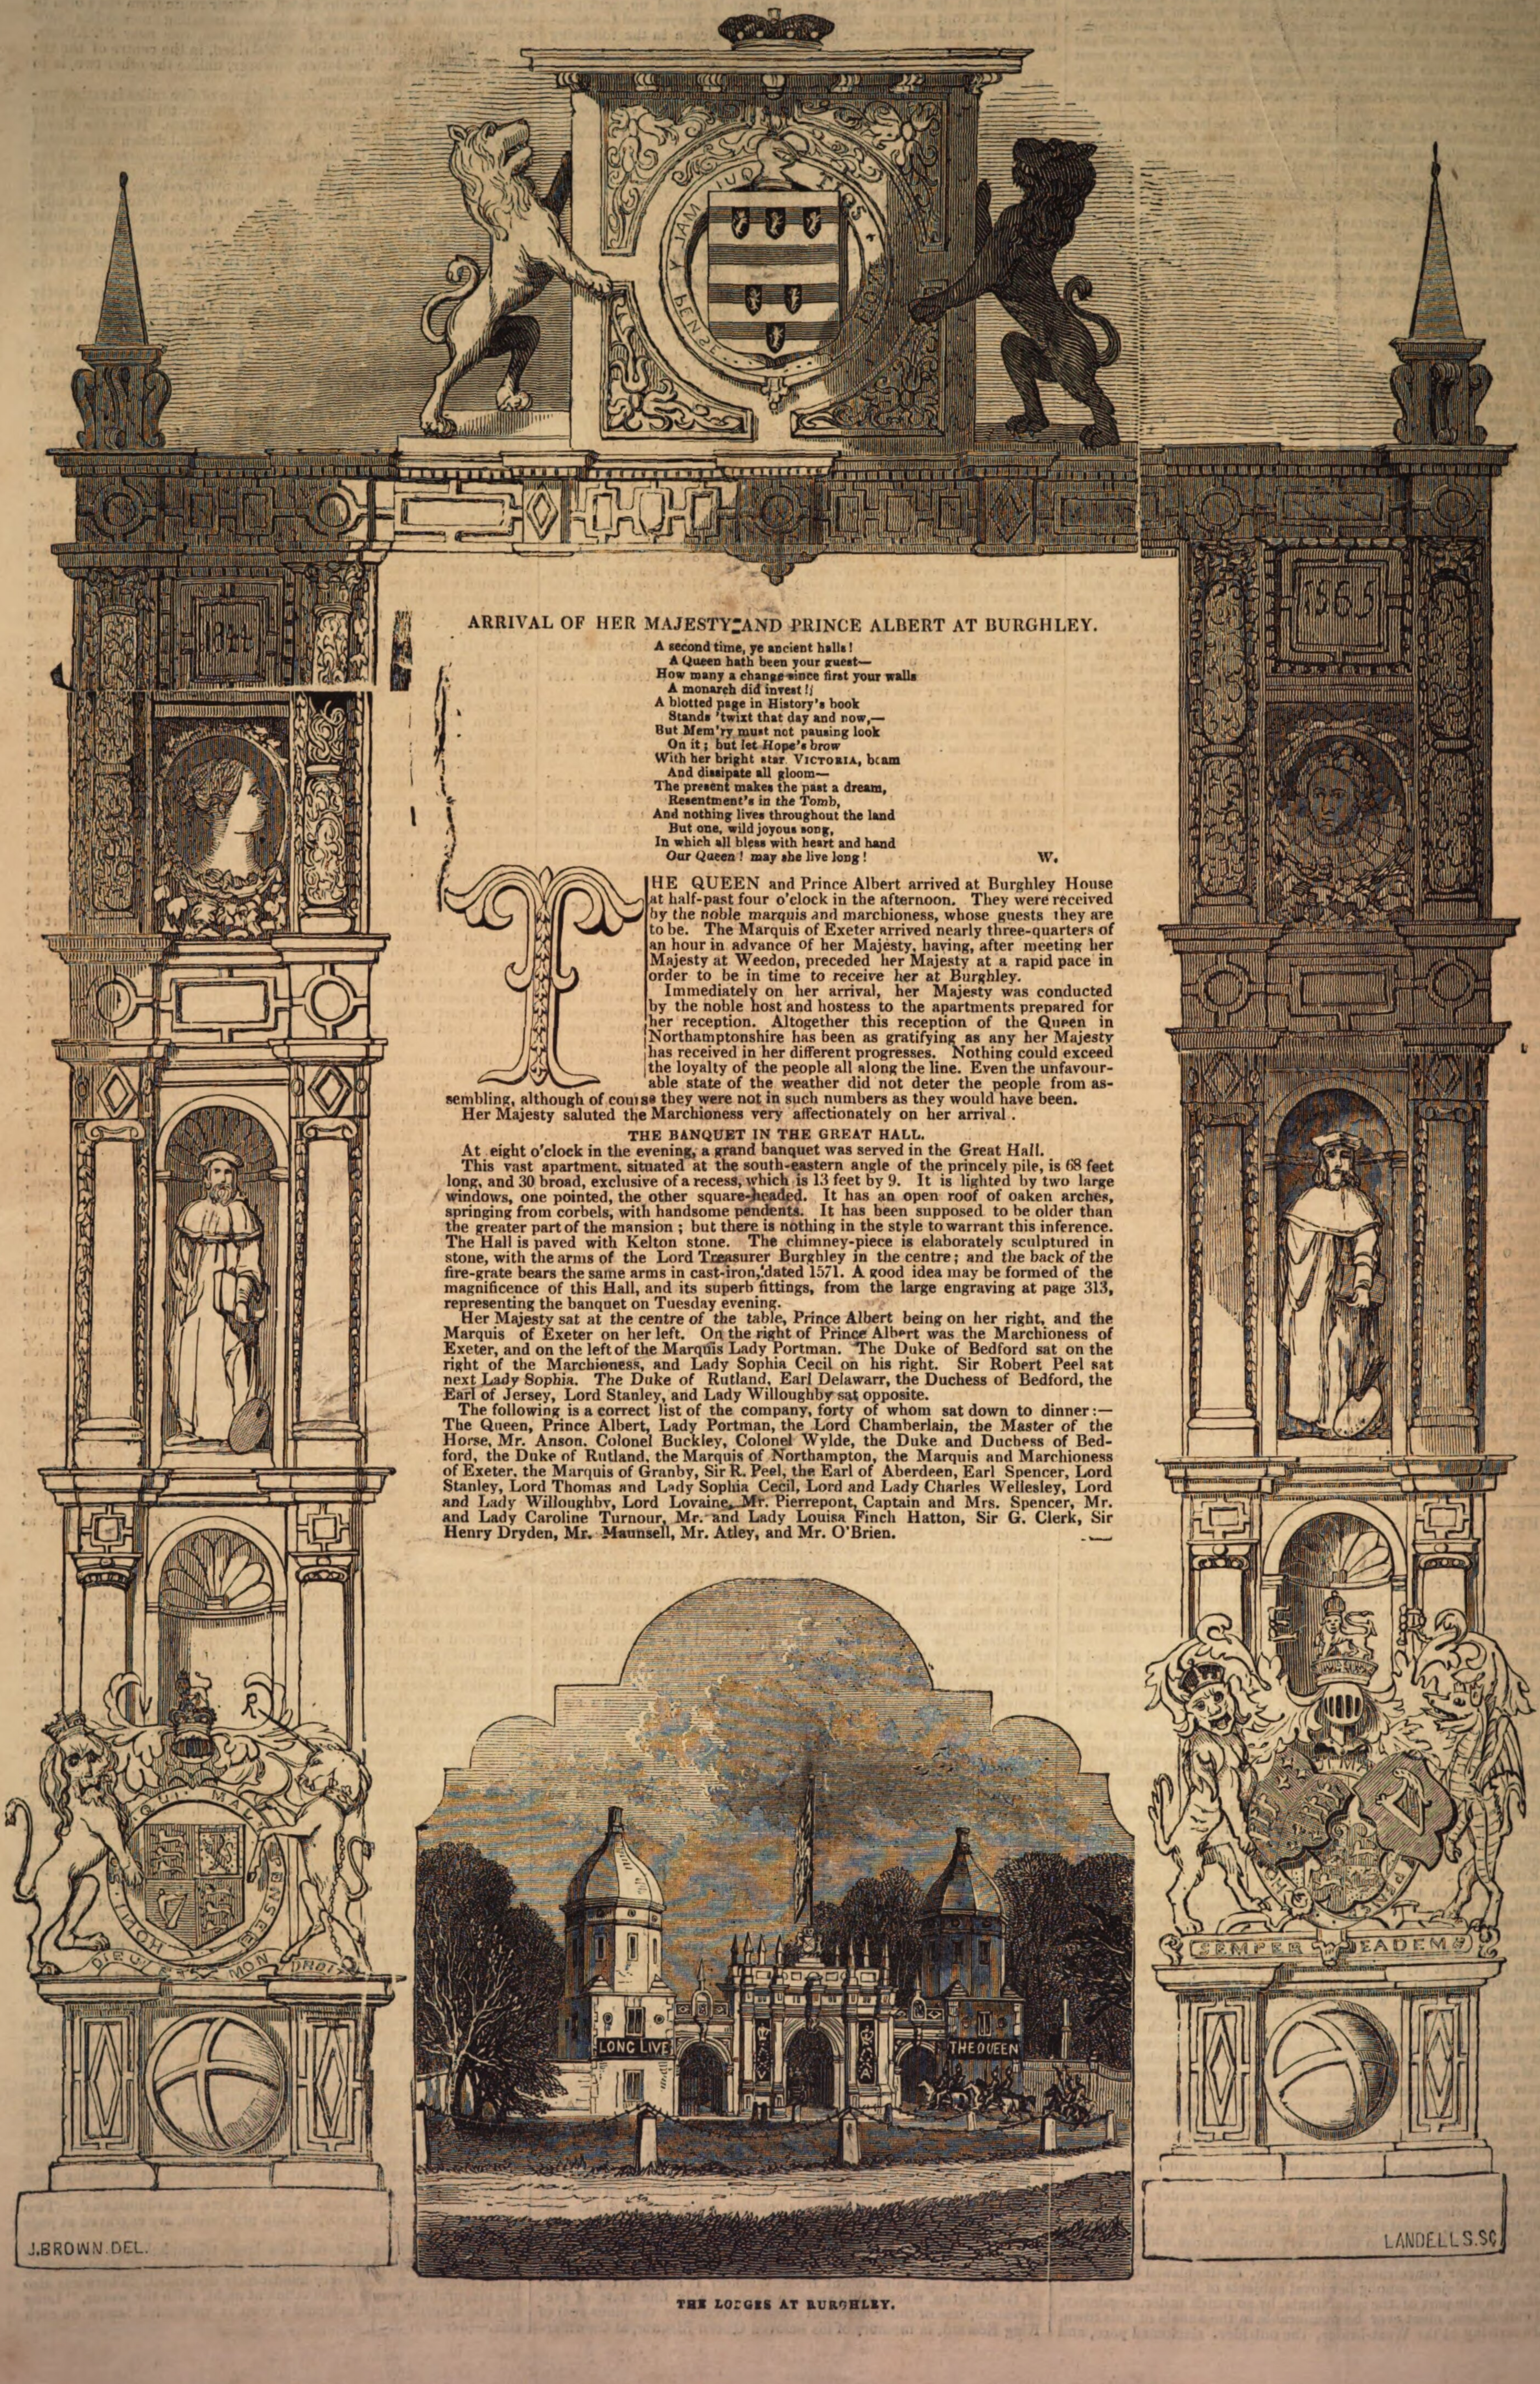
THE BANQUET IN THE GREAT HALL.

At eight o'clock in the evening, a grand banquet was served in the Great Hall.

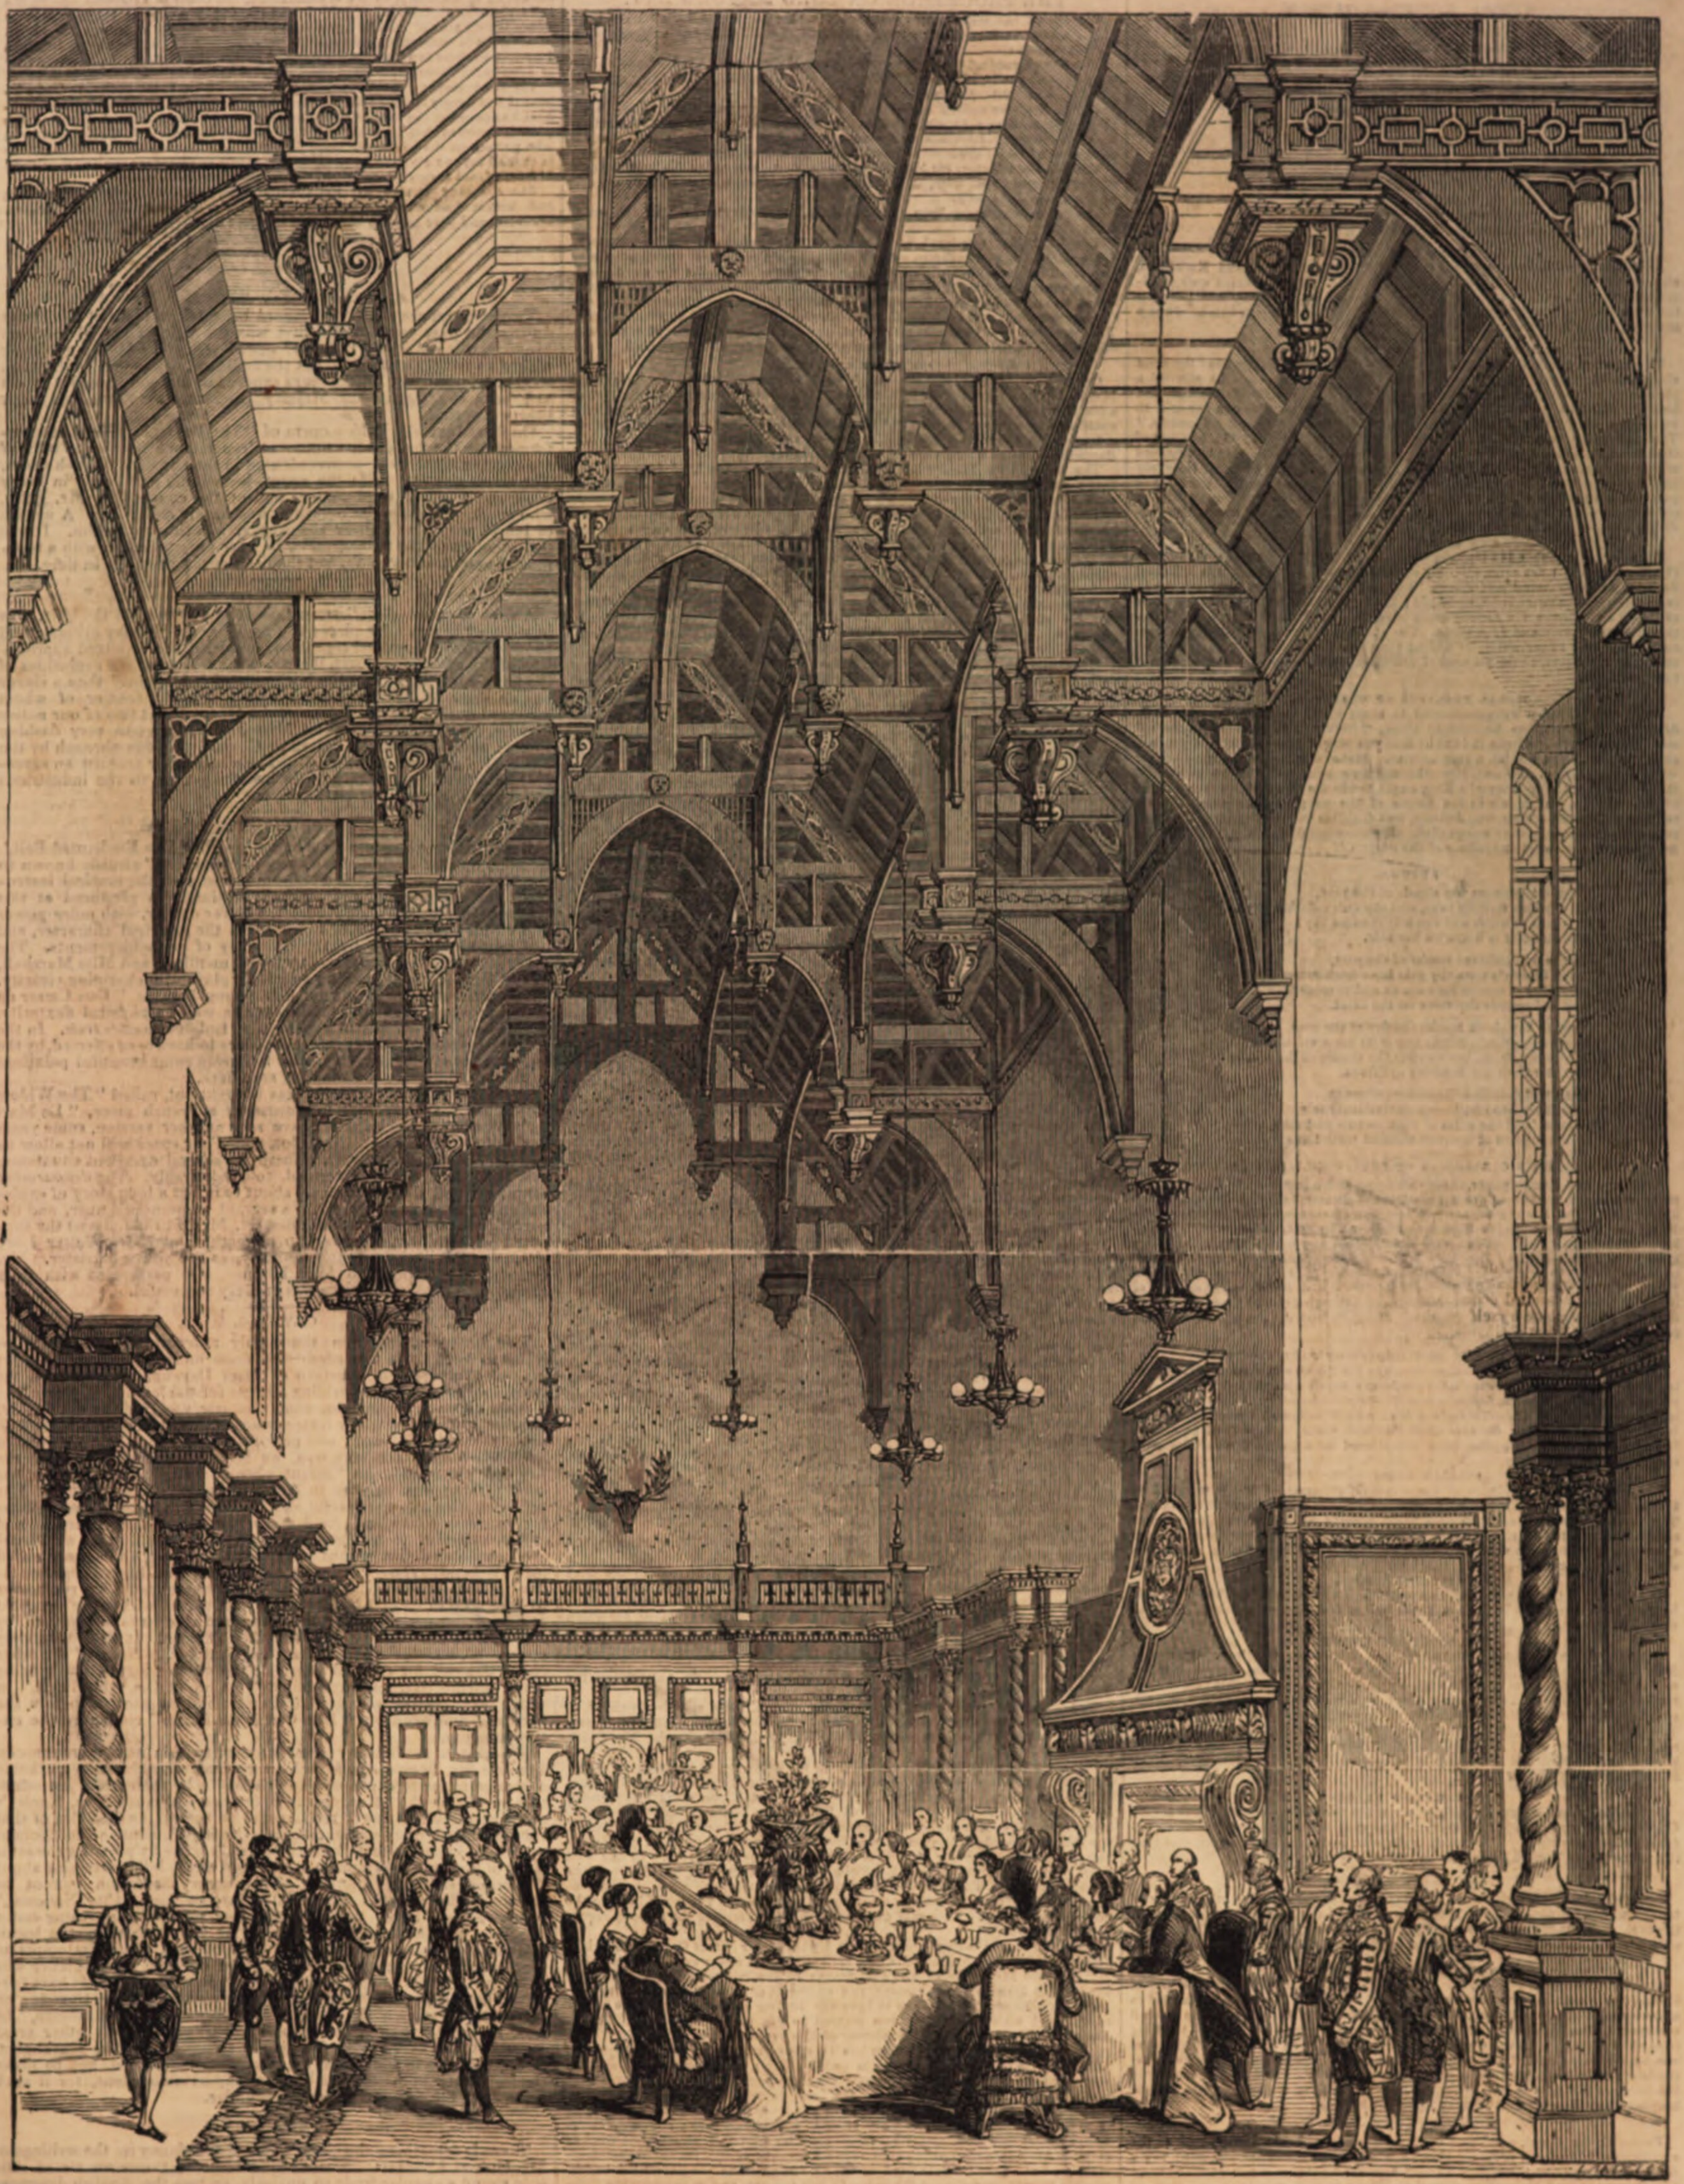
This vast apartment, situated at the south-eastern angle of the princely pile, is 68 feet long, and 30 broad, exclusive of a recess, which is 13 feet by 9. It is lighted by two large windows, one pointed, the other square-headed. It has an open roof of oaken arches, springing from corbels, with handsome pendents. It has been supposed to be older than the greater part of the mansion; but there is nothing in the style to warrant this inference. The Hall is paved with Kelton stone. The chimney-piece is elaborately sculptured in stone, with the arms of the Lord Treasurer Burghley in the centre; and the back of the fire-grate bears the same arms in cast-iron, dated 1571. A good idea may be formed of the magnificence of this Hall, and its superb fittings, from the large engraving at page 313, representing the banquet on Tuesday evening.

Her Majesty sat at the centre of the table, Prince Albert being on her right, and the Marquis of Exeter on her left. On the right of Prince Albert was the Marchioness of Exeter, and on the left of the Marquis Lady Portman. The Duke of Bedford sat on the right of the Marchioness, and Lady Sophia Cecil on his right. Sir Robert Peel sat next Lady Sophia. The Duke of Rutland, Earl Delawarr, the Duchess of Bedford, the Earl of Jersey, Lord Stanley, and Lady Willoughby sat opposite.

The following is a correct list of the company, forty of whom sat down to dinner:—The Queen, Prince Albert, Lady Portman, the Lord Chamberlain, the Master of the Horse, Mr. Anson, Colonel Buckley, Colonel Wylde, the Duke and Duchess of Bedford, the Duke of Rutland, the Marquis of Northampton, the Marquis and Marchioness of Exeter, the Marquis of Granby, Sir R. Peel, the Earl of Aberdeen, Earl Spencer, Lord Stanley, Lord Thomas and Lady Sophia Cecil, Lord and Lady Charles Wellesley, Lord and Lady Willoughby, Lord Lovaine, Mr. Pierrepont, Captain and Mrs. Spencer, Mr. and Lady Caroline Turnour, Mr. and Lady Louisa Finch Hatton, Sir G. Clerk, Sir Henry Dryden, Mr. Maunsell, Mr. Atley, and Mr. O'Brien.



THE LODGES AT BURGHLEY.



THE BANQUET IN THE GREAT HALL, AT BURGHLEY.

In the recess of the bay-window stands a superb wine cooler or cistern of massive silver, weighing 3800 ounces. Upon a sideboard at the south end of the room, beneath a remarkably fine window, ornamented with richly stained glass, representing the family arms and the insignia of the Most Noble Order of the Garter, was a magnificent display of gold plate, some of which was presented to the family by King James II., Queen Anne, and George I.

At the north end of the room, at an elevation of upwards of twelve feet, is the Music Gallery, capable of accommodating about fifty performers, and it is said that there are few rooms in the kingdom more excellently constructed to give effect to musical sounds.

The Hall is lighted by superb Gothic chandeliers, in character with the decorations of the apartment, which are suspended from the roof.

Among the fine pictures upon the walls, is a portrait of Prince Albert, which was only hung up the previous day. The hall was lighted with ten splendid chandeliers.

The band of the Coldstream Guards was stationed in the gallery, and performed several pieces of music.

After dinner, her Majesty retired to the Drawing-room. The band was stationed in one adjoining, and performed various airs.

The Queen entered the dining-room at a quarter past eight o'clock, the band playing the Anthem. The only healths given were "The Queen" (after which the band played the Anthem), and "Prince Albert" (Coburg March).

Her Majesty retired from the dining-room about half-past nine o'clock, and from the drawing-room a quarter before eleven o'clock.

HER MAJESTY'S APARTMENTS.

The gates of the entrance porch are of a highly decorative arabesque pattern of bronze richly gilt, and approached by a flight of semicircular steps, which were covered, as well as the vestibule and the various corridors, with crimson cloth.

All the apartments are exceedingly lofty and of large proportions; those set apart for her Majesty and Prince Albert are on the south side of the edifice, and commanding a series of delightful views over the surrounding country, and immediately in front a sloping lawn and beautiful sheet of water.

Her Majesty's apartments were fitted up in the most costly and recherché style. They are approached by the grand staircase, at the bottom of which are two large and massive bronze vases, and in the centre a bust of Queen Elizabeth. The approach is between four pillars of lofty proportions, the walls being hung with tapestry, and the recesses ornamented with sculptures. At the top of the staircase is the ante-room, and beyond this the Queen's Drawing Room. The suite opens beyond this into the Queen and his Royal Highness' private apartments, all the decorations of which are of the most elaborate and costly description. The fauteuils, ottomans, couches, &c., are of the richest velvet, and the fittings of the dressing-rooms of silver-gilt.

On the ground-floor, at the foot of the grand staircase, is the Break-

EVERY BODY'S COLUMN.

WOMAN'S LOVE.

Man knows not love—such love as woman feels.
In him it is a vast devouring flame—
Resistless fed—in its own strength consum'd.
In woman's heart it enters step by step,
Conceal'd, disown'd, until its gentler ray
Breathes forth a light, illumining her world.
Man loves not for repose; he woos the flow'r
To wear it as the victor's trophied crown;
Whilst woman, when she glories in her love,
More like the dove, in noiseless constancy,
Watches the nest of her affection, till
'Tis shed upon the tomb of him she loves.

A NEW REAPING MACHINE.

A letter from Warsaw states, that Messieurs Tymerzszki and Kaczynski, engineers of that city, had just invented a reaping machine, which worked admirably, and in less than an hour had cut down an acre of oats, and piled up the straw with as much regularity as if it had been done by the hand. Such a machine, of the largest dimensions, would cost about £300.

OLD WOMEN EXCLUDED FROM PARADISE.

The greatest and best of men (may the Almighty shower on his head the most abundant blessings!) sometimes joked, but seldom; and when he allowed a pleasantry to escape him, it was sure to be in an adroit and indirect manner, and he never departed from strict truth. It is told of him, that he one day said to an old woman, "At the day of resurrection no old woman shall enter Paradise." The old woman, very much troubled, said in a sorrowful tone, "Oh, prophet of God, what faults have we poor old women committed, that we should be deprived of the happiness of entering Paradise?" The elect of God (may all Heavenly blessings repose on him!) smiled, and withdrawing the ruby veil which hid the pearls of his teeth, said, "The Creator, may He be glorified! will make all the old women young again, and will thus introduce them into Paradise."—Pidding's Chinese Olio.

THE GERMAN THEATRES.

There are altogether 115 German theatres, with 3,175 dramatic performers (1,870 actors and 1,305 actresses), 147 singers (89 male 58 female), 174 principal dancers, 2,089 orchestral performers. The entire number of persons employed in the German theatres is about 12,769; the most numerous orchestre are those of Berlin and Vienna, the former comprising 95, and the latter (the Karthnerthor Theatre) consists of 77 persons. The smallest orchestra is that of Marburg, comprising only 12 persons. By adding the singers, and most of the directors and stage managers, to the number of dramatic actors, the whole would amount to about 3,600.

MORAL PRECEPTS OF GUSTAVUS.

Gustavus of Sweden was accustomed to instil moral precepts into his children. On one occasion he said to them, "Be steady in your faith—united amongst yourselves. If you fail in the first you anger your Maker; if you neglect the second you will fall a prey to man. Make war by compulsion—peace without compulsion. Be no idlers—the morning hour has gold in its mouth. Remember that the memory of a King ought not to die away with the sound of his funeral bells, but remain in the hearts of the people." In person he was tall and well made, strong, but delicate, and faultless in every respect. His firmness and perseverance were unequalled. He was careful of money, "For," said he, "it costs the sweat and labour of the subject."

AUTUMN.

Thou art come on the clouds of the year,
With thy rich flowing robe, and thy quick flashing eye,
Fair regent of earth and the bright azure sky!
And summer is borne on her bier.

To the unnumbered tombs of the past,
Though beauty's tiara thy pale brow hath crowned,
The symbol of mourning hath twined it around,
And sad sounds thy voice on the blast.

Though thy cheek mocks the dye of the rose,
Like consumption's bright hue is its too vivid bloom,
And o'er thy proud brow sweep the shades of the tomb;
The tear from thy beaming eye flows.

Thou wilt fade like the visions of youth,
Too brilliant—too frail—too endazzlingly fair
To bloom 'mid the gales of dark sorrow and care,
In the regions of tempest-throned truth!

HER MAJESTY'S CORRECTION OF LOUIS PHILIPPE'S ENGLISH.

According to a French paper, Louis Philippe in his late visit to England, had made extempore replies to the corporations of Portsmouth and Windsor; but having learnt that it was customary to communicate before hand in writing the Royal words addressed to the Lord Mayor of the City of London, he said, laughing, "This time I shall act as a constitutional King; let M. Guizot write my answer." The Minister of Foreign Affairs set to work, and then gave the answer to M. de Jarnac to translate. The morceau being finished it was sent to the King, who requested Queen Victoria to peruse it and give him her opinion of it. Her Majesty approved of the speech, observing only that there were some words in it that were not quite English. She then took up her pen, and herself corrected it.

THE STONE IN THE NEW HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT.

The Bolsover quarries, from which the stone for the new Houses of Parliament is procured, and several others that have been recently opened in the neighbourhood, contain about twelve feet of workable stone, in numerous bands from eight inches to two feet thick. This stone is of a light yellowish lemon colour. It is not expensive, being cheaper than Portland stone, and worked as easily; but it does not seem to have been much used at a distance from Bolsover, except in slabs for paving.

ITALIAN STATISTICS.

The commission of statistics of the scientific congress of Milan reported to that body that there are 70 savings banks in Italy, having 40,000,000f. deposited. The same commission declares that there are 114 houses of refuge for poor children, where 13,600 children are nourished and educated, at an expense of 470 000f., collected from voluntary contributions. The Papal States are not included in this account.

THE CHINESE DUN.

It is said that the Chinese test, to a fraction, the capacity of a debtor's means, by sending a man to sit in his house and look at him till he pays or is driven to despair.

THE SCOTT MONUMENT.

On Saturday week the topmost stone was placed on Scott's monument at Edinburgh, with appropriate ceremony, thus exhibiting, in its full proportions, and in all the richness of its light and elegant Gothic tracery, a structure which, for beauty of design and imposing effect, is admittedly unsurpassed, if even equalled, by any similar commemorative or ornamental building in Europe. The Union Jack was immediately after hoisted on the summit, where it floated until the close of day. A bottle of brandy was also drawn up, and the first glass dedicated with all solemnity to this masterpiece of architecture, "the Monument to Sir Walter Scott."

GUY FAWKES'S LANTERN.

In the Bodleian Library, Oxford, is yet extant the lantern with which it is said Guy Fawkes intended to perpetrate the blowing up of the House of Lords, on the 5th of November, 1605. It bears an inscription in Latin to that effect, and that it was the gift of Robert Heywood.

THE HOUSE SPARROW.

Some will doubtless smile when they are told that sparrows are, when properly taught, admirable song birds. Taken when callow (this is indispensable) from the nest, and brought up under a canary in fine voice, they have been known not only to equal, but even to surpass, their masters in brilliancy of execution.

SHAKSPEARE'S RESIDENCE.

A correspondent of "Fraser's Magazine" gives the following account of Shakspeare's house at Stratford-on-Avon:—"We sallied out before breakfast to make a rough survey of the place. A man was cleaning a gutter before a small tenement in Henley-street. On looking up we observed a sign-board abutting from the building, with the significant inscription, "The Immortal Shakspeare was born in this house." We stood for some time uncovered, and looked reverentially on the birth-place of so great a man. One of the few facts known about the father of the poet is his being amerced, in 1558, in the sum of 4d., for not keeping clean the gutter in front of his dwelling."

ROYAL ECONOMY.

Frederick the Great, sending a minister to Denmark who complained of the smallness of his salary, and said that he could keep neither an equipage nor a table, the King's remark to him was—"You are a prodigal; you ought to know that it is more healthy to go on foot than it is to go in a carriage; and that, so far as eating is concerned, another man's table is always the best."

THE CHAMELEON.

It is a common delusion to suppose that the food of the chameleon is the air. It lives on more substantial diet; but this supposition may have arisen from the following circumstance:—The lungs are exceedingly voluminous, and these the creature is able to fill with air, so as to puff itself up, and in this state it often remains for hours, without any movement of respiration being perceptible; on exhausting the lungs of the air, the sides of the body fall in, and the frame has a meagre appearance till the lungs are again inflated, when it becomes suddenly bloated as before.

STATISTICS OF THE BAR.

It appears by an examination of the records of admission to the bar by the four inns of court—Lincoln's Inn, the Inner Temple, the Middle Temple, and Gray's Inn—that at the present time there are no less than 2243 members of the bar. Of this number, 7 were called above 50 years since, 17 between 45 and 50 years since, 28 from 40 to 45 years ago, 122 from 1804 up to 1814, from 1814 up to 124, the number is 308. Of those who were called 10 to 20 years since, there are now 701 members of the bar, and of those called during the last ten years, there are no less than 1100 who appear as members of the bar at the present time.

THE PROCESSION ON LORD MAYOR'S DAY.

We repeat the following account of the procession and banquet on Lord Mayor's Day, as, from the lateness of the hour, it could of course only appear in our last edition:—

This day (Saturday) being the period so well known as Lord Mayor's Day the City, and particularly the neighbourhood of Guildhall, presented a scene of bustle and interest from an early hour.

The Lord Mayor arrived at Guildhall a few minutes past ten o'clock in his state carriage, drawn by six beautiful bay horses. His lordship was received with loud cheers, intermixed with some hisses. The splendour and chasteness of the state liveries attracted universal attention and admiration.

The late Lord Mayor, Sir William Magnay, Bart., arrived in his private state carriage, drawn by six bays, at 11 o'clock. He was most enthusiastically cheered by the assembled crowd.

The procession having been marshalled, left at twelve o'clock, in the usual order.

The Lord Mayor entered his state carriage, attended by the Swordbearer, Macebearer, and other officers, exactly at twelve o'clock. His appearance was the signal for great uproar; but the accounts upon this point are conflicting.

The procession passed down the Poultry, part of Cheapside, and Queen-street, and arrived at Southwark-bridge shortly before one o'clock, where the Corporation embarked on board the state barges, and proceeded to Westminster The crowd, at this time, was very great, but not the least personal insult was offered to the chief magistrate, who repeatedly bowed to those assembled.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

On arriving at Westminster, the Lord Mayor, attended by the late Lord Mayor, the Recorder, the Sheriffs, Aldermen T. Wood, Farncombe, and Challis, a few Common Councilmen, and the usual civic authorities, were ushered into court shortly after half-past one o'clock, and were received by a full Court, consisting of the Lord Chief Baron, Mr. Baron Parke, Mr. Baron Gurney, and Mr. Baron Rolfe, all of whom wore their scarlet robes.

The Recorder, in introducing Mr. Alderman Gibbs, the Lord Mayor, to the Court, entered into a recapitulation of the offices that gentleman had filled in connection with the City of London for a period of eighteen years.

The Lord Chief Baron, in very high terms, congratulated the Lord Mayor on his election, and expressed a confidence he would discharge the duties he had undertaken to the full and perfect satisfaction of his fellow-citizens. The learned Judge also congratulated Sir W. Magnay upon the conclusion of his year of office, and upon the well-deserved honours which he carried with him into his retirement.

Proclamation was then made by the officer of the court for Sir William Magnay, the late Lord Mayor, to come forth and render an account of all issues, profits, &c., which had come to his hands in his office of escheator of the Crown.

Sir William Magnay immediately presented himself.

Mr. Baron Parke, (as senior puisne baron) administered to him the following oath, the terms of which excited some laughter, in consequence of the reference made to the subject of accounts, the expressions being considered as somewhat appropriately applying to the present Lord Mayor:—

"Sir William Magnay, you, as late mayor and escheator of the City of London and suburbs of the same, shall swear that you shall yield to her present Majesty a true and faithful account of the issues and profits of your office as escheator, due to her Majesty, from the 8th day of November, in the seventh year of her said Majesty's reign, until the 8th day of November, in the eighth year of her Majesty's reign—that is to say, for one whole year; and in the same account you shall make a true answer of all felons' goods, outlawed men's goods, waifes, strayes, and other profits whatsoever, which have come to your hands or to the hands of any of your deputies or ministers, by reason of your said office of escheator, or by reason of her said Majesty's prerogative royal; and in the same account you shall charge yourself with all such sums of money as you, or any of your deputies or ministers for you, have levied to her Majesty's use; and furthermore, you shall well and truly behave yourself in yielding the same account, as a true accountant ought to do, without omission or concealment—so help you God."

The usual oaths having been administered to the Lord Mayor,

The Recorder then, in the usual form, invited the learned Judges to partake of the entertainment at Guildhall.

The Chief Baron replied that the invitation would be accepted by some of his learned brethren.

THE BANQUET IN THE GUILDHALL.

The guests began to arrive at half-past three o'clock; the interval between which time and the hour of dinner, half past six, being agreeably occupied with presentations in the Drawing-room (Council Chamber), and identifying the more distinguished guests as they passed through the hall. The presentations were numerous: the Lady Mayoress wore a superb brocaded white satin dress; a crimson velvet robe; head-dress, feathers, and diamonds. The Lord Mayor was in excellent spirits, and, with the Sheriffs (Aldermen Hunter and Sidney), received their guests very courteously. The recognitions of the public characters were "few and far between:" Sir James Graham was received with loud applause.

At length, the dinner-hour arrived. The Lord Mayor, with his distinguished guests, made the détour of the Hall; the Count St. Aulaire leading in the Lady Mayoress. The Lord Mayor and the Sheriffs were received with unqualified approbation. Grace having been said, the work of refection commenced: the dinner (by Lovegrove, of the London Coffee-house) was both abundant and excellent; the supply of wines was unsparing, especially Champagne. The host of applicants for the barons of beef convinced us that they were not the mere symbols of old English festivity, but the demand for them indicated a sympathy with Young England. The appearance of the hall, throughout the evening, was very brilliant: the superb cut-glass star, at the west end, was especially admired. The vast apartment was tastefully decorated with armour and flags, arranged in picturesque groups, and the ensemble reminded us of the Duke of Wellington's remark, that "it is the noblest room in Europe." Still, it has the disadvantage of being extremely ill-adapted for hearing. The comestibles being dispatched, the more intellectual enjoyment of the evening commenced; but, such was the lack of silence, and so altogethery were the company throughout the evening, that the speakers were rarely heard beyond the upper tables. Nevertheless, a spirit of unanimity pervaded the whole company, and the west responded to the east without nicety as to the topic of approbation.

On the removal of the cloth, "Non Nobis Domine" was sung by the professional ladies and gentlemen."

After the usual loyal and patriotic toasts had been drunk with the greatest enthusiasm,

The Lord Mayor proposed "The health of the greatest of living warriors, the Duke of Wellington," which was received with tremendous cheering.

His Lordship then called on the company to exhaust a bumper to the next toast, which was "Prosperity to the City of London." The toast having been drunk with the customary honours,

The Lord Mayor next proposed the health of the late Lord Mayor, for which Sir W. Magnay returned thanks.

during my year of office, not unworthily of its responsibilities, and transferred it unsullied to its present possessor." (Loud cheers.)

The Lord Mayor next proposed "The health of the Count St. Aulaire, and the Foreign Ambassadors."

The Count St. Aulaire returned thanks in French. His speech consisted of some sensible general observations in favour of peace, but he alluded more particularly to the subject in referring to the visit of Louis Philippe. The Count said:—

"Many among you heard from the lips of my sovereign the sentiments which he entertains towards England, and those which your reception inspired in him. It is in the name of all my fellow citizens that I thank you to-day, gentlemen, for that reception. Yes, gentlemen, all Frenchmen, whatever may be their opinions or their position in society, have felt deeply, and they will long remember, the kind sentiments expressed by you towards the representative of the French nation. With the people of antiquity hospitality was a religion. In our own days, its rights, its duties, and the sentiments which it inspires, have lost nothing of their potency. The people of England and France have cause to rejoice in seeing the sovereigns of the two most powerful nations in the world become the hosts of each other. They may consider it as one guarantee the more in favour of general peace."

The Lord Mayor having proposed the health of Sir James Graham, the right honourable baronet in acknowledging the compliment spoke in these terms:—

"My Lord Mayor, ladies, and gentlemen: In the unavoidable absence of the head of her Majesty's Government, and on behalf of my colleagues and myself, I rise with the greatest pleasure to have the honour of returning thanks for the compliment which you have been pleased to pay to her Majesty's Ministers. From the earliest period of the history of this free country, to deserve the approbation of the citizens of London has ever been among the highest objects of ambition with all men taking part in public affairs; and to obtain any mark of your confidence and esteem has ever been regarded, and justly regarded, an ample and honourable reward for the most faithful and efficient services. (Cheers.) The Lord Mayor has truly told you that, in such a great assembly as this, there necessarily must be a difference of political opinion; it would, therefore, be most improper and inexcusable on my part if I uttered one word or expressed one opinion which would create a division of opinion in this great assembly; but I must be permitted to say that to promote the happiness, to sustain the honour, to maintain the peace of this country, and to promote the prosperity of all classes of its inhabitants, are, indeed, the constant aim and ardent desire of her Majesty's present advisers. (Cheers.) You have heard from her Majesty herself the expression of her own sentiments on this subject. The mode of attaining these great objects naturally gives rise to a difference of opinion, but her Majesty has herself declared what is the key-stone of that government which, among a free people, can never be doubted as the most beneficial and best adapted to secure its objects. Her Majesty herself declared, that "to promote the relief of the indigent, to secure the advancement of science, and to aid the extension of commerce, are the great objects of the policy of this country." To give effect to these objects shall be the constant and sedulous endeavour of her Majesty's ministers, and, by the blessing of Providence, I confidently hope that their efforts will not be altogether unavailing. (Cheers.) My Lord Mayor, with your permission I am anxious to ropose a toast, and in proposing it I rely with confidence on the justice and generosity of so large an assembly of my fellow-citize I scorn to use the language of flattery and adulation, I shall rather use the simple language of sincerity and truth; and I appeal to this great assembly, whether it be not just, whether it be not generous to anticipate that your lordship, filling the high office which you now hold by the voice of your fellow-citizens, will emulate the example of your predecessors, and honourably and faithfully fulfil the high duties and important functions of that office to which you have been elevated by the choice of the livery, by the approbation of the Court of Aldermen, and by the full and entire approbation of your Sovereign. (Loud cheers.) Feeling that he whom the citizens of London have thought worthy cannot be unworthy—(Loud cheers,)—it is with great and heartfelt satisfaction that, with your permission, I have to propose as a bumper toast, 'The health of the Lord Mayor of the City of London.' (Three times three and one cheer more.)"

The Lord Mayor, in returning thanks, said—"My lords, ladies, and gentlemen, I feel deeply indebted for the very kind manner in which Sir James Graham has done me the honour to propose my name to your notice. I feel on the present occasion that I ought to speak with deep humility. It becomes not him who putteth on the harness to boast like him who putteth it off. All I can say is that all my anxiety shall be to endeavour firmly to discharge the duties of Lord Mayor. (Loud cheers.)"

The company having left the dinner-tables, tea and coffee were served; and within half an hour sets of quadrilles were formed in the council-chamber, and were kept up with spirit for some time.

THE THEATRES.

DRURY-LANE.

Two occurrences worthy of record have taken place at this house during the past week. The first was the visit of her Majesty on Monday, when Auber's "Syren" was played. The Queen evidently wished to remain unnoticed, but the audience, with more loyalty than good taste, would not let the opera proceed until the National Anthem had been sung, when her Majesty graciously acknowledged their hearty cheering.

On Tuesday, Mr. Balfe's opera of "The Bohemian Girl" was performed for the hundredth time—a circumstance which the bills of the evening stated to be unprecedented in the annals of British opera. The house was very full; the opera, beautifully performed in every department, never went better; and at the conclusion, Mr. Balfe, who conducted upon the occasion, was loudly called for. A wreath of laurel, with small silver shamrocks, was thrown to him. It was the intention of the management to have presented him with a testimonial upon this occasion, but the list was not filled up in time.

LYCEUM.

A very pleasant divertissement, as it was termed in the bills, was introduced between the pieces at this house on Monday evening, and to judge from its cordial reception, met with the unmixed approbation of the audience. First, there was the marching and evolutions of the female warriors from the burlesque of "Aladdin:" then a clever pas de deux by Mdlles. Louise and Clara, the former of whom appeared during the last season at the Opera: next two of our native artistes, Miss Farebrother and Miss James, danced a very dashing Polka: and lastly, the "Bolero de Cadiz" was gone through by the French ladies above mentioned. The whole affair formed an agreeable interlude, and gave a little breathing-time to the industrious usual performers of this establishment.

PRINCESS'.

On Saturday evening a new ballet, called "The Enchanted Bell,' founded on that version of the story of "Aladdin," already known to the English stage, in which a bell—not a lamp—is the magical instrument for summoning the assistant genius, was produced at this theatre. Mdlle. Caroline Rousset, a clever dancer, with more power and vigour than elegance or finish, plays the principal character, and has made quite a hit by the brilliancy of her achievements. The other Roussets also deserve a favourable mention; and Miss Marshall, as the Genius, has a character which she plays with charming vivacity. The excellent performance of this young lady in "Don Cæsar de Bazan proves that she has intelligence as well as physical dexterity. Mr. Gilbert merely has to appear in an isolated pas des trois. In the scenic department a great reform appears to have been effected, by the engagement of Mr. Beverley, who has given some beautiful paintings in place of the daubs occasionally seen here.

On Wednesday a comedietta was brought out, called "The Widow Bewitched," a translation (of course) of a French piece, "Le Mari de la Veuve." We think we have seen another version, some years back, of the same piece. The plot, which our space will not allow us to detail, is smart and lively. There are several excellent situations, and the "tag," as it is termed, told admirably. The denouement having arrived, the lady appears about to inflict a long story of explanation upon the audience, when a servant announces dinner, and the narration is postponed until the dessert. Mrs. Stirling played the supposed widow, Mrs. Lorimer, to perfection; and Mr. Walter Lacy was, as usual, lively, bustling, and gay, as the young barrister. Mr. Granby, Miss Noel, and Miss Honner, also performed with their accustomed care. The piece was entirely successful.

OLYMPIC.

This house having been thoroughly redecorated and cleaned—which in good truth it needed—was once more opened on Monday evening, "under the direction of Miss Davenport," and with the charitable intention of providing a home for the legitimate drama.

After an opening address, somewhat confusedly delivered by Mr. Rayner (in place of the fair lessee, whose province it was to have done so), "Romeo and Juliet" was performed, the young lady playing the heroine. Miss Davenport was, we believe, formerly known to the London playgoers as an "infant phenomenon;" since then she has been playing with success in America and the West Indies. Her acting on Monday was careful and intelligent: she possesses a pleasing expressive face and good stage figure, but lacks passion and energy sufficient to assume any very high position. She was, however, applauded throughout by a very full house, and loudly called for at the end. Romeo met with a fine burly iron-lunged representative in Mr. Hudson Kirby, a gentleman whose name we remember to have seen in various "statements" connected with some squabble at one of the over-the-water houses: and Mercutio was played by Mr. Roxby, who was lately at the City Theatre. It was judiciously performed, but the actor's voice is against him. None of the other characters call for especial remark; the greater part of them being below mediocrity. A farce called "A Chip of the Old Block," in which Mr. Rayner appeared, followed: and we escaped before the hacknied and worn-out "Don Cæsar de Bazan" concluded the entertainments.

We cannot predict any great success to this new management. Because Mr. Phelps and Mrs. Warner have wrought so remarkable a change in the fortunes of Sadler's Wells, by the careful introduction of the works of our great dramatists—because Mrs. Keeley's name as the directress of the Lyceum so turned the destinies of that establishment—managements far inferior in judgment and component parts have imagined that like success would arrive by pursuing the same track of placing a lady's name at the head of the bills, or talking about "a home for the drama." This dreary imitation cannot be too much deprecated. The total failure of the "City National," a few weeks back, proved that the path was anything but a safe one, without a good company. At the same time, the legitimate drama loses far more than it gains by such dismal attempts to represent it. Any person watching the mass of the audience who filled the Olympic gallery on Monday evening would readily have perceived how little their sympathies were excited by the tragedy: on the contrary, when a Mr. Flexmore performed a "comic dance," he was, to their thinking, far beyond Shakspeare, or any other great dramatist that ever lived. We would recommend Miss Davenport, or any one else to whom the management is confided, not to make the legitimate drama the life-buoy of the establishment, for if such is the case, the ship will be sure to founder.

STRAND.

There is something singularly original and funny in the writings of Mr. Gilbert àBeckett. No one like him can throw an air of ridicule round a popular topic so quaintly, or toss the English language about into such a laughable confusion of puns and allusions. His pathos is remarkable: he can sink anything, albeit, certainly not by weight: and he makes the creations of romance and poetry—spirits, kings, and lovers—always appear intimately acquainted with the most common-place methods of living, or the direst destitution. Unpaid water-rates, cheap ready-made clothes, "tremendous sacrifices," and front parlours or third-pairs back, are the subjects which occupy their minds; and these antitheses are sad provocatives of your laughter. A burlesque from the pen of this gentleman, assisted by Mr. Lemon, was produced here on Monday, founded on the story of Undine, and called "The Knight and the Sprite; or, the Cold Water Cure." The story was pretty closely followed, although in the extravaganza style; and the dialogue so charged with jokes, that the audience had scarcely time to laugh at them, or even to applaud, except at the fall of the curtain, when they did so most lustily. Mrs. Walter Lacy and Mrs. Montgomerie appeared as two dashing young gentlemen, speaking every word set down for them with proper emphasis—a rare thing in the majority of burlesque performers. A very pretty young lady, with a very sweet voice, Miss Bromley, was the Ondine; and Mr. Hall, as a water-sprite with webbed hands and feet, imitating O. Smith and Wilkinson, and singing comical American banjo melodies, deserves the warmest thanks of the authors for his clever acting. The other ladies and gentlemen deserve commendation, especially Mr. Romer and Mrs. Melville. The piece has been put upon the stage with good care; and the scenery and mechanical effects are the piece. We may mention a triple pas de l'ombre as one of the best. It was announced for repetition amidst loud applause, and will, we doubt not, prove attractive.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

Are the palmy days of pageantry to be accounted among the things that have clean departed from the land? And was it for a sign and a warning that the elements arrayed themselves against its latest passage attempted by the chivalry of Eglintoun? Else would it not have been a dainty conceit for the Lord of Burghley to have fêted Victoria, as he of Leicester did Elizabeth at Kenilworth! Who so nobly could have mounted a grand Olympic spectacle, graced with the fairest of British coursers, and furnished with all befitting their estate; and would it not have been a characteristic show to set before a Queen of these isles? To be sure the weather was atrocious, and if the clouds are not lost to all sense of propriety, they must feel heartily ashamed of having thrust themselves into the way of the sun, and prevented his offering the Royal guests a warm welcome to the north. Truth to tell, festivities, al fresco, are not in the ascendant just now. If there be one month of the twelve more abhorred of Diana than another—it is November. Mountain sport is at an end, for unless men were Polar bears they cannot, at this season tolerate the Highlands—even the partridge of the valley is as fugitive and unattainable as hope. Pheasant-shooting, indeed, may be carried on by those who can command the necessaries—well-stocked manors, keepers with relays of guns, and footmen with relays of Curaçoa—but it's not every one who can go to Corinth, as the proverb says. In short the only popular fun for the furious in woodcraft, at this moment is to be met with in the vicinity of the metropolis, where the Royal hounds furnish the Citizens with a pretext for riding over each other, and the prospects of the kitchen gardens. We are the loyalest people on the face of creation, or the occupiers of the soil in the Harrow country would long since have purchased Captain Warner's combustible cure for stag-hunting. Fancy a bilious nabob retired for rural ease and undisturbance to his villa at Pinner, treated, during breakfast, to a view of three hundred distracted fellows upon horseback—one half charging across the meadow, where his daughters gather their earliest violets, and the other stuck fast in his favourite hedge, the screen of hawthorn, that turns his spring-tide to fragrance. You suppose this an extreme case?—the last stag at whose capture the penitent penner of this paragraph assisted, was secured in a lady's boudoir, standing at bay on a pink satin ottoman.

This, however, is the affair of the sufferers, those thick-and-thin patriots who take juggernauting of their lawns and gardens with a philosophy which would have astonished a Stoic. Our office is to deal with things as we find them, and, since there is such a paradise of the hunter of deer—such a nook remaining from the Golden Age—to point out its geography to all who may contemplate a pilgrimage thither. The district hunted by her Majesty's hounds is now, by means of the Great Western Railway, within two hours of every Londoner's stable. The kennel is on Ascot Heath—the meets as set forth below, with their distances from Windsor. Relieved from "the grain of salt" wherewith we have savoured it, the sport with this establishment is often excellent. Of course, there is a vast deal of road work, or MacAdaming contingent on it; but, perhaps, the majority of its habitués do not much object to it on that ground.

Davis, the huntsman, is very enthusiastic in his calling, and Lord Roslyn now gives three public days a-week. Already, they have had some capital runs, but the system of chasing the young hinds at this season is not commendable. In every respect it is characteristic of the country, in every sense of the term it is a national establishment. In appearance, the turn out is all over English—from the spotless top-boot of the Whip to the noble animal he bestrides. In its career is it not English too? for where, but in a land in which sporting is an instinct, might we hope to see such wild licence of woodcraft granted—permission to the peasant to press beneath his horse's hoof the parterres of the nobles?

TATTERSALLS.

MONDAY.—The chief feature of some reasonably brisk betting was the advance of the Cobweb colt to 22 to 1, with plenty of backers, and the retirement of Fitz Allen to 33 to 1. Several other horses were backed with considerable gust, amongst whom may be mentioned Young Eclipse, the Laird o' Cockpen, Cabin Boy, and Devil's Dust, but the odds on the average tallied closely with those returned on Thursday, the 7th inst. The following were the market prices:—

11 to 1 agst Alarm	25 to 1 agst Old England	40 to 1 agst Miss Whip colt
16 to 1 —— Forth's lot (t)	38 to 1 —— Fitz Allen	50 to 1 —— Jinglepot
16 to 1 —— The Irish lot (t)	34 to 1 —— Young Eclipse	50 to 1 —— Cabin Boy
16 to 1 —— Kedger	35 to 1 —— Weatherbit	50 to 1 —— Devils' Dust
22 to 1 —— Cobweb colt	40 to 1 —— Laird o'Cockpen (t)	50 to 1 —— Twig
25 to 1 —— Pam (t)		50 to 1 —— Seaman
25 to 1 —— Idas	45 to 1 —— Clear the Way

THURSDAY.—If the betting this afternoon be received as a sample of what may be expected on the winter Thursdays, book-making will be a sorry occupation until after the meeting of Parliament. The following summary of the business will show that the metallics had a very easy time of it:—200 to 10 agst the Cobweb colt, 25 to 1 to £100 agst Pam, 28 and 30 to 1 to £150 agst Idas, 35 to 1 each agst the Laird o'Cockpen and Young Eclipse, 1000 to 25 agst Anti-Repealer, 1000 to 20 four or five times agst Cabin Boy, 1000 to 15 each agst Flahowlagh, Seaman, and the Carlotta colt; and 1000 to 10 each agst Christina colt, John Davis, and The Hermit.

MATCH.—Mr. Bowles's Blue Coat Boy beat Mr. Aggs's Anodine.

The weather was unfavourable, and the attendance thin, but the sport was good.

BATTUE SHOOTING.—On Thursday week Lord Stanley, Lord Lilford, Mr. Talbot Clifton, Mr. Wilson Patten, and two other gentlemen, shot upwards of 300 head of game on Lord Lilford's estate, near Warrington.

GREAT TROTTING MATCH FOR ONE HUNDRED POUNDS.—The long-pending match between Mr. Vanderstein's (of Whitechapel) grey gelding and Mr. M'Grath's (of Lambeth) bay cob, to trot two miles in harness, came off on Tuesday on Sunbury Common; and from the amount of stakes, the heavy betting on the race, and the great celebrity of the horses, an unusual degree of interest was created. The distance being measured, the horses, harnessed to light match carts, were driven to the starting mark, and at the signal they went away at great speed, and accomplished half a mile in eighty-eight seconds. At this stage the bay horse broke out into a gallop, and was suddenly pulled in (in compliance with the usual rules of trotting, and the great cavalcade of horsemen and vehicles came violently upon it, and it was thrown down, the chaise overturned, and the driver seriously injured, and, being unable to proceed further, the grey horse completed the distance and won the stakes, the spectators being much mortified at so unsatisfactory a result. The winning pony is of American breed, and performed the two miles in six minutes.

COUNTRY NEWS.

A HEARTY OLD MAN.—John Richards, a man of 110 years of age, was present at the late Tring Agricultural Association. He looked not older than many do at sixty or seventy years of age. He is a native of Broad Cliffs, in Devonshire, where his baptism is registered as having taken taken place in 1739. He was a working man in the reign of George II., from whom he had the honour to receive a guinea for opening a gate at Longleat Park. He had also frequently conversed in Windsor Park with George III, whom he said they used to call Farmer George. He has been a sawyer, a drover, a herb gatherer, and had latterly been employed in keeping birds from corn; for though so aged his eye was still good; and sporting gentlemen would be surprised and pleased to witness his shooting. He was also in the militia in the time of General Wolfe, and was wounded at the battle of Vinegar Hill, but had no pension. It is needless to say that this old man excited considerable interest. He appears to be still strong and active, and waved his arm vigorously when the toasts were cheered. It is painful to add, that this poor old fellow, who attended on the Prince of Wales' great grandfather, was, until very lately, confined in a union workhouse. On Saturday morning the old man made a trial of his skill in shooting at a mark, the fourth part of a sheet of foolscap, at forty yards distance, in which he placed twelve shots.

PROVIDENTIAL ESCAPE ON THE BRISTOL AND EXETER RAILWAY.—On Sunday evening last a gentleman of Weston Super-mare, mamed Bellinge, purchased a first-class ticket from that station to Bristol, and took his seat; but when he got to the junction, it was noticed that he was rather the worse for liquor. On the arrival of the train at Bristol he was missed; and on looking at the carriage, it was found the window on the side nearest the opposite line was open, but the door fast; his hat was on the seat, and two letters. It was immediately surmised that he had fallen out, and was killed; and the inspector of the railway police (Mr. Burton) and a policeman started down the line in search of him. They walked on to Clevedon-road station without any news of him, but, on arriving there, the policeman on duty told them that about an hour before a gentleman walked down the line, covered over with blood and ballast, and was gone to bed at the Station Hotel, intoxicated; he stated to the policeman he had lost his way. In the morning, when he came to his senses, he was visited by the inspector, and said he had not the slightest recollection of the affair, or even of getting into the train at Weston; and he was not much hurt, only a cut in the forehead, his hands cut and swollen very much, and coat, &c. much torn. He lost his wig in the scuffle with the train and timbers on the line. It was afterwards found that he got out of the train about two miles above Clevedon station, and must have fallen with great force between the two lines of rail, as there were evident marks in the loose gravel where he alighted. The train, at the time, must have been going at least thirty miles an hour. How he escaped instant death is not easily to be imagined; and the mail train only missed him by a few inches (by his own account). Four hours elapsed after he fell out before he got to the Station Hotel for assistance, during which time he was walking about, or lying insensible on the line. It was about eight o'clock in the evening when he is supposed to have fallen out.

THE BURGLARY AT MANCETTER, WARWICKSHIRE.—In consequence of the recent outrage at Mr. Worthington's, at Mancetter, of which an account appeared in our paper, Mr. W. S. Dugdale, M.P., convened a meeting of magistrates, when it was unanimously agreed that a communication should be forwarded to the Secretary of State for the Home Department, signed by all the magistrates, soliciting the Government to offer a reward of an additional £100, with her Majesty's free pardon to either of the parties who will impeach his accomplices. A letter from Sir J. Graham to Mr. Dugdale has been received, granting the request of the magistrates, and offering a reward of £100, in addition to the £100 previously offered by Mr. Worthington, for the discovery and conviction of the burglars.

INCENDIARY FIRE NEAR BRIGHTON.—On Saturday last an incendiary fire took place at a barn in the occupation of Mr. Gorringe, a farmer at Withdean, about a mile and a half from Brighton. The barn was full of corn, and, owing to the inadequate supply of water, there were no means of arresting the progress of the flames. The villagers hastened to the spot, and exerted themselves to save the corn, but with all their praiseworthy efforts scarcely a handful was saved. The damage is estimated at £400. A young man named Ledbitter is in custody on suspicion of having set the premises on fire. The building and property were insured.

THE LAWYERS OUTWITTED.—It is not often that the lawyers are taken in, but a case has recently occurred at Birmingham, in which so ingenious an artifice was practised upon a professional gentleman there by two swindlers, that he was completely deceived, and no doubt he thinks himself fortunate that the amount to which he was swindled was not a very large one. A few days ago an elderly person, represented to be of gentlemanly exterior and address, and apparently blind, called at the office of a respectable solicitor in that town, accompanied by a youth, who acted as his guide. On being introduced to the principal of the office he presented his card, bearing the name of "Mr. C. Rice," and proceeded to say, that he called to consult with the solicitor as to the recovery of £60, owing to him by a Mr. Joliffe, in the Aston-road. The attorney, upon receiving these instructions, promised to write to Mr Joliffe immediately, and the client offered him the customary fee, but this, until the matter was settled, was declined. The attorney, according to promise, wrote to Mr. Joliffe, and in the course of the same day the latter person called at the office, acknowledged the receipt of the letter, regretted the necessity which had induced his old friend, Mr. Rice, to proceed against him, but expressed a hope that a few more days of indulgence would be extended towards him, when he would most certainly discharge Mr. Rice's claim. The solicitor was so much satisfied with Mr. Joliffe's manner and apparent sincerity, that he granted him the time required. Mr. Joliffe tendered the solicitor a guinea as some recompense for the trouble he had already taken in the matter; but this, of course, like the former fee, was for the present declined. On the following day Mr. Rice, followed by his juvenile guide, again called at the office of the solicitor, and represented himself as so well as pleased, that he at once expressed his determination to put the entire management of his affairs into that gentleman's hands. With this view he produced a large posting bill, announcing the sale of a very "desirable estate," only "one and a half hour's journey from London, in a delightful situation," late the property of Mr. Frederick A. Rice. The sale was announced under the authority of Mr. Winstanley, the auctioneer, to come off, without reserve, at the Crown Inn, Aylesbury, on the 30th inst. Amongst the commodious effects to be put up for sale was "a commodious residence," called "The Red Hill Farm." Mr. Winstanley was also instructed to sell about 300 lots of well-made furniture, 460 oz. of plate, 37 dozen of excellent wines, with live and dead stock, farming implements, &c., particulars of which were to be obtained from the auctioneer, on the premises, and of Mr. Rice, sole legatee, 41, Great Brook-street, Birmingham. The agency was of course at once accepted, upon which Mr. Rice said he would immediately put the deeds into the possession of his new solicitor, but that on his way from London he called upon a friend at Coventry, where he left the deeds with a gentleman who kindly lent him £20; as he happened, however, only to have £8 upon him, the solicitor freely advanced to his client the balance of £12 wherewith to repay his Coventry acquaintance. Mr. Rice was extremely obliged by this prompt assistance, and speedily left the office. It is almost needless to say that the check was forthwith melted into cash at the solicitor's bankers, and that Mr. Rice, forgetting to return with the deed from Coventry, has not again visited the office of his new legal adviser. The solicitor beginning to suspect all was not right, the next day made inquiries, and found that two other legal gentlemen had been similarly duped, and had advanced £20 each upon the deeds of the "Red hill Farm. Information was given to the police, and it was discovered that several tradesmen had been similarly swindled.

AWFULLY SUDDEN DEATH.—The Rev. Rowland Hill, who has been residing at Bowness, Windermere, for the last three months, was suddenly taken ill in the shop of Mrs. R. Barrow, draper and grocer of that place, about half-past twelve on Thursday, when, with great difficulty, he was carried into an adjoining room, and he was attended immediately by two medical men, but expired in about half an hour. On Friday an inquest was held, and the jury returned a verdict that the deceased died from some inward fit.

THE LATE FATAL ACCIDENT AT OLDHAM.—The result of the inquest on the persons who were killed by the falling of the mill at Oldham, could only appear in part of our impression of last week. The verdict was as follows:—"Accidental death, caused by the falling of the building; and the jury are unanimously of opinion that the causes of the accident are fully pointed out by the able report of Messrs. Fairburn and Bellhouse."

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

VAUGHAN V. THELLUSON.—In the Court of Chancery, on Tuesday, the Lord Chancellor gave judgment in this case, which has been argued at great length on several occasions. About twelve months since a motion was made to this court to discharge an order of the Vice Chancellor of England, granting an injunction restraining the defendant from proceeding with an action at law. It appeared that, after the death of the late Sir B. Codrington, one of his judgment creditors for £4000 brought an action against the executors to recover the amount of the debt, to which the executors pleaded that they were not liable, and afterwards filed a bill in this court for an injunction to restrain further proceedings at law. The Vice Chancellor granted the injunction; against that decision the present appeal was brought. His lordship, after going at length into the facts of the case, said he could not see that the executors had been guilty of any laches, or had acted in any manner which disentitled them to the relief they sought for in an equity court, and, agreeing in opinion with the Vice Chancellor, he must dismiss the appeal with costs, and order the injunction to continue.

THE WESTMINSTER LOAN AND DISCOUNT SOCIETY.—In the Court of Bankruptcy, on Tuesday, Mr C. K. Nicholls, formerly secretary to the Westminster Loan and Discount Society, whose case has often been before the public, again appeared.—Mr. Lloyd objected to the passing of the bankrupt on several grounds, the principal one being that he had not given a sufficiently clear account of his connection with the defunct loan society.—The bankrupt was then sworn, and examined at some length as to his connection with the society, and with the possession of the banking-house in Adam-street, but nothing of importance was elicited.—After a protracted hearing, his Honour said that the accounts of the bankrupt presented rather an extraordinary appearance. There were debts and liabilities to the amount of £14,000, and property handed in only to £25. Besides, having been only ten days in the hands of the official assignee, further time would be necessary for their thorough investigation. Under these circumstances, he would adjourn the examination until the date of the audit, which would be some time in January.

THE LATE CASE OF ABDUCTION AND SUICIDE.—In the Bail Court, on Wednesday, Mr. Mellor applied to Mr. Justice Patteson for a writ of certiorari to remove into that court an inquisition which had been taken by the coroner on the body of George Gardner, and also the depositions of the witnesses examined before him. The affidavits on which the learned counsel founded his motion set forth the following extraordinary facts:—Some time since the deceased, George Gardner, was indicted for the abduction of a young lady from a boarding school, but after that proceeding, an arrangement was come to between the parties, the result of which was that on his trial the defendant pleaded guilty to the indictment, when the court ordered him to enter into recognizances to appear and receive judgment when called upon, which having done, he was liberated. Before the commission of the above offence he was servant to a farmer named Page, the father of the young lady in question, and after his discharge from custody he went to Canada, but had since returned to this country and visited the farmhouse of Mr. Page, and having gained access by one of the windows remained there during the night. In the morning he was seen by the young lady, who gave him some coffee. Her mother also had an interview with him, Mr. Page himself being from home at the time, and not aware of the fact of deceased's return. After breakfast the young lady complained of some disagreeable smell in the room, and it was subsequently ascertained that Gardner had taken poison, from the effects of which he shortly afterwards died. The jury before whom the coroner's inquisition was taken, returned a verdict of "Felo de se." To this inquisition the learned counsel now took several objections, upon hearing which his lordship granted a rule to show cause.

ROBERT BANNISTER'S BANKRUPTCY.—A first dividend under this estate, the particulars of which have already appeared, was declared in the Court of Bankruptcy on Wednesday, of 8s. in the pound. It will be recollected the bankrupt carried on business at Portsea as a draper, and got into debt in the space of about four months for upwards of £17,000.

The clergy of Paris, in imitation of the clergy of Dusseldorff, have opposed the reading of Eugene Sue's novel of Le Juif Errant. Notices have been stuck up in the church of Saint-Eustache, interdicting the reading of this novel by the parishioners, and at the church of Saint-Germain-l'Auxerrois the clergy have requested the mothers of families to prohibit their children from reading it. The probable effect of this clerical interference with the literature of the day, will be to cause the work to be perused by many who could not otherwise have cared for doing so.

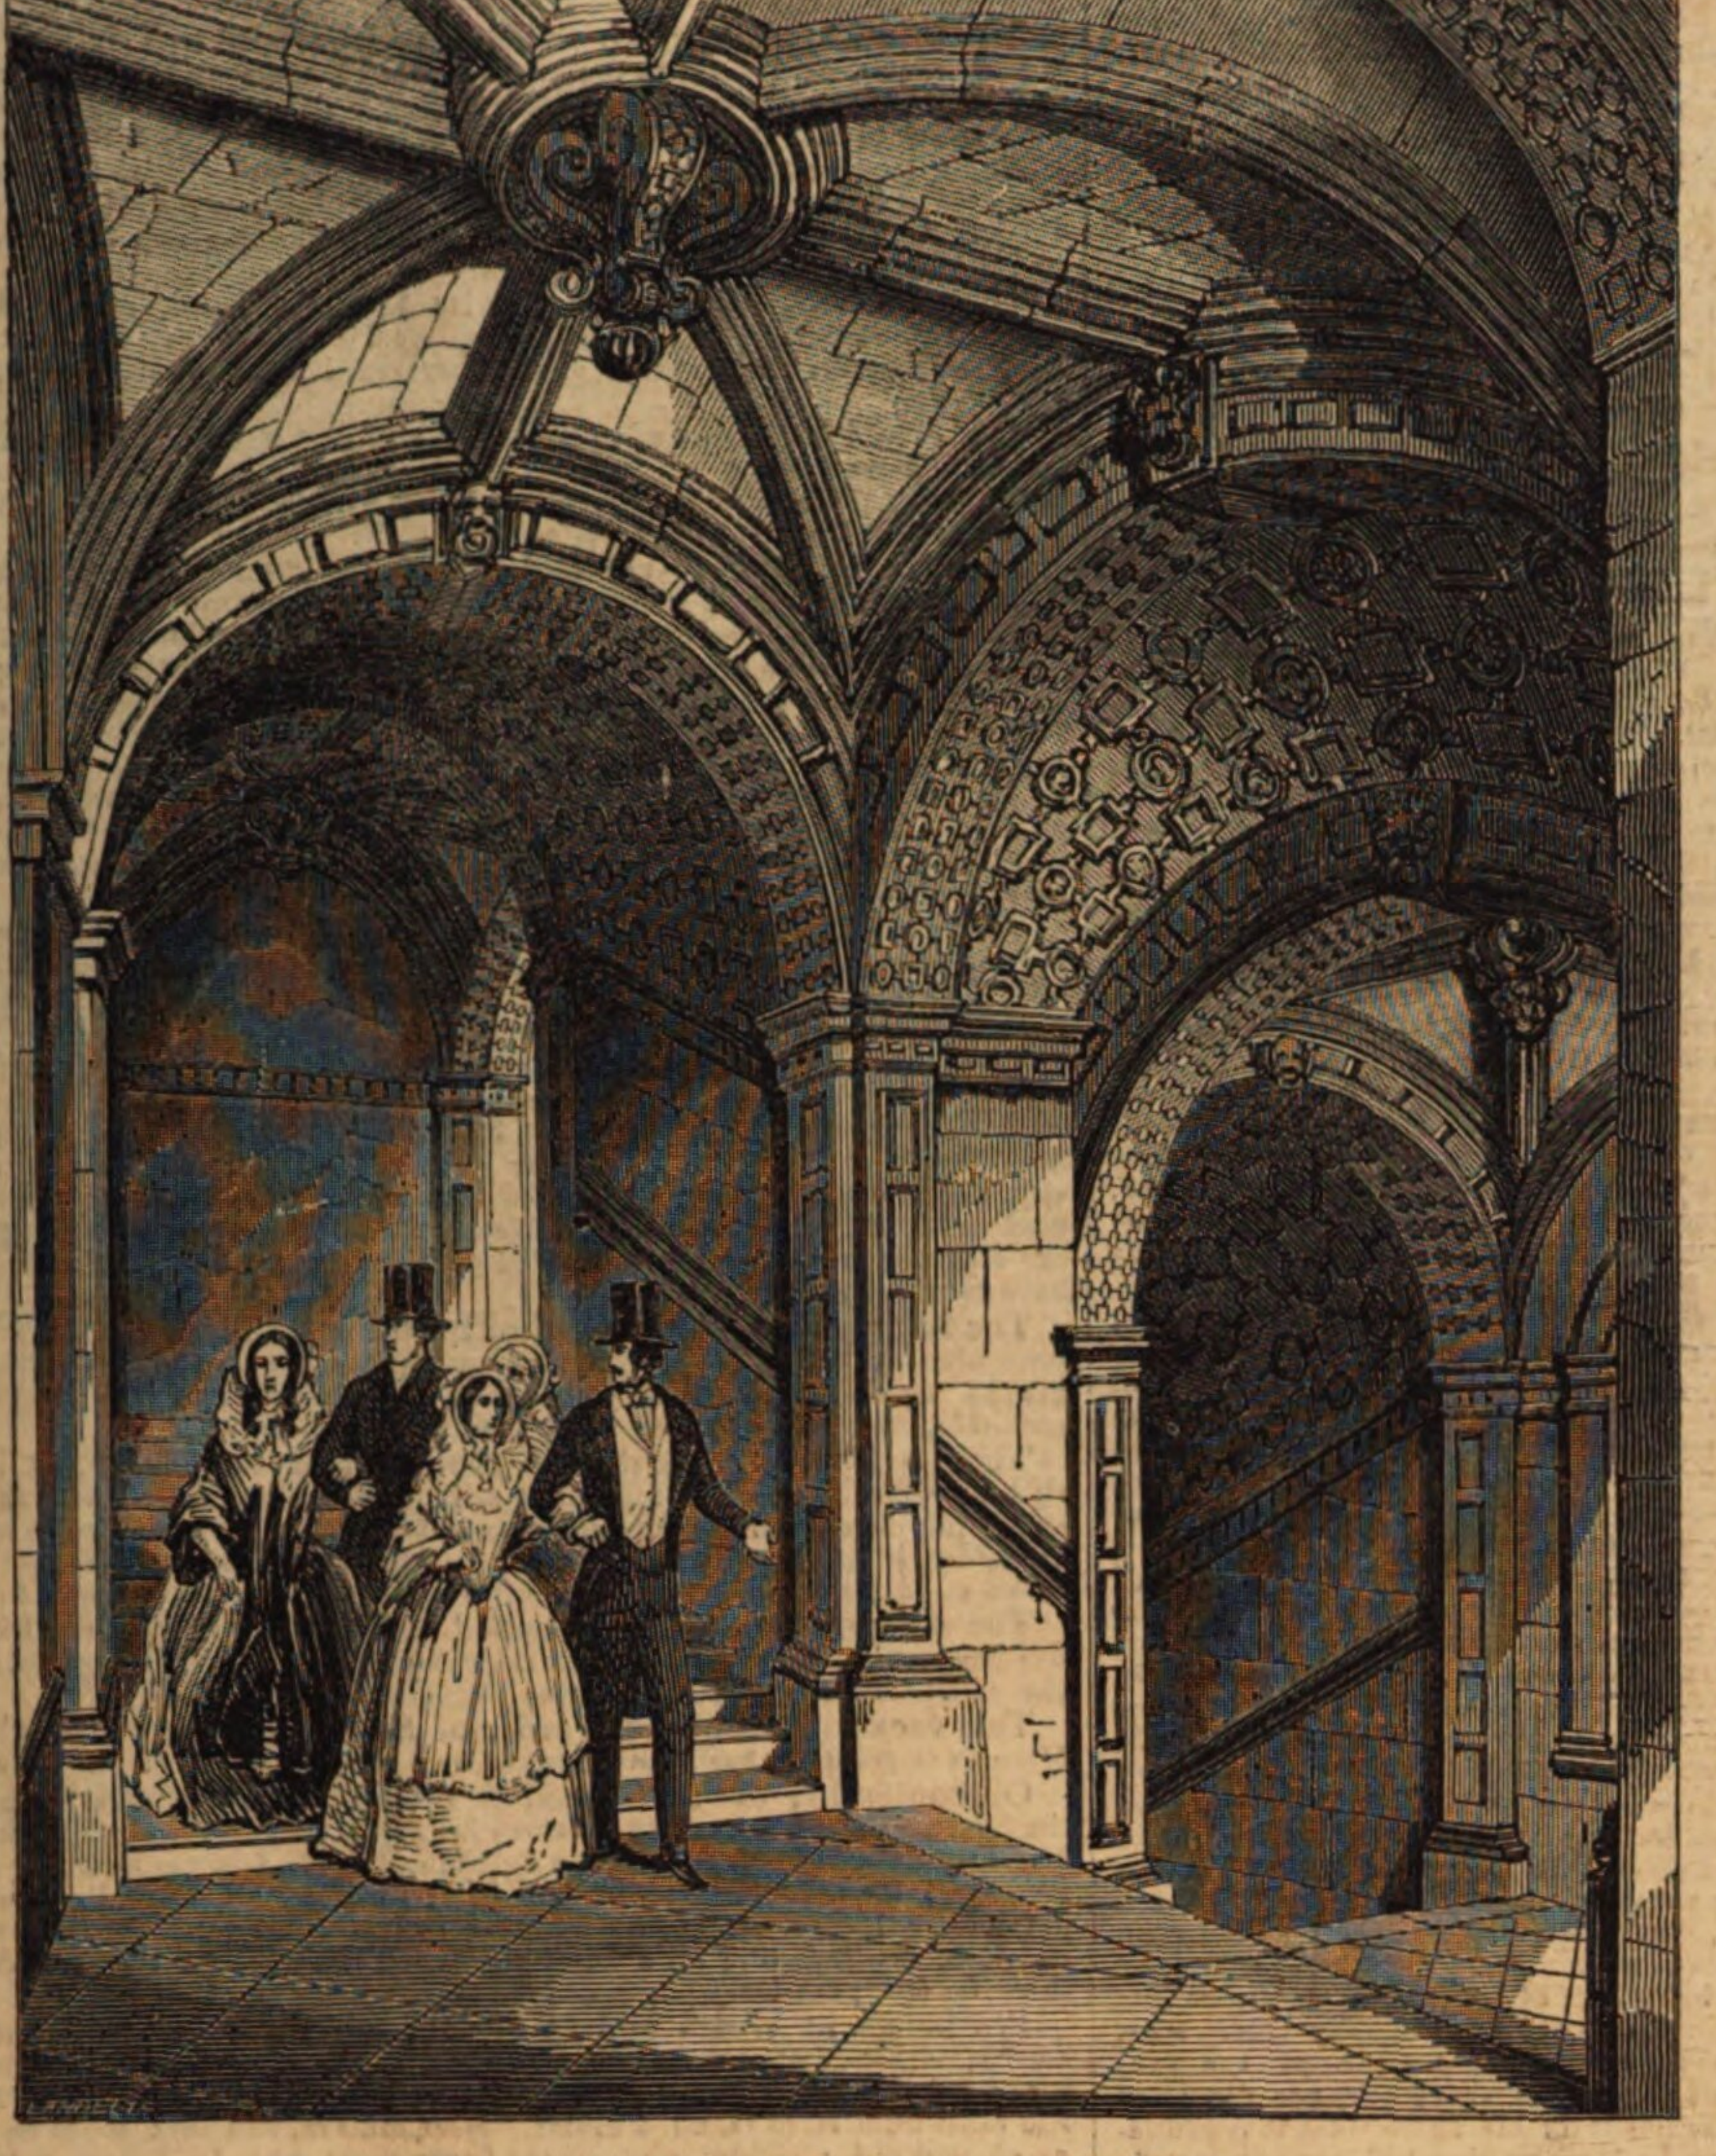
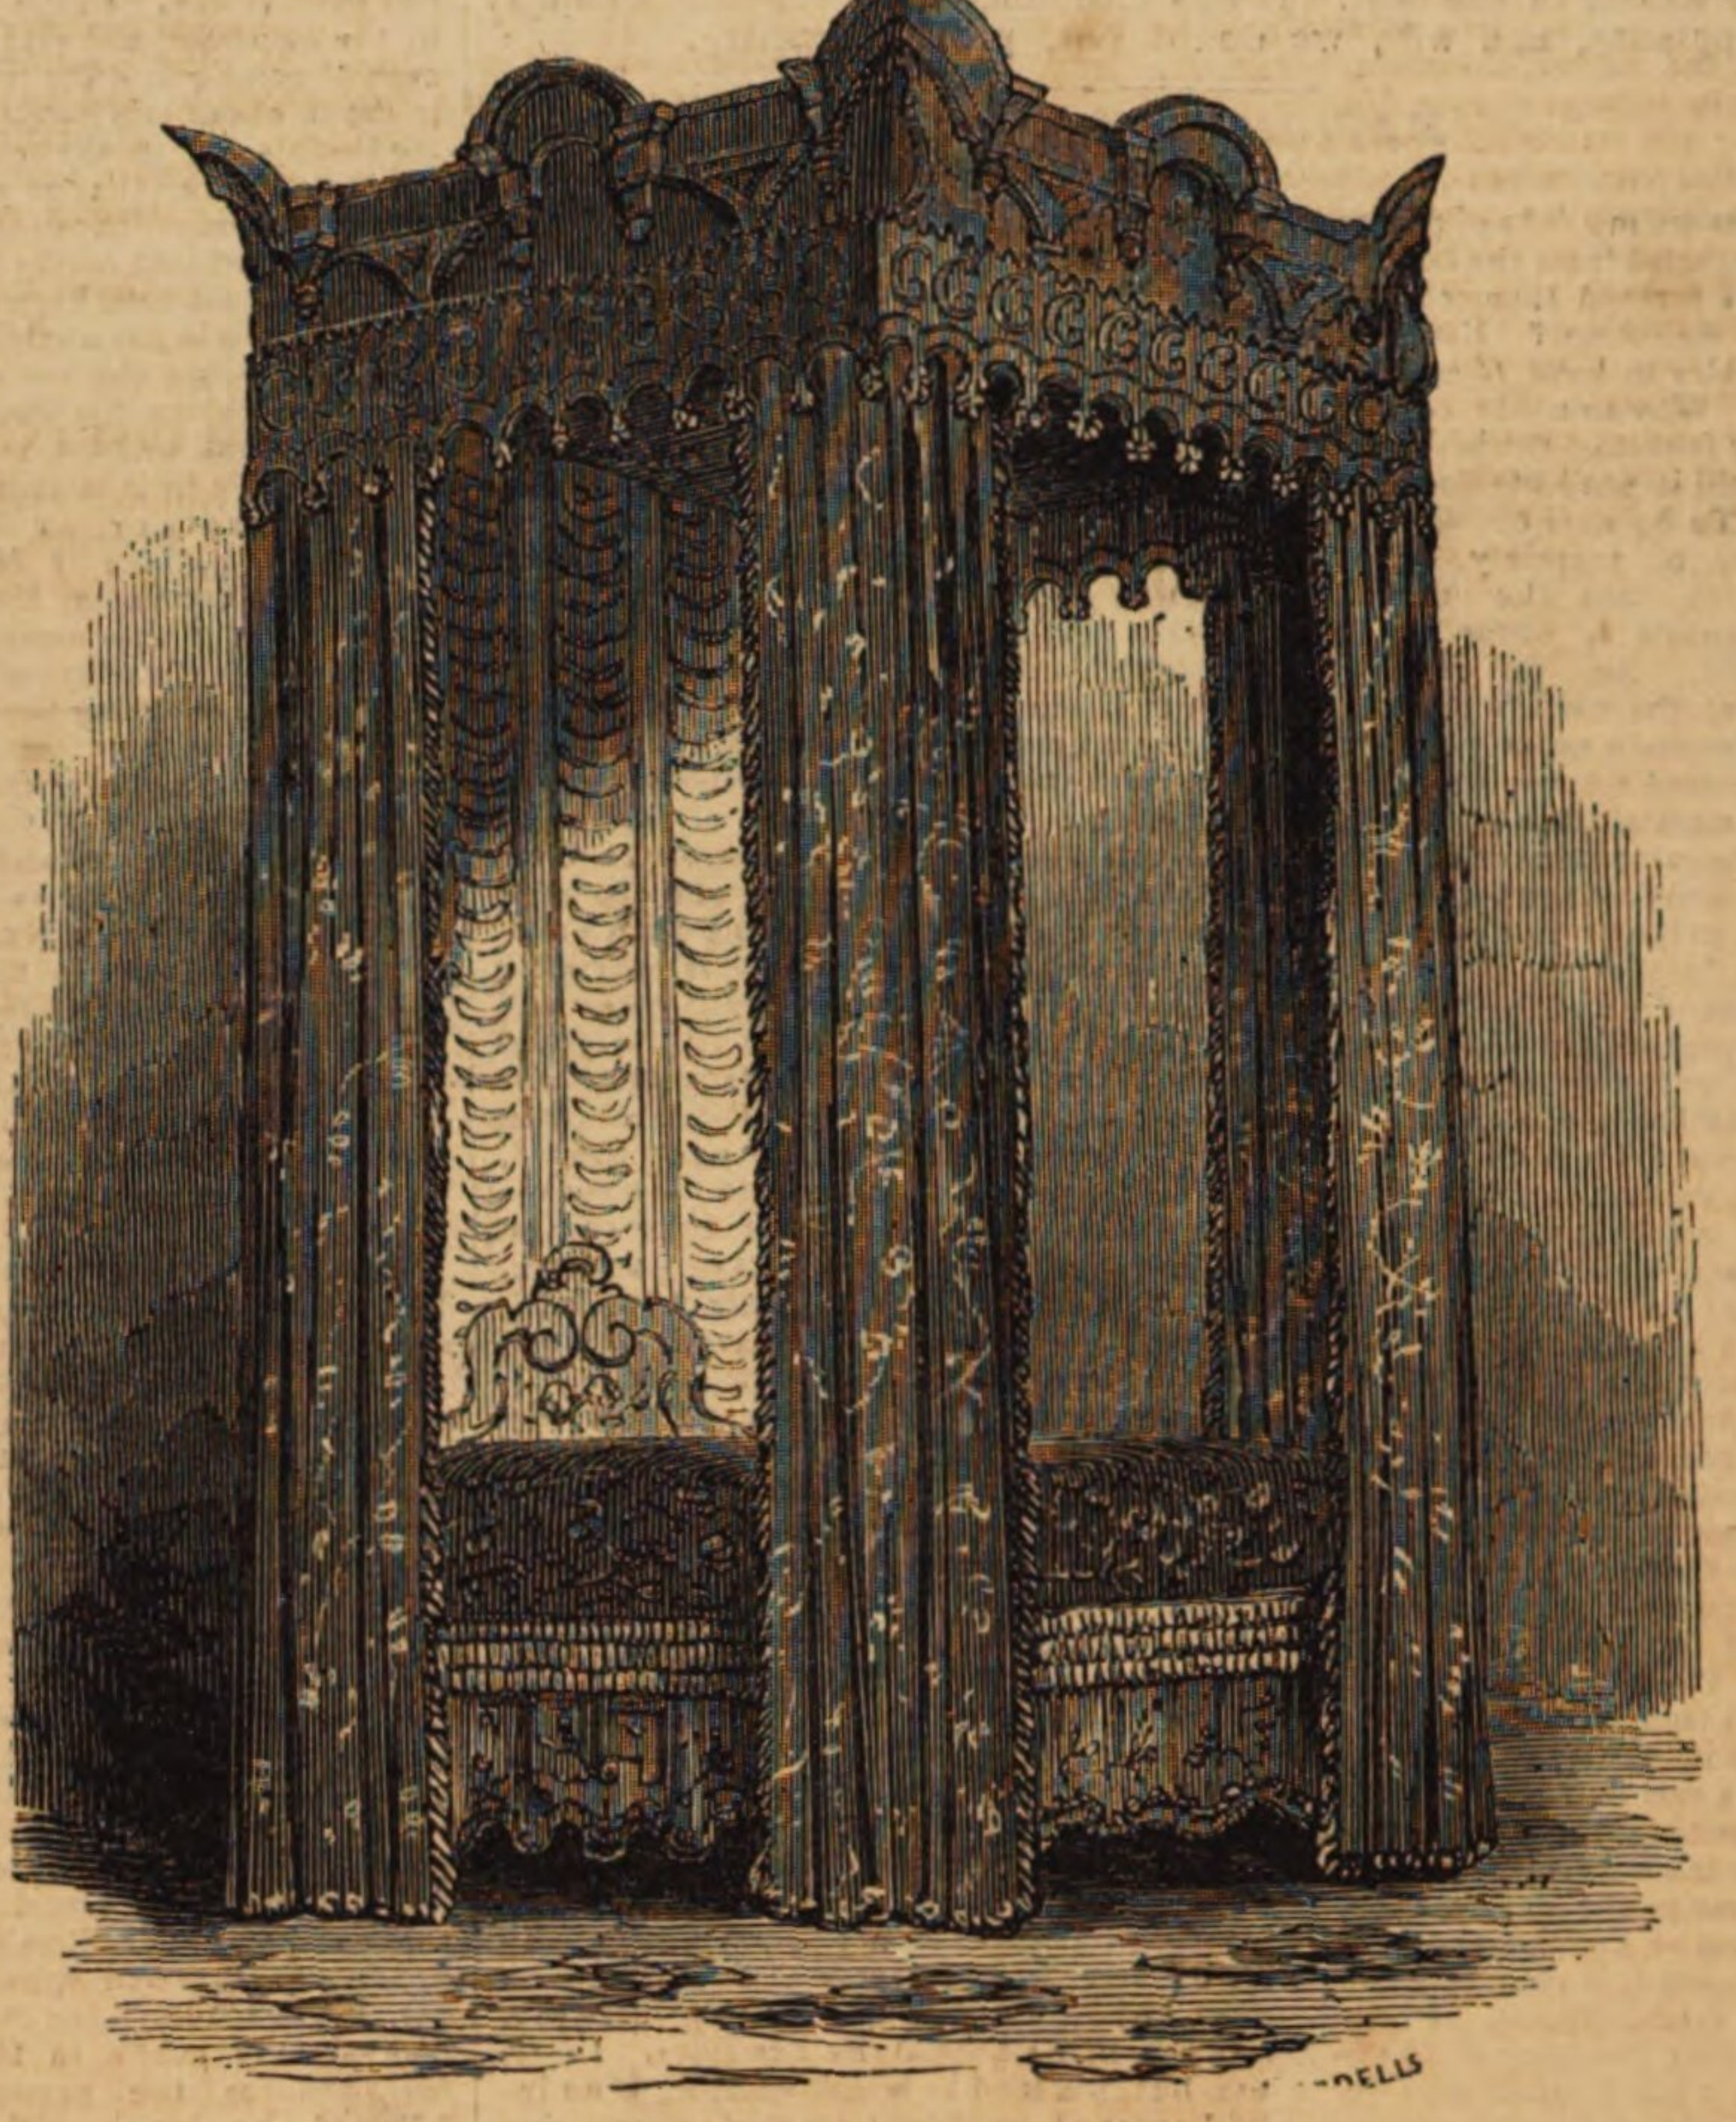
VALUE OF AN ILLUSTRATED JOURNAL.—In a course of lectures on the history of architecture, recently delivered at the Collegiate Institution, Liverpool, by Mr. George Godwin, F.R.S., the lecturer remarked, after describing the public buildings, in ancient Greece, that little was known of their private dwellings, and said, an ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS of that period, or rather "Athenian News," which would give us a peep into the dwellings of the citizen, of his every-day habits, would be exceedingly valuable. Considerable applause followed the remark.



CURIOUS STAIRCASE, AT BURGHLEY.



QUEEN ELIZABETH'S STATE BED.

fast-room, a noble apartment, and very magnificently furnished. The staircase (engraved at page 316) is remarkable for its elaborately decorated vaulted roof; its pendents correspond with those of the timber roof of the Great Hall.

On Wednesday morning the Queen rose at an early hour, and breakfasted with the Prince Consort in her private apartment.

Before taking breakfast, however, her Majesty, accompanied by Prince Albert, proceeded to the private chapel of the mansion (where the other guests had already assembled) to perform her morning devotions.

The chapel is a beautiful apartment, ornamented by a variety of superb carving, by Gibbons. Arranged on each side are ten antique figures, as large as life, in bronze.

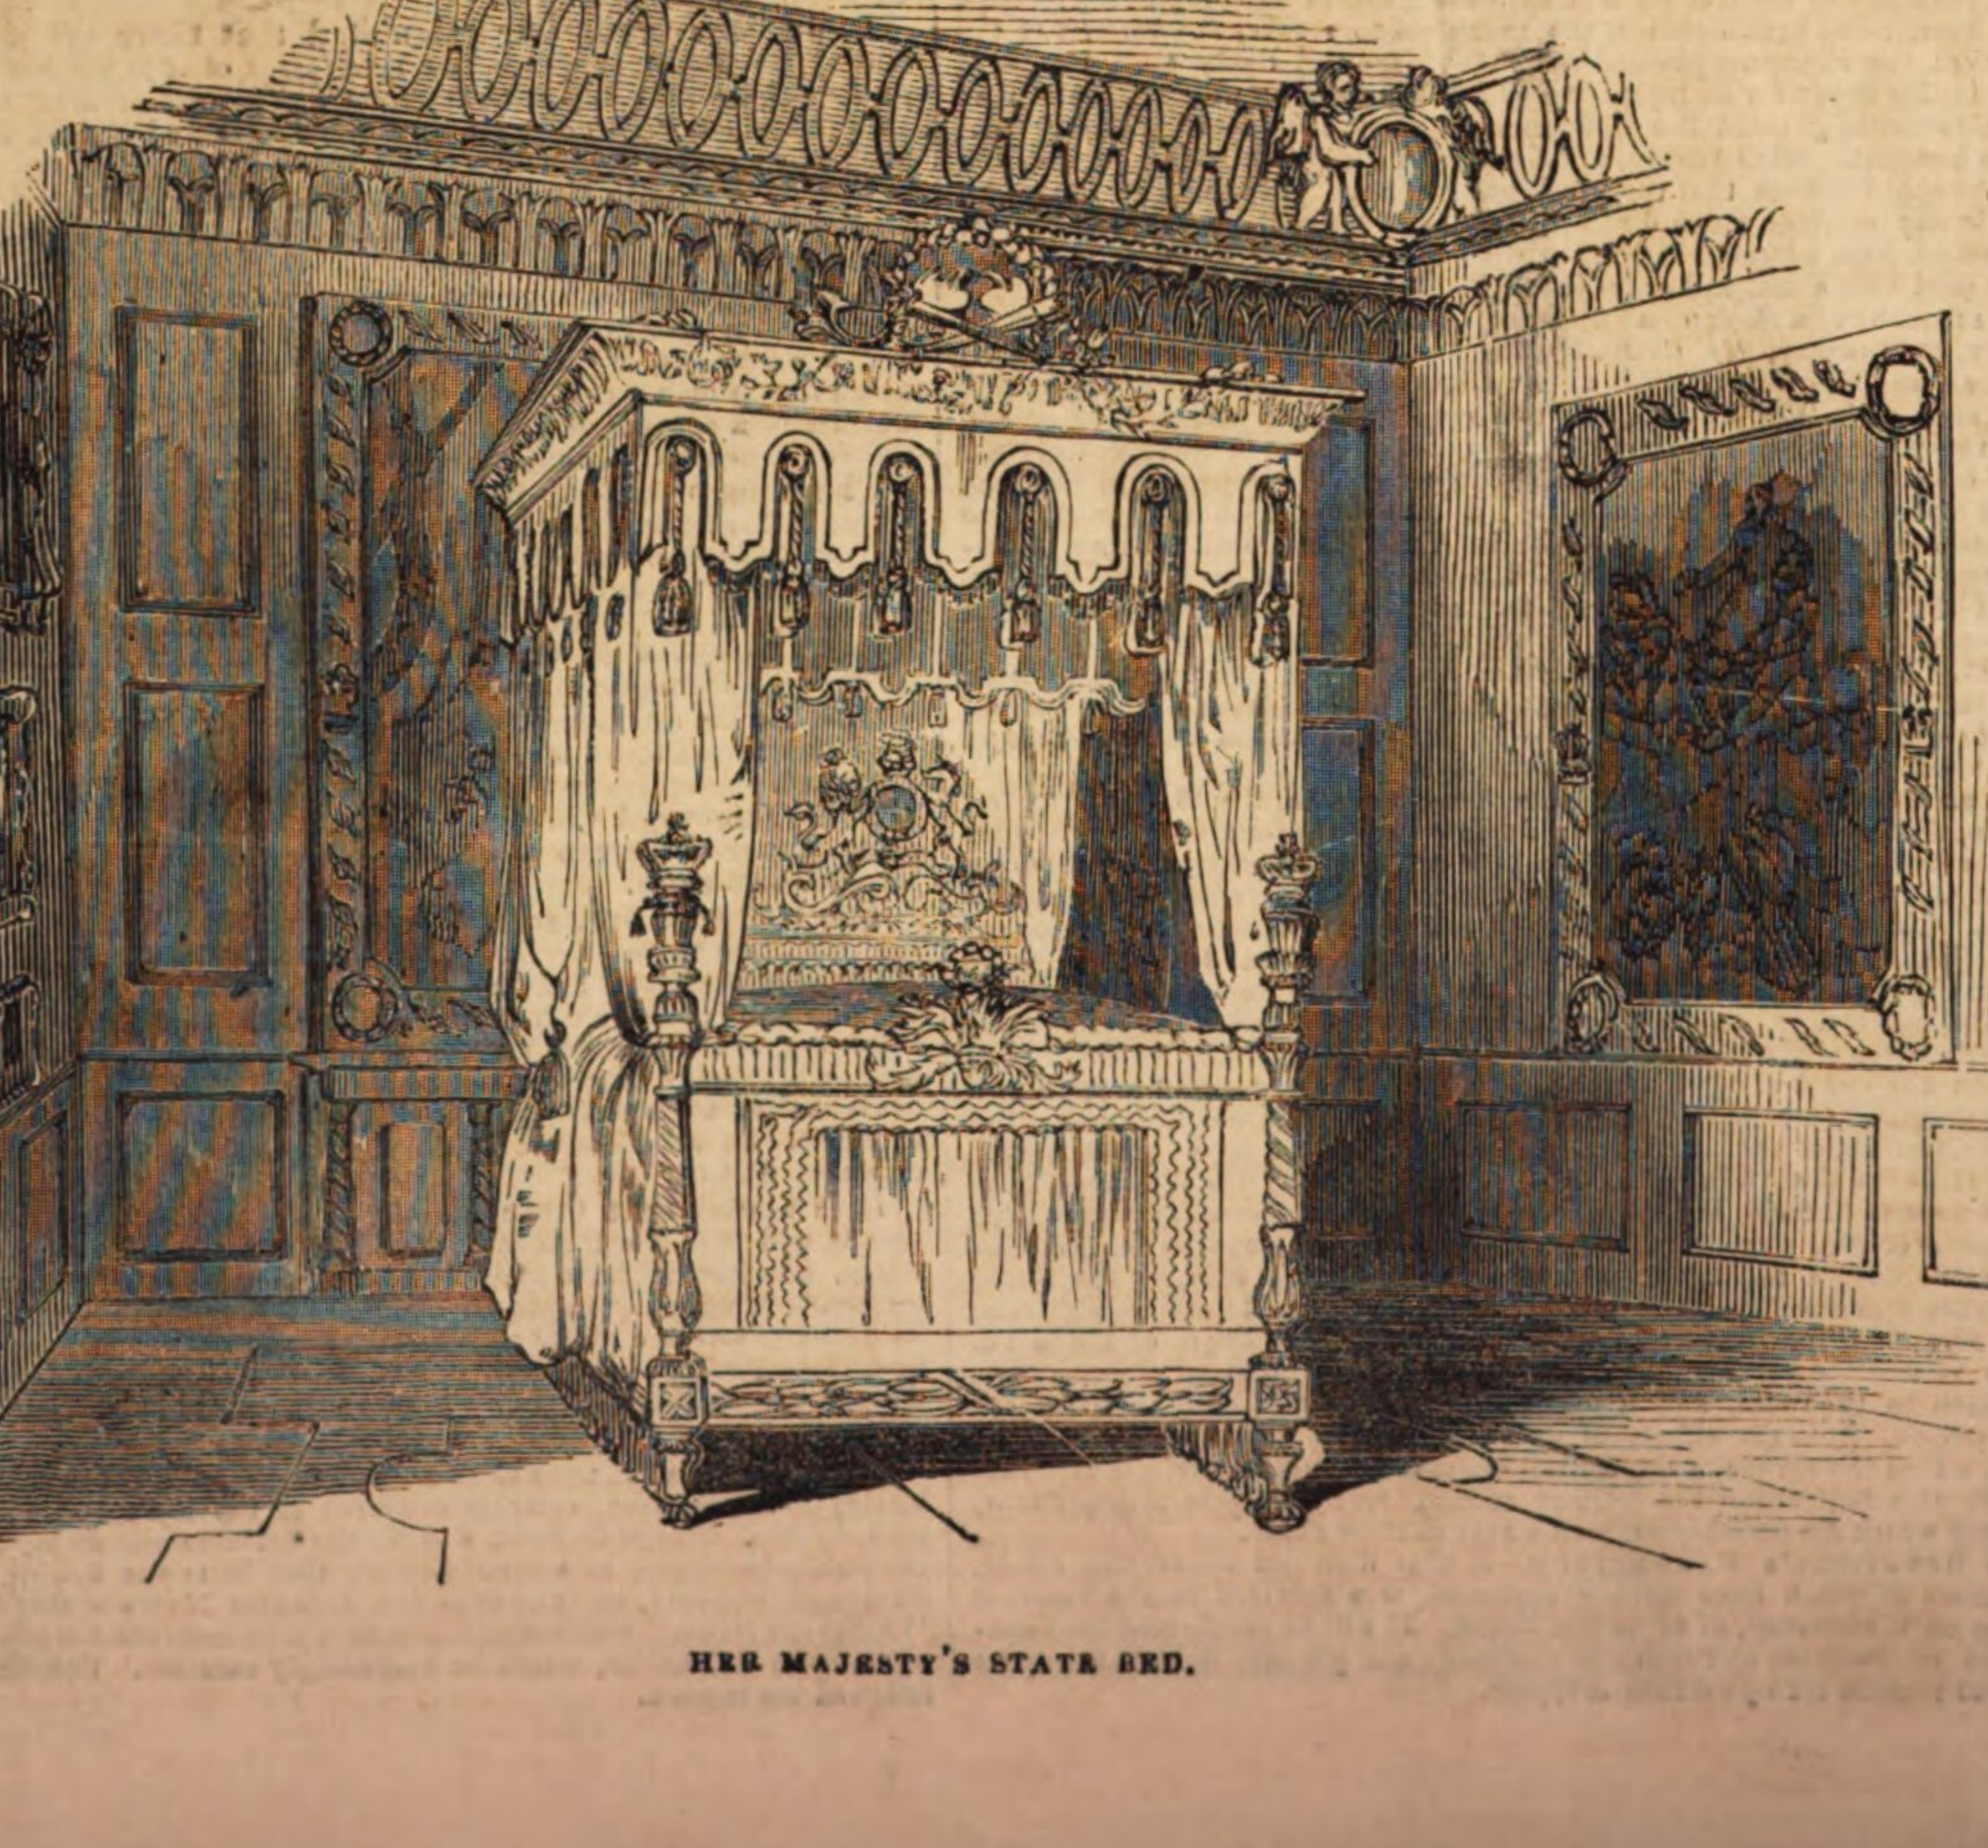
It is asserted that Queen Elizabeth, when a visitor at Burghley, regularly attended divine service in this chapel, and that it was her custom to place herself on the left side, nearest the altar, which has ever since been distinguished by the appellation of Queen Elizabeth's seat.

STAMFORD, Thursday.

Throughout the whole of yesterday the rain continued to fall without intermission until nearly four o'clock, when it ceased, and the evening became fine. Her Majesty, in consequence of the unfavourable state of the weather, did not leave the house, but devoted the day to inspecting the splendid collection of pictures, one of the first in the kingdom, belonging to her noble host. Among those which especially attracted her Majesty's attention was a painting of the "Virgin and Child," by Castiglione, which was presented to Brownlow, Earl of Exeter, by Gangannelli, Pope Clement XIV., in 1774, under somewhat singular circumstances. His lordship being in the streets of Rome when the Pontiff was passing in procession on a public occasion, joined in the adoration of the Catholics, which so forcibly impressed his Holiness that he wished to show some token of respect to so polite a Protestant nobleman. Shortly afterwards, the Earl amusing himself at the Vatican, expressed his admiration of this picture, and observed he had none of the works of Castiglione in his collection at Burghley. This information no sooner reached the ears of the Pope, than he ordered the picture to be conveyed at an early hour the next morning to his lordship's lodgings. A "Salvator Mundi," a chef d'œuvre of Carlo Dolci, and the "Death of Seneca," by L. Giordano, and also a fine picture of "Adam and Eve," by L. Caracci, recently added to the collection by the present marquis, also engaged her Majesty's special attention. When it is considered, that in the collection at Burghley there are paintings by Titian, Corregio, Raphael, Claude Lorraine, Maratta, Spagnoletto, Rembrandt, Caravagio, Rubens, Guido, Domenichino, Murillo, Baptiste, L. Da Vinci, and numerous others, it may be readily imagined that her Majesty, who is a connoisseur in paintings, found ample subjects of amusement.

Her Majesty was conducted over nearly the whole of the magnificent rooms in the house by her noble host, and afterwards went to look at the kitchen, which is one of the most ancient and curious apartments in the house. The whole of the decorations and arrangements in her Majesty's own suite of appartments have been much praised by her Majesty. They have been fitted up by E. Browning, Esq., his lordship's architect, who also designed the triumphal arches so much admired by the Queen on her entry to Burghley.

This morning the weather was remarkably fine, and formed an agreeable contrast to that of yesterday. Immediately after breakfast, his Royal Highness Prince Albert, accompanied by the Marquis of Salisbury, Sir Robert Peel, Lord Stanley, and the Marquis of Granby, went out to shoot in the preserves at Butlands, adjoining the park. Her Majesty intends to drive out this afternoon, and her carriages are ordered to be in readiness at one o'clock. It is stated, that she intends to drive as far as Exton, the seat of the Earl and Countess of Gainsborough, to pay them a passing visit, but nothing certain is known. The Mayor and Corporation of Stamford are to present their address to her Majesty this evening; but the time is not yet fixed. It was generally thought yesterday that Prince Albert would go out with the hounds, which meet a few miles from Burghley this morning, and in consequence of which there was a greater field than has been known for many a day—many of the hunters coming from a considerable distance.



HER MAJESTY'S STATE BED.

THE CHRISTENING IN THE CHAPEL.

Oh! happy infant! blest in each degree,
The child of wealth and pow'r,
The promised care of Royalty
Pledg'd at this sacred hour,
Thy dawning on the world has been most bright,
  May'st thou live through a joyous day,
    And when thy night,
For night must come, will steal thee hence away,
  Let it be calm—serene—
As ever clos'd a soft Italian scene,
  When in tramontane skies
The sun sinks down to make more glorious rise!
Oh! bless thee, Babe! and her who gives thee name
And both alike be consecrate to Fame! W.

The ceremony of christening the infant daughter of the Marquis and Marchioness of Exeter, took place yesterday evening at six o'clock. and was performed by the Bishop of Peterborough, assisted by the Rev. H. Atley. It has been stated that her Majesty was to have stood sponsor to the infant; this, however, is incorrect, the sponsors at the christening being His Royal Highness Prince Albert, Hon. Lady Middleton, and Lady Sophia Cecil. Her Majesty attended at the ceremony, and occupied the seat in which it is stated Queen Elizabeth usually sat, when attending divine service at Burghley. The infant was named after her Most Gracious Majesty. Immediately after the ceremony, Prince Albert presented to his little goddaughter a handsome gold cup and cover, which had a suitable inscription engraved on it. The whole of the nobility and other guests of the Marquis attended the ceremony, which took place in the chapel, a beautiful apartment, 42 feet long, 35 wide, and 18 high, ornamented by festoons of fruit and flowers, carved by Gibbons. The ceiling is of fretwork, and the sides are wainscotted half-way. The pulpit, desk, and chairs, are of mahogany, and the communion-table and rails of cedar—all modern. Arranged on the side are the antique figures, as large as life, in imitation of bronze, standing on altars and bearing lamps in their hands.

There is a large ante-room attached to the west end, and forming part of the Chapel, which is 31 feet 6 inches in length, and 24 feet in breadth; it is wainscoted from the ground to the ceiling, and fitted with open seats, for the use of servants.

Immediately over the altar is a painting, by Paul Veronese, of "Zebedee's Wife Petitioning Jesus Christ to Dignify her two Sons in Heaven." There are six other paintings in the Chapel, by the following masters:—"Solomon's Idolatry," by Carlo Loti; "Interview between Christ and Mary Magdalen, after his resurrection," by Liberi; "Saul and the Witch of Endor," by Carlo Loti; "Adoration of the Shepherds," by Liberi; "Jephtha's Vow," by L. Giordano; "Finding of Moses," by Carlo Loti.

The dinner party last night, besides her Majesty and Prince Albert and the Marquis and Marchioness of Exeter, was Lady Portman, Hon. Miss Liddell, Earl of Delawarr, Lord Burghley, Mr. Anson, Col. Arbuthnot, Col. Wylde, Duke of Rutland, Marquis of Salisbury, Marquis of Granby, Earl of Aberdeen, Sir Robert Peel, Sir James Graham, Lord Stanley, Lord and Lady Alford, Lord and Lady Cecil, Lord and Lady Charles Wellesley, Sir William and Lady Middleton, Lord Lovaine, Hon. H. Pierrepont, Hon. Captain and Mrs. Spencer, Lord Brooke, Sir George Clerk, Rev. H. Atley, the Bishop of Peterborough, Mrs. Davys, Lord and Lady Gainsborough, Sir John Trollope, Lord and Lady Aboyne.

Sir James Graham arrived at Stamford early in the afternoon.

In the evening, as soon as the christening was over, there was a display of fireworks in the park, and the bridge across the lake was brilliantly illuminated, as also were the lodge and the triumphal arches.

THE STATE BEDS.

Burghley is sumptuously furnished with "State Beds"—(see page 316)—and one of the most superb of them is in "Queen Elizabeth's Bed-room," in the western first floor of the mansion. This state bed has hangings of green velvet on a ground of gold tissue; and a set of chairs with covered seats of the same manufacture. The room is hung with tapestry, the subjects being Actæon and Diana, Bacchus and Ariadne, and Acis and Galatea. Qneen Elizabeth is stated to have occupied the above state bed on her visit to her Lord High Treasurer.

The State Bed fitted up for her Majesty on the late visit is altogether in a different style from the Elizabethan meuble. The carving is of very elegant design, and the walls of the apartment are hung with choice paintings.

The arrangement and decoration of her Majesty's apartments have been designed and executed, with great taste, skill, and convenience.

In one of the northern rooms, known as "the Black Bed-chamber," is an ancient state-bed of black satin, superbly embroidered with flowers, and lined with gold colour; the whole of which has recently been restored by Miss Graham, and is an exquisite specimen of needlework. This room is hung with fine old tapestry; over the chimney are some of Gibbons's carvings; and the windows are beautifully painted.

The following addresses from the Corporation of Stamford to her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert have been presented.

TO THE QUEEN'S MOST EXCELLENT MAJESTY.

We, the mayor, aldermen, burgesses, clergy and other ministers, and the inhabitants at large of your Majesty's ancient and loyal borough of Stamford, most humbly and respectfully solicit permission to approach your Majesty.

We feel that we cannot adequately express the deep sense which we entertain of your Majesty's condescension in honouring Stamford with your presence, and we desire most gratefully to acknowledge the distinguished privilege accorded to us of thus conveying to your Majesty the assurance of our devoted attachment to your Majesty's sacred person, family, crown, and dignity.

That your Majesty's life may be long preserved for the happiness of your faithful subjects, that your reign may be distinguished by the continued glory and increasing prosperity of this great country, and that a gracious Providence may visit your Majesty and your Royal Consort with every personal and domestic blessing, is our most sincere and earnest prayer.

Given under the common seal of the said borough the 12th day of November, in the eighth year of your Majesty's reign.

TO HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS PRINCE ALBERT.

We, the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses, clergy and other ministers, and inhabitants at large, of the borough of Stamford, beg to approach your Royal Highness with the tribute of our unfeigned respect.

As the faithful and devoted subjects of our Queen, we feel that we cannot but most thankfully acknowledge the goodness of Divine Providence, in uniting her Majesty to a consort so calculated to promote her happiness.

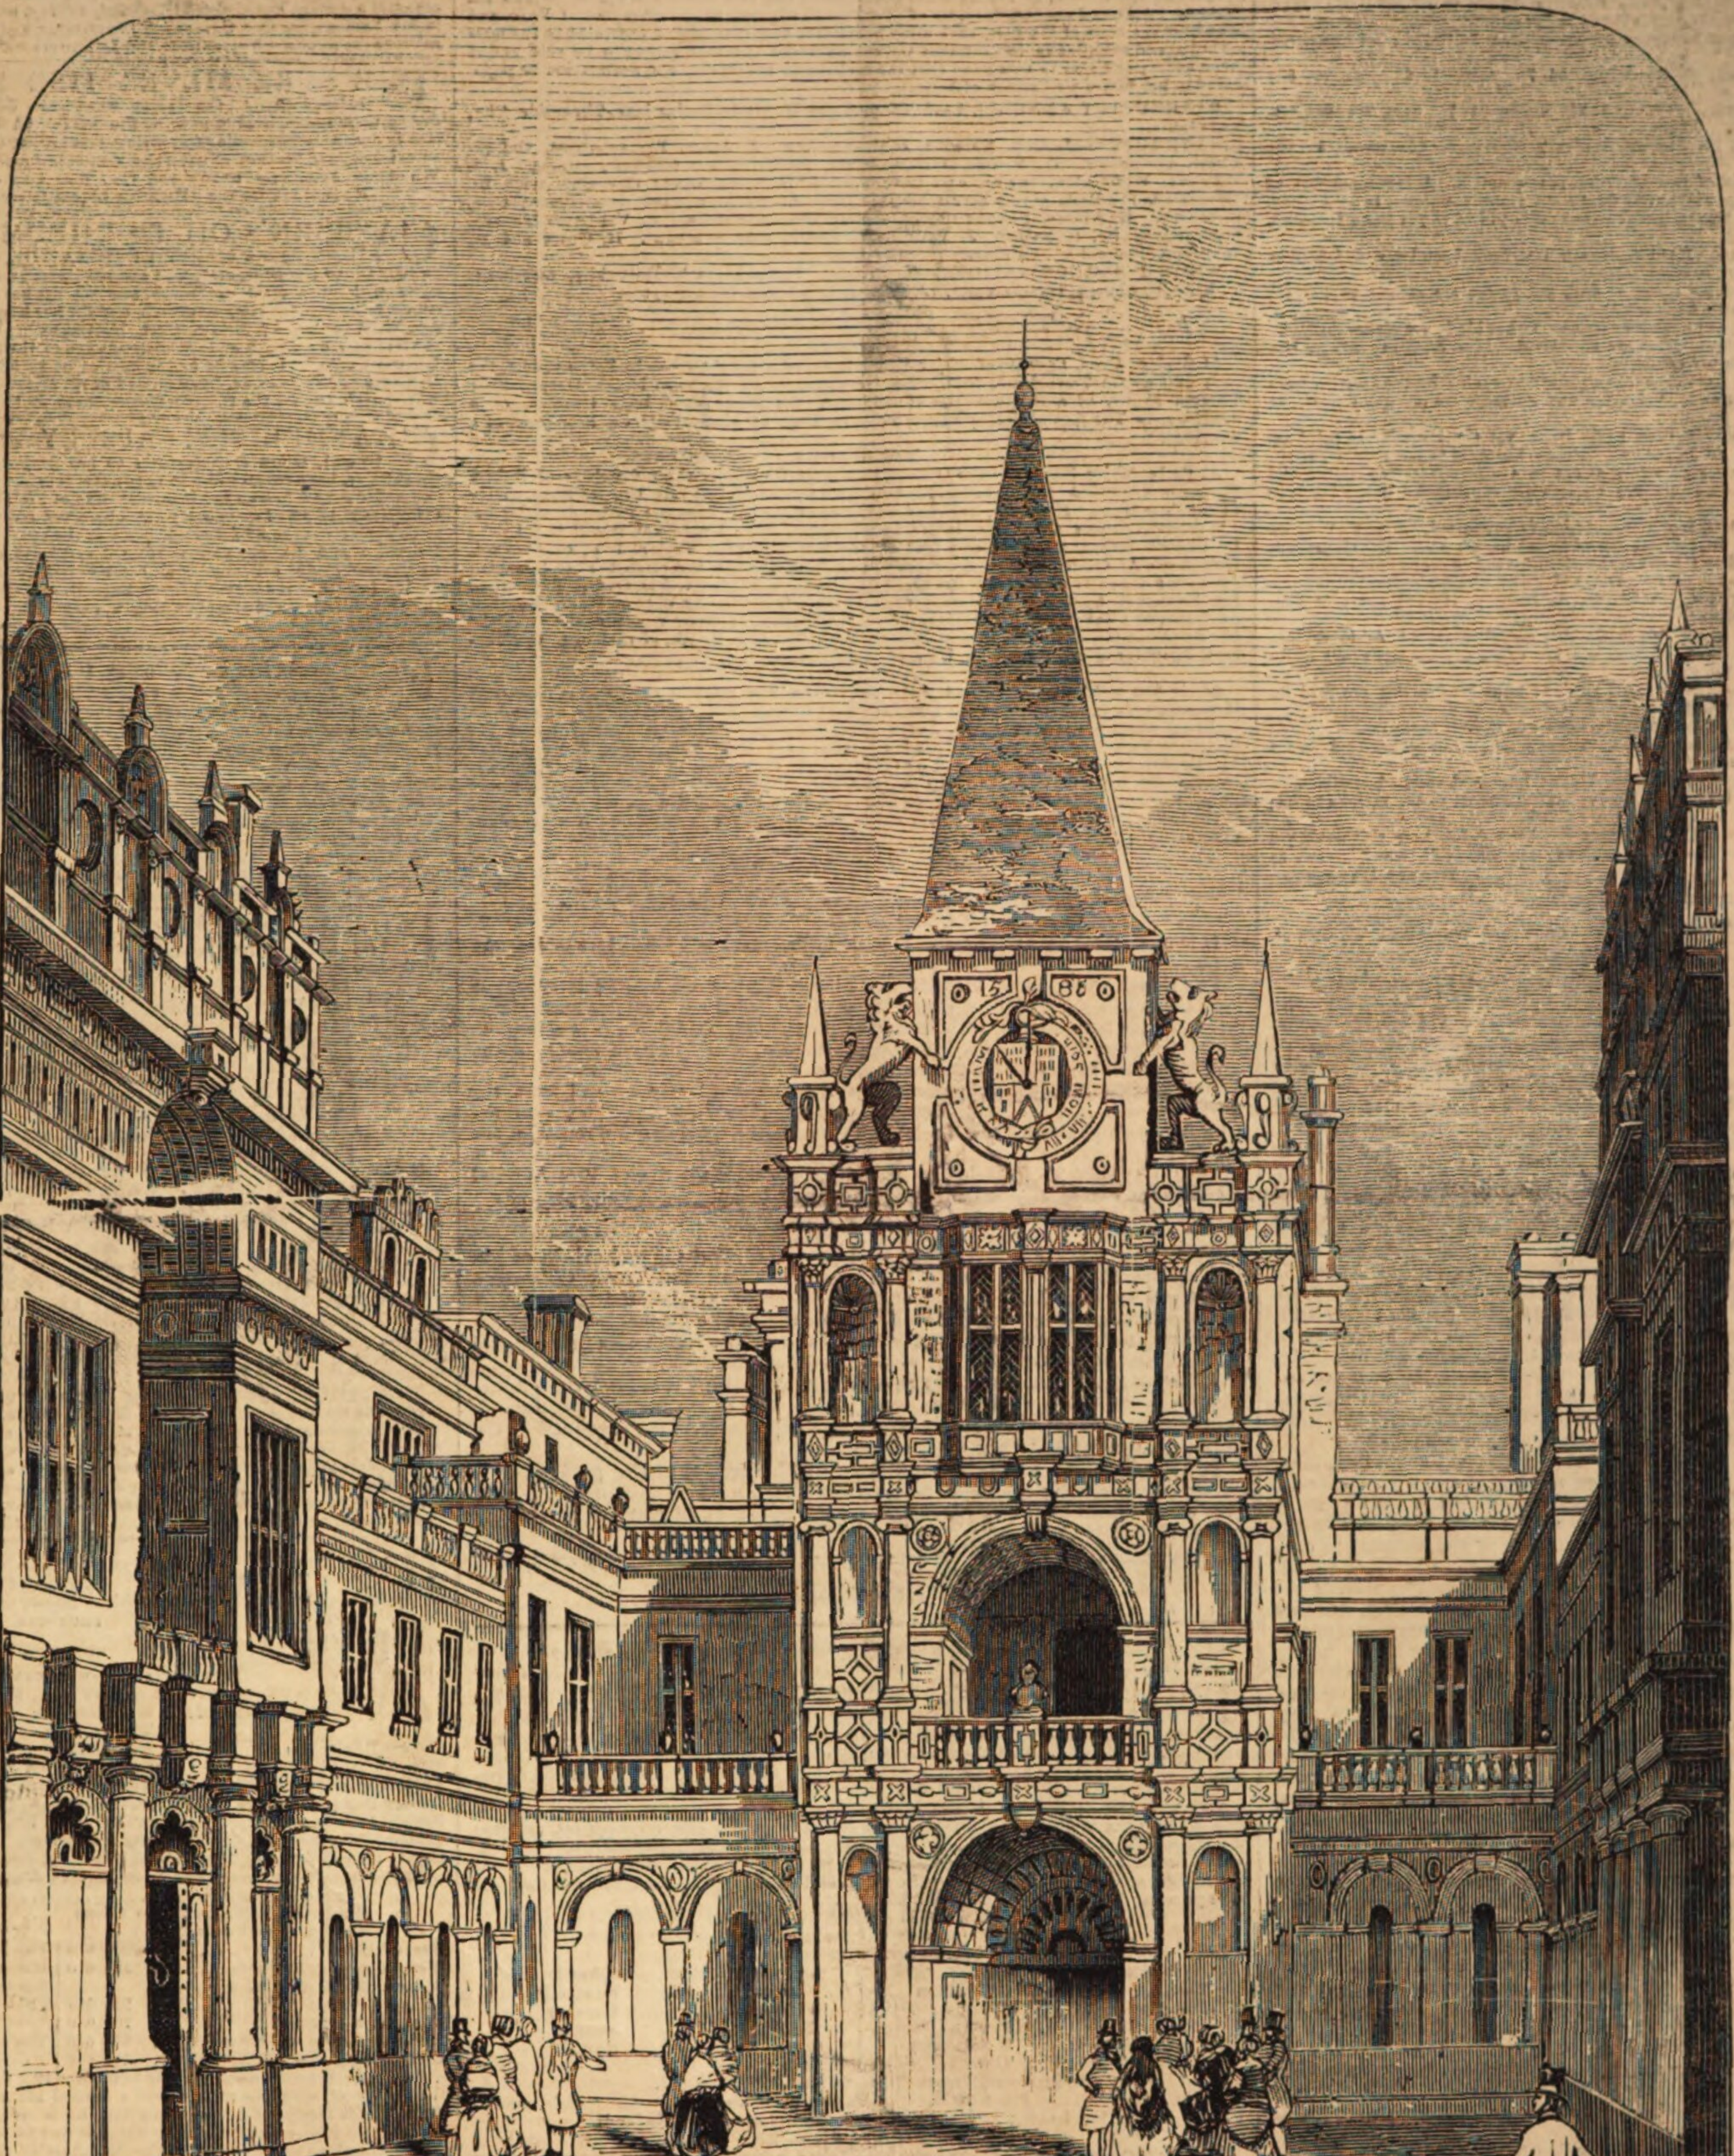
The personal qualities which distinguish your Royal Highness, while they add lustre to your position, have greatly endeared your Royal Highness to the British people, and we rejoice in the opportunity thus specially afforded us of testifying the admiration which we, in common with the rest of the people of this realm, entertain for your character and station.

That every blessing may attend your Royal Highness, is our fervent trust and prayer.

Given under the common seal of the said borough, the 12th day of November, in the eighth year of her Majesty's reign.

"THE COTTAGER'S DAUGHTER" AT BURGHLEY.

In the Billiard-room, at Burghley, hangs a large picture, from the pencil of Lawrence, to which is attached a romantic interest. The circumstances are narrated as follows :—



THE INNER COURT, BURGHLEY.

The present Marquis of Exeter's father was married three times; first, to the only daughter and heiress of Thomas Vernon, Esq., which marriage was dissolved by act of Parliament; secondly, to Sarah Hoggins ("the cottager's daughter"); and thirdly, to a daughter of Peter Burrell, Esq. By the second marriage there were three children, viz.—Lady Sophia, who died in Nov., 1823, after marrying the Right Hon. Henry Manvers Pierrepont; Brownlow, the present and second Marquis; and Lord Thomas Cecil. The visitors to Burghley generally request to be shown the above picture, known as "The Cottager's Daughter:" it contains three portraits—the late Marquis, Countess Sarah, and Lady Sophia; and the following history of it appears in the "Guide to Burghley:"—"Sarah Hoggins was the second wife of Henry, afterwards Earl and Marquis of Exeter, to whom she was married October 3, 1791; she died January 18, 1797, aged 24 years. The Earl died in 1804. The amiable woman whose virtues gave a lustre to the title of Countess of Exeter, and who died lamented by all who knew her, has something so uncommonly interesting in the history of her life, that a detailed sketch cannot but be acceptable to every reader of sensibility. When the late earl was a minor, he married a lady from whom he was afterwards divorced. After the separation had taken place, the earl (his uncle) advised him to retire into the country for some time, and pass as a private gentleman. Mr. Cecil accordingly bent his course into a remote part of Shropshire; and fixing his residence at an inn in a small village, he amused himself there for some months, passing by the name of Jones. He took a dislike to this situation, and sought out a farm-house where he might board and lodge. Several families refused to receive him, but at length he found a situation which answered his purpose; and in consideration of his liberal offers, and the knowledge of his possessing money, a farmer fitted him up rooms for his accommodation. Here he continued to reside for about two years; but time hanging heavy on his hands, he purchased some land, on which he built himself a house. The farmer, at whose house Mr. Cecil resided, had a daughter about 17 years of age, whose rustic beauties threw at an infinite distance all that he had ever beheld in the circle of fashion. Although placed in a humble sphere, Mr. Cecil perceived that her beauty would adorn, and her virtue shed a lustre on the most elevated situation. He, therefore, frankly told the cottagers that he was desirous of marrying their daughter, and the celebration of their nuptials was accordingly consummated. Shortly afterwards, the news arrived of his uncle's death, when he found it necessary to repair to town. Mr. Cecil (now Earl of Exeter), taking his wife with him, set out on his journey, and called at the seats of several noblemen, at which places, to the great astonishment of his wife (now, of course, a Countess), he was welcomed in the most friendly manner. At length they arrived at Burghley, where they were welcomed with acclamations of joy. As soon as he had settled his affairs, the Earl of Exeter returned to Shropshire, discovered his rank to his wife's father and mother, put them into the house he had built there, and settled on them an income of £700 per annum. He afterwards took the Countess with him to London, introduced her to the fashionable world, where she was respected, admired, and adored, until it pleased the Great Dispenser of events to call the spirit of life to a more lasting region of happiness" In Shropshire, Mr. Cecil represented himself to be a landscape painter.

Upon the above interesting subject, Mr. Alfred Tennyson (a son of the late Rev. Dr. Tennyson, rector of Somersby, Lincolnshire, and nephew of the Right Hon. Charles Tennyson d'Eyncourt, formerly M.P. for Stamford), has produced the following beautiful ballad-form composition :—

THE LORD OF BURGHLEY.

In her ear he whispers gaily,
"If my heart by signs can tell,
Maiden, I have watched thee daily,
And I think thou lov'st me well."
She replies, in accents fainter,
"There is none I love like thee."
He is but a landscape painter,
And a village maiden she.
He to lips, that fondly falter,
Presses his without reproof;
Leads her to the village altar,
And they leave her father's roof.
"I can make no marriage present;
Little can I give my wife,
Love will make our cottage pleasant,
And I love thee more than life."
They by parks and lodges going,
See the lordly castles stand:
Summer woods about them blowing,
Made a murmur in the land.
From deep thought himself he rouses,
Says to her that loves him well,
"Let us see these handsome houses,
Where the wealthy nobles dwell."
So she goes by him attended,
Hears him lovingly converse,
Sees whatever fair and splendid
Lay betwixt his home and hers;
Parks with oak and chesnut shady,
Parks and order'd gardens great,
Ancient homes of lord and lady,
Built for pleasure and for state.
All he shows her makes him dearer:
Evermore she seems to gaze
On that cottage growing nearer,
Where they twain will spend their days.
O but she will love him truly!
He shall have a cheerful home;
She will order all things duly,
When beneath his roof they come.
Thus her heart rejoices greatly,
Till a gateway she discerns,
With armorial bearings stately
And beneath the gate she turns;
Sees a mansion more majestic
Than all those she saw before,
Many a gallant gay domestic
Bows before him at the door.
And they speak in gentle murmur,
When they answer to his call,
While he treads with footstep firmer,
Leading on from hall to hall,
And, while now she wonders blindly,
Nor the meaning can divine,
Proudly turns he round and kindly,
"All of this is mine and thine."
Here he lives in state and bounty,
Lord of Burghley, fair and free;
Not a lord in all the county
Is so great a lord as he.
All at once the colour flushes
Her sweet face from brow to chin:
As it were with shame she blushes,
And her spirit changed within.
Then her countenance all over
Pale again as death did prove;
But he clasp'd her like a lover,
And he cheered her soul with love.
So she strove against her weakness,
Though at times her spirits sank;
Shaped her heart with woman's meekness
To all the duties of her rank.
And a gentle consort made he,
And her gentle mind was such,
That she grew a noble lady,
And the people loved her much.
But a trouble weigh'd upon her,
And perplex'd her night and morn,
With the burden of an honour
Unto which she was not born.
Faint she grew, and ever fainter,
As she murmur'd, "Oh, that he
Were once more that landscape painter,
Which did win my heart from me!"
So she drooped and drooped before him,
Fading slowly from his side:
Three fair children first she bore him,
Then before her time she died.
Weeping, weeping, late and early,
Walking up and pacing down,
Deeply mourned the Lord of Burleigh,
Burleigh-house by Stamford town.
And he came to look upon her,
And he look'd at her and said,
"Bring the dress, and put it on her,
That she wore when she was wed."
Then her people, softly treading,
Bore to earth her body, drest
In the dress that she was wed in,
That her spirit might have rest.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE.—The arrivals of English wheat up to our market during the present week, have been extremely moderate, for the time of year. Still, however, the demand for that description of grain has been in a sluggish state. The best qualities have sold at about previous rates; but the value of all other kinds has declined about 1s. per quarter. The show of barley has not been to say large, yet the barley trade has ruled dull, at a decline of 1s per quarter. The Seed Market.—Owing to the large supplies, both linseed and rapeseed have met a very heavy demand, at barely late rates. In other kinds of seeds, exceedingly little is doing.

The following are the present rates:—Linseed, English, sowing, 52s to 58s; Baltic crushing, 38s to 42s; Mediterranean and Odessa, 40s to 42s; hempseed, 35s to 38s per quarter; coriander, 15s to 18s per cwt.; brown mustard seed, —s to —s; white ditto, —s to —s; tares, —s to —s per bushel; English rapeseed, £23 to £25 per last of ten quarters; Linseed cakes, English, £10 10s to £11; do., Foreign, £6 15s to £7 per 1000; rapeseed cakes, £5 10s to £6 6s per ton; canary, 54s to 56s per quarter.

Tea.—The transactions in all kinds of tea since our last have been large, and further improved rates have been realised by the importers.

Coffee.—On the whole the demand for coffee is dull, yet prices are mostly supported. Good ordinary Ceylon has sold at 54s to 55s per cwt.

Cocoa.—West India is in good request at former terms. Other kinds are rather dull.

Dutch butter is in fair request, at 92s to 98s for the best brands. Bacon goes off freely, at 46s to 47s for Waterford landed, and 44s to 45s for heavy. In lard but little is doing, yet prices are supported. Other kinds of provisions are rather dull.

ROBERT HERBERT.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

The separation of the banking department from that of the issue, placing the latter under immediate Government controul, has had the effect of making the Bank of England mainly dependent upon its banking business for the profits necessary to pay the dividends on its stock. It was, therefore, to be anticipated that the directors would avail themselves of all fair opportunities of competing with the banks and banking companies in the furtherance of this object. The first step taken, it will be remembered, was a reduction in the rate of discount, and this has now been followed by an alteration in their arrangements with regard to the remittance of money. Hitherto, a party having an account at the Bank or one of its branches, has not been charged commission upon any sum remitted by him or to him through its agency. This privilege will now cease; and all sums remitted to persons having drawing accounts at the Bank or its branches, will be charged 6d. per cent. The smallest charge will be 1s., and the fraction of 100 is to be charged as 100. Parties not having an account with the Bank or its branches, will be charged ½ per cent. on sums not exceeding £500, the smallest charge being 2s 6d. Above £500, and not exceeding £3000, the same rate will be charged; but on all above the £3000, 1s. 6d. per cent. Should, however, the party have an account with the Bank, but remit the money to be paid on demand to any party not having an account, the charge will be—under £100, 2s. 6d.; above £100 and under £300, 4s. 6d.; above £300 and not exceeding £3000, 1s. 6d.; and all exceeding £3000, 1s. per cent. This measure will doubtless be followed by other changes which will tend to render the Bank of England a gigantic competitor to the private and joint stock banks.

The French Government loan, amounting to about £8,000,000 sterling, may, it is supposed, have some effect upon the money market here. This, however, is at present purely conjectural, and has no connexion with the depression of Exchequer Bills. The gradual advance of the value of money, coupled with the amount of capital required to commence only a portion of the railways in contemplation, is sufficient to account for the decline in the value of those securities. The Consol Market, which has been comparatively inactive during the week, is mainly supported by the purchase of the Government Broker, and that description of investments which cannot be delayed. A temporary scarcity of stock is thus created, but upon the slightest demand for money in the house, Consols immediately declined. This was the case on Tuesday. Consols were done at par, but some real transactions, backed by a few speculative purchases, caused a re-action, and the closing quotation was 100¼ to ⅜. On Wednesday, however, a sale of 90,000 Consols caused a decline of about ¼ per cent., and although the price rallied on the following day, the advance has been barely maintained. At the close of the week, the Exchequer Market was very heavy, and large bills quoted only 58 to 56; small do., 60 to 58. Consols closed at 100¼ for Account, and 100⅛ to ⅜ for money; Three per Cent. Reduced, 99½ to ⅝; Three-and-a-Quarter per Cents., 102 to ⅛; Long Annuities, 12; India Bonds, 75; Bank Stock, 204½.

The Foreign Market was heavy at the commencement of the week, Spanish Five per Cents. quoting 24½ to ¼; the Three per Cents, 35⅝ ¾. Mexican was, on the contrary, firm, upon the news brought by the last mail. This improved feeling, however, brought sellers into the market on Tuesday, and the price yielded a fraction. The declaration of M. Mon, the Spanish Finance Minister, that the payment of the dividend on the Three per Cents. due in December had been secured, has not had the effect of improving prices, the Five per Cents. closing at 24¼; Three per Cents., 35½. The new certificates of the Dutch Four per Cent. stock are finding their way into the market—the last quotation for them is 96¾. The Two-and-a-Half per Cents. continue to maintain a disproportionate value both to the Four and Five per Cents., quoting 62½. The Five per Cents. closed at 99½; Chilian is 102; Columbian, 14; Portuguese maintains its advance, quoting 54¾; and Mexican, 35¾.

The Railway Market has been steady, but without any great amount of business. The Sheffield and Manchester Railway have leased their line for thirty years to the Manchester and Birmingham and Midland Companies, at a variable rent, but never less than five per cent. The settling on Thursday passed off without much difficulty, although many accounts have been carried over, in the hopes of an improvement in prices. Business in the French lines is not so brisk as it has been, and the tendency of the market is rather towards a decline. The closing prices of the week are (where no reference to premium or discount is made) per share as follows:—Birmingham and Gloucester, 100 to 101; Bristol and Exeter, 70; Chester and Holyhead, 5¾; Churnet Valley, 3; Eastern Counties, 13⅞; Great Western, 137 to 139½; Birmingham (Stock), 215 to 216; Blackwall, 6½; Sheffield and Lincoln, 1⅝; Manchester and Birmingham, 48 to 50; Norwich and Brandon, 10; Trent Valley, 7⅞; South Western, 73¾; Croydon, 16⅜; London and York, 2⅞; Direct Northern, 2⅛; Edinburgh and Glasgow, 57½; Orleans and Bordeaux, 3⅞; Orleans and Vierzon, 9½; Paris and Orleans, 39¼; Paris and Rouen, 38¾; Rouen and Havre, 22¼.

The Royal steam-yacht Victoria and Albert, Capt. Lord A. Fitzclarence, has been taken into dock at Portsmouth for further alterations. All her magnificent furniture has been landed, and her Senior Lieutenant, Cringham, is promoted to be Commander, and succeeded by Lieut. Robson, who will have charge of the brig Nautilus, 10, fitting for Channel service.

The steamer Vesuvius, Commander Ommanney, recently arrived from the Mediterranean, will be paid off at Woolwich on Tuesday, at which port the new steam-ship Rattler, awaits being commissioned, being quite ready for the pendant.

The Cornwallis, 72, Captain Richards, having struck the flag of Vice-Admiral Sir William Parker, is gone to Plymouth, there to be dismantled and paid off.

The Countess de Sonnaz, consort of the Grand Chamberlain of his Majesty the King of Sardinia, died recently at Turin. The Noble Countess's death was occasioned by a most shocking and lamentable occurrence. The Countess, while engaged in searching for some article in a cabinet in her boudoir, by an unfortunate accident shook the piece of furniture, which overbalanced, fell on the Countess, and crushed her to death on the spot.

A letter from Tangiers of the 30th ult. mentions a report that Abd-el-Kader, after having taken refuge at Melilla, one of the Spanish presidios on the coast of Morocco, had withdrawn to the south, to avoid the execution of the orders communicated to him by the Emperor.

It appears by a letter from Berlin of the 3rd, that the project of a canal from Sweden to the Baltic Sea, by which vessels which now pass from Elsinore to Helsinbourg and pay the Sound duties, would avoid that tax, is seriously contemplated.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.—M. JULLIEN'S ANNUAL SERIES OF CONCERTS.—M JULLIEN has the honour to announce that his Annual Series of Concerts commenced on FRIDAY, Nov. 15, 1844. The Proprietors of the Theatre Royal, Covent Garden, having last year placed their splendid theatre entirely at M. JULLIEN'S disposal, allowed him thereby an opportunity of testing the attraction of his Entertainments in a building of greatly increased dimensions. That experiment having been crowned with the most complete success, it is with feelings of great satisfaction M. JULLIEN is enabled to state that he has entered into a new arrangement, and that the present series of Concerts will also be held at that National Establishment. M. JULLIEN, however, regrets that the Theatre being required at Christmas for dramatic purposes, the Concerts can this Season continue for ONE MONTH ONLY; the LAST will therefore take place on SATURDAY, DECEMBER 14th.

WOLLASTON'S PATENT GELATINE, for immediately making Jellies or Blanc-mange, being quickly dissolved in boiling water. It is of equal strength with the finest Russian Isinglass, and perfectly free from any unpleasant taste or smell, requiring less flavouring than any other preparation of Gelatine or Isinglass, being a perfectly pure, colourless, and soluble substance. For Jellies, it will not be found necessary to use eggs, as passing through a flannel bag is sufficient. Invalids will find this a very nourishing and valuable restorative, from the great facility and readiness with which it is used, and not being liable to become sour so soon as isinglass.—Manufactured by Edward L. Wollaston, Dover. Sold wholesale by Messrs. Barclay and Sons, Farringdon-street; Messrs. Edwards, 67, St. Paul's Churchyard; Messrs. Evans and Lercher, Bartholomew-close; Messrs. OPENING of the NEW ROYAL EXCHANGE.—Future English Historians have a fine field for elegant narration in recording the gorgeous spectacle of Queen Victoria opening the New Royal Exchange. The tens of thousands who witnessed this ever memorable event, when they beheld their Queen, it was as if the very windows spoke; such eager looks, such vivid, sparkling, animated eyes, gazing with rapture on the glorious scene! while the all-attractive charms of the fair actresses shone resplendent in their power, and the white and swan-like neck, the rich, luxuriant tress, and the pearly set of teeth, formed admirable trophies of the Inestimable Qualities of ROWLAND'S KALYDOR, ROWLAND'S MACASSAR OIL, and ROWLAND'S ODONTO. The august patronage conceded by our gracious Queen, and the several Sovereigns of Europe, together with the beauties which adorn the circles of princely and regal magnificence; and the confirmation, by experience, of the infallible efficacy of these creative, renovative Specifics, have characterised them with perfection, and given them a celebrity unparalleled. They have proved the theme of the poet; they are celebrated in the periodical literature of the whole civilised world: the lays of Byron, and the voice of the universal press, have proclaimed the incomparable virtues of the "Oil Macassar," and of its accompanying preparations.—Evening Paper.

Gentlemen.—If my case is of any value to you I beg you will make the best use of it, as I have suffered too much from Gout and Rheumatism not to have the strongest sympathy for all who may be similarly afflicted. I purchased only one bottle of your Cod Liver Oil, and after a few applications was completely cured. I could say much in praise of this miraculous remedy, and shall be happy to reply to all enquiries.
I am, Gentlemen, your thankful and obedient servant,

Gentlemen.—About 4 months since I was attacked with a disease of the legs, for which I was admitted into St. Thomas's Hospital, and remained there a month subject to all kinds of treatment. I left the hospital to try the advice of several medical men, and all without the least benefit. I was at length advised by a friend to try a small bottle of your Cod Liver Oil, and from the very first application experienced relief, and before using the whole of the small bottle, was perfectly cured and have remained in perfect health to this day.

Examined by chemical tests, it is found perfectly free from acid, and fully stronger than the best isinglass in the London market, and affords a Jelly (in a few minutes) equal in all respects to, if not richer and more crystalline than, that prepared from calves'-feet."—Agent in London, Mr. Henry Watson, No. 11, Old Fish-street, City.—Patent Gelatine Works, Gorgie Mills, Edinburgh.

THE HAIR.—Of the numerous compounds constantly announced, for promoting the growth or reproduction of the Hair, few survive even in name, beyond a very limited period, whilst ROWLAND'S MACASSAR OIL, with a reputation unparalleled, is still on the increase in public estimation. The singular virtues of this successful invention for Restoring, Preserving, and Beautifying the Human Hair, are too well known and appreciated to need comment. The very facts of the high and distinguished patronage it enjoys, its general use in all countries, together with numerous testimonials constantly received in its favour, are authorities which stamp its superior excellence and title over all attempts of a similar nature. Being universally preferred, its consequent great demand excites the cupidity of unprincipled shopkeepers, who vend the most spurious trash as the "genuine" Macassar Oil; whereas, the genuine article is wholly the invention and property of A. Rowland and Son, and the amalgamation of its costly exotic materials (solely imported by them) renders abortive any attempt to discover its component parts—thus proving the imposition of all other articles bearing the title of "Macassar Oil." The genuine article has the words ROWLAND'S MACASSAR OIL engraved in two lines on the Wrapper; and on the back of the wrapper nearly 1500 times, containing 29,028 letters.—Price 3s. 6d., 7s; Family bottles (equal to four small), 10s. 6d.; and double that size, 21s. per bottle.— All others are FRAUDULENT COUNTERFEITS!!!

TOWN AND HARBOUR OF HAVANNAH.

HAVANNAH.

Havannah, the capital of the island of Cuba, and the whole of its northern and southern shores, have just been the scene of a dire calamity, by which the prospects of the sugar crop are rendered infinitely worse than before. By a letter just received from Messrs. L. Mariategai and Co, of Havannah, of the 10th of October, to their correspondent in London, Mr. F. Scheer, of Adam's-court, Old Broad-street, we learn that "a strong gale commenced on the 1st of October, and increased on the night of the 4th to the most terrific hurricane that was ever experienced in the island, which lasted until the middle of next day, accompanied by a violent deluge of rain, mixed with spray from the sea. Houses were thrown down, and trees rooted up; several small towns and villages in the interior are said to present little more than heaps of ruins. The accounts from the estates announce the most serious injury; whole fields of cane appear as if fire had passed over them, and the buildings on the plantations have been thrown to the ground. It is difficult as yet to form an estimate of the vast amount of property destroyed, or of the probable influence of the calamity on the quantity of sugar next season; the most moderate calculation at present is, that the crop will be deficient by at least one half. The cane that is most forward has suffered most, having been snapped asunder, while the young cane bent before the storm; many estates will not grind at all. In Matanzas a great part of the little stock of sugars remaining has perished, as the water penetrated into the warehouses, and even rose several feet. The damage suffered on the south side of the island seems, if possible, to have been still greater than on the north side. In our harbour (Havannah), and that of Matanzas, scarcely a vessel escaped without injury, more or less serious, and the greater part of the coasters employed to convey produce to the ports of shipment, and to supply the estates with necessaries, have been entirely destroyed.

"Our Government has issued an order admitting free of duty, from yesterday, rice, potatoes, beans, corn, and corn-meal, as well as all kinds of timber used for building; lowering also the duty on cattle. Further relaxations on other articles are contemplated, if the necessity should become apparent.

"We may now expect that planters will retain the remaining stock of this year's sugars with a firm hand, and that little or no business will be done for some time to come. They will naturally anticipate that the news will occasion a considerable advance of prices in Europe, particularly if the calamity should have extended to other West India islands. As for the coffee crop it is almost destroyed, and we cannot hope to see any exported from this port and Matanzas."

Our engraving, from a sketch by Lieut. W. T. Bellairs, R.N., shows the harbour of Havannah, which is one of the most commodious in the world, communicating with the sea by a channel little more than half a mile in length, and from 300 to 350 yards wide; its depth varying from 8 to 10 fathoms. The harbour itself is an oblong basin, surrounded by heights which usually shelter it from the wind. Hence, the violence of the late gale must have been tremendous. The town is built on the western side of the basin, near the channel, on a kind of promontory. The channel is protected by two strong fortresses, El Morro and La Punta, and a continuous series of batteries along both shores. The town is equally strong towards the land.

The streets are narrow, crooked, and generally unpaved, but they contain some well-built houses. There are, too, several good buildings among the churches, one of which contains the remains of Christopher Columbus. The other large edifices, as the Palace of the Government (shown to the right of the engraving), that of the Commandant of the Marine, the Arsenal, the Post-office, and the buildings used for the manufacture of tobacco, are less remarkable for their architecture than for their solidity. The town has also a theatre, a circus for bull-fights, two fine promenades, a university, a seminary for Catholic priests, a patriotic society, and a botanic garden. The town is the seat of the Captain-General and of a Bishop. The most important manufactures are those of cigars and chocolate. More than half the produce of the island destined for foreign markets is shipped at Havannah. The climate of the town is very unhealthy and the ravages of the yellow fever there are truly frightful.

CHESS.

In resuming this department of our journal we have obtained the co-operation of a distinguished member of the London Chess Club, and are enabled to promise our readers a considerable accession of amusement; at the same time we invite communications relative to matches pending at clubs, problems, or any well contested games, all of which will receive insertion, should they be deemed sufficiently interesting to the amateur.

CHESS STUDIES. By GEORGE WALKER, 8vo. Longman.

Mr. Walker, to whom all Chess players are under great obligations, has, in the compilation and arrangement of this admirably printed volume, shown himself to be possessed of untiring perseverance and industry. It is certainly the most valuable Chess publication that has hitherto appeared, containing, as it does, the best games of the finest players in Europe, both living and dead.

THE WEATHER.—On Tuesday ripe raspberries were gathered in the grounds of Mr. Park, gardener and florist, Victoria-road, Kensington, and ripe strawberries also in the grounds of another gardener near Hounslow, the richness and flavour of which could only be equalled by those produced in the height of the summer season.

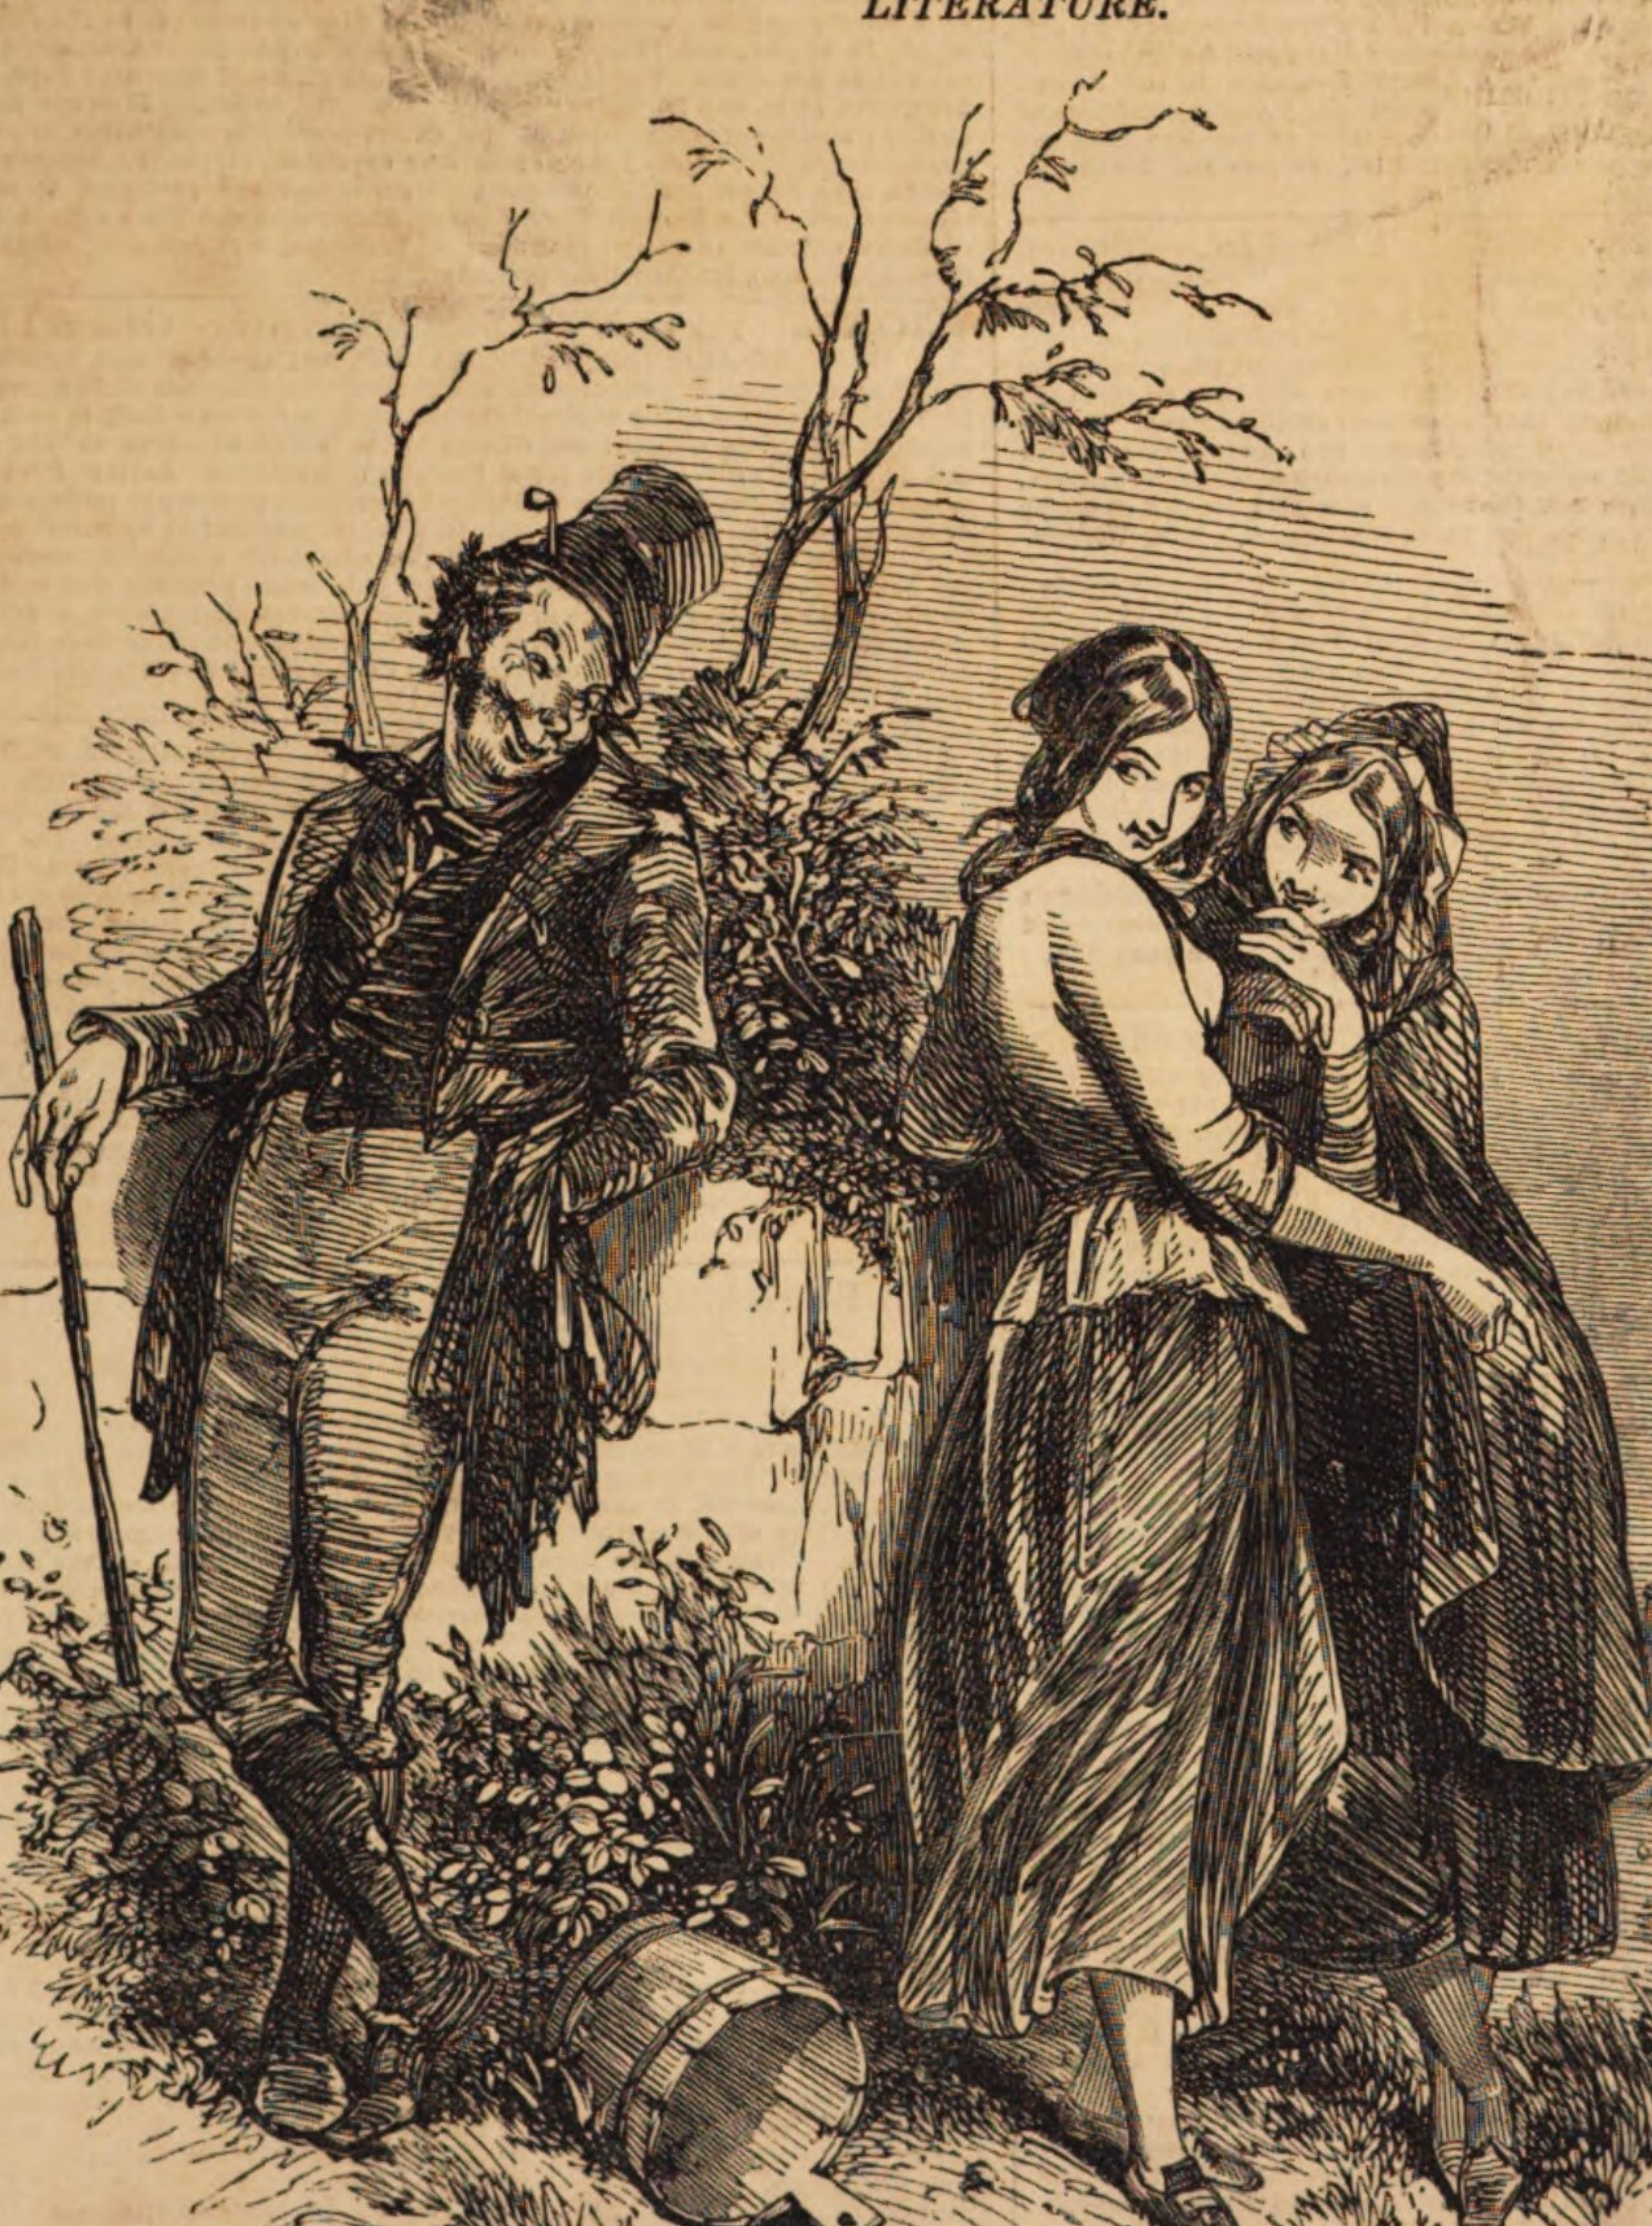
We are sorry to announce the death of Mr. William Grieve, of Drury-lane Theatre, whose talents as a painter of the highest rank have on so many occasions been appreciated by the public. He died on Tuesday morning. Mr. Grieve has left a widow and several children.

LIGHTING OF THE CHAPEL ROYAL.—The Chapel Royal at Buckingham Palace has recently been fitted up with gas lights, enclosed with large glass globes, ornamented with appropriate inscriptions, and fixed upon handsome ormolu columns. They are ventilated upon Professor Faraday's principle of conveying away from the lights all the noxious products of combustion, by means of a descending draught, which is obtained in this instance by the assistance of Dr. Reid's ventilating shaft and apparatus. Prince Albert visited the chapel on Monday evening, and expressed himself much pleased with the perfect success o this application of that invention, as well as with the chaste and brilliant effect produced by the lights.

RAPID CONVEYANCE OF GOODS FROM SOUTHAMPTON.—A novel and rather important experiment in the fruit trade has been tried by the enterprising brokers Messrs. Keeling and Hunt. The Eleanor, Captain Wickham, arrived from Fayal in eleven days, discharged her cargo of 950 boxes of oranges at Southampton on Saturday evening last, which were immediately despatched by the Southampton railway to London, and had not Sunday intervened, they would have been on sale in London twenty-four hours after they had been landed at Southampton. Every facility was afforded by the Customs in expediting the unloading of the cargo; and the railway directors were so impressed with the importance attached to the result of the operation, that special engines were ordered to be ap-plied, if found necessary, to increase the speed to London: and the result being attended with the best success, will, no doubt, be productive of much increasedbusiness to the port of Southampton.

MELANCHOLY CASE OF DESTITUTION.—On Monday an inquest was held at Camberwell, on the body of a Mr. Mason, aged 70, who had died under very lamentable circumstances. It appeared from the statement of the daughter of the deceased that her father had formerly been a principal partner in the firm of Mason and Meyer, opulent lead-merchants and refiners of antimony, in the Blackfriars-road, but latterly they had been so reduced, that they had been compelled to sell their furniture and pawn every article of wearing apparel. They lived in East-street, Walworth, and afterwards went to a miserable lodging in White-street, Borough, where they both slept in the same room. The parochial authorities of St. George, Southwark, gave them some relief, and ultimately the poor old man was taken, much against his will, in a very debilitated state, from want of food, to Camberwell workhouse, where he died. Mr. Thomas King, surgeon to Camberwell parish, said death had been caused by serous apoplexy, which the want of food and proper ventilation of dwelling would sometimes cause Deceased would have died, if he had not been removed, though removal had probably accelerated it, as he was not in a proper state to bear it. The jury returned a verdict of "Natural death from serous apoplexy." The unfortunate daughter subsequently stated that she should be most thankful if any kind individual could obtain her a situation as a governess or some other suitable occupation in order that she might be able to quit the workhouse, which, she stated, was equally as repugnant to her feelings as to those of her deceased parent. The unfortunate woman, who is about forty, appeared to be of elegant manners, but was attired as a pauper.

LITERATURE.



DRAWN BY PHIZ.

There's our beautiful eye of grey, Sir,
And our blue one that seems to say, Sir,
If your intintions lie in that way, Sir,
His reverence lives hard by!

Such is the verse from Doctor O'Toole's "Grand Historical Lilt," in the "Illuminated Magazine" for the present month, which Phiz has illustrated in true poetic vein: it is, indeed, a masterpiece of graphic humour.

THE AMERICAN PRESIDENCY.

THE periodical election of the American President is now almost the only remaining instance of the elective principle applied to creating the head of a state. It has been abandoned by the Monarchies of Europe, but it flourishes in the Republic of the Western World. If it is found to work well and tends to promote the strength, peace, and unity of the States, we hope it will long continue to be the main and vital principle of the Constitution. But in the Europe of former ages, the election by the people of its head or chief, produced disputes, hatreds, division—then the weakness consequent upon them, and slavery last of all—for a weak nation never long remains a free one. Poland was an elective Monarchy long after all the other states of Europe had allowed their Kings to become such in virtue of their birth—a thing that could not be disputed,—rather than for the claims afforded by their virtues, talents, or wealth; in all which, let a man be as wealthy, as virtuouss and as talented as he may, he will find others ready to dispute the choice with him on the same grounds, either as to one quality or even all. It may seem irrational enough that men should prefer to have their rulers determined by accident rather than by their fitness for the office. But this very fitness is the most difficult thing to get generally acknowledged; and the controversies created by the freedom of choice, work more harm in a State than even the bad qualities of a ruler by right of birth. Nearly every existing Monarchy has its definite laws and constitutional forms, which prevent the power of the ruler going too far for the safety of the people. If those safeguards are broken, and the compact violated, the people can exercise another kind of privilege—that of deposing, as they have often and very effectively proved. Such Monarchies as that of Russia are fortunately not universal; nor does the complete despotic power of the Emperor there arise from his succeeding to his throne by hereditary title—not by the choice of a popular suffrage. Victoria wears the crown of England as much by right of birth as Nicholas; but in all else how different is their power! We know our American friends are inclined to pride themselves considerably on their political liberty to a degree not altogether reasonable; many of them believe that no liberty can exist under any Constitution that differs in form from their own. They prize their periodical election of a President as a sort of constantly-recurring triumph of the democratic principle. They are at present in the midst of a contest for that office; and much excitement is a consequence. The name of England is mixed up with it; a suspicion of a greater or less bias towards England will probably do much to turn the scale one way or other. We will therefore take the opportunity, while giving a full and fair account of both parties and their proceedings, to say a few words in vindication of that quiet and settled principle, which, leaving the highest office of the State hereditary, gives a fixed centre from which all the governing powers proceed. This is one advantage; but a far greater one is the absence of all that fever of excitement—that almost madness of party spirit—which in America hardly ever ceases. The strife during which one President is elected is hardly over before it begins on the prospect of the election of another.

As long as the United States continue to be the great preponderating political power of the Western Continent, there may be less danger in these contests; but if time and circumstance divide them—and it is not impossible—into two rival powers, the elective principle will break down. If the Republic were at the present moment the near neighbour of a strong and wealthy Monarchy, she would not preserve her independence; her divisions would ruin her. Poland is the last kingdom in Europe that preserved an elective Monarchy—and it destroyed her; of all nations she is, at this moment, the most completely and cruelly enslaved. Venice was a Republic with an elected head, and thoughthe Doges were chosen for life, and that by the nobles only—not the people—a Monarchy has absorbed it. Nearly every Republic has ended by becoming a Monarchy; only once in modern history has a Monarchy become a Republic, and a few brief years saw it trodden beneath the hoof of a military despotism—of all forms of Government the worst.

While the Americans, then, are mustering their strength for the elective battle, in monster meetings, processions en masse, speeches, shoutings, canvassings, with much that is stirring, much that is picturesque, perhaps, but more that is mischievous—let them not imagine that all political liberty is enshrined in the Constitution of which they are so often, and sometimes, we must add, so inordinately proud: there is, at least, something to be said on the other side of the question.

The rival candidates for the office are Mr. Polk and Mr. Clay; we have given portraits of both of them, and a sketch of a "Procession" in New York.

APPROACHING ELECTION OF THE AMERICAN PRESIDENT.

We have just received the annexed interesting sketches from our correspondent at New York; they are accompanied by the following important details:—

The great political contest for the ascendancy between the two powerful parties of Whig and Democratic in the United States, is now (Nov. 1) near at hand; and these respective juntas are marshalling their forces, discussing the broad principles of their doctrine and political faith, exciting the multitude by cannon-firing, song-singing, soul-stirring music, processions, harangues, &c. Collateral questions seem to be merged in the chief subjects of protective tariff, or free trade; United States Bank, or no bank; Texas with the Union, or the Union without Texas; equal distribution of the land funds, according to the ratio of the population of each state, or no distribution, &c.

Within the last few years, another question, too, has sprung up, which has given rise to a new party—it is the question of the naturalization of foreigners. The Constitution of the United States provides that a foreigner shall have been seven years in the country before he becomes a voter, and shall have gone through the regular forms of naturalization. It also stipulates that a native-born citizen shall have arrived at the age of twenty-one years, before he be allowed the privileges of citizenship and the right of suffrage. These stipulations are separate and exclusive of provisions of respective states, where a property qulification is necessary. This has been a question of serious meditation among all classes, whether a foreigner should attain his citizenship and the right of suffrage in one-third less time than a native-born citizen. A party called the "Native Americans" has been formed, which seeks to repeal the present naturalization laws, and render it compulsory on the foreigner to have completed a residence of twenty-one years, in the United States, before he becomes a voter for any office in the gift of the people. One subject composing a part of the principles of this party, on account of which they are anxious to extend the time of naturalization, is that of papacy. They disclaim holding any hostile feelings towards that system of Christain faith as such, but they are distrustful of the influence it may yet exert over the politics of this country.

This party is now becoming very popular, and at the late canvassing, has elected several of its candidates in different states. The native American party is probably stronger in the states of Pennsylvania, New York, and Louisiana, than in other states of the Union, for the reason that these states have suffered more from the innovation of foreigners, and their influence at the polls. It is not yet known for which candidate for the Presidency this party will cast their votes: but it it presumed they will favour the Whig candidate, as the Democratic party has heretofore received the suffrages of naturalized foreigners.

There are, virtually, three candidates for the Presidency, but really, only two; for the abolition candidate (Mr. Birney) has been put in nomination only by a few of the states, and will receive but a small number of votes.

The grand contest, then, is between Messrs. Polk and Clay, and present appearances indicate that it will be a close one. In as brief a manner as possible we shall give a sketch of the political histories of these distinguished men, and of their claims to the high office for which they are singled.

James Knox Polk is the Democratic candidate for the office of President of the United States. He is a North Carolinian by birth, and at present a citizen of Tennessee. He was born in Mecklenburgh on the 2nd November, 1795, and is consequently in the forty-ninth year of his age. His ancestors, whose original name, Pollock, has, by obvious transition, assumed its present form, emigrated from Ireland. His uncle, Colonel Thomas Polk, was one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence, and the prime mover of the formal Manifesto of Independence issued in North Carolina, one year before the Declaration of the States, on the 4th July, 1776.

Mr. Polk emigrated to Tennessee with his father in 1806; entered the University of North Carolina in 1815, where he distinguished himself as the first scholar in mathematics and the classics. He returned to Tennessee, and became a practitioner at the bar; in 1823, was chosen representative to the State Legislature; in 1825, a member of Congress; placed in the Committee of Foreign Affairs; in 1835, elected Speaker of the House of Representatives, and also in 1837; in 1839, was chosen Governor of Tennessee under a Democratic gain of 22,000 votes. He has now received the unanimous nomination of the National Democratic Convention for President.

Mr. Polk's political character has always born the stamp of consistency. He is of the school which puts a strict construction upon the powers of the Constitution, and consequently, is an enemy to the various projects of the Whig party; to the making of public roads and canals within the States by the General Government; to the creation of a National Bank; to the distribution of the surplus revenue among the States, &c. When General Jackson was President of the United States, Mr. Polk supported, with ability, the principal measures of his administration.

Mr. Polk's talents are respectable. His private character is spotless, his demeanour courteous, but manly, and his impulses generous. His predilections are in favour of the admission of Texas into the Union; but, should he be elected to the office of President, it is by no means certain that such an event would transpire.

Henry Clay is the Whig candidate for President. He is a native of Hanover county, Virginia, and at present a citizen of Kentucky. He was born on the 12th April, 1777. His father was a Baptist clergyman. Mr. Clay first became distinguished as a criminal pleader in Lexington, Kentucky, where he practiced at the bar. He was engaged in the celebrated trial of Aaron Burr, when arrested in Kentucky, for high treason. He was chosen a member of the Kentucky Legislature; and in 1806, he took his seat in the Senate of the United States, to serve the fraction of a term occasioned by the resignation of Hon. John Adair. Retiring from the United States Senate, he was again chosen to the Legislature of Kentucky. In 1810, he took his seat a second time in the Senate. He opposed the renewal of the charter of the United States Bank. He was in favour of the war with Great Britain. He was chosen a member and afterwards Speaker of the House of Representatives. In 1813 he was appointed one of the commisioners to Ghent, to arrange a treaty of peace with Great Britain. Returning home in 1815, he was again elected to the Congress of the United States. He now advocated the re-chartering of the United States Bank, which he opposed in 1811. In 1824, he made his great speech in favour of American industry. This year he was the candidate of his party for President of the United States. Messrs. Jackson, Adams, and Crawford were the highest candidates, but neither having a plurality of votes, the choice devolved on the House of Representatives, of which Mr. Clay was a member. Mr. Clay and his friends turned the balance in favour of Mr. Adams, and he was elected. Mr. Clay was immediately appointed Secretary of State by Mr. Adams, which office he accepted. This circumstance gave rise to a charge of bargain and corruption on the part of Mr. Clay, which, it would seem, has never been fully substantiated, though it has been the means of prejudicing the public mind against the political honesty of this distinguished man. In 1831, in the administration of President Jackson, he was again sent to the Senate of the United States. The same year he was nominated by the National Republican Convention again for President of the United States, and was defeated by General Jackson; was re-elected to the Senate in 1836, and was succeeded, in 1842, by Mr Critenden.

Mr. Clay, in person, is tall, erect, and commanding. He is a most eloquent and impressive speaker. Our engraving is a capital likeness of his face, which indicates a powerful and brilliiant intellect.

Mode of Electing a President.—In all the states, with one or two exceptions, Presidental Electors are chosen by the people. The electors constitute one from each congressional district in the respective States, and are chosen in November, once every four years, which is the term of office prescribed by the Constitution for the President. The electors having been chosen, meet in electoral colleges, cast their votes for the men of their choice, which votes are transmitted to the seat of Government under seal, and opened before both Houses of Congress. Should a plurality of votes appear for any one man, he is declared elected, and the same system is observed with regard to the Vice-President. Should neither candidate have a plurality of votes, the choice devolves on the lower house. This event has occured but twice since the formation of the Constitution. No one person is eligible for more than two terms in succession. In one or two States, the electors are chosen by the Legislature.

The excitement throughout the United States at the present moment is intense. The master political spirits of all parties are traversing the country, congregating meetings, and haranguing the multitudes in boisterous and declamatory language, never failing to denounce their opponents with unmeasured zeal. A new system of electioneering and excitation has come up within a few years, and all sorts of trickery is resorted to now a-days to excite the patriotic feelings and passions of electors. At the election of President Harrison, in 1840, log cabins were erected by his party throughout the country, where they congregated in mass meetings, sung Whig songs, and drank hard cyder; 'coon skins were fastened upon the doors and walls, all of which were symbols of their candidate's plain and unostentatious mode of living—for he lived in a log house, in a new country; occasionally went 'acoon hunting; and hard cyder was his principal beverage. This may be said to be the commencement of song-singing at political meetings, which is now adopted by both and all parties, and puts us in mind of the Jacobite times in Scotland.

ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS

Mass processions are now becoming very popular. On the eve of an election, and for months previous there has been a continued series of marching and counter-marching throughout the country; gun-firing, drum-beating, horn-blowing, and a waving of banners, and the whole Republic seems alive and under arms.

Our engraving is a correct representation of a Whig procession in New York, drawn by J. Kobb. The procession was headed with a cavalcade bearing banners with various devices. Then came carriages and waggons, with implements representing the mechanic arts, which were followed by a body of men and boys, some carrying flags and banners, and the whole under the direction of a chief marshal and assistants. The view is taken from the corner of Chamber-street and Broadway.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

PARISIANA.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Paris, Wednesday.

The spirit of hostility towards England appears much assuaged in Paris. The spirit of amity has been singularly marked as regards the English plays, whose performances, although resisted by some narrow-minded lessees, have received the cordial fiat of the public as well as the Government. Still some vapour and smoke will every now and then arise from the old crater of Anglomania. One of these eruptions has amused, beyond measure, the English residents in Paris. Barthelemy, the satirical poet, writes a weekly feuilleton in verse in the Siecle. Of his last lucubration the perfiide Albion is his devoted quarry—and in his attack he commits the most irresistible mistakes on the subject of our language and habits—for example, take these three lines:—

"Les shame et les shoking échappent de leurs bouches,"
"Le chaste Polisman condamne sans appel"
"A cinq livres sterlings un peché veniel,"

Our fashionable salons are preparing to give a brilliant reception to the number of fair and noble foreigners, who are shortly expected in the capital. In addition to those we have already mentioned, are the Countess of Glengall, Lady Paulett, Lady Cardigan, the Countess of Tankerville, and Lady Blessington. These fair visitors will, doubtless, adorn Parisian society this season by a display of all that splendour and luxury which render your countrymen so conspicuous abroad, and with which the Parisian salons find it so difficult to compete. Every circumstance continues to infuse spirit into Parisian society. Independently of the arrival of persons of fashion, the prelude to the opening of the Chambers is now begun. MM. Thiers, Billault, Viview, Odillon Barrot, &c., have already arrived. From every quarter the foreign representatives of the Government come to give personal explanation—Baron de Bourqueney, from Constantinople; the Marquis de La Valette, from Egypt; M. de Nijou, from Morocco, &c. The Duke de Glucksberg, from Spain, and the Duke d'Isly, from Algeria, are but a few of those that will follow. The arrival of the bride of the Duke d'Aumale is to be a pretext, one of those Parisian society is so ready to seize, for balls, gaiety, and magnificence. The young duchess's new household is already nearly complete. Amongst her female attendants are named the Countess de St. Maurice, niece of the Marquise de Dolomica, as lady of honour, and Madame Coiffier, as Dame d'Interieur.

Amongst other English tastes, albums are becoming the rage at our Court. This ingenious method of utilizing and renumerating artistic talent has great success in France. The press and the boudoir teem with this elegant product of art. The album of Queen Victoria, which has been so greatly admired, has given this fashion fresh impulse. Apropos, if the witty Vicomte de Laimay may be believed, this prevailing taste is the cause of the marriage which, it is confidently reported, is about to take place between the daughter of Lord James Haye, the cousin-german of the Duke of Wellington, and the celebrated marine painter Gudin. This belle Anglaise, at least so relates the Vicomte, received, last winter, the present of a fan, painted in an exquisite style by Winterhalter. She showed this elegant offering wherever she went with enthusiastic praises. This fair lady was to M. Gudin what the laurels of Miltiades were to Themistocles. Ardent emulation filled his mind, depriving him of rest or peace, and he set to work to compose an offering worthy of being presented to the fair daughter of Albion. The result of his labours was an album, which might with propriety have been dedicated to Neptune and Amphytrite, for the sea, the waves, the calm, and the tempest, were there represented with wondrous truth. They perhaps imagined the conflicts of his mind, for the fair and noble Briton, touched by the splendour and talent of this homage, is about to reward the fortunate artist with her hand.

Even in the absence of the Princes on their wedding excursion, pleasures and gaieties are still rife at the Court. Yesterday, at the Theatre of the Palais St. Cloud, the actors of the Comédie Francaise performed "L'Ecole des Vielliards," the celebrated piece of Casimir Delavigne, and a little one act bluette, entitled "Faute de s'entendre," in which the actor, Samson, was greatly applauded by the august spectators. Amongst the audience we distinguished Alderman Moon.

It is reported that the King on his journey to Fontainebleau was robbed of a silk pocket handkerchief, a splendid snuff box mounted in diamonds, and a portrait of the Queen of the Belgians, by Madame de Mirbel, which were taken from his coat pocket.

The Baron Solomon Rothschild has just returned to Paris.

A company have offered to build a new and immense opera-house in the Champs Elysées at their expense, on condition of being put in possession of the space occupied by the present one, on which they purpose building houses, which on that site would be of immense value. Sixty years ago, when the Grand Opera was suddenly burnt, one of the former abodes of the Academie Musique was built in forty days. Paris then could not live without an opera: it was the work of magic art: now, the construction will take years.

The ninth and last volume of the "Histoire Dix Ans" (from 1830 to 1840), by M. Louis Blanc, has just appeared. Written by a gentleman of extreme liberal opinions, this work nevertheless bears testimony to the remarkable genius of its author, who, a man of diminutive stature with gentle manners and almost infantine physiognomy, nevertheless unites brilliant talents with great acquirements and depth of scientific knowledge.

Although somewhat abused on statues and fountains in the Place Louis XV. every foreigner has admired the gilding of constructions in Paris. The spear-points of railings and the roofs of edifices acquire thus, at moonlight, the enchantment of a fairy scene. An offer has been made to Government by a company, who propose to regild, by the Ruolz process (Elkington's), the vast dome of the Invalides. It may be remembered that a short time after the Revolution the same offer was made by an individual, who, however, instead of demanding, as this company does, 200,000 francs for the purpose, proposed to pay the Government 80,000 francs for being allowed to do it. The motive of this singular offer was explained by the fact that, the gilding of the dome being of great thickness, the speculator intended merely scratching off the surface, which was blackened by the dust, and the profits of the gold thus procured would, after the expenses were paid, have amounted to 250,000 francs.

A member of the Geographical Society, a highly-gifted Jesuit missionary, recently returned from the Celestial Empire, vouches for the truth of the following singular admixture of civilised feeling and barbaric superstition of the present Emperor Tauok-wang. His favourite daughter, Yihanika (Tear of Evening), was betrothed to her cousin, the Prince Tunsing-pi. It is usual for the bridegroom to present to the lady the skin of some fierce animal on the day of marriage; in the pursuit of which cadeau the prince was killed. The lady mourned, and her life was despaired of. The court physician, Kea-leu, prescribed medicine; it availed not, and the "Tear of Evening" died. The Emperor sentenced the physician to take his own drug. He was incarcerated for three years; when the Emperor, finding that the drug was innocuous, liberated the M.D. The Emperor was praised as the most equitable ruler that ever blessed the plaited tails and the chop-sticks of China.

FRANCE.

The Paris papers do not contain any intelligence of importance. The Chambers are to meet on the 26th of December, until which time, probably, there will be some stagnation in the political world.

The Commerce states that last Tuesday a considerable mass of earth detached itself from the Hill of Montmartre, on the side of the Barrier of Rochechouart, Paris, and fell upon a lime kiln, a cartwright's factory, a weaver's workshop, and a dwelling-house, which were partly buried under it. The inhabitants were fortunately awoke by the cries of some dogs, and escaped in time. At six o'clock another house experienced a similar fate, and a third was surrounded with earth up to the first story. Fragments of earth and stone continued to roll down the hill, which is extremely steep on that side, during the whole day, and the alarmed inmates of a number of dwellings situate at the bottom of the declivity abandoned their homes, carrying away their furniture and most valuable effects. The event had been long foreseen, from the extensive excavations made in the hill to procure "plaster of Paris." It seemed probable that there would be a further sinking of earth, but precautions had been taken to avoid accident.

The Journal des Débats publishes a notice from the Intendant-General of the Civil List, announcing to all artists that the annual exposition of their works will open at the Louvre on the 15th of March, 1845, and close on the 15th of May following.

The papers mention the death at Angoulême on the 12th inst. of M. Galard de Brassac, Count of Bearn, former Chamberlain of the Emperor Napoleon, in his 74th year.

Mr. Alderman Moon, who is in Paris, has had the honour to dine at the palace with their Majesties.

A Naval Court Marshal was held at Toulon on the 14th inst. for the trial of Captain Besson, of the French navy, for the loss of the steam frigate Gröenland on the 26th of August last, on the coast of Morocco, within two leagues of Larache. It appeared from the examination of Captain Besson, that the steam frigate Gröenland, constructed at Rochefort in the commencement of the present year, and which had joined the squadron under the orders of the Prince de Joinville on the coast of Morocco, went on shore during a thick fog whilst on her passage from Mogador to Cadiz. All the efforts made to float her having proved ineffectual, it became necessary to destroy the wreck, to prevent its falling into the hands of the Moors, who came in multitudes to the coast, and who never ceased to keep up a heavy fire on the crew of the Gröenland. After the witnesses for the prosecution and defence had been examined, the Advocate-General, in a long speech, accused the captain of gross negligence, and called on the Court to declare him guilty, and to dismiss him from the navy. After a very able defence by Captain Baudin, the President, in the name of the Court, declared that the Court was unanimously of opinion that the accused did not lose the vessel wilfully, but that the Court was divided on the question, whether it had been lost from neglect and want of experience, four members being for the affirmative, and four for the negative. The law requiring that an accused can be declared guilty only by a majority, Captain Besson was acquitted.

The Moniteur contains a Royal ordinance, authorising the Minister for Foreign Affairs to open, in his department, a credit of 115,000f. for unforeseen expenses.

The pupils of the Polytechnic School at present in Paris, between 60 and 80 in number, assembled on Sunday to consider the line of conduct they should pursue in the situation in which they had been placed by the Government. They pledged their words of honour, two months ago, to partake of the fate of, and to remain stanch to each other, all being culpable or innocent in the same degree. After some discussion, as the time for opening the school had not yet arrived, they drew up an address to the King, expressing to his Majesty the painful situation in which they had been placed by the Government—fearing, on the one hand, to pass for rebels, and bound, on the other, by an engagement of honour not to allow a few to be sacrificed for the fault of all.

SPAIN.

Our Spanish news this week records the progress of insurrection in the Peninsula. There has been a serious outbreak at Logrono, in the province of Old Castile, at the head of which the celebrated Martin Zurbano has placed himself. The 12th was General Zurbano's jour de fête, and he celebrated it by proclaiming the Constitution of 1837 in its integrity. To the cry of "Viva la Constituçion de 1837," was added the cry of "Viva Isabella II., and death to the tyrants." Zurbano was at the head of 400 men, and was hourly gaining additional followers. He marched from Logrono to Najara, a town of 7000 inhabitants, where he met with no opposition, and was directing his steps towards Burgos. The part of the country where this insurrection has broken out has been the focus of several insurrections, both Liberal and Carlist. In the neighbouring towns of Cenirao, Azo, and Burgos, there are thousands who are disaffected to the present Government, and only wait for an opportunity of rising.

There is reason to believe that this insurrection has various ramifications throughout the country, and fresh outbreaks are expected in various places. The kingdom of Old Castile, as well as the neighbouring provinces, is described as being in a state of the greatest excitement.

From Madrid our letters are to the 13th instant. The Chamber of Deputies was still occupied with the proposed reforms of the Constitution. The Opposition is quite unable to carry any amendments to the bill.

Letters from Barcelona announce that Prim and his co-accused are still confined in the tower of the barrack of the Body Guards, to which several persons arrested in the provinces, as his accomplices, had been likewise removed. Prim, who had been allowed to communicate with his friends, continued to protest his innocence, and loudly vowed vengeance against General Narvaez and the Political Chief of Madrid. It was reported that Commander Alberni, who, after being implicated in the conspiracy, had turned Queen's evidence, had been arrested.

There have been some riots at Cadiz, but nothing of a very serious nature appears to have occurred.

There are reports of the intended marriage of the Queen of Spain with Count Trapani. The Memorial Bordelais positively asserts that the marriage between the Queen and the Count will take place next month at Valencia, and that the recognition of Isabella by the Courts of Vienna and Rome will immediately follow.

PORTUGAL.

Our private correspondence from Lisbon to the 14th, records the continued triumph of Costa Cabral. Not only did his Cabinet obtain a majority in the Chamber of Peers of 37 votes against 12 on the question "of the use made of the extraordinary powers conferred on Government for the suppression of the revolt;" but there seems every probability that the Ministers will be successful on the question of the Bill of Indemnity for the unconstitutional acts performed by the Government after the cessation of the discretionary powers. Towards the close of the debates which have taken place on the subject, Costa Cabral made a long speech, in which he not only justified himself and his colleagues for all they had done, but went a step further, and showed, by the production of documentary evidence, that Count Lavradio, and others of his political opponents, had, upon the same plea of necessity, committed much greater infractions of the charter, or rather had made a much more free and extensive use of the discretionary powers with which they had been invested, when they were in power, in 1826, on the occasion of the Marquis of Chaves' revolt for the restoration of Absolutism, and in 1841, when the question of the navigation of the river Douro was on the point of bringing about a rupture with Spain.

The well-known capitalist Joze Bento de Araujo, one of the wealthiest merchants of Lisbon, died on the 9th instant. He entered the Portuguese capital, n 1771, with one cruzado in his pocket.

CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.

We have received Cape of Good Hope papers to the 15th of September. The accounts from the eastern frontiers are much more favourable than those last received, the placing of the military detachments at intervals on the neutral ground having evidently produced a beneficial result. Four Caffres implicated in the murder of Mr. de Lange, the Dutch boor, had been delivered up by the chief of their tribe, to be dealt with by the Colonial tribunals, and sixty head of cattle had, at the same time, been restored to the widow. The rains had been copious, and the weather in every respect favourable for the crops, and securing the season's clip of wool. The Governor had received the patent for erecting Natal into a separate province, with a Lieutenant Governor, but subordinate to the Central Government of the Cape, and subject to the same laws, &c. The Lieutenant-Governor to be assisted by an executive council of five members, and a Recorder was to be the head of the judicial establishment, from whose court there will be a right of appeal to the supreme tribunal at Cape Town. The temporary laws in force in Natal were to be abolished, from whatever authority they had emanated. The road from Graham's Town to Cape Town was a favourite project with the inhabitants, and had greatly enhanced the value of the land situated in the districts through which it was to pass.

UNITED STATES.

The packet ship Oxford has arrived at Liverpool, with accounts from New York one day later than those received last week by the Acadia. The Presidential election was the only subject of importance discussed by the papers. The chance of Mr. Clay's return was said to be improved. W. Peters, Esq., her Britannic Majesty's Consul to Philadelphia, was robbed of his wallet, containing two hundred dollars, on the 30th ult., at the Harrisburg Railroad depôt. He had just returned from Ohio with a newly-married wife. There is a good deal of business doing in railway shares. The New York Stock Market was flat, and prices rather lower than by the quotations received by the steamer. The rate of exchange had not varied.

TAHITI.

Later accounts have been received from the Society Islands, by way of the United States, from which it appears that there has been another battle between the French and the natives, in which a great number of the latter have been butchered by their well-armed and well-disciplined assailants. Louis Philippe's new officer of the Legion of Honour, Captain Bruat, is, we suppose, the hero of this new slaughter. The Fishguard English frigate has conveyed Queen Pomare to the island of Bolabola.

According to a Paris paper, intelligence from Papaiti to the 6th June had been received, through the United States. The most perfect tranquillity reigned there; the garrison was hard at work at the fortifications of the town. The insurgents had not laid down their arms, but, under the terror inspired by the affair of Mahahena, they dared not take a step out of their entrenchments.

A letter from Rio Janeiro, of the 12th of September, announces the arrival there of Admiral Hamelin, in the Virginie frigate, and states that he was almost immediately to proceed to Tahiti.

THE WEST INDIES.

The Royal West India mail-packet the Clyde has arrived with mails from the West Indies. She sailed from St. Jago de Cuba, October 19th; Jamaica, 24th; Demerara, 20th; Trinidad, 21st; Barbadoes, 24th; Grenada, 26th; St. Thomas, 31st; and Fayal, 12th November. The Clyde brings home 13 passengers, and on freight 1620 dollars, £18 British money, 75 ounces gold dust, 699 ounces silver, 399 ounces platina.

It appears that the season throughout the West Indies has been unusally hot, causing great sickness and mortality. Demerara was particularly unhealthy, typhus and scarlet fever raging, in addition to the indigenous fever of the colony.

The Jamaica House of Assembly was opened by the Earl of Elgin on the 15th of October. The Hill Coolie proposition was brought forward in a very full house, and, after a lengthened discussion, was carried: the number, however, being limited to 2000, instead of 5000, as proposed by the home Government.

A dreadful fire occurred on the Canal Coffee Plantations, near Demerara, on the 14th of October, and was burning on the 20th, whereby nearly the whole of that valuable district would be destroyed. The plantations were fired by the peasantry, in consequence of a tax on the sale of plantains having been recently exacted by the collector of the district.

The Georgetown Royal Gazette contains accounts of other incendiary fires in Demerara.

A severe hurricane had destroyed numerous vessels in Montego Bay, and along the coast on the 3rd ult.

The Jamaica Times contains an important piece of news indicative of the determination to discourage slavery in Cuba. That paper says:—"By late advices from Havannah, we have the gratifying intelligence that the Captain General has issued a proclamation, notifying that 'on and after the 1st of January next, all vessels, under whatever flag, arriving at any of the ports of Cuba, with slaves, will be confiscated.' By all accounts, both from Cuba and the old country, never was the Captain-General in greater favour than he is at present; while the promptitude with which he put down the late attempt at insurrection has been made the theme of praise among men of all parties."

A dreadful accident has happened at Turnhout (Belgium) at the funeral of M. de Nef, deputy of that district. As the funeral was to be with all the honours due to his rank, a great number of persons were attracted to it; among these were fifty who stationed themselves in a gallery, built on the outside of a neighbouring windmill. This gallery not being constructed to support so great a weight, suddenly gave way, and the whole were precipitated to the ground from a height of thirty feet. Four persons are already dead, above twenty others have received very serious injuries, many having their legs or arms broken, and it is feared that several of them will not recover

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

Lord Huntingtower's Bankruptcy.—In the Bankruptcy Court on Monday, Lord Huntingtower came up for his final order. Mr. E. James, who appeared on behalf of his lordship, said that this matter was adjourned upon the understanding that some proposal should be made by Lord Huntingtower to his creditors, and his lordship had hoped to be able to effect a compromise with them ere this. His lordship had never received one shilling from his father, the Earl of Dysart, from the time he had been sent to Eton, nor up to this moment would any appeal to his father's humanity produce one shilling; Lord Huntingtower had, therefore, to place his reliance entirely upon his mother. The alimony now allowed to Lady Dysart, was £3000 a year, but she had appealed against that allowance, as being thoroughly disproportionate to Lord Dysart's income, which exceeded £50,000 per annum, and the judgement of the Court was about to be given. Until, therefore, the precise amount of income which would be decreed to her ladyship was known, it would be impossible for her son to ascertain what sum his mother could allow him annually to liquidate the claims which were made upon him, as such amount would bear some proportion to her ladyship's income. If his Honour, under the circumstances, would allow a short adjournment, it would further the justice of the case to all parties, and give Lord Huntingtower an opportunity of knowing better the means he should have of effecting an arrangement with his creditors, which he was most anxious to do. Mr. Montague Chambers expressed his assent, on behalf of a creditor, to a further adjournment. Some further allusion having been made to the assistance to be rendered by Lady Dysart to her son, Mr. Commissioner Fonblanqne said: I would rather it rested upon the justice of the father than the affection of the mother. After a short conversation as to the period of adjournment, it was ultimately arranged that the matter should stand over until Monday, the 20th of January next.

The Earl of Dysart v. the Countess of Dysart.—In the Consistory Court, on Tuesday, Dr. Lushington gave judgment in this suit, which has excited some interest from the circumstances connected with it, as well as from its bearing indirectly upon the case of Lord Huntingtower. The suit was instituted by his lordship, to protect himself from the responsibility of being held good for her ladyship's debts, and also to enforce her return to her conjugal duties. To which her ladyship pleaded that his cruelty made it unsafe for her to return to his house, and therefore prayed the Court to reject the suit entered by his lordship. The learned Judge said he had to reconcile evidence of the most conflicting kind, extending over a considerable space of time, and at periods somewhat remote. He had to weigh the credit due to the several witnesses, to make allowance for their bias as partizans. He then recapitulated at considerable length the evidence. He could not think that Lady Dysart would run any personal danger by returning to his house. The unhappy differences which had arisen might be attributed, in a great measure, to the violent language used in the first instance by her ladyship, to her frequently absenting herself from his house, in order to enjoy the greater comforts and indulgences of her father's roof, and to her not studying, to that degree, commanded by her marriage obligations, the tastes, the habits, and even the eccentricities of her husband. But he did not justify Lord Dysart in the use of language which he could not otherwise characterise than as most degrading and infamous. But the question for that Court was, was it likely that Lady Dysart incurred personal risk by returning to his lordship's roof? He thought on his conscience no, and with that conviction so strongly impressed upon his mind he could not do otherwise than dismiss her petition. Dr. Lushington, in conclusion, said he must pronounce in favour of the prayer of Lord Dysart. The Court expressed a hope that Lady Dysart would know her duty was submission, and that Lord Dysart would recollect the Divine command, not to be bitter to his wife.—The Proctor for Lord Dysart prayed that the Court would issue its monition in the ordinary course for the return of the countess to cohabitation.—The Proctor for the Countess of Dysart, with all due submission, gave notice of an appeal from the decision of the learned Judge.

The Privileges of the House of Commons.—There have been several days argument in the Court of Queen's Bench in the case of Howard v. Gossett, the well-known action of trespass against the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Commons, for having, as it was alleged, arrested the plaintiff under a warrant, which it was alleged was deficient in form. The case came before the Court on a demurrer to the defendant's plea of justification. Lord Denman intimated that the Court would give judgment on as early a day as possible.

The Court of Queen's Bench and the Royal Court of Jersey.—Our readers will recollect that a short time ago application was made on the behalf of a Mr. C. Carus Wilson to Mr. Justice Patteson, for a writ of habeas corpus to bring him up before the Court of Queen's Bench, in order that the reason of his imprisonment might be examined into, and decided upon. The writ was granted and addressed to the gaoler. This functionary, instead of complying with the writ, referred it to the Royal Court of Jersey; and that Court, after hearing the Attorney-General upon the subject, and after due deliberation has decided that the gaoler "should take no notice whatever of the said writ, their opinion being that the Court of Queen's Bench has not jurisdiction in Jersey, and that the writ of habeas corpus doth not run in that island." In the Bail Court, on Thursday, the Solicitor-General moved for and obtained a rule to show cause why the writ of habeas corpus, obtained on the part of Mr. Charles Carus Wilson, should not be superseded, on the ground that the Court had not the power of issuing such writ.

Swindling Bill-discounters.—The case of William Law, a mercer at Reading, was brought before the Court of Bankruptcy on Wednesday. The bankrupt's debts, it was stated, amounted to upwards of £2,300, and his assets would, it was asserted, be sufficient to pay between 9s. and 10s. in the pound. The only remarkable feature in his case was, that he had been made the victim of one of the many bill swindling concerns which have recently sprung up in various parts of the metropolis. The bankrupt having been examined by Mr. Lucas, as to an alleged removal of goods, which he denied, the further hearing was adjourned to the 24th of January.

A Certificate Withheld.—In the case of Mr. Casanas, who carried on business as a wine-merchant in Fenchurch-street, application was made for a certificate. His debts were about £12,000, and his assets £500. It appeared that he had bought wine at 44s. a dozen, which he immediately sold at 16s. This was his usual course of trading; and under all the circumstances Mr. Commissioner Fonblanque said that in justice to the creditors and the public, he must withhold his certificate for three years from this period.

Mr. Barnard Gregory and the "Satirist."—In the Court of Queen's Bench on Thursday, Mr. Platt made two applications on the part of the defendant, Mr. Gregory—one, that the period of his being brought up to receive judgment upon an indictment to which he had pleaded guilty, should be postponed; the other the postponement of a trial upon a criminal information filed in Trinity Term, 1843, in which Mr. Gregory was defendant, and which at present stood fixed for the present month. Mr. Platt read an affidavit from the defendant, in which he stated that he was wholly incapable of preparing for his trial, owing to his illness, and also to the regulations of the gaol, which did not permit the free use of writing materials or the access to private papers necessary thereto; and that this application was made bonâ fide, and not merely for the purpose of delay. He (Mr. Platt) believed that if the defendant were compelled at present to attend this Court, his life would be placed in jeopardy thereby. After some discussion the Court intimated that the medical attendants of the defendant ought to make an affidavit, and time was allowed for the purpose.

The Claimant against Louis Philippe.—At Bow-street, on Tuesday, the Frenchman Buchoz Hilton, whose alleged claims against Louis Philippe have several times been brought before the public, applied to Mr. Jardine for leave to post a number of large placards he held in his hand at different places through town. They were printed in the French and English languages, setting forth that the King of the French was indebted to him to the amount of several thousands of pounds, for the expenses he had incurred during the revolution in supporting two regiments to establish the King on the throne, and entreating of the Queen to mediate with his Majesty for the settlement of the alleged debt.—Mr. Jardine, having glanced over the contents of the papers, said he could perceive nothing illegal in them to prevent them being published, provided the applicant could obtain the permission of persons to have them affixed to their premises.—The applicant appeared gratified at the intelligence, and thanked the magistrate.

Violation of the Liberty of the Subject.—At the Thames Police-office on Tuesday Mr. George Walton, a respectable plumber and gas-fitter, of No. 5, George-terrace, Commercial-road, Stepney, and George Scaltock, a lad in his employ were brought before Mr. Broderip, on a charge of stealing one of Defriez' patent dry gas meters, value £7, stated in the police sheet to be the property of William Cormack, of the firm of Banks and Cormack, gas purifiers, of Church-row, Lime-house. Mr. Walton, who was much agitated, said, that a few days ago he entered into an agreement with Banks and Cormack, to fit up a gas apparatus for them, and after the job was commenced Mr. Cormack requested the loan of a meter which he kept in his shop, for the purpose of trying some experiments on a gasometer the firm had lately erected. He agreed to lend them a patent dry meter, on their promising to take particular care of it, and conveyed it to their premises. Having done work and furnished materials to the amount of £15, and knowing very little of the firm or their resources, he waited upon Mr. Cormack that morning, and asked him for an advance of money. Mr. Cormack refused to advance anything, and he would not pay a farthing till the job was completed. He said he could not proceed with the work till he recciveed an advance of £5, and Mr. Cormack immediately directed his foreman to proceed to the nearest gas-fitter's, and bring him to the premises to complete the fitting-up of the apparatus. He then said he should take home his gas meter, and took it up and gave it to his boy. Mr. Cormack immediately sent for a policeman, and gave him into custody for stealing his own property.—Mr. Broderip: Then you are in custody for merely taking away your own property, which Mr. Cormack refused to give up?—Mr. Walton: Yes, Sir; I lent it to the firm of Banks and Cormack for a day or two. It is my property; and there are persons in court to prove it. I have had the mortification of being taken through the streets as a felon, pointed at by my neighbours, and followed by a crowd of persons, to many of whom I was known, in open day. It is too bad, Sir.—Mr. Broderip: Too bad! it is indeed. (To the policeman) You should not have taken these parties into custody at all. You should not have arrested a man for stealing his own property, under such circumstances. What time did you apprehend them?—Policeman: About 11.—Mr. Broderip: And it is now twenty minutes past two. The man and his servant have been illegally in custody for about three hours and a half, and no prosecutor has ventured to appear against them. The policeman said he took the parties to the station-house to settle the matter amicably (laughter).—Mr. Broderip: I must beg of you, Mr. Symons, to mention this to the superintendent of the division. It has happened before, and must not be repeated. The liberty of the subject is not to be trifled with in this manner. Every person engaged in the detention of Mr. Walton and his servant are liable to an action. Ellis, the usher, said he knew Mr. Walton to be a most respectable and upright tradesman.—Mr. Broderip: He leaves this court without a stain on his character. It is a monstrous infringement of the liberty of the subject. The prisoners were then set at liberty, and Mr. Walton took home his gas meter. [There are frequent instances of a disposition on the part of police constables to take people into custody upon charges which they know cannot be sustained; and, although disposed to do full justice to the New Police, as a body, yet we think these individual cases of the arbitrary exercise of power ought to be watched narrowly and punished. The liberty of the subject would be but a mere delusion if such conduct as that above noticed were of frequent occurrence.]

Two Omnibus Drivers Committed to the House of Correction.—At Union Hall, on Wednesday, Henry Key and Richard Dye, the drivers of two Camberwell omnibuses, were summoned for furious driving, and endangering the lives of the passengers of their respective vehicles, as well as those passing along the road.—Mr. Courage, of the firm of Courage and Donaldson, the brewers of Shad Thames, stated that on Wednesday he was a passenger in one of the omnibuses, and that soon after they left the Elephant and Castle, the defendants, who were the drivers, commenced driving at a very rapid pace along the road. They seemed to be vieing with each other as to who should be foremost, and, in endeavouring to obtain this point, they put their horses into a gallop, and, from their close proximity to each other on frequent occasions, witness expected every moment that a collision would have taken place, and that an upset of either one or both the vehicles would have occurred. Even when the defendants got into Camberwell they still continued driving at the same furious speed up High-street, which is very narrow; and when they arrived at the Red Cap, witness got out and remonstrated against such conduct, and determined to appear against them. There were ten passengers in the omnibus in which he rode, one of whom was a lady.—Mr. Allport, a gentleman, who was a passenger in the other omnibus, also gave evidence confirmatory of the furious manner in which both vehicles were driven by the defendants. A collision did take place in the course of their career, and it was only a matter of surprise that an accident of a most serious nature had not occurred.—Other evidence having been given, Mr. Cottingham said that it was the worst case of that description that was ever brought before him—that he considered he would not be doing justice to the public if he did not exercise the power which the late act had given magistrates in cases of this kind, and, instead of imposing a fine on the offenders, which it was certain had not the effect of deterring them from furiously driving against each other, inflict a punishment that would be attended with much more beneficial effects for the public safety. The magistrate then sentenced the defendants to be imprisoned for six weeks, each to hard labour, in Brixton House of Correction.—Mr. Courage subsequently applied for a mitigation of the punishment, on the ground that it was the first time of the defendants' conviction, and that one of them had a wife and family dependent on him for support.—Mr. Cottingham said that there were no mitigating circumstances, and he could not accede to the application [Mr. Cottingham has done nothing more than his duty in punishing these omnibus drivers by imprisonment. The lives of passengers are continually placed in jeopardy by the misconduct of such men, to whom a fine is no punishment, as it is frequently made up by a subscription, or paid by their masters. The dread of imprisonment and hard labour, it is hoped, will induce them to reform their conduct altogether.]

The Case of the French Bankrupt.—The Act for the Extradition of Offenders.—The French fraudulent bankrupt case was brought before the Lord Mayor at the Mansion House on Wednesday. Mr. E. James applied for a warrant to arrest Jacques Besset, a French merchant, residing in London, accused of the French crime of fraudulent bankruptcy. The learned counsel after alluding to the recent decision of the Court of Queen's Bench on the matter, urged the Lord Mayor to grant the warrant, as it would afford an opportunity of initiating proceedings de novo, and thus clear away a difficulty only occasioned in the first instance by the illegality of the instrument upon which Besset was committed to the custody of the keeper of the gaol. The necessary docmmentary proofs recognised by the French law were ready, and the learned counsel submitted that there could be no valid ground for refusing the warrant under all the circumstances. Mr. James called some witnesses who deposed to the legality of the proceedings in France, after which the Lord Mayor said, that he had looked very particularly into the act, and, as the person accused of fraudulent bankruptcy could not be committed for such an offence in this country, he did not see how he, as a magistrate, could be justified in giving a warrant for the apprehension of an individual so charged. Mr. James contended, that the decision of the Lord Mayor would neutralise the important objects of the late Act of Convention, but his lordship said he could not come to any other conclusion.

COUNTRY NEWS.

Alarming Illness of General Nott.—We have much regret that we cannot report at all favourably of the present state of General Nott's health. The gallant officer has had a relapse, and is now very ill in Wales. It is conjectured that this change for the worse has been brought about by the change in the weather.

Public Walks and Baths in Birmingham.—On Tuesday there was a very numerous and respectable meeting at the Town Hall, Birmingham, the Mayor in the chair, for the purpose of considering the propriety of adopting the necessary measures for securing to the people of Birmingham public baths and places of recreation. A resolution, moved by Lord Lyttelton, was carried, stating "that the meeting, considering the great extent, the dense and increasing population of the borough of Birmingham, and the growing difficulties of obtaining for a large portion of its inhabitants ready access to places for ablution, fresh air, and healthful recreation, declares its opinion that the formation of public baths and public walks, or other open spaces for exercise and active sports in the vicinity of the borough, would contribute greatly to the health, rational enjoyment, kindly intercourse, and good morals of all classes of our population." A resolution for the establishment of at least four sets of public baths in the most convenient parts of the borough was also agreed to, and a subscription was set on foot to carry out the objects of the meeting. No less a sum than £3000 was collected.

Lord Harborough and the Midland Railway Company.—During last week, there were some rather serious affrays between the agents of Lord Harborough and some persons employed on the Midland Railway, arising out of a notice given on the part of his Lordship to the Railway Company, that they would not be allowed to send any one to survey the park. The most violent skirmish was yesterday week at Saxby-bridge, adjoining his lordship's park. The surveyors were defeated on the previous day, and it was generally understood that another attempt on a larger scale was to be made on the following morning. Consequently, by nine o'clock between thirty and forty of his lordship's servants assembled at the spot above-named, to prevent the surveyors of the company taking their levels, &c., on the towing-path of the Oakham Canal, and along Stapleford Park. Very soon parties of gentlemen in the employ of the company arrived in chaises, &c., from Melton and Oakham, heading a number of reckless-looking ragamuffins, carrying flag-staffs, &c. A lengthened parley took place on the bridge, between his lordship's steward and solicitor, the clerk and treasurer of the Oakham Canal Company, and the solicitors and surveyors of the railway company, as to the mode of proceeding to be adopted. Meantime, Lord Harborough's men made preparations for a determined stand on the towing-path on each side of the bridge, by fencing the path with trays, &c., close to the water's edge. An attempt was then made by the surveyors to force their way through the party stationed on the Oakham side of the bridge, but the barrier was too firm to be broken, and they had to beat a retreat. Four or five of the county police now also same up. Both parties were then desired to lay aside their weapons, consisting of "stout shillalaghs," &c., and ordered not to strike any blows, but simply to try their strength by pushing. A "grand stand" was then made by Lord H.'s party below the bridge, and nearest Melton, who stood "wedged together," and forming a living and very formidable-looking barrier. The surveyors next placed rows of their men with their backs to the faces of the earl's party, and set others in opposite position to force the way. An almost indescribable scene now took place. The railway men exerted their utmost strength, but so firm did his lordship's party retain their ground, that more than one was actually forced up "high in the air" between and rolling over the heads of the contending parties. Others were forced through the hedge, tumbling over each other, and nearly filling the ditch beneath, amidst the shouts of the "leaders" and the numerous spectators. Great confusion now ensued, the two parties mixing together, and in the tumult and dirt becoming almost undistinguishable by each other. There were some broken heads during the affray. In the midst of this confusion, the surveyors succeeded in getting the chain on the forbidden ground. Lord Harborough's men then took forcible possession of the chain, which in the scuffle to recover it, was broken in one or two places. A fine chase was then had for about a quarter of a mile down the towing path. Another barrier was then about to be formed, when a truce was shouted by the railwayists, and it was finally agreed that each party should withdraw their forces, and that the matter should be judicially braught before the magistrates by issuing a summons for assault against one or two of the men of each party.

Serious Case of Infanticide at Wolverhampton.—An investigation is now going forward in Wolverhampton, in which a lady, of hitherto respectable character, together with a married sister and a young surgeon, is charged as being implicated in a case of infanticide. A coroner's inquest, under the presidency of Mr. Phillips, one of the coroners for Staffordshire, has been held some days, and stands adjourned for further evidence. There was an examination of the parties at the Police-office on Monday, when the charge was regularly heard. The mother of the child is a Miss Railton, and the other accused persons are Mrs. Hildreth (her sister), and Mr. Sheriff (the surgeon); Mr. Hildreth has also been taken into custody since the inquest. The evidence was such that the magistrates expressed their intention of sending the case for trial, but the prisoners were remanded until the conclusion of the inquest. The inquiry is the engrossing topic of conversation in the neighbourhood. Miss Railton is the sister-in-law of Mr. Darby, the post-master, and resided with him.

The Proposed Incorporation of Brighton.—A meeting of the inhabitants of Brighton was held at the Town-hall, on Monday afternoon, for the purpose of receiving the report of the committee appointed at the public meeting held on Monday, the 21st ult., to consider whether it will be beneficial to the inhabitants that the borough should be incorporated, and the propriety of petitioning her Majesty in Council for a charter of incorporation under the provisions of the Municipal Corporations Acts of Parliament. A proposal was made by way of amendment, to receive the report that day three months, and after a very long discussion, it was finally determined to postpone the meeting for a month, and in the meantime to have the report printed and circulated through the borough, in order that the inhabitants might have an opportunity to consider it. Captain Pechell and Lord A. Harvey, the borough Members, were present, but did not address the meeting.

Masonic Festival at Nottingham.—On Tuesday there was a grand Masonic Festival at Nottingham. The town began to fill at an early hour, and the day appeared like a general holiday. At eleven o'clock, a procession of immense length and high respectability proceeded to St. Peter's Chucch, where service took place. At two o'clock the Grand Lodge was opened for the transaction of business of the day in the immense Exchange Hall, which was completely filled; Colonel Wildman, the proprietor of Newstead Abbey, the seat of the late Lord Byron, took the chair, supported by the Right Hon. the Earl of Scarborough, the Lord Lieutenant of the County; Lord Rancliffe, past Grand Master for Leicestershire; Charles Richard Colville, Esq., M.P. for South Derbyshire, and past Grand Master for Derbyshire; Coptain Campbell, past Grand Master for Argyllshire; and numerous other superior officers of the order. In addition to the Grand Officers for Nottinghamshire, a considerable number of Grand Officers were present from Leeds, Derby, Wakefield, Leicester, Birmingham, Sheffield, Belper, Chesterfield, York, and all towns in the North. At the conclusion of the Grand Lodge business, a Craft Lodge was opened for the admission of visiting brethren, and members presented themselves to the Grand Masters. At four o'clock there was a splendid banquet.

The Manchester Chamber of Commerce and Sir Henry Pottinger.—The Manchester Chamber of Commerce have presented an address to Sir Henry Pottinger, expressive of admiration at his general administration of affairs in China, but particularly in reference to the commercial arrangements effected under his auspices. Sir Henry, in his answer, expresses a hope that China will in due time reap the full reward she so well merits for her liberality in the arrangements; and that all other nations wishing to participate in the trade with that vast and wonderful empire will take example by the moderation which England exhibited in the discussions, and in their final settlement.

Trade at Manchester.—During the week rather an increased demand for grey cloth has existed, and this is the case more particularly to-day in shirtings, long cloths, &c.—fabrics calculated for the East and China. The latter are again steady, and even buoyant, and the market closes very brisk for all descriptions. The velvet trade, whether plain or printed, is brisk, and understood to give fair profits to all parties engaged in its production. Yarns continue in undiminished demand, a thing never before known, and at so late a season of the year.

More Incendiary Fires in Norfolk.—There have recently been two more incendiary fires at Reepham, Norfolk, one attended by considerable loss of property, the other not so extensive. Soon after nine o'clock on Thursday week, a servant in the employ of Mr. Hickling, who holds a large farm at Cawston, perceived flames issuing from some barley and straw stacks, whch stood in a part of the yard remote from the dwelling-house or other buildings. By great exertions, the house, farm buildings, and live-stock were saved, but the stacks in which the fire originated were wholly consumed. Mr. Hickling was insured.—Aqout the same hour, on the preceding Monday night, another fire broke out in a shed standing in a meadow, within less than a mile of Reepham, belonging to Mr. Bircham, farmer. The shed, which was a considerable distance from the farm-yard, was burned down before assistance could be procured. Two tramps, who were seen in the neighbourhood within a short time of the fire breaking out, are suspected to have caused it, but no trace of either has been obtained.

Atrocious Murder at Yarmouth.—A most brutal and unparalleled murder was committed on Tuesday at Yarmouth, Norfolk. As far as the facts are already known, it appears that the deceased, named Harriet Candler, who was a widow woman, very quiet and respectable, was a member of the Wesleyan Society, and managed a kind of chandlery shop, selling flour, oatmeal, pollard, &c. The night policeman on duty found her street door partially open; he called to her, but receiving no answer proceeded to examine the till, suspecting some robbery had been committed. Lying down by the side of the till, with her head forced under the counter, he found the deceased, literally deluged in her own blood. Her skull had no less than five wounds inflicted upon it; one of them in the left side so severe as to throw the upper portion of the bone so as to overlap another broken part of the skull. On the right side of the neck a wound had been inflicted sufficiently severe to sever a portion of the vertebræ of the neck, and one of her fingers was cut off, probably whilst uplifted in defence. Deceased lived quite alone in the house, and went to a public-house opposite to purchase her supper beer, leaving the street door closed, but unlocked, whilst she was gone. During an absence of ten minutes, the murderer or murderers (probably two) secreted themselves in a bin where peas or bran was kept. The deceased sat for a time reading a religious work, and drank a portion of the porter; she then went into the shop to take the money out of the till, when she fell to the ground by the murderer's hammer. The first blow rendered her insensible; the remainder were given lest the "intent and not the deed" should confound them. A knife covered with blood lay by the side of the deceased, but the surgeon was of opinion that the wound in the neck was inflicted with the cheese-cutter (a kind of short axe) which contained a portion of blood upon it. Last Saturday deceased had taken a division of property amounting to £150, left by her husband's mother and uncle. Several of her relatives live in Yarmouth and neighbourhood, and received similar sums; it became common talk amongst them, and the deceased was incautious enough to say that as the £150 was for her son, she should put it under her bed until she could hear from his trustee, as she expected a much larger sum. This got noised abroad, and parties, doubtless, sedulously watched her movements on the night in question, in order to plunder her, and as they were recognised and known by her, to murder her rather than be detected. The £150 was taken without disturbing the bed; £100 was in a cheque on Messrs. Gurney and Co.'s bank. During the inquest a portion of money, consisting of gold, silver, and about £8 or £10 in coppers, were found near the Battery, in a bag which was taken from the deceased's premises the night of the murder—the contents of the till, doubtless. It had wrapped up in it a man's purse, containing a token, enveloped in four papers, and written upon, in a man's writing, "The Lord said unto my lord, Sit thou on my right hand, until I make thy enemies my footstool." No clue has been at present found. A reward will, we believe, be offered; but at this moment no tidings of any noise in the next house, or anything likely to lead to the detection has been discovered. There were several places where the murderer had wiped his hands upon, and the till was found thrown up in one corner of the shop empty. On Tuesday an inquest was held before Mr. A. Woods, deputy coroner for the borough, on view of the body. Seven witnesses were examined, who deposed to the facts above stated. The jury, after a short deliberation, returned a verdict of "Wilful Murder" against some person or persons unknown.

Fatal Coal-pit Explosion near Wigan.—On Monday afternoon a most extraordinary and unaccountable eruption of water and foul air, followed by an explosion, occurred in the coal-pit belonging to the trustees of Mrs. Williams, situated immediately behind the Hare and Hounds public-house, Pemberton, about a mile and a half from Wigan, on the road to Billinge. The result of the accident is the death of two youths, about sixteen years of age, the serious injury of three boys and two men, the slight injury of two other boys, and also a few casual bruises to another workman in the mine. The following are the names of the sufferers:—Richard Fairhurst and William Parkinson, drawers, dead; Henry Taylor, Thomas Taylor (the two who carried the lights which caused explosion), and John Parkinson, all drawers, seriously injured; Thomas Topping and Edward Stockley, two men, seriously bruised and burnt; James Derbyshire and William Fishwick, drawers, slightly injured.

Murder in Essex.—An inquiry took place at Navestock, Essex, last week, before Mr. Lewis, the coroner, touching the death of Martha Phillips, the wife of a labourer, who was found dead in a field in that parish. It appeared from the evidence, that the deceased was found lying on her back in one of Mr. Hicks's fields; an umbrella and can of beer were by her side, her clothes were in disorder, and her pockets turned inside out. On her being removed some blood came from the right ear. There were appearances about the ground as if there had been some struggling. The coroner having summed up, the jury returned a verdict of wilful murder against John Young, and he was committed to take his trial.

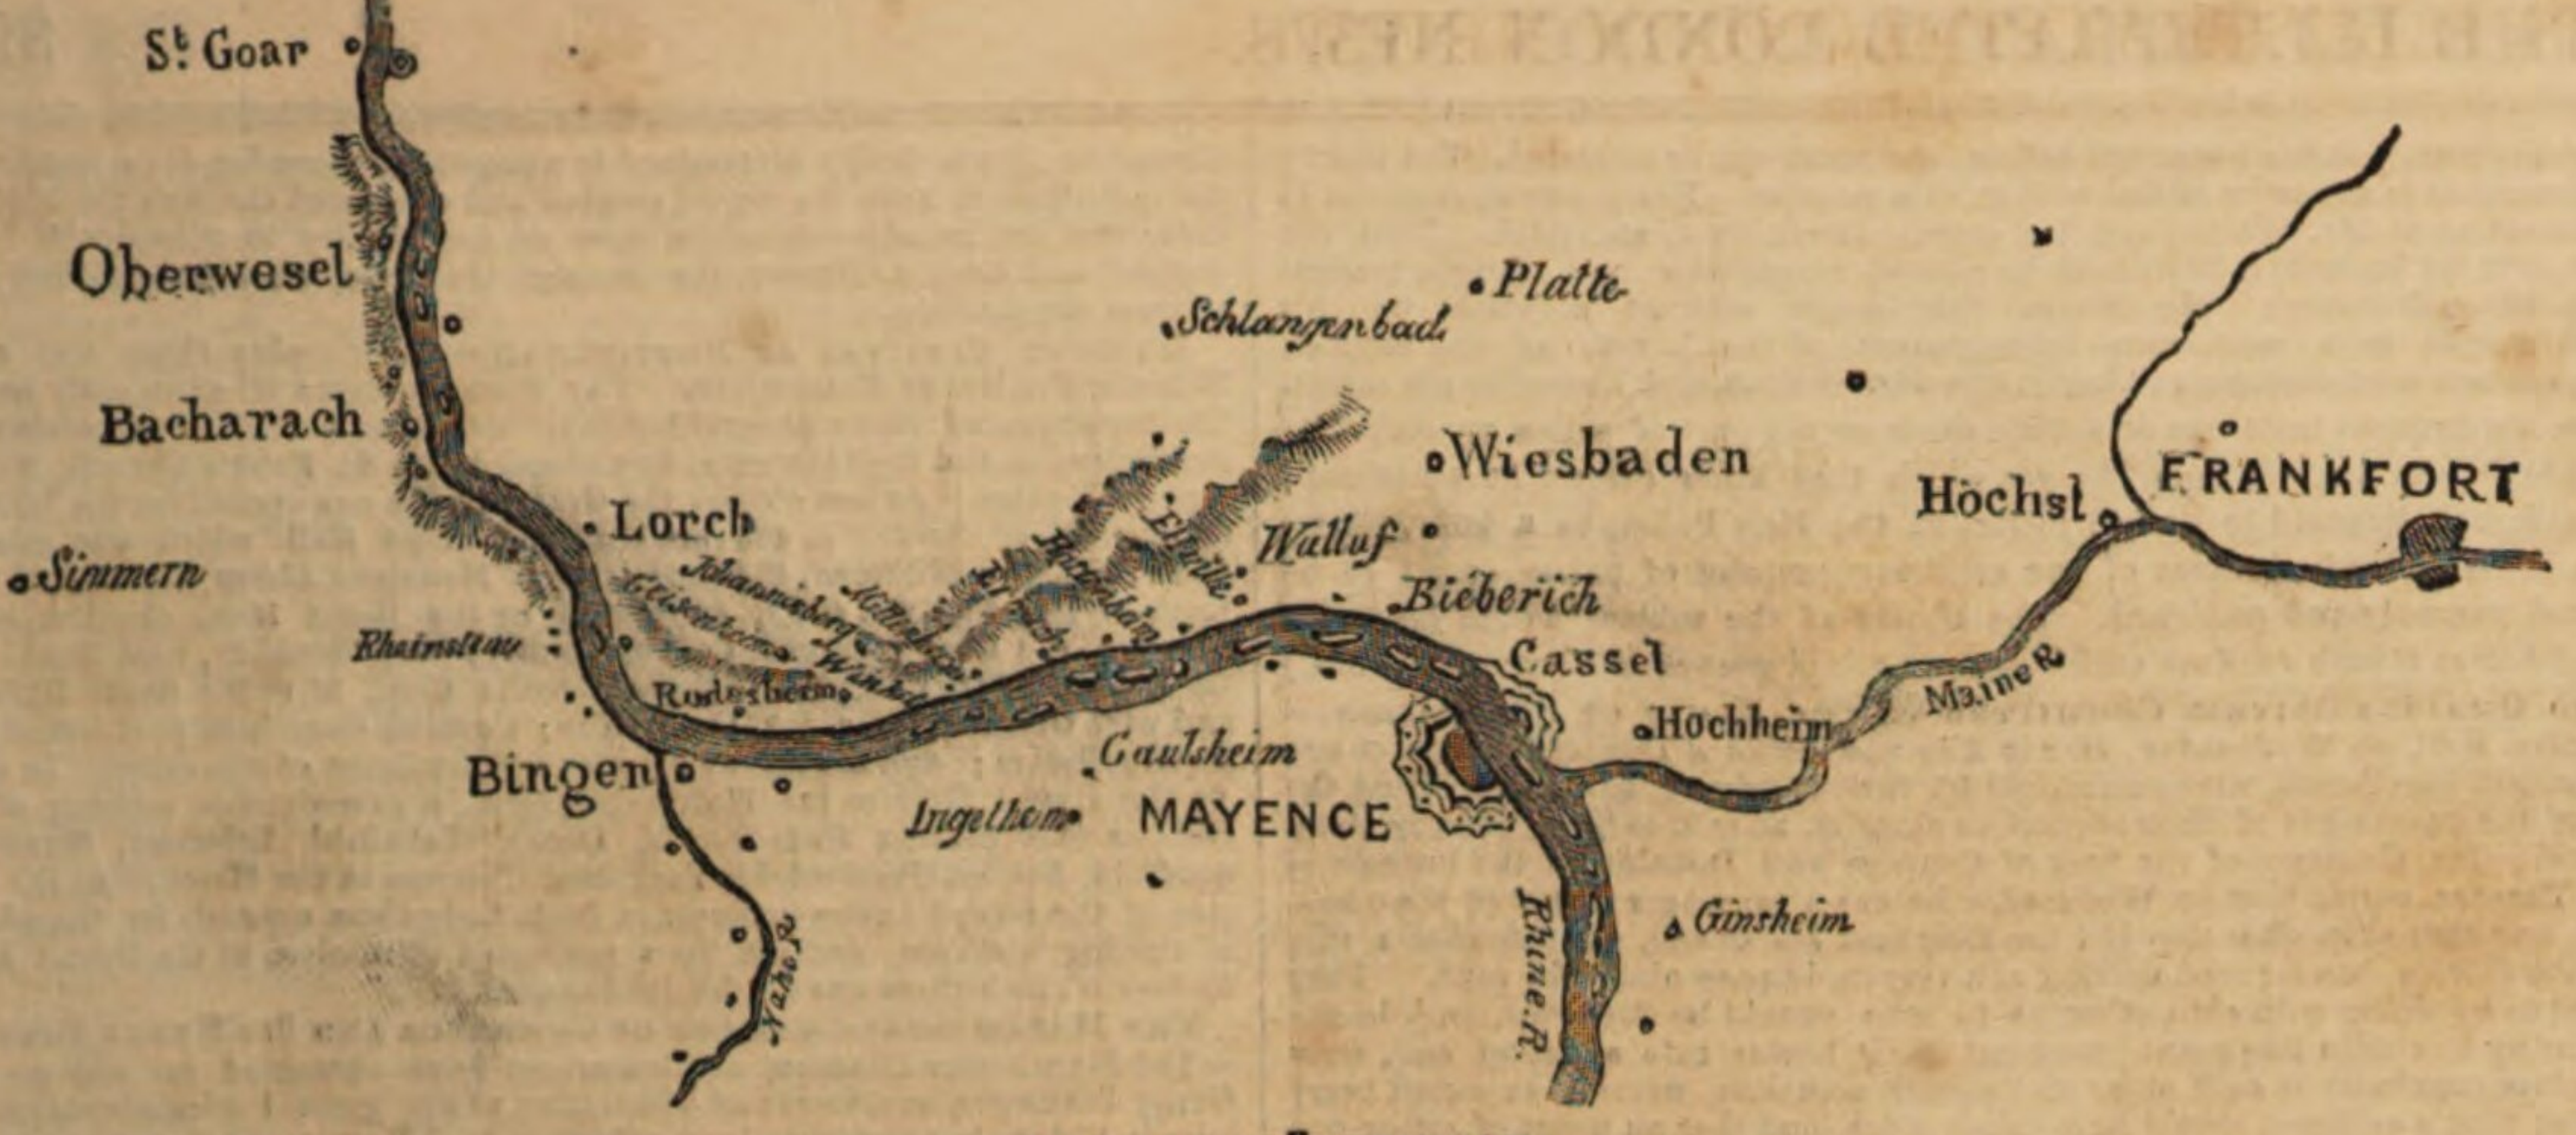
SCOTLAND.

Election of Lord Rector of Glasgow.—Mr. Rutherfurd has been elected Lord Rector of Glasgow, by rather a large majority over his opponent, Lord Eglintoun.

Death of Dr. Abercrombie.—Dr. Abercrombie, the well known physician of Edinburgh, died in that city last week, suddenly. What the cause of death was is not yet ascertained, but it has been ascribed to an affection of the heart, with which the doctor was afflicted some years ago, and by another account to apoplexy. Dr. Abercrombie was in such health on the day of his death as to be preparing to go out on his usual professional visits, when he was found dead. Dr. Abercrombie was the author of two valuable treatises on the "Intellectual Powers, and the Investigation of Truth;" and on "The Philosophy of Moral Feeling." In 1835, Dr. Abercrombie was elected Lord Rector of Mareschal College and University, Aberdeen, and published his inaugural address, which afterwards appeared in an enlarged form under the title of "Culture and Discipline of the Mind."

Fatal Colliery Accident.—An accident of a fatal nature occurred at Dalziel Colliery, near Hamilton, belonging to the Messrs. Wilson, on Saturday last. Three brothers, of the name of Laird, were ascending from their work, when, owing to some mismanagement on the part of the engine-man, the cage was drawn up to the hurls, and one of the brothers, named George, was dreadfully mangled, and died in a few minutes; another had his hand split up, and the third, his leg broken; another man, named Philip, was in the cage, but when he came on a level with the surface, seeing the danger he was in, he ran the risk of jumping off, and was caught by some one on the pit-head, which prevented his falling down the shaft. The engine-man has since been apprehended, but bailed out.

Loss of Nine Lives.—On Thursday week a boat belonging to the island of Eday left Kirkwall for home, with nine persons on board—viz., three brothers, named Garrioch; two brothers and a sister, named Tulloch; a young man, John Fotheringham; a girl, named Elizabeth Garroch; and a girl named Hercus; all belonging to the same island. It is thought that, finding the Stornsay Frith rough, the boat may have returned, and that she was upset in Kirkwall Bay, or near the mouth of the String, off Shapinshay, as the boat was found next morning near Saverock, driven ashore, with the body of one of the sufferers in it. The watch found on the body had stopped at half-past five o'clock, when the accident had probably happened.



MAP OF THE RHEINGAU.

THE RHINE, THE RHEINGAU, AND ITS WINES.

We trace in the elevated Alps, in Switzerland, and near Mount St. Gothard, the sources of the Rhône, the Tessin, and the Rhine, or the king of the German—nay, of the West European rivers. The visitor, on ascending the Rhine, or on his arrival at Strasbourg, calls to his recollection how this stream has hastened his course through the Lakes of Constance and Zellern; how he precipitated himself over the rocky ramparts at Shaffhausen, then strengthened by the collected waters of Switzerland—the influx of 370 glaciers and upwards of 2700 rivers of various sizes—he commences his majestic course near the ancient Roman city of Bâle; how he expands between the upper Black Forest, amidst ranges of mountains encircling a valley of nearly 30 miles in breadth, through which he playfully winds, and receiving, besides other streams, the important Neckar and Maine, until a rocky gate at Bingen seems to arrest his further career, but which he powerfully bursts, and strengthened by the Nahe and Moselle, overcomes a similar obstacle at Andermach, when he continues his victorious course towards the sea.

Most travellers think they have seen the beauties of the Rhine when a steamer has carried them up or down between Dusseldorf and Strasbourg; but nothing is more erroneous than this, for however beautiful the sight may be from the river, nothing can equal the scenes when viewed from the heighths: Bingen, Rüdesheim, St. Goar, and Godesberg, are the points at which the traveller should stop and make his excursions towards heights and valleys which irresistibly fix his admiration. Without dwelling on the description of towns, remarkable castles, and hamlets comprised in the direction between Frankfort and Coblentz, we shall merely confine ourselves to the small district within Wiesbaden and Bacharach, or rather, properly called the Rheingau, between Walluf and Lorch, where the Rhine vends his course from east to west. The Rheingau is but a small tract of land, and strictly on the right bank of the Rhine, only occupying an area of about 25 miles. The fertility and riches of production as to the cultivation of wine is concentrated in this little spot. It is the celebrated vineyard of Germany.

As early as the third century the Emperor Probus is said to have planted the grape of the banks on the Rhine. According to more correct history, Charlemagne is said to have observed from his castle, Ingelheim, how early the snow commenced melting on the Rudesheim mountain, planted Orleans grapes, and history sufficiently establishes the fact. The vineyards in the Rheingau are of considerable extent, and those belonging to Prince Metternich are the most celebrated: they are known by the name of Johannisberg.

The wines produced in Germany are mostly white: the red wines are those from the Burgundy grape. The white grapes are the Riesling; they are small, require a hot summer, ripen equally, and give the best flavoured and finest wine. The Orleans grape, a larger kind, likewise requires a hot summer, produces a high-coloured and glowing wine, but is inferior to the former; the Orleans grape is therefore little cultivated. The Tramine, a light red grape, ripens early, gives a strong sweet wine, but is deficient in flavour. So is the deep red Ruland grape introduced from Hungary. There are a variety of other grapes, but their qualities are inferior.

The cultivation of the vine, especially the Riesling, has been much improved since 1815; such as open planting, low props, repeated and suitable manuring, classification of the grape in gathering, proper and timely pressing, confined fermentation, &c. The vine yields the choicest wine in the fourth year, and attains the age of from 25 to 50 years. The Rheingau is considered a model school for wine-growers. An acre will hold about 4000 vines, and yield from eight to twelve ohms in a favourable autumn. Besides the excellence of the soil, consisting of clay and slate, the Rheingau is particularly adapted for the maturing of the grape. Along the course of the Rhine here a range of hills extends from east to west on the right bank, and the fertile valley and the hills themselves, sloping towards the river, are warmed on the southern side, sheltered against the north winds, and there being no hills on the opposite side, no shadow is thrown towards this direction, and therefore this delightful country is never deprived of the congenial warmth which the longest sunny day gives it. To this must be added the regular morning vapours ascending from the Rhine. We may easily conceive why the Rheingau stands so pre-eminently as a wine country; for here are combined excellence of soil, natural advantages of position, choice of grape and unremitted attention on the part of the intelligent cultivator.

The limits of our columns prevent us from entering into details as to the treatment of the various vines, but we may briefly mention that the best wine is produced about the middle part of the hills; lower down, or at the foot of the hill, the flavour is inferior, and the taste somewhat earthy. The most magnificent of all vineyards is the Rüdesheim mountain, of nearly 400 acres: it is surrounded to its very top with walls, and has the appearance of a fortress. Those walls, or belts, form a series of terraces, which sustain the ground on the steep ascent; and where the old castle Ehrenfels hovers over the Buigerloch, there thrive the most luxuriant of the Rüdesheim wines.

The cultivation of wine occupies more hands than any branch of agriculture, for it requires indefatigable labour throughout the whole year, it absorbs attention, and demands capital. The wine-grower considers himself happy if one season out of five he meets with a favourable autumn; he is then sure to be richly compensated.

That the reader may form an idea of the great importance resulting to Germany from the cultivation of wine, we may state that the last returns of the Zollverein proved that the produce is not less than 300,000,000 of litres, which, even as unfermented wine, is valued at 77,500,000 florins, or £6,458,518. We read in romances that the vintage is the happiest and merriest life the labourers enjoy, but in the Rheingau it certainly is not the case. The undivided attention in the collecting of grapes different in their stage of maturity, the proper time of pressing, are duties which make the labourer forget his cheerfulness, and force on his countenance a seriousness and care. It being a branch of industry which requires constant attention and subjects them to great responsibility, yet do we see the labourers, women, and children, or the musical Germans go at day-break singing to the hills, and returning in the evening with a cheerful tune, occasionally, at the end of the harvest, enjoying a dance.

The German wines are considered good at five years, but the better qualities require double that time. Some of the finest sort do not improve after five. Of all wines, white wines are tne most durable; this is ascribed by chemists to their perfect fermentation. Old German wines deepen in colour, and acquire an agreeable acidity.

Among the many celebrated vineyards in the Rheingau, the Johannisberg has always been prominent. The Johannisberg is an isolated hill, and is protected, like the other hills of the Rheingau, from the northerly winds. It was formerly the property of the Priory of Fulda, belonged afterwards to General Kellermann, and now to Prince Metternich. The castle hill yields, in favourable seasons, 40 hogsheads of wine, valued at 80,000 florins; the quality is most exquisite, and precaution is taken in sealing the bottles with the Prince's crest. The best Johannisberg of 1831 is sold at 11 florins the bottle, and a few hogsheads of 1822 were sold at 1000 to 1200 florins per hogshead. The vineyards around the castle produce a wine somewhat inferior. Until lately Johannisberg had no equal, but it has now found its decided rival in the Steinberg: the area is about 100 acres, surrounded by a wall, and is acknowledged to be the most perfect model, as showing the management of a vineyard. The quantity produced is somewhat more than the Johannisberg, but the value varies from 1000 to 5000 florins per hogshead; and as an instance of the superior quality of Steinberg, a sale took place in the year 1436, and a cask (of 3½ ohm. or 630 bottles) of Steinberg, of 1822, was sold for the enormous price of 6105 florins (£509). No wine is known ever to have fetched such a price.

In addition to the places marked on our map as the Rheingau, we must mention Hochheim as sometimes included in the district of the Rheingau; and our English connoisseurs will recognise the celebrated Hock as being a wine imported from that place.

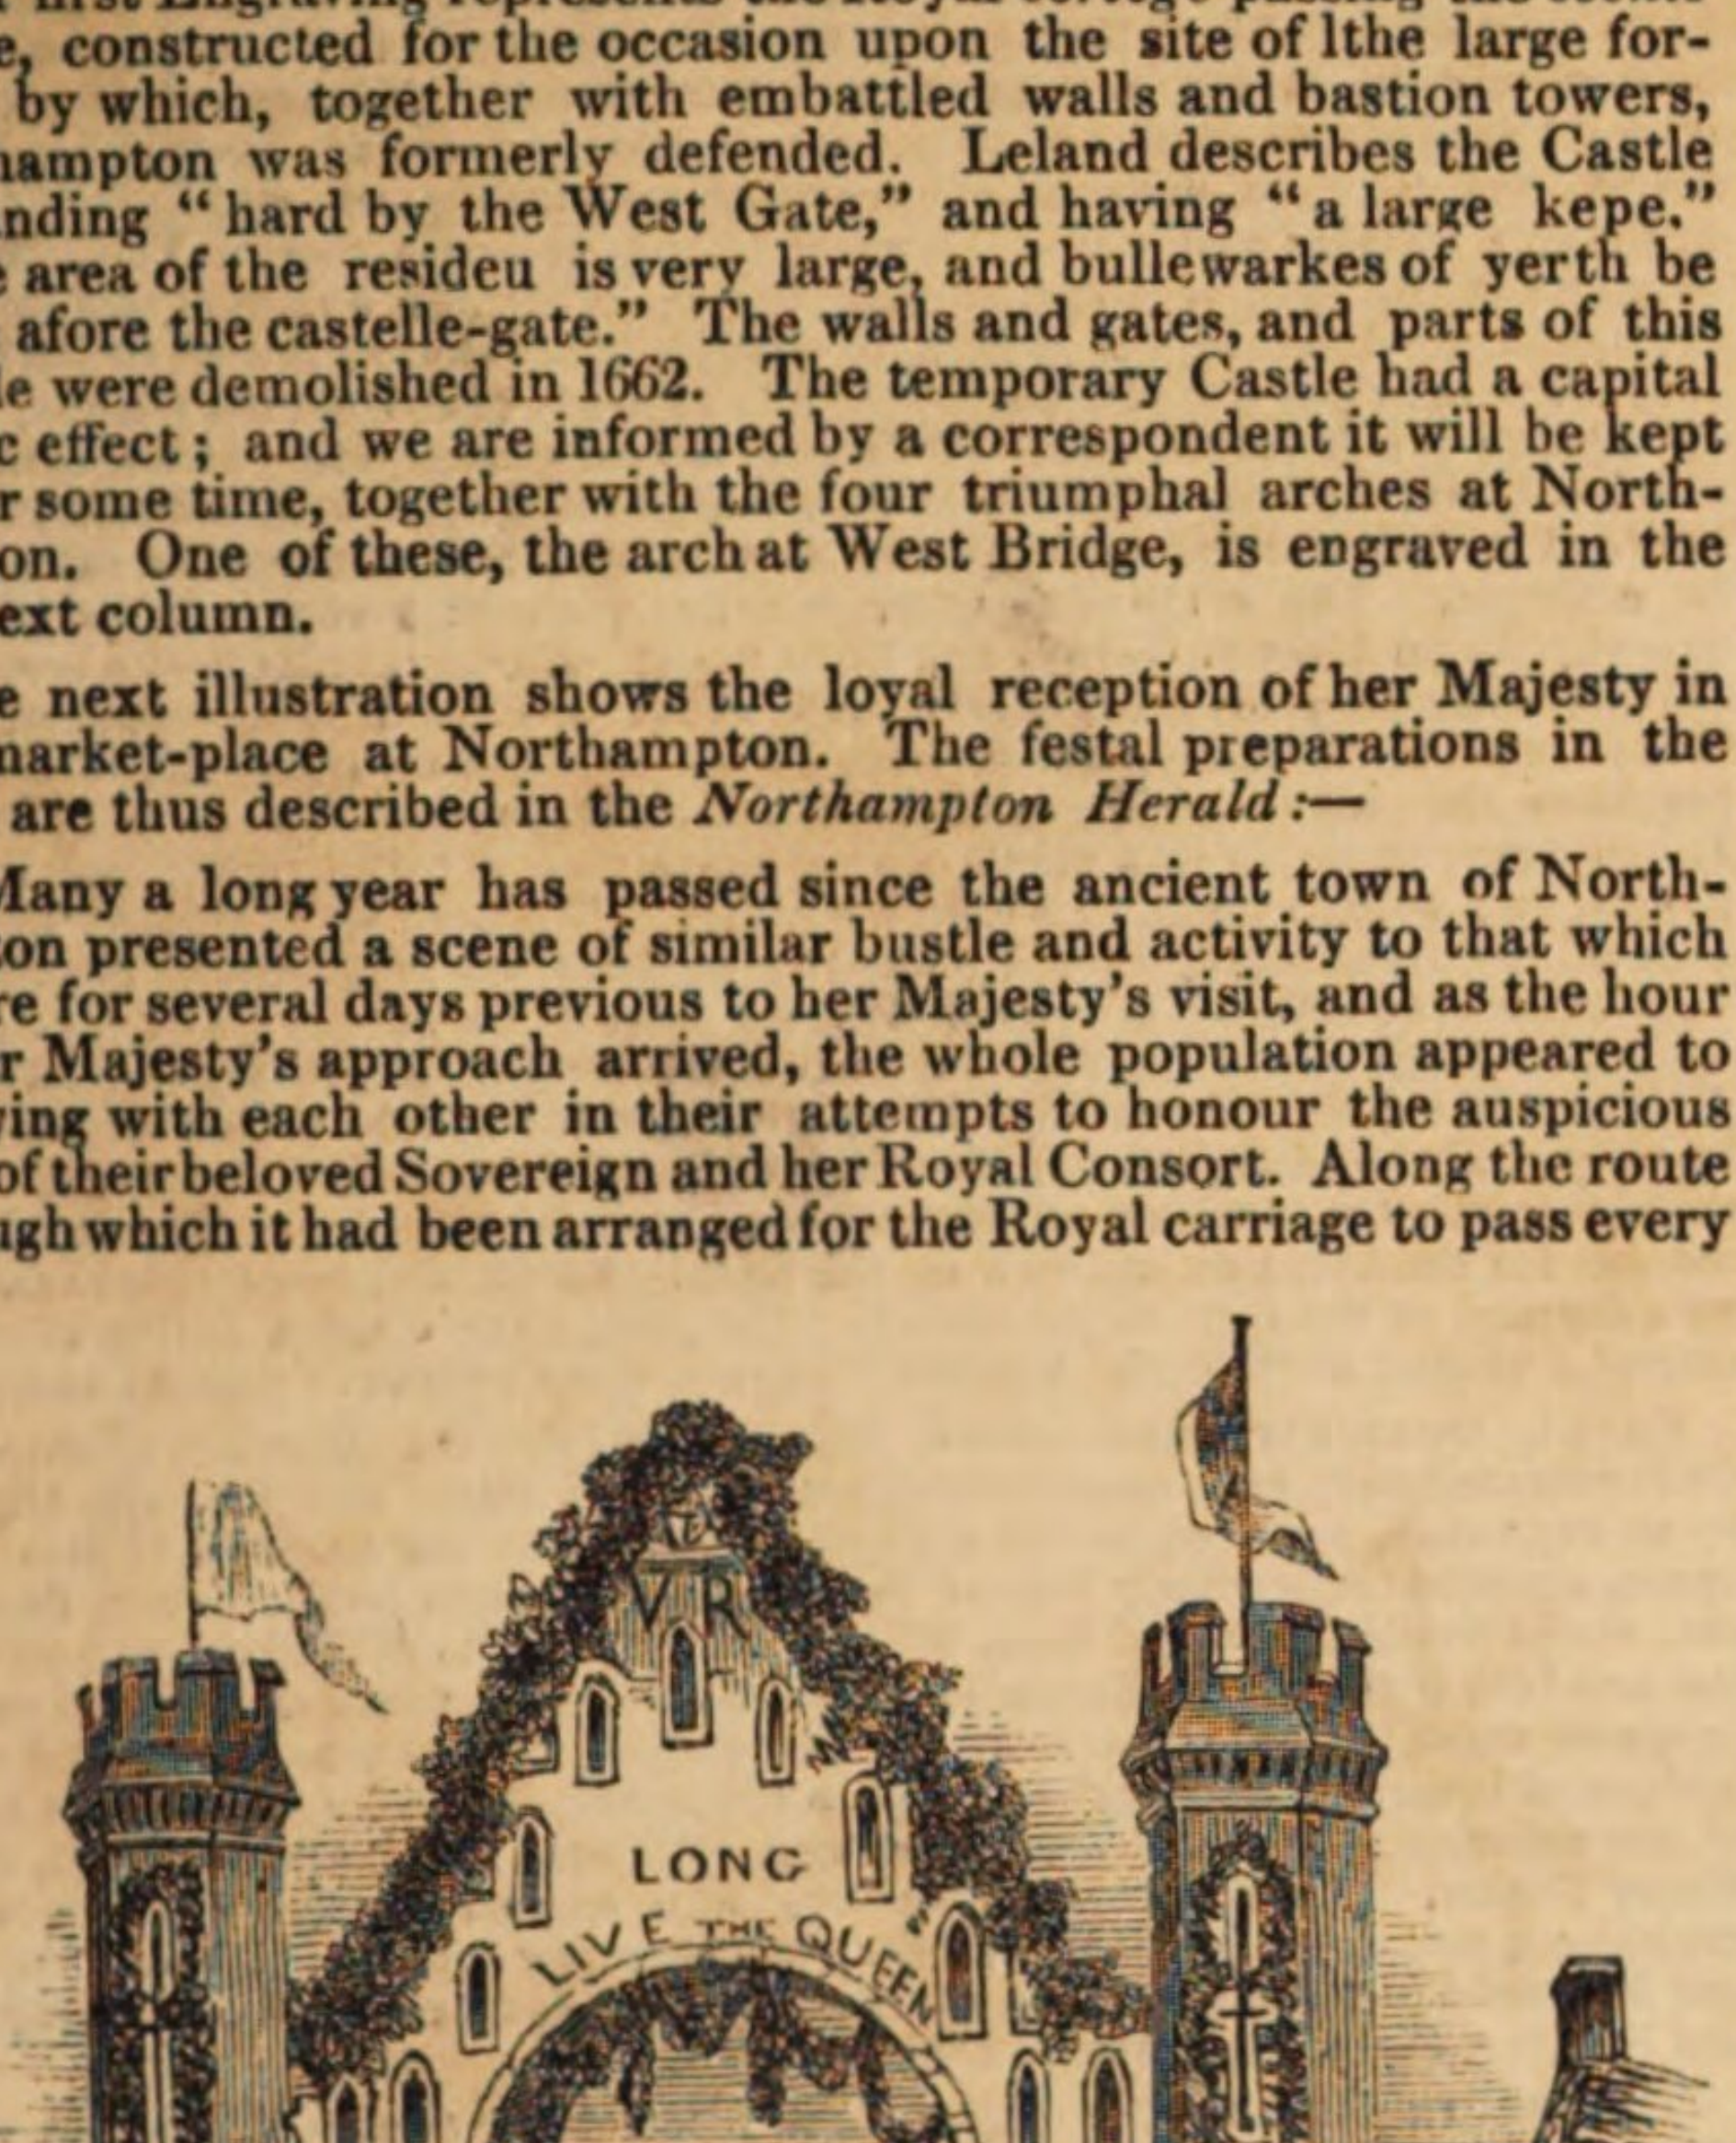
HER MAJESTY'S LATE VISIT TO BURGHLEY.

We now proceed to the completion of our illustrated chronicle of this Royal Visit, with details of the Progress supplementary to the report in our Journal of last week.

Our first Engraving represents the Royal cortége passing the scenic Castle, constructed for the occasion upon the site of the large fortress, by which, together with embattled walls and bastion towers, Northampton was formerly defended. Leland describes the Castle as standing "hard by the West Gate," and having "a large kepe." "The area of the resideu is very large, and bullewarkes of yerth be made afore the castelle-gate." The walls and gates, and parts of this Castle were demolished in 1662. The temporary Castle had a capital scenic effect; and we are informed by a correspondent it will be kept up for some time, together with the four triumphal arches at Northampton. One of these, the arch at West Bridge, is engraved in the next column.

The next illustration shows the loyal reception of her Majesty in the market-place at Northampton. The festal preparations in the town are thus described in the Northampton Herald:—

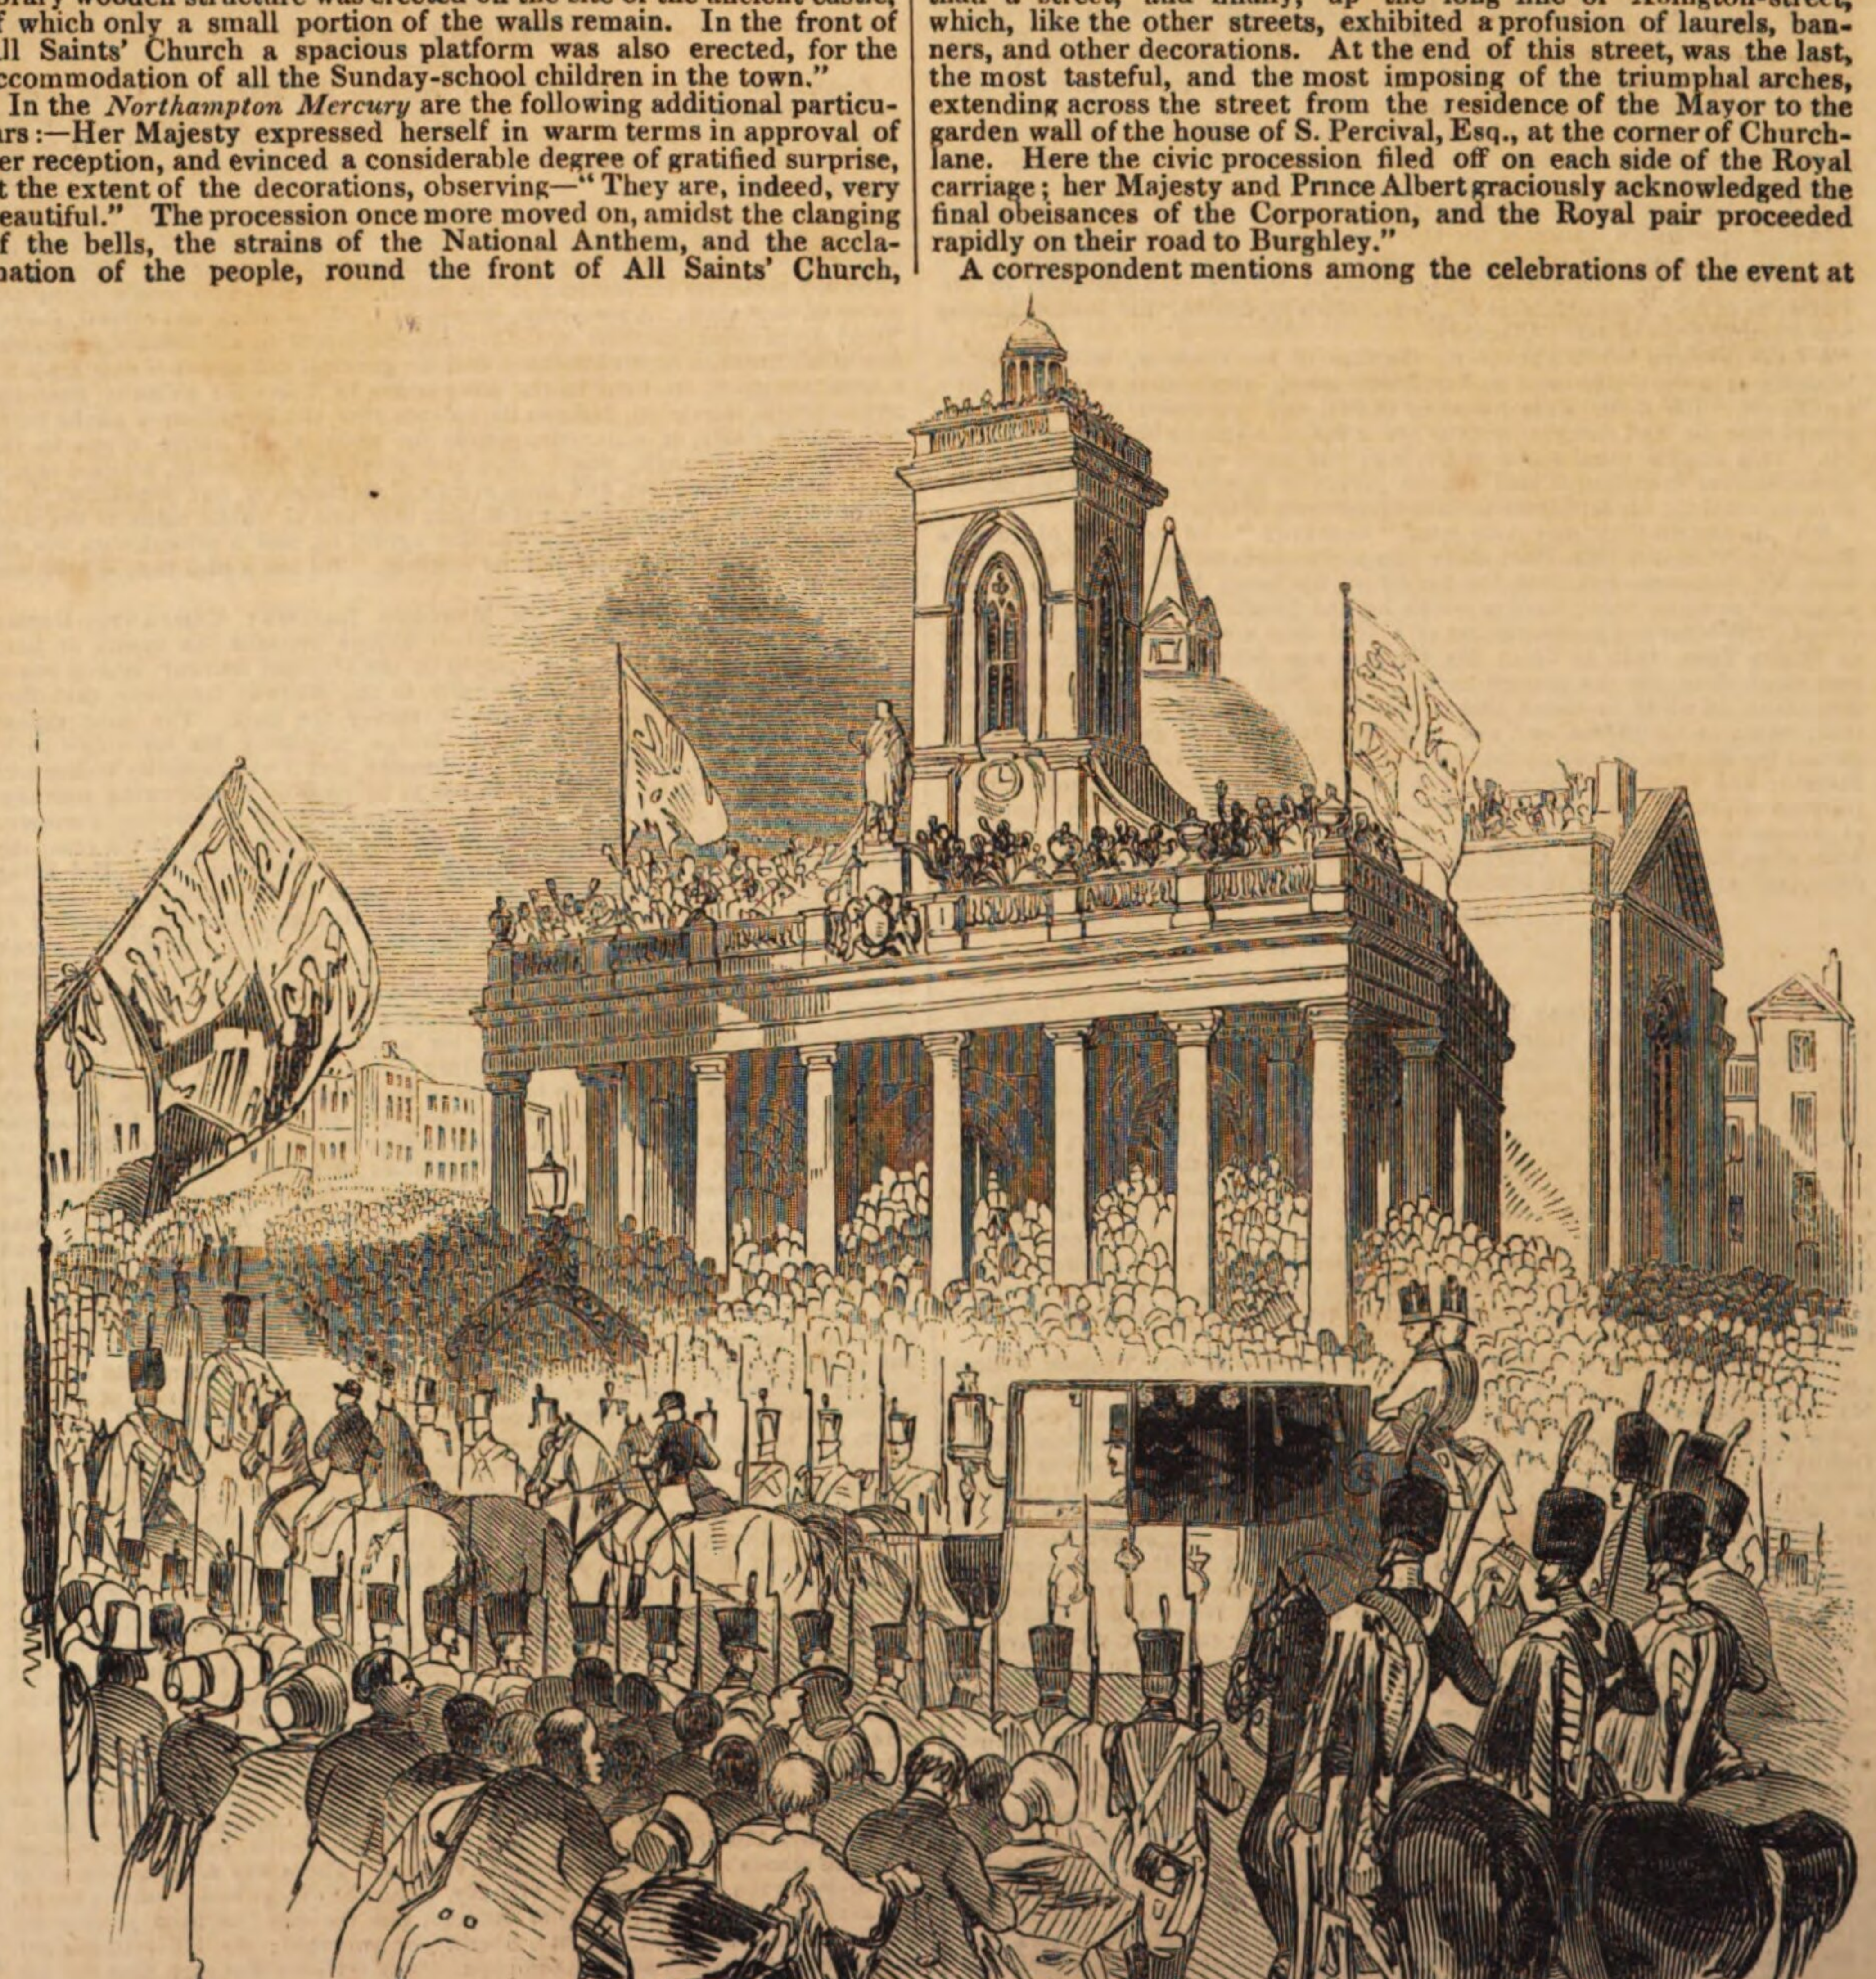
"Many a long year has passed since the ancient town of Northampton presented a scene of similar bustle and activity to that which it bore for several days previous to her Majesty's visit, and as the hour of her Majesty's approach arrived, the whole population appeared to be vying with each other in their attempts to honour the auspicious visit of their beloved Sovereign and her Royal Consort. Along the route through which it had been arranged for the Royal carriage to pass every house exhibited more or less enthusiam on the part of its inhabitants in giving effect to this feeling of loyalty and affection. Festoons of evergreens and flowers floated across all the principal streets, and no fewer than four magnificent triumphal arches, tastefully designed, had been thrown across the road at different parts of the town. The first of these was situated just below the old castle hill, on the Dallington side of the river. The second was placed in Mare Fair. The style of this arch is Elizabethan—in keeping with Burghley House. The design consisted of three arches, a large one in the centre, and two smaller ones on either side. The span of the centre arch was about fourteen feet; that of each of the smaller ones measuring five feet. Three pillars supported this ornamental piece of architecture; the two great ones upon which the centre arch was formed were six feet square and twenty-eight feet high. The other two were four feet square and sixteen feet high. Including the decorative turrets, the height of the two larger pillars was forty feet each, that of the two smaller ones about twenty-one feet each. The whole was surmounted by a crown, over which the Royal standard floated. The inscription, "Welcome Victoria and Albert," was painted in large characters at the upper part of the arch, and the lower portion was decorated with evergreens and flowers. The third arch, even more colossal, was situated at the side of All Saints' Churchyard, and nearly opposite the George. This also bore a similar inscription, and was, like the others, a very imposing structure. The fourth arch, the most admirable of the whole, was erected at the eastern extremity of the town, at the top of Abington-street. In addition to these arches, a temporary wooden structure was erected on the site of the ancient castle, of which only a small portion of the walls remain. In the front of All Saints' Church a spacious platform was also erected, for the accommodation of all the Sunday-school children in the town."



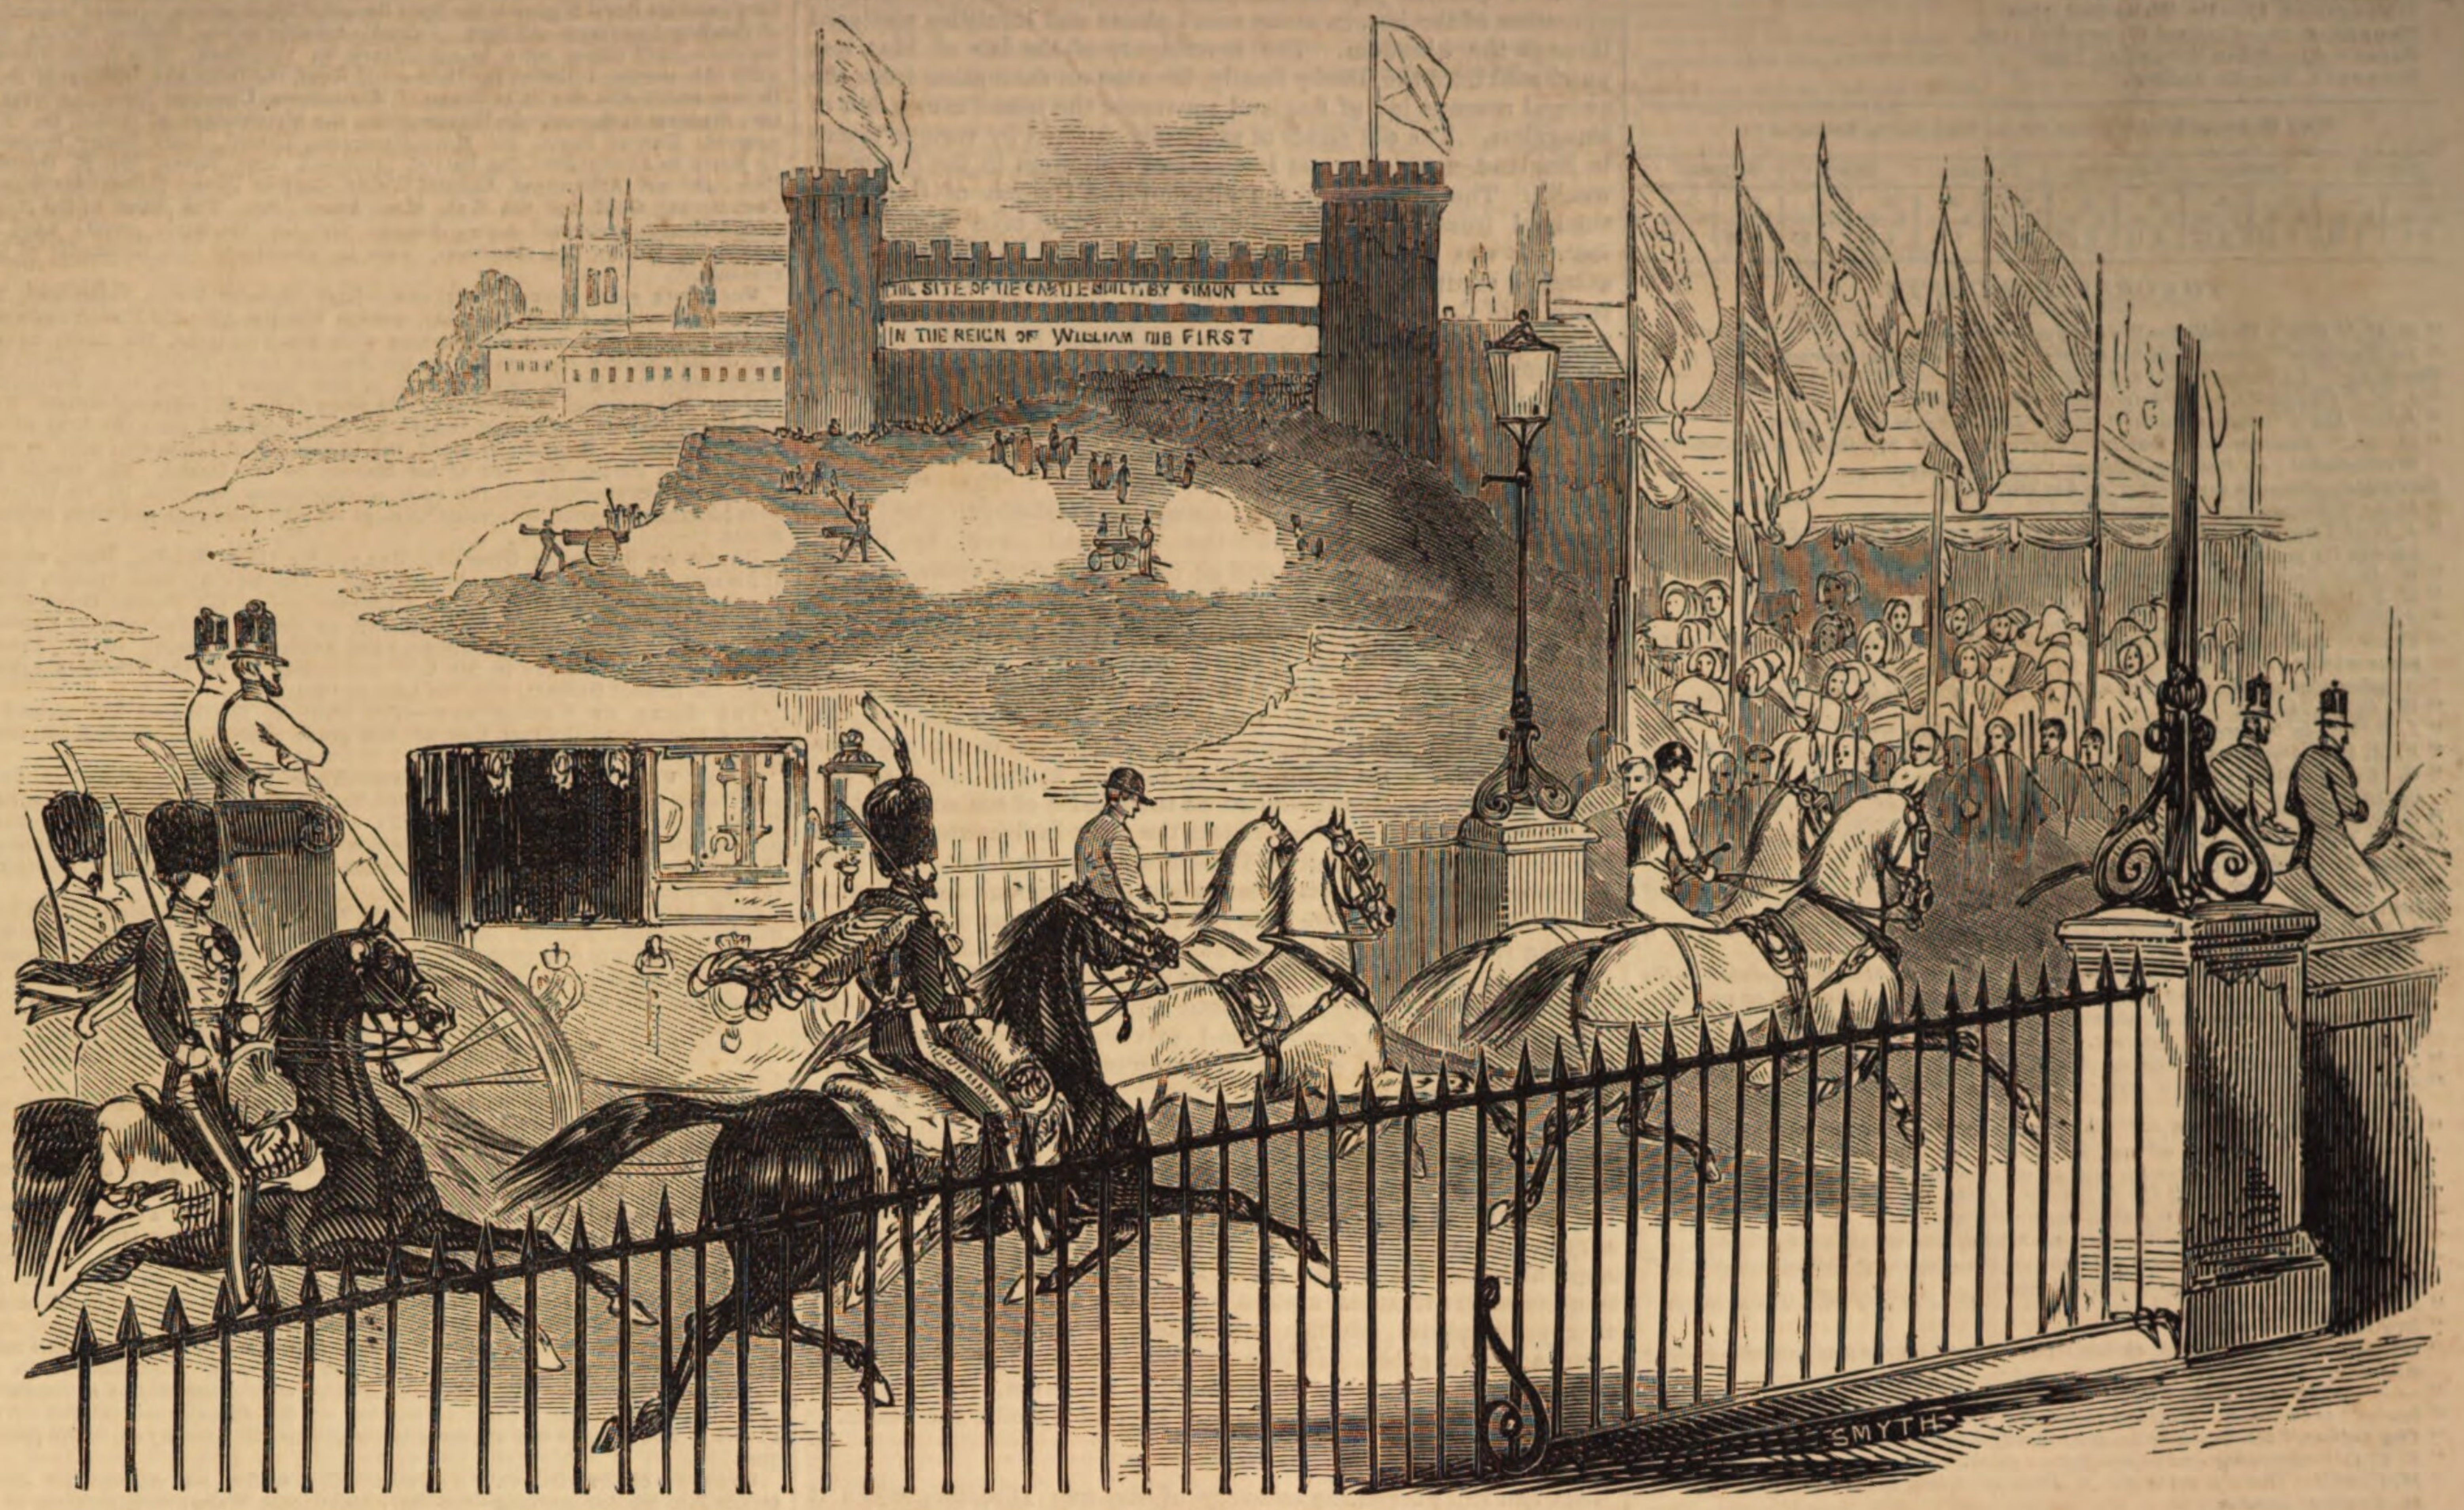
ARCH AT WEST BRIDGE.

In the Northampton Mercury are the following additional particulars:—Her Majesty expressed herself in warm terms in approval of her reception, and evinced a considerable degree of gratified surprise, at the extent of the decorations, observing—"They are, indeed, very beautiful." The procession once more moved on, amidst the clanging of the bells, the strains of the National Anthem, and the acclamation of the people, round the front of All Saints' Church, under the triumphal arch at the end of Mercers' Row, and alon Mercers' Row, which, like Gold-street, was so profusely decorated with evergreens and gorgeous flags and streamers, as to rather wear the appearance of a grove decked out for some triumphal occasion than a street, and finally, up the long line of Abington-street, which, like the other streets, exhibited a profusion of laurels, banners, and other decorations. At the end of this street, was the last, the most tasteful, and the most imposing of the triumphal arches, extending across the street from the residence of the Mayor to the garden wall of the house of S. Percival, Esq., at the corner of Church-lane. Here the civic procession filed off on each side of the Royal carriage; her Majesty and Prince Albert graciously acknowledged the final obeisances of the Corporation, and the Royal pair proceeded rapidly on their road to Burghley."

A correspondent mentions among the celebrations of the event at



HER MAJESTY PASSING THE MARKET-PLACE, NORTHAMPTON.



THE SITE OF THE CASTLE BUILT BY SIMON
IN THE REIGN OF WILLIAM THE FIRST SMYTH

HER MAJESTY PASSING "THE CASTLE," NORTHAMPTON.

Northampton, a large dinner at the Angel Hotel, a splendid ball at the George Hotel, whilst almost every private house had its small party. "Not only," says our correspondent, "does the town feel honoured by the visit of the Queen, but that honour has been much increased by the Mayor being invited to Burghley, and by the gracious reception he met with both from the Queen and the Prince, who expressed themselves gratified with their loyal reception by the Northamptonians."

Among the incidents, it is stated that more than sixty pair of horses were supplied from the George Hotel, during the week, solely on account of her Majesty's visit. A valuable charger died at the hotel stables on Sunday, it is supposed of exhaustion; it was the property of one of her Majesty's escort, Sir A. Chichester, of the 7th Hussars, who is stated to have been lately offered a considerable sum for this fine animal.

Among the lasting memorials of the Queen's visit to Northampton, is the foundation of "the Royal Victoria Dispensary," the subscription for which has already approached £1000.

On Thursday, a pair of patent Wellington boots, manufactured by Mr. H. Hull, was presented by E. H. Barwell, Esq., the Mayor of Northampton, to His Royal Highness Prince Albert, at Burghley, as a specimen of the staple trade of this town. The workmanship is very splendid. The front, of scarlet velvet, is interlaid with scrolls of black patent leather. The Prince of Wales's plume is neatly stitched in the centre; the scrolls round the top and front are in white silk, and the Royal arms inside the lining, in gold. His Royal Highness personally expressed to the Mayor his approbation of the skill exhibited by the manufacturer, who has since received a formal acknowledgment of the present.

The next illustration shows one of the most tastefully constructed arches, in the village of Broughton, between Northampton and Kettering, where the preparations were extensive. "The entrance to, and exit from the place," says the Northampton Herald, "were ornamented with triumphal arches, formed of evergreens and flowers tastefully arranged, and the whole population of the village decked in holiday attire, lined the wood on either side, testifying in every possible manner, as the Royal party passed, the intensity of their gratification at even the momentary glance of her Majesty which the rapid progress of the Royal carriages allowed. The Hon. and Rev. James Douglas, a relative of his Grace the Duke of Buccleuch, who is the incumbent of the parish, had taken an active part in the arrangements here; and he was worthily seconded by the yeomanry of the neighbourhood, the occasion being observed as a gala day by all classes, from the highest to the lowest grade."

The following is quoted from the Northampton Mercury.—

"Between Weldon and Bulwick, the Royal party passed the seat of the Earl of Cardigan, at Deene Park. Here a very large and handsome arch was thrown across the road. It was an imitation of masonry, and very happily executed.

"But a more interesting sight here was the junction of Lord Cardigan's tenantry, who mustered in great numbers by the roadside, and fell in with the Royal cortège. They saluted her Majesty with hearty cheers.

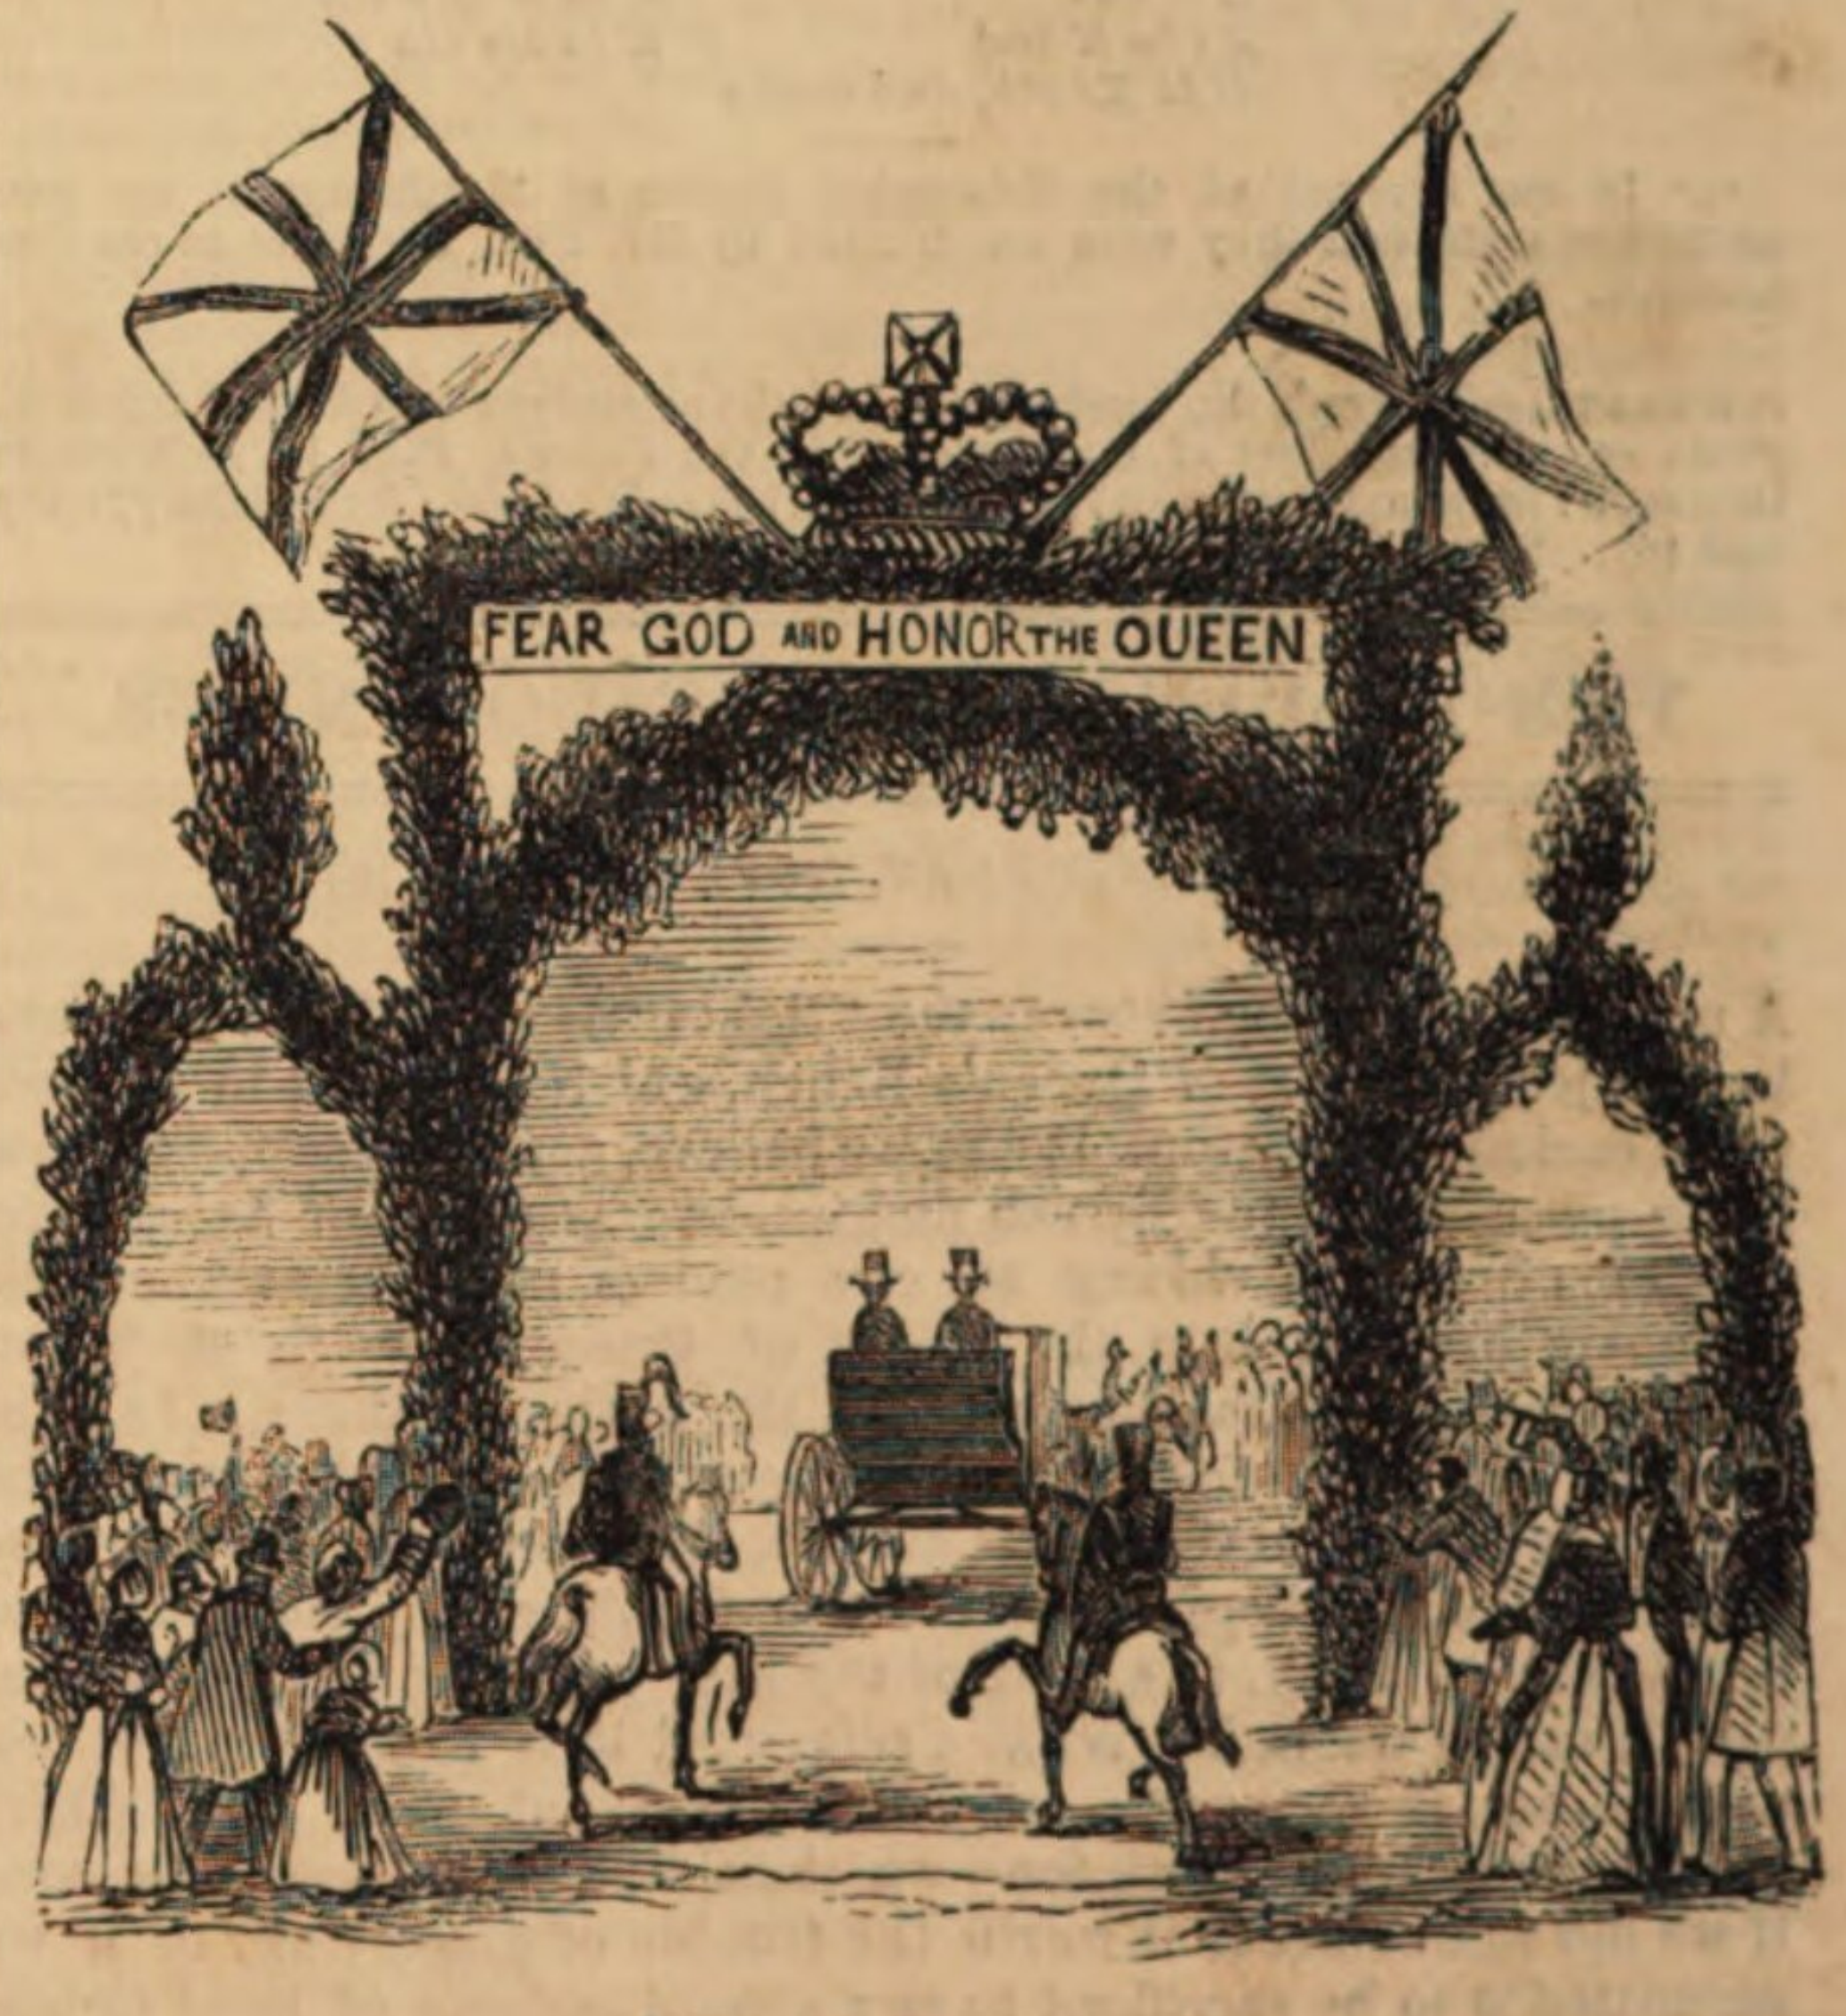
"By this time the followers of the Royal party had very considerably increased. At every point on the wayside, some few additions were made of horsemen or vehicles, and the appearance of such a large body, proceeding at so rapid a rate, preceded by the soldiers and the Royal carriages, with the outriders in their scarlet coats, was particularly striking."

Deene Park is situated on the confines of the Royal Forest of Rockingham and presents very beautifully diversified scenery. The mansion is built entirely of stone, and with several embattled turrets. The hall has a timber-framed roof, the windows are emblazoned with family arms, and the walls are hung with fine paintings.

HER MAJESTY'S DEPARTURE FROM BURGHLEY-HOUSE.

On Friday morning her Majesty, Prince Albert, and the suite left Burghley at half-past nine o'clock, on their return to London. Her Majesty had previously taken leave of the Marchioness of Exeter and the reft of the family. The Marquis accompanied her Majesty on horseback one stage, and then went on in his carriage to be ready to receive her Majesty at Weedon.

All along the route from Stamford to Kettering the same demonstrations of loyalty and affection were made by the people as on her Majesty's journey down. The triumphal arches had all remained up, and the houses were very gaily decorated with flags, evergreens, &c. The Royal party changed horses at the same stages as on their journey down.



FEAR GOD AND HONOR THE QUEEN

ARCH AT BROUGHTON.

At Kettering, also, there was a great demonstration by the people.

At Northampton her Majesty was received by the Mayor and Corporation and a procession of the town-trades, in the same manner as on her journey down. They preceded the Royal carriages as they went at a walking pace through the town.

At the town and station of Weedon great numbers of people had collected. The military (47th Foot) lined the road, and there was a guard of honour (of the 47th) under the command of Captain Gordon. The Marquis of Exeter, who had arrived previously, and Sir Henry Dryden, the high sheriff of the county, were at the station to receive her Majesty.

At a quarter past two the approach of her Majesty to the station was announced by the elevation of the Royal standard, and in a few minutes more the Royal party entered the station. Her Majesty and the Prince went to their apartments.

On the departure of the Queen and Prince Albert, the Prince shook hands with the Marquis of Exeter, and the train started, amidst the cheers of the people, at five minutes to three o'clock. The regular train had not long preceded it, so that great precaution was required.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 23, 1844.

A dispute is pending between the "tight little island" of Jersey and her Majesty's Court of Queen's Bench, which promises to produce some curious discussion. It was, we believe, generally supposed that in no place within the British dominions was a writ of habeas corpus of no effect. Many of our readers must remember the prisoners brought into the Court of Queen's Bench at Westminster from Canada, shortly after the outbreak there. In that case the writ was effective across the Atlantic. And it would be the same in Australia, in Calcutta, in our settlement in the Island of Hong-Kong. Wherever, in fact, the English Constitution is known at all, this, one of the best powers of the Constitution, must be obeyed. What a safeguard it is against oppression and abuse of authority we need not point out; our fathers thought it worth fighting for—we should be but degenerate sons if we did not consider it worth the trouble of preserving, or if we permitted it to be sacrificed to any absurd notions of local rights, or to the prescription of exemption claimed by an obscure and insignificant spot of earth, that would be scarcely heard of at all if it did not now and then make itself ridiculous.

The island of Jersey has preserved a code of laws which is now a mass of confusion, being made up of the old Norman-French legal system, combined with portions of the jurisprudence of the twelfth and fourteenth centuries. It has been exempted from most of the statute law which applies to England, and, locally, may pretty well be said to govern itself. But the exemption from these different laws does not, we should apprehend, place it out of the pale of the Constitution. No special acts of Parliament have been necessary to make the writ of habeas corpus obeyed in our most distant settlements, and we do not see that the personal liberty of English residents should be placed in jeopardy at the caprice of the Royal Court, merely becuuse that body chooses to assert an independence of England in one of the most vital of our Constitutional privileges.

It has been found necessary, at various times, to suppress every claim to peculiar jurisdictions, and exemption from the general operation of the law, in many small places and localities scattered through the kingdom. The sovereignty of the Isle of Man was purchased from the Derby family, because an exemption from the general revenue law of England converted the island into a den of smugglers. The old rights of sanctuary claimed by various places in England, made them at last perfect nuisances to the commonwealth. The holiness of the altar of the Church of God once shielded from arrest the criminal who could take refuge at its foot. It was not exclusively a Christian usage, for the same, or at least a similar protection was given within the precincts of the temples of the Heathens. That privilege was often abused, and when, as it afterwards did in Christian Europe, it became extended to whole districts, some of them lying in the heart of crowded cities, it may easily be perceived that there could be neither peace nor safety in a society that permitted these "harbours of refuge" for all that was dissolute, vile, and desperate to remain without the pale of the law. The "Alsatia" of old, the space lying between Fleet-street and the Thames, and bounded on the east and west by Blackfriars and the Temple, was one of these privileged spots, and the crime and disorder that abounded in it have no parallel in modern London. Who does not recollect the use made of it by Sir Walter Scott in his "Fortunes of Nigel," and the vivid picture he gives of the revels of Duke Hildebrand and his crew? But amid all their brutal riot he places the dark deed of the murder of the miser; and in so doing he adhered to the probable and the true, for the knife was as familiar to the hands of the privileged and protected ruffians as the handle of the wine flagon. Another place of the same sort was the Mint in Southwark, which has fallen for imaginative illustration into the hands of Mr. Harrison Ainsworth. His description is far enough from Scott's in dramatic effect, but we fancy it is very near the literal truth. Let the reader try to imagine what such dens would have become in the present day, and he will at once see the wisdom of our predecessors in abolishing, without condition or reserve, all the "exemptions," and charters, and privileges, which these places pleaded on behalf of a continued immunity from the wholesome supervision of the law.

The island of Jersey is not an Alsatia nor a Mint. It is not a rogue's paradise, nor in that sense of the term, a refugium peccatorum. It is liable to the visits of Bow-street, and cannot exclude the presence of Daniel Forrester, should occasion render it necessary, for the detection of a thief, the recovery of property, or the apprehension of a forger. But it claims something else, which is quite as great an exemption from the law of the kingdom, and to the occasional English inhabitants of the island may have even a worse effect. That exemption cannot be safely allowed. If the letter of the law permits such an abuse, the sooner na Act of Parliament places the matter beyond a doubt the better.

Nothing can exceed the courtesy of Railway Directors, when it is known that Royal and noble personages are travelling or going to travel by "the line," in special trains for special purposes. The accommodation is bountiful—even excessive. But the public at large—that very comprehensive and at times very ill-used body—frequently find the managers of the Boards, of whom every one must now purchase locomotion, rather the reverse of attentive. Trains do not start, or do not arrive at the times specified, luggage goes astray, tickets are issued with too little rigour, and demanded with a little too much; all kinds of small misfortunes happen, of which some of the blame may be ascribed to the Railway Company, and a good deal, perhaps, to the travellers themselves. But beyond being pilloried in the grievance column of a morning paper, by some Senex or Viator, very little can be done to these gigantic corporations of conveyancers. The equanimity with which they hear of the mishaps of the public is astonishing—as long as they are mere common, plodding, commercial people. What earthly consequence can punctuality of arrival or departure be to them? But it may happen that a railway train may carry a Duke in the most private and unostentatious manner, and being guilty of the same want of punctuality, may then hear of it in a manner that produces more effect on them. This, according to a story that appears in the papers, has just happened. The Duke of Wellington coming from Dover to London to attend a Privy Council was delayed by the train an hour beyond the time it ought to have been, and thus arrived too late. It is said that he, in consequence, rebuked those who had the management rather sharply. The deprecatory reply was, that if they had known his Grace was a traveller they would have had a special train for him, by which they only made matters worse; they were told plainly that it was not the convenience of the Duke of Wellington they were bound to consult, but that of the public at large; the times announced they ought to keep, whether their passengers were dukes or draymen. Such was in effect the lesson said to have been read them by his Grace. We cannot vouch for the authenticity of the story, but we hope it may be true in the first place, and that the railway officials will profit by the rebuke in the next. The reply to the offer of special accommodation, certainly reads very much like what we think the Duke would say, and agrees completely with the direct, clear, and common-sense view he is known to take of most questions. If the anecdote is not true, it certainly ought to be.

In the afternoon the Queen and Prince Albert, accompanied by the Duke and Duchess of Saxe Coburg and Gotha and Duke Ernest of Wirtemberg, walked in the pleasure-grounds, returning to the Castle in a pony phaeton.

Clarke, the newly-elected Mayor, having been commanded by his Majesty Louis Philippe to present the worthy chief magistrate with the sum of 5000 francs (£200) to be distributed amongst the poor and necessitous of the town during the ensuing winter. Two beautifully executed gold snuff-boxes have been presented from the King of the French to Messrs. Russell and Stead, the inspectors of police who were on duty at the Castle during the visit of his Majesty to the Queen. The female domestics also, connected with the suite of apartments occupied by his Majesty, were likewise presented with valuable rings set with diamonds and other precious stones.

Illness of the Rev. Sydney Smith.—This reverend and facetious gentleman has been indisposed for some time, but we are glad to hear that the disease (gout) has assumed a favourable form. Consecration of the New Church of St. Paul, at Malta.—This church, which was built at the sole expense of her Majesty the Queen Dowager, was consecrated on the 1st instant, by the Lord Bishop of Gibraltar. The body of the church and the portico are not much unlike those of St. Martin's-in-the fields in their exterior aspect. The internal aspect is still better. The church is to be called the English Collegiate of St. Paul in Malta.

Consecration of Camberwell New Church.—On Thursday this magnificent church was consecrated by the Lord Bishop of Winchester, with the customary ceremonial. We shall next week present to our readers an engraving of the impressive scene, with a description of the embellished interior of the church. The exterior was engraved in our journal for January 20, in the present year.

Opening of St. Olave's Church.—This edifice was opened for divine service last Sunday morning—the Rev. Archdeacon Wilberforce, chaplain to his Royal Highness Prince Albert, preaching an impressive sermon. The cost of the repairs is about £8000.

The Parish of Tottenham.—We regret to state that a dispute has taken place in the parish of Tottenham, between the incumbent and his parishioners, arising out of the attempted introduction by the reverend gentleman of some alterations in the rubrics and other matters relating to the reading of Divine service.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

Opening of the Gresham Club-house.—The neat extensive stone building, recently erected at the corner of St. Swithin's-lane and King William-street, City, known as the Gresham Club-house, was opened on Tuesday evening for the accommodation of the members, for the first time.

Cabinet Council.—The first Cabinet Council of the season was held on Tuesday afternoon at the Foreign-office. The Ministers present were Sir Robert Peel, the Duke of Wellington, Lord Wharncliffe, the Earl of Aberdeen, Lord Stanley, Sir James Graham, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Earl of Haddington, Sir Edward Knatchbull, Lord Granville Somerset, and Mr. Gladstone. The Lord Chancellor subsequently joined his colleagues. The council sat two hours.

Improvements in Hyde Park.—The piece of dirty water in Hyde-park, facing the new gate at Knightsbridge, called Albert-gate, which formerly flowed from a waterfall in connexion with and at the east end of the Serpentine River, has now been entirely removed, and the vacuum filled up. In its place appears a well-gravelled road from the new gate to the ride, being for equestrians only, as the celebrated ride called Rotten-row is devoted entirely for the use of equestrians, no carriages, except those of the royal family, being admitted within the drive, and the privilege is rarely, if ever, availed of by them. This new road, in place of the unsightly piece of water, is a very great improvement, in addition to its being a vast convenience to the wealthy inhabitants of the numerous splendid streets and squares recently formed on the Marquis of Westminster's estate in Pimlico. A new grand walk has been formed across the park from Grosvenor-gate, leading from Grosvenor-square to the small gate opposite the Chinese Exhibition.

The New Royal Exchange.—The workmen during the week have been engaged in raising the splendid stone statue of Sir Richard Whittington, so well known in nursery history as "Whittington and his Cat, thrice Lord Mayor of London." The statue represents him in his robes of office, and weighs three-and-a-half tons, and is placed in the niche over the northern entrance to this magnificent commercial edifice. The statue of Sir Thomas Gresham is expected to be put up next week.

The Ball at Guildhall for the Benefit of the Poles.—The fancy ball at Guildhall for the benefit of the distressed Polish refugees, took place on Tuesday night, and went off with considerable éclat. The hall was decorated in the same manner as when the Lord Mayor's inauguration into office was celebrated on the 9th of November. The company began to arrive soon after eight o'clock, and at half-past nine o'clock dancing commenced. The amusements of the evening did not entirely consist of dancing, but were varied by the introduction of a vocal concert, in the course of which Miss Sarah Flower, Mrs. Rodwell, Miss Steele, Signor Ferrari, &c. sang various pieces. This concert took place in the Common Council chamber, and very pleasantly diversified the enjoyments of the evening. Dancing was then resumed, and kept up with great spirit to an early hour of the morning. Among the company were the Earl and Countess of Errol, the Earl of Munster, Lady Adelaide Fitzclarence, Countess of Tankerville, Countess of Glengall, Lady Mary Fox, Lord Dudley C. Stuart, Colonel Fox, M.P., Colonel Leicester Stanhope, Mr. C. Villiers, M.P., the Hon. Mr. Abbott, Sir H. Webbe, Sir W. Magnay, Mr. H. Baring, M.P., &c. As the company was very numerons, it is to be hoped that the ball realised a good sum for the Poles.

Artists' Amicable Fund.—In our journal of last week, we inadvertently omitted to notice the fourth anniversary dinner of this excellent society, which was held at the Crown and Anchor Tavern, on the 11th instant. Amongst the company, were many eminent professors of the Fine Arts, with Dr. Leonard Stewart and Mr. Kirkwood, medical officers of the Institution. The chair was taken by Mr. A. J. Mason; and after the customary toasts, the company were most ably addressed by the chairman, Mr. Cooper, R.A., Mr. G. Clint, Mr. Fahey (the secretary), Mr. C. E. Wagstaff, and other gentlemen, on the advantages which must accrue to the members of the Institution in creating, by their own annual subscriptions, an independent provision for sickness, old age, and the distresses attendant upon death. Such a principle of co-operation and self-support can only require to be known among artists to become extended.

St. Marylebone Bank for Savings.—Open deposit accounts, 1843, £14,130; ditto, 1844, £15,124. Sums invested: 1343, £319,496; ditto, 1844, £350,089.

The New Police-Court in the Borough.—This police-court, which has been built on the west side of Blackman-street, Borough, adjacent to the Queen's Bench Prison, is completed; and the Secretary of State has issued orders for the removal of the public business from Union-hall to the above court by the early part of the ensuing month.

Equestrian Portrait of the Duke of Wellington.—An equestrian portrait of the Duke has just been completed for the Worshipful Company of Salters of the City of London, and at this moment adorns the grand staircase of their hall. It is painted by Mr. Lilly, already favourably known by his former picture of the Duke as Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports, and represents his grace in his uniform as Field Marshal, on horseback, and of the size of life.

Mortality of London.—The total number of deaths in the metropolis, during the week ending last Saturday, was 1072, showing a considerable increase of mortality, probably caused by the unseasonable warmth of the last ten days. The weekly average for the last five years has been 946.

The Lost Bridegroom Found.—A paragraph appeared in our paper last week relative to the mysterious disappearance of Joseph Ames, who has been book keeper of the Bull Inn, Aldgate, immediately after being married at Whitechapel Church. It has been already stated that previously to the wedding he made arrangements to come into the occupancy of the Kent and Essex public-house, High-street, Whitechapel, and had paid a deposit. On the receipt of his extraordinary letter, his wife and her friends were naturally greatly alarmed, and began to fear that he contemplated suicide; although they knew no cause to which to attribute any mental distress or annoyance. They have, however, since been relieved from all their tears and anxieties by the return of the bridegroom, who, having "thought better of the matter," resolved to come back and claim his wife. The oddest part of the business is, that he could assign no motive for his strange conduct, merely saying that he experienced a feeling of despondency with regard to his new undertaking. He is, however, now in possession of the house in question.

Fire in the Strand.—On Thursday morning, about eight o'clock, a fire broke out at No. 7, Southampton-street, Strand, which in a very short time completely gutted the house, and destroyed the greater part of the property it contained. The premises were jointly occupied by a bootmaker, named Troy, and a tailor, named Anderson. The fire originated in the carelessness of a servant, who had placed a candle so near the bed-curtains as to envelope them in flames. The house contained a great deal of wood, to which is to be attributed the fact of its falling so speedily a prey to the flames. The fire was extinguished by half-past ten.

POSTSCRIPT.

FATAL AND MELANCHOLY ACCIDENT ON THE MIDLAND COUNTIES RAILWAY.

We regret to announce that a very serious accident took place on Thursday on the Midland Counties Railway, at Beeston, near Nottingham. In consequence of the fog, the down-train from Nottingham came into contact with a train coming to that town. A second edition of the Nottingham Journal contains the following particulars of this fatal event. It says the collision was quite unavoidable, and the destruction tremendous.

In consequence of the down-train being driven at so much more rapid a pace than the train from Nottingham, and being a much heavier train, and having a powerful and very heavy engine, the up-train from Nottingham sustained the principal part of the damage. So great was the force with which the down train met the up-train, that the engine of the latter was actually driven from its position downwards, and the boiler was elevated to the height of many feet above it, the tender of the engine was driven through the parcel-carriage, and the two passenger second-class conveyances were as completely smashed to pieces as a nutshell when trodden under foot. The unfortunate passengers in these two carriages were dreadfully crushed and mutilated.

Mr. Dean, of Hounds' Gate, Nottingham, commission-agent, who had received severe injuries about the head, was first taken out, and was able to stand, but speechless; a Mr. Varnalls was extricated in a similar condition; Mr. Robinson, in the spirit trade; and Mr. Bowlestridge, of the Three Horse Shoes, Derby-road, were released in a state of great suffering. Mr. G. Baker, who had taken a second-class ticket, but had by some accident, along with Mr. Tutin, senior, butcher, been put in the first-class carriage, escaped without much injury. As soon as he was able to collect himself and alight, he assisted, with Mr. Wildey, who had been riding in the third-class, to release their more unfortunate fellow-travellers, and he proceeded as rapidly as he could across some ploughed fields, and over hedges and ditches, to procure assistance; and about an hour after the occurrence of the accident, two carts, containing straw, and some other conveyances, were procured, and some of the sufferers were conveyed to Beeston, some to Lenton, and others, by a train sent up for the purpose, down to Nottingham, when those who were able reached home, and others were taken to the Infirmary. Twelve or fourteen were thus conveyed away seriously hurt.

It does not appear that either Mr. Lightfoot, the chief clerk at the Nottingham station, or the engineer or the stoker (whom he accompanied) have sustained any damage; we understand they threw themselves from the engine, which was proceeding at a slow pace, just before the collision took place. The persons who sustained the most serious injuries were those in the two second-class carriages, those in the first and third classes having come off much more favourably. It appears that a person from South Wingfield, who was in the third-class, and who had set open the door of the carriage to facilitate his escape, in case the collision, which he seemed to expect, should take place, was thrown by the concussion with so much violence with his head against the iron rod, round the top of the third class carriage, as to break the iron rod in two, yet without suffering much injury himself.

We subjoin as complete a list of the passengers and the nature and extent of the injuries they sustained, as we have been able to procure.

LIST OF KILLED AND WOUNDED.

Mr. Dean, Hounds' Gate, dead.

Mr. John Neep, of middle age, of Retford, lies at the General Hospital, but hopes are entertained of his recovery. The extent of injury cannot at present be ascertained, and, besides being sadly bruised, it is feared some of his ribs are broken.

George Burley, about 30 years of age, stoker, seriously scalded and burnt—the fire and boiling water having fallen upon him from the engine, when forced upwards by the collision. We understand he was on the engine coming from Derby.

Mr. J. Bowlestridge, landlord of the Three Horse Shoes, Derby Road, and Miss Ann Gretton, of Stoke Cliff, Staffordshire, were conveyed to the Three Horse Shoes, Derby Road. They were much bruised.

Mr. Gretton, Burton-on-Trent, severely crushed.

Mr. Bradley, Southwell, farmer, leg broken.

Mr. Varnalls, formerly butler at Colwick Hall (dead.) The distressing news of his death was instantly despatched to Mrs. V., who is housekeeper at Mr. Strutt's, Derby.

Mr. Arnold, medical instrument-maker, seriously hurt.

Mr. Garrett, surgeon, of London, extensively injured.

Robert Thornhill, lace-manufacturer, slightly crushed.

David Fox, employed at Mr. Gill's silk-mill, arm broken.

Misses Ann and Maria Lewis, of Sneinton (seriously hurt), owing to the violence of the concussion, were thrown out of the carriage, and, their dresses becoming entangled, they were nearly stripped. One of them had actually the sole of her shoe torn off.

We regret to say that the conduct of the inhabitants was characterised by anything rather than humanity; the Misses Lewis (who were close to the unfortunate Mr. Dean in the railway carriage) were permitted to remain in almost a state of nudity in a field for upwards of an hour, before they were removed. At length they were taken in a baker's cart to Mr. Hammond's, to whom they were paying a visit, and were afterwards conveyed to their homes. Mr. Dean was also treated with similar neglect.

Mr. Robinson, traveller (very much bruised).

Mr. Thistlewood, of Lincoln (ditto).

Mr. Nixon, Hounds' Gate (ditto, and tooth broken out).

Mr. George Baker, Woolpack-lane (slightly bruised).

Mr. John Wildey, Pelham-street (bruised).

Mr. Tutin, senior, butcher, Nottingham (bruised).

Miss Surplice, of Beeston, escaped injury by leaping out of the carriage.

We understand that her Majesty has it in contemplation to invest his Royal Highness the Reigning Duke Ernest, of Saxe Coburg and Gotha, with the insignia of the illustrious order of the Garter, as an honorary knight, during his visit to his august relatives in this country. A distinguished circle of personages of high rank are expected to assemble at Windsor Castle in the course of the ensuing week, by Royal invitation, to meet their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess of Saxe Coburg and Gotha.

A Cabinet Council was held at the Foreign Office yesterday, at three o'clock.

Accident on the Great Western Railway.—A fatal accident occurred yesterday morning on this railway. Two men were working upon the line beyond West Drayton, during the intense fog which prevailed. From this circumstance they did not perceive the approach of the down train, and although the engineer blew the whistle, this was not heard. The consequence was, that both men were swept from the line, the train passing on without the conductors having the slightest knowledge of the accident. On arriving at Slough, however, the front part of the engine was discovered to be marked with blood, and on another engine being sent slowly back towards West Drayton, the mutilated bodies were discovered. It would appear that no blame can attach to any one engaged in conducting the train.

Fatal Accident to a Dissenting Minister.—Yesterday Mr. Baker held an inquest at the Golden Eagle, Stepney, on view of the body of the Rev. Edwin Parsons, aged 47, a Dissenting minister, attached to Baalam chapel, Mile-end-road. It appeared that the deceased was residing in Assembly-row, Mile-end. On Friday morning he was alarmed by a noise. He immediately went out of his room to go down stairs, when his foot caught against something, and he fell down nearly half the flight of stairs. In his fall he knocked down some flower pots. Mrs. Parsons afforded him immediate assistance, and he was carried into his room. The deceased gradually sank from the effects of the injuries he received, and died on Tuesday last. Verdict, "Accidental death."

Incendiary Fire at Coggeshall.—About three o'clock on Thursday, the uninhabited mansion of Charles Skingley, Esq., of Great Coggeshall, was maliciously set on fire, and, with the extensive premises adjoining, was completely burnt to the ground, nothing but the naked chimneys being left standing. There is no clue at present to the vile incendiary.

Suicide in Epping Forest.—On Wednesday last a gentleman, named Scott, hung himself from a tree in that part of Epping Forest which is known by the name of Phillipson's Warren, High Beach.

FOREIGN.

The Insurrection in Spain.—Our latest advices from the north of Spain represent the rising of Zurbano as an important movement. The Indicateur of Bordeaux states that news had been received there that Burgos, Santander, and St. Sebastian had joined in the movement. This, however, requires confirmation. One thing is certain, that General Zurbano is at the head of a body of men who are formidable, as much by their character and past exploits, as by their numbers. They are mostly old soldiers, who served under him during the civil war, and who knew their commander well, and trust him. The country, too, in which the insurrection has broken out, the Sierra de Cameros, is most difficult of approach, and with a very small body of troops he may be able to set Narvaez's army at defiance for months. From Madrid we learn that the court-martial appointed to try General Prim and his co-accused assembled on the 14th, under General Ribero. The Fiscal having laid before the tribunal the new facts and proofs which he had obtained since the last trial, General Shelly, Prim's defender, rose and demanded that time be allowed him and the counsel for the other prisoners to prepare their defence. The Court only allowed an hour and a half for this purpose. At 6 o'clock p.m. it resumed its deliberations. General Prim himself presented his defence, in a lengthened and impressive speech. He declared that he was not afraid to die, though he had not as yet attained the age of twenty-nine; that there was only one motive which induced him thus to plead for his life, and that was, he had a widowed mother and an orphan sister, who depended on him only for their existence; and he should, indeed, regret leaving the world while those so dear to him were left behind helpless and unprotected. At nine o'clock the Court adjourned, without pronouncing judgment.

Latest News from Tahiti.—Accounts to the 11th of June have arrived from Otaheite, when her Britannic Majesty's ship-of-war, Thalia, 42 guns, and Salamander (steamer), were both off the port of Papeite, in which harbour the French had the Uranie frigate of 60 guns, and the Ambuscade, 32, with a steamer. The Charte, 46, was gone to the Marquesas for more troops. The oppressions and cruelties of the French continued unabated, and their insolence towards the English was even greater than before. One letter says:—"The French had hired one of the traitor chiefs to go on board the Basilisk to assassinate the Queen! but the base intention was happily discovered in time to guard against it." Captain Hope, of the Thalia, refused to salute the French flag, which had been so unaccountably hoisted on the island. The French were fortifying in every direction.

EVERY BODY'S COLUMN.

THE REMEMBRANCE OF EARLY DAYS.

There's a peaceful spot in a quiet vale,
Where the blackbird sings his song,
And the tuneful lark in the morning gale
Goes caroling along.
With a note so soft, and sweet, and clear,
That it seems to come from another sphere.

That happy home, with its birds and flowers
And the stream that murmurs by,
And the tree, where in summer's sultry hours
It was luxury to lie,
Was the Eden of my early years,
And memory thinks of it with tears,

O that childhood is a happy time!
I have never known a joy
Such as when at morning I would climb,
A young light-hearted boy,
Up the rugged side of that steep old hill
Where in fancy I am wandering still!

But the flowers may bloom, and the birds may sing,
And I shall see them—never!
For Fate comes mournfully whispering
That we're parted now for ever.
Though there I'd heave my latest sigh,
Though there, in death, I'd wish to lie.

What is this Heaven, of which so much
Is dreamed and said, and sung?—
O, if its pleasures should prove but such
As we all have known when young,
And old haunts and friends we there shall see,
What a realm of bliss indeed 'twill be.

LORD NORBURY AND THE ATTORNEYS.

An attorney in Dublin having died exceedingly poor, a shilling subscription was set on foot to pay the expenses of his funeral. Most of the attorneys and barristers having subscribed, one of them applied to Toler, afterwards Lord Chief Justice Norbury, expressing his hope that he would also subscribe his shilling. "Only a shilling," said Toler, "only a shilling to bury an attorney? Here is a guinea: go and bury one-and-twenty of them."

INVENTION OF STEAM NAVIGATION.

An Irish paper asserts that the merit of the discovery of steam navigation is due to a man named Taylor, a native of Cumnock, who first succeeded in propelling a boat by steam, in the year 1788. In acknowledgment of his claim, a pension of £50 per annum was settled upon his widow by Government, and a donation of £50 was subsequently made to each of his four surviving sisters; but, as this is justly deemed a poor remuneration for such important services, it is now suggested that a national testimonal should be made to the family of Mr. Taylor.

GEORGE THE THIRD AND THE SHIP-BUILDER.

An anecdote is told of George the Third, that, when inspecting the large dock forming at Plymouth during his reign, he inquired "why its dimensions should so greatly exceed those of the other docks?" The builder replied, that "The French were building larger ships than any we had, and therefore it was necessary to have a dock in England fit to receive them." He instanced, amongst others, the Commerce de Marseilles, one of the finest three-deckers; and sure enough, that ship was the first which entered the large dock, having been sent to England by Lord Hood, at the evacuation of Toulon in 1793. She was found, however, to be so badly timbered as not to be worth the expense of repairs, and she was broken up in August, 1802.

GAS FROM ANIMAL MATTER.

A process has been discovered by which animal matter can be converted into an inodorous gas, which burns with extreme brilliancy. It can be obtained at a very cheap rate, and may be rendered of great utility for domestic purposes, although it is not likely to supersede coal gas in lighting streets.

THE LATE DUCHESS OF ST. ALBANS.

It is stated in the first number of the "Leigh Monthly Magazine," that Miss Mellon, who married the late Mr. Coutts, the banker, and afterwards the Duke of St. Albans, made her first appearance on the stage among an itinerant company in Leigh, in an old barn behind the Old Boar's Head.

TRIAL OF THE ATMOSPHERIC RAILWAY.

A first trial of M. Hallette's atmospheric system of locomotion for railroads was made a few days ago, to the extent of a hundred yards, in his factory at Arras (France). The result is said to have been sufficiently satisfactory to warrant an invitation to M. Arago, M. Seguier, and several other men of science, to witness another trial to be shortly made, and which invitation they have accepted.

A SPLENDID NEW LIGHT.

A new electro-magnetic light has been invented at Cincinnati, of such power, that one of them, at a height of 200 feet, is expected to illumine the whole city.

ELECTRICITY OF THE EARTH.

MM. Linare and Palmeri have succeeded in obtaining an electrical current from the earth, sufficient to give a shock, decompose water, and to afford a spark. Their apparatus consists of hollow cylinders of iron, covered with seven superimposed coils of copper wire. These cylinders are rapidly rotated by means of wheel works, and the spark is produced by breaking contact with mercury.

INDIA RUBBER STOCKINGS.

This material, which is now employed for almost everything, is now devoted by the French to another purpose. They have introduced a new manufacture, by making stockings wholly of India-rubber thread. They are made by machines, and are said to be excellent in preventing rheumatic pains.

ADULTERATION OF WINES.

The ancients formerly used salt water to clarify and preserve wine. This discovery is said to have been owing to a slave having drunk part of a cask of wine committed to his care, and concealed the fraud with salt water. The wine thus falsified was found to be superior to the wine of the same growth contained in the other casks. The Romans were but children in the art of adulteration when compared with the Greeks. Pliny, in enumerating the several kinds of adulteration practised in his day, exclaims, "How can we wonder if wine, produced by such practices, should rather possess the qualities of poison than of wine!"

PAINFUL COINCIDENCE.

A police report of last week says, there is a "Sack Protection Society" in existence, sacks being lost every year to the amount of £20,000. The sack which the East India Directors have given Lord Ellenborough has cost his lordship nearly a similar sum.—Punch.

CURIOUS ATMOSPHERICAL PHENOMENON.

A Bath paper notices a curious fact respecting the weather last week. In the early part of Wednesday the mercury in the barometer had fallen considerably below "rain," but in the night, without any apparent cause (for the rain came down in torrents, and so continued during the whole of the succeeding day), the mercury rose to above "fair," at which point it has, almost without variation, continued ever since.

AN EQUIVOCAL ANSWER.

Bishop Porteus, whom in all conversations about him George III. called the Queen's Bishop, was asked by her Majesty, at a period when all the ladies were employed when they had nothing better to do in knotting, whether she might knot on a Sunday. He answered, "You may not;" leaving her Majesty to decide whether, as knot and not were in sound alike, she was, or was not, at liberty so to employ herself on that day.

EGYPTIAN MODE OF TAMING VICIOUS HORSES.

Burckhardt says that the Egyptian horses, unlike those of the pure blood of Arabia, are often vicious, and that he has seen such animals cured of the habit of biting, by presenting to them, while in the act of doing so, a leg of mutton just taken from the fire; the pain which a horse feels in biting through the hot meat, causes it, after a few lessons, to abandon the vicious habit.

POPE LEO THE TENTH.

Pope Leo the Tenth had often been heard to say, that he should die contented if he could gain possession of Parma and Placentia. When he won them, his joy was so excessive that it brought on a fever, of which he died.

RAILROADS IN BELGIUM.

A Belgian journal states that the number of leagues (the Belgian league is about three miles English) travelled over on the railroads of Belgium during the first nine months of the present year was 363,605, that the expense of working per league was, in 1841, 15fr. 67c.; 1842, 14f. 79c.; in 1843, 12f. 58c.; and that this year it is only 12f. 3c.

THE FUNCTIONS OF THE BRAIN.

At an inquest held on Monday upon a person who survived for three days a dreadful injury of the brain, Mr. Wakley said that a short time ago a man was struck on the head with a pickaxe, and that although his brains escaped from the wound and besmeared his hand, he was able to run without assistance to the London Hospital. Upon arriving at the hospital he was asked how he felt, when he replied that he was much better since he lost his brains. Mr. Wakley further said that it was almost incredible how long persons survived injuries of the brain.

THE STYLE OF PERSIAN WRITERS.

Persian writers have always been fond of long pompous periods; and Abul-Fazel, who seems to have thought the essence of all good writing consisted in this, has been so eminently successful, that his nominatives and verbs are often posted at the distance of three pages from each other; and the space within is occupied with parenthesis within parenthesis, where the sense, if any, lies concealed behind such a number of intrenchments, that the Council of Trent would be puzzled to discover it.

THE FOLLY OF PRIDE.

The most beautiful flowers that ever graced the table or head of royalty, sprang from the earth. And whence sprang man? Let the Holy Bible speak:—"And the Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and man became a living soul." How vain then the pride of birth and ancestry! What a perfect delusion to be elated and puffed up, when he, from whom we are descended, was himself formed from the dust of the ground. How clearly, how forcibly does this say "pride was not made for man."

DR. JOHNSON'S IMITATIONS.

It happens unfortunately that Dr. Johnson's style is particularly easy of imitation, even by writers utterly destitute of his vigour of thought; and such imitators are intolerable. They bear the same resemblance to their model that the armour of the Chinese (as described by travellers, consisting of thick quilted cotton covered with stiff glazed paper) does to that of the ancient knights; equally glittering, bulky, and cumbersome, but destitute of the temper and firmness which was its sole advantage.—Whately's Rhetoric.

THE PROCESSION, ST. MARY'S HILL, STAMFORD.

HER MAJESTY'S VISIT TO BURGHLEY.

The special train, however, came on at a rapid rate, and reached the Camden-town station at ten minutes past five o'clock. From here the train was backed, and turned on the down line; and it reached the Euston terminus at twenty minutes past five o'clock.

Some parts of the journey were performed at very great speed. At Watford, where the train stopped for a few seconds, the Prince remarked to the Directors how very fast they had come. At the terminus her Majesty expressed to Mr. Glyn her satisfaction at the arrangements that had been made for her accommodation on the railway.

RETURN OF HER MAJESTY AND PRINCE ALBERT.

Her Majesty and Prince Albert arrived at the terminus of the London and Birmingham Railway on Friday afternoon, on their return from Burghley House, at twenty-five minutes past five o'clock.

A detachment of the 17th Regiment of Lancers, under the command of Lieut. Annes, arrived at the station before three o'clock, and remained until her Majesty arrived.

After the Royal carriages entered the station yard, the crowd, which before was inconsiderable, greatly increased, and the most intense interest was manifested to obtain a view of the Queen and her Illustrious Consort.

The passage leading from the railway to the rooms appropriated for her Majesty's use, were, as on Tuesday last, covered with scarlet cloth.

Shortly before five o'clock, the workmen employed in the carpenters' shops and other departments of the railroad, amounting to upwards of 200, formed themselves into a line at the end of the terminus, and when the Royal cortège arrived, they gave loud and hearty cheers, which were warmly responded to by those who had been admitted to witness her Majesty's arrival.

The Earl of Delawarr, Lord Chamberlain, accompanied her Majesty to town. The Earl of Liverpool and Lord Jersey left the station at Weedon about an hour before the Royal train, in order to be in readiness to receive her Majesty on her arrival at Windsor.

At Euston-square, her Majesty and Prince Albert were received by Mr. C. Glynn, the chairman of the Birmingham Railway Company, and several of the Directors, and after a short delay, conducted to the Royal carriage, followed by the members of the Court.

The Royal cavalcade then drove off at a rapid pace for the terminus of the Great Western Railway at Paddington, escorted by a detachment of the 17th Lancers. A train was in readiness to convey her Majesty to Slough en route to Windsor.

The reception which her Majesty and her Royal Consort received was most loyal and enthusiastic; the cheers of the populace, as the Royal carriages passed under the principal entrance to the station were unanimous, and appeared as if given from the heart.

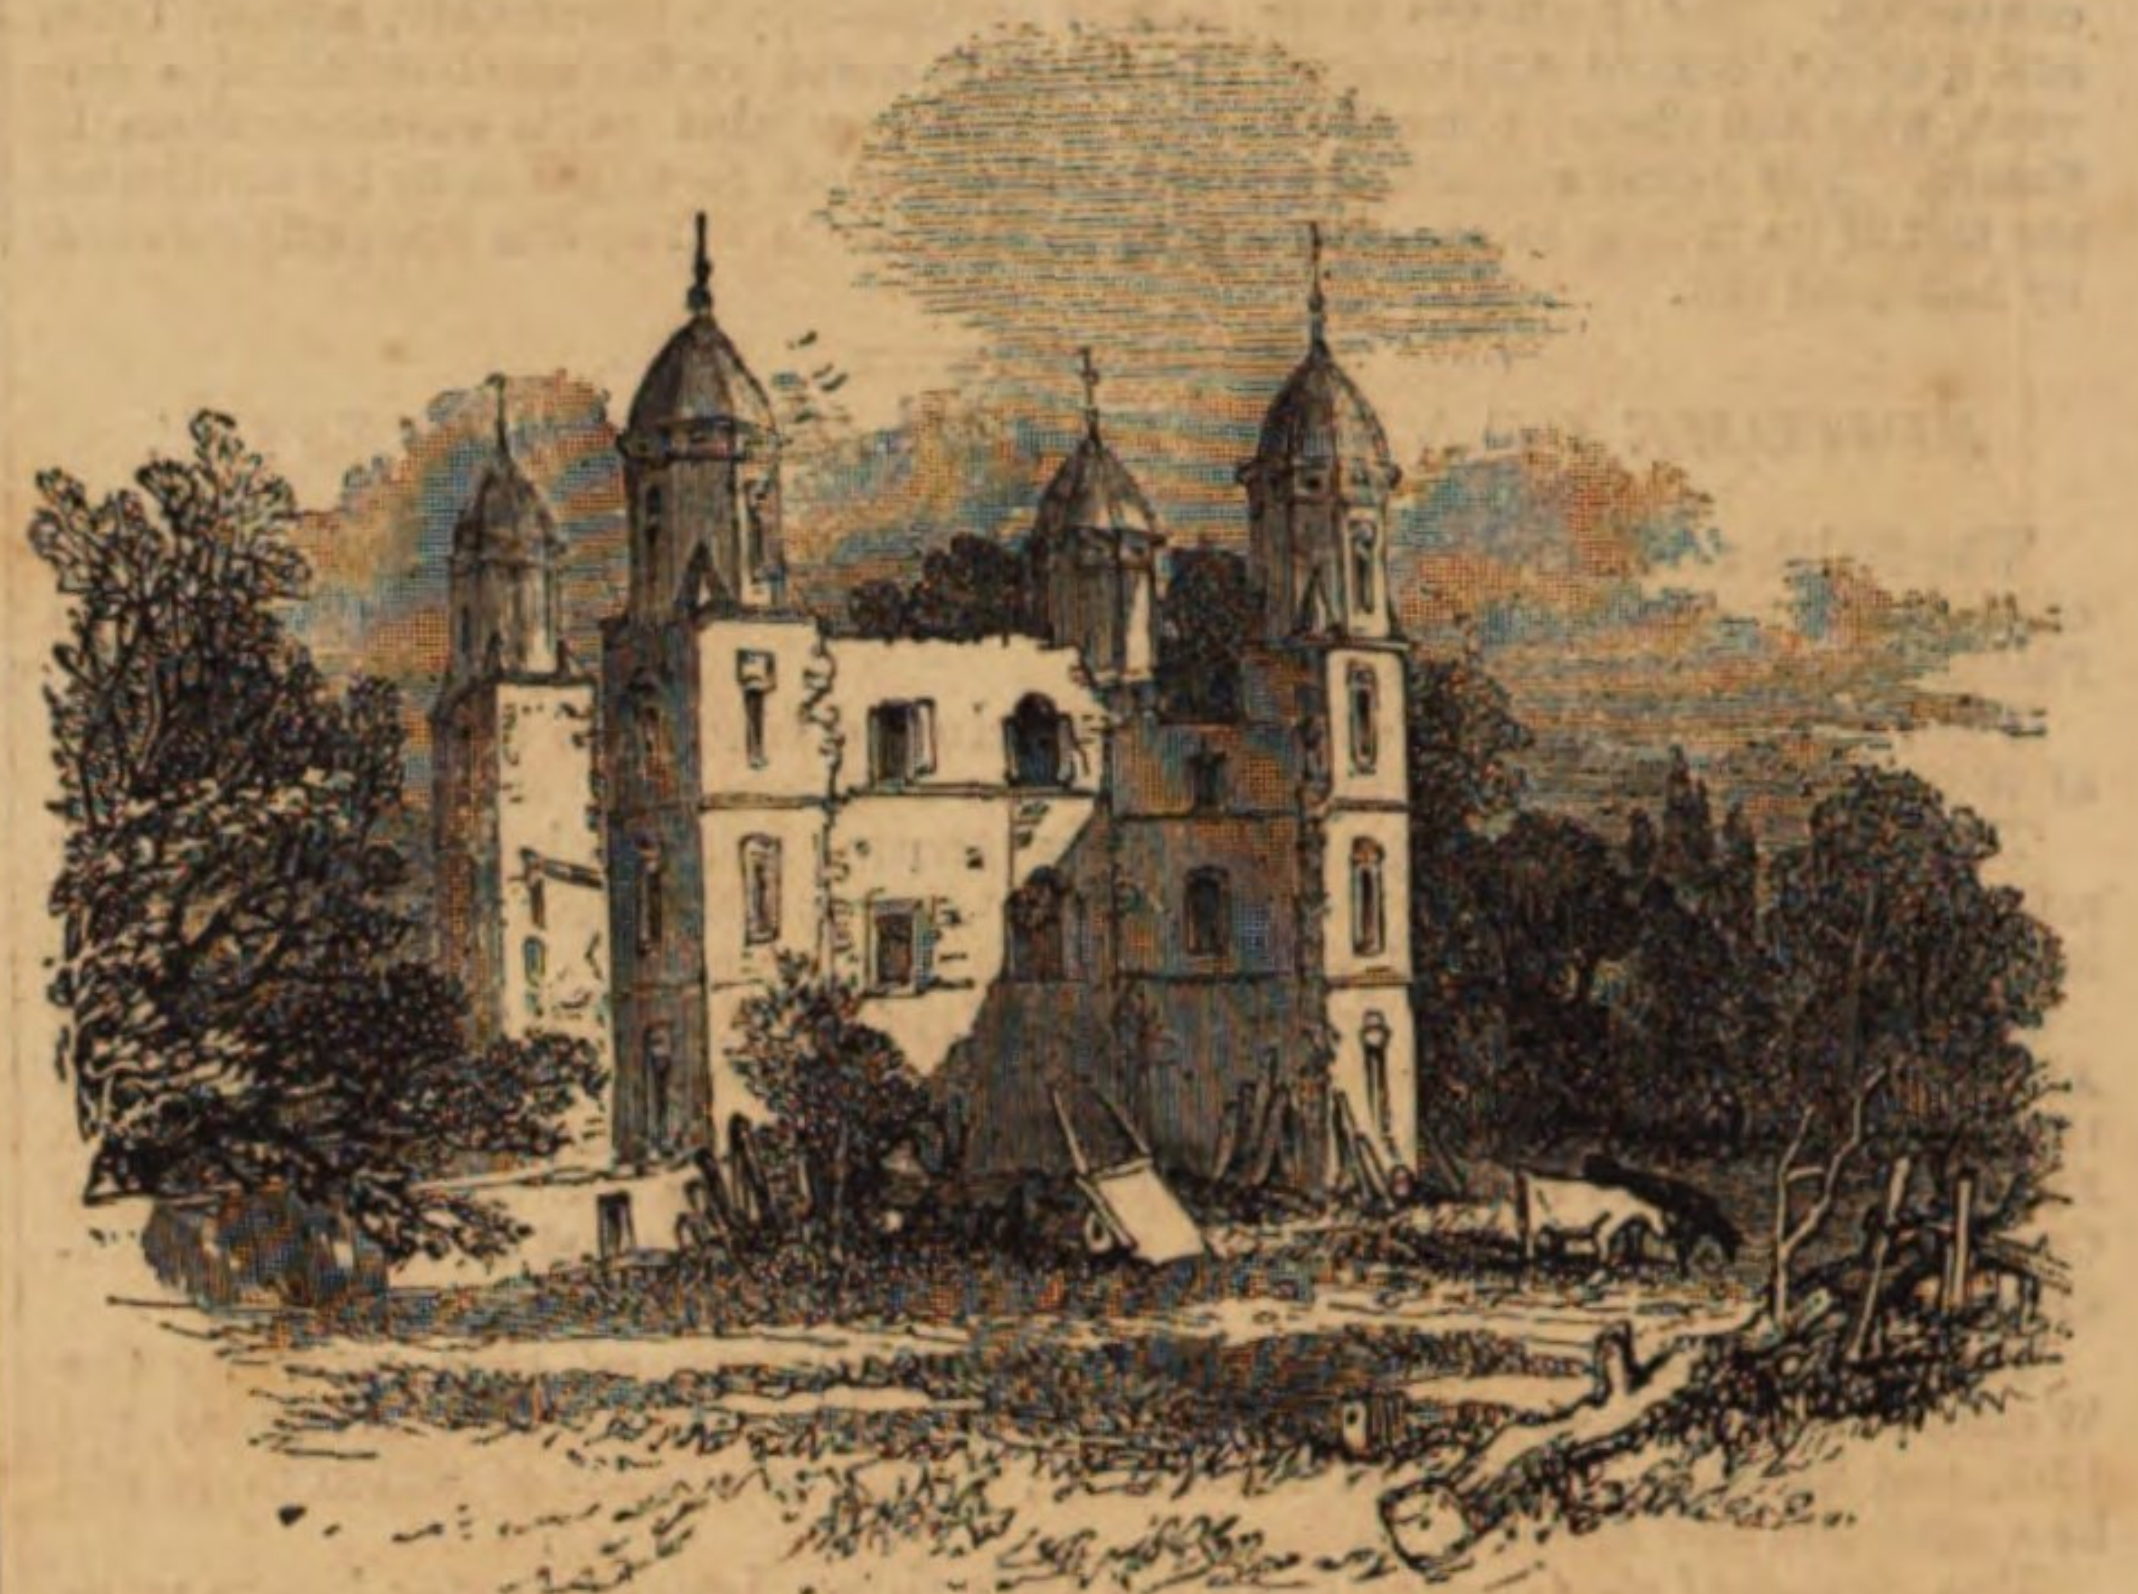
Her Majesty, who did not appear at all fatigued by travelling, was heard to say that she had had a very pleasant journey.

The proceedings at Stamford were detailed last week. At the entrance of the borough a handsome arch was erected, and also an enormous platform by the side of the road, for the accommodation of visitors and residents. It was surmounted by a flag, and inscribed, "Long live the Queen!" There must have been some 2000 or 3000 people there. It is needless to say that they cheered her Majesty most warmly as she passed. As the progress of the Royal cortège was necessarily somewhat slower, owing to the conflux of people, those who were stationed on the platform must have had a good view of the Queen. This platform extended to the corner of the road as it enters Stamford, the road to Burghley turning off to the right.

Our Engraving represents her Majesty and her loyal escort passing St. Mary's Hill, at Stamford, with the fine old church in the distance: it is principally of the thirteenth century: the height of the tower and steeple, to the top of the vane, is 163 feet. The church has some rich chapels, and an ancient canopied altar-tomb.

The next illustration shows the procession passing the handsome church of St. Michael, altered and modernised, by Mr. John Brown, architect, Norwich.

On Thursday, the Queen honoured the town of Stamford with a visit. At two o'clock most of the shops in the town were closed in honour of the occasion, and exactly at half-past two, the Royal cavalcade left Burghley. The first carriage, which was drawn by four horses, and contained the Queen, his Royal Highness Prince Albert, the Marquis of Exeter, and Lady Portman, was preceded by two of Lord Exeter's outriders. The carriage was an open one, and every one had an excellent view of the Royal and illustrious party. In the second carriage, which was also an open one, were seated Sir Robert Peel, Earl de la Warr, Lady Sophia Cecil, and the Hon. Miss Liddell. In a pony phaeton which followed were the Hon. Mrs. Spencer, and Lady Middleton. The Royal cavalcade proceeded through St. Martin's-street, St. Mary's-street, St. John's-street, up High-street, to the west entrance of the Infirmary, and then by St Leonard's.



RUINS AT WOTHORPE.

The cavalcade returned in front of the Infirmary through St. Paul's-street and Ironmonger-street, Broad-street, and Red Lion-square to Burghley. During the Royal progress through the town the bells of the various churches of the borough rang merry peals.

Every window along the entire route was decorated with Royal standards, union jacks, streamers, and flags of every description, or some other token of love and attachment. When opposite the Bede House, in Broad-street, the carriage in which were the Queen and the Prince stopped for a moment, which afforded the Marquis of Exeter an opportunity of drawing the attention of her Majesty to that excellent institution.

The streets through which her Majesty proceeded were crowded by her loyal and devoted subjects, who evinced their affection by hearty greetings, which were acknowledged by her Majesty in a most gracious manner.

On leaving the borough the Royal and Noble party proceeded to Wothorpe, where they inspected the ruins of the mansion and other antiquities in the neighbourhood. This seat is stated by Camden to have been built by Thomas Cecil, the first Earl of Exeter, who pleasantly said, he built it only to retire to out of the dust, while his great house at Burghley was sweeping. After the Restoration, the Duke of Buckingham, with his family resided in it for many years. There are only the turrets, (with cupolas similar to those at Burghley) and the fragments of some walls remaining, which are shown in the annexed view. The greater part of the house was taken down in 1758-9, and the materials employed in building the stables at Burghley.

The arrival of her Majesty at Burghley was reported last week; as was the ceremony of the christening of the infant daughter of the Marquis and Marchioness of Exeter, on Wednesday. (See page 316.) The ceremony is represented in our engraving. After it had concluded, her Majesty kissed the young godchild of her Royal Consort. Prince Albert presented the infant with a very rich and handsome gold cup after the ceremony.

The cup stands about fifteen inches high, and bears a crown on the top of the cover. The sides are ornamented with figures of Cupid bearing cymbals, and the whole is elaborately chased. This work of art bears the following inscription in the three compartments into which it is divided:—

To the Lady Victoria Cecil,	from her Godfather, Albert.	Burghley, Nov. 13, 1844.

THE CHRISTENING CAKE,

of which we annex an Engraving at page 332, was a gorgeous work in confectionery, reflecting great credit upon the skill and taste of the manufacturer, Mr. Oswin, of Red Lion-square, a native of Stamford. Its weight was about 60lbs., exclusive of the ornaments. The cake was surmounted by a font, with a white satin flag, fringed with silver, at each corner. The height of the cake was 2ft. 2in., and its circumference 57 inches. Its decorations were very superb, and, placed upon a handsome silver stand, it was, altogether, a splendid affair.

Her Majesty's visit to the kitchen at Burghley was incidentally mentioned in our last. This apartment, as we intimated at page 308, is a portion of the original mansion, built by the great Lord Burghley. It is a noble room situated on the south side of a spacious court. It stands at the east end of the mansion, and measures 48 feet by 30; the roof is very lofty, and has a groined ceiling, of earlier style even than the old mansion. At one end is a large painting of a carcase of beef—an exhibition of the true ensign armorial of English hospitality; though to place the semblance amidst so much reality, seems extrinsic. Lastly, the engraving at page 332, shows the Buffet of Plate in the Great Dining Hall, described at page 313, last week.

WYON'S ROYAL EXCHANGE MEDAL.

The "Jetteau" designed to commemorate the opening of the Royal Exchange was executed by W. Wyon, Esq., R.A. It bears on the obverse a bust of her Majesty in high relief, with the legend, "ROYAL EXCHANGE, OPENED BY H. M. QUEEN VICTORIA, OCT. 28, 1844." The reverse is composed of a wreath of oak and laurel, which is displayed three shields—the bearings of the City of London, the Mercers' Company, and Sir Thomas Gresham; the latter, surmounted by his crest—the famous Grasshopper. The legend consists of the words, "FIRST STONE LAID BY H. R. H. PRINCE ALBERT, JANY. 17, 1842." Of this medal, 1500 have been struck, and 200 more are in course of preparation, for distribution by the Gresham Committee, amongst the guests present at the opening of the Exchange, and persons, both at home and abroad, of high commercial reputation. The medal—as we prefer to call it—is of silver, the surface of the metal burnished, and the raised parts dead. Our cut has been enlarged from the original for the sake of greater clearness.

ROYAL EXCHANGE MEDAL.

The committee, feeling that so important an event should be celebrated by the execution of a higher work of art, than the mere striking of a "Jetteau," have ordered Mr. Wyon to prepare a large medal, whose beauty of design and workmanship shall be commensurate with the great event it is intended to commemorate. The model submitted by Mr. Wyon, and which has been approved by the committee, has, on the one side, the full length figure, in profile, of the Queen, from the statue by Lough, which is to be placed in the centre of the Merchants' Area. Her Majesty is represented standing in her Robes of State, holding in her left hand the Orb, and in her right which is inclined downwards, the sceptre of the Dove; behind the figure is a portion of the Quadrangle of the Royal Exchange. On the other side of the medal is a freely executed bust, in high relief of Sir Thomas Gresham, dressed in the characteristic cap and ruffed frill of his time.

FINE ARTS..

"The Emperor," winner of the Ascot Cup; painted by W. Shayer; engraved by C. Hunt. "Foigh-a-Ballagh," winner of the Great St. Leger; painted by G. Swandall; engraved by C. Hunt. "Alice Hawthorn," winner of the Doncaster Cup; painted by W. Shayer; engraved by C. Hunt. Moore.

Certainly, if industry in the publication of sporting realities in the class of art most appropriate for the illustration of such subjects be a recommendation to popularity, Mr. Moore attains it beyond doubt, and has a good right to call his "nobby" establishment the Bees-wing gallery. He is for ever working with the bee's wing. We have here three most spirited portraits of three of the most remarkable animals that ever made speed famous, and taught the lightning of rapidity to play along the turf.

The first is "The Emperor," the winner of the Ascot Cup, named in hospitable honour of the Emperor of Russia, who, during his presence in England, by his munificent donation to the race-course, well deserved the compliment from the sporting world. He was formerly called The Defence colt; but, having been promoted in his title, and won the cup, now requires no defence whatever. His portrait is here beautifully drawn by Shayer, and coloured to the life.

What ho! Foigh-a-ballagh! Clear the way! That is the English way of saying it in Irish—Clear the way for Foigh-a-Ballagh. "By Japers, yer honor" says a Paddy at our elbow. "There's small need of that same; Foigh-a-Ballagh has cleared the way for himself." And so he has; and a fine rollicking Irish dandy of stepper he is and looks; he beats Banagher, and Banagher beats the devil—and so we have small chance for his opponents. Nothing could be more true and spirited than the portrait of him, which, although just now staring us in the face, looks as if it could run away from us in a moment.

A third exquisite reflex of horseflesh in prints, is Alice Hawthorn—the darling of the turf, and the winner of forty-three (!) cups! Who would not be proud to drink out of a cup won by Alice Hawthorn? It is enough to say that she is to be framed and glazed to make every body run after her likeness. All three prints are capital, and now reader Foigh-a-Ballagh for Mr. Moore.

LITERATURE.

THE POST-OFFICE LONDON DIRECTORY, 1845. KELLY and Co.

Twenty years have made strange alteration in the bulk of this almost indispensable Directory. Well do we remember the mean, spare volume of other days, with its long lines of large type, and its shabby sheepskin binding; in place of which we have here a ponderous, large octavo volume, of some 1900 pages, of two and three columns each, of small type, comprising, inter alia, directories, official, street, commercial, law, court, parliamentary, postal, City, conveyance, banking—thus combining the advantages of the old "Directory" with those of the "Court Guide"—the east with the west—and comprising all the information which the merchant or trader, or any other London resident or visitor, can reasonably expect to find; and, by excellent classification and arrangement, any portion of this information may be found without difficulty. In this volume, the 46th annual publication, the Street Directory contains twenty-eight pages, or upwards of 4000 names, more than that for 1844. The Postal Directory, of instruction as to the despatch of letters and newspapers to all parts of the world, and the list of the principal places in England and Wales, with the view to facilitate the operations of the Money Order Office—have also been greatly extended. Among other additions, we perceive some important and interesting statistics of London—as the area in acres, population, and assessment, and a statement from the Occupations' Abstract of the Census of 1841. The "Directory" is, in fine, as complete as untiring industry and vigilance can make it; for they have uniformly kept pace with the increase of the number and extent of our metropolitan and national establishments and interests.

THE LITERARY AND SCIENTIFIC REGISTER AND ALMANACK FOR 1845. By J. W. GUTCH. Simpkin and Co.

This is a kind of Register of Facts and Information, such as must be useful to all persons of an inquiring turn of mind. Moreover, it contains a host of aids to general conversation, which often flags or comes to a stand-still for want of some definite information on an abstract subject. Thus, we have an Almanack, with anniversaries of inventions; a list of customs duties; the usual calendarial and commercial lists; a compendium of facts, data, or "constants," as Mr. Babbage would term them, in acoustics, aerial phenomena, agriculture, anatomy, angling, architecture, astronomy (very copious), biblical chronology, building, chemistry, domestic economy, gardening, geography, heat, hydraulics, insurance, mathematics, mechanics, mensuration, miscellanea, optics, painting, pathology, phrenology, physiology, statistics, therapeutics, useful tables, weights, measures, &c. To this enumeration we should add our note of confidence in the authenticity and excellent arrangement of the information. This pocket-book, like its predecessors, is dedicated, by permission, to Prince Albert; and it appears to be, in every respect, worthy of his Royal Highness' distinguished patronage, for its very extensive sphere of utility.

INSTRUCTIONS TO YOUNG SPORTSMEN IN ALL THAT RELATES TO GUNS AND SHOOTING. By Lieut.-Col. P. HAWKER. Ninth Edition.

To give a note of commendation to this work, of which nine editions, numbering more than as many thousands, have been sold, would be supererogatory. The original edition was printed some thirty years since, and the book has gone on increasing in bulk with the author's trial and experience; taking for his aim, "particular directions for (what gentlemen least understand) getting access to wild birds of every description." The work has, of late, been in many parts materially altered and enlarged: and the Colonel considers that the improvements introduced in this edition may be considered, in some degree, as "finishing lessons to those young sportsmen who have done him the honour to attend to his earlier instructions." Among the entirely new matter, we find detailed accounts of Greenfield's new machinery for making waterproof copper caps, of Colonel Hawker's improvement on Wilkinson's musket, the patent breaching musket, &c.; with several pages of valuable observations on coast-gunning, more especially on the Hampshire coast. The following is the

POSTSCRIPT ON PARTRIDGE SHOOTING.

> P.S., 1844.—When this group was drawn, (several years since), it was not an uncommon occurrence to bring home from fifty to sixty brace of partridges in a day. But within these few years the shooting has so fallen off, that we can rarely get our ten brace even on the 1st of September. Many people say, "How do you account for this? Why, the reason is obvious, from a combination of circumstances, all against the sportsmen; viz., the march of intellect in poaching—a sale-of-game act without a summary proceeding against trespassers who are without guns—the increased demand for partridges' eggs—the facility—the farmers cutting up the grass banks for fuel, and thereby driving the birds to feed in open fields, at the mercy of hawks, wet weather, and scythes—putting among their seed-wheat vitriol (to prevent smut,) which poisons many birds that would otherwise be left to breed—and mowing their wheat, by which means they destroy all fine stubbles for shooting! In short, the only wonder is that we have any birds at all; and the scarcity will, no doubt, increase every year, unless some alteration be made in the game-laws, and the landlords adopt certain restrictions in their leases, taking care, at the same time, to make amends to the farmer for any new claims they may choose to introduce; or he will either destroy the game himself, or encourage his labourers to do so."

KNIGHT'S WEEKLY VOLUME—X. to XXII. C. Knight and Co.

This already popular series of Reading for All proceeds well. Possibly, the selection of Tasso's "Jerusalem Delivered," translated by Fairfax (X. and XI.), is too much in advance of the reader; but it is a very venial error. Mr. Rennie's "Bird Architecture" deservedly forms No. XI. The two succeeding numbers complete Miss Lane's "Englishwoman in Egypt," and Mr. Davis's "The Chinese." No. XV. is devoted to a reprint of the volumes on "The Elephant," in the charming series entitled "The Menageries," in the "Library of Entertaining Knowledge:" it is, indeed, a most fascinating work, from the first to the last page. We are by no means so well pleased with No. XVI., "Rambles by Rivers," by James Thorne, reprinted from "The Penny Magazine." The "rivers" are the Duddon, the Mole, the Adur, Arun and Wey, the Lea and the Dove. This is, throughout, a very flimsy and unsatisfactory performance, and, by some degrees, the least meritorious volume yet printed in the series. The author affects to be above his task as a topographer, while he proves himself unequal to it in information. The next work, XVII. and XVIII., is of more sterling worth: it is entitled "Sketches of the History of Literature and Learning in England from the Norman Conquest to the Accession of Elizabeth;" in which the author, Mr. Craik, brings to his labour untiring research, and admirable tact in illustrating points of popular interest. The first volume extends to Piers Ploughman; and although the chronicles of our early literature are not uniformly attractive, by aid of "the improved archæological scholarship of recent times," Mr. Craik has enriched his survey copiously with new lights. One, however, appeared to have escaped him, viz., a communication made to the Royal Society of Literature, in 1839, maintaining the existence of Gildas, our earliest historian, to be a fiction. The work, excepting in its arrangement, is of a cyclopædian character, and must prove acceptable to a very large class of readers athirst for knowledge. No. XIX. consists of a reprint of Lord Brougham's "Dialogues on Instinct," and his "View of the Researches on Fossil Osteology," from his lordship's "Dissertations," in the two supplementary volumes of the edition of Paley's "Natural Theology;" the Latin quotations being translated: this volume, it need scarcely be added, is a "pearl of great price" in the series. No. XX. is another of Mr. Craik's contributions—the first of three volumes to be devoted to the "History of British Commerce," reprinted from the "Pictorial History of England:" this is a most laborious production, more to be prized as a book of reference than entertainment: in a long note, we perceive old Camden is caught tripping, so that Mr. Craik himself must take our correction in good part. No. XXI. is "A Volume of Varieties," by the Editor, and containing some very agreeable papers, occasionally of the magazine cast—all reprinted from various works. No. XXII., "The Camp of Refuge," is the first volume of "Old England Novelets:" it is a tale of the Norman times—four years after the Battle of Hastings—the scenes being the Grand Abbey of Crowland, the Great House at Ely, &c., in the Fen country: the period is not attractive overmuch.

MURRAY'S HOME AND COLONIAL LIBRARY, Nos. XII. and XIII.

The first of the numbers contains Dr. Southey's Lives of Oliver Cromwell and John Bunyan, reprinted from the "Quarterly Review," if we mistake not, with the advantage of additional notes. Southey was, altogether, the best prose writer of his day; and, although the "Lives" before us are somewhat too discursive (from their being written for a review) to be considered as regular biographies, they, on that account, are the more attractive, from the extraordinary mass of illustrative anecdote which author and editor have here collected. At the close of the life of Bunyan, is Dr. Southey's honourable notice of one towards whom he was, doubtless, embittered in earlier life; it is really worth quoting: "In one of the volumes collected from various quarters, I observe the name of W. Hone, and notice it that I may take the opportunity of recommending his Every-day Book and Table Book, to those who are interested in the preservation of our national and local customs. By these very curious publications their compiler has rendered good service in an important department of literature; and he may render yet more if he obtain the encouragement which he well deserves."

No. XIII. of the "Library" contains an orignal work—"Notes and Sketches of New South Wales, during a residence in that colony from 1839 to 1844," by Mrs. Charles Meredith; the preface being dated from Van Diemen's Land. The scenery, people, and the various objects which strike a new-comer as novel or remarkable, are described in a very lively vein, and the book is altogether an appropriate and valuable contribution to the series. A few years since its contents would have been expanded to an expensive octavo volume.

POINTS AND PICKINGS OF INFORMATION ABOUT CHINA AND THE CHINESE. By the Author of "Soldiers and Sailors." Grant and Griffith.

The younglings of the next generation will, doubtless, be better acquainted with China, than are the children of a larger growth, in our day; and, towards this end, the present volume will contribute its quota of information, cleverly picked from books of travels and recent records; for, the author's experience, we opine, scarcely extends beyond his own room. The voyage is, however, confessedly suppositious: it is narrated in a lively style, which the author evidently fears may lead to his descriptions being impugned; and we must add that somewhat less of the gasconade would have improved the work: for example, it is beneath the reformed manner of writing books for children to say, "Were I called on to decide what people beneath the stars are most worthy of estimation, I should certainly point to my own countrymen." Again, sentences are occasionally obscure, as the following: "There is little doubt that the Chinese nation is the oldest in the world, if we except that of the Jews, but you must know something of what they (?) say of themselves." With these incidental blemishes, the volume is very amusing and instructive: it is profusely illustrated with woodcuts.

THE STAR OF THE COURT. By Miss S. BUNBURY. Grant and Griffith.

This is a narrative of "the Maid of Honour and Queen of England, Anne Boleyn," written for young persons, with the intention of illustrating the frightful evils of ambition and vanity in the character, history, and fate of the fair maid of Norfolk. The historical facts are related in a very entertaining manner, and the moral purpose continually kept in view, so that the book may very safely be placed in the hands of the young. It is embellished with an illuminated title-page, a portrait, engraved initials, &c.

SONGS AND HYMNS FOR THE NURSERY. Burns.

A thin quarto of songs and hymns, with music set low, in the hope of its being found within the compass of very juvenile songsters; and accompaniments added for their less juvenile friends.

PICTORIAL LIVERPOOL; a new and complete Handbook for Resident, Visitor, and Tourist. H. Lacey.

This is a very neatly-compiled picture of the annals, commerce, shipping, institutions, public buildings, sights, &c., of the Modern Tyre, as Liverpool has been felicitously termed, from its extensive commercial and maritime connexions: it is very ably put together, but is almost disfigured by some engravings of very questionable execution. With this exception, the work is entitled to high praise.

THE BEAUTIES OF THE OPERA. Parts VI. and VII. Bogue, Fleet-street.

This truly elegant work maintains its attractions. Part VI. is a continuation of "The Huguenots," and presents a nicely engraved portrait of Treillet-Nathan as Valentine in that piece. The prose, in many instances, is more a translation than a description of the plot and incidents of the French libretto, and affords a very lively notion of the original, both by its own fidelity, and the illustrative woodcuts which are inserted in the text.

Part VII. has the ballet of "Ondine" for its subject, with a portrait of the fascinating Cerito, as the Nymph of the Waters, such a one as the creator of the character, M. le Baron la Motte Fouqué, would have hailed as the realization of his supernatural dream—for it was he who, in his "Undine," first gave to the world that modern description of the "Naiad" which has been embodied by Cerito so felicitously. Independent of the engraved portrait, we have another from the pen of the writer, which describes Cerito truly, and which, for its graphic fidelity, we here transcribe:—"The dancing of Cerito has been particularly germane to British audiences, and for her have been produced the two most original ballets that have ever given fame to the Italian Opera in the Haymarket—'Alma' and 'Ondine,' which have been constantly performed; and, to judge by the applause that has greeted and followed them, have been

"Ever charming, ever new."

The numbers are got up in the elegant style of their predecessors, but there is too much bad, hard, French drawing about many of the illustrations. Some of the borderings are extremely beautiful—viz., page 73.

MUSIC.

MUSICAL STATISTICS OF THE METROPOLIS.

The following enumeration will afford the best answer to those grumblers who are eternally deploring the low state of music in England, and comparing its present degradation (?) with its former grandeur. In the season—and that is nearly all the year round—what city can boast of such a bill of fare as the following? We shall begin, by grace, with that theatre which her Majesty so particularly patronises—the Italian Opera. Where can be heard such a congregation of the first artistes in the world? Not elsewhere is our reply. Where can we hear the immortal works of Mozart, Haydn, Beethoven, Weber, &c., performed as they are at the Philharmonic; or the sublimer conceptions of the giant HANDEL at the Ancient Concerts, or Exeter Hall? Does not the Societa Armonica prove the love for, and high state of the art amongst us? The same question will apply to the Society of British Musicians. Look, moreover, at the thousand and one concerts by day and by night—the matinées musicales—the soirées musicales—the quartet réunions—the madrigal meetings—the glee clubs—the melodists, &c.; and then cant about the want of a lover for music in the land of PURCELL! The quantity of music printed in this country, and the exorbitant price paid for it, alone would prove that it is almost a mania with us; and go into any society, do we not find amateurs who can rival the most distinguished professors in either vocal or instrumental ability? There are more musical amateurs in this metropolis than are to be found in all the world beside.

THE THEATRES.

HAYMARKET.

The definitions of comedy given by our greatest critics, are so at variance, that we are at a loss to discover the actual limits of the art. Johnson considered the ultimatum of comedy to be merely laughter; but this is a most degrading conception of its powers. Pope declared that it was a matter of doubt, which was the highest aspiration of the human mind—a comedy or a tragedy. Warburton, Brydges, Warton, and others, are equally undecided. Again, farce is considered to be a deteriorating ingredient in high comic writing, yet it is copiously used by Shakspeare, and all the old dramatists. The "Comedy of Errors" is not only a farce, but a most outrageous impossibility. It is no excuse to urge that it is an adaptation of the "Enigma" of Plautus: Shakspeare has lent his name to it and given it a position in the dramatic creation. If we might be permitted, amongst such mighty disputants, to give our opinion, we should say that comedy should indicate the manners, follies, vices, and general anatomy of the conventional world. Tragedy is as fixed in its rules as nature itself—it professes to be the action of the passions common to all times and natures; but comedy is the picture of society as it is; and must change in its forms and texture with the times which it delineates. If, therefore, adventure was the business of fashionable life in 1744, and wit was its common parlance, the representation of its comedy would admit of what is technically termed, "Spanish intrigue" and epigrammatic point; but if the present era reveals nothing to the eye of the dramatist but routine and rapidity, he is compelled to farcify his situations and impose a violence on his creation, to render effective that which faithfully depicted would only be tedious and unprofitable.

The new comedy of "Old Heads and Young Hearts," by Mr. Bourcicault, produced at this house on Monday evening, is the very best which has appeared for years—an assertion possibly borne out by its triumphant success. Year after year have comedies been brought out, and the same date has seen them quietly on the shelf. Some of them had very fair plots—others most brilliant dialogue: but, in spite of puffs and placards, boxes grew thinner and receipts less each night of their representation, until they retired altogether to be heard of no more. The reason was, that there was in them no attempt to depict the manners of the day; or, rather, there was an attempt, resulting from imagination, and received conventional notions. Persons came to see existing society pourtrayed, and were disappointed; or else they were wearied with long heavy dialogue and leaden sentiment. This will not apply to "Old Heads and Young Hearts." The writing was sparkling and pungent; the portrayal of character natural and unaffected: aud in the scenes of society introduced, nothing was outraged by ignorance of the class from which they were drawn.

It is unnecessary to detail the plot: we will mention merely the characters. The two chief parts of the piece, Jesse Rural, a kind and simple country curate, and Tom Coke, a fine-spirited Yorkshire squire, were in the hands of Messrs. Farren and Webster. The former was beautifully played: the old man's joy at his mistaken contrivances for promoting everybody's happiness, and subsequent distress when he finds how his innocent mismanagement has turned out, was in the highest style of acting. Nor was Mr. Webster less effective as the warm-hearted countryman—more especially in the fifth act, respecting his reconciliation with his brother. Littleton Coke, a young briefless barrister, was not sustained with any remarkable effect by Mr. Charles Mathews. His first scene struck us as most inanely played; and he hurried some of the speeches with a careless rapidity, which entirely destroyed their point. As the piece proceeded he improved greatly, possibly warmed up by the continuous applause. Colonel Rocket, an old Indian officer, was admirably enacted by Mr. Strickland; Mr. Holl showed average ability as Lord Charles Roebuck, son of Lord Pompion (Mr. Tilbury); and Mr. Buckstone's Bob was amazingly droll. The female characters were Lady Alice Hawthorn (a high-spirited meteor of fashion, who insists upon being balloted into the "omnibus box"), most spiritedly played by Madame Vestris, as was Miss Rocket by Miss Julia Bennett. Lady Pompion also found a very efficient supporter in Mrs. W. Clifford.

Some trifling disapprobation in the second act was immediately suppressed: and then the comedy went with continued bursts of cheering, until the curtain fell amidst a whirlwind of applause. Mr. Bourcicault, in reply to the calls of "author!" bowed from a private box; and the whole of the dramatis personæ subsequently appeared on the stage.

There were so many clever things said that it is difficult to select one or two for quotation. Perhaps the following went best with the audience:—

> Lit. Gold is the Medean bath of youth, possessing also a magnetic attraction for every cardinal virtue, while all the plagues of Egypt are shut up in one English word, and that is poverty; the exhibition of which, like that of the Gorgon's head, turns the hearts of your dearest friends to stone.
> Roe. Can May-fair legislation so repeal the laws of nature? By Jove! the west-end, at last, will cut the sun because it rises in the east, and lives by wax light.

> Lit. You, perhaps, may never see the world as I do, Charles, because I am poor—but a rich man's view of life is bounded by his parasites—he feels but through his glove and thinks all things are soft.

> Tom. Since I came into this city I haven't seen a fair inch of blue sky, or a blade of green grass. Stop—I did though—yes, I did see a puir sickly plot penned up in a place they called a square, looking, for all the world, as if they'd put nature in a pound for straying into town.

Old Rocket's disbelief in the battle of Hastings because there was no account of it in the Army List, was also very effective, as well as his anger at the Earl's allusion to his ancestors, who came over after the battle, in which the old soldier could not see much credit. This produced a round of applause.

LYCEUM.

"A Trip to Kissengen"—which mellifluous name indicates the locality of some German baths, in fashion with our autumnal tourists—is the name of a new farce, produced towards the close of last week at this house, and with triumphant success. It is stated to be the first production of Mr. T. Taylor, of Trinity College, Cambridge; and, if this be the case, gives strong indications of a very fresh and original vein of dramatic writing, with much less reliance on conventional stage business and hacknied situations than is usually the case. The story may be thus told:—Count de Carambole (Mr. Wigan), a foreign scamp, such as might have been seen lately hanging about the low hells of Leicester-square, and his wife, Fifine (Mrs. Wigan), arrive at the principal gasthaus at Kessingen in danger of being arrested for some bank forgeries upon letters of credit, which have been discovered at Frankfort. At the same time arrives Mr. Crisis (Mr. Keeley), the "exclusive correspondent" of the "Scourge" London newspaper, who has left his wife in the dismal solitudes of Herne Bay, and come to the baths of Kessingen on a wild spree. Fifine pretends, at the table d'hôte, to be struck with him, and, finding out who he is, tells him that he is in jeopardy from some articles which have appeared in the "Scourge," reflecting on the Bavarian Government; but that, to serve him, she will exchange her husband's passport for his own—of course, out of devotion. Mr. Crisis agrees to this; and we next see him as Count de Carambole, playing the part of a gallant flaneur in front of the bath-house. In the meantime his wife (Mrs. Keeley), accompanied by her uncle, Mr. Lonely (Mr. Turner), has arrived at Kissengen, and finds her husband flirting with Fifine, just as he is arrested for the Count de Carambole, upon the strength of his boasting and his false passport. Mrs. Crisis is so enraged, that she denies all knowledge of him, and the wretched little journalist is at once marched off to prison. A variety of distressing situations now commences, in which Keeley must be seen, for their drollery to be conceived; and he is on the point of being condemned, when two Bow-street officers arrive and recognise the real Count de Carambole. An explanation takes place; his wife, having punished him sufficiently, forgives him; the real culprit is marched away, and the piece terminates happily.

This is the outline of the plot; but the dialogue is so smart and good-tempered, and the allusions so clever, that a double vivacity is given to its progress; and a quaint pleasant humour runs through it from beginning to end. To say that both Keeley and his wife played with the same inimitable drollery which characterises all they do, is indeed praise enough; but we must, at the same time, speak most especially of the acting of Mr. Wigan, as the French swindler. To this gentleman belongs the sole credit of effecting a reform in the representation of stage foreigners. His personation of them is perfect; his Waterloo Guide in "Gertrude's Cherries;" his Sporting Count in "The Turf;" his French Valets, in everything, are characteristic studies of no low order; and he speaks also, as they might, in reality; not in the theatrical broken English of a few years back. His making up also from his hair to his pantalons en guetre was a picture: he was the living representative of the "shy" foreigner that Mr. Leech can portray so well with his pencil. Not less clever was Mrs. Wigan's Fifine; her tournure and broken English were also carefully taken from nature, and we could sometimes close our eyes and fancy we were listening to Celeste or Eugenie Prosper. Mr. Turner was comically harmless as Uncle Lonely. The piece went with a roar of laughter throughout, and was announced for repetition amidst loud applause.

PRINCESS'.

A drama, called "Prediction," was produced here on Monday evening, which, we were somewhat disappointed to find, was merely another version of the "Mysterious Stranger," now performing at the Adelphi, and scarcely so effective. Miss Emma Stanley is a very clever young lady, but she does not play the assumed Evil One equal to Madame Celeste. Her performance, nevertheless, was highly creditable; as was that of the lover of the piece, sustained by Mr. Walter Lacy. Mr. Granby, a useful member of this company, also played carefully; but there was nothing in the other characters to call for any particular remark. The piece went tolerably well, and the audience were perfectly satisfied; but it will not do to rely upon alone, in drawing an audience.

Mr. Balfe bids fair to rival Donizetti in the number of his operatic productions—for between the Opera Comique, at Paris, Drury-lane, and the Princess's here, he contrives currente calamo to keep three establishments constantly supplied with something new, and has not made a single fiasco yet. On Wednesday last an English version of "Les Quartre Fils Aymon," the title of the libretto which was performed at Paris last summer, was produced at this house, and proved successful in the highest degree. It is called "The Castle of Aymon," or "The Four Brothers," but the story bears no resemblance to the legend so well known in Germany as the "Haimonskinder;" it seems rather to have been founded upon our own juvenile romance of "Jack and his Eleven Brothers," in earlier days which we recollect, touched our sensibility mightily. The present treatment of the subject, however, takes a humorous turn, which has been most felicitously brightened by the wit of the composer. The plot of the piece may be briefly told:—

The four heroes of the piece are the sons of an old Bretagne nobleman, who has made them travel, each by a different route, and appointed them all to return on a certain day to open a chest supposed to contain all his treasure. On this day the action of the piece commences, and they all enter their ancestral castle dressed exactly alike. The quintet which they sing with their Old Steward, was encored, and so was a pretty romance sung by Allen, who plays Olivier, the eldest of the brothers. When the chest is opened, nothing is found but a document wherein the deceased parent informs them that he has nothing to leave but the bare walls of the castle, and his advice to preserve brotherly unity. Report, however, has given a fictitious splendour to affairs, and a wealthy, miserly nobleman, the Baron de Beaumanoir, has hastened to the castle, on the day the chest is opened, in the hope of uniting his daughter to the eldest brother, now Duc d'Aymon. The Old Steward, anxious to keep up the honour of the house, makes the Baron believe that his master's riches are inexhaustible, and that he is in fact the sole heir to the late Duke, his three brothers being dead

The second act takes place in the garden of the Baron's castle. He wishes to marry his daughter Hermine to Olivier. Unfortunately, there is an obstacle in the way of the marriage, for Hermine, to save her three female cousins from a convent, for which her father has destined them, has made a vow that they shall all three be married before her own nuptials take place. A pretty, singular, chattering quintet occurs among these four young ladies and their attendant Then comes the "gem" of the opera, an admirable buffo duet by the Baron and Ivon (Messrs. Walton and Leffler), the latter recounting to the former the boundless riches of the Duc d'Aymon, and the former greedily swallowing every word. There is originality in this duet, and the effect produced by one singer rapidly repeating the phrase which has just been uttered by the other is quite unique. A pretty romance and duet take place between Hermine and Olivier, and the act terminates with a very dramatic finale. The three younger brothers have each fallen in love with Hermine, without knowing that she is their elder brother's bride; and she, to fulfil her vow, makes an assignation with them all, and contrives that they shall elope with her three cousins all veiled—to three several hermitages, where a priest will unite them. This incident is not very new, but is well treated in the present instance.

In the third act Hermine is with her bridegroom, and her father is urging the marriage, but she dares not comply till she hears the signal from the hermitages, announcing that the weddings have taken place. In the meanwhile Olivier sings a pretty romance, "In the chapel all is ready;" and Hermine sings a duet with her father, pending which the expected bells are heard. At the end, when all the affairs are settled, the four brothers having made their fortunes by their respective marriages, repeat the strain with which they closed their first act.

The heroine, Hermine was performed by a debutante—a Miss Helen Condell—who, although labouring under timidity at first, ultimately succeeded to complete triumph. She is an ornament to the vocal profession Allen sang his ballads with that taste by which he is always distinguished. Walton was excessively droll as the old Baron. Leffler, too, was much more pains-taking than usual. He played the Old Steward with a quiet roguish humour; and his voice was in more than ordinary good condition. Mr. C. Horn, jun., displayed an ease and manner far above the usual acting of vocalists.

The opera was as successful as could be. Everybody was called for, including Mr. Balfe, and Miss Condell received a bouquet or two. A beautiful new scene has been painted for the second act by Mr. Beverley.

Altogether Mr. Maddox has good reason to be pleased with his liberal speculation.

ASTLEY'S

We are very fond of going to Astley's, if it be only to revive bygone feelings and associations. We will not, however, deny that we feel some small pleasure apart from this in visiting it at present—that we even laugh at the time-honoured jokes of the Clown, with a dash of former joyousness in the outburst—that it is the only theatre where the spangles do not appear less bright, the ladies less lovely, the processions less imposing, the gas less sparkling, than formerly. We do not wish, it is true, to go there very, very often, for then the charm would quite depart; but we look upon a visit to Astley's, as a dinner from roast sucking pig—an excellent thing now and then.

They were rare times when we used first to go to Astley's—we mean for ourselves, not for the world at large—to the greater part of which they were possibly just the same as they are at present. But we saw everything then through a wonderful medium: we respected the very sawdust as a substance of a marvellous nature: and we made bows to the box-keeper, and called him "Sir." The Clown, too—how we loved him: next to Punch there was nobody that we had never spoken to, whom we took into such intimate acquaintanceship. We have never heard jests since that pleased us like his did, or that we thought so sharp—no, not amongst the first wits of London. And Mr. Widdicombe, whom we then conceived to be the commanding officer of some royal cavalry regiment, just managing the ring, in all condecension, for amusement and change—our feeling towards him was something like respect. We had not then learnt that he was an ordinary person, nor should we have dared to make rude jokes and intricate calculations about his age. Such would have been utter profanity. One of the good old fashioned pieces, such as we used to see—not Wars in China and Affghanistan—was produced here last week, called "The Royal Fox Hunt; or, the Race Horse, and Life's Course of Man and Steed"—we quote the bill. We will not attempt to give the plot. The moment we reduced an Astley piece to the unities, its charm would be gone; and the present one was so long, withal, that when it was over we had well nigh forgotten how it began. But there were country fêtes and festivals—there was a fox-chase, with a real fox and pack of real hounds—there was the Derby Day at Epsom, before Sir James Graham's enactment against the thimble tables—and a great deal more than we have space to tell of or heart to remember. But everybody was amazingly pleased, and so were we; and we believe we cannot do the establishment a better turn, which it really deserves, than by recommending all our readers to go and see it. If only a small fraction of them followed our advice, the proprietor might be very well content.

"AT HOME AND ABROAD."

MADAME DULCKEN'S SOIREES MUSICALES.—This lady gave the first of a series of musical entertainments at her house in Harley-street, on Wednesday night. The concert opened with Haydn's quatuor in G major (No.81), for two violns, viola, and violoncello, which were played by Messrs. Willy, Goffrie, Loder, and Luces. It was executed with great spirit, and a thorough feeling of its chaste and simple beauties, and elicited considerable applause. This and Mendelsshon's quintuor in A major, for two violens, two tenors, and a violoncello, formed the mainstays of the concert. It was admirably executed by Messrs. Willy, Goffrie, Loder, Hill, and Lucas, and was received with enthusiasm. Madame Dulcken displayed a masterly touch and extreme taste and correctness in Beethoven's sonata in C (No. 3), Hummel's trio in E major, accompanied by Messrs. Goffrie and Lucas, a fantasia by Ries on Swedish national air, with accompaniments for violin, alto, violoncello, and double bass, and Chopin's notturno and tarantella.

M. MOSCHELES.—This distinguished pianist and composer is at present in his fatherland, Germany, giving concerts in the principal cities and towns.

PARISH ALVARS.—This celebrated harpist is leaving Vienna for Naples, where he will pass the winter. He has just completed a new concerto, and a symphony for the orchestra; at present he is employed on a pianoforte concerto, which is expressly intended for Madame Dulcken.

Mr. Gattie, the actor, formerly so well known by his representations of Frenchmen of the old school, died on the 13th inst. at Reading. Mr. Gattie was a most honourable man, and he retired from the stage several years ago, universally esteemed by his brethren and every one who knew him. Mr. Gattie had an engagement at the Surrey Theatre, under the management of Mr. T. Dibdin.

WHOLESALE DEALERS IN THE CITY.—At a Court of Aldermen held on Tuesday, a presentment was made by the inquest of the ward of Farringdon Within, to the effect, that 146 wholesale dealers were carrying on business in the ward who were not free of the City. The Court agreed that the necessary steps should be taken to put the law in force, and to compel persons to take up their freedom.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

SEIZURE OF A DISTILLERY BY THE EXCISE.—Some rumours have been in circulation for the last fortnight, relative to the seizure of the distillery and the rectifying-house of Messrs. Smith, Thomas-street, Whitechapel. The cause of this step on the part of the Excise is not exactly known The stoppage of the business will continue until the Revenue and Excise causes are tried in the Court of Exchequer, which will take place immediately after the end of the present term. Nearly the whole of the men employed in the two departments have been discharged. According to one account, the firm had been in the habit of retailing spirits at a superior strength and lower price than other distillers. It is well known to the trade, that the quality sent out commanded the highest prices in the market, and the house was never considered to come under the denomination of cheap sellers. Here, as in all other establishments of the same kind, an excise-officer was constantly on the premises, and during the whole of the period, until the commissioners stopped the trade, he was in the constant habit of seeing what was going on. At present no correct information can be obtained as to the exact amount for which the commissioners have made a seizure; whether they amount to £1000 or £100,000 is unknown.

THE LATE SWINDLING CASE AT BIRMINGHAM.—Several tradesmen who have been swindled by the individual of whose exploits we gave an account last week, have waited upon the Birmingham magistrates to detail their grievances, and, if possible, to obtain a warrant. A Birmingham paper, referring to the affair, says:—"An attorney has furnished us with several cases, in order to show that the magistrates would have been fully justified in granting a warrant against Messrs. Rice, Joliffe, and Co., on the application to Mr. Arnold. We have received several communications from gentlemen in London and elsewhere, who have recognised in Mr. Rice, from the case reported by us last week, an old acquaintance. One of our correspondents, a sufferer, who dates his note from the Parthenon Club, Regent-street, informs us that the blind man, when practising in town, went by the name of "C. Radley, tailor, 13, Hatfield-street, Borough," and his accomplice by the name of "Charles Portlock Attwood, of Eltham, Kent." Another correspondent, a professional gentleman, who, we have no doubt, was also victimised, says he can furnish a clue to the discovery and apprehension of the scoundrels, should any measures be determined on for bringing them to justice. This gentleman's address we shall be happy to furnish, if required, as he is most willing to lend a hand in bringing the transactions of the swindling company to a close. It appears the parties are well-known to the metropolitan police, whose vigilance they have succeeded in eluding; we trust our Birmingham force will be more successful when they make the attempt."

THE LATE FATAL ACCIDENT ON BOARD THE GIPSY QUEEN.—Mr. Joseph Samuda, the brother and partner of Mr. Jacob Samuda, who lost his life on board the Gipsy Queen, with nine of his engineers and workmen, having intimated that he would bear the expense of the funerals of such of them whose families or friends were unable to do so, the mournful ceremonials were conducted in a most respectable manner. Last Sunday afternoon the remains of five of the engineers, who resided in Poplar or its vicinity, were consigned to the earth, viz., Henry Scobell, who has left a widow and eight children, was buried at two o'clock in Poplar churchyard. He was followed by his widow and the whole of his eight orphan children, who were all respectably attired in mourning at the cost of Mr. Joseph Samuda. At four o'clock a procession, consisting of the bodies of John Newman and Michael Donovan, two others of the sufferers, followed by above twenty couple of sorrowing relatives, was observed wending its way up the High-street, Poplar, towards the Catholic cemetry in Wade-street, East India-road; a similar crowd of persons followed in the rear. They were both interred in one grave. The service, according to the Catholic ritual, was read in a most impressive manner by the Rev. Mr. Haresnep, the Catholic priest. William Riley, the boiler maker, was interred at Trinity Chapel, East India-road, with a similar intensity of feeling. Arthur M'Ghee was also buried in the Catholic cemetery. The remains of Mr. Jacob Samuda were interred at the Jews' Cemetery, in the Mile-end-road. The brother of Charles Dodd, the principal engineer, whose native place was Liverpool, arrived in London from that town. Mr. Dodd immediately had the remains removed in a hearse to the terminus of the London and Birmingham Railway, at Euston-square, from whence they were conveyed to Liverpool. The body of Thomas Nugent was taken to his father's house, in Union-street, Old Gravel-lane, Southwark, and interred on Friday week. In addition to the numerous family left by Henry Scobell, we understand that Riley has left a widow and six children, and all, with the exception of Charles Dodd and Thomas Nugent, have left widows and families.

FATAL RAILWAY ACCIDENT.—On Tuesday night an inquest was taken before Mr. Payne, at Guy's Hospital, on view of the body of W. Thomas Hollidge, aged twelve years, in the employment of Mr. Phillipps, farmer, Norwood, who was run over by a steam-engine, the property of the London and Dover Railway Company. It appeared from the evidence that, about half-past six o'clock, a man named Wooker, a gardener, was walking along the side of the Croydon Railway, between the Jolly Sailor and Anerley stations, when a steam-engine, which was going slowly to London, passed him. Shortly after he found the deceased lying on the ground, between the up rails. He was prescribed for by a medical gentleman, and then taken to Guy's Hospital. Deceased, it was stated, was going to Penge, to his work, and that he was in the habit of walking between the rails. The driver of the steam-engine, which had a white light in front, and which was going at a rate of from ten to twelve miles an hour, said he did not see deceased, nor was he aware of the accident till about eleven o'clock. Deceased had a very extensive fracture of the skull, and other injuries. He died the same evening. Verdict—"That the deceased died from a fracture of the skull, but how that was occasioned there was no evidence."

DETERMINED SUICIDE.—A very long inquiry was held at Guy's Hospital on Tuesday night before Mr. Payne, touching the death of Mr. Ellis Hayward, aged seventy-two, lately residing at 31, Anne street, Waterloo-road. From the evidence of Mrs. Natter, the deceased's landlady, it appeared that on the previous Friday, she heard a strange noise in the room occupied by deceased. She hastened there, when she found deceased with his throat cut, and a razor covered with blood lying by his side. Medical aid was sent for, and deceased was subsequently taken to the hospital, where he died. Several letters were found in his room; one addressed to the editor of the Times, which the coroner sent to that gentleman. The others were read. One, directed to his landlady, set forth that he had left her his boxes, &c., regretting that he had nothing more to leave her. He hoped, if any thing was owing to his laundress or tailor, she would pay them, but not to contribute any thing towards the expenses of his funeral, as his wife had plenty of spare cash, and could afford to bury him. He made a very serious charge against her, for which, however, there appeared to be no foundation. Two letters to the Jury were very similar, and stated that he was in a state of destitution, and he preferred taking his life to suffering "purgatory" in the workhouse. No one knew that he was in want, although he had relief from some of his wife's friends. The deceased shortly after his marriage began to lead a very disgraceful life. Mr. Kent, the house surgeon, proved that death arose from the hemorrhage caused by the wound in the throat. Other witnesses were examined, from whom it appeared that, besides cutting his throat, he attempted to take poison. His mind, there was no doubt, had become impaired, and the Jury returned a verdict of "Temporary insanity."

HER MAJESTY'S STAG-HOUNDS.—SERIOUS ACCIDENTS.—A large field attended the meet on Wenesday morning, which took place at Dawley Wall, near Hillingdon. The celebrated "Hampton Deer," which was selected for the day's sport, had not been hunted during the past season. Upon the deer being uncarted, at Pole Hill, it went right away for the feeder of the Ruislip reservoir, doubling to the left towards Ickenham, then round to Ruislip, leaving the village to the left, and then back again over the same line of country to Hayes. It was taken near Staines, after a run of one hour and three quarters, at a steeple-chace pace, over upwards of twenty miles of country. The horse of a gentleman who regularly attends the hunt, in taking a blind hedge out of a field near West-End, about a mile from Harrow, fell into a ditch on the other side, and, its neck doubling under him, its death was instantaneous. Its rider fortunately escaped unhurt. The horse, which was a favourite and highly valuable animal, has been hunted with the Royal buckhounds during the last seven seasons. Another gentleman, in taking the hedge from another part of the same field, was thrown, and sustained a compound fracture of the thigh bone, besides other injuries. Several other accidents took place during the run, but we have not heard they were attended with any very serious results.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE (Friday).—Although the return for the present week shows a good arrival of English wheat, the supply of that article on sale to-day was by no means large. For all descriptions, however, the demand ruled heavy, at almost nominal prices. In foreign wheat next to nothing was doing, yet holders would not submit to lower figures. Barley and malt were a mere drug; yet we can notice no alteration in the currencies. Oats, beans, and peas as on Monday, with exceedingly little doing.

ARRIVALS.—English: wheat, 11550; barley, 7400; oats, 1220 quarters. Irish: wheat, — barley, ——; oats, 19020 quarters. Foreign: wheat, 1930; barley, 3430; oats, 1070 quarters. Flour, 4950 sacks. Malt, 6480 quarters.

Flour, American, 22s to 24s; Baltic, 24s to —s per barrel. Town made, —s to —s.

The Seed Market.—For linseed and rapeseed the demand continues very steady, at full prices. In other kinds of seeds, exceedingly little is doing.

The following are the present rates:—Linseed, English, sowing, 52s to 58s; Baltic crushing, 38s to 42s, Mediterranean and Odessa, 40s to 42s; hempseed, 35s to 38s per quarter; coriander, 15s to 18s per cwt.; brown mustard seed, —s to —s; white ditto, —s to —s; tares, —s to—s per bushel; English rapeseed, £23 to £25 per last of ten quarters; Linseed cakes, English, £10 10s to £11; do., Foreign, £6 15s to £7 per 1000; rapeseed cakes, £5 10s to £6 6s per ton; canary, 54s to 56s per quarter.

Bread.—The prices of wheaten bread in the metropolis are from 7d to 7½d; of household ditto, 5½d to 6½d per 4lb loaf.

Imperial Weekly Averages.—Wheat, 46s 4d; barley, 35s 9d; oats, 21s 9d; rye, 34s 2d; beans, 38s 4d; peas, 35s 7d.

Duties on Foreign Corn.—Wheat, 20s; barley, 4s; oats, 6s; rye, 6s 6d; beans, 5s 6d; peas, 8s 6d.

Tea.—A small public sale, consisting of 11,145 packages, has been held this week. The biddings have been somewhat spirited, and gunpowders, young hysons, and souchongs have produced an advance of ½d to 1d per lb. The stock in warehouse is rapidly decreasing. Privately, a good business is doing, at full prices.

Sugar.—For West India sugar the demand has ruled very steady this week, and full prices have been paid in every instance. Bengals have advanced 1s to 2s per cwt. All other kinds of raw sugar are quite as dear. Standard lumps have improved to 73s 6d to 74s per cwt.

Coffee.—Mocha and West India sorts have been in fair request, but in Ceylon very little is doing at 54s for good ordinary. Foreign coffee is held at full rates.

Provisions.—The accounts from Ireland being very fine, we have again to report an active inquiry for Irish butter, the prices of which are still on the advance. Foreign butter is in good request at full currencies. There has been an improved demand for all kinds of bacon, at 1s to 2s per cwt. more money. Lard has risen from 1s to 3s per cwt, with a brisk trade. All other kinds of provisions support previous figures.

Wool.—Both English and foreign wools are selling heavily, and the rates are with difficulty supported.

Potatoes.—The best samples of potatoes are in good request, at full prices. Other kinds are a dull inquiry.

Tallow.—Owing to the large arrivals, this article is heavy, and the rates have a downward tendency. P.Y.C., on the spot, is held at 40s 6d to 40s 9d; and for forward delivery, 40s 6d per cwt. Town tallow is plentiful, at 41s 6d net cash.

Hay and Straw.—Coarse meadow hay, £3 10s to £4 15s; useful do., £4 16s to £5 3s; fine upland do., £5 5s to £5 12s; clover hay, £4 10s to £6; oat straw, £1 10s to £1 13s; wheat straw, £1 13s to £1 15s per load.

Fruit.—Valentia' raisins are in active request, at 50s per cwt. A very large business is doing in currants, at 43s to 46s for old, and 49s to 59s per cwt. for new Patras.

Oils.—Linseed oil is in good request, at full prices. Most other kinds of oil are a dull sale.

Hops (Friday).—Since the declaration of the duty, the demand has somewhat slackened for most kinds of hops, the quotations of which are, in some instances, easier than last week. The rates of new qualities rule as under:—Sussex pockets, £7 0s to £8 0s; Wealds, £6 18s to £8 0s; Mid Kent, £8 0s to £10 10s; East Kent, £7 7s to £8 15s; Choice ditto, £10 0s to £12 0s; Farnhams, £10 0s to £10 15s.

Coals (Friday).—Adair's, 16s 6d; Old Pentop, 16s 6d; Old Tanfield, 16s 6d; Townley, 17s 6d; West Hartley, 18s 6d: Braddyll's Hetton, 23s; Adelaide, 22s 9d; Stewart's, 23s; Lambton, 23s per ton.

Smithfield (Friday).—The supply of beasts here this morning was only moderate, yet the beef trade was, on the whole, inactive, at about Monday's quotations. We had on sale 54 beasts, in fair average condition, from Rotterdam, as also 50 horned and polled Scots, from Dundee. The numbers of sheep being very limited, the mutton trade was firm, and previous rates were steadily supported. For prime small calves we had a steady inquiry, at, in some instances, a trifle more money. Other qualities were a dull sale. The pork trade ruled dull, yet prices remained about stationary. Milch cows sold at from £16 to £19 each.

Per 8lbs to sink the offal:—Coarse and inferior beasts, 2s 4d to 2s 6d; second quality do. 2s 8d to 2s 10d; prime large oxen, 3s 0d to 3s 8d; prime Scots, &c., 3s 10d to 4s 0d; coarse and inferior sheep, 2s 6d to 2s 10d; second quality ditto, 3s 0d to 3s 4d: prime coarse woolled sheep, 3s 6d to 3s 8d; prime Southdown ditto, 3s 10d to 4s 0d; large coarse calves 3s 0d to 3s 6d; prime small ditto, 3s 8d to 4s 2d; large hogs, 3s 0d to 3s 6d; small porkers, 3s 8d to 4s 0d; sucking calves, 18s to 30s; and quarter old store pigs, 16s to 20s each. Beasts, 523: cows, 179; sheep, 3560; calves, 151; pigs, 375.

Newgate and Leadenhall (Friday).—There was a full average supply of meat on offer to-day, yet the demand was steady at our quotations:—Per 8lb., by the carcass:—Inferior beef, 2s 2d to 2s 4d; middling ditto, 2s 6d to 2s 8d; prime large ditto, 2s 10d to 3s 2d; ditto small ditto, 3s 4d to 3s 6d; large pork, 2s 6d to 3s 6d; inferior mutton, 2s 6d to 2s 8d; middling ditto, 2s 10d to 3s 2d; prime ditto, 3s 4d to 3s 8d; veal, 3s 0d to 4s 0d; small pork, 3s 8d to 4s 0d. ROBERT HERBERT.

BRADFORD PIECE MARKET, Thursday, Nov. 14.—There is a fair demand for goods suitable for the winter, and the business done in Lastings, Damasks, Moreens, &c., has been active; but for Merinos, Orleans, &c, which are for dress purposes, there is not that animation among the buyers for the home market, which the late favourable harvest led the manufacturers to anticipate. In prices there is no change worthy of note.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

The Consol Market has displayed an upward tendency during the week, the advance having been gradual from 100¼ to ⅜ to the closing price of 100½. On Wednesday a few bargains were done at 100⅝, but this induced some realising, and the price receded. The Exchequer Bill Market also improved from 57 60 (Monday's quotation) to 63 65 on Wednesday, but this has since yielded to sales, and the closing quotation is 64 62. The demand for money having somewhat decreased within the last few days, is the assigned cause for the rise, but the market is any thing but firm for either Consols or Exchequer Bills at the present advanced quotations. The variations in the heavy stock have been very trifling, and the closing quotations are, Three per Cent. Reduced, 99⅞; Three-and-a-Quarter per Cent., 102¼; Bank Stock, 206; India Bonds, 81 to 83; India Stock, 288; Long Annuities, 12.

There has been some animation in the Foreign Market during the week, and transactions in Spanish have been numerous, if not heavy, in amount. Monday's market was steady, but on Tuesday the Active Stock advanced to 24½, and the Three per Cents. to 35⅝ ⅞. The party for a fall, however, changed the prices on Wednesday, by selling on the strength of some unfavourable rumours; and the price receded to 24 to ⅛ for the Actives; the Five per Cents., 35½ to ¼. This price has again receded upon the news of an insurrection in Castile; but the quotation was not materially worse, the Actives closing at 24, and the Three per Cents. 35 to ⅛. Dutch Two-and-a-Half per Cents. close at 62⅞; Four per Cent. Certificates, 97; Five per Cents., 99½; and Portuguese, which has not recovered last week's depression, closes at 54½.

The Railway Market, although steady in regard to prices, still continues heavy, and business is nearly suspended on the newly-projected lines. The South Western Railway propose to capitalise their shares, &c., converting them into a transferable stock. South Eastern shares have declined to 38½; a result that might be anticipated from such an additional issue of new shares. Birmingham Stock has also receded to 217. Great Western close at 139⅞; Birmingham and Gloucester, 98; Bristol and Exeter, 69½; Eastern Counties, 13⅞ to 14; Edinburgh and Glasgow, 58 to 59; Croydon, 16; Brighton, 47¼; South Western, 76; London and York, 2⅛; Midlands, 108 (ex. New); Norwich and Brandon, 12¼; Lincoln and Sheffield, 34s. to 36s.; Glasgow and Dumfries, 19s.: Trent Valley, 7⅞; Dovers, 38¼; Sheffield and Manchester, 96½ to 97; Paris and Orleans, 40; Boulogne and Amiens, 3⅞; Orleans and Vierzon, 9⅞; Orleans, Tours, and Bordeaux, 4⅜; Paris and Rouen, 38½; Rouen and Havre, 22½.

SATURDAY MORNING.—Business was rather dull yesterday in the English House. Prices, however, were maintained; Exchequer Bills only quoting a fraction lower. Nothing of importance occurred in the Foreign House, and the Railway Market was rather flat, at the previous day's quotations.

THE BURGHLEY CHISTENING CAKE.

HER MAJESTY'S VISIT TO BURGHLEY.

At the Ball at Burghley, on Thursday evening, Adams's band was in attendance, and performed in the presence of her Majesty and Prince Albert, an entirely new selection of quadrilles, polkas, waltzes, &c.

A correspondent has forwarded us the accompanying anecdote :—

A lady, residing not an hundred miles from Wolverton, was commanded to be at Weedon on Tuesday, should the Queen stop there, as her services would be required. The lady started for the occasion; but, to her great grief, found the train would proceed to Rugby, and not stop at Weedon. Her feelings may be better imagined than described when she heard this, and, of course, all hope for her was lost. When near Crick, the whistle sounded, and the train slackened its pace; and from some cause, which proved fortunate in the end, it eventually stopped, and the lady alighted, determined to remain there rather than proceed. To use her own words, she was heedless of the consequences of being on the line, and burst into tears. An engine-driver near at hand saw her distress, and on hearing her case, offered to take her back to Weedon on his engine, if she had the courage for the journey. She gladly accepted the offer, although in a delicate state of health, and arrived at Weedon in time, having performed the journey in four minutes and a half. This, we believe, is the first instance of a lady riding on an engine, and some of our fair ones would faint at the bare idea of such a flying visit through the air—standing, not seated.

BUFFET OF PLATE, BANQUETTING HALL, BURGHLEY.

"THE COTTAGER'S DAUGHTER." *

"This ballad was suggested by a well-known and interesting story told of a certain noble family in England."—Note by Thomas Moore.

"You remember Ellen."—Irish Melody.

You remember Ellen, our hamlet's pride,
How meekly she blessed her humble lot,
When the stranger, William, had made her his bride,
And Love was the light of their lowly cot.
Together they toiled through winds and rains,
Till William at length, in sadness said,
"We must seek our fortune on other plains;"
Then, sighing, she left her lowly shed.

They roam'd a long and a weary way,
Nor much was the maiden's heart at ease,
When now, at the close of one stormy day,
They see a proud castle among the trees.
"To-night," said the youth, "we'll shelter there;
The wind blows cold, the hour is late:"
So he blew the horn with a chieftain's air,
And the porter bowed, as they pass'd the gate.

"Now welcome, lady," exclaim'd the youth,
"This castle is thine, and these dark woods all."
She believed him crazed, but his words were truth,
For Ellen is lady of Rosna Hall!
And dearly the lord of Rosna loves
What William, the stranger, woo'd and wed;
And the light of bliss, in these lordly groves,
Shines pure as it did in the lowly shed.

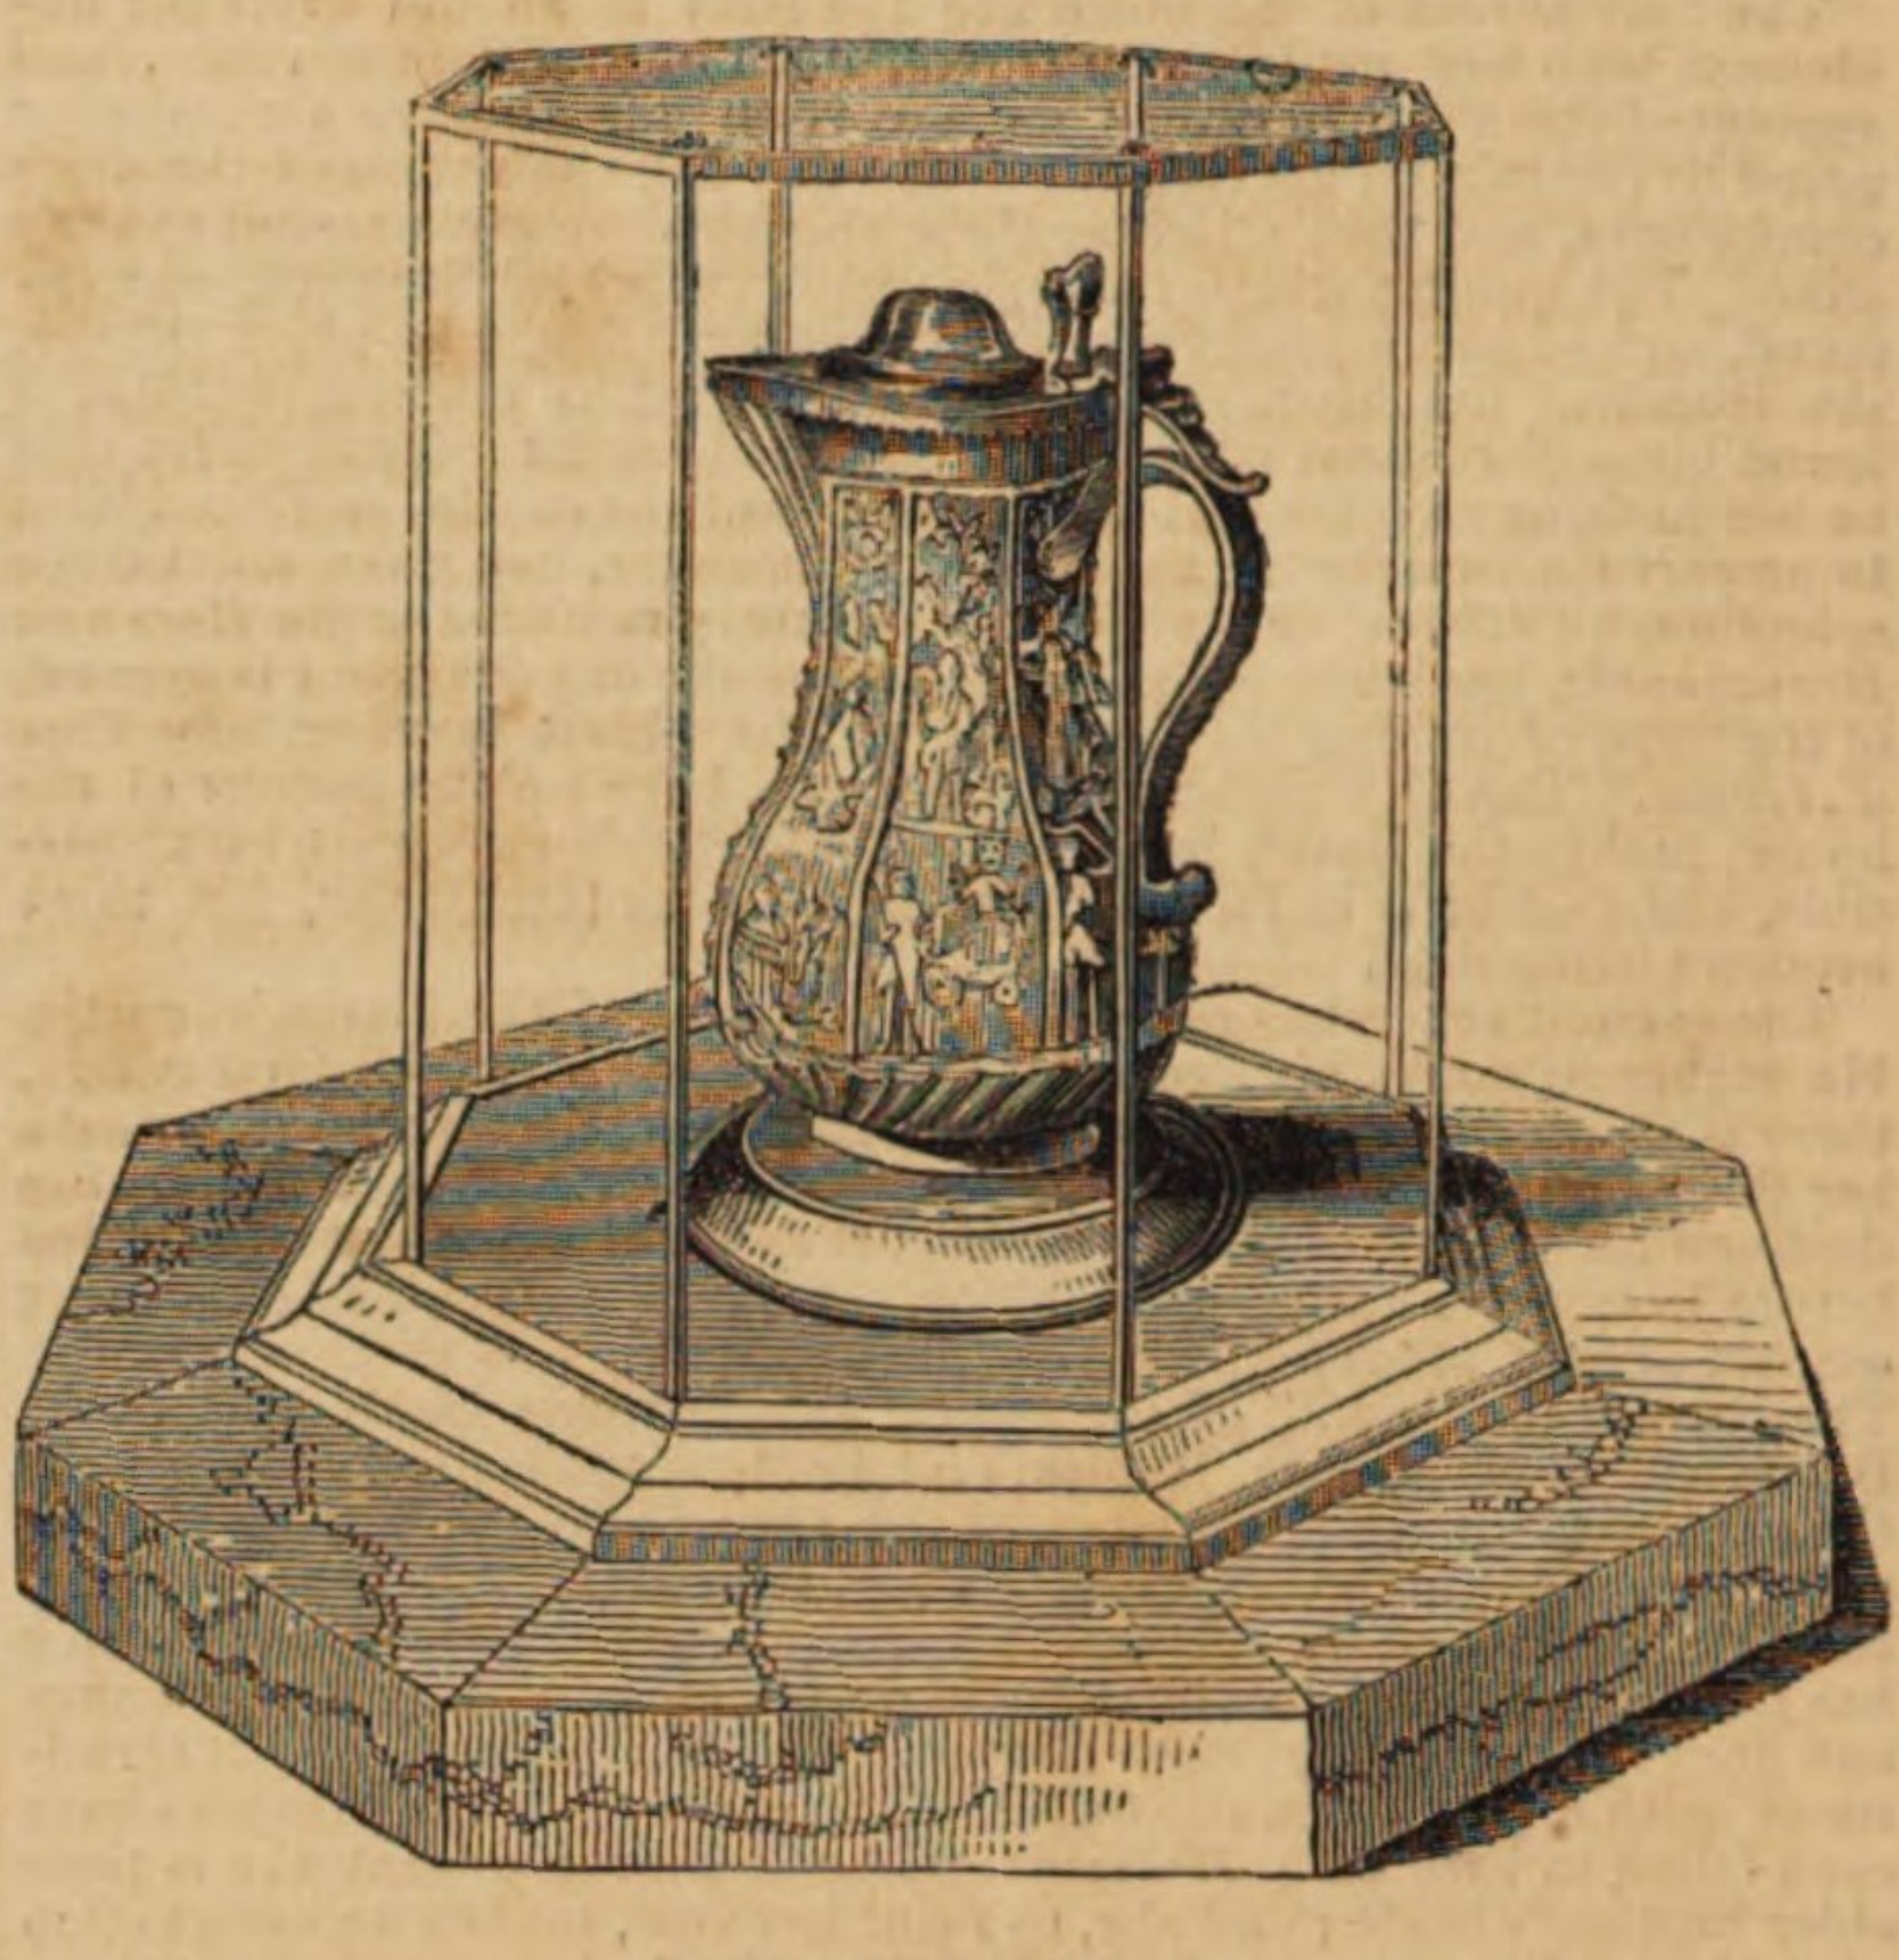
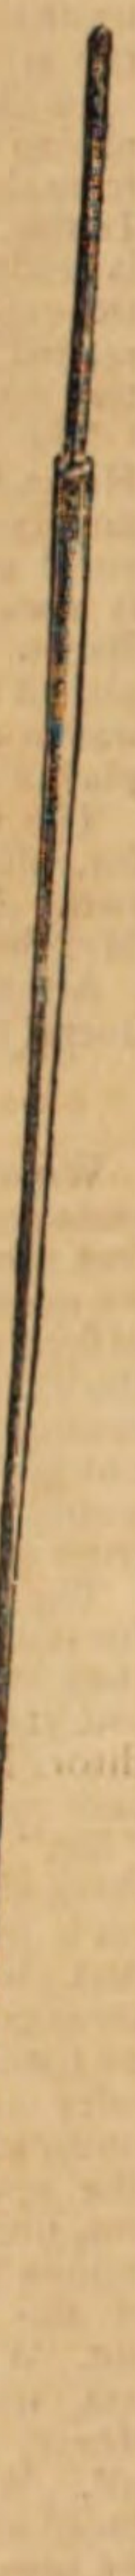
SHAKSPEARE'S JUG AND CANE.



SHAKSPEARE'S JUG.

The first of these accredited relics of Shakspeare was formerly the property of Edwin Lees, Esq., of Forthampton Cottages, near Tewkesbury, Gloucestershire, and was sold by auction in May, 1841. It has since been exhibited in the west of England, and has attracted very considerable attention. The accompanying details are from a handbill, printed by Mr. Bennett, of Tewkesbury :—



This Jug is of cream-coloured earthenware, about nine inches in height, and sixteen round in the largest part, and somewhat in the shape of a modern coffee-pot. It is divided longitudinally into eight compartments, each horizontally subdivided; and within these the principal deities of the Grecian Mythology are represented in rather bold relief. Jupiter and Juno, Bacchus, Diana, Mercury Apollo, Mars, &c., are all plainly distinguishable by their thrones, chariots, or characteristic animal attendants.

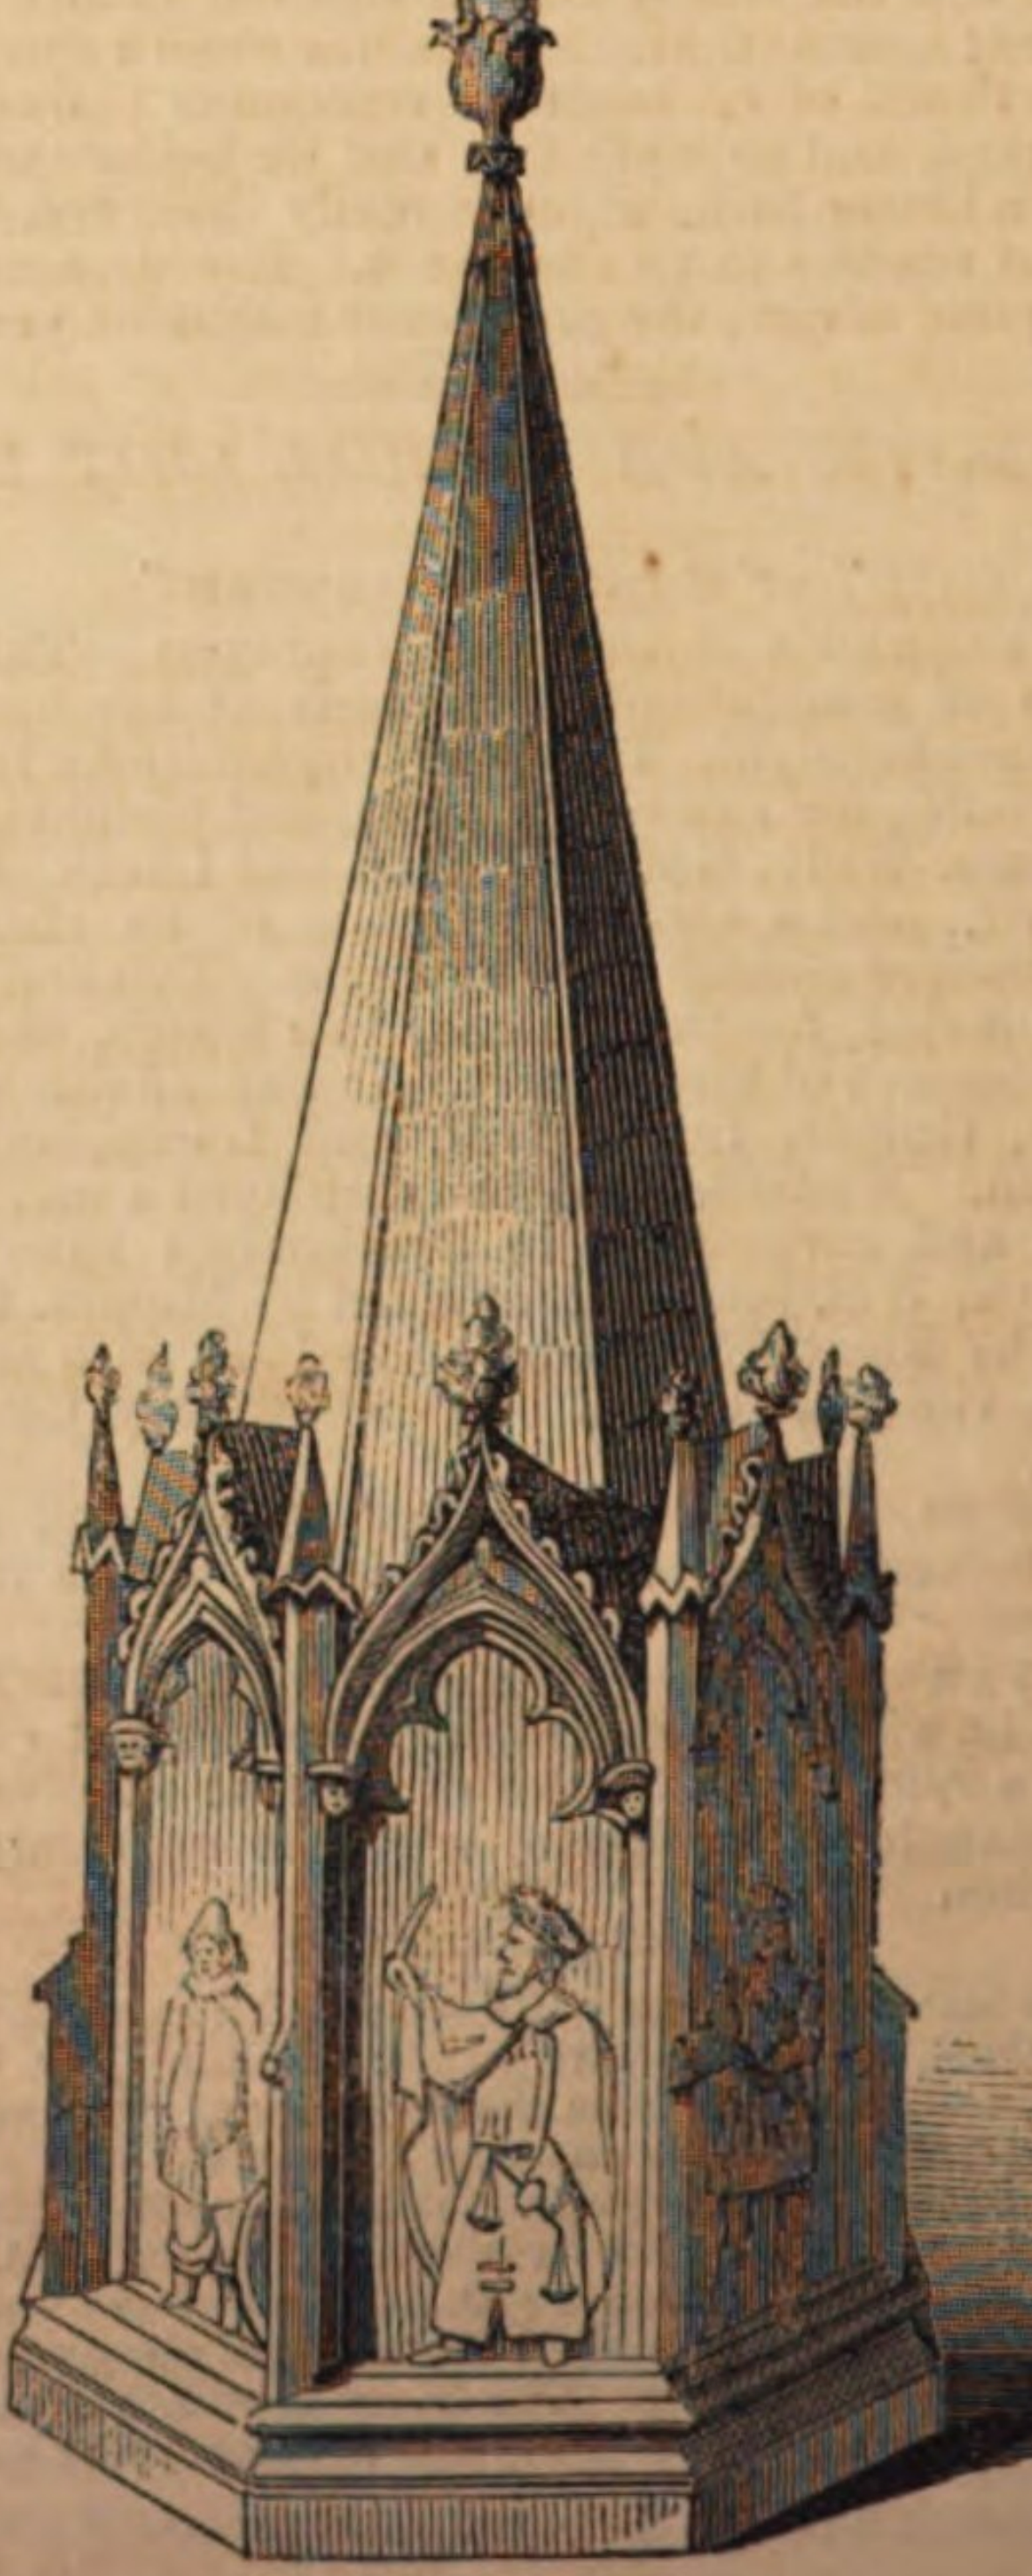
To preserve the interior from dust, and the rim from accident, a silver top and edging were added about forty years ago, with a small medallion of Shakspeare upon it, inscribed "William Shakspeare, at the age of 40." The precious relic is kept beneath a carved covering, shown in the engraving.

As this interesting relic was never, until within the last six years, out of the possession of the collateral decendants of the "immortal bard of Avon," it becomes necessary to trace its history. Its possessor (Mr. Lees) purchased it from a daughter of the late James Kingsbury, Esq., of Tewkesbury. whose wife inherited it from her mother. This lady, whose name was Richardson, was, through her husband, whom she survived, related to the Hart family, direct descendants of Shakspeare's sister Joan; and the Harts, having fallen into depressed circumstances, gave up the Jug to their relative, Mr. Richardson, in compensation for a considerable debt owing to him, about 1787. Sarah Hart, who thus disposed of the Jug, was the fifth in descent from Shakspeare's sister Joan, who married William Hart, of Stratford-upon-Avon, and previously to this the Harts had constantly kept the Jug as brought into their family by Joan Shakspeare.

It appears, from Shakspeare's will, that he left his sister Joan all his wearing apparel, together with the house in which he was born; besides which, other property that had been Shakspeare's was devised to the Hart family by Lady Barnard, the grand-daughter of Shakspeare, in whom the line of Shakspeare's own body terminated. It, therefore, becomes certain, that various relics of Shakspeare were at one time in their possession. Of these, however, none appear to have been treasured with any care except this Jug, which was ever denominated Shakspeare's, as having truly belonged to the immortal bard. The facts here stated, however, challenge the fullest investigation—the Hart family yet existing in Tewkesbury, and the Jug having been long ago noticed and described by Sir Richard Phillips, in the Monthly Magazine, and in Mr. Bennett's Tewkesbury History and Register.

The present possessor of the Jug, Mrs. Fletcher, a descendant of the immortal bard, tried to prevent it from going from the Shakspeare family. She was outbid, and Mrs. Mary Tuberville, of Charlton-house, bought it for £30. At the second day's sale of her effects, however, at a cost of nineteen guineas, Mrs. Fletcher re-bought the Jug, and, during the week of the Festival, hundreds of persons availed themselves of the opportunity of inspecting it.

The Cane is of the Malacca species, in beautiful preservation, the enamel being untouched. In length it is 4 feet 7½ inches, 4 inches in circumference at the thickest part, and at the set-off for the hand of 10 inches it is 3½ inches round. It has evidently, at some time or other, been mounted, and has had a ferrule 5 inches long, but these mountings have been removed. It was long in the family of the Harts of Tewkesbury, and it is only a few days ago that the stick was purchased by Mrs. Fletcher, one of the few surviving descendants of the venerated owner.



THE CASE IN WHICH SHAKSPEARE'S JUG IS KEPT

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD ENGLAND.

ABBEY OF ST. BENE'T'S, NORFOLK.

The county of Norfolk literally teems with ecclesiastical antiquities: her very villages, in many instances, can boast of a plurality of churches, while the magnitude of her monastic institutions attests the piety or pride of bygone generations, and offers an interesting study to the modern antiquary.

Constructed at an epoch more remote than the generality of similar structures in the same county—endowed with large possessions, occupying a fertile and well-watered site, and combining within itself the conventual characteristics of a religious house with the solidity of a Norman stronghold—the Abbey of St. Bene't's appears at a very early period to have borne a high degree of importance as an ecclesiastical foundation, and to have assumed a very belligerent aspect as a fortified place. Founded by royalty (in the reign of Canute), we find it assuming the defensive, and stoutly resisting a very unceremonious visit from royalty, in the reign of the Conqueror. The siege then carried on was, however, brought to an abrupt conclusion by the perfidy of a monk, who yielded up the place upon condition of succeeding to the Abbacy. He gained his point, and was very properly executed as a traitor. In 1469, the Abbey was again visited by royalty, but on this occasion the visit was a friendly one, and a very showy equestrian procession repaired hither from Norwich, for the purpose of presenting a petition to the King's mother. In the reign of Edward IV., the parsimonious administration of the revenues of this Abbey gave rise to the perpetration of some doggrel, which is preserved as a literary curiosity.

At the period of the Dissolution, the revenues of the Abbey are stated by Speed to have been £677 9s. 8d. One Bishop Rugge exchanged these for those of Norwich, but binding himself at the same time to maintain the prior and twelve monks, he found himself unable to do so, and resigned, upon an annual pension of 200 marks. A contemporary versifier has thus commented on the circumstance:—

"Poor Will, thou rugged art and ragged all,
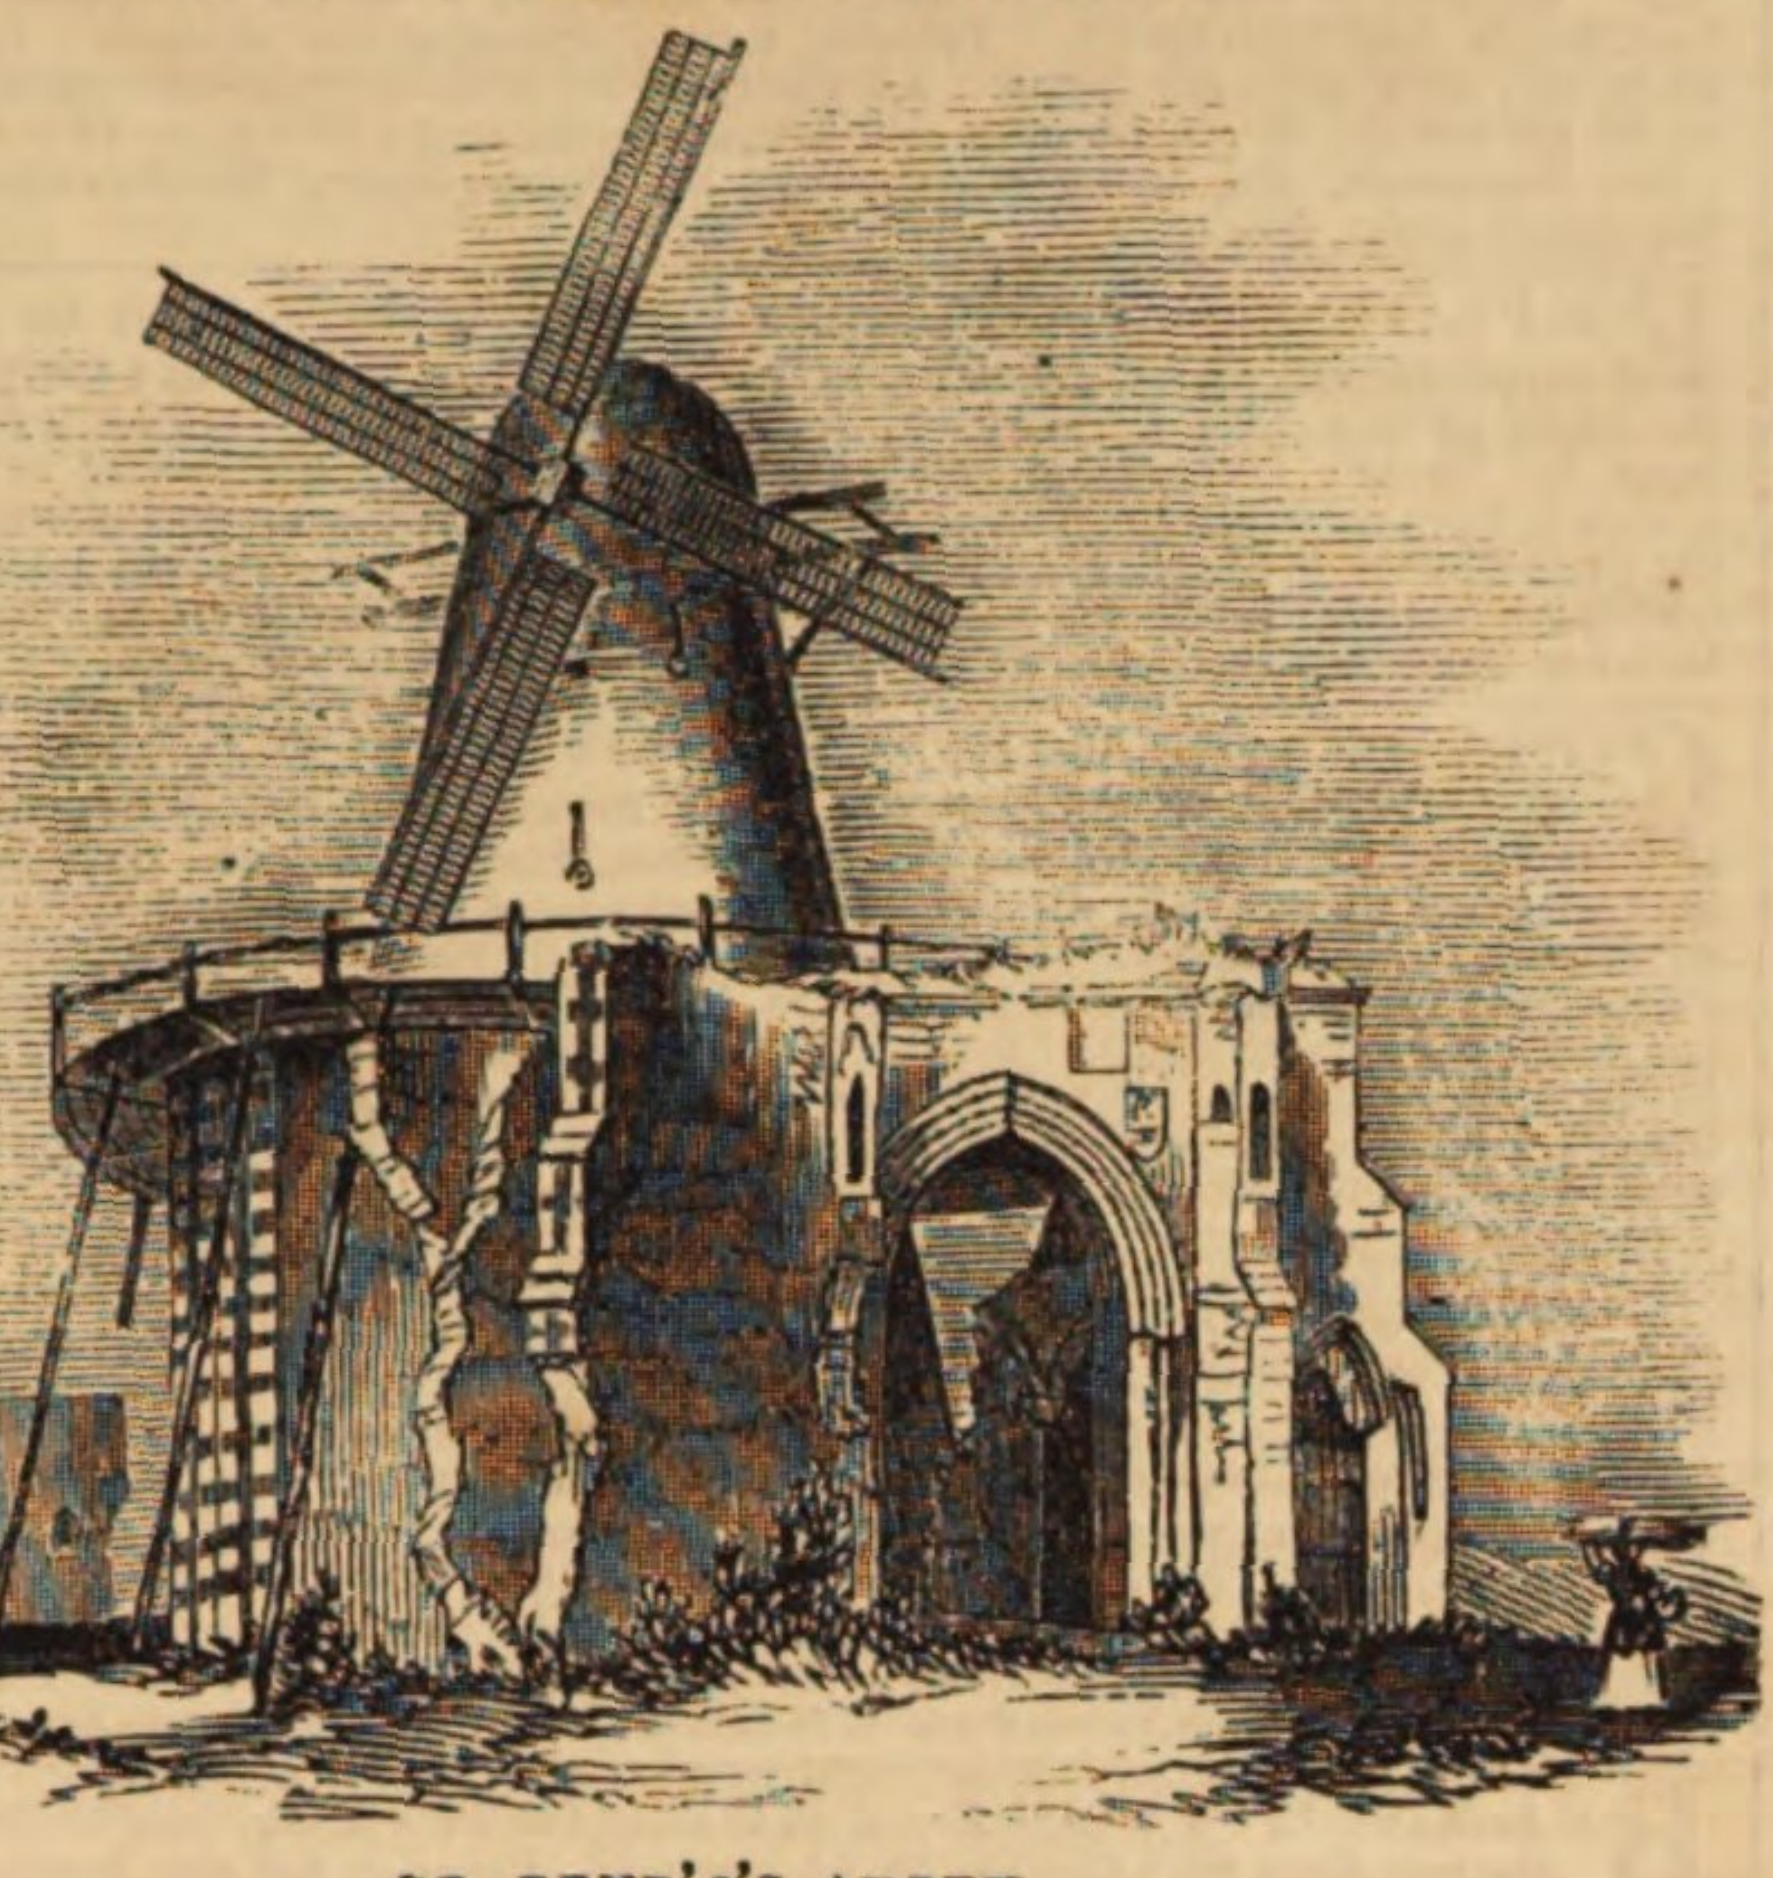
  Thy Abbey cannot bless thee in such fame;
To keep a palace fair, and stately hall,
  When gone is thence what should maintain the same.
First pay thy debts, and hence return to cell,
  And pray the blessed saint whom thou dost serve,
That others may maintain the palace well—
  For if thou stay'st, we all are like to starve."



ST. BENE'T'S ABBEY.

It is worthy of remark that the Abbey of St. Bene't's is the only one in England which can still boast of an abbot, and a mitred abbot—the Bishop of Norwich taking his seat in the House of Lords as Abbot of St. Bene't's.

All that now remains of this once magnificent edifice is the gateway, shown above, upon the walls of which a draining-mill has been erected. The ground-plan of the building and its appurtenances may, however, still be traced, and a melancholy contrast drawn, by the help of imagination, between its past grandeur and its present desolation.

NEW MUSIC.

MORE POLKAS! Lanner's John Bull Polka. Arranged for the Pianoforte. By AUGUSTUS MEVES. R. Cocks and Co.

Cleverly arranged, but time thrown away. We are heartily sick of these saltatory barbarisms.

CLARE'S PSALMODY. Parts I to VI. Cocks and Co.

This collection of Psalms, Hymns, Chants, &c., contains many beautiful melodies, adapted to the purpose professed by the author or editor, Mr. Clare, in a very happy manner. But still there is a monotony about it which would satiate and fatigue the most devoted psalmodist. Moreover, we do not like to see melodies detorted from their original purposes, even to make psalm tunes of them; and, again, why should not rhythm be attended to in their arrangement for the conventicle as well as for any other locality. The frequent occurrence of the horrid, expletive ninth bar is intolerable. To introduce rounds into psalmody is bad taste. The canon of "Non nobis," by Byrd, is not in the fifth, but in the fourth and eighth below. Mr. Clare's canon, "Non nobis," after the other's, was a bold attempt; but he seems to have had Cherubini's "Perfida Clori" more in view than the immortal production of old Tallis's pupil. On the cover of this publication it is stated to be "complete in three parts," and yet six have been published. What does this mean? On the whole, it is neatly got up, and, no doubt, will prove a favourite with those whose taste inclines them to the style of music contained in its numbers. Chacun à son goût.

JULLIEN'S CONCERTS.—Not content with the Procrustean task of making English, Irish, and Scotch airs fit the measure of quadrille, whether they would or not, M. Jullien has turned the principal airs of the Principality into most amusing distortions. The set commenced very appropriately with the bold air "The Rising of the Sun," which was admirably instrumented and performed. Mr. Roberts, the Cambrian minstrel, of whom some time ago we gave a portrait, next followed, and executed some variations on the air of "Sweet Richard," which excited universal applause. The various solos by Barret, Lazarus, Baumann, and Kœnig, were given in their usual delicious and finished style. The tout ensemble produced a splendid effect.

CURIOUS LEADEN COFFIN.

This interesting relic was lately found by some workmen in the employment of Mr. Forster, of Bow, while excavating near the Old Ford, at Stratford. It is preserved at the Bombay Grab, at Bow, for the inspection of the antiquary, and such persons as cherish respect for objects which throw a light upon the customs of other days; whilst it presents a rare example of ancient art, illustrative of one of the modes of sepulture in this country. Mr. Forster gave early information of the discovery to the Society of Antiquaries, in consequence of which, Mr. C. R. Smith, accompanied by Mr. Stock, of Poplar, have examined and made drawings of the coffin, which is considered by those gentlemen to be either Romano-British or Saxon. The field in which it was found is near the ancient road; on the sides of highways, the Romans and other nations were accustomed to bury their dead, either entire, or in sarcophagi of stone or lead; or in urns, when the bodies were burned.

SCENE FROM "THE CITY MADAM," AT SADLER'S WELLS THEATRE.

SCENE FROM "THE CITY MADAM."

Our artist has here portrayed an effective scene from Massinger's play of "The City Madam," lately revived, and performed, with some alterations, at Sadler's Wells Theatre. It is the scene in which Luke, frantic with his vast accession of wealth, revenges himself upon Lady Frugal, her daughters, and servant Millescent, by turning them out of doors. The following is from the text of Massinger:—

Luke. I'll cut off
Whatever is exorbitant in you
Or in your daughters, and reduce you to
Your natural forms and habits: not in revenge
Of your base usage of me, but to fright
Others by your example: 'tis decreed
You shall serve another, for I will Allow no waiter to you. Out of doors
With these useless drones!

* * * * * *

Lady Frugal. I am sick, and meet with A rough physician. O my pride and scorn!
How justly am I punished!
Mary. Now we suffer
For our stubbornness and disobedience
To our good father.
Luke. Get you in,
And caterwaul in a corner.
Lady Frugal. There's no contending.
(They go off.)

We had occasion, when noticing the production of this play, to speak highly of the acting of Mr. Phelps and Mrs. Warner in the two principal characters. There was a fine contrast between the humility of Luke in the earlier scenes of the play and his terrible wrath upon his elevation. Equally marked was the performance of the lady in her two positions of arrogance and utter dependence. We may honestly recommend our readers to go and witness this representation.

SCENE FROM THE COMEDY OF "OLD HEADS AND YOUNG HEARTS."

Our illustration represents the fifth act scene, wherein the good Rural is overwhelmed with the reproaches of everybody, just as he imagines he has been serving them. Mr. Farren's transition from the natural to the hysterical laughter, and subsequent weeping, was a wonderful piece of acting, alone sufficient to stamp him a great artist.

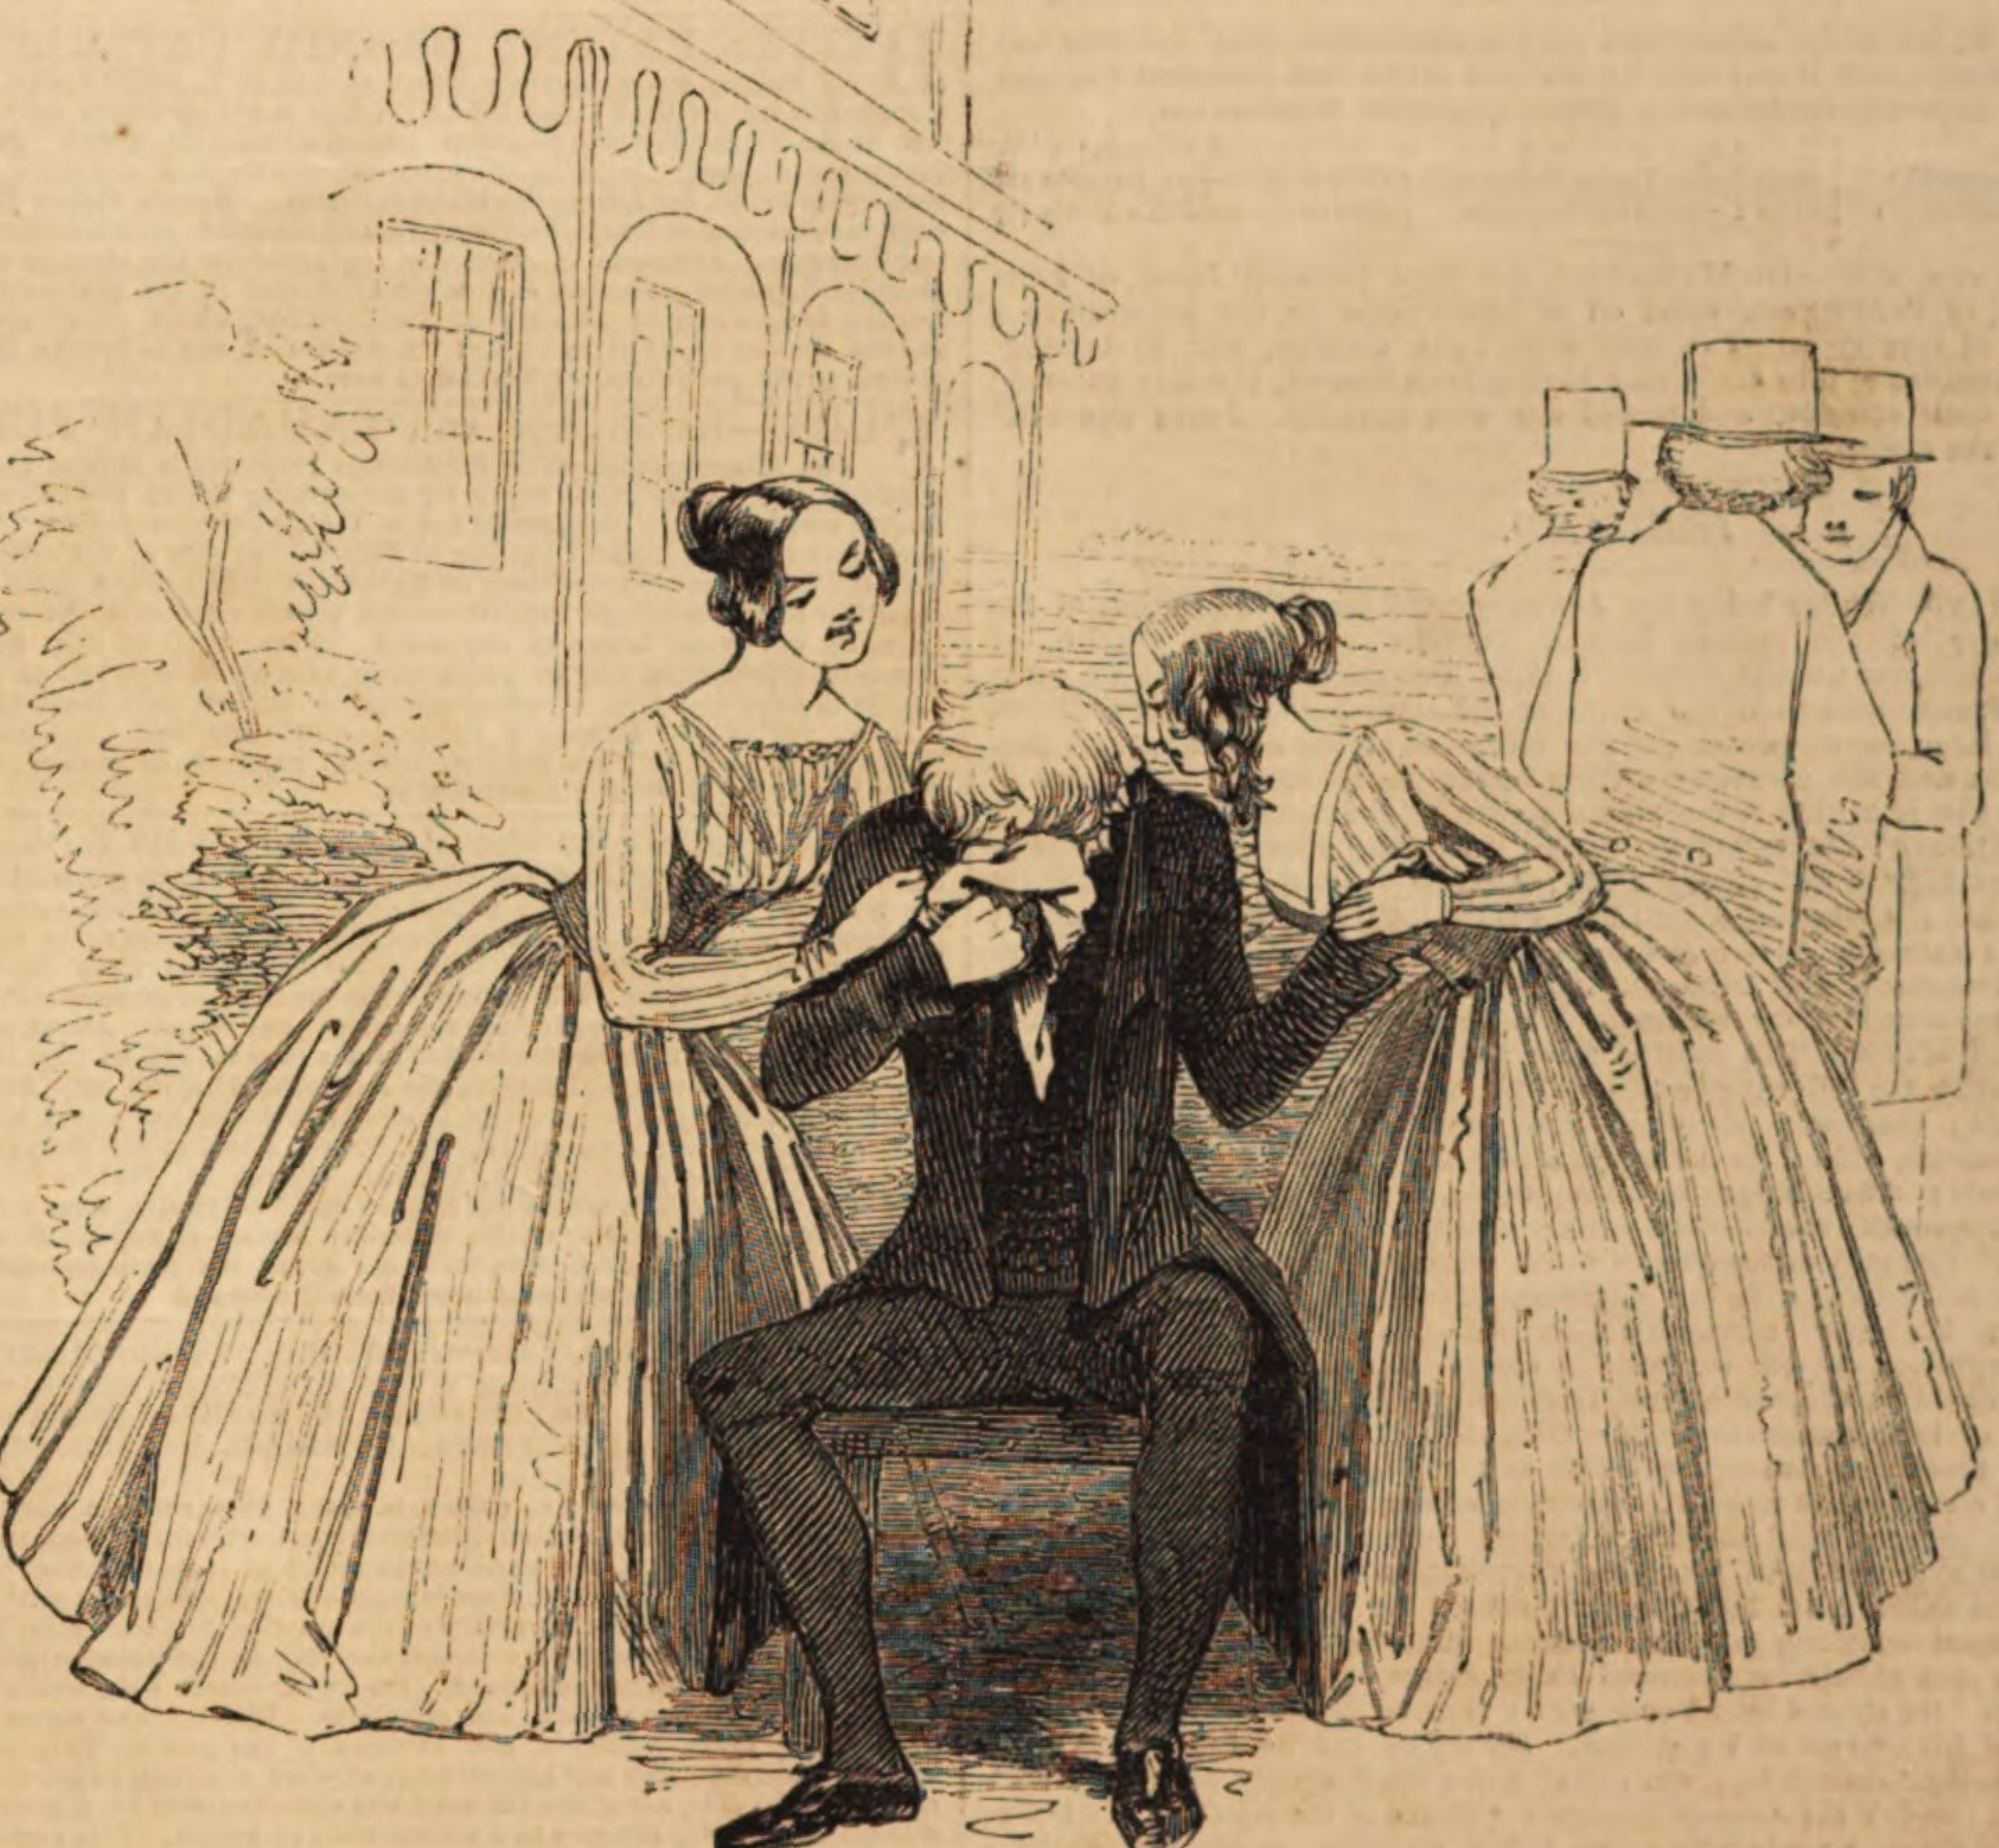
Enter Lady Alice Hawthorn, Littleton Coke, Miss Rocket, and Roebuck, to Rural.

Rur. Aha! at last they are here, my blest ones, and I am free—give me your hands.

Roe. When you have severed our hearts for ever.

Rur. Eh!

Kate. Oh, Sir, you have destroyed the only hope of my existence.



SCENE FROM THE NEW COMEDY OF "OLD HEADS AND YOUNG HEARTS," AT THE HAYMARKET THEATRE.

Rur. What!

Lady A. What could have actuated you to such a deed; or did you betray us to the Earl and the Colonel, and agree to compromise us into obedience.

Rur. Bless me,—Littleton—

Lit. Do not look to me for help.

Rur. I—ah—(aside) the rascal is keeping up the joke because the old people are here.

Lady A. Exonerate yourself, Sir.

Rur. Ha!

Roe. What excusec an you—

Rur. Ha! ha!

Kate. You could not have mistaken.

Rur. Ha! ha! ha!

Lit. Can you not see, Sir, this is reality?

Rur. Ha! ha—(chokes a laugh) ha!

Lit. Is my ruin a subject for your mirth?

Rur. Ha! ha! (in wonder, but continuing to laugh.)

Lady A. It is inhuman!

Rur. Ah! ah! ah!

Lit. Or have you—yes, her suspicions are true, and you have betrayed me.

Rur. Ah! ah! ah!

Lit. And over such a deed you can laugh. Farewell for ever.

[Rural bursts into a paroxysm of hysterical and convulsive laughter, Lady Alice Hawthorn runs to Rural on one side, Miss Rocket on the other, while Roebuck and Littleton Coke walk up and down on opposite sides.

Lady A. Don't weep, it was no fault of yours. You would have aided our love if our foolish young hearts had not puzzled your kind old head.

Rur. He's gone! he's gone!

Lit. No, my dear friend, pardon my cruelty to you: I have slighted your affection—(looking at Lady A.)—and for what?

Rur. My heart, but I have ruined you.

Lit. No!

Rur. I have, I know I have; I have ruined my child—my—oh! forgive me, will you Littleton?

NATIONAL SPORTS.

Woodcraft, as our forefathers used to call the occupations of the sportsmen, is now busied with its winter work—or, to speak by the letter, afield—hunting, coursing, shooting, and certain river angling, being in full practice. The chace has commenced in earnest in "the provincial counties," as the Melton people designate every hunting district except their own; but Leicestershire being the cream of ton, has not yet put forth its pomp and circumstance. Fashion hath its degrees geometrical and chronometical; thus, your country squire dines at four, your courtly gallant at eight. In Finsbury-square winter begins in November, in Park lane in May. The old Surrey open their season on Michaelmas Day, the Quorn at Christmas, or thereabouts. Coursers are less fastidious; they ply their trade from October to March, and, as the ill-natured assert, at other times beside. The leash was never our especial sport, even with a wild Grampian ditch, and such gaze-hounds fleet and true as Caledonia delights to slip on the quarry: but for those who bait the plethoric wretches of Bushy-park with luxurious loungers from their parlour firesides, we hold tarring and feathering as too good. A gentleman may fish at Twickenham—if he likes—and according to the keepers of places of entertainment in that region, there is just now "glorious sport to be had by the lovers of the angle," a fact which cannot be doubted, considering the uninterested source from which it emanates. While, however, these are enjoying themselves in their various degrees, we will review the proposals and prospects of summer sporting—the state of the turf, and its contingencies for the coming year.

When racing first assumed the character of a national sport, it was solely in the hands of the aristocracy: the mighty of the land alone supported it—and to them was left the direction of all its details. It has grown into a democratical occupation, a popular pastime in the widest sense of the epithet—and an important agent of a great branch of our rural statistics: it is still wholly under the controul of class management: this is wrong, and if suffered to continue, it will be ruinous. With great consideration for the majority of the members of the Jockey Club in their capacity of citizens and gentlemen—as a body it is undoubtedly the most wrong-headed society in existence. It is no worse, as we conscientiously believe, but the world is fast getting into a very different way of thinking, and, we are bound to admit, not without cause. The suppression of the evidence adduced on the Ratan inquiry was a most unwise course. The pretence of expense preventing its being published was quite "too bad," as if any one of the sporting papers, or rather all, would not have been too happy to have done so gratis. We cannot trust ourselves to speak of the laches of Messrs. Crommelin and Ives in not availing themselves of the privilege of clearing the doubts about their connexion with Messrs. Rogers and Braham, by calling for the publication of the evidence. Did the Jockey Club suppose they would? And now, in the face of a rule of the Club, passed in October, 1842, declaring that, for the future, it would never interfere on the subject of bets, we have an announcement that "all persons who do not settle their accounts standing in the late Mr. Crockford's book shall be declared defaulters, and treated accordingly." This has been made public through their organ, the "Racing Calendar;" and here, by means of a channel of public communication, which stands in such relation to it as the Mississippi to Fleet-ditch, we declare that the honour of the Jockey Club is dependent upon the immediate showing of the state of those accounts. If, as the current belief is, members of that body are deeply interested in this settlement—if the average of these accounts stands on the creditor side of those parties—the step the Club has taken will be its final blow and fatal discouragement. We will not go into the question of the moral or social convenience of the system of betting on horse-racing—we deal with it as we find it—such is the province of a journalist. In that capacity we ask, why is not better care taken to superintend the interests of those who invest their money in such a speculation? There is hardly a merchant in the City but sports his "pony" on the Derby; many—such is the fact—who embark very serious ventures on the great races of the year. These look with much anxiety for the returns from Tattersall's—the turf exchange—and find all the daily papers of this vast metropolis, like the four Kings of Brentford (if there were so many), smelling at the same nosegay; Times, Herald, Chronicle, and Post, uniting in sweet concord of opinion on all matters connected with racing. The time cannot be remote when the West-end money articles will receive some of the attention now monopolised by the East: the public ought not to rest satisfied with vague statements that a horse is at such and such a price; they must be told by whom he is backed. The weight of business is transacted at Tattersall's, as at all marts of traffic by regular brokers. When we find that the prices of favourites are regulated by the operations of Messrs. Gally, Cloves, Ives, Clarke, Justice Hill, Hargrieves, and so forth, we shall know what to think of their real character, and how to separate the bond from the mala fides.

TATTERSALL'S.

MONDAY.—Our report this afternoon must be the same that it will be throughout the winter months, viz.—a thin attendance, and a flat market, with no results of sufficient importance to call for more than a table of the averages at the close:—

PRIZE-FIGHT FOR £20.—On Wednesday, the fight between Jones, of London, and Lawlor, of Paddington, came off at Greenhithe, in the presence of a large concourse of spectators. The men were light weights, and in betting Jones was the favourite at 6 to 4. A ring having been formed, the men entered accompanied by their seconds, and waged war with severity. Jones was ultimately declared the victor.

IRELAND.

THE RENT DAY.—Sunday being the day appointed for the collection of the O'Connell tribute at the various Roman Catholic chapels in Dublin, of course every exertion was used to procure a good amount of rent. At an early hour the tax-collectors took their old stand at the several chapel doors, armed with formidably large pewter-plates for the reception of the offerings, and furnished with tables and the necessary writing apparatus to record the names of liberal donors. The following is the official return of the sums collected, so far as could be ascertained:—Metropolitan parish, including receipts applicable to the credits of that district and office, £536; Andrew's parish, £457; Michael and John's, £255; Catherine's, £140; Paul's, £100; Michan's, £209; Nicholas, £180; James's, £140; Andrew's, £90; Rathmines, £160; Donnybrook, £72; Kingstown and adjuncts, £140; Sundries, £255. Several parishes have not yet sent in their returns. The aggregate will probably be between £3000 and £4000. The returns from the provincial towns, up to the present period, show the following results:—The amount from Cork city is £755; Waterford, £400; Drogheda, £210; Belfast, £200; Carrick-on-Suir, £188: Navan, £90; Thurles, £90; Enniscorthy, £90; Kells, £60; Mullingar, £93; Clones, £50; Caher, £64; Kilguade, £40; Ferns, £33; Dunboyne, £30.

THE REPEAL ASSOCIATION.—The weekly meeting on Monday last was very thinly attended. The only circumstance worth notice was the reading of a letter from Mr. O'Connell referring to Mr. Sharman Crawford's plan of Federalism. Mr. O'Connell in his letter expressed his decided opposition to the plan, which he said, in his opinion, did not contain one single principle or matter of detail which ought or could be adopted by the Irish people in their noble struggle for the restoration of Irish nationality. Mr. O'Connell in his letter proceeds to say, "I may be greatly mistaken, but as far as I can form a hasty opinion, Mr. Crawford's plan seems to me to be an elaborate scheme to make matters worse than they are at present, and to reduce Ireland from a nominal equality with England to a real and vexatious provincial degradation. But there is one thing quite certain, and that is, that Mr. Crawford should be treated with the utmost courtesy and respect—nothing personal, nothing offensive should be said to him or of him. His plan should be discussed in language of perfect politeness and unmixed civility. He should be argued with; reasons should be given for the condemnation of his scheme of legislation. No cry should be raised—no nickname, as 'Federalist,' should be given; that name itself should be treated with becoming regard; and, if the Association agree with me in the rejection of his Federalism, let us do it in a mode which can inflict no pain, or create irritation; above all, let us do nothing which could discourage others from following the manly example he has given of laying his plan boldly and in detail before the Irish public." The rent for the week was announced to be £337.

ATTEMPTED CAPTURE OF GAMBLERS.—Considerable commotion was caused on Wednesday evening by an attempted capture of gamblers in the neighbourhood of Leicester-square by the police, under the direction of the superintendent of the C division of police. To effect an entry into those dens of infamy, the police have generally to resort to stratagem, in order to prevent an alarm being given; but, although their plans are usually well organised, they were not successful on this occasion in effecting their object, for before the caption and breaking into the establishment could be effected, the whole of the inmates succeeded in making their escape. The house in question adjoins Mr. Burford's Panorama, in Leicester-square, and it appears that the gamblers having by some means received intimation of the intended visit, lost no time in beating a retreat by taking to the roofs of the adjoining houses, from which they rushed into the lower apartments, to the great terror of the occupants, and gained the open street. One of the fellows had a narrow escape, by dropping on to the skylight of the Panorama, but fortunately he did not fall through, otherwise he would, probably, have been killed on the spot; as it was, he broke several squares of glass, and did considerable damage. He then clambered up the circular roof of the building, and jumped into the window of the adjoining house, which was open at the time, and ran down the stairs into the shop (a bonnet establishment), where he encountered three young women, who demanded his business, and by what means he entered the premises. The man offered a sum of money if they would allow him to escape, but seeing a crowd collecting in the street, he suddenly pushed them on one side and got clear off by taking to his heels and running at his utmost speed down Bear-street.

IMPORTANT to the FASHIONABLE WORLD.—By far the most influential of all the graces that contribute to personal adornment, is the Hair. Its recovery, preservation, and improvement, proportionably concern the elegantés of our fashionable circles, and any information which will ensure these desirable results will be hailed as an inestimable boon. The following extract from the letter of a respectable chemist in Bridlington, will be read with the highest interest:—"A lady, a customer of mine, has found great benefit from the use of your Balm. About six months ago her hair nearly all fell off. I recommended her to try your BALM of COLUMBIA, which she did. In the course of a few applications the hair ceased to fall off. Before she had used one 3s. 6d. bottle, it began to grow very profusely, and she has now a beautiful head of hair.—I am, gentlemen, yours, respectfully, WM. SMITH, Chemist and Druggist, Market-place, Bridlington. To Messrs. C. and A. Oldridge, March 13, 1844."—C. and A. OLDRIDGE'S BALM of COLUMBIA causes the Hair to curl beautifully, frees it from scurf, and stops it from falling off; and a few bottles generally restore it again. It also prevents greyness. 3s. 6d., 6s., and 11s. per bottle; no other prices are genuine.—OLDRIDGE'S BALM.—1, Wellington-street; the second house from the Strand.

COD LIVER OIL.—Another extraordinary case of Cure, with additional Testimony of the extraordinary value of this natural remedy in the CURE of GOUT, RHEUMATISM, SCROFULA, DISEASED JOINTS, SPINAL and GLANDULAR AFFECTIONS, LUMBAGO, SCROFULOUS ULCERS, and other external Diseases:—

OPINION OF DR. BREFELD, WITH REMARKABLE CASE OF CURE.

The Oil is of the greatest benefit in cases where the Gout or Rheumatism appear to have seized upon the whole system, and when, as the result of long suffering, the body is wasted, the process of nutrition very slow, there is want of sleep, loss of the vital powers, languid expression of the countenance, contraction of the muscles, &c. &c. Mrs. Mearman, 30 years old, had been confined to her bed, or room, and only in the warm summer months experienced a slight alleviation of her sufferings. Nearly the whole body was attacked, but principally the inferior extremities, back, and shoulders. Walking was entirely prevented by the insupportable pains, stiffness, and swelling of the joints. This patient was wasted, of a bleachy whiteness, and had lost all hope of relief, although originally of a strong and robust constitution. The use of the Oil daily was soon followed by a beneficial result, and, after some time, she was restored to a perfect state of health. This person was, three years from the time he first saw her, perfectly healthy, well nourished, blooming, and of robust appearance.

Sold in bottles, at 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., and 11s. each, by JONES and Co., 201, Strand: SANGER, Oxford-street; HOOPER, chemist, Pall-mall; JOHNSTONE, Cornhill; and all respectable Medicine-vendors in Town and Country.

CAUTION—Observe the seal and address of JONES and CO., 201, STRAND, on the wrapper.

MICHELET'S HISTORY of FRANCE. TRANSLATED by G. H. SMITH, F.G.S., with Notes, &c. PART I. Comprising the RACES and the PROVINCES of FRANCE.

"Michelet's History has only to be translated to become one of the most popular books ever published. The author is a man of the highest genius; his erudition is wonderful, and he is at once philosophic and dramatic, uniting the severest judgment to the most facile and delicate imagination. His history is thus not only a succession of faithful pictures but a series of the profoundest deductions. The modern French School of History, comprising as it does, amongst many illustrious names, those of Thiers, Guizot, and Thierry, is deservedly acknowledged as the first in Europe, and at the head of it we should certainly place Monsieur Michelet."—Monthly Magazine.

the honour of being first allowed to introduce the Polka at the Nobilities' Balls, and thus created a complete revolution in the Soirées Dansantes of the Haut Ton, begs most respectfully to announce that he has just published the original MAZURKA and the CELLARIUS VALSE, which are this season quite à-la-mode in the salons of Paris, and arrives to form with the Polka a second change to the Quadrille and Valse, which for so long a time have formed the only dances of all our balls. Jullien's first publication of the music of the Polka imitations without end have been sent forth to the public, calculated to mislead those who were anxious to learn that delightful dance; he has therefore been obliged to adopt the method of personally signing each copy of his works, and his patrons may therefore be certain that none can be genuine which do not bear his autograph.

On the 1st of December next will be issued, to be continued monthly, large 8vo., price 2s. 6d. sewed, Part I. of the HISTORY OF THE FRENCH REVOLUTION.

By Mons. THIERS, late Minister of War in France, &c. Translated from the last Paris edition (the Twelfth, in 10 vols. 8vo.), containing the author's latest emendations and corrections, and the entire appendixes, "Pièces Justicatifes," &c. To which will be added, by the English translator, for the first time, a copious index of persons and events. It is expected the entire translation will not exceed eight parts, at 2s. 6d. each.

. This celebrated work was originally published in Paris, in 1824 and 1825, and since then has passed through twelve editions, being considered as the best written, and the most authentic and statesmanlike history of the great and extraordinary events of which it treats, and is supposed to have been one of the causes of Mons. Thiers being subsequently exalted to the high political honour of Minister of France. The publishers of the present edition issued a translation of the first three volumes on its first appearance. This will be carefully corrected and re-translated where necessary, and the subsequent volumes faithfully translated from the last edition; and as it is a work of considerable bulk, every facility will be afforded for reference, by means of an index, head-lines, dates, and notes. The entire work will be given, and the translation rendered with the utmost fidelity.

Also, in order to perfect the foregoing, the continuation and completion of the work under the following title, will be issued immediately it is published in Paris, uniform, in Parts, at 2s. 6d. each,

The HISTORY of the CONSULATE and EMPIRE of NAPOLEON.

THE HAND-BOOK TO THE PIANOFORTE, comprising an easy Rudimental Introduction to the study of that Instrument and Music in General; the Art of Fingering, according to the modes of the best Masters, exemplified in various Exercises, Scales, &c., in all the Major and Minor Keys; and interspersed by Relaxations from Study, consisting of Popular Melodies and Romances, and Selections from Pianoforte compositions of some of the most celebrated Masters. Also, a short and easy Introduction to Harmony or Counterpoint, and a New Vocabulary of Terms. By J. AUGUSTINE WADE, Author of "The Dwellings of Fancy;" "Songs of the Flowers;" "The Two Houses of Grenada," an Opera; "The Prophecy," an Oratorio, &c. &c.

"From the first 'example' to the last 'exercise,' everything is brought before the learner in the clearest manner, and the means of conquering each new difficulty as it arises literally placed at his fingers' ends. Indeed, after carefully digesting some sixty pages, and mastering the 'digital' and other exercises here given, he need not fear the thickest army of semi-demi-semis, or the most whimsically-noted passage of the most gifted manipulator of the key-board. The work comprises, in addition, a brief and excellent treatise on the elements of harmony, developing the laws of composition in a simple and sound manner; and we altogether warmly recommend the book to public favour."—Literary Gazette, October 19.

"The book now before us is the most admirable instance we have ever met with of a man acknowledged as a poet and composer condescending to construct a threshold to harmony. Mr. Wade has written the best first book we ever read."—Sunday Times.

"This is one of the best works of musical instruction which has been brought under our notice; the author unites an earnest love of music with sound knowledge of the art, and has, therefore, given a life and animation to his lessons, which relieve the dry and technical details of teaching."—The League, October 12.

TO LADIES.—ROWLAND'S KALYDOR, for the SKIN and COMPLEXION. This Royally Patronized and universally adopted Specific is composed chiefly of extracts from the most rare flowers and herbs of an eastern clime, and perfectly free from all mineral admixture. It exerts the most soothing, gentle, cooling, and purifying action on the skin; and most effectually dissipates all Redness, Tan, Pimples, Blotches, Spots, Freckles, and other Cutaneous Visitations. The radiant bloom it imparts to the Cheek, and the softness and delicacy it induces on the Hands, Arms and Neck, render it indispensable to every toilet. It affords immediate relief in cases of Sunburn, Stings of Insects, or incidental Inflammation. Price 4s. 6d. and 8s. 6d. per bottle, duty included.

CAUTION.—Many Shopkeepers vend the most spurious trash under the title of "Genuine" Kalydor, containing mineral astringents utterly ruinous to the complexion, and by their repellant action endangering health. It is therefore imperative on purchasers to see that the words "ROWLAND'S KALYDOR" are on the Wrapper; and A. ROWLAND & SON, 20, Hatton Garden, engraved (by Authority) on the Government Stamp affixed on each bottle. . All others are Fraudulent Counterfeits!

OPENING of the NEW ROYAL EXCHANGE.—Future

English Historians have a fine field for elegant narration in recording the gorgeous spectacle of Queen Victoria opening the New Royal Exchange. The tens of thousands who witnessed this ever memorable event, when they beheld their Queen, it was as if the very windows spoke; such eager looks, such vivid, sparkling, animated eyes, gazing with rapture on the glorious scene! while the all-attractive charms of the fair actresses shone resplendent in their power, and the white and swan-like neck, the rich, luxuriant tress, and the pearly set of teeth, formed admirable trophies of the Inestimable Qualities of ROWLAND'S KALYDOR, ROWLAND'S MACASSAR OIL, and ROWLAND'S ODONTO The august patronage conceded by our gracious Queen, and the several Sovereigns of Europe, together with the beauties which adorn the circles of princely and regal magnificence; and the confirmation, by experience, of the infallible efficacy of these creative, renovative Specifics, have characterised them with perfection, and given them a celebrity unparalleled. They have proved the theme of the poet; they are celebrated in the periodical literature of the whole civilised world: the lays of Byron, and the voice of the universal press, have proclaimed the incomparable virtues of the "Oil Macassar," and of its accompanying preparations.—Evening Paper.

INTERESTING TO LADIES.

To Messrs. ROWLAND and SON, 20, Hatton-garden, London.

Percy-place, Landport, Portsmouth, April 4th, 1844.

Gentlemen,—I think it but an act of justice to inform you of the benefit I have derived from the use of your admirable Macassar Oil. About six months ago I found my hair getting daily more weak and thin, and much discoloured from a practice I had adopted of wetting it continually; fearing that I should lose it entirely, and hearing of the efficacy of your Macassar Oil, I have for some time past constantly used it, and the result is, that my hair is now perfectly restored and much improved in appearance and colour, having become thick, dark, and glossy; it also curls freely without the use of paper, which it never did before. To all my friends I have warmly recommended your Macassar Oil as an excellent restorative and preservative for the hair. As I have an objection to see my name in print, I beg you will not publish it; but you are at liberty to show this letter, or make any other use you please of it, and refer applicants to me, if necessary, in proof of the efficacy of your Macassar Oil. Your obedient servant, * * * * * * * * * * *

ROWLAND'S MACASSAR OIL preserves and reproduces the Hair; prevents it from falling off or turning Grey; changes Grey Hair to its Original Colour; frees it from Scurf and Dandriff, and makes it beautifully soft and curly.

Ask for ROWLAND'S MACASSAR OIL." All others are FRAUDULENT COUNTERFEITS.

ECLIPSE OF THE MOON ON SUNDAY, NOV 24, 1844.

TOTAL ECLIPSE OF THE MOON.

On Sunday next, the 24th of November, a great, total, and, we hope, visible Eclipse of the Moon will take place; and it will occur, too, at an hour when most families may watch its progress without inconvenience. Instead, however, of waiting until this phenomenon shall have passed, it will be more interesting to give, prospectively, an illustration of its most striking appearances.

The second engraving shows a section across the shadow of the Earth, with the penumbra, at the orbit of the Moon, drawn in true proportions, as it will be at the time the Moon will pass through it, and, consequently, be eclipsed.

The horizontal line A. B. represents the Ecliptic, or level of the orbit of the Earth, supposed to be extended infinitely as a datum plane; and along which the centre, or axis of the Earth's shadow, moves from right to left.

The line C. D. represents the orbit of the Moon, which is inclined to that of the Earth; the motion of the Moon being from right to left.

The dark circle is a section across the shadow of the Earth, and the outer circle shows the limit of the penumbra at the Moon's orbit.

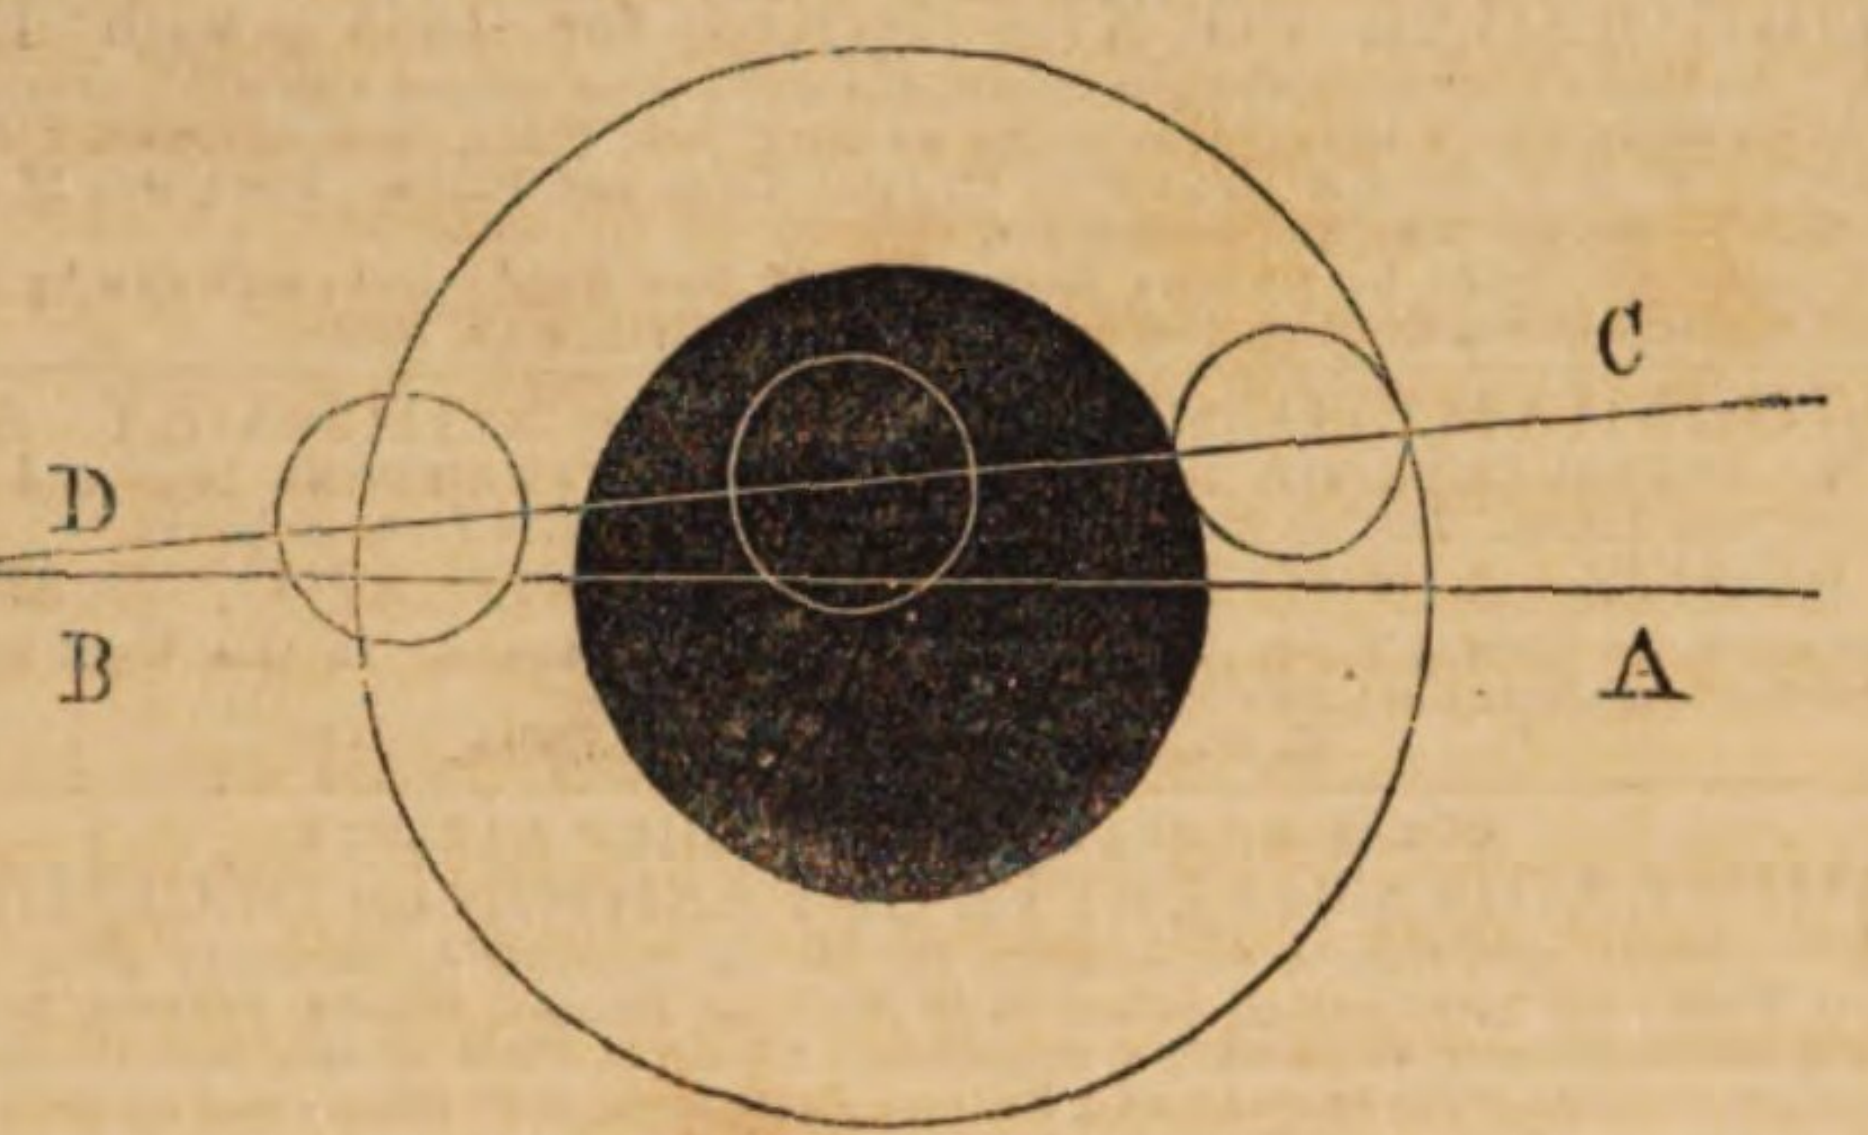
Now an Eclipse of the Moon can only occur when she is near that part of her orbit which intersects the Ecliptic, and when that part happens to be near the shadow; such was the case in May last, and will be again on Sunday next. In May, the Moon, during the Eclipse, was south, or below the Ecliptic; but, at the time of the next Eclipse, she will be north, at about the same distance, or latitude, above the Ecliptic.

The small circle on the right shows the place of the Moon at the moment of the first contact with the shadow, at 9h. 49m. 36s.; hence, the shadow will first be seen on the left side of the Moon, rather towards the lower part.

The third circle on the left shows the advanced position of the Moon at 13h. 39m. 24s., the moment at which she will be clear from the shadow; hence the shadow will appear to go off the Moon on the right hand, towards the lower part.

The small circle in the middle shows the exact place of the Moon at the middle of the Eclipse; hence the upper part of the Moon will most likely, even at this stage, be visible; but, possibly, the lower part may not, as it will be in the central darkness of the cone of shadow.

But it may be asked why the Moon on the left in the diagram is not shown in contact with the shadow, as it is intended to show its true place at that moment? It must, however, be recollected that while the Moon advances in her orbit, the Earth, with her shadow, also advances in hers; and that, though they go the same way, they move at different rates. The reader will thus imagine that while the Moon will go from the first to the last position, as shown, the Earth's shadow will travel just so far as to be in contact with the Moon, that being the moment when they separate.



ECLIPSE.

The first engraving represents successive periods in the advance and retreat of the shadow.

The Eclipse, commencing at Greenwich at 10 minutes before 10 o'clock at night, Fig 1 shows its appearance at 4 minutes past 10; Fig 2, at 17 minutes past 10; Fig 3, at 30 minutes past 10; Fig 4, at 44 minutes past 10. Fig 5 exhibits the aspect of the Moon, during the time of the total Eclipse, when the Moon will appear of a dull red colour, which will be from 58 minutes past 10 until 31 minutes past 12. A NOVEMBER FOG IN LONDON.

TIME, THURSDAY AFTERNOON LAST. SCENE, TEMPLE-BAR.

Did'st note the day? 'Twas Thursday by the week,
And of November's dreary month near end,
(Though bootless seem'd all calendar account, Heav'n look'd so out of keeping with all seasons)
How darkness spread above—around—o'er all
Our visible horizon. One might deem Innumerable chimnies' sooty vapours
And countless myriad-breathings of humanity,
And smoke of many battles upward roll'd,
And hundreds of steam navies' varied belchings,
And every dank, terraqueous exhalation
This planet could give birth to—wove together,
In the vast universal loom of space,
To make a sombre shroud for this fair world.

And flick'ring flames of weak, unwonted gas,
Mixing night's semblance with the noontide's business,
Gleam'd gloomily athwart the crowded ways,
Lighting the busy sons of Toil and Care,
As on they plodded, all in search of wealth
Or competence, or that small hard-won pittance
Too often sought in vain by o'er-worked want
Or gaunt necessity. Still were essayed
All this life's avocations as they might:
Unheeded still prevailed, the darkness visible.
As glibly glided grandeur's gilded wheels,
Guided by flashing globes' prismatic gleams.
Commerce her sails shook out, and plied her oars
With lanthorns lash'd to yard-arm, mast, and bow;
And bustling Traffic in her noisy marts,
By torchlight traded, self-engross'd as ever,
Within her always dimly-lighted halls,
Now doubly, trebly darkened, Justice sate,
And by the taper's beams dispensed her rescripts.
But ever and anon the ochreish atmosphere
Would for a moment briefly lighten up
With a faint sickly hue, as if the throes
Of an expiring sun were working through it
In intermittent gleams—whose vital struggles,
By the dense circumambient opaque
Together quenching light and life, were smother'd:
And thus again deeper cimmerian darkness
Enveloped all things with a power renewed.

The dismal day crept on; noon followed morn,
Evening succeeded noon, and twilight came,
And melted into night;—yet no one marked
The intervening shades that shew their progress;
'Twas Morn – Noon—Evening—Twilight—Night—all blent
Into an unknown quantity's proportion
Of Nature's Subdivision of Old Time;
An undistinguishable Unit Day
Merged in Eternity's all countless Sum.

Methought at that dull moment in the Town,
It was a Life, aye, more than passing sweet,
For those whose happy lot was cast amid
The pure clear air, and sunny azure skies
Of Rural Scenes; whose wilful wand'rings were Through pleasant fields begirt by lucid streams;
Inhaling all the thousand od'rous breaths
Of fragrant shrubs and flowers wildly growing:
Whose only shadow was a fleeting cloud,
Or the umbrageous foliage of the groves:
And who could watch the variegated woods
Their Autumn clothing gradually doff,
Ere the departing year prepared to shed
The Winter's hoary honours thick upon them?
Such simple, natural, unsophisticated
Innocent joys as these, are not, alas!
For men who dwell in busy, smoky, London. N. C.

DENSE FOG IN THE METROPOLIS.

November had almost passed away, and people began to think that in these times of innovation, there had been a change in this respect. On Thursday afternoon, however, this unwelcome visitant presented the compliments of the season in "form so palpable," that we believe the often quoted person, the "Oldest Inhabitant," never saw anything so dense. To say that darkness was visible would be to give but a faint idea of the aspect of things about seven o'clock. It was literally pitch dark, and therefore numbers of persons in all directions very appropriately lighted torches. In Fleet-street and the Strand, and the public thoroughfares, there was "confusion worse confounded." The omnibuses and other vehicles were obliged to proceed at a creeping pace, and foot-passengers, particularly timid ones, were detained some time at the crossings. Even in well-lighted streets, persons lost their way, for it was utterly impossible to see a yard in advance, and the gas-lights were totally eclipsed. In fact locomotion was almost impossible. Most of the omnibuses and cabs had torches, and the old-fashioned cry of "light, your honour" resounded at almost every step, men and boys having sallied forth in a strong force to try and earn an honest penny by endeavouring to counteract the effects of the fog. Happily no accident occurred, so far as we could learn, but it is long since there has been such a dangerous evening for travelling.

RAILWAY MISMANAGEMENT.

ANOTHER frightfully fatal proof that a great power mismanaged becomes a great mischief, has just occurred; it is one more added to the many lessons that have been given by the saddest kind of experience, of the necessity of perpetual watchfulness and scrupulous care in those who have the control of that agent so obedient to command, but so terrible when that control is withdrawn or suspended—steam.

In proportion to the vast number of passengers daily conveyed along the lines that now cover the surface of the country as it were with a network of iron, and the distance they are carried, the accidents that do occur from a collision of trains are exceedingly few. The loss of life from accidents arising from the working of railroads is far less than that formerly caused by the casualties to which the coaching system was continually liable. But, on the other hand, when a railway accident does occur, it is generally so awful in its nature, and so shocking in its details, that it creates a ten times greater impression on the public mind, and leaves a conviction behind that, with all its unquestionable advantages, steam is a perilous power to travel by. No people are more alive to the ill effects of this feeling on the part of the public than railway directors, and even if they were insensible to it from a want of perception, they would soon be taught it by their account of receipts. They are, therefore, generally careful in their management "choose trusty officers, keep careful watch;" punctuality, swiftness of transit, and safety are confidently expected, and with few exceptions realised. But when the exception comes it is a striking one, and, we fear, can generally be traced to a lax observance or neglect of the rules that tend to secure the better result. Some such want of precaution is perceptible in the catastrophe on the Midland Counties line.

The circumstances are briefly these. According to what seems to be "customary" at the Nottingham station, a coal train, which had arrived there about two o'clock in the day, had been moved from the down line to that on which the up trains travel. In doing this, the tender slipped off the rail, and was damaged, when about forty yards above the Wilford Gate. The coal waggons, in consequence of their great weight, could not be moved; in order, therefore, to intercept the Derby train due at Nottingham at three o'clock, one of the officers of the railway went to the Beeston station, understanding that no train would be started on the road up till he had returned to Nottingham again. Therefore—

> He joined the stoker upon the engine, and proceeded on for Nottingham, at the rate of about four miles an hour. This caution was highly ne-cessary, as a thick fog prevented the stoker seeing more than a few yards before him, and it was probable that some obstruction might be met with on the line. Having proceeded at this easy pace about three quarters of a mile, they heard the rumbling of wheels, and the next moment they were thrown from their elevation by a most violent concussion.

In spite of the supposed understanding, the up train to London was started

> At about 20 minutes to three. The stoker, not having had sufficient instruction, or being reckless as to the consequences, caused the train to proceed at the rate of about thirty miles an hour, notwithstanding that he knew he was on the wrong line. When the two trains met, it thus appears that the down train was travelling at a slow pace, whilst the other was proceeding with great velocity.

The one great fault here was placing the up-train on the down line, and then running it at a rapid rate, "without sufficient instruction, or being reckless of consequences." The first supposition we believe to be the true one; it was ignorance; there had not been enough precaution taken in the first place, and this, in conjunction with the unfortunate accident of there being a dense fog at the time, the two trains advancing towards each other, did not perceive their mutual danger till it was too late to avoid it. One instant all was apparent safety—the next saw wood and iron "crushed like eggshells," and all around a scene of shrieking, confusion, and dismay; with loss of life and limb, the full consequences of which cannot yet be known.

Granting that the railway system has, in the comparatively short time since it was called into existence, made a great approach to perfection, still while absolute safety is possible to be attained, we ought not to rest satisfied with what has been effected: "much has been done, but more remains to do." The main cause of this calamity was the want of a clear understanding of what was being done at two different points at the same moment. Science has discovered modes of communicating words, with the rapidity of thought, through darkness and distance; there can be no good reason why the Electric Telegraph should not be generally adopted on every line, and the officers at each station may converse with each other without being subject to the uncertainty of messages to and fro. Expence may be an obstacle, but one such accident as this causes a loss of many hundred pounds, and any plan by which such an expenditure of capital could be saved, would be economical. By daylight there is not much danger of a collision. In the present case, for instance, could the conductors have seen the approaching train, a stoppage could have been effected. But darkness and fogs are as natural as day and sunshine, and must be provided for. The present system of signals might perhaps be improved; they contain the germ of what is required, consisting of lights for the eye, and sounds for the ear when lights are not used. But it is evident, that shrill as the whistle of the engine is, it cannot at a distance, and in the dark, do more than apprise another that it is advancing; it does not give any information as to which line the train is running on. An improvement is wanted in this respect, and in some others. But, above and beyond all the aid that can be derived from physical science, are the moral qualities of scrupulous attention and caution. If, after every possible means have been taken to ensure safety, an accident does happen, there is at least a satisfaction in knowing that, as far as human power could avert it, that power was exercised. In the present instance, we fear that consolation does not exist. It has been stated that the officers of the company had two codes of regulations, the same on most points, but differing in some others. Some had the new, some the old ones; the driver of the train that was going at the most rapid rate, on the wrong line, through a dense fog, had not seen the new regulations at all; he was supplied with them the day after the accident! All this must be avoided for the future. We have overcome one of the things that appeared to place the greatest obstacle in the way of using steam for the purpose of travelling by land; we scarcely ever hear of an accident from its explosive power on any of the lines of road; having conquered that difficulty, shall we fail in the minor point of regulating it? It is one of the most remarkable qualities of this mighty agent, that it is so perfectly under control; an engine of the highest power is more completely under the command of the engineer, than a team of horses is to the best of coachmen. But, on the other hand, any error or neglect in its management is almost fatal.

There is a class of railroad accidents that cannot be prevented; all that arise from the want of individual caution, such as getting out of a train before it stops, or jumping in after it is in motion—these cause frequent casualties, but they arise from no fault of the system, to which all must adapt themselves, or run the risk of the consequences. But, as far as the management is concerned, we are persuaded that nearly absolute safety might be attained. The whole system is a grand triumph over difficulties apparently insurmountable; it must not present defects caused by ourselves, by a want of that vigilance and energy which has enabled us to create it.

CONSECRATION OF ST. GILES'S CHURCH, CAMBERWELL.

This magnificent structure (the exterior of which will be found engraved in No. 90 of our Journal), was consecrated by the Lord Bishop of Winchester, on Thursday, the 21st inst. Before eleven o'clock, the church was crowded in every part by a congregation of nearly 2000 persons, who were admitted by cards. Amongst them were the Venerable Archdeacon Wilberforce, the Hon. and Rev. Mr. Eden, the Rev. Dr. Vaughan, of Brixton; the Rev. Tenison Cuffe, the Rev. Mr. Anderson, and several other clergymen; Sir John and Lady Pirie, Mr. H. Kemble, M.P., and most of the gentry of the neighbourhood. The Lord Bishop arrived shortly before eleven o'clock, and was received at the door of the church by the Chancellor, Registrar, Vicar, Churchwardens, and was by them conducted to the vestry-room. Having proceeded in his robes to the front of the Communion-table (upon which the vessels for the Holy Communion were placed), the Vicar presented to his Lordship the petition, praying him to consecrate the church. The ceremony, according to the form prescribed, was then proceeded with.

The service was read by the Rev. Mr. Storie, the vicar, and the sermon (a very xcellent discourse) from the 12th chapter of Deuteronomy, v. 5, was preached by his Lordship the Bishop. Mr. Wesley presided at the organ, and those parts of the service which are chanted or sung were performed by the parochial choristers. At the conclusion of the service (about a quarter before two o'clock) the bells—a fine peal of ten, cast at the foundry of Messrs. Mears, of Whitechapel—began to peal, and the Bishop and clergy, and many other gentlemen and their ladies, preceded by the parish authorities with their wands of office, walked to the house of the vicar, in the garden of which, under a temporary apartment, erected as a tent, by Mr. B. Edgington, of the Borough, was laid out a sumptuous repast for 150 persons. Here the company remained for some time, and it was dark before they retired.

This church, which is built on the site of the old one, burnt down in 1841, is a very handsome building—perhaps the most appropriate and elegant building of the kind which has been raised in the neighbourhood of London for some years. It is built of Whitby stone and stone from Caen, in Normandy, in the style of the time of Edward II., when the decorative manner began to be ingrafted on the plainer English Gothic of the earlier ages. The architects are Messrs. Scott and Moffatt, of whom it would be unjust not to say that they have rescued modern church building from the reproach of want of taste and architectural authority, which some recent edifices had brought upon it.

The building consists of a nave, transept, and chancel; a choir, a square tower, ascending from the transept, surmounted with an octagon spire. The length of the nave is 78 feet; of the tower across the transept of the chancel, 42 feet 6 inches. The breadth of the nave, without aisles, is 25 feet 6 inches; with aisles, 58 feet 6 inches. Length of the transept 80 feet; breadth of the chancel 23 feet. The interior height of the nave is 63 feet, and under the tower the height is 50 feet. The external height of the tower and spire is 210 feet.

Of the interior we shall shortly present our readers with an engraving; so that we reserve the details of the architecture, the fine painted glass, &c., save the immediate scene of the Consecration engraved in the preceding page.

The chancel is fitted up with open stalls, with elaborately carved poppy heads, &c., of oak down each side. The floor is of encaustic tiles, of beautiful floriated character, and containing, near the chancel arch, the Royal Arms, and those of the patrons, &c., of the church, emblazoned in their proper heraldic colours, in porcelain. These tiles, manufactured by Messrs. Copeland and Garrett, of Staffordshire, have been by them presented gratuitously to the parish.

Two stone steps lead to the altar-rails, which are of carved oak. The floor within the rails is also laid down with encaustic tiles, but of a different pattern from the rest of the chancel. Another floor, similarly paved, is raised one step above the rest, upon which stands the altar-table; and on the upright edge of this floor is a border of painted porcelain, composed of a beautiful Gothic foliage, combined with the sacred emblems of the Evangelists.

The altar-table itself is a square stone slab, supported by six octagonal pillars, with elegant foliated capitals. The altar-screen, of stone, corresponds with the style of the chancel. It is composed of five pedimented arches, supported on clustered columns, foliated, with capitals of the characteristic foliage of the time, and the abacus with the "Tooth ornament." The outer arches are again divided into two trefoil arches, with pendants; the centre ones have cinquefoil cusps, the featherings of which, as the finials, the crockets, and the trefoil foliage of spandrels, are of the most chaste design and exquisite workmanship. Within the centre arch is an ornamented cross, enclosed in a border, painted on the wall, on either side of which, in the other arches, are the Commandments, the Lord's Prayer, the Creed, &c., beautifully illuminated.

This screen has been executed by Mr. Cox, who was employed by the architects to carve the greater part of the Martyr's Memorial at Oxford. At the back of the screen is the east window, of magnificent stained glass.

The carvings are of unusual beauty, and have been produced by the machine of Mr. S. Pratt, of Bond-street. The designs are cut after some of the most exquisite Gothic remains in various ecclesiastical buildings in England.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

PARISIANA.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Paris, Wednesday.

All Paris has caught cold, the cause, the eclipse, which has behaved with combined incivility and cruelty. After drawing our Parisian gobemouches by thousands out on the quays, the balconies, and roofs of houses, to witness its performances, the phenomenon was totally indiscernible, the sky being covered with clouds until the eclipse was over, when they suddenly dispersed. Eager as we Parisians are after any description of novelty or amusement, you may imagine the disappointment of the crowd of expectant astronomers.

Who has not heard of the heart, found six months ago, in a box of lead, at the Sainte Chapelle, in Paris? "It is the heart of St. Louis," cried the wonder-mongers. Professors of History, Antiquarians, Chemists, Anatomists, Poets, Priests, Archbishops, and Cardinals, immediately entered into a literary battle—speeches, feuilletons, pamphlets, and sermons, were the missiles of the combatants: when all at once came M. Latronne, and with the shafts of satire brought down the glorious superstructure, raised by Gothic learning, religious zeal, and romantic imaginations. The heart proves to have beat in the noble breast of a hairdresser of by-gone days, (nicknamed L'Amour, by his contemporaries) and the re-interment is ordered to take place by the Priest. But one shaft more is thrown amongst the Zealots before the funeral—a poem by the renowned German critic Schlegel, of which the following is a sample:—

In the "holye chapel" was yesterday found
The heart of the barber L'Amour,
His sweetheart, poor girl, who best knew its size,
Determined to place it secure.
Like a right royal heart, on consecrate ground,
So that if looked for, it there might be found.
Is he of the Wigs unknown to fame?
No—Boileau has loudly sung his name.
How the pulpit and barber were closely allied
With full-bottomed, curl, and pig-tail tied.
His heart may be known by its od'rous smell,
Of huile-antique, and pommade doth it tell,
Alive it beat, but for silver and gold,
It now rests in lead in its cerement cold.

Our gobemouches are all agog to behold the Marshal Duke d'Ysly on his return from Algeria—for, lo and behold, he brings with him the choicest specimens of that country. First in the list is the young and handsome son of El-Arrach, who sent the French Governor, in one day alone, 500 pair of ears lately worn in the field by the enemies of France. Then follow the ruling Agas of Constantine, Philippeville, the former secretary of Abdel-Kader, all of them of the rank of Sheiks, and wearing the legion of honour; and last, and not least, is a Toleb, that is to say, a learned man of Arabia. He comes to Paris to study Arabian manuscripts; but no doubt he will favour the ladies by casting nativities even of puppy dogs, and tell them by the stars and the moon why their shoes pinch them in hot weather. The banquet to the Marshal d'Ysly, at Marseilles, was prepared quite à l'Anglaise, with toasts and speeches. The town voted 30,000f. for the occasion, and from the pockets of the subscribers came as much more. Well may Marseilles cry "Io triumphe" for the conquest of Algeria, whose whole resources pass through the hands of its merchants.

The following is said to be the forthcoming list of the new peers—General Marbot, Victor Hugo, the Duke de Praslin, Bertin de Vaux, General Achard, and Baron Deffaudis. The two latter are not yet definitively settled.

The contemplated adoption of a new system of paving has turned half Paris topsy-turvy—created an immense outcry.

The discovery of a Latin poem, by "William Tell," has set our philological antiquaries by the ears. Many have been the presumed contemporary effusions of the land of Schwitz. But it is thought to be the mere forgery, à la Chatterton, by some clever imitator. However, as a set off against the above, a genuine MS. of the 16th century has been brought to light. It contains unedited works of Clément Marot, Theodore of Beza, and also an Epistle of Catherine de Medicis, in the days when young, beautiful, and innocent of the massacre of St. Bartholomew.

Another fossilized human skeleton has been brought forward; but it has been proved the human body does not at any period possess sufficient siliceous matter to produce fossilization. This anthropolite, exhumed at Pantin, near Paris, and over which the discoverer chuckled with so much triumph, will neither discompose the settled opinons of geologists nor theologians.

The new hotel taken by the family of the rich American millionaire, Mr. Thorn, resounds with the noise of the workmen employed in erecting a theatre, in which the élite of Parisian amateurs are invited to perform. An Italian opera by Cappola, "Nina Pazza per Amore," has been selected for the inauguration of this new lyrical temple. The principal part will be taken by the eldest daughter of Mr. Thorn, who was one of the leading stars at the aristocratic concerts of Prince de la Moskowa.

Music, however, is not the only art now taken up and practised with marvellous success by the higher classes of society. Painting shares the same honour.

Since the incursion of the polka new life has been given to the danse de societé, which languished under the monotonous sway of the quadrille. Our lions and dandies, however, destine even the polka to an untimely death, in their new-born enthusiasm for the mazurka. The difficulty of this dance will, however, prove an obstacle to its adoption in general society. Cellarius has just invented a new waltz, which is to be danced in very slow measure, and to which he has given his name.

One of your countrymen has caused some sensation in our salons. After contracting debts to the amount of 130,000 francs, he has managed to escape from prison by means of a bribe of 9000 francs to the gaoler.

We have received by letters from Rome tidings of the death of one well-known in our circles—of the Princess Dorothea Czartoriska, a descendant of the princely houses of Lichtenstein and Dietrichstein, and allied to all the great Galician families. This pious princess had reached an advanced age, and had retired some time since to a convent of the Ursulines.

In the same letters we see that Cardinal Grimaldi is dangerously ill.

By-the-by, in a few days will take place the sale of a magnificent collection of snuff-boxes, the property of the celebrated Cardinal Gonsalvi, whilom first minister of the Pope, and who left instructions in his will that the sale should be delayed for twenty years after his death. The term is now expired, and numbers of amateurs are expected to attend. This curious collection numbers some snuff-boxes formerly the property of Napoleon. It is far, however, from equalling that of Lablache. You know that this is the favourite hobby of that giant in mind as well as in body.

By the same courier we hear of further additions to the destruction by inundations in Italy. All the roads are impeded, or utterly stopped. The waters in Florence have swept away edifices, with all their living tenants; and one of the suspension bridges has been carried away. The water is three fathoms deep at the portals of the well-known Santa Croce. The Grand Duke of Tuscany has spared neither his treasures nor his exertions to relieve the universal wretchedness. For 300 years Florence has not witnessed so great a disaster.

M. Thiers's new and voluminous historical work has not yet been published, and already three translations are publishing in the Peninsula alone. Don Sebastian de Minano, M. Joaquin-Maria, and M. Alcala-Galiano, are the three rival translators. M. Cousin's admirable "Biography of Jaqueline" has increased the enthusiasm for "Pascal," her brother. A new edition of Cousin's "Pensées de Pascal" is forthcoming; a triumph for good literature, and another blow against the Jesuits.

Melancholy indeed is the fate of the illustrious house of Wasa! You have heard of the dire domestic troubles of the present head of the house, and his recent separation from his wife—deprived of a home as well as a throne. He has now just sold his barony of Eichorn, in Moravia, to the Baron de Sina, the Viennese banker, for 1,800,000 francs.

A striking, and certainly not a pleasing, feature of the times is now presented to the eye of the visitor at Tours. The beautiful and ancient abbey church of St. Julian, in that town, is put up for sale or hire, and at this moment serves as a stable! Your astonishment at this desecration may be somewhat mitigated, however, when you remember that, in 1830, "Maison à louer" (a house to let) was inscribed on the outside of the Palace of the Tuileries itself.

The busts of the deputies who came over to pay homage to the Duke of Bordeaux, have been seized at all the shops, by order of the police.

The anniversary of the wedding of his Majesty Louis Philippe will be celebrated by the inauguration of the new salle de Theatre at the Palace of St. Cloud. Mehul's "Raoul de Créguy" is the opera fixed upon for this occasion, and will be performed by the pupils of the Conservatoire.

A curious incident has occurred in the country. Some giraffes arrived at Mons, the other day, for exhibition at the fair, when it was found that the town-gate, not being high enough, it was impossible for them to enter, unless, as in the case of the famous horse of Troy, the town walls were demolished to admit them. This desperate alternative was, however, avoided, by the happy idea of making them pass by the railway terminus.

The great object of interest to our savans, at this moment, is two Egyptian sarcophagi, now in the possession of the Duke of Calabria. They are of the greatest antiquity; one is in black Basalt, the other in whitish stone; and they are covered with most curious and admirably-preserved hieroglyphics. Their history is remarkable They are mentioned in the works of Kercher, and the famous traveller Thevenot; and La Fontaine celebrated them in his epistles. On their arrival from Egypt they became the property of the famous superintendent, Fouquet; afterwards they passed into the possession of Lenotre, the well-known gardener-architect; then into that of the Chevalier Bernin, who erected St. Peter's Monument at Rome; from him to that of their present possessor.

FRANCE.

The French papers this week furnish little matter of value either in the way of news or commentary. The state of Spain naturally engrosses much of their attention, but so far as facts are concerned, they are very barren.

A grand banquet has been given at Marseilles to Marshal Bugeaud, on his return from Algeria. The Marshal made a speech, in which he drew a very encouraging picture of the state of that colony. He said peace reigned everywhere, from the fortress of Tunis to Morocco. He also dwelt on the immense progress made by the colony, and its importance to France. The Marshal also stated, that Abd-el Kader had removed into the interior of Morocco.

The Moniteur publishes a Royal ordinance, authorising the Minister of the Interior to open an extraordinary credit of 240,000 francs, to defray the expense of the experiment of an electric telegraph on a railroad line of at least 24 leagues (60 miles) in length.

M. Chaix d'Est Ange, the Ministerial candidate, has been returned deputy for Rheims by 414 votes. His opponent, M. Leon Faucher, obtained 344.

According to the Constitutionnel, a new candidate has been proposed for the honour of possessing the hand of the Queen of Spain. A certain number of influential Spaniards and Portuguese have proposed to unite Isabella to the Prince Royal of Portugal, Pietro d'Alcantara, the eldest son of the Queen Donna Maria da Gloria. This Royal Prince is a child of seven years of age. Isabella is fourteen. The young couple would be merely affianced, and they would then wait the majority of the young husband. The partisans of this alliance anticipate immense advantages from this arrangement, absurd as it is to draw political conclusions from a proposal for the marriage of two mere children.

The Sentinelle of Toulon states that, in order to reduce the number of sailors, the Minister of Marine has desired the Maritime Prefect to discharge all those who have been six years in actual service of the Government, and those who can reckon thirty months of such service since the last levy.

The Débats again returns to the subject of the comparative merits of a railway or canal across the Isthmus of Suez, and, after labouring three columns of argument, adheres to its previous opinion, that the preference is to be given to a canal.

Some of the Paris opposition papers state that Admiral Dupetit Thouars has received orders from the Government not to return to France for two years, or at all events till the end of the next session of the Chambers. The Presse confirms this report, but states that the Admiral had the choice of either coming home at once, or remaining on his travels for two years, and that he chose the latter.

The publication of the intended marriage of the Count de Jarnac, Secretary of the French Embassy at London, with the daughter of the late Lord Foley, said to be the rich heiress, has been posted up at the Mayory of the first arrondissement of Paris.

Marshal Bugeand, Duke of Isly, has arrived at Paris, and is said to have immediately waited on the King.

SPAIN.

The accounts upon the subject of the recent insurrectionary movement of General Zurbano are so contradictory, that it is difficult to glean any thing positive respecting him or the progress made by his followers. The Débats and the Spanish Ministerial papers affect to consider it impossible that Zurbano can effect any thing or even escape the Government forces, but on the other hand it would seem that he is acting with great vigour. A letter from Bayonne of the 20th represents him as making rapid progress. On his arrival at Soria on the 18th he found that the political chief had issued a bando, declaring him a rebel, and directing him to be shot, as soon as his identity should be established. Zurbano, however, turned the tables upon him, and caused him to be shot as an example to persons in authority not to publish such sanguinary instructions. A battalion of the regiment of Saragossa had pronounced for Zurbano. A rising had taken place in Guipuscoa in favour of the constitutional cause, and Iturbide had placed himself at the head of the movement.

Accounts from the other northern parts of Spain allude to the excitement prevalent there. Saragossa was declared in a state of siege. The valley of Tena, in Upper Arragon, has taken part in the Zurbano movement.

By a Royal decree, issued at Madrid, signed by General Narvaez, Zurbano and his followers were declared outlaws, and, as such, were to be shot "without any other delay than that necessary to enable them to die like Christians." Zurbano also had issued a proclamation, from Najeva, in the name of liberty, stating that the Royal authority in Spain was usurped; and ordering all the authorities of the "intrusive" Government to relinquish their functions under pain of death. The inhabitants of some of the villages are placed in rather an unpleasant predicament between the contradictory commands of Narvaez and Zurbano.

Our letters from Madrid of the 20th are filled with accounts of rejoicings on the Queen's saint-day, and descriptions of a magnificent ball given by Narvaez to the two Queens, the whole of the corps diplomatique, and 1,500 of the fashionables of Madrid. The affair is the more remarkable as being the first time that a Queen of Spain has honoured a subject with her presence at an entertainment, with the exception of Queen Christina, when Regent, to Count Toreno. The two Queens were accompanied by the Infant Luisa, and by Don Francisco de Paulo and his family. The ball was opened by General Narvaez, in a quadrille with the Queen, who, it is said, appeared in excellent health, was in great spirits, and danced with perfect grace. In the second quadrille her Majesty honoured Count Bresson, the French Ambassador, with her band, while Mr. Bulwer, the English Minister, performed the part of vis-à-vis with the Infanta Luisa. In the third quadrille Mr. Bulwer had the honour of being her Majesty's partner, and in the fourth she chose General Concha. It was only in the fifth quadrille that the Queen favoured the first Grandee of Spain, the descendant of royalty, the Duke of Medina Celi, with an invitation, a circumstance which appears to have given some offence in aristocratical circles in Madrid. Mr. Washington Ivring and Mr. Peel, the son of Sir Robert Peel, were also present at the ball.

PORTUGAL.

We have accounts from Lisbon to the 20th instant. There have been some animated discussions upon the recent despotic acts of the Government, but the Bill of Indemnity being granted, these debates have lost much of their interest.

The Chamber of Peers has been chiefly occupied in discussing the subject of the new taxes which the Government proposed some time back, and they have been voted. By means of these taxes, and of the extensive retrenchments in contemplation in the public expenditure, the amount of the deficit will be very considerably reduced.

The Deputies are at present engaged in discussing an application made by the Government to be allowed to levy an additional five per cent. upon the existing taxes.

The Late Forged Transfer at the Bank of England.—Burgess, who it will be recollected obtained £80,000 from the bank by means of a forged transfer of stock, had been captured on Light-house Island, in Boston harbour, and been safely lodged in Levant-street gaol, ready for delivery to the British authorities. Neville, an Irishman living on the island, and at whose house Burgess stopped, received 300 dollars reward on the spot.

NEWS FROM TAHITI.

The last New York papers contain news from Tahiti to the 15th of July.

It appears, by a report given by the captain of the whale-ship Martha which had arrived at Rhode Island, that, on the 20th of June, a body of natives having assembled at Point Venus, and their proximity being considered too near for safety, Governor Bruat had marched against them at the head of 400 French. The natives, having received intelligence of their approach, placed themselves in ambush, and allowed the main body to pass; but, as the rear-guard were passing in front of the English mission-house, they opened their fire upon them in a direct line with the house, and Mr. M'Kean, one of the missionaries, who was walking on his verandah, was struck by a ball, and instantly killed. His death is universally regretted. He was one of those who had lately arrived from England, well educated, and one of the most respected men upon the group of islands. The action was upon the north side of the Bay of Papeite. The native loss is unknown. The French loss amounted to three killed and five wounded.

At the same time, on the south side, another action took place, in which the natives were routed. In this action five French were killed and seven wounded. The native loss on this occasion is also unknown; but the day following the natives again advanced upon the town, and succeeded in burning the French mission-house, chapel, &c.

In all these actions it has been impossible to determine, with any degree of certainty, the native loss. They have always been accustomed to remove their dead during the night, and only those are found upon the field who die at the point of the bayonet.

The natives had seized three Frenchmen, whom they put to death with great torture.

The French ship Borbonnaise was lost at Tahiti by striking upon the Middle Ground; she was got off by the assistance of the Government war steamer, but in so doing tore out the keel, and sunk in 15 fathoms water; vessel and cargo a total loss, and nothing was saved by the crew except what they had on.

A Rio paper, the Jornal do Commercio, of the 1st of October, contains the following important news from Tahiti:—"Valparaiso, August 17.—We received yesterday, by the corvette Albatross, arrived from Tahiti, the Oceanie Française of the 14th July. The affairs of the Archipelago, though not presenting a menacing appearance, were far from tranquil. The French troops had gone out to encounter the detachments of the natives in the districts subject to the authorities of Papeiti. The depredations and robberies to which the friendly natives were exposed, the general appearance of insubordination, and the neglect of the orders of the Governor, induced him at length to attack them on the 30th of June, at a place called Hapape. In this encounter, as was to have been expected, the natives were routed with loss, and the French attained, by this stroke, the opportunity of hindering a body of the enemy, who had come from the south of the island, from joining the insurgents. The camp of the enemy was removed, in consequence of this, further from Papeiti. The Oceanie Française gives well-deserved praise to the frank and honourable conduct observed by Captain Hammond, commander of the English steamer Salamander, in undeceiving the natives of the idea that the British forces were about to protect them. On the 17th of July the English frigate Carysfort arrived at Papeiti from Valparaiso. It saluted the French frigate Urania, which returned the salute. The Governor, Captain Bruat, received the visit of Lord William Paulet; and although he had not received any official intelligence of the French Government having refused the dominion of the Society Islands, nor any other notice of it excepting what was contained in a letter from Valparaiso, he immediately sent the chief of his staff on board the Basilisk with a letter for Queen Pomare, informing her of the new position of affairs, and requesting her to land. This letter was translated to Queen Pomare in the presence of the French Chief, and of the Commanders of the Carysfort and Basilisk, and she replied that she would go to Barbara, there to await the settlement of these affairs. The Carysfort prepared immediately to conduct her there, where resides the Chief Tabara, the first husband of Pomare.

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

The Celebration of Divine Service.—The Dean and Chapter of Exeter have presented an address to the Archbishop of Canterbury, in which they entreat his Grace to consult with the Bishops on the best mode of putting an end to certain diversities in the celebration of Divine Service; and, for that purpose, to procure their concurrence in some uniform interpretation of those Rubrics in the book of Common Prayer which may seem obscure or conflicting, and in some uniform rule for the direction of the clergy with respect to certain forms and practices which have, more or less, fallen into desuetude.

The Archdeacon of Surrey, the venerable S. Wilberforce, held his Visitation on Monday last at St. Saviour's Church, Southwark.

The Lord Bishop of Lichfield has licensed the Rev. Frederick Rogers Blackley, late of All Saints, Birmingham, to the curacy of North Harborne, Staffordshire, on the nomination of the Rev. Thomas Green Simcox, M.A., vicar.

New Church at Cove, near Farnborough.—Thursday last, the Bishop of Winchester consecrated a new church, which has lately been erected at Cove, near the Farnborough station. The church is a small but very neat one; and the windows are filled with stained glass. The stone composing the building, is similar to that of Windsor Castle. The architects, Messrs. Stevens and Alexander, were highly congratulated at the conclusion of the ceremony by the Lord Bishop, who observed that the edifice was the only one of the kind that he noticed nothing objectionable in.

COUNTRY NEWS

The Infanticide at Wolverhampton.—The prisoners, Miss Railton, Mr. Sheriff, and Mr. and Mrs. Hildreth, have been again brought before the coroner's inquest, but no further evidence of any importance was adduced, and a general verdict was returned. The prisoners were also placed at the bar of the public office before Mr. Hill, Mr. Barker, Dr. Dehane, and Dr. Briscoe, magistrates of the county. The prisoners declining to say anything in their defence, were each committed to Stafford, Miss Railton for concealing the birth of her child, and the other prisoners as accessories. The magistrates intimated that they would take bail; themselves in £80, and two sureties for each prisoner in £40. Mr. Sheriff, the surgeon, who attended Miss Railton, was also committed to take his trial for felony at the ensuing assizes.

The Murder at Yarmouth.—A man named Frederick Boatright has been taken into custody on suspicion of being either a principal or an accomplice in the above horrible transaction. It appears there was a very strong suspicion prevailing in Yarmouth, in consequence of Boatright's dissipated habits and previous character, that he was in some way connected with this horrible tragedy. When told that he was suspected of being concerned in the murder of Mrs. Candler, at Yarmouth, he appeared much agitated, and changed colour. He was conveyed to the station house, and afterwards underwent an examination before the magistrates of the borough. The prisoner, who has returned from sea within the last eighteen months, is a man of between 23 and 24 years of age, and was considered a very bad character.

Matrimonial Hoax at Uxbridge.—On Tuesday seventeen young men were charged at Uxbridge, with a disgraceful assault upon a Mr. Stone. The affair arose out of a mischievous hoax, practised upon Mr. Stone. It appeared that Stone had inserted an advertisement in the Maidstone Gazette for a wife, and that advertisement had been answered by a shopkeeper's apprentice, of Uxbridge, in the name of "Frances Gower," and enticed Stone to Uxbridge, where the defendants and others pushed him into a pond and pelted him with mud. The magistrates fined the ringleaders twenty shillings, and let the others off. Mr. Stone, who has been an attorney's clerk, resides at No. 4, Albany-road, Camberwell. He is described as a man of gentlemanly appearance, of rather above the middle stature, remarkably staid countenance, dark-brown hair, considerably bald on the top, dark-brown bushy whiskers, dark hazel eyes, and apparently nearly fifty years of age. He described himself as "now living independent." In his cross-examination he admitted that once before he had advertised for a wife in the Sunday Times.

Death of Professor Henderson.—Thomas Henderson, Esq., Professor of Practical Astronomy in the University of Edinburgh, died on Saturday morning last. The immediate cause of his death was disease of the heart. Mr. Henderson had held the Professorship of Astronomy since 1834—an office for which he was eminently qualified.

A Gamekeeper Shot.—Saturday night last, Mr. Green, gamekeeper to J. S. Lescher, Esq., of South Weald, Essex, was wounded by a gun-shot, in an attempt to apprehend a poacher, who escaped. Mr. Green lies in a dangerous state.

Boat Accident.—Six Lives Lost—Six men, inhabitants of Port Glasgow, are supposed to have been drowned in the Clyde, between Gourock Bay and that place, last Sunday. The boat in which they sailed was found on Monday morning. The probability, therefore, seems to be, as there was no ballast in the boat, and as there was a sail set upon it, that the whole of the persons on board were thrown out by some sudden lurch, that the boat then righted itself, but that owing to the darkness of the night none of them were able to regain it. The master of the boat was about twenty-three years of age. The other sufferers were a man named Arnot, a bleacher, at Gourock ropework, his son, an apprentice plumber, and another young man, Arnot's nephew, a young man from the Highlands, named Dugald M'Intyre, and another young man named John Gray, from Galloway.

Murder at Stockport.—A coroner's inquiry was held on Tuesday night, before Mr. C. Hudson, on the body of Eliza Jones, whose death had been caused on the previous afternoon by the violence of her husband. It appeared, the husband in question, whose name is Henry Jones, was a bricklayer, in the receipt of good wages, but unfortunately of very intemperate habits. On Monday, as usual, he was intoxicated, so much so that his master desired him to quit the ground, and return when sober. On leaving his work he met his wife, who kept dodging him to give her some money, two children being then at home in want; but he became excited, and refused to comply or go home. After going from public-house to public-house, he consented, late in the afternoon, to go home, and they were on their way through the town, when a violent quarrel arose between them. The wife was equally excited, when, in a moment of frenzy and madness, he threw her from him, and kicked her savagely. She fell instantly, and died in the street before any assistance could be obtained, supposedly from some injury sustained by a kick in the stomach. Her husband was immediately taken into custody. The prisoner appears extremely dejected, and is painfully alive to the awful position in which he is placed.

Expected Strike of the Coal Miners of Lancashire.—The Manchester Guardian states that circumstances have come to its knowledge which induce it to believe that there is an intention on the part of the Lancashire Colliers' Union to cause a general strike ere long. The remarkable feature of this agitation is the proposal by the coal miners to their employers to force a rise in the price of coals, by contracting and diminishing the supply to the public, and then to allow the coal miners to share with them the profits which would result from this artificial scarcity and consequent dearness of an article which, at this season of the year, may be termed a prime necessary of life.

Extraordinary Sudden Deaths in Norwich.—Last week the papers in Norwich mentioned the death of Mr. David Irwin. This gentleman had for upwards of forty years filled a confidential situation in the office of the Conservative newspaper, the Norfolk Chronicle. His death was peculiarly sudden. On Sunday last, only five days after his death, great was the astonishment and deep was the regret, at the announcement of the equally sudden death of Jonathan Matchett, Esq., the senior partner and editor of the same paper, which capacity that gentleman had filled upwards of half a century. On Wednesday morning still greater was the astonishment and regret at another awful visitation, in the nearly as sudden death of R. M. Bacon, Esq., the senior partner and editor of the Liberal paper, the Norwich Mercury, who had been unwell for the last few weeks.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

ROBBERY OF UPWARDS OF FORTY THOUSAND POUNDS FROM A BANKING HOUSE.

Considerable stir was created in the City on Monday morning, by the discovery that a robbery of a most extensive character was committed on Sunday at the banking-house of Messrs. Rogers, Olding, and Co., bankers, of Clement's-lane. Bank-notes to the amount of from £35,000 to £40,000, or £41,000 were stolen out of the iron safe, which is deposited in the wall of the inner office; and securities to a very large amount were also taken by the thieves. It is a remarkable circumstance connected with this robbery, that when it was first discovered, there was no external appearances from which suspicion could be entertained upon entering the office that any robbery had been perpetrated, or attempt at robbery had been made. Everything was in its accustomed order; the iron safe in which the cash and securities were regularly deposited was locked, and the iron chest in which it was usual to deposit the master-key of the safe, to which there were two locks, was also secure. According to one account the money was deposited in the iron safe; and, as usual, a clerk was appointed to watch over its safety during Sunday, and another clerk to perform the like duty during the night. One of the partners remaining at home on Sunday, the day-clerk asked permission to go out for a few hours, which was granted. At the accustomed hour in the evening the other clerk came, and remained during the night; but when business was resumed on Monday morning, and the iron safe opened with the ordinary key, it was found entirely empty; and yet no force whatever had been used in the employment of the means adopted to rid the chest of its valuable contents. Of course, all is conjecture upon the subject. It is the practice of the partners of the firm, to relieve each other in the heavy cash business of the house at stated periods, and each of them keeps keys of the safe and iron chest, and it is supposed that one of the gentlemen left behind him his keys, upon some occasion of hurry or forgetfulness, and that with these keys the places of former security were violated. Some force had been used on a tin box in which several valuable securities were kept, but it appeared that the thieves had made some mistake with regard to the exact position of these documents, for they worked on the wrong side, and were so far disappointed. They laid hands upon enough, however, to console them for their blunder, as appears from the enormous list of bank-notes announced in a large handbill. In that handbill are the particulars of the stolen Bank of England notes, which amount altogether to £40,710. Of these bank notes there are 168 for £5, 40 for £10, 37 for £20, 10 for £30, 12 for £40, 9 for £50, 10 for £100, 5 for £200, 1 for £500, and 35 for £1,000. The handbill states that further particulars of the bills of exchange will be published, and that whoever will give such information as will lead to the apprehension of the guilty party or parties, or either of them, and recovery of the property, or any part thereof, shall receive £3,000 reward, or a part thereof, proportionate to the sum which shall be recovered. Mr. Hobler has been employed by the banking-house to investigate the case, and has secured the assistance of Daniel Forrester, the officer. The house of Rogers and Co. is in rather a quiet thoroughfare, and, on Sundays especially, comparatively deserted, the houses being chiefly let out as offices, and occupied, in other than business hours, merely by the male or female keepers. This would so far afford facilities for the unobserved approach of the thieves, a court running also within two doors of the bank. The house of Rogers and Co. has always been considered one of decided property, and the head of the firm, now advanced in age, is well known as the author of the "Pleasures of Memory." Business has since proceeded in the establishment in the usual quiet way. The transaction—the possession of the keys, the opening of the strong-room, and the principal party being fairly on "the road"—occupied less than three-quarters of an hour.

ADDITIONAL PARTICULARS.

Mr. Hobler, who has been employed by the firm, started immediately the robbery was discovered for the Continent, from which place he has returned, and it is believed from the information he there obtained that the guilty parties had not started for France. The supposition now entertained is, that the produce of the robbery is secreted, and that the notes will not be put in circulation for the present. One of the superior officers of the City police received a letter in the course of Tuesday, informing him that the whole of the property which was stolen from Messrs. Rogers' banking-house was deposited in a house in the neighbourhood of Walworth; and off two of the force were sent in a cab to act upon the premises. The letter was anonymous, written in a wretched manner, and turned out to be a hoax. The cabman was the only one who gained by the report, for the poor man who owned the house, upon being shown the warrant, expressed the greatest surprise and indignation at the calumny, and invited the most scrupulous investigation. The mode in which the robbery was effected is pretty well ascertained, and as the locks of bankers' safes are generally on the patent principle, the probability is that the keys had on some occasion been mislaid, and that advantage was taken of that circumstance to prepare for the robbery. In this case, however, the probability is that the plan could not have been long matured. There are one or two points that may be stated with certainty, from what has transpired. First, that a successful ruse was planned to get possession of the keys of the strong chest; secondly, that the party delinquent has on a former occasion not stood A 1; and thirdly, that there is a clue to the retreat of the delinquent. In most instances the bills of exchange due on Monday were abstracted from their depositaries, to enhance the value of the property, so that a more ready means may exist for a compromise. This, however, the firm, it is asserted, will unqualifiedly reject.

ANOTHER DOUBLE SUICIDE.

There seems to be a sort of fatality about great crimes or offences. At all events, there is something pernicious in such examples. Only a short time ago there was a double suicide at Kilmarnock, and now we have to record an event very common in France, but happily of rare occurrence here—the suicide of two lovers. This event took place at an early hour on Monday, at the east end of the metropolis. About a quarter past one o'clock, a.m., police-constable M'Kenzie, 371, K, was called to the house of Mr. William Duckett, No. 9, Raven-row, Mile-end, where he met Mr. Davis, the surgeon, of Constable-row, Mile-end, who had also been hastily summoned, entering at the same time. They were ushered into a back parlour, fitted up as a sleeping apartment, where, lying across the bed, they saw the bodies of a young man and a young woman; the former, that of Charles William Duckett, son to the proprietor of the house, who was absent at the time; and the latter, that of a pretty young woman, named Elizabeth Williams, about 28 years of age, to whom the unfortunate young man had for some time past paid his addresses. Lying beside the bodies were found two teacups, which had recently contained some sort of liquid, leading to the conclusion that both must have drunk off the fatal draughts at one and the same moment. On looking about the apartment, the constable perceived two phials, which he handed to Mr. Davis, who, from the odour which they emitted, at once perceived that they had contained hydrocianic acid; and, having examined the bodies, he pronounced it as his opinion that the deceased parties had been dead several hours, no doubt from the effects of the poison. On the table was found a letter, bearing the following superscription:—

> To Miss Margaret Chapman, Lucas-street, Commercial-road.—It is our last and sacred wish that this letter be delivered into the hands of the above lady. Such is our final request, and whomsoever may find this we pray they may give the same to her.—E.W., C.W.D.

The handwriting is that of the young man, and displays much firmness. The letter was sealed with black wax, with the following motto:—

> Absence pains, but cannot alter.

Duckett and Miss Williams had been long attached, but adverse circumstances having intruded to prevent their union, it would seem as if despair of their ever coming together prompted them to this rash and tragical conclusion. The father is an accountant; his son was twenty-one years of age, and Miss Williams twenty-eight. For upwards of nine years the unfortunate young persons were attached to each other, and were never known to have quarrelled. On Sunday afternoon they had tea at Mr. Duckett's house, and took their departure about half-past five, at the same time stating that they were going to church, at which period they seemed in excellently good spirits. The evening wore on, and eleven o'clock having arrived, the usual time they returned, the family became somewhat alarmed. Soon afterwards two brothers of the ill-fated girl visited Mr. Duckett, and inquired if his son or their sister had been seen, she not having made her appearance, and the lateness of the hour induced them to think that they had met with some accident. Unpleasant feelings of alarm were then felt by all. Messengers were despatched all round the vicinity in search of them; but of no avail. At last, between one and two o'clock, whilst Mr. Duckett was searching about the house, in the hope of finding some letter which would mention where they had gone, he discovered that his son's bedroom was fastened on the inside, the key being in the door. It being surmised that he had returned unknown to the family, and had retired to bed, the door was broken open, and there the bodies of the young couple were stretched on the bed, life having been extinct apparently for some time, with their arms round each other's neck. The young man had not been in regular employment for some weeks past. This is reported to have been one circumstance that must have affected his mind, although he never wanted for anything. As regards his unfortunate partner, the poor girl, her mind of late has been affected; she was the daughter of a surgeon (deceased), and her mother resides in Cannon-street-road, in a respectable sphere of life. On a post-mortem examination, half an ounce of prussic acid (of Scheele's strength), was detected. According to the request of the deceased, inscribed on the letter found in the apartment and directed to Miss Chapman, in Lucas-street, it was delivered in the course of Monday afternoon at her residence, and opened in the presence of Mr. Porter, the constable of Stepney. On the envelope being broken open, it was found to contain two epistles, both of which were addressed to that young lady, and written in the handwriting of Duckett. One was a piece of poetry in twenty-four verses, and is a beautiful piece of penmanship. The title is "The Last Lay of Two Broken Hearts, written and composed by C. A. D.," executed in the illustrated style in old English, with a variety of inks. It bears the date of Nov. 8, but it has evidently been written as far back as September, which date was erased, but which is still partially discernible. The theme shows a wild paroxysm of love on his part, manifesting the most fervent attachment to the ill-fated girl. He bids adieu to his parents and all other relations, and prays forgiveness. Poverty had blasted his prospects, and > Since Fate had marr'd their earthly bliss, they would seek an early grave.

The same wild strain is displayed throughout the whole piece—

> His Lizzy begging that his grave might be her grave also.

The second is written in the same superior style, and bears the date of the day, last Sunday, on which he effected his fatal purpose. It states "that ere she (Miss Chapman) had received that epistle they would be in the sweet sleep of death." Fate had marred his bliss in this world—he was prepared to leave it, and she, for whom he had lived, had told him "If you die without me, you will be my murderer!" and, to use the words of Lady Jane Grey, "Death had no terrors." Both productions had deep black borders round them.

The inquest on the two lovers was held on Wednesday, at the Fox Tavern, Mile-end. The evidence confirmed the above account, and nothing else material was elicited. The letters and inclosures alluded to were read. At the conclusion of some verses, there was the following document:—

> "This is the holy vow, freely given from both our hearts. We have lived for each other. We solemnly and without reluctance mutually consent to die together; testifying to the truth thereof we have subscribed our names, thus proving our perfect will to share the grave in the arms of one another.
> "Elizabeth Williams and
> "Charles William Duckett.
> "Signed at No. 9, Raven-row, Mile-end Gate, London, Nov. 8, 1844."

Mr. Duckett, the young man's father, said:—My son resided with me. I was aware of his attachment to Elizabeth Williams, and approved of it. I never heard my son speak of getting married, but it is my opinion that he feared his circumstances would never enable him to do so, and it preyed on his mind. He was a candidate for a lucrative situation about twelve months since, and being unsuccessful, he had ever since been desponding. He was twenty-one years of age, and had known Elizabeth Williams nine years. The books he read were chiefly tracts and cheap publications. The witness here produced a large packet of letters he had found in his son's box addressed to him by Elizabeth Williams. They reciprocated his affection, and one of them, of recent date, describes the writer as very unhappy, and stated that she cared not how soon the time came to die with him. The jury returned a verdict "That the deceased persons, Charles William Duckett and Elizabeth Williams, died from imbibing a certain quantity of prussic acid, but by whom or how administered there was not sufficient evidence before the jury."

Suicide of the Son of Sir Stephen May.—On Tuesday night Mr. Higgs held an inquest at the Unicorn, Duke street, St. James's, to inquire into the circumstances of the death of Mr. Edward May, son of Sir Stephen May, Bart. The deceased recently arrived from Madras, in one of the Company's vessels, the Mary Ann, and took lodgings in Duke-street. The deceased was very singular in his manner, and appeared extremely dejected, as if troubled in his mind. On Monday morning his cousin came to pay deceased a visit, but was unable to get into his room, on account of his door being fastened; but, on gaining access into the room, through another door, the deceased was discovered on the bed quite dead. The bed-clothes were saturated with blood, a knife was by his side, and a wound was observed in his throat. The captain of the vessel in which the deceased returned to England, said that he had known him when in Madras. He had been in the army, but was dismissed by a General Court-Martial, on account of a quarrel with a brother officer, which affected his mind. The cousin of the deceased gave similar testimony, and said he dined with the family on Sunday, in Holles street, Cavendish-square. The deceased appeared dejected, absent, and melancholy. His father supplied him very liberally with money. He never spoke to his family on the subject of his dismissal from the army. The jury returned a verdict of "Temporary insanity."

Frightful Death in a Brick-Kiln.—On Tuesday evening Mr. Baker held an inquest at the London Hospital on the body of Jeremiah Cray, aged thirty-five years. Mr. William Webb, of No. 10, Albion-road, Dalston, tailor, deposed that about nine o'clock on Thursday night, whilst at supper with his family, he was alarmed by hearing cries of distress proceeding from a field at the rear of his house. He immediately went out, and discovered the deceased standing with his arms outstretched, having the whole of his clothes in a complete blaze from head to feet, and calling for "God's sake to help him." Witness, with the assistance of a policeman and a young man, dragged the burning remnants off his body till he was completely naked. Witness then took off his own coat and wrapped it over deceased, and with assistance he was carried to the above hospital. The deceased was at first quite sensible, and said that, having had a penny given him, he bought some potatoes, and had proceeded to the brick-kiln, near which he was found, for the purpose of roasting them, when he was overpowered by the vapour, and, falling asleep, his clothes became ignited. He further stated that he had no home or friends, being quite destitute. The house surgeon said the deceased, when admitted, was burnt in a most dreadful manner. He lingered until the next morning. Verdict, "Accidental death."

Fatal Accident.—On Monday morning, whilst Mr. G. Littlewood, lamp-contractor, Upper King-street, Bloomsbury, was driving a horse in a chaise-cart along Aylesbury-street, Clerkenwell, towards the Green, the horse, a vicious animal, suddenly took fright and dashed forward. On descending the hill on the west side of the Sessions-house the horse fell and rolled over. The sudden jerk threw the driver out of the cart, and his head came with great force against the curb-stone. Mr. Littlewood's skull was entirely knocked in. He was conveyed in a state of insensibility to a surgeon's near the spot, who directed his removal to St. Bartholomew's, whither he was conveyed, and, after receiving every attention from the house-surgeon, expired at half-past eleven. Mr. Littlewood has left a wife and family. He was about forty.

Singular Case.—On Monday afternoon Mr. Wakley held an adjourned inquest, at the Pembroke Arms Tavern, Pembroke-square, Kensington, on the body of Mary Garfield. It appeared that the deceased had been living for twelve months as cook in the service of Mr. Collett, a gentleman holding an official situation at the House of Commons, and residing at No. 28, Pembroke-square. During the whole time of her living there she was never known to go to bed, but she would sleep sitting in a chair in the kitchen, and her manners were in all respects most eccentric, the other servants scarcely speaking to her, on account of her crossness and snappish manner of answering them. On the night of Wednesday week, about half-past eleven o'clock, Rose Jackson, the nursemaid, after having supped with deceased, who during the evening appeared in her usual good state of health and spirits, took the candle off the table to go up to bed, when the deceased called her back, and asked her to leave the candle. She did so, and on coming down again into the kitchen the next morning, about seven o'clock, she found the deceased in the kitchen, dressed as she had left her on the previous night, lying on the floor, and quite insensible. A surgeon was sent for, who applied hot water to the deceased's stomach and feet; but she died in about an hour. In accordance with the medical testimony, the jury returned a verdict of "Natural death."

Railway Accident near Leicester.—On Saturday an inquest was held at Leicester, on the body of Edward Jowett, an unfortunate man killed on the railway near that place on the previous Thursday. From the evidence of the two principal witnesses, the driver and stoker of a coal train which left Leicester for Rugby, about seven o'clock on Thursday night, it appeared that deceased acted as breaksman to the same train, and accompanied them on that occasion. After passing through the Knighton-hill Tunnell, which is little more than a mile from Leicester, one of the coupling chains connecting the coal trucks broke, and the train was stopped to remedy the accident. This having been done, the engine was again set in motion, but owing to the humid state of the atmosphere, and consequent slipperiness of the rails, the wheels did not "bite," and the deceased got down off the truck on which he was riding, and crossed the line for the purpose of obtaining a little sand to throw upon the rails. While in the act of doing this, the second goods train from London came along the down line at a rapid pace, but from the fog which prevailed at the time, it was not observed by the driver of the coal train until within a few yards' distance. When the train had swept past, the driver called out to deceased, and, obtaining no answer, commenced a search for him. In a very few moments he was discovered in a senseless state by the road side, with a frightful wound over the right temple, from which the brains protruded, and other contusions about the face. He was immediately conveyed back to Leicester, where he lingered until ten o'clock, and then expired. The Jury returned a verdict of "Accidental death."

Another Fatal Accident on the Midland Counties Railway.—Another fatal accident on this line of railway occurred on Wednesday morning. The deceased, named Joseph Woodford, a married man, without family, was a guard in the employ of the Company, and left Rugby, in charge of the seven o'clock train. On arriving at the Syston station, some luggage was handed up to him on the top of the carriage upon which he was seated. He gave the signal to the driver to start the train while he was so engaged, and Mr. Withers, the superintendent, handed him a note, and the train moved off. The deceased being still in an erect position on the top of the carriage, was observed for some distance down the line, and was only missed on the arrival of the train at Sileby, by the superintendent of that station, and, on a search being made, he was discovered on the top of one of the carriages, with his brains dashed out and quite dead. There is but one bridge between Syston and Sileby. It is situated about midway, and there can be no doubt that the accident occurred by the deceased's head, while he was still engaged on the roof of the carriage, coming in contact with the bridge. At the inquest the jury returned a verdict of "Accidental death." Mr. C. Shaw, one of the directors of the railway, said that the bridge should be immediately altered.

Another Railway Accident.—On Saturday last, a little boy named George Crowther, son of Mr. Crowther, of Hendon-terrace, near Sunderland, was killed on the Durham and Sunderland Railway, by being run over by two waggons as they were passing on the line near Hendon. The little fellow was attempting to get on to one of the waggons, when he fell down, and both waggons passed over him, breaking his legs, and injuring him severely in other parts of his body. He died shortly after from exhaustion, his remains presenting a shocking spectacle. It is rather remarkable, that about a year and a half ago he escaped miraculously from being killed on the same spot by a train of waggons, at which time he was knocked down and his head laid open, and the greater part of his face mutilated. On a previous occasion he narrowly escaped drowning.

ELECTION OF THE AMERICAN PRESIDENT.

In our journal of last week, we gave a narrative of the excitement of this important election, with portraits of the candidates, Messrs. Polk and Clay; and a scene from one of the great Whig demonstrations; from our correspondent in New York. We now present to our readers two additional illustrations of this tremendous election struggle, with details since received by the Great Western, which has reached Liverpool, with accounts from New York to the 9th inst.

They contain the important announcement of the success of the Democratic party, and the consequent election of Mr. Polk as President, and Mr. Dallas as Vice-President. The election had not actually taken place, but returns had been received from Pennsylvania, which state returns twenty-six, all of them in favour of Mr. Polk, and the adjoining state of New York, which returns the largest number in the Union—thirty-six—also declared in his favour. These great states, being the most densely populated, and returning the greatest number of presidential electors, were held to be decisive of the contest. Some of the remote states had not been heard from, and returns were daily pouring in, but the friends of Mr. Clay hold the return of his rival as certain; indeed, the admissions of that gentleman's organs in the City of New York place the issue of the contest beyond a doubt. The result of this contest shows the hold which two questions of great importance have taken of the American mind—one of them appertaining more immediately to their own domestic policy—the annexation of Texas to the Union; and the other of considerable importance to Great Britain—a low, in contradistinction to the present high tariff. Whether Mr. Polk will possess sufficient strength in Congress, as now constituted, to carry out these two questions, remains to be seen, but that they have been the instruments by which he has shelved a much abler and otherwise more popular man is unquestionable; as regards the subject of free trade, the elections in New York show an extraordinary result. The city, which is the commercial metropolis of the country, voted in favour of the protectionist, Mr. Clay, but this was neutralized by the general vote of the state, which supported Polk by a majority exceeding 4000. Upon this subject, the New York Weekly Herald says, "the returns—not official, but sufficiently accurate for all practical purposes—from 54 counties, give Mr. Polk a majority of 9021, the remaining three counties having only given 3732 for Harrison in 1840. The most startling defection to Clay has taken place in the abolition counties of the west. These have probably voted largely for Birney, although we have none of their returns as yet; but that alone can account for the diminution of Clay's votes from Harrison's. Mr. Clay came to Cayugabridge with only about 7000 majority, a very serious diminution from the vast popularity of Harrison in 1840. In other respects, the papers by this arrival possess no striking features. The stock market had experienced the shock of Polk's return, many species of security having become depressed. The cotton market, too, was most inanimate, the result of the unfavourable intelligence respecting that staple which the Great Western carried out; but the rate of exchange was high—varying from 10¼ to 10½ per cent.

The second of our present illustrations represents the interior of a Polling Booth, with the mode of taking the elector's vote by Ballot. The votes are taken in each township of every county separately, and the mode of doing this cannot be better described than in the words of Mr. Stuart, who was present at an election for President.

"The ballot-boxes were placed on a long table, at which half a dozen of the inspectors or canvassers of voters were seated. The voters approached the table by single files. Not a word was spoken. Each voter delivered his list when he got next to the tables to the officers, who called out his name. Any person might object, but the objection was instantly decided on, the officers having no difficulty, from their knowledge of the township, of the persons residing in it, and to whose testimony reference was instantly made, in determining on the spot, whether the qualification of the voter was or was not sufficient. The county canvassers for the different townships of the county afterwards met, and made up their returns for the county; and thus, in a state far exceeding Scotland in extent, and almost equalling it in population, the votes for the chief magistrate of the United States and his substitute, for the governor and lieut.-governor of the state, for a senator and representative to Congress, for three representatives to the state of New York, for four coroners, a sheriff, and a clerk to the county, were taken, and the business of the election finished with ease, and with the most perfect order in three days."

The first scene is from the last grand demonstration of the Democrats, on the night of Nov. 1—a torch-light procession of immense extent. Our artist saw it at the time when it was preparing to move from Tammany Hall, the democratic head-quarters; and when torches, banners, &c. were accumulated together with a picturesque brilliancy, which was lost when they were spread over miles of streets.

The torch-light processions, of which the Democrats are very fond, are, artistically speaking, decided failures; an enormous waste of material, without arrangement or the slightest idea of effect: a splendid banner, for instance, beautifully painted on white satin, with gold, at an expense of, perhaps, a hundred dollars or more, will be carried in the dark; or, perhaps, some boys with a few torches behind it; while far in the distance, the eye will be attracted to a blaze of light, which, on approaching, will be found to be a multitude of boys of all ages, from 14 downwards, with a host of brilliant torches, lighting each other; and a stupid little transparency of a racoon hanging from a gallows, or any other equally flattering type of Henry Clay's political fate.

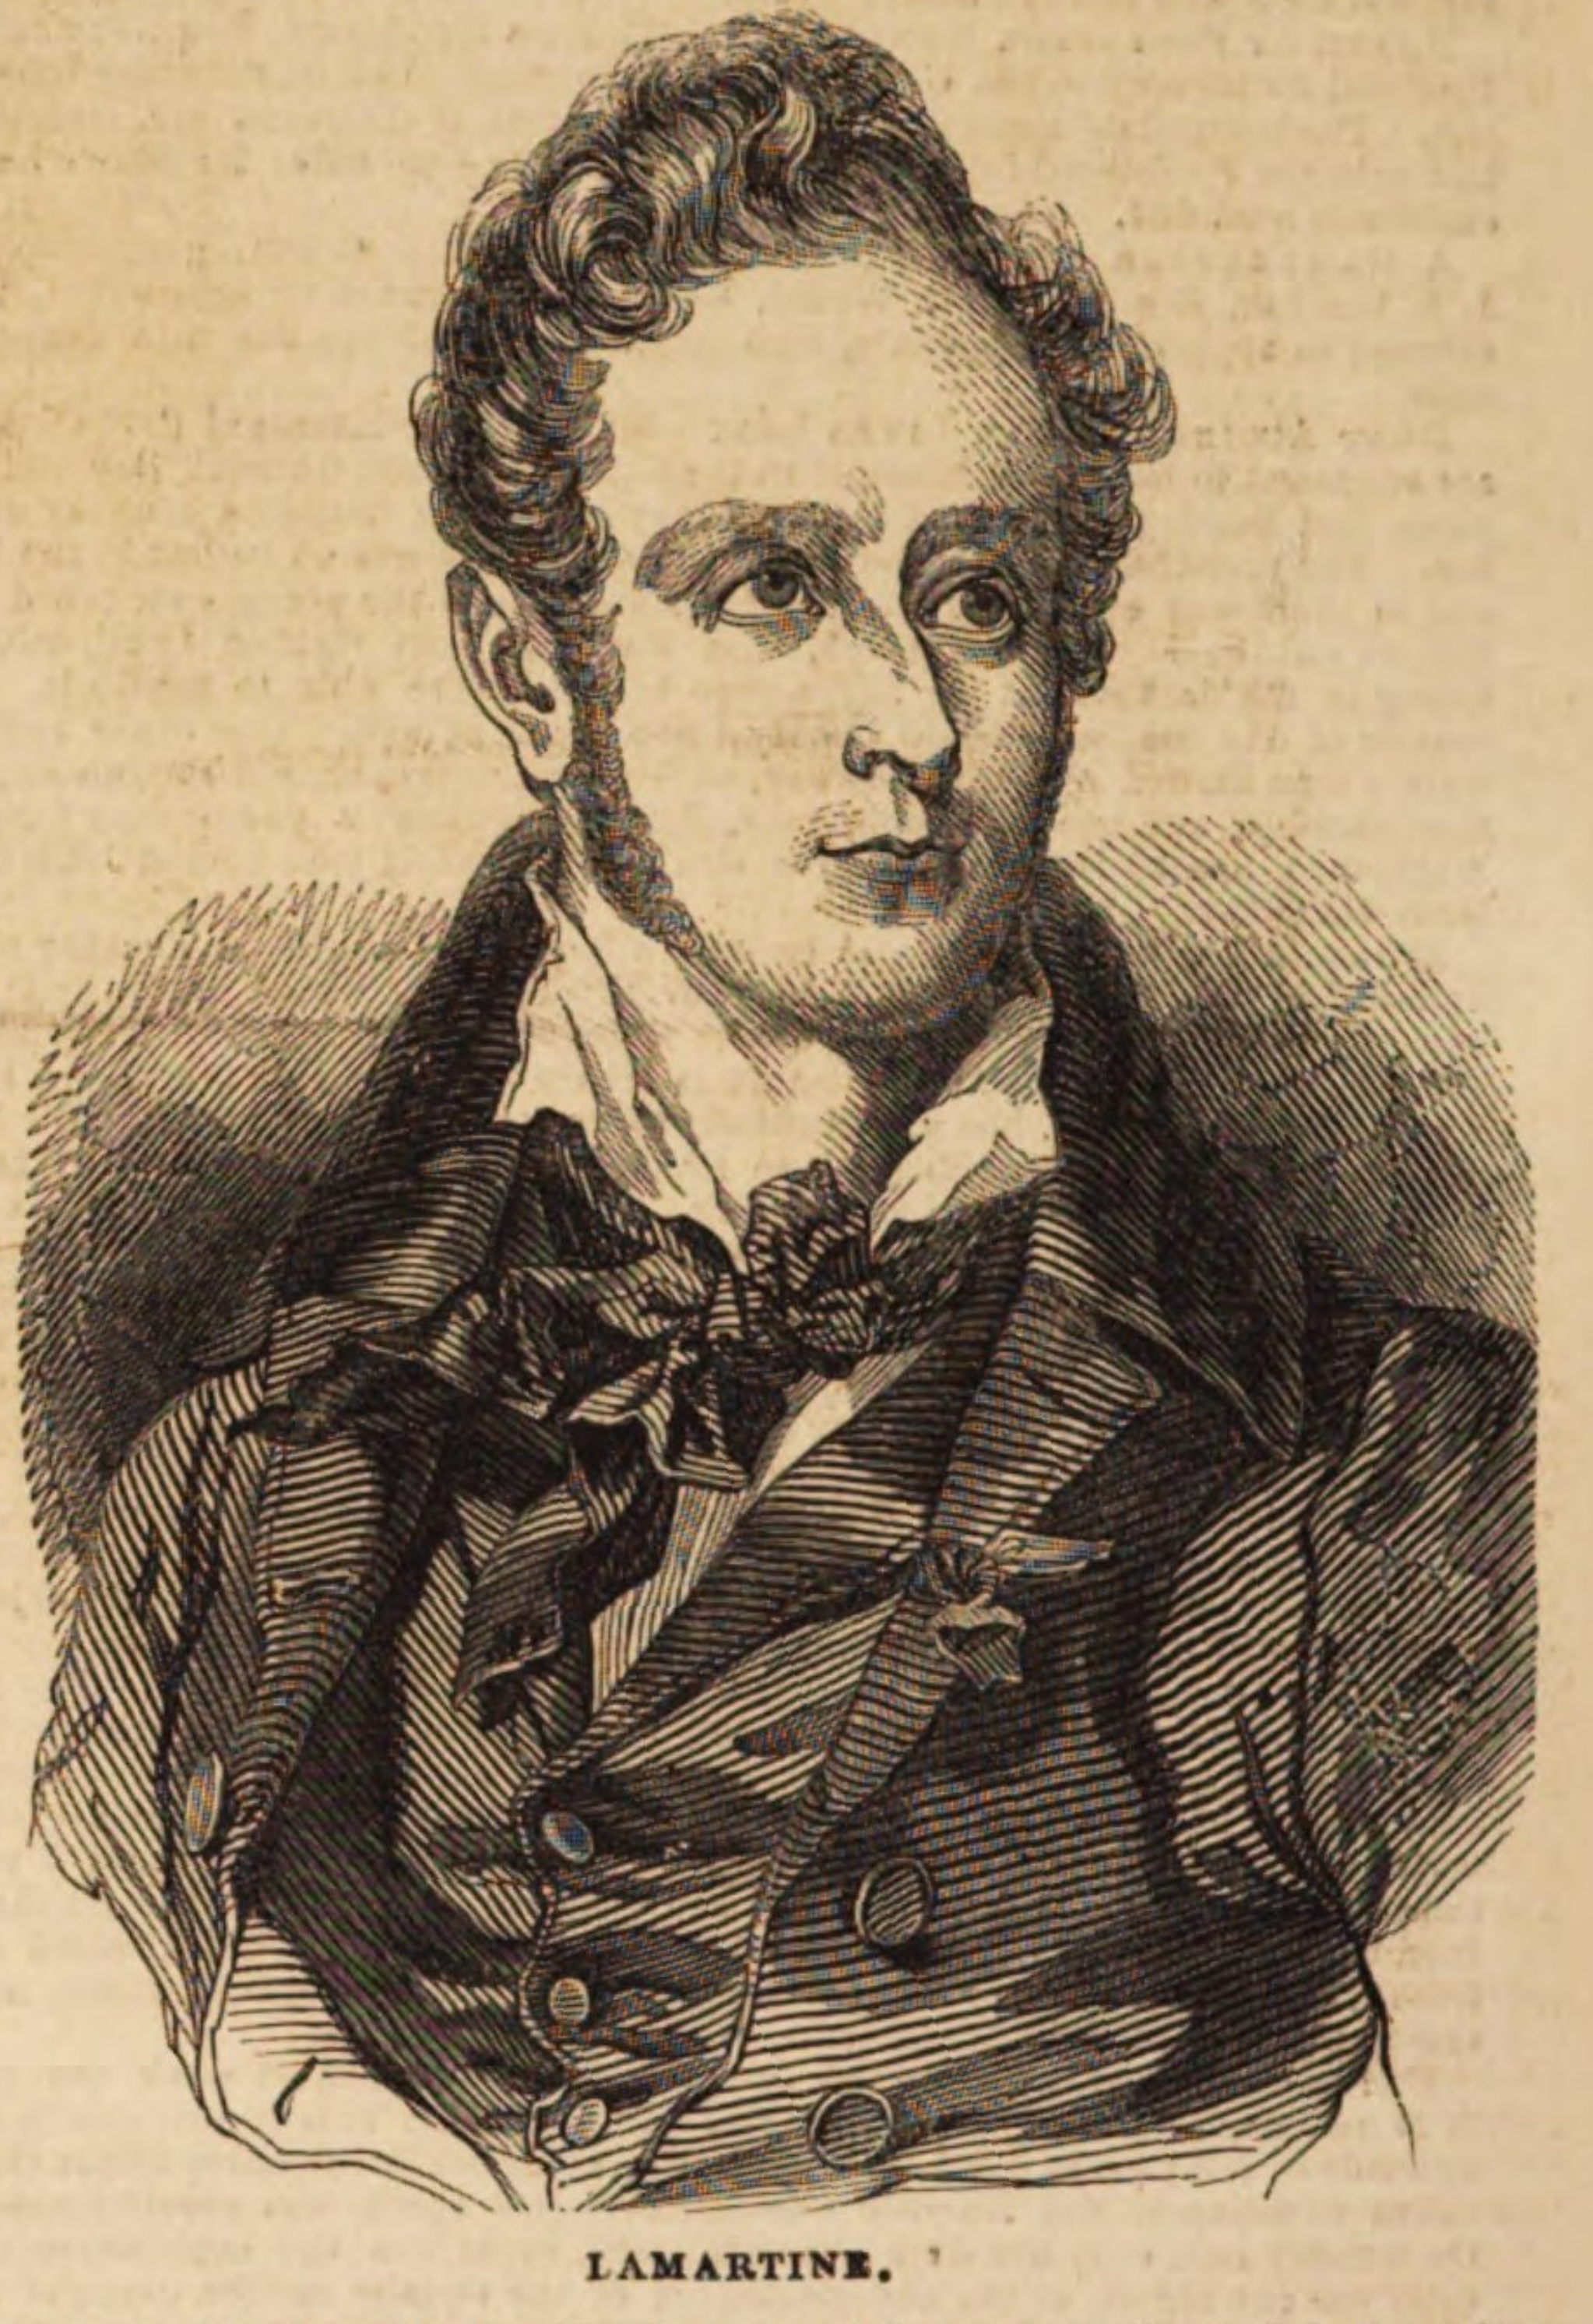
The large building to the left of the view is Tammany Hall, brilliantly illuminated; the balconies filled with company hurraing with extacy; and the steps crowded with spectators. Across the street is suspended, from the attic of the hall to a lofty young hickory-tree, a large banner, inscribed with the candidate's name. In the procession are a large eagle, backed by a wreath; a huge ship, inscribed "Free Trade," and "Sailors' Rights," on the sails; and a large transparent star, inscribed "Texas;" whilst the brilliancy of the whole is heightened by a powerful Drummond light.

Our correspondent adds:—Though very far from resembling them, the Whigs and Democrats regard each other in much the same way as the High Tories and extreme Radicals of England do, or did. The Whigs accuse their opponents of being Jacobins, Levellers, Agrarians, vagabond rowdies, banditti, offscourings of foreign gaols, &c.; and that, had they power, they would disorganise society. On the other hand, the Democrats style the Whigs the "Kid Glove Aristocracy," Blue-light Federalists—in allusion to their having warned the British ships of danger during the last war—asserting that if they had power, they would limit the suffrage to high property qualifications, trampling on the poor hard-working mechanic, and filling the land with all the evils of class legislation; and, as a final brand of infamy, they call them "British Whigs," the opprobrious term "British," having been faintly foreshadowed more than two thousand years ago in the old Roman sense of "Punic."

The mode in which this election has been carried on is beyond all praise. The quiet, order, decency, and forbearance observed at all the polling-places in this city were admirable.

M. DE LAMARTINE.

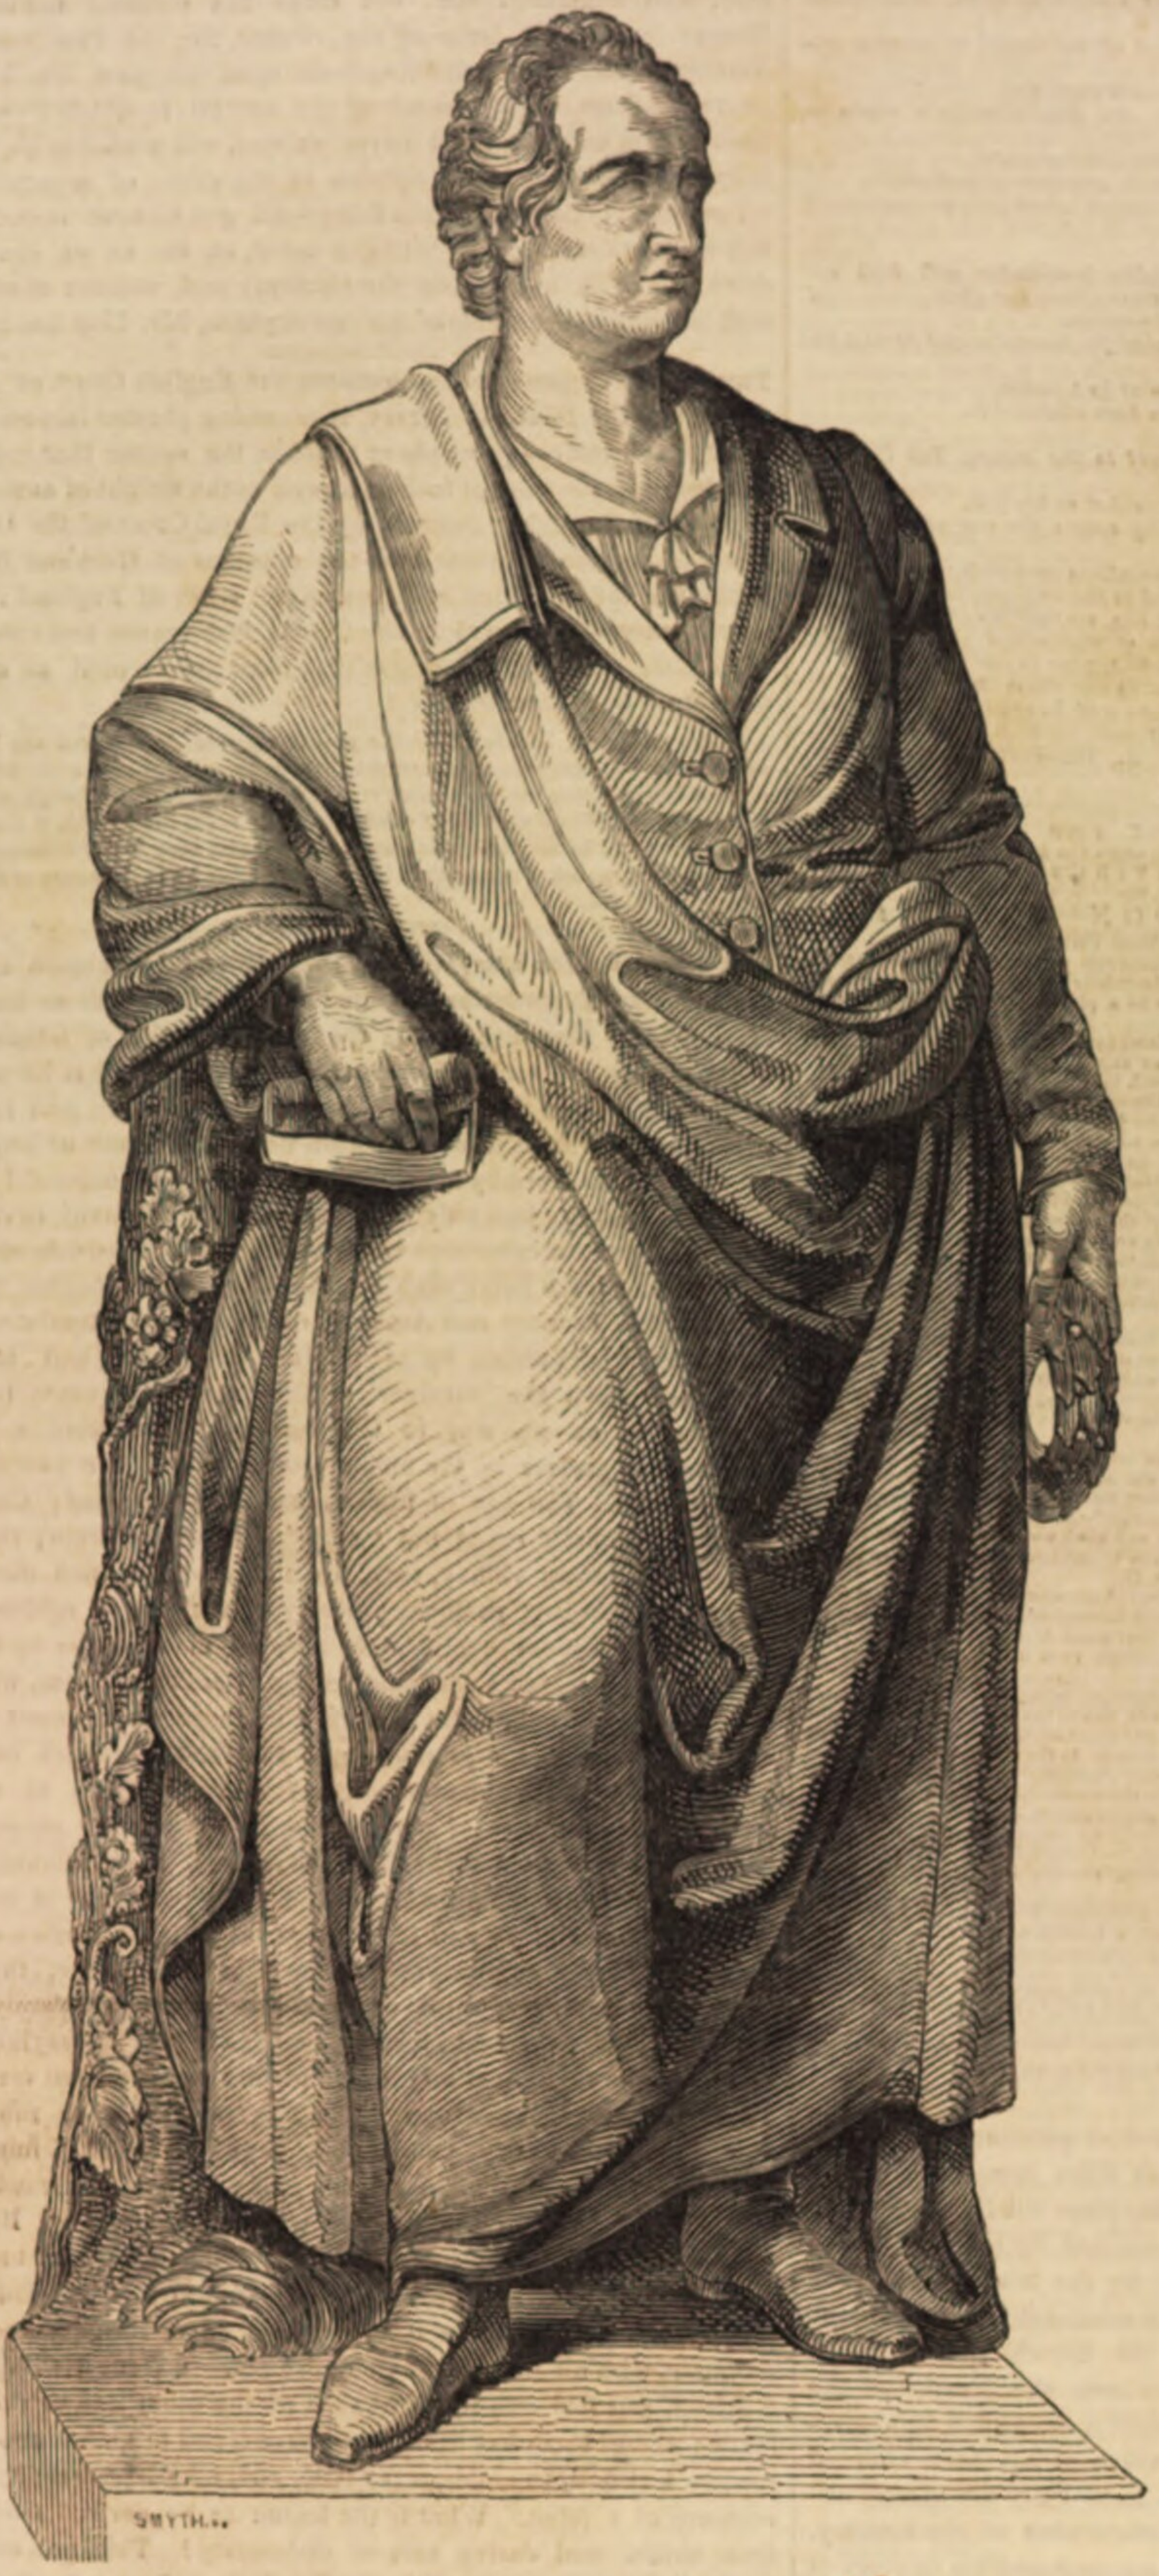
M. De Lamartine is a poet, a traveller, a legislator, and a politician. He plays many parts on the stage of life, and is good in them all, though his greatest and widest fame rests upon his poetry, and his prose, which is almost as beautiful. But it is as a politician he has at this juncture come into notice; he is a prominent member of the French Chamber, but has the misfortune to differ from M. Thiers, and the calamity of not agreeing with M. Guizot. He has recently put forth what is called a manifesto, with which the Paris papers are at present busy:—"It was easy to foresee," observes Le Siècle, "the effect which it would produce. Legitimists, Ministerialits, Radicals, democratic innovators, all applauded. The manifesto was common ground on which all these different parties could meet. It offered to them, each and all, the glorification of their own respective opinions, and a text for bitter incrimination against other parties." A production that combines such qualities, was sure of a brilliant reception. But in all things M. De Lamartine has always been a fortunate man; a slight sketch of his career will prove it, although more is known of his writings than of his life, for, to a certain extent, "his soul is like a star, and dwells apart;" his life is rather one of sentiment than action.



LAMARTINE.

Alphonse de Lamartine was born at Mâcon, in the beginning of 1791, when France was in the midst of the storm of the Revolution. His first recollections are of the prison, to which he used to be taken to see his father, who had been arrested, suspected of the crime of being an aristocrat, because he had filled some post in the Orleans branch of the Bourbon family. He survived the reign of terror by living in the greatest privacy, at an obscure place called Milly, afterwards so piously illustrated by his son. There the poet passed a long and innocent childhood, and only left it when he entered the College of the Pères de la Foi, at Belley. After leaving college, and about the year 1809, Lamartine lived at Lyon, and from thence made a short trip to Italy, and then proceeded to Paris, where for some time he lived a gay and joyous life, dreaming and writing and fancying he was a dramatic poet, for which, of all things, his genius is the most unsuitable. In 1813, his health being affected, he revisited Italy. The fall of the empire and the restoration had a considerable change in the destiny of the poet. Nurtured in sentiments and opinions wholly opposed to the revolution, he had never acknowledged the sway of Napoleon. It was to him but the rule of brute force, of numbers, and of the sword. He entered as an officer in the garde du corps in 1814, but did not resume his post after the Hundred Days, and his life presents no event of note till 1820, when his "Meditations Poetiques" were first given to the world. The advent of a great poet was at once acknowledged. The work became universally popular, and, thanks to Lamartine, France believed once more in Poetry, the eternity of Love, and the beauty of Nature—things that the verse-makers of the century had wholly forgotten. He profited by the popularity his name had acquired, and entered on the career of diplomacy; he was attached to the French Legation of Florence. He has been an exception to the common lot of poets; every kind of good fortune came to him, and nearly at the same time, fame, wealth, and a marriage of affection with a lady who is, we believe, a native of England. In 1830 he was admitted a Member of the Academy, and since that time he has travelled in the East, of which voyage he has given a most eloquent description to the world. He there lost his favourite daughter, Julia, and returned to France, where he engaged in politics, and soon gained a high position in the Chamber, above the tumult and storm of parties. His work, "De la Politique Rationelle," and his "Voyage en Orient," appeared in 1834; his "Jocelyn" in 1835; and in 1838 or 1839, "La Chute d'un Ange."

Lamartine lives in that street of splendid houses, the rue de l'Université, where he occupies a spacious hotel and keeps the establishment of a noble, indulging his refined taste for luxury and elegance, and his love of horses, which is so perceptible in his eastern voyage. He will walk to the Chamber in spurs, and after prostrating Arago in an eloquent speech, will gallop off to the Bois, leaving politics on the Tribune. The poet is not always in mysterious conversation with the tearful and pensive muse; he often speaks in his verses of his "humble roof," but it is that of a magnificent chateau, that of St. Point, near Mâcon, and the "modest shades" he celebrates, are those of the majestic forest that surround this aristocratic dwelling.



STATUE OF GOETHE, AT FRANKFORT.

STATUE OF GOETHE.

This fine colossal statue of Goethe, which was cast in bronze at the Royal Foundry of Munich, according to the model of Schwanthaler, was inaugurated with great ceremony, on the 23rd of last month, at Frankfort-on-the-Main, the illustrious poet's native place. Goethe is represented clad in a mantle, but having his hands free. He wears the simple costume of the present period. His right arm is resting on the trunk of an old tree, and in his left he holds a laurel crown. His eyes are turned towards heaven. The subjects of the bas-reliefs on the pedestal are borrowed from the works of Goethe. In the front, three female figures represent the natural sciences, and dramatic and lyric poetry. On the opposite side is seen, at the right, Gœts of Belichingen Egmont, Tasso, and a fawn. On the left, the Bride of Corinth, Prometheus, and the King of the Aulmes. One of the lateral surfaces represents Iphigenia, Orestes, Thoas, Faust, and Mephistophiles, and the other Mignon, Wilhelm Meister, the Harpist, Hermann, and Dorothea.

Chatsworth.—The Duke of Devonshire's princely seat at Chatsworth is at the present moment undergoing extensive alterations and embellishments. The two new fountains which have been set in action are truly magnificent—the one called the "Emperor," from a single jet throws a column of water nearly three hundred feet high. The other from several jets sends forth copious streams which rise and fall alternately. Huge masses of rock are collecting and forming into a rock work, and, when completed, will present the appearance of a wild mountain torrent of above three hundred feet long. Some rare plants have been sent to his Grace from one of the most arid parts of Western Africa for the noble duke's conservatory.

The Great American Aloe.—A fine specimen of this magnificent plant is now in flower, at Weald Hall, Essex. It is upwards of thirty feet high, and has 25 branches of flowers: it is constantly exuding a sweet juice, which contains 80 per cent. of saccharine matter.

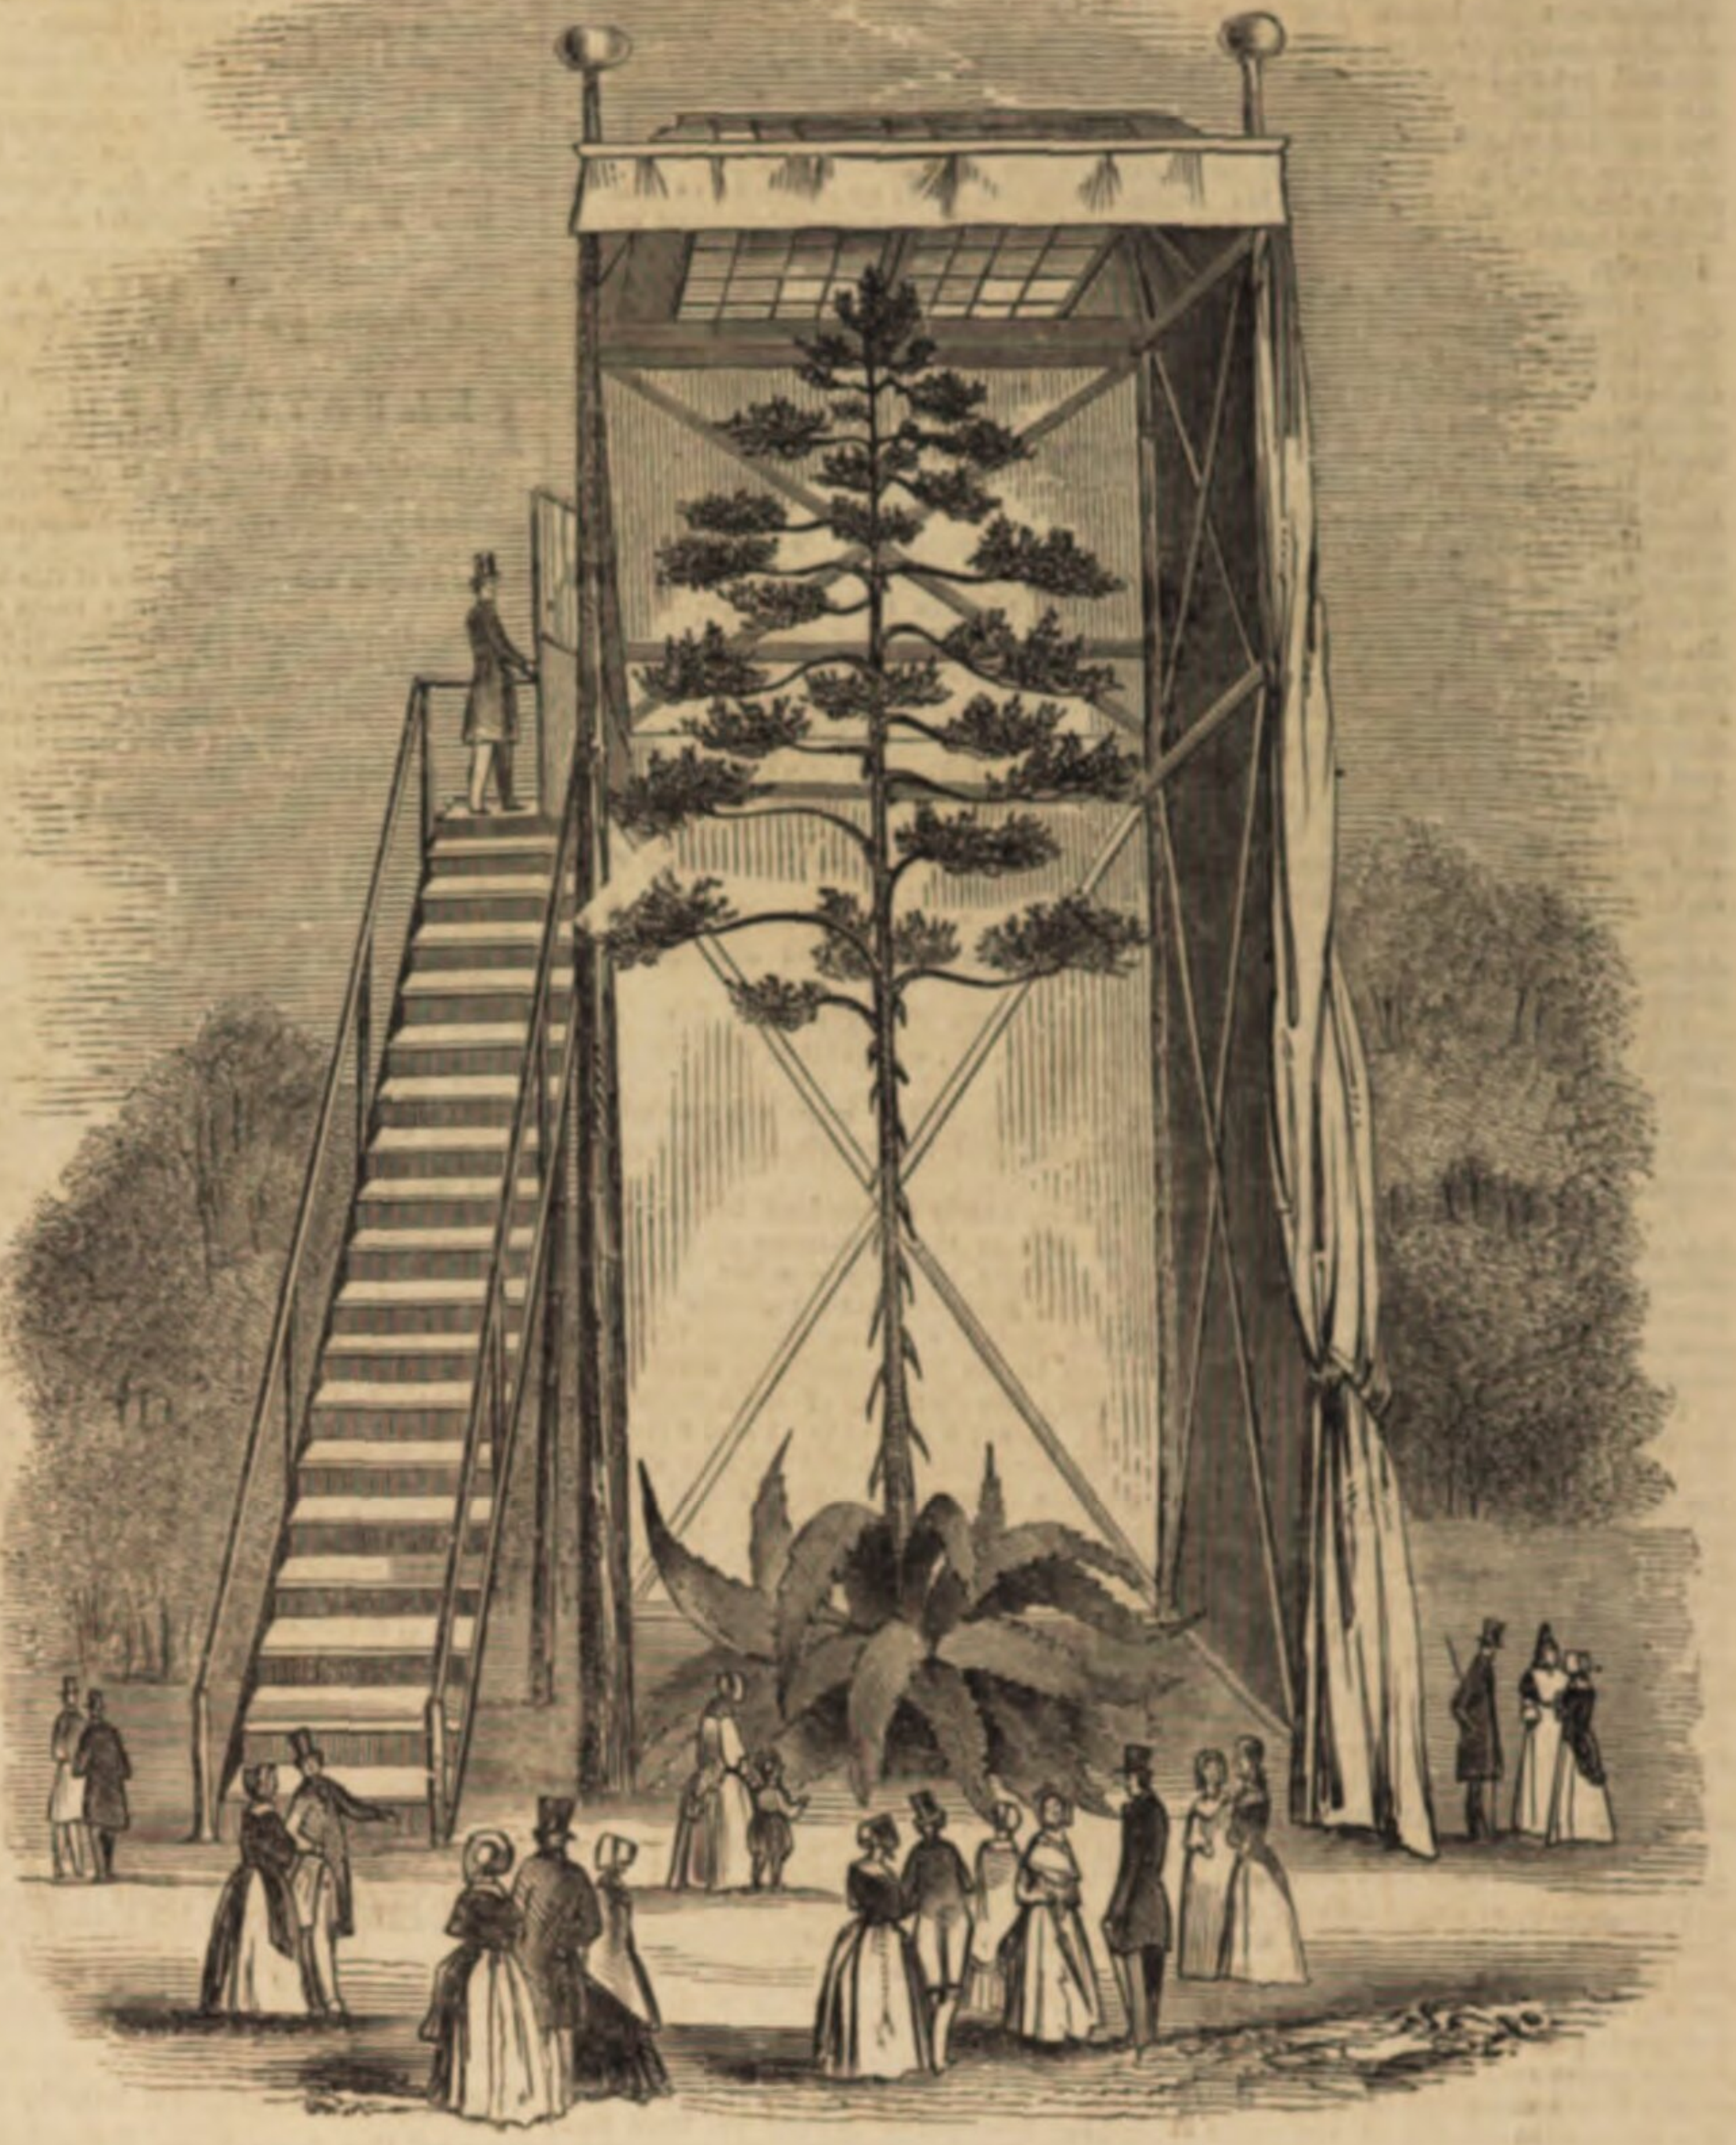
Improved Razors.—Messrs. Gilberts, of Sheffield, have succeeded in materially improving the form of the handle of this very serviceable implement, by certain bends and curvatures, which considerably aid its convenience in use; they have likewise made some judicious adaptations of the well-tempered blade; whilst the embellishment of the handle has not been neglected; so as, alogether, to produce a razor which, for elegance and utility, has not been equalled in specimens within our cognizance.

The Destitute Poor of London.—The Refuge for the Houseless Poor, which has been opened for several years in the City, will be ready for the reception of objects as soon as the severe weather shall have set in. It is the practice of the committee to throw open the doors of three asylums for the houseless poor in the city of London at the latter end of November. We are sorry to state that the demands upon the funds of the committee for the last year's expenses incurred by the influx of paupers into the city of London have reduced their means of affording assistance very considerably.

GREAT AMERICAN ALOE IN BLOOM.

A very fine specimen of the Agave Americana, or Great American Aloe, in a state of blossoming, is now to be seen in the garden of the Rev. E. Duke, at Lake House, near Amesbury, Wilts. Such an event always attracts a good deal of attention, as it is of rare occurrence, the plant being somewhat uncommon, and requiring many years in this climate—from 70 to 100—to enable it to flower, after which it dies. The present specimen is exactly a century old. The flower stem first made its appearance on July 1st, and shot upward with astonishing rapidity, sometimes amounting to a growth of six inches in twenty-four hours. Thirty-six lateral branches, of a graceful curved form, spring from the central stem, much after the fashion of a candelabrum. These branches are laden at their extremities with a profusion of flower buds, averaging, as we believe, 150 in a bunch. The flower stem has now, for some weeks, ceased to grow, having attained its extreme height of twenty-five feet. We understand from the gardener (who tells us that up to October 10, 1500 visitors had availed themselves of the permission to inspect it), the plant presents a spectacle as magnificent as it is rare among the many wonders of the herbaceous creation. Our engraving shows the plant, with a temporary staircase, by which visitors may ascend, the more closely to inspect the flowers.

Lake House, the mansion of the Rev. E. Duke, is situated in a valley on the banks of the Upper Avon, about six miles north of Salisbury, and two miles south-east of Stonehenge. It deserves attention as an excellent specimen of the residence of an English country gentleman, erected (most probably) in the time of good Queen Bess. Britton, in his "Beauties of Wilts," Vol. III., thus speaks of it:—"The house is a truly picturesque edifice, with bay windows, gables, and other characteristics of the mode of building which prevailed in the 16th, century. The gardens, with their terraces, yew hedges, &c., were laid out at the same time, and are characteristic of the same period."



GREAT AMERICAN ALOE IN BLOOM.

MONUMENT TO ADMIRAL SIR THOMAS MASTERMAN HARDY, ON BLAGDON HILL, DORSETSHIRE

The late anniversary of the Battle of Trafalgar (Monday, October 21st), was selected by the inhabitants of the County of Dorset, as the commencement of a work, which does equal honour to the heads and hearts of all concerned. On a day so auspicious in England's history, and so fraught with remembrances of noble hearts and gallant deeds, did a grateful band of generous Britons assemble to pay a just tribute to the memory of one who stood foremost in the hot melée, among the defenders of his country, their labour rendered doubly dear by the spot of his monumental pile being the place of his birth, and the associations of his early years being connected with every object which meets the eye from its elevated and commanding position.

At the foot of Blagdon Hill, near Dorchester, Admiral Sir Thomas Masterman Hardy was born, on the 5th of April, 1769, in the small village of Martin's MONUMENT TO ADMIRAL SIR THOMAS HARDY, ON BLAGDON HILL.

Town. On the 30th of November, 1781, he entered the navy, on board the Helena, as an officer's servant; was made midshipman on board the Hebe, 5th February, 1790; Lieutenant, on board the Meleager, on the 27th November, 1793; Commander on board the Mutine, 16th June, 1797; Captain on board the Vanguard, August 4th, 1798; and retired from the command of the Superb, August 11th, 1819, as a Commodore. Was made a Rear-Admiral, 27th May, 1825; and a Vice-Admiral of the White, 10th January, 1837; which he continued till his death, on the 20th September, 1839. Sir Thomas Hardy was Captain of Nelson's ship, the Victory, at Trafalgar, and received the naval hero in his arms as he fell. During the latter years of his life he was appointed Governor of Greenwich Hospital, at which excellent institution he died, sincerely and deservedly regretted by all who knew his kind and generous disposition.

In order to pay a just tribute to the memory of one, so much respected both in the service and in private circles, as well as to allot to the county of his birth its equitable share in the honour of his fame, a project was set on foot some months since by the inhabitants of Dorsetshire, Devonshire, &c., to erect some testimonial to secure both objects. A meeting was called of the inhabitants of the county, which was held at Dorchester, and most fully attended—the result being a subscription towards building a monumental pillar on the summit of the hill of Blagdon—a spot most appropriate for the purpose, as commanding magnificent views of the sea, and surrounding country. Designs were solicited from the most eminent architects, and numbers were sent in for the decision of the committee. The choice fell on the plan of Arthur Henry Dyke Acland, Esq., of Killerton, Devonshire. This gentleman is a magistrate of the county of Devon, son of Sir Thomas Dyke Acland, Bart., M.P. for the county (North Division), and brother of Thomas Dyke Acland, Esq., M.P. for West Somersetshire. Although an independent gentleman, and no architect by profession, he is most ardently attached to architectural pursuits; and although he was on the Hardy committee himself, yet on having sent in the design anonymously, and it being selected by the committee without the least knowledge of the designer, he left the committee, hoping they would put the superintendence of the structure into the hands of one of those who had sent in other good designs for competition. This, however, met with difficulty, and that of Mr. Acland, with the aid of an experienced builder—Mr. Goddard, of Bridport—has been proceeded with, most favourably and expeditiously.

The anniversary of the battle of Trafalgar saw the arrangements completed to the laying of the foundation stone, and that task was allotted to the lady of the High Sheriff of the county of Dorset, Mrs. Floyer, for whose hands so fit as those of the fair to weave the first wreath in memory's garland, over the ashes of the brave. The day was delightfully fine, and a company, numerous and highly respectable, assembled with anxious hearts to witness the proceedings.

On the summit of the hill, a spacious and handsome marquee was erected for the accommodation of the principal visitors, within which a sumptuous and elegant déjeûné was laid out by direction of the committee. The preliminary arrangements being concluded, Mrs. Floyer, accompanied by the High Sheriff (John Floyer, Esq.), the Mayor of Dorchester (Charles Criswick, Esq.), A. H. D. Acland, Esq. (the architect), E. Thorne, Esq., R.N., and other members of the committee, proceeded to the spot, where the ceremony of laying the foundation stone having been performed by Mrs. Floyer, a salute of fifteen guns was fired from the Nothe battery at Weymouth; the revenue cutters in that harbour and bay, and also the yachts of R. S. Wardell, Esq., and T. Halston, Esq., having hoisted full colours. The spectators were then addressed by the Mayor of Dorchester, who thanked Mrs. Floyer for her kindness in laying the stone, and proposed three cheers for that excellent lady, which was responded to with right good will, as well as three cheers for the High Sheriff.

The High Sheriff called for three cheers for their worthy architect, Mr. Acland, for the good service he had done on the occasion, which were heartily given.

Mr. Acland returned thanks, and three cheers were then given for the Navy which were acknowledged by E. Thorne, Esq., R.N., who served with the late gallant Admiral Hardy.

Three cheers were then given for the Committee, which were acknowledged by Mr. Hodges; and three cheers for the Queen, and the spectators then separated.

The marquee was soon crowded with ladies, nearly a hundred being entertained; the High Sheriff presiding, and as well as the gentlemen of the committee, assisting in everything that could conduce to their comfort. A large number of gentlemen subsequently sat down; nor were the humbler classes assembled on the Hill forgotten, as they were regaled with substantial fare and Dorset ale. The whole proceedings passed off in the most gratifying manner.

The pillar is intended to be in height 72 feet; the diameter of the base 28 feet at the ground level; the diameter of the shaft, 13 feet 6 inches to 11 feet 6 inches. Mr. Goddard, builder, of Bridport, takes the contract for building it at £450; the amount of subscriptions to the present time being something beyond £400. The design itself is solid, and without pretension; at the same time, it is most peculiarly fitted to withstand the rude shocks of time and weather, which its elevated and exposed situation is liable to. It is a simple octagon, with massive battering bases, gradually leading the eye upwards, from the form of the ground on which it is intended to stand. It is to contain a spiral staircase, which will afford, from the top, one of the most magnificent views to be found in the kingdom. Situate on a wild, uncultivated hill, 800 feet above the level of the sea, and not four miles from the nearest part of the open coast, its position is at once commanding and majestic. The boundless sea, stretching far out in dim distance—the dangerous Needles—the Start—the town of Weymouth—Wyke Church and Chisel Bank—Portland, with its Light-house—and, in far-off majesty, the lofty Somerset and Wiltshire hills—all are revealed to the eye at one range.

The immediate site is adjacent to that of a Peat-stack, erected by the Admiral himself when in charge of the Experimental Squadron. His native village, and his family property repose peacefully below, and it is from thence the materials for the erection of the column are obtained free of expense, owing to the kind permission of William Mansfield, Esq., his successor, and the owner of the site in question. The pillar is also upon the immediate site of one of the angles of the Trigonometrical survey of Great Britain. There will probably be a massive iron anchor at the foot of the column, but the inscription has not yet been decided on. The names, however, of the four great actions in which he was engaged, will probably be placed on it.

A more appropriate emblem to a Naval Warrior, could not be selected. His life passed in storm and tempest, is fitly represented by the unbending sternness of the rocky pile—the mariner as he steers his bark over the rippling sea, will hail it as a monument honourable to those who raised it, and memorable in its unflinching strength of the stout hearts which man the best defenders of Old England's power.

ILLUSTRATED LONDON ALMANACK
and PICTURESQUE CALENDAR FOR 1845.

It contains a greater variety of Information and seasonable entertainment than is to be found in any other Almanack. The Wrapper is beautifully printed in colours; and the artistical execution of the entire Almanack entitles it to a place upon every drawing-room table in the empire.

The Press is universal in praise of this beautiful Alamanack.

EXTRACTS FROM OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

"This is certainly one of the cheapest shilling's-worth that we have seen, even in this age of cheap publication. It contains some of the best Illustrations, for any common observer, of astronomical phenomena that have appeared for some years. From past recollections, we are satisfied that a few years ago a similar publication to this would not have remunerated its producers, even if sold at ten times its price."—Morning Chronicle.

"One of its features is an accurate representation of the principal astronomical phenomena of each month, accompanied with an intelligible description. The pages of the calendar are illustrated with highly fanciful designs of the signs of the zodiac, by Mr. Kenny Meadows; there are also scenes of the sports of each month, birds, and other illustrations. The literary matter is quite as good as the pictorial, and the quarto pages on which the Almanack is printed afford more room for explanation than can be obtained in the ordinary forms. One shilling for such a mass of information and amusement is wonderfully cheap."—Morning Post, Nov. 20.

"This is a new annual, the purpose of which is to blend illustrations with the customary information contained in an almanack. Its letter-press contents are as copious and varied as any of its contemporaries, and the illustrations, which are from the rich fancy of Mr. Kenny Meadows's pencil, comprise allegorical compositions applicable to each month, scenes of the sports of the month, &c. It is, upon the whole, not only a useful, but a most pleasing work."—Morning Advertiser, Nov. 15.

"A cheap year-book of astronomical phenomena and natural history, country sports and town amusements, chronology, and legislation. Of the numerous engravings those representing the telescopic appearances of the planets as they will be visible in the ensuing year are the most interesting, and are peculiar to this almanack."—Examiner.

"Is exceedingly well done, and full of information and good wood-cut adornments and illustrations. Its intrinsic merits, as well as its extrinsic attractions, are sufficient to insure for it a very general demand."—Literary Gazette, Nov. 17.

"It unites with calendarial information, astronomical observations, and recreations incident to each month, embracing as well, notes on natural history, and a mass of miscellanies as useful as it is entertaining. We repeat that this 'Illustrated Almanack' is a happy idea, beautifully executed, and preferring its claims to purchase even by a modern 'Elwes' in economy."—Era, Nov. 24.

"This is one of the many attempts to substitute something rational for the foolish almanacks of times that are passing away—and, we may add, one of the most successful. It is filled with illustrations, some of which, representing the signs of the Zodiac, are executed with considerable artistical taste. As it is chiefly devoted to the natural history of the months, it is just what the readers of the 'Gardeners' Chronicle' are most likely to find useful. It is difficult to imagine anything cheaper."—Gardeners' Chronicle.

"This is, beyond all doubt, the most extraordinary production of the British press. The illustrations are very beautiful. Kenny Meadows revels in the exuberance of his rich fancy, and Linton has done him ample justice in the engraving."—Lloyd's Weekly Newspaper.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 30, 1844.

WE last week referred briefly to the general question of the Election of the American President; it has since been decided, for though the formal election does not take place till December, the result of the contest is virtually determined by the majority of the electors returned for the purpose by the States. Mr. Polk has the majority of votes; his return is a triumph for the extreme democratic party—it is a victory of the Slaveholders over the Abolitionists—of the Southern States over the North—of the Repudiators over those who consider debt a moral and legal obligation. There never was such an instance as has been afforded by this election of a man springing at once from the utmost obscurity to the first station of the Government of his country. There seems in his case to have been no intermediate degrees of celebrity; yesterday his name had never been heard of, and today he is President of the Republic of America. Such are the world's slippery turns. Milton gives an example of one who was "by his demerits raised" to the "eminence" of the place he filled; we have no wish to apply the comparison invidiously, but of what may have been, or what are the merits of Mr. Polk, we at least are wholly ignorant. The name of Mr. Clay is known throughout Europe, as that of a man who has gained the reputation of an orator and a statesman, and it was scarcely imagined that one entirely unknown would have beaten him in the contest. We fear that a readiness to support the worst feature of the social and political system of America—slavery—has been no slight recommendation of Mr. Polk, who is also known to be favourable to the annexation of Texas to the United States, by which the South would probably gain an accession of strength. The Pro-Slavery party are, doubtless, at the present moment flushed with their victory; but in the eyes of all right-thinking men they are glorying in their shame. The slave-holding system is fast degrading them; even the papers that brought the intelligence of the contest contained evidence of the demoralization that the system produces. Under the head of "Legal Sales," there appears in the Columbus Times an advertisement of certain property, in which the following may be seen classed together:—

> One negro girl, by the name of Jane, eighteen years old, levied on as the property of Adam McCoy, to satisfy one fi. fa. from Talbot Superior Court; Thomas Shannon, vs. Adam McCoy.
> Also one Yoke of Oxen, as the property of Asa Daniel, to satisfy one fi. fa. from Harris Superior Court; Chaffin & Oneal, vs. Asa Daniel.

The following is also from the same announcement of property, to be sold "at the same time and place:"—

> One negro boy, by the name of George, about fourteen years old, and one fine Jackass, levied on as the property of Samuel Huey, to satisfy sundry fi. fas. issued from the Justice's Court of the 703rd Dist., G. M.; Thomas Culbreath, v. Samuel Huey.

These are the things, with the much more and much worse that is hidden behind this open violation of the laws of nature, religion, and humanity, that will make the civilised nations of Europe lament the issue of the contest for the Presidency of America. Mr. Clay, in looking back upon his past life, his labours, his fame, and the result of the contest, in which they have been to him as if they had never existed, will probably be painfully reminded of Iago's opinion of the value of reputation—"Tush, man; 'tis but a slight thing—oft got without merit, and lost without deserving." Without merit, as far as we can perceive, Mr. Polk has gained the election; and, without deserving such neglect at the hands of his countrymen, Mr. Clay has lost it.

THE Habeas Corpus question between the English Court of Judicature and the Island of Jersey, is assuming greater importance; there is evidently a principle at stake in the matter that must be decided, and the general feeling, as well as the weight of authority, are against the rights assumed by the Royal Court of the Island. It would be vain to quote here the opinions of Hale and Blackstone, and the old commentators on the Laws of England; they may be more fitly urged in the Courts, but reason and common sense alike point out the course that must be pursued, as a contemporary well observes:—

> Accept the law as laid down by the absurd court in Jersey, and any British subject may be kidnapped and carried to Jersey, there to remain a life prisoner, without bail or mainprize, or without relief from his Sovereign, though at Hong Kong or New Zealand such relief would promptly reach him. This is a state of things not to be borne; and which must be corrected even if the correction can be obtained by no other means than by sweeping away all the charters and privileges of the island.

THE City has been startled by a robbery on a large scale, a kind of "monster" depredation, planned and executed with an amount of skill truly alarming. It is the last of a series of felonies by which during the space of a year the monied world has been perplexed. The will forgeries of Barber and Fletcher had hardly ceased to be a topic of conversation before the Bank of England were again plundered by a fraud, which was wholly successful here, the amount of the loss only being recovered by the Bank in consequence of the total ignorance under which the delinquents seemed to labour, of there being such an article in the Ashburton treaty between this country and America as that which stipulates for the mutual delivering up of fugitive criminals; and at the very time when the survivor of the two delinquents in the last case is on his way to this country to be tried, a third case occurs, greater in the amount of loss than the two others put together. The age of highwaymen has departed; Captain Macheath himself could not "stop" a first class train; the attempts of daring villany, then, are not now so much directed against the moving, personal property of society, as against the masses of it that are banked, and they are made either by fraud or force, or, as seems probable in the present instance, with a combination of both. But the skill of those who commit such crimes, now bears no proportion to the facilities which society possesses for their detection; the form into which so much wealth is thrown, that of paper, renders the plunder gained by such a robbery as that at Messrs. Rogers' bank, almost unavailable; but a few hours elapse and every particular is known all over the country; and a few days, at farthest, carries every particular to the capitals of Europe; in either case, the attempts of the thieves to make use of their booty are paralysed; nor does either the Continent or America afford an asylum, as of old, to the fugitive criminal. Detection seems almost certain; we scarcely remember one great forgery, fraud, or robbery, within the last few years, that has not been followed by the prompt punishment of the guilty persons. Beaumont, of Exchequer Bill notoriety, was transported; Barber and Fletcher, though they brought legal skill and dexterity to their aid in planning and carrying out their system of deception and forgery, were convicted and transported also; Burgess and his associate, who obtained eight thousand pounds from the Bank of England, and fled with it, were taken on the other side of the Atlantic: one of them has destroyed himself, and the other is on his road to England, to undergo the trial, and, in all probability, the sentence of a felon. What is the lesson to be derived from all these skilful and daring acts of dishonesty? That not one of them baffled the pursuit of justice, and that those who "made haste to be rich," by plunging into crime, are now poor, miserable, justly despised; and from good, even exalted, positions, have fallen to a state of the most ignominious slavery. And yet, undeterred by these examples, men still engage in the perilous game against society and the laws, in which so many have failed before them!

At the Council Parliament was ordered to be prorogued from the 12th proximo to Tuesday, the 4th of February; then to meet for the dispatch of business. A grand banquet was given by her Majesty this evening; covers were laid for nearly forty Royal and distinguished guests. The band of the Royal Horse Guards (Blue) performed during the banquet, and the Queen's private band was in attendance the remainder of the evening. It is rumoured that her Majesty and Prince Albert, accompanied by the Duke and Duchess of Saxe Coburg, and the Duke Ernest of Wurtemberg, will leave the Castle in the course of the ensuing month, for a short séjour at the Pavilion, at Brighton. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent has presented the sum of £20 towards the purchase of a new organ for the parish church of New Windsor.

Lady Charlotte Giffard died last week at Wolverhampton at the age of 81.

On Saturday last the Queen, accompanied by her Royal Highness the Duchess of Saxe-Coburg and Gotha, took a carriage airing, attended by the Marchioness of Douro, Madame la Baronne de Wangenheim, and the Hon. Miss Hamilton, Colonel Arbuthnot, Equerry in Waiting, attended on horseback.

Prince Alfred.—The birth of his Royal Highness Prince Alfred was registered at Windsor Castle on Monday. The Castle and its precincts being extra-parochial, it was necessary to register the birth of the infant Prince in the books of the parish contiguous to where the auspicious event took place; but, in consequence of upwards of six weeks having elapsed since that period, a fee of 7s. 6d. was necessarily incurred. The Prince was registered in the name of Alfred Ernest Albert. His Royal Highness Prince Albert was present.

The Queen Dowager.—On Sunday, her Majesty and his Serene Highness Prince Ernest of Hesse Phillipsthal attended Divine service at Witley Church.

Mrs. Blomfield had been in her accustomed health during the day—indeed had been walking in the town. In the afternoon she complained of unusual symptoms; these, increasing, ended fatally at about eight p.m. The Right Rev. Bishop of London was expected in his native town to officiate at the re-opening of St. Mary's Church. Strange and melancholy to say, his arrival took place at the moment of dissolution. Mrs. Blomfield was, we believe, in her 80th year.

Present to her Majesty.—Some ladies at Fonthill, Wilts, are engaged in the manufacture of two beautiful pieces of cushion lace, which they intend forwarding as a present to her Majesty. The first piece is 24 yards in length, and 4½ inches wide. It is ornamented throughout with emblems of royalty. The bottom edge represents shell work interwoven with vine leaves and grapes. The work is without join or laying on, and is composed of thread of fine gold twist of delicate texture. In the centre are introduced the profile of the Queen and the names of the different branches of the Royal Family. At intervals the crown of England, the rose, thistle, and shamrock, the Bible and sceptre, are ingeniously portrayed. The second piece of lace is of similar construction; it is a yard square, and is ornamented with devices in thread and gold. The ladies have been engaged nearly two years in the work.

EPITOME OF NEWS—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

A letter from Munich, of the 15th, says: "A dreadful crime was committed here yesterday. While Captain N—— was attending his duties at the Ministry of War, his wife, only twenty years of age, and the female servant of the house in which she resided, were murdered. A razor, with which the crime was perpetrated, was found near them, and all the closets and drawers had been plundered of their most valuable contents. The man servant of Capt. N——, who is suspected of being the murderer, has fled."

Mona's Herald states that Sir James Graham has been in communication with the authorities of the Isle of Man, and has declared, "in the most unqualified and unreserved terms," that if the people desire popular representation in the House of Keys (an anomalous kind of local legislature and board of management), Ministers are prepared to concede the boon to the fullest extent.

Two individuals have been sentenced to death at the Brabant assizes for murder. It appears that they belonged to an association of young men, formed in the village of Bael, near Aerschot, for the singular purpose of fomenting quarrels with the young men of the neighbouring hamlets. The association had organised a body of partisans, whose sole business it was to act as witnesses whenever any of the members got into trouble, and who, of course, always threw the blame upon their opponents. The execution is appointed to take place in the village of Bael.

The Italian Opera of Lisbon has been suddenly brought to a close by the bankruptcy and flight of the "Empresario," the unfortunate performers being left minus their salaries.

The Prussian papers state, that it is in contemplation by the Government to oblige the editors of newspapers to give up the names of their correspondents. [This would be a worse species of despotism than that of the censorship.]

Dr. Wolff is still at Meshed, from which place he was unwilling to proceed till he had received an escort from Colonel Shiel at Teheran. According to accounts from Batavia to the 26th of July, a fire broke out at Sisier, on the 6th of that month, which destroyed the dwelling and out-buildings of M. Von Viotin, jun., contractor with the Government for the preparation of coffee. The mills, the warehouses, and the contents happily escaped. FATAL AND MELANCHOLY ACCIDENT ON THE MIDLAND COUNTIES RAILWAY.

The subjoined account of the melancholy accident on the Midland Counties Railway, appeared in our late impression last week. We now add a report of the inquest on the sufferers:—

We regret to announce that a very serious accident took place on Thursday on the Midland Counties Railway, at Beeston, near Nottingham. In consequence of the fog, the down-train from Nottingham came into contact with a train coming to that town.

In consequence of the down-train being driven at so much more rapid a pace than the train from Nottingham, and being a much heavier train, and having a powerful and very heavy engine, the up-train from Nottingham sustained the principal part of the damage. So great was the force with which the down-train met the up-train, that the engine of the latter was actually driven from its position downwards, and the boiler was elevated to the height of many feet above it, the tender of the engine was driven through the parcel-carriage, and the two passenger second-class conveyances were as completely smashed to pieces as a nutshell when trodden under foot. The unfortunate passengers in these two carriages were dreadfully crushed and mutilated.

We subjoin as complete a list of the passengers and the nature and extent of the injuries they sustained, as we have been able to procure.

LIST OF KILLED AND WOUNDED.

Mr. Dean, Hounds' Gate, dead.

Mr. John Neep, of middle age, of Retford, lies at the General Hospital, but hopes are entertained of his recovery. The extent of injury cannot at present be ascertained, and, besides being sadly bruised, it is feared some of his ribs are broken.

George Burley, about 30 years of age, stoker, seriously scalded and burnt—the fire and boiling water having fallen upon him from the engine, when forced upwards by the collision. We understand he was on the engine coming from Derby.

Mr. J. Bowlestridge, landlord of the Three Horse Shoes, Derby Road, and Miss Ann Gretton, of Stoke Cliff, Staffordshire, were conveyed to the Three Horse Shoes, Derby Road. They were much bruised.

Mr. Gretton, Burton-on-Trent, severely crushed.

Mr. Bradley, Southwell, farmer, leg broken.

Mr. Varnalls, formerly butler at Colwick Hall (dead.) The distressing news of his death was instantly despatched to Mrs. V., who is housekeeper at Mr. Strutt's, Derby.

Mr. Arnold, medical instrument-maker, seriously hurt.

Mr. Garrett, surgeon, of London, extensively injured.

Robert Thornhill, lace-manufacturer, slightly crushed.

David Fox, employed at Mr. Gill's silk-mill, arm broken.

Misses Ann and Maria Lewis, of Sneinton (seriously hurt), owing to the violence of the concussion, were thrown out of the carriage, and, their dresses becoming entangled, they were nearly stripped. One of them had actually the sole of her shoe torn off.

Mr. Robinson, traveller (very much bruised).

Mr. Thistlewood, of Lincoln (ditto).

Mr. Nixon, Hounds' Gate (ditto, and tooth broken out).

Mr. George Baker, Woolpack-lane (slightly bruised).

Mr. John Wildey, Pelham-street (bruised).

Mr. Tutin, senior, butcher, Nottingham (bruised).

Miss Surplice, of Beeston, escaped injury by leaping out of the carriage.

A subsequent letter from Nottingham says, that a gentleman of Lenton had expired since the accident, through injuries sustained, and the stoker is not likely to recover. Another person is also said to have died.

THE INQUEST ON MR. VARNALLS.

On Friday morning, Mr. Swan, the coroner, held an inquest upon the body of Mr. W. Varnalls, formerly a gentleman's butler, at the Wheat Sheaf Inn, in Lenton.

After viewing the body, which was found to be in a very livid and bloody state, blood having been flowing from the nostrils profusely, and the right leg smashed, the Jury took their seat, and the coroner proceeded to examine the witnesses.

Thomas Cooper, lace-maker, said—"I was at Beeston station, intending to return to Nottingham by train. The train was delayed from some cause, and when it came it was on the wrong line—the down line. Mr. Lightfoot was upon the tender: the engine whistled much. As the train was going past the station, some one shouted out to a boy, Tom, to turn the train on to the other line, by moving the points; he did so, and Mr. Lightfoot got off; he (Mr. Lightfoot) came back to the Beeston station. After a short delay, Lightfoot mounted the tender. He told the engine-driver to go at slow speed: the train started. I did not remove after the train started, until I heard the crash; it was a loud crash and took place in about two minutes after the starting of the train. When I got to the place, I saw two trains crashed into one another, both on the same line: I saw Mr. Dean, and assisted to remove him into a cart. Some of the passengers were lying on the ground, apparently hurt. All were not out of the carriages.' By the Foreman—"No one said anything to witness about the impropriety of starting the down train."

Some other witnesses were examined, and the inquiry was adjourned.

The inquest proceeded for several days. The evidence was so precisely of the same character as that at the other inquest, given below, that it is unnecessary to repeat it. The inquiry was continued to a late hour on Tuesday, and was adjourned to Wednesday morning, when the coroner and jury re-assembled. Among the witnesses examined on that day were Kearsley and Markland, the engine-drivers; Joseph Mowett, of Derby, an engineer; and John Boulton, of Long Easton, overlooker of the contractor of the permanent way, &c. There was nothing new in the evidence. Mr. Caunt, of Nottingham, surgeon, who had made a post mortem examination of the body of Varnalls, stated the nature of the injuries received by the deceased. The principal seat of injury was in the right leg, the integuments of which were lacerated from just below the knee to the ankle; the thigh bone was likewise fractured. Death resulted from the shock which his nervous system had received. Witness did not think that the circumstance of his having been refused admission into Mr. Godfrey's house made any difference, as he had lost too much blood ere he reached Lenton to leave any chance of recovery.

The inquest was resumed on Wednesday afternoon, and several witnesses were examined. Mr. Lightfoot was one of them, but his evidence was similar to that already given. Some rather serious personal altercations took place in the course of the inquiry, which was ultimately adjourned to Monday next.

INQUEST UPON THE BODY OF MR. DEAN.

On Friday evening Mr. M. Browne, coroner for the town, held an inquest at the General Hospital upon the other sufferer, Mr. J. Dean, of Hound's gate, Nottingham. The evidence given was very similar to that adduced in the case of Mr. Varnalls. An adjournment took place till Monday. On that day it was resumed, and was again adjourned.

The following evidence, given by Robert Lightfoot, the station-master of Nottingham, comprises the most essential portion of the proceedings on Tuesday. Mr. Lightfoot stated that he had suffered greatly in mind since the accident, not having had more than a single hour's sleep at one time from the period of the unfortunate occurrence to the present, and he should, therefore, read to the jury a statement of all the circumstances with which he was acquainted in connexion with it. He then read as follows:—I am manager and station-master at the Nottingham railway station. I went into the yard at about a quarter to two o'clock on Thursday last, when I met a man, who said to me that an engine was off the line. I immediately went up, and saw John Kearsley, the engineer, and several men, trying to disengage the engine from the tender, the tender being off the line. Kearsley informed me then that he had sent Howitt up to Beeston station, to stop any train that might be coming down the line, until the quarter past two train had passed, as he intended to send the quarter past two London train up the down line. My reply was, there was great danger, from the fog. His answer then was, there was plenty of time before any train was due, meaning the down trains; and that he would give instructions to Jerry to blow his whistle, and go with caution until he got up the line, meaning changing to the other side, at Beeston. At this time Mr. Youle, the Nottingham director, was passing through Wilford-gates, on horseback. I went to him, to explain the situation of the engine and tender, stating that Kearsley intended sending up the down line the two hours fifteen minutes London train. I asked Mr. Youle if I should go on the engine to see if the driver was careful in going, and blowing his whistle all the way to Beeston, as there might be men working on the down line, or persons crossing at the time. He said, "By all means do so," or words to that effect. I then went to the men who were working at the engine. Up to this time the engine attached to the tender was the great obstacle which caused delay. After the engine was disengaged, I said to the men, "All will be right now very soon, and the engine clear." One of the men said, "Yes, in a short time." I then got on the engine of the London train, that had started from the station, fully convinced in my own mind that the line would be quite clear before the ten minute before three train would start, and never for a moment supposing the least possibility of a second train being sent off on the wrong line, without some previous intimation, or I should never have put myself in such a dangerous situation. We proceeded with the up-train with great caution, whistling every thirty or forty yards, until we came in sight of Beeston station, passing Howitt about two hundred yards on this side of the station. Jerry, the driver, stopped the train on the departure line. I got on, and the train went forward. I crossed the line to the station-house, to explain to Mr. Raven, the station-master, the cause of my coming up on the wrong line, and I said that the two hours and fifty minutes, or next train, would come up the right line. Immediately after, Howitt came up perspiring very much and quite exhausted. He asked me for 6d. to go and get some spirits; I think he said rum. I referred him to Raven, and he (Howitt) borrowed something from him and went to the Victoria Inn. Howitt arrived back at the station before the arrival of the train from Derby. Immediately on the arrival of that train I went to the engine-driver to inform him what had occurred at the Nottingham station, stating the caution I had used in coming up, and the same caution he was to observe in going down. We proceeded slowly on, whistling as we went. I was watching the line to see that no person or anything was on the line, when I called out, "Good God! there is a train coming, and on our line." The engine man did something to his engine and jumped off. I followed, but, catching my foot, I tumbled over, making a complete somersault, and lay for a short time senseless. As soon as I recovered I sent the guard to the Beeston station to stop the London down-train.

In answer to questions from the jury, Mr. Lightfoot said he was convinced at the time, from his experience, that the tender would be off the line in time for the second train. Witness would not, of course, have proceeded back to Nottingham with the down train which came in collision, if he supposed that there was any possibility of a second train coming up on the wrong line, for he is the master of the train, and he could refuse to go. The engineman must obey the orders of the guard, so that if the engineman went on the wrong line the responsibility of doing so would be on the guard.

In the course of the proceedings, a Juror asked, is there any understanding as to which train, the up or down train, must be kept back in case of accident interfering with the rail? Witness—I am not aware of any such understanding.

Coroner—We have it in evidence that there are two sets of rails which do not correspond with each other; that one set (the old set) was in operation with some of the men till the day after the accident, and that the other (the new) was not in operation with the others on the 9th of November. I wish you to explain this.

Mr. Youle—It is the duty of Mr. Knitley to see that the engineers have proper copies of the rules.

Coroner—Do you know how it is that the whole of the drivers have not been provided with regulations of the same description? Mr. Youle—I do not.

Coroner—The regulations affecting changing the rails differ materially in the two sets of regulations, and yet some of the servants had one set of regulations, and others another set.

Mr. Youle—Mr. Knitley, the principal engineer, I understand, arranges that.

The Coroner—I should wish very much to have it explained.

A Railway Director—It shall be explained.

A Juror—Naikland (the driver of the engine which was on the wrong line) did not get the new regulations till Friday morning after the accident, so that you went to the insurance-office after the fire.

The inquest on the body of Mr. Dean was continued to a late hour on Tuesday night, and then adjourned to Friday morning.

The witnesses examined were—Mr. John Chadbourne, of Pinxton, Derbyshire, miller, one of the passengers; Joseph England, of Alfreton, saddler, another passenger; John Fisher, the engine-driver, who directed the train from Derby which came in contact with the one from Nottingham; John Kearsley, another engine-driver, who spoke to the circumstances attending the getting off of the train at the Nottingham station; Mark Marland, the engine-driver of the train from Nottingham which ran into that from Derby. This person did not guide the train on Thursday afternoon, though he was with it.

All these persons spoke to circumstances which had been previously elucidated, the tendency of their evidence being to attach neglect on the part of the company's servants.

Mr. Hutchinson, one of the managing directors, was also examined. Nothing very material was elicited from his evidence. A great portion of the day was taken up in discussing objections raised by Mr. Campbell, solicitor for Mr. Lightfoot, and this gave rise to a good deal of recrimination on both sides.

POSTSCRIPT.

A Cabinet Council was held at two o'clock yesterday afternoon at the Foreign-office. Sir Robert Peel came to town from Windsor Castle to attend the meeting; most of the other ministers were also present.

Death of Lady Emily Bryce.—We have to announce the demise of the above lady, widow of the gallant Admiral Bryce, who expired on Monday last at her residence at Cheltenham.

We hear that the quarter's revenue, as far as it has gone, presents an improved aspect; this is the case, we learn, both in the Customs department and the Post-office. The Tariff is also said to be working well with France and the Netherlands. According to report, if the revenue comes up, as is expected, to the end of the quarter, Sir Robert Peel will reduce the Income-tax to 3½d. in the pound.

Fourteen persons were, yesterday, examined at Marlborough-street, charged with having been found in a common gambling house. The defendants had been apprehended that morning, at No. 64, St. James's-street. There were billiard tables in the room, but no complaints of gambling, and Mr. Hardwicke being of opinion that the evidence was insufficient to convict the defendants of the offence charged, dismissed them.

A true bill has been found by the Middlesex Grand Jury against Mrs. Jane Tyrwhytt, for the late robbery at the Soho Bazaar. The trial has been postponed on the application of the accused.

At the Central Criminal Court, yesterday, Alfred Edwards was tried for the murder of Jane Gregory, an unfortunate girl, by administering poison to her. The occurrence took place at Bethnal-green, in September last, and we gave the particulars at the time. On the evidence of the medical witnesses, the Judge stopped the case, and the jury acquitted the prisoner.

The late Bank Robbery.—We are requested by Messrs. Rogers, Olding, and Co., to inform the public that all the boxes and property of their friends remained undisturbed, and that the robbery affected their own property only.

A man named Brown, a seaman on board the Sir Charles Napier, of St. Stephen's, has been examined at Liverpool on a charge of stabbing Captain Reed, the commander of that vessel, on the 16th instant, in long. 26, west. The captain is in a very dangerous condition. The prisoner committed the act in consequence of being rebuked by the captain for being tardy in his movements.

FOREIGN.

Greece.—A letter from Athens, dated Nov. 10, gives the unexpected intelligence of the dismissal of Sir Richard Church, without the slightest notice, from his situation of Inspector-General of the Greek Army, and the appointment of Grivas in his place.

United States.—Arrival of the Hibernia.—The Hibernia has arrived at Liverpool, with New York papers, a week later than those brought by the Great Western. The intelligence in these papers confirms the success of Mr. Polk, and the triumph of the Democratical party. This subject, of course, entirely engrosses the attention of the American editors. Mr. Polk is treated by all parties as if duly elected to the Presidentship. The Canadian papers record the success of the Conservative party at the elections. The papers contain later news from Peru, in letters from Lima, which bring accounts of the total defeat of General Vivanco by General Castilla, near Arequina. The former had arrived at Lima with the greater part of his officers, as fugitives, and has been exiled by the Government, which has declared in favour of the constitution of 1838, and the legal authorities instituted by the same. The American commercial intelligence is of no moment. Nearly all the state stocks had fallen in price. The cotton market was also very dull.

THE "MIGNON" OF SCHEFFER.

Our limited space hardly allows us to give any particular account of the subject of Scheffer's two exquisite pictures. Such of our readers as are at all acquainted with German literature, cannot but have admired that most delicate and beautifully mysterious creation of the greatest of German poets, and, perhaps, the greatest artist among authors—Goethe. For those to whom the German is altogether unknown, we would say that Mignon is one of the chief characters in Goethe's novel of "Wilhelm Meister." Wilhelm first sees her in company with certain rope-dancers and jugglers, a dark-haired, strange-looking child, the slave of those people and a part of their show. He rescues her from the brutality of one of the posture-men, and takes charge of her. The child had been stolen from her friends in Italy, the place of her birth. In the depth of her loneliness and despair during her wandering life, she had sworn to herself never to say who or what she was. She attaches herself to Wilhelm, and as she grows to womanhood, becomes—searcely knowing it, and he utterly ignorant of it—ardently in love with him. She wanders some while with him, for he protects her as a father, but is ultimately separated from him, and dies broken-hearted. It would require a long article to give anything like an analysis of the subtly-drawn and mysterious character of Mignon, to present our readers with even a faint idea of the intense feeling and passion, the melancholy, the indefinite longing and aspiration, which consume her half-developed, her fragile, and delicate organization.

Scheffer has taken this exquisite creation of the poet as the subject of two paintings, that are perfect gems of art; they are remarkable for the degree to which they unite the qualities of simplicity and feeling. He has not chosen, as a less thoughtful artist would have done, those passages of the novel in which Mignon is presented surrounded by accessories that seem to invite the painter or illustrator; he has not placed her amid the thoughtless and admiring crowd, in the gay costume of the dancing girl: "A short silk waistcoat, with slashed Spanish sleeves, tight trousers, with puffs, looked very pretty on the child: its long black hair was curled, and wound in locks and plaits about its head. Wilhelm looked at the figure with astonishment, and could not determine whether to take it for a girl or boy. However, he decided for the latter." "He reckoned her about twelve or thirteen years of age; her body was well formed, only her limbs gave promise of a stronger growth, or announced a stunted one. Her countenance was not regular, but striking; her brow full of mystery; her nose extremely beautiful. Her mouth had an air of frankness that was very lovely." This is not the Mignon that Scheffer has painted; he has taken her at a more advanced period of the tale, when she has become the passionate girl, nourishing a secret and a hopeless love, and haunted with dim memories of her mysterious birth, and of her distant home; at times, as in a day dream, she recalls the scenes among which she must have passed her infancy, and sighs for the "distant land" she so beautifully describes in her song; this is the Mignon that "Scheffer" has given us; we subjoin the song itself, for it is a fitting accompaniment to the picture:—

MIGNON REGRETTING HER COUNTRY.

Know'st thou the land where citrons bloom, and where
The golden orange breathes its fragrant air?
Where winds are ever so't, and blue the skies,
Where myrtles spring, and groves of laurel rise?
Know'st thou that land, my love? Away, away,
Oh! might I with thee mid its beauty stray!

Know'st thou that mansion's roof—its lofty walls,
Its stately chambers and its sculptured halls,
Whose still cold statues seem to ask of me,
What, child of sorrow, have men done to thee?
Know'st thou that mansion, dearest? Come! O come!
With thee, my guardian, I would o'er it roam!

Know'st thou the mountain rising to the cloud,
That hides the mule-track in its misty shroud?
Where caverns hold the dragon's scaly brood,
Where rocks roll down beneath the torrent's flood?
Know'st thou it well? That region dost thou know?
My father, come! Oh! thither let us go!*

The companion picture, "Mignon aspiring to Heaven," represents her as she is described towards the close of the tale; every hope is gone, and she is longing for the hour that shall bring with it the peace of the grave. Her thoughts are here, too, thrown into the form of poetry, and she is introduced singing, as before, a song, which has been re-printed in the collected poems of Goethe, under the title of "Madchensehnsucht nach dem Tode"—the "Maiden's desire for death"—though it is better described by the title of the painting, "Mignon aspiring to Heaven." To explain it will be necessary to say that she has been robed in white to represent an angel, on a birth-day fête of two children, when she was to distribute to the party the basket of little presents that are given on such occasions, and she is unwilling to quit the character she has assumed. Through the greater part of the story, too, she wears the dress of a boy, in which Wilhelm finds her; she will take no other.

THE THEATRES.

With the exception of Balfe's new opera, at Drury Lane, there has been little novelty during the past week at the theatres.

The Haymarket bill remains as per last; and appears from the good houses to be drawing money, a light farce or two being sufficient to back it up.

At the Princess', Douglas Jerrold's drama of the "Rent Day" has been revived, with Messrs. Wallack and Walter Lacy in their original characters. It has lost none of its attractions, but was greeted, on Wednesday evening, with the same attention and applause which distinguished its former representation, and forms an excellent piece for the off-nights, when the "Castle of Aymon" is not played.

The Adelphi has also fallen back upon revivals, and the "Wreck Ashore" has formed one of them, in which Mrs. Yates played Alice with the same deep pathos and power as of old—Mr. O. Smith and Mrs. Fitzwilliam resuming their original parts of Grampus and Bella. "Cupid" was the other reproduction, and may, with great advantage, go back again to the dusty shelf from which it was routed out. Notions of fun have gone into different lines since John Reeve played in this burlesque; and nothing could well be more flat than its reception on Monday. Not the least pleasing theatrical remark of the week is, that the different "Cæsar de Bazans" are gradually being heard of no more. The Princess' was certainly the best—to our thinking the only, version; and we question if any of the others were of much benefit to the managements under which they were produced.

The Lyceum has brought out a new drama, by Mr. Fitzball, but too late for us to notice it this week: and Mr. àBeckett's drolleries in the "Knight and the Sprite," are nightly rewarded with laughing audiences at the Strand.

The Olympic, so pompously opened as the "home for the legitimate drama," appears to have proved rather an uncomfortable abode: as the legitimate has already begun to alternate with the "terrific"—"The Six Degrees of Crime" being played three nights a week, as a first piece. It is very nicely put upon the stage, and respectably acted; and will, possibly, prove of greater service to the treasury, than the charitable intentions towards the drama would ever have done.

And lastly, but far from being the least, Sadlers Wells is yet flourishing: "The Lady of Lyons" having been admirably performed every night during the week to excellent genuine houses.

DRURY-LANE.

Of a verity, Mr. Balfe is a most industrious man; he writes operas at railway speed; for Italy, Germany, France, or England, no matter where—it is all the same to him; he will undertake to compose half a dozen partitions in the year, and all of them, as Fame and Time have hitherto proved, possessing merit of the highest order. Now, people who are non-musicians cannot form an adequate notion of the enormous quantity of penmanship, not to say anything of the creative genius, or fluent fancy, which all this requires. Balfe's scores are generally very full—he writes on folio music-paper, specially ruled for him, of which he consumes sometimes upwards of a thousand pages in the notation of one opera. This must certainly keep his pen and ink in almost perpetual requisition. He composes on the Italian plan, that is, he never stops to make comparisons of thoughts —he puts down every suggestion as it comes, and hence it is not to be wondered at that sometimes he is mediocre, or deficient in originality.

On Wednesday last he produced a new opera at this house, entitled "The Daughter of St. Mark." The libretto (by Mr. Bunn) is founded upon a passage in the annals of Venice, but embroidered, or rather distorted sufficiently to render it fit for the stage. The cast was as follows:—Lusignano, Burchiori; Andrea, Borrani; Moncenigo, Weiss; Adolphe, Harrison; Caterina, Miss Rainforth. In the first act Caterina is about to be married to Adolphe de Courcy, when the nuptials are interrupted by one of the "Ten', who tells her uncle that, instead of the French Knight, she must wed the King of Cyprus. The nuptials are accordingly broken off, and a noisy finale proclaims the discontent of all parties. We cannot complain of too much incident so far. The second act presents an attempt on the part of Adolphe to induce Caterina to elope, who considerately declines the temptation, by informing him that were she to attempt it, his life would be the forfeit, as she knew, from the best authority, that there were bravi concealed "behind the arras," who would rush forth, and assassinate him. Adolphe seems to say he could brave a hundred arms for her sake, but the lady is inexorable, and the French Count departs, taxing her inconstancy in no very measured terms. In the next scene we find Caterina in Cyprus, received as Queen at the port of Farnagosta, and the act concludes. In the third act we find that Adolphe has followed Caterina to Cyprus, where she, being discovered in a secret meeting with him, is condemned to death, and is about to be executed, when a discovery is made that she is the daughter of Moncenigo, on which the King of Cyprus yields her up to Adolphe, and the matter, we mean the curtain, drops. So much for the libretto—now let us see what the composer has done—what flesh he has put upon this skeleton, and much of the success of the piece depended upon him. We do not like the overture, or, indeed, any of Balfe's overtures—they are too rambling and noisy. The finale to the first act is the only thing in it which is truly beautiful—it is composed in the highest range of dramatic music. We suspect that Mr. B. musical, more than Mr. B. managerial, had the construction of the first scene in the second act: the music of which is scientifically ingenious, and dramatically effective, as is also that of the finale. Caterina's reception at Cyprus affords the composer an opportunity to display the richest resources of a rich invention. The third act possesses no great claims on our approbation, with the exception perhaps of rather a pretty ballad "Oh, Smile as thou wert wont to Smile."

The finale consists of a graceful rondo, nicely sung by Miss Rainforth. On the whole, it would seem to us that Mr. Balfe preferred in this opera to write solid, well-concerted music, than light ad captandum melodies. It certainly adds to his fame as a composer; his accompaniments exhibit more of the organ of constructiveness and originality than those of any of his previous productions, and if there be now and then a little of the "Light of others' days" about the whole, we must say it is most prismatically wrought into new colours. It is hardly necessary to say that the opera was entirely successful. All the principal singers, with Mr. Balfe and——Mr. Bunn, were called for at the fall of the curtain. The house was crammed, and owing to the ingenious (!) construction of a side box we could get but an imperfect view of the scenery, which, the last work of poor Grieve's hand, is very beautiful, particularly in the 2nd act.

Improvements in the Tower.—This ancient fortress is undergoing such extensive alterations and improvements as will not only render it of more importance as regards its garrison, but equally add to the beauty of the many interesting historical buildings therein known to the public. A new grand entrance will form the most important improvement. It is to be immediately facing Upper Thames-street, and will be approached by a drawbridge. To effect this alteration, the well-known Spur-gate is to be demolished, that part of the old ditch between the Warders'-hall and Spur-gate filled up, so as to build upon, and a new one in a line with the ditch that runs along the water-side is to be made, so as to run outside the grand entrance, in accomplishing which a large space of ground will be added to the fortress, without encroachment on the public right of way on Tower-hill. The Spur-gate barracks, the well-known menagerie buildings, the new ticket office, the Spur guard-room, and the ramparts adjacent, are all to be razed to the ground, and on their site to be built substantial erections for public offices. Perhaps the greatest importance of having the new entrance is, that there will be a direct line of communication through the Tower, from Tower-hill to East Smithfield. The two archways almost at the extreme eastern end of the fortress, leading to what is termed the Irish barracks, at the south-east angle, are to be removed, and the Irish barracks, now used for the accommodation of the troops, are to be converted into store-rooms. The alterations intended immediately adjacent to the grand parade are equally extensive. The houses on the right, after passing under the Bloody Tower to the parade, now the residence of some of the warders, will be destroyed, as also the guard-room, and all the buildings, in fact, contiguous to the White Tower, are to be swept away, so as to throw that interesting and stately structure to the full view of the spectator, many of its beauties being hidden by the unsightly buildings that are attached to it. The buildings to the west of the parade are to be pulled down, to make room for more substantial erections. The Beauchamp Tower, which stands on the west side of the parade, will be thrown open to public view; and when the records are removed to the New Houses of Parliament, the White Tower will be open for public inspection, it certainly being the greatest novelty, and possessing more interesting features, than anything else in the fortress.

The Weather.—In the early part of Wednesday the metropolis was again visited by a very dense fog, which in respect of locality varied in a singular manner. It commenced at daybreak in some portions of London, while others were perfectly clear; and later in the day the City was completely enveloped, while parts of the town before visited were left perfectly clear, with bright sunshine. On Thursday also it was rather foggy. The Liverpool papers state that a sharp frost had set in there, which, it was hoped, would put an end to the typhus fever which had prevailed for sometime in the town.

MIGNON ASPIRING TO HEAVEN.

MIGNON ASPIRING TO HEAVEN.

Such let me seem till such I be,
  Take not my snow-white robe away!
Soon from the dreary Earth I flee
  Up to the glittering realms of day.

There first a little space I'll rest,
  Then ope my eyes with joyful mind.
In robes of lawn no longer drest,
  Girdle and garland left behind.

And those calm shining sons of Morn
  They ask not touching Maid or boy,
No robes, no garments, there are worn,
  The frame is purged from sin's alloy.

Through life, 'tis true, I have not toil'd,
  Yet anguish long my heart has wrung,
Untimely woe my cheek has spoiled,
  Make me again for ever young.

The artist to whom the world owes these two exquisite paintings, Ary Scheffer, was born in Holland, in 1796. His father was a painter also, and died at an early age, when the widow, with her three sons, removed to Paris. Ary, the eldest, was then fourteen, and had already shown a decided aptitude for his father's profession. At eleven years of age he painted a Hannibal, the size of life, receiving the head of his brother Asdrubal! This picture attracted much notice at Amsterdam. At Paris he studied under Guerin, and while yet very young became favourably known to the public by his picture of St. Louis dying of the plague, and St. Thomas steering a vessel driven by a storm; he also painted the subject of the Citizens of Calais submitting to Edward III. He has been an active labourer, for, in addition to several paintings that have gained an European fame, he has executed an immense number of commissions for the churches of Paris, and the Museum of Versailles; but it has been alleged that some of these indicate haste and want of finish. In 1827, he produced his picture of the Suliote women throwing themselves over a precipice to escape falling into the hands of the Turkish soldiers: it is much admired for its grouping, and the variety of expression in the heads.

From the subjects he has worked upon for some years past, he may be classed as an illustrator of poesy, and of that emotion that gives life and beauty to the true lyrics of all languages. In this style are his "Francesca de Rimini and her Lover," from Dante; "Count Eberhard weeping his Son," from Schiller's ballad; "Margaret at her Spinning Wheel," and with the "Evil Spirit," from Faust; and two paintings from Lord Byron's "Giaour." In 1836, appeared his "Christ," as the consoler of the repentant and the afflicted: in this group he has introduced a dying Polish soldier, a Negro slave, and a portrait of Tasso, to represent a poet stricken with madness. In 1838, he exhibited four pictures, all of them subjects from the works of Goethe, two again from Faust, and two from "Wilhelm Meister," the "Mignons," of which we have here presented our readers with engravings. These last have been universally admired, and have added to a reputation already well established. Since they appeared he has been engaged in painting by himself, a whole saloon in the Palace of Versailles; yet, such is his industry, that even this task did not fully occupy him, for he has worked also on a sacred subject, "The Human Race in the Valley of Jehoshaphat." He was the instructor of the late Princess Marie of Wirtemberg, the daughter of Louis Philippe; she was the only pupil he ever formed. He lives in the most complete independence, and belongs to no academy or coterie; he has created his own school, has never paused in his career in which he is still progressing, and he is beyond a doubt one of the very highest rank among the painters of the present age.

The following are the remarks of an eloquent writer and critic on the character of Mignon:—

"This mysterious child, at first neglected by the reader, gradually forced on his attention, at length overpowers him with an emotion more deep and thrilling than any poet since the days of Shakspeare has succeeded in producing. The daughter of enthusiasm, rapture, passion, and despair, she is of the earth, but not earthly. When she glides before us through the light mazes of her fairy dance, or twangs her cithern to the notes of her home-sick verses, or whirls her tambourine, and hurries round us like an antique Maenad, we could almost fancy her a spirit; so pure is she, so full of fervour, so disengaged from the clay of this world. And when all the fearful particulars of her story are at length laid together, and we behold in connected order the image of her hapless existence, there is, in those dim recollections, those feelings so simple, so impassioned and unspeakable, consuming the closely-shrouded, woe struck, yet etherial spirit of the poor creature, something which searches into the inmost recesses of the soul. It is not tears which her fate calls forth; but a feeling far too deep for tears. The very fire of heaven seems miserably quenched among the obstructions of this earth. Her little heart, so noble and so helpless, perishes before the smallest of its many beauties is unfolded; and all its loves, and thoughts, and longings, do but add another pang to death, and sink to silence utter and eternal. It is as if the gloomy porch of Dis, and his pale kingdoms, were realised and set before us, and we heard the ineffectual wail of infants reverberating from within their prison walls for ever.

"The history of Mignon runs like a thread of gold through the tissue of the narrative, connecting with the heart much that were else addressed only to the head. Philosophy and eloquence might have done the rest; but this is poetry in the highest meaning of the word. It must be for the power of producing such creations and emotions that Goethe is, by many of his countrymen, ranked at the side of Homer and Shakspeare, as one of the only three men of genius that have ever lived."

THE ECLIPSE OF THE MOON.

The great lunar eclipse, of which we gave so accurate a prediction on Saturday last, was only visible in a few favoured localities. At Carmarthen, a correspondent informs us, the "evening was brilliant in all the magnificence of heaven's hosts;" and that the people of the town and neighbourhood enjoyed a fine sight of the entire phenomenon. At Liverpool, it was, also, exceedingly well seen. But the situation in which it seems to have been best seen, appears to have been the southern coast, where, from the greater warmth of the temperature, the breezes of the Channel, and the dry, compact nature of the stratification of the adjacent country, a more lucid atmosphere, and one less oppressed with clouds, ordinarily prevails. In this expectation, the writer of the present notice went to Folkstone, and was gratified, at the "time appointed," with a very perfect view of the eclipse. The night, at its commencement, was dull and murky; hordes of ragged, slovenly vapours, driven by an upper current from the ungenial north, careered across the vault of heaven, and left but small hope that a glimpse of the moon's face would be obtained. However, at about nine o'clock, the star-bespangled sky became visible in patches, and in the course of half an hour the whole south-eastern heavens presented an aspect of perfect clearness. The light of the moon was then so strong, that writing could be read with ease, and the coast of France was distinctly visible. The larger stars were, of course, proportionably deprived of their full lustre, shining as mere points in the milky darkness, and destitute of scintillation; while those of smaller magnitude were wholly obscured. Under these auspicious circumstances the eclipse commenced. As it progressed, and the light of the moon became extinguished, the various objects in the landscape were slowly withdrawn from sight; the stars, one by one, came forth from the depths of heaven, with a brightness, which, in its increase, gave the effect of an actual advance; the silvered sea gave up its stream of radiant reflections, and at length so thick a darkness fell upon all things, that the light of Jupiter, shining above Dungeness point, became distinctly reflected on the beautiful bay of Sandgate. The eclipse was now total; and the moon, "shorn of its beams," presented the appearance of a ruddy and partially-transparent globe lighted from the inside. The departure of the shadow was, of course, attended by a reversal of the phenomena we have described. During the progress of the eclipse, an opportunity was offered of refuting by direct observation, the popular error, so industriously inculcated in almost all astronomical publications, of the possibility of seeing the actual ebullition of numerous volcanoes on the moon's surface. The idea has always appeared to the writer to be an absurd one, and wholly unsupported by appearances. The case is this—on the face of the moon a number of very bright spots are visible, and these are supposed to be so many active volcanoes: the brightness being conjectured to arise from the intensely luminous character of their eruptions. Now, if this were the case, it would follow, that lights of such magnitude would not suffer an eclipse by the passage of the earth's shadow, but would rather shine with additional brightness; but observation shows us that they do suffer a total eclipse, and in this view the writer was fully confirmed on Sunday night, for, on that occasion, when the parts of the moon, obscured by the earth's shadow, were still distinctly visible, they themselves remained wholly indistinguishable from the general mass.

Some curious effects of refaction occurred during the latter stages of the eclipse, but as these would involve the necessity of some purely scientific and lengthy descriptions, we may only mention that during one of them the bright part of the moon appeared to bulge beyond the shadow and eventually to separate partially rom it—a phenomenon of superstitious import to the timid and the ignorant.

PARIS FASHIONS.

(From "Townsend's Selections of Parisian Costumes for December.")

Paris has latterly been enlivened by numerous elegant equipages which have appeared in the Champs-Elysées, and we observed, with pleasure, they were graced with the élite of the fashionable world, in toilettes, in which novelty both in the materials and forms were conspicuous. In many equipages were seen mantelet-palatines of Zibeline, accompanied by ermine, or sable muffs, without either acorns or drawings. We also particularly observed some velvet RUSSIAN CLOAKS, with pelerines and borders of grèbe.

DRESSES for morning wear are now rather shorter, and not so full in the pleats round the waist.

The corsages of DRESSES are all tight; they have, however, to give them a fullness, facings, or lappels, composed of biasses, placed in form of a fan.

BALL DRESSES have several skirts, and are usually ornamented with flowers.

Many Crispins and Pardessus are made of quilted silk. The Pardessus is only another name for the old open pelisse with sleeves.

BLACK SATIN PELISSES are much worn; they are embroidered either with silk braid, or with cord, intermixed with application of velvet; some are simply trimmed with ribbon velvet round the sleeves and collar.

VELVET is, and will be, the most distingué article of dress this winter; it is employed for everything; for morning pelisses with tight sleeves and high-buttoned corsages; for visiting dresses with lappel corsages; and half large sleeves for evening dresses, with low tight corsages and lace berthes; in fact, velvet is adopted in every descriptian of toilette—for mantles, scarfs, pelerines, &c., &c.

HATS continue to be rather small and the brims low at the ears; the crowns are rather wide, and slightly rounded.

SATIN HATS are frequently entirely covered with black lace, which is sometimes placed on the top of the crown, and falls in folds on the brim.

Many CAPS are made with lappets of blond, twisted, and mixed with flowers. These caps usually recede from the face; but as this does not suit every physiognomy, some have, in addition, a flower, a bow of ribbon, or of lace, placed on each side.

TURBANS are smaller and lighter than they were last year; they are placed very backward on the head, merely covering the coil of hair.

HAIR COIFFURES are very low and simple; some bandeaux ondes (waved bands) are seen, but this fashion is not on the increase, as smooth bands will keep a whole evening without being disarranged, for which reason they have the preference. The ringlets à l'Anglaise are not worn so long as they were last year, but fall more in clusters.

GLOVES for evening wear are always very short, and are fastened with three or four buttons; they have now no trimming, as heretofore.

It is the fashion to waar several bracelets; antique and modern are often worn together.

PROPOSED DINNER TO SIR HENRY POTTINGER, AT LIVERPOOL.—Sir H. Pottinger has accepted an invitation to dine with the merchants and bankers of Liverpool. The 12th of December was named, but the day will probably be the 17th, as on the former day the Judge of Assize (Mr. Baron Gurney) will probably dine with the Mayor.

A GOOD WINDFALL.—A well-known millwright at Sleaford, Lincolnshire, by a recent decision in the High Court of Chancery, immediately comes into the possession of a large estate near London, of the annual value of £13,000, as well as arrears of rent for the same for the last 20 years, amounting to the sum of £260,000.

FREEMASONRY.—On Tuesday a Provincial Grand Lodge of Freemasons was held at Coventry, for the purpose of installing Earl Howe as Provincial Grand Master of Warwickshire. The ceremony of installation was performed by T. H. Hall, Esq., Grand Registrar of the Order, assisted by a numerous assemblage of the fraternity from the metropolis, and from all parts of the county of Warwick and the adjoining counties. The company afterwards partook of a sumptuous dinner, at the Castle Inn, at which his lordship presided.

FATAL ACCIDENT AT GIBRALTAR.—A very distressing accident happened in the forenoon of Wednesday, Nov. 13, at Gibraltar, by the sinking of a boat in the bay; the unfortunate sufferers were almost all our own countrymen, belonging to a detachment of Artillery, on their way to Corfu, by the troop-ship Apollo. This troop-ship, which arrived at Gibraltar on Monday, the 11th, brought out detachments of men for all the regiments in the garrison, and, besides others for Malta, had one on board of Artillery, destined for the companies of Captains Stow and Gosling, at Corfu. As the boats of the Apollo were not exclusively used to effect the disembarkation of the troops, many from the quay were also employed for this purpose, when, early in the forenoon, one of the latter, conveying on shore ten men, the greater part of whom belonged to the Artillery, for the purpose of procuring a few necessaries for the voyage, and with a female servant, the boatman and a boy, making in all a company of thirteen in the boat, it was unfortunately run down by a Danish galliot which had just arrived from Malaga, and was proceeding to its anchorage-ground; six only out of the number were rescued from a watery grave. The owner of the boat, although an expert swimmer, has perished, and left a large family to deplore their loss; whilst the boy, who could not swim, was providentially saved by the timely assistance of one of the boats of her Majesty's sloop Scout. The Apollo only left Cork on the 2nd of this month. We subjoin a list of those who were drowned:—Sergeant Gritton; gunners Leaver, Bowery, and Latter, of the Royal Artillery; sergeant Kenevan, of the 97th regiment; Mary Ann Coyle, servant to Captain M'Quarrie, of the 42nd; and the boatman, John Ferro.

EVERY BODY'S COLUMN.

THE WINDS.

The winds are abroad to-day
Over the hill-tops flying;
Shouting aloud in their stormy play.
Blast unto blast replying;
Bowing the woods 'neath their tyrant sway, the stubborn and strong defying.

They have taken the old oak tree,
Whose knarled boughs, unbending,
Have seen a thousand tempests flee,
And mocked their vain contending;
They have dashed him to earth in their savage glee, his mighty roots uprending.

And away, and away they fly!
Stern Desolation's minions;
They pierce the mists that round them lie
With keen, sky-cleaving pinions;
They scatter the wreathed clouds on high, from the great Sun's blue dominions.

Aha! old Ocean roars
As he hears the far-off shrieking,
And his billowy legions forth he pours
As if to meet their seeking;
While the cavern-echoes from his shores give back his stormy speaking.

The winds and the waves have met!
Woe, woe, to the bark outlying!
And winds and waves, a mightier yet
To join your strife is hieing.
Ere that pale-visaged sun hath set, lo! Death shall calm the dying.

Rage on, it is yours to day
To mock man's weak endeavour;
We shrink before your fierce array;
We yield, but not for ever,—
Oh winds and waves, your vaunted sway, your linked strength shall sever.

And thou, oh crowned King,
Who laugh'st to scorn our weeping
The fiat of the Eternal Word
Stern watch is o'er thee keeping;—
Thou too shalt be a chainèd thing, no more thy harvest reaping.

ECONOMY OF GAS.

A lecture, by Dr. Jones, on the advantages of naphthalised gas, now forms one of the subjects of instruction at the Adelaide Gallery. The naphtha distilled from coal during the manufacture of gas, when purified, is extremely volatile and inflammable, and when properly burned it yields a brilliant light, in consequence of the large quantity of carbon it contains. It has been ascertained that coal gas, when passed through naphtha, absorbs a portion, and its illuminating properties are thereby greatly increased by the larger amount of carbon. To effect this absorption, the gas is passed through a box containing shelves, whereon sponges dipped in naphtha are placed. By adopting this plan, and by using a dry gas-metre, it is found that a saving of twenty-five per cent. in the cost of the gas is attained, after adding the expense of the naphtha.

THE ECLIPSE OF THE MOON.

The weather on Sunday last in the metropolis was so thick that the commencement of the eclipse could not be observed. About midnight the darkness was intense. A little before one o'clock, however, the moon appeared tolerably clear, and for nearly half an-hour before the last contact with the shadow was distinctly visible. We learn from Liverpool, however, that shortly after ten o'clock the clouds cleared away, and from that time the moon was unobscured save by the earth's shadow which passed across its surface. The appearance of the moon when about three parts obscured was beautiful. The progress of the eclipse agreed closely with the calculations.

A POETICAL DIRECTION.

On Saturday last, a letter passed through the Sudbury Post-office, bearing the following rhymetical address:—

"Postman, convey this letter straight,
To Mr. Joseph Steel;
At London, 19, Cripplegate;
And mind—don't break the seal."

OAKS IN HYACINTH GLASSES.

If an acorn be left for some weeks suspended by a string, at about half an inch over the surface of some water contained in a Hyacinth glass, it will throw down long white roots, whilst its stem will rise upwards, and become decorated with bright green and delicate leaves. When it grows over the top of the hyacinth glass, it looks a very pretty object. This experiment was first performed by the learned Doctor Munt, Bishop of Down and Connor, but has since been repeated with success by several others.

A CAPITAL SHOT.

I'll tell you of a peculiar cheap shot as I had with a single bullet. In at Farmer Spovin's I see a coop ready to go to Brooklyn, with seven and forty ducks in it. So I said to Spovin, "How much will you charge me for a single shot among that brood with a single bullet, whole, and not split?" "Two dollars," said Spovin. "Done!" says I slick enough. So I took a little bruised corn and strewed it along the trough, and out pops the seven and forty heads of the ducks. Then I lay down on the ground right away, and taking a perspective horizontal view of the whole regiment sideways, I wish I may be teetotally substaquilated if I didn't carry off the entire whole of the seven and forty heads.—American Paper.

M. JULLIEN A SOLDIER.

A writer in the Times says that M. Jullien fought with us in the same field of honour at Navarino, alongside the British flag. On that eventful day the corps harmonique of the brave Admiral De Rigny, led by Monsieur Jullien, were distributed at the great guns as powdermen. While performing this duty in bringing powder from the magazine, Jullien's gun, during his momentary absence, burst with a fatality so terrific as to destroy every man who served it. Experiencing a disgust at the scene of carnage which presented itself after the battle, De Rigny gave him his choice either to continue with him in the navy or to enter the Conservatory of Music at Paris. He selected the latter.

THE THEORY OF ECHOES.

An echo is nothing more than a reflected sound. When the aerial vibrations strike against any obstacle of sufficient magnitude, they are reflected back to the ear, and produce a repetition of the sound, which will appear to proceed from the point whence they are reflected, so that the apparent direction of the voice becomes completely changed by an echo. A considerable extent of level wall will sometimes produce it in great perfection; for a smooth surface reflects sounds much better than a rough one.

A "FAIR" PUN.

I remember (says Lord Eldon) I was coming away from the Queen's drawing-room in my full dress as King's Counsel (Lord Clarendon, then Mr. Villiers, was with me), and we came into the room where the milliners were collected to see the fashions. Said I, "Why, Villiers, I think that all the prettiest women are here." One of the girls, and a most amazingly beautiful creature she was, stood up, and said to another, "I am sure that gentleman is a Judge."

AN INDEPENDENT WOMAN.

There is something very manly (says a Canadian paper) about the following advertisement, published in Portland, by one of the fair sex:—"This is to certify, that I, Elizabeth Wright, have left my husband's bed and board on account of his misconduct. I do, therefore, give up all right and title to him for life, as I flatter myself that I can take care of myself, as I have always done since and before marriage."

ALIMENTATIVENESS.

Mr. Rumball, the Lecturer on Phrenology, in the course of an explanation of the organ of alimentativeness, this week, described the indications of a desire for food. He remarked that Doctor Clarke had spoken of a very handsome Siberian girl, whose appetite was so enormous that she ate twenty-four pounds of horse-flesh in twenty-four hours: and the medical journals notice the case of a French prisoner at Portsmouth, labouring under bulimia, or diseased appetite, who devoured sixteen pounds in twelve hours, of solid food—six pounds of it consisting of soap and candles. I, myself (said Mr. Rumball), had a patient who went into my larder, abstracted a loin of mutton, weighing six pounds, picked the bones, raw as it was, and then very coolly asked for his dinner.

A TEMPLE OF THE MORMONITES.

A writer in an American paper gives the following account of the Temple in the course of erection at the city of Nauvoo, to be devoted to the worship of the Mormonites. The Temple is a magnificent structure, as far as it is advanced. It is 128 feet long, 88 feet wide, and the walls 57 feet high. The materials are white limestones. There are 30 pilasters projecting about 15 inches from the walls, the cases of which are wrought to represent the rising moon in its first quarter, and the capitals represent the meridian sun: the whole executed in the most elaborate style. The whole is to be surmounted by a splendid dome. In the basement is the baptismal font, 18 feet long by 10 feet wide, standing on the backs of 12 oxen—four looking south and four north, two east and two west. Nauvoo contains 10,000 inhabitants, and has an organised military force of 400 armed men. There have been within a year at least 12,000 people residing within the city.

A PIOUS SERVANT.

It is a fact, that in the window of the Servant's Registry-office, in Wells, Somersetshire, may be seen—"Place wanted, by a young woman, as cook in a respectable family, where a pious footman is kept, of High Church Principles."

PAYMENT OF LITERARY MEN IN FRANCE.

The Paris Globe contains an article showing the high rate paid to novelists and newspaper writers in France. He says:—"M. Dujarrier, the proprietor of the Presse, has taken M. Alexander Dumas upon a lease at 60,000f. a year. The Constitutionnel announces that it has acquired the exclusive property of M. Eugene Sue—we believe that he is to have a share in the property of the paper. The proprietors of the Courrier Francais have offered M. Victor Hugo half of the property in their journal for his novel entitled 'Quiquengrone.' The aforesaid has just bought for 80,000f. in cash, and an annuity of 4000f., M. De Chateaubriand's 'Memoires d'Outre Tombe.' It is, at this moment in contemplation to publish M. Thiers's 'History of the Empire' in the shape of feuilletons in the Constitutionnel. The bargain is proceeding: if M. Thiers do not consider the hopes of a portefeuille as distant, he will assent to the arrangement.

LUNACY AND LUNATIC ASYLUMS.—No. I.

The late inquiry in the case of Mr. Campbell having excited much attention, and uplifted a corner of the veil by which the economy and management of institutions for the insane are shrouded, it will not be uninteresting to take a glance at the past and present condition of these establishments. In nothing is the progress of amelioration more visible—an amelioration marked by a large and humanitarian spirit—than in the changes of criminal codes, and the management of prisons. The working of this spirit, and the application of more enlightened views in regard to insanity, have wrought also a total change in the treatment of the insane, who were too long subjected to brutalities worse than are inflicted on the wild beasts of a menagerie; and because visited with the heaviest affliction that can befal humanity, were treated as if they had been alien to their kind. It must be borne in mind, that till within the last half century, the darkest ignorance prevailed as to the nature of mental alienation. When an unhappy being became afflicted, he was immured in a gaol, or in a mad-house, where the chain, and the lash, were the approved means of cure. And how few, alas, must the cures have been! How often, too, did the horrors of this system react with benumbing effect on the minds of those who witnessed or perpetrated them, without perceiving their evil!! Ignorance in their case was as much the cause of bootless and brutal cruelties, as if they had been actuated by the blackest and most vindictive malice. The heart sickens at the recital of barbarities inflicted for the purpose of maintaining order, and sometimes from the more praiseworthy view of restoring mental sanity. But with the progress of knowledge, the higher sentiments obtained sway, and this blind and hard-hearted mode of treatment, which knew not how to protect society from one evil without inflicting a still more serious one, was brought to an end. It was not till 1792 that Pinel, of Paris, like another St. Vincent de Paul, proclaimed that mercy and kindness were the best medicines for the "mind diseased." When he was appointed physician to the Bicêtre, he set free eighty lunatics, who had long been galled by chains. He thus opened a new era for the unhappy and the afflicted, and raised himself to that moral elevation in which he will ever shine as a benefactor of his species. Many of the incidents of this release are very affecting. Some of the poor creatures were so powerfully affected by the sudden and unhoped-for change, as to be restored to reason; and to the honour of the daring innovator, and his benevolent experiment, most of them were tranquil in their deportment. One of the first to be liberated was an English captain, of whose history all trace had been lost, as he had been in chains forty years. He was considered a most dangerous lunatic: his keepers approached him with caution, as he had, in a fit of fury, killed one of them with a blow of his manacles. He was chained in his cell. Pinel entered alone, and, in a mild tone, said to him, "Captain, I will order your chains to be taken off, and give you liberty to walk in the court, if you promise me to behave well, and injure no one." "Yes, I promise you," said the maniac; "but you are joking with me; you are all too much in fear of me." "I have six men," said Pinel, "ready to enforce my commands, if necessary; you may, therefore, believe me; I will give you liberty if you will put on this waistcoat." He submitted cheerfully; his chains were taken off, and the keepers retired, leaving his cell open. He raised himself many times from his seat, but again fell back on it; from the many years he was compelled to remain in a sitting posture, he had not, at first, the use of his legs. In a quarter of an hour he was able to keep his balance, and to advance with tottering steps to the door of his dark cell. His first look was at the sky, and he cried out with emotion, "How beautiful!" During the rest of the day he was in constant motion, walking about the house, and uttering short exclamations of delight. In the evening he returned of his own accord to his cell, where a better bed had been provided for him, and he slept soundly. During the two years he remained at the Bicêtre he had no return of his paroxysm, but rendered himself useful by exercising a kind of authority over the insane patients, whom he ruled in his own fashion.

This was but the dawn of a better day. The bastilles both of France and England, the lunatic asylums, were not overthrown immediately, in compliance with the cry of knowledge and humanity. A system founded in error was not so soon to give way, especially when it was so convenient for carelessness, or cupidity, or avarice.

But it will be right, perhaps, before we fix our contemplation on the bright side of the picture, to revert to the condition of the insane prior to and after this period. On the Continent, lunatics were confined in convents, or prisons, or they wandered about unfriended and unknown, the objects of scorn or coarse levity. In some of the monastic establishments they were subjected to regular daily flagellation. In some countries the intractable were confined in iron cages, or wooden boxes; some in cells, or dungeons, their food being thrown to them, as if they had been wild beasts, through the gratings of those loathsome dens. In such kennels no provision was made for the satisfaction of animal wants, clothing and food were insufficient, and, as a matter of course, there could be no personal cleanliness or comfort of any kind suitable for a human being. But this is not all: naked patients were kept chained to the ground, night and day, for years, without fire, or any source of warmth! It is impossible to peruse, without feelings of horror, the details of the case narrated by Sir G. Paul. The subject of it was a poor maniac, who was kept shut up, and chained in an uninhabited ruin. His relatives resided at some distance, but brought him food daily!

What a humiliating picture is this! But is it more so than that of public establishments deriving an income from the exhibition of poor human beings, under the excitement of furious mania, and upon whom the jest, the gibe, and taunt were played off to enhance the enjoyments of the shilling-paying sight-seeker? During the last century, an income of some hundreds a-year was eked out in this manner at Bedlam; and in France, we learn from Esquirol, that this shameful practice was continued to a much later period.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

A journal is a literary bill of fare—we speak, of course, of a carte artistically constituted—which offers to your consideration everything in season. Base broadsheets there are indeed perpetrated against chronology, and in defiance of all orthodox-ologies which poach for paragraphs the whole year round, and expose them for sale in contempt of time and taste; but newspapers "of the better classes" cater for each season and its change. No editor, with a soul above buttons, dreams of setting you down to politics at Michaelmas—or "Rambles along shore," at Shrovetide. We request any humane person who detects us writing about Ascot Races at Christmas, or Cowes Regatta at or about Ladyday, to shoot us through the head, for we shall not be fit to run loose among our fellow citizens. To prove that at present we are not only proper objects for protection from such a necessary precaution—but worthy the patronage upon the scale, without a limit, in which we have so long enjoyed it—we proceed, seeing that we are on the threshold of December, and discourse about fox-hunting illustratively—in keeping with our patent of precedence—and usefully, according to the custom of our columns.

Last Saturday week we placed before the amateur of the chase, certain statistics connected with the Royal hunting establishment of this land—so now proceed to offer him a notice of the fashion in which one of the noblest of our National Sports is upheld by a nobleman of this realm. The Belvoir hounds, though they cannot lay claim to the most ancient lineage of any in existence, are certainly first in position at the present day. They trace their origin to the year 1730, when the foundation of so noble a structure was laid by the then Duke of Rutland, the Earl of Cardigan, the Earl of Gainsborough, and Lords Howe and Gower. By the conditions of the confederacy of good fellowship it was enacted "that each party should annually place in the hands of Mr. Alderman Childe, of Temple-bar, by two payments, the sum of £150 towards defraying the annual expense of horses, hounds, and all other incidental charges. The size of the hound shall not exceed twenty inches, nor be less than nineteen in height. There shall be a steward, one huntsman, six whippers-in, and two cooks!" (if exclusively for feeding one huntsman and six whippers-in, what jolly times they must have had of it!!) "Each of the party, in turn, shall take upon him during the hunting season, for the space of one week and no more, the ordering the stopping of the earths, management of the hounds and horses, the appointing the places for hunting, hours for meeting, &c. &c." The present arrangements at Belvoir touching the cooks and whippers-in are probably reversed—concerning the management of the county here is a characteristic morçeau: "Met the Belvoir—at a place, the name of which has escaped me—about a mile from Melton Spinney. Drew the Spinney and soon got to business." "But what has become of the bridge over the brook?" I inquired of Mr. White, although on a horse that would soon have carried me over it. "It is taken away purposely," was the answer, "to give the hounds a chance, should the fox cross it at starting." What will young France say to that?"—Ask a gentleman to jump, probably into a river, during les fêtes de noël, out of politeness to a hound. In their work this distinguished pack is remarkable for the style in which they drive a scent when the chase is forward, and for the quick decisive manner in which they turn when it has not gone on. The general speed of hounds, indeed, in the majority of runs, depends upon the extent in which they are possessed of this property. Without it, the chances are long in favour of a stout fox, on a good scenting day. As a commentary on the complement of cooks in service at the princely seat of the Duke of Rutland, it may be remarked, that on the last occasion of our visiting Leicestershire for the purpose of hunting with his Grace, it appeared by the cook's book, that upwards of thirteen thousand persons had dined under his roof during thirteen weeks of the preceding hunting season.

The Belvoir hounds have been for some years under the management of the duke's nephew, Lord Forester, a young nobleman in whom are united all the qualities suited to give éclat to a master of hounds. He has the courtesy of the polished gentleman of the world; he is a horseman of the first class, and enthusiastically fond of hunting, to which he was born and bred, of course, as the heir of Cecil Forester. Subjoined is a list of their general fixtures, though all the places as published for rendezvous are not given, from the circumstance of almost exactly the same locality being often designated by a different description.

TATTERSALL'S.

MONDAY.—It will be unnecessary to shut out matter of greater interest by dwelling upon the business transacted this day at the Corner. It will be enough to mention that Kedger was slightly on the decline; Old England, Fitz Allen, and the Black Prince particularly so; and that Pam and Young Eclipse were the lions of the day at improving prices. We add the closing averages:—

IRELAND.

THE REPEAL MOVEMENT.—The Repeal Association met this week on Tuesday instead of Monday, the former day having been devoted to the municipal elections. Mr. O'Connell, after putting on a new and splendid cap, very much bedizened with gold lace, which immediately provoked three cheers and the approbation of the galleries, made a long speech, which, however, did not present any very remarkable point. He commenced by congratulating the members on the "unvarying triumph" of the preceding day at the municipal elections, and, after some routine business had been transacted, proceeded to descant upon Repeal. He enlarged upon the usual grievance topics, alluded to the trial, attacked both Whigs and Tories, hurled defiance at the press, and abused Louis Philippe as "a crafty miserable usurper." He then spoke contemptuously of Federalism, and analysed Mr. Sharman Crawford's scheme. Mr. O'Connell concluded by submitting ten propositions, which he said he would explain at the next meeting. These propositions were chiefly in deprecation of the Union; but they also complained that injustice had been done to Ireland in regard to the elective franchise, and also touched upon the alleged grievance of the Irish Church. At four o'clock the repeal rent amounted to £530.

THE MUNICIPAL ELECTIONS.—The Repealers have extinguished nearly all the lights of Conservatism in the Dublin Town Council. Excepting in two wards every man returned on Monday has pledged himself to the "Repeal."

THE RECENT MURDERS IN IRELAND.—Mr O'Connell, in passing through Nenagh last week, took occasion to address the crowd in impressive terms upon the subject of the recent murders in Tipperary. He said—"In the name of all that is honourable or honest—in the name of your fatherland—in the name of mercy—for the sake of your immortal souls—(Here the learned gentleman took off his cap)—in the name of the living God—the God of Justice—let there be no more crimes—no more murders—no more assassinations—no more riots. Oh, let not again your fine county be stained with human gore. (Two or three having shouted 'No,' Mr. O'Connell said, I will not be satisfied with that; you must all promise me that there shall be no more murder in Tipperary; a deep murmur here issued from the crowd, after which there were loud cries of 'Never, never!') It was impossible their cause could either prosper or progress, if such a state of things were to continue. (Cries of 'They won't.') He had heard that those faction fights or riots at fairs had again broken out, but to those he would say—old Ireland had enemies enough to contend against, without any dissensions amongst the sons of her soil." (Tremendous cheering.)

OUTRAGEOUS ABDUCTION.—A letter from Killarney states, that on Sunday night week about fourteen men, whose faces were blackened, and most of whom were armed, attacked the house of Michael M'Gillycuddy, of Trippinagh, in the parish of Aglish, a respectable farmer, and having discharged a shot through the parlour window, effected an entrance through it, and first secured the servants by binding them firmly with ropes. They then proceeded to the bed-room of M'Gillycuddy's daughter, a girl 16 years old, whom they violently dragged out of bed, and, regardless of the incessant entreaties of the mother to permit the girl to dress herself, the heartless ruffians forced her through the window in that lamentable condition, leaving six of the party behind to prevent any trace of the fugitives. In a desperate struggle to shelter the daughter, her mother was barbarously beaten by these savages, and now remains under the care of doctors. Four of the gang have been arrested.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

EXPENSIVE LITIGATION.—In the Court of Chancery, on Monday, the Lord Chancellor gave judgment in the case of the Duke of Leeds v. Amherst. The case was argued about a week ago before his lordship, upon appeal from the decision of the Vice-Chancellor of England, declaring that a full-length equestrian picture of the great Duke of Schomberg, who fell in the battle of the Boyne, was to be considered, for the purposes of the late Duke of Leeds's will, as a portrait, and not a picture; and, therefore, that it passed to those persons whom the respondent represented. The great Duke of Schomberg was the maternal ancestor of the Duke of Leeds; the picture, which was painted by Sir G. Kneller, was hung up in the grand hall of Hornby Castle, and the Duke of Leeds being anxious that it should not be displaced from the ancestral halls of the family, appealed from the decision of the Vice-Chancellor of England, and upon that appeal the Lord Chancellor now gave judgment, affirming the decision of the Court below. It is generally supposed that there will be an appeal from this judgment to the house of Lords. The picture is only valued at £300, and nearly twice as many thousands have already been spent in litigation.

MR. BARNARD GREGORY AND THE "SATIRIST."—In the Court of Queen's Bench, on Monday, Mr. Wordsworth prayed the judgment of the Court on Mr. Barnard Gregory, he having pleaded guilty to an indictment charging him with publishing false and scandalous libels on his Royal Highness the Duke of Brunswick.—Mr. Platt applied, on behalf of Mr. Gregory, for a rule to show cause why the indictment against him should not be quashed, or that the judgment of the Court should not be respited. He made this application on the ground that the Central Criminal Court had no jurisdiction, under the circumstances, to take cognizance of the offence to which the defendant had pleaded guilty. That Court was established under the provisions of the act of 5 and 6 William IV., and that statute gave no authority to hear cases of misdemeanour, except those relating to perjury and subornation of perjury; that the Court could not proceed in cases of libel, unless the prosecutor entered into recognizances to prosecute the indictment before the bill was sent before the grand jury. Now, in the present case, that had not been done; the necessary recognizances were not entered into until after the grand jury returned a true bill. There was also another objection to the validity of the proceedings in this case—recognizances had only been entered into to prosecute one indictment, and the defendant had pleaded guilty to eleven indictments. The learned counsel, after some further observations of a technical nature, submitted that the whole proceedings were irregular; the prosecutor ought to have gone to the Middlesex or Westminster Sessions to prefer his indictment; he, however, went before the grand jury at the Central Criminal Court, where a bill, or rather bills, were found on Nov. 14, last year, but the necessary recognizances were not entered into until the 2nd of December following.—Mr. Sergeant Talfourd, on the part of the prosecutor, declining to show cause against the rule, being unprepared for the objection, the rule was granted, and cause will be shown against it next term.—The effect of this decision is, that Mr. Barnard Gregory, whose term of imprisonment in Newgate expired on Tuesday, has been set at liberty. The defendant seemed in a very weak state of health, and much agitated.

THE RAINBOW TAVERN, FLEET-STREET.—A meeting took place at the Bankruptcy Court, on Tuesday, for proof of debts, and choice of assignees, in the case of Isaac Argent, a bankrupt, who was proprietor of the above tavern. At a former meeting, none of the trade creditors were in a situation to prove, in consequence of their having neglected to bring their books. Mr. Hoggins now appeared on behalf of the bankrupt, and Mr. Cooke represented Mr. Colls.—Some proofs of money lent to the bankrupt, which were not allowed at the last meeting, were now received, upon the production of certain books and papers, in which entries of the loans had been made, as collateral evidence. Amongst others, a Mr. Wells, of Upper Norton-street, proved a debt of £200 for an accommodation acceptance.—Mr. Colls was then examined by Mr. Hoggins, and said that he formerly kept the Rainbow Tavern. He produced an agreement between himself and the bankrupt, in consequence of which agreement the latter became the occupier of the house. Argent was to pay so much a week for the use of the tavern. Several payments had been made to him by the bankrupt, but he did not keep any books in which entries of such payments were made. He had been in possession of the inn for the last fortnight, under an execution. He considered the bankrupt to be £1700 in his debt; £1000 on a bond which he had given to him for £1500—a third part of which had been paid off—and the remaining £700 on bills of exchange.—None of the trade creditors having proved, Mr. Wells, the gentleman above mentioned, was chosen assignee.

FRAUDS ON THE REVENUE.—THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL V. CANDY—THE SAME V. DEAN.—This case was decided in the Court of Exchequer on Thursday. It was an information filed at the instance of her Majesty's Attorney-General against Messrs. Candy and Dean, the well-known silkmen, for illegally importing a quantity of silks without payment of the duty. The case was not gone into, in order to give an opportunity for an arrangement. After a long consultation between the parties, the Solicitor-General stated it had been arranged that the Jury should give a verdict for the single value of the silks at £14 11s. Verdict accordingly. Verdicts were also returned, by consent, in three other cases, for single values of £848 8s., £2016, and £300. With these informations, we believe, all proceedings by the Crown against Messrs. Candy and Dean are brought to a close.

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.

The first session of the present mayoralty commenced on Monday, before the Lord Mayor and other civic authorities. The following were the only cases of interest tried during the week:—

THE GLORIOUS UNCERTAINTY OF THE LAW.—James Johnson, aged twenty-one, wheelwright, was indicted for a burglary in the dwelling-house of Samuel John Weldon. Mr. Prendergast appeared for the defence. The Recorder examined the prosecutor, who, in answer to his lordship and to Mr. Prendergast, deposed that his name was Samuel John Weldon. He was an elderly respectable-looking person, but appeared to be either naturally very dull or greatly confused. After a long and searching examination and cross-examination by the Recorder and counsel, who tried their ingenuity in turn in endeavouring to extract the precise truth of the matter, the witness deposed that he holds at present in his possession the certificate of his baptism, in which his name appears to be Samuel John Weldon, but he never was known by the name of Samuel, or called by any name but John, and he never, even on the occasion of his marriage, signed any other Christian name to any document or paper than simply "John." Nevertheless he had no doubt of his having been christened "Samuel John," and he was made acquainted with the fact of his having been so named by his sponsors upwards of sixty years ago. However, having been in his youth uniformly called John, and nothing else, he had never used the name of Samuel until called upon in the present case, in the indictment-office, to state his name in full. After a tedious and puzzling continuance of an examination, out of which the above were the simple facts elicited, the Recorder asked the jury if they could really make up their minds as to what the prosecutor's real name was?—The jury replied they could not.—The Recorder said that the prisoner, being charged with a burglary in the house of Samuel John Weldon, if the jury could not find that the house belonged to Samuel John Weldon, they could not find the prisoner guilty. They should, therefore, at once acquit him.—Under the Recorder's direction the jury accordingly returned a verdict of "Not Guilty."—The Recorder: Let the prisoner be detained in custody, however, as he can be indicted for burglary in the house of John Weldon.—In the course of a desultory conversation which subsequently ensued amongst the gentlemen of the bar on the subject, it was asserted that no subsequent indictment could be so framed as to preclude the validity of a plea on behalf of the prisoner of autrefois acquit; the only difficulty being the prisoner's inability from poverty to try the issue.

THE SLAVE TRADING CASE.—THE AUGUSTA.—On his lordship taking his seat in court on Wednesday morning, Captain Jennings, who has appeared on several occasions to take his trial, on an indictment charging him with carrying on an illegal traffic in slaves during the time he was captain of the Augusta, again attended in discharge of his bail, and was immediately placed at the bar.—The prisoner said he had to apply to his lordship to direct that he (prisoner) might take his trial during the present sessions. It had been put off from time to time, the consequence of which was, that he could not follow his avocations, that he was nearly reduced to ruin, having scarcely anything to pay his expences. His means of livelihood were exhausted; he therefore trusted there would be no further delay. Mr. Payne, on behalf of the prosecution, opposed the application, and put in an affidavit of Sir George Stephen and others, which stated that, in the absence of Captain Hill, a material witness in the case, they were not prepared to go to trial. Mr. Prendergast trusted the Court would bear in mind the number of times the trial had been postponed: it was a great hardship on Captain Jennings to be obliged to attend every session and renew his recognizances. Lord Denman: That may be so, but this is a case in which the interest of the public is involved, therefore justice requires, that under the circumstances, another postponement of the trial—— Prisoner, in a high tone: My lord, I assure you that I have not done anything in the sight of God or man, that is sufficient to place me in this dock session after session; and, as an Englishman and a free-born subject, I have a right to demand an investigation of the charge alleged against me. There is no just ground of complaint against me. (The defendant was proceeding to make some further remarks, when he was advised by his counsel to desist.) After a short conversation, it was ordered that the trial should be postponed for six months, in order to allow Capt. Jennings to take a voyage; and that he should be discharged from prison on the same bail renewing their recognizances.

POLICE.

FATAL OCCURRENCE AT A MASQUERADE.—At Union Hall, on Tuesday, Francis Thomas Passmore, a young man of respectable appearance, described as a commission agent, residing in Star-court, Fenchurch-street, was charged with causing the death of John Slade, a young man, the son of a gentleman living in the Albany-road, Camberwell, and also with being the cause of such a serious accident occurring to another young man, named John King, a bookseller at Walworth, that his life is despaired of. The first witness was a young man of the name of Tompkins, who stated, that on the preceding night a masked ball took place at the Montpelier Tavern, in the Walworth-road, at which a large number of persons were present. That between one and two o'clock that morning witness, with several other persons, male and female, were in the act of ascending a staircase, which led to the ball-room, when the person at the head of the stairs, standing on the landing, pushed the crowd back. He (witness) was near the bottom of the stairs at the time, when he heard the noise of the banisters giving way, and at the moment saw two gentlemen fall backwards from the landing above to the pavement at the bottom, on their heads, one of whom (Mr. Slade) was picked up bleeding from the nose, mouth, and ears, and the other individual was also bleeding from a wound on the back of his head. Both the gentlemen were immediately carried into one of the rooms in the tavern, where Mr. Slade soon expired, and his fellow sufferer was in such a dangerous condition, that it was considered advisable to have him immediately conveyed to Guy's Hospital, where he at present lies in a most precarious state. In answer to Mr. Traill, the witness said that he saw the prisoner standing at the door of the ball-room taking tickets as the company went in, and that several persons were ascending the staircase for the purpose of going into the room. He saw the prisoner push them down the stairs; that he (witness) did not absolutely see the prisoner lay hands upon the two gentlemen who fell down, but that he was firmly persuaded the banisters gave way in consequence of the manner in which the company were pushed by the accused, and that to this was to be attributed the accident and loss of life which occurred. Witness considered that the height from which the two gentlemen fell was between eight and nine feet, and that it was pavement underneath.—Another witness stated that he was merely going up stairs to ask a question, when he was violently pushed down by the prisoner, and on falling back with the crowd, he heard the banisters break, and saw the deceased and the other gentleman fall from the landing place.—The prisoner having been cautioned by the magistrate, proceeded to describe that on the night in question he attended at the Montpelier Tavern, at the request of a friend of his named Emmett, who gave the ball, to take tickets at the entrance of the room. That while he was engaged in the performance of that duty, hearing a noise, and seeing his friend in a scuffle below, he ran down to his assistance; and that while he was below the banisters gave way, and the deceased and Mr. King fell from the landing, as already described. That he was the first to pick up the deceased himself, and was busily engaged in holding up his head, to keep him from being suffocated with the blood which was pouring from his nose, mouth, and ears, until medical assistance arrived, and the deceased expired. That he (the prisoner) presently observed that a great number of persons, and amongst them the witnesses, got into the house, and wanted to force their way into the ball-room without tickets, although he announced that none would be admitted who did not produce them. He declared that he never laid hands on the parties; and that, after the accident occurred, he made no attempt to escape, but quietly resigned himself into the hands of the police, conscious of his own innocence in the unfortunate affair.—The witnesses were here recalled, and asked, after hearing the prisoner's statement, whether they still adhered to their former evidence, as to the fact of their having seen him at the door of the ball-room, on the landing-place, at the moment the deceased and the other gentleman fell from that spot? The answers given by the witnesses were in the affirmative.—Mr. Traill remanded the prisoner, in order to give him an opportunity of producing witnesses to prove he was down stairs at the time.

VIOLENT OUTRAGE.—At the Thames Police-office, on Tuesday, a young man named Charles William Glover, a labourer, residing in Whitehouse-lane, Stepney, was charged with feloniously wounding Ann Neal, a young married woman, in a critical state of health. It appeared, from the evidence of several witnesses, that on the evening of Monday week, the prisoner, whose conduct was more like that of a raving maniac than of a rational being, ran a-muck along the Mile-end-road, in a state of infuriate drunkenness, with a mason's trowel in his hand, striking at every person who came in his way. He first hit a man named Green, who was selling umbrellas below the London Hospital, with such force, that but for the intervention of the coat collar the blow would have nearly decapitated him. He next struck at, but fortunately missed a young man named Hopkins, and then rushed on, striking furiously both right and left, Green and Hopkins being in pursuit. On arriving opposite the London Hospital, the prisoner struck Mrs. Neal so forcibly on the left side of the head, that the trowel cut through her bonnet and laid open her cheek to the teeth, two of which were displaced, and hung loosely by light filaments from the gum. She fell senseless on the pavement, bleeding profusely from the wound, and was ultimately conveyed to the London Hospital. Green and Hopkins continued their pursuit of the prisoner, who still ran on striking at all in his course until he was overtaken by the latter near Osborne-street, on which he turned and attempted to use his trowel, but Hopkins closed in on him, and they both fell in the struggle and rolled over and over in the mud. He was then given into the custody of two policemen, whom he kicked and cuffed violently on the way to the station-house. Mrs. Neal, who had been in the hospital until Saturday last, attended with her head bandaged up. She seemed still pale and languid from what she suffered. Her testimony was in accordance with the statement given above. The prisoner said he was drunk at the time, and had no recollection of what had occurred. Mr. Broderip told him that was no excuse for running a-muck at the public, and, in his mad violence, striking at every person he met. In the case of Mrs. Neal, he must take his trial for feloniously wounding with intent to do grievous bodily harm, and the other parties injured could have redress by indicting him at the sessions. The prisoner was fully committed.

TWO CHILDREN COMMITTED FOR TRIAL.—At the Thames Police-office on Tuesday, two well-dressed children named Edward Paddington, aged eight years, and Ann Paddington, aged eleven years, were brought before Mr. Broderip, on a charge of stealing a pair of boots from the front of a boot and shoe warehouse in Bedford-place, Commercial-road, where an immense pile of those articles are always exposed for sale upon the foot pavement.—Mr. Broderip, looking at the children, asked Mr. Benton, the prosecutor, if he intended to proceed?—Mr. Benton said he should do so on account of the numerous depredations to which he had been subjected.—The case having been proved, the magistrate again asked if it was intended to prosecute?—Mr. Benton said he would leave the matter in the hands of the magistrate.—Mr. Broderip: You can't leave it in my hands. I wish to know whether you intend to prosecute?—Mr. Benton: I wish you to dispose of it summarily, and either reprimand them or send them to prison.—Mr. Broderip: I have no such power. Do you intend to prosecute these children or not?—Mr. Benton: I do intend to prosecute.—The children were therefore committed for felony and were taken from the bar weeping.

THE MARKETS.

CORN-EXCHANGE (Friday).—We had a full average quantity of English wheat here to-day. Owing to the millers having well supplied themselves from the late large arrivals, the demand was very heavy, and prices were with difficulty supported. Foreign wheats were equally dull, but holders would not submit to lower figures. There was a good deal of barley—both English and foreign—on sale; hence the inquiry for that article was very dull, and the inferior kinds were 1s per quarter cheaper. In malt, next to nothing was doing, and prices were not supported. Oats, beans, and peas, were in sluggish inquiry, at late rates.

ARRIVALS.—English: wheat, 7650; barley, 6890; oats, —— quarters. Irish: wheat, ——; barley, ——; oats, 400 quarters. Foreign: wheat, 480; barley, 6750; oats, 740, quarters. Flour, 4690 sacks. Malt, 4830 quarters.

English.—Wheat, Essex and Kent, red, 39s to 47s; white ditto, 44s to 54s; Norfolk and Suffolk, red, 38s to 43s; ditto, white, 40s to 47s; rye, 37s to 38s; grinding barley, 27s to 29s; distilling, 31s to 32s; malting ditto, 31s to 34s; Lincoln and Norfolk malt, 61s to 62s; brown ditto, 57s to 60s; Kingston and Ware, 63s to 64s; Chevalier, 65s; Yorkshire and Lincolnshire feed oats, 22s to 23s; potatoe ditto, 24s to 25s; Youghal and Cork, black, 21s to 22s; ditto, white, 22s to 23s; tick beans, 36s to 37s; ditto, old, 36s to 40s; grey peas, 36s to 37s; maple, 36s to 37s; white, 36s to 38s; boilers, 38s to 40s, per quarter. Town made flour, 45s to —; Suffolk, Stockton, and Yorkshire, 33s to 35s, per 28 lbs. Foreign.—Fine wheat, 38s to 54s; Dantzig, red, 40s to 47s; white, 42s to 49s. In Bond.—Barley, 27s to 29s; oats, 17s to 18s; ditto, feed, 15s to 17s; beans, 24s to 29s; peas, 28s to 32s, per quarter. Flour, Canadian, 21s to —; Baltic, 20s to —, per barrel.

The Seed Market.—Linseed and rapeseed, as well as cakes, have been in very active request, at higher figures. In other kinds of seeds, no material variation has occurred.

The following are the present rates:—Linseed cakes, English, £12 to £13; ditto, foreign, £7 12s to £8 10s, per 1000.

Bread.—The prices of wheaten bread, in the metropolis, are from 7d to 7½d; of household ditto, 5½d to 6½d, per 4lbs. loaf.

Imperial Weekly Average.—Wheat, 45s 10d; barley, 35s 2d; oats, 21s 8d; rye, 30s 9d; beans, 38s 6d; peas, 36s 2d.

Six Weeks Average that governs Duty.—Wheat, 46s 1d; barley, 35s 3d; oats, 21s 3d; rye, 35s 8d; beans, 37s 6d; peas, 34s 11d.

Duties.—Wheat, 20s; barley, 3s; oats, 6s; rye, 7s. 6d; beans, 5s 6d; peas, 8s 6d.

Tea.—This market continues very healthy, and prices are firmly supported. The arrivals continue small, and the stocks are still on the decrease.

Sugar.—Fine colony parcels of sugar have been in steady request at full prices; but of other kinds, the sales have not been to say extensive. Refined goods have improved in value—the standard lump having produced 1s per cwt more money.

Coffee.—All descriptions of coffee have been in slow request this week. Ceylons have declined to 53s 6d to 54s 6d for good ordinary. The stocks of the latter description are very heavy.

Rice.—Cleaned rice is in fair request, at full prices; but other qualities are a dull sale.

Oils.—Linseed oil is selling at full prices. Other kinds of oil support previous rates.

Tallow.—Although the amount of business doing in this market is by no means large, prices are supported. The price of P.Y.C., for forward delivery, is 41s 3d per cwt. The shipments from St. Petersburgh, this year, have been less by 8000 casks than in 1843. Yet the stock exhibits a large excess over that of last season.

Provisions.—The Irish butter-market still rules very active, and the quotations have further improved 3s per cwt, the best parcels having sold at 101s per cwt. The same may be said of foreign butter, as also of bacon and lard. Other kinds of provisions are quite as dear as last week.

Hay and Straw.—Coarse meadow hay, £3 10s to £4 15s; useful ditto, £4 16s to £5 3s; fine upland ditto, £5 5s to £5 10s; clover hay, £4 10s to £6; oat straw, £1 10s to £1 12s; wheat straw, £1 13s to £1 15s per load.

Wool.—In all kinds of wool, exceedingly little is doing, and, in some cases, the rates have ruled somewhat lower.

Potatoes.—The supplies of potatoes are on the increase, owing to which, the demand is inactive, at late rates, or from £2 10s to £3 10s per ton.

Hops (Friday).—In New Kent and Sussex pockets a fair amount of business has been transacted this week, at full prices. The supply of bags being on the increase, the inquiry for them is inactive, yet their quotations are supported. Old hops are very dull. 1844's:—Sussex pockets, £7 5s to £8 0s; Wealds, £6 18s to £8 0s; Mid Kent, £8 0s to £10 10s; East Kent, £7 7s to £8 8s; Choice ditto, £10 0s to £12 0s; Farnhams, £10 0s to £10 15s.

Coals (Friday).—Adairs, 16s 6d; Holywell Main, 20s; Clennell, 18s; Lambton, 22s; Stewarts', 22s 6d; Caradoc, 22s; Hartlepool, 22s; Hartley, 17s 6d per ton.

Smithfield (Friday).—The supply of beasts here, this morning, was only moderate, and of very inferior quality. The best Scots sold freely, at full prices; but other kinds were a dull sale. From Scotland, we received 100 Scots, and from Rotterdam, 48 beasts and 50 sheep. The numbers of sheep were scanty, owing to which, the mutton trade was firm, and Monday's quotations were steadily supported. In calves—the supply of which was small—next to nothing was doing, at barely stationary figures. The pork trade was dull, at previous currencies. Milch cows sold at from £16 to £19 10s each.

Per 8lbs to sink the offal:—Coarse and inferior beasts, 2s 4d to 2s 8d; second quality do, 2s 10d to 3s 4d; prime large oxen, 3s 6d to 3s 10d; prime Scots, &c., 4s 0d to 4s 2d; coarse and inferior sheep, 2s 6d to 3s 0d; second quality ditto, 3s 2d to 3s 6d; prime coarse woolled sheep, 3s 8d to 3s 10d; prime Southdown ditto, 4s 0d to 4s 2d; large coarse calves 3s 0d to 3s 6d; prime small ditto, 3s 8d to 4s 0d; large hogs, 3s 0d to 3s 6d; small porkers, 3s 8d to 4s 0d; sucking calves, 18s to 32s; and quarter old store pigs, 16s to 20s each. Beasts, 636; cows, 170; sheep, 4120; calves, 177; pigs, 380.

Newgate and Leadenhall (Friday).—The supply of meat here to-day, was only moderate, while the demand ruled steady at full prices:—Per 8lbs by the carcass:—Inferior beef, 2s 4d to 2s 6d; middling ditto, 2s 8d to 2s 10d; prime large ditto, 3s 0d to 3s 2d; ditto small ditto, 3s 4d to 3s 6d; large pork, 2s 4d to 3s 4d; inferior mutton, 2s 6d to 2s 8d; middling ditto, 2s 10d to 3s 0d; prime ditto, 3s 2d to 3s 6d; veal, 3s 0d to 4s 0d; small pork, 3s 6d to 3s 10d. ROBERT HERBERT.

BRADFORD PIECE MARKET, Nov. 28.—There is a full average attendance of merchants here to-day, and their operations a little more extensive, which, we expect, will be continued for some weeks, in order to enable them to get a supply of goods ready to meet the next fair at Leipzig, in January. The change in the weather during the week is also looked favourably upon by the home trade houses, whose business has not been so extensive as was looked for. In prices no marked difference is notable.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

There was a slight tendency to flatness in Consols on Monday, several large sales having been made upon the news of the election of Mr. Polk to the American Presidentship, coupled with the unsatisfactory state of affairs in Tahiti. Prices, however, rallied on Tuesday, as far as Consols were concerned; although the other description of English securities did not partake in the advance. A slight tendency to improve on Wednesday was succeeded by a more considerable advance on Thursday, and the settlement passed off easily, Consols quoting 100¾ ⅞ for Money, and 101 to ⅛ for the Account. The alteration in the period of paying the dividends on the other description of securities leaves Consols the only large Stock on which anything will be due in January. This has created rather a demand during the last few days, more particularly as the books for transfer will close on the 3rd of December. Exchequer Bills are declining in price, and the market is very heavy. The closing quotations are 58-60 for the large, and 60-58 for small Bills; Bank Stock quotes 206 to 205½; Three per Cent. Reduced, 99⅞; Long Annuities, 12 1-16; India Stock, 287; India Bonds, 83s.

The principal features in the Foreign House have been the heaviness of Spanish Stock and the rise in Portuguese. The former is affected by the progress of Zurbano's insurrection, which, instead of being quelled, appears to be gaining ground. There is also a rumour that the parties undertaking to guarantee the dividend on the Three per Cents., made a proviso, that, in the event of any insurrection or revolution, the contract should be null and void. Quotations during the week have been, with a very slight variation, 23⅞ to 24 for the Actives, Three per Cents, 35½. The Legislature in Portugal have lately passed some new taxes, and materially improved the mode of collecting the revenue. This affords reasonable hope that regularity and good faith will be observed with regard to the dividends. The price has consequently improved to 55½ 56. Mexican has also advanced to 35⅞ to 36½. Belgian last quotes 101½ to 102; and Dutch Two-and-a-Half per Cents are 62⅞; Five per Cents, 99½; Four per Cent. Certificates, 96⅞.

There has been but little animation in the Share Market during the week; prices, however, with few exceptions, have been maintained. Blackwall's have suddenly become in demand, and some very good business has been doing in them: the closing quotation is 6⅞ 7. Great Westerns have varied in price, and close at 139. South Eastern and Dover have not recovered the depression caused by the small dividend and new issue of shares. The last price is 38. Birmingham (Stock) is 216 217; Birmingham and Gloucester, 75; Cambridge and Lynn, 1½; Direct Northern, 2⅜; South Western, 76; Croydon, 16⅝; London and York, 3⅝; Manchester and Birmingham, 50; Manchester and Leeds (quarter shares), 10 11-16; Sheffield and Lincoln, 1⅜; Glasgow and Dumfries, £1 to 17s 8d; Edinburgh and Glasgow, 59 to 60, Newcastle and Darlington, 55½; York and North Midland (Extension), 13; Greenwich, 9⅝; Eastern Counties 13½; Portsmouth Direct, ½ dis.; North British, 5; Brightons, 47½; South Western, 76. The Foreign Lines have, in some instances, advanced, closing as follows:—Boulogne and Amiens, 4½; Orleans and Vierzon, 11½; Orleans and Bordeaux, 6; Paris and Lyons, 3; Paris and Orleans, 41¼; Paris and Rouen, 39½: Paris and Strasbourg, 2⅝.

SATURDAY MORNING.—The Directors of the Bank of England announced yesterday their intention to advance loans, payable the 13th of January, at 2½ per cent., for not less than £2000 each. The effect was to give an impulse to the Consol and Share Markets, both of which quoted improved prices. In the Foreign House Spanish Three per Cents. improved to 35⅞, and Mexican also has advanced to 36⅞. Consols closed at 100¾ ⅞ for money, and 101 for the opening in January next.

FRIDAY, NOV 29.

RAILWAY DEPARTMENT, BOARD OF TRADE, WHITEHALL, Nov. 28.—Whereas various notices of intended applications to Parliament for Bills to authorise the construction of new railways, have appeared in the Gazette, in compliance with the standing orders of Parliament, some of which may not be comprised in the terms of the Gazette notices of the 20th August, 9th September, 19th September, and 24th October, stating the intention of the Board for the transaction of railway business, to examine into and report upon such schemes; notice is hereby given, that it is the intention of the Board to examine into and report upon all railway schemes, respecting which notices have been inserted by the promoters in the Gazette, with a view to the presentation to Parliament of minutes or reports thereon, in the event of their becoming the subjects of application to Parliament in the ensuing session. The principal points into which inquiry will be made, in connection with the said schemes, are as follows:—

1st. The ability and bona fide intention of the promoters to prosecute their application to Parliament next session for Bills to authorise the several undertakings.

2nd. The advantages to be obtained, in a national point of view, in completing or extending important lines of railway communication.

3rd. The amount of local advantage afforded to the towns and districts more immediately affected.

4th. The engineering circumstances of the lines, so far as may be necessary to form a general judgment of the undertaking.

5th. The estimates of cost of construction, and of traffic and working expenses, so far as may be necessary to judge of the probability of the line being completed and efficiently worked, in the event of its being sanctioned by Parliament, and with a view to drawing a comparison between the merit of competing lines of railway.

The inquiry, in conformity with the recommendation of the fifth report of the Select Committee on Railways, will not embrace questions of private property or interest, which will be reserved altogether for the consideration of the Legislature.

THE ORDER OF THE BATH.

This Most Honourable Order of Knighthood is named from the ceremony of bathing performed by the Knights previously to their inauguration. Froissart refers its origin to the coronation of Henry IV.; but Anstis has shown good reasons for believing this Order of Knighthood to be of yet greater antiquity. Be its origin of what date soever it may, the honour of being created a Knight of the Bath is one which it was, for a long time, customary to bestow upon such of the flower of the nobility as had not previously received the honour of Knighthood at the coronations of Kings and Queens, and at their marriages; sometimes, also, when their sons were invested Prince of Wales or Dukes, or when they solemnly received the cincture, or military girdle of Knighthood.

But this Order may be said never to have been established upon any solid foundation, until the year 1725, when it was, at the suggestion of Sir Robert Walpole, renewed by George the First, who enacted Statutes for its regulation, by which it was ordained to consist of the Sovereign and thirty-seven Knights Companions. The Duke of Montagu was named Grand Master, but upon his death that dignity was re-united to the Crown.

Since this period the Order has gradually increased in honour and importance; and by Statute, 2nd January, 1815, it was ordained that "for the purpose of commemorating the auspicious termination of the long and arduous contest in which this Empire had been engaged," the Order should henceforth be composed of three classes—Knights Grand Crosses, Knights Commanders, and Companions of the Order.

The following details of the insignia of the Order, are from Thoms's "Court Directory." The new Badge for the Military Classes of the Order, is a gold Maltese cross of eight points, enamelled Argent—in the four angles, a lion passant, guardant Or. In the centre, the rose, thistle, and shamrock, issuant from a sceptre between two imperial crowns Or, within a circle gules, thereon the motto of the Order, 'Tria juncta in uno,' inscribed in letters of gold, surrounded by two branches of laurel proper issuing from an escrol azure, bearing the words 'Ich Dien.' It is worn by the Grand Crosses pendant from a red ribbon across the right shoulder, by the Knights Commanders from the neck, and by the Companions from the button-hole.

The Collar is of gold, weighing thirty ounces Troy weight, and is composed of nine imperial crowns, and eight roses, thistles, and shamrocks, issuing from a sceptre, enamelled in their proper colours, tied or linked together with seventeen gold knots, enamelled white, having the badge of the Order pendant therefrom.

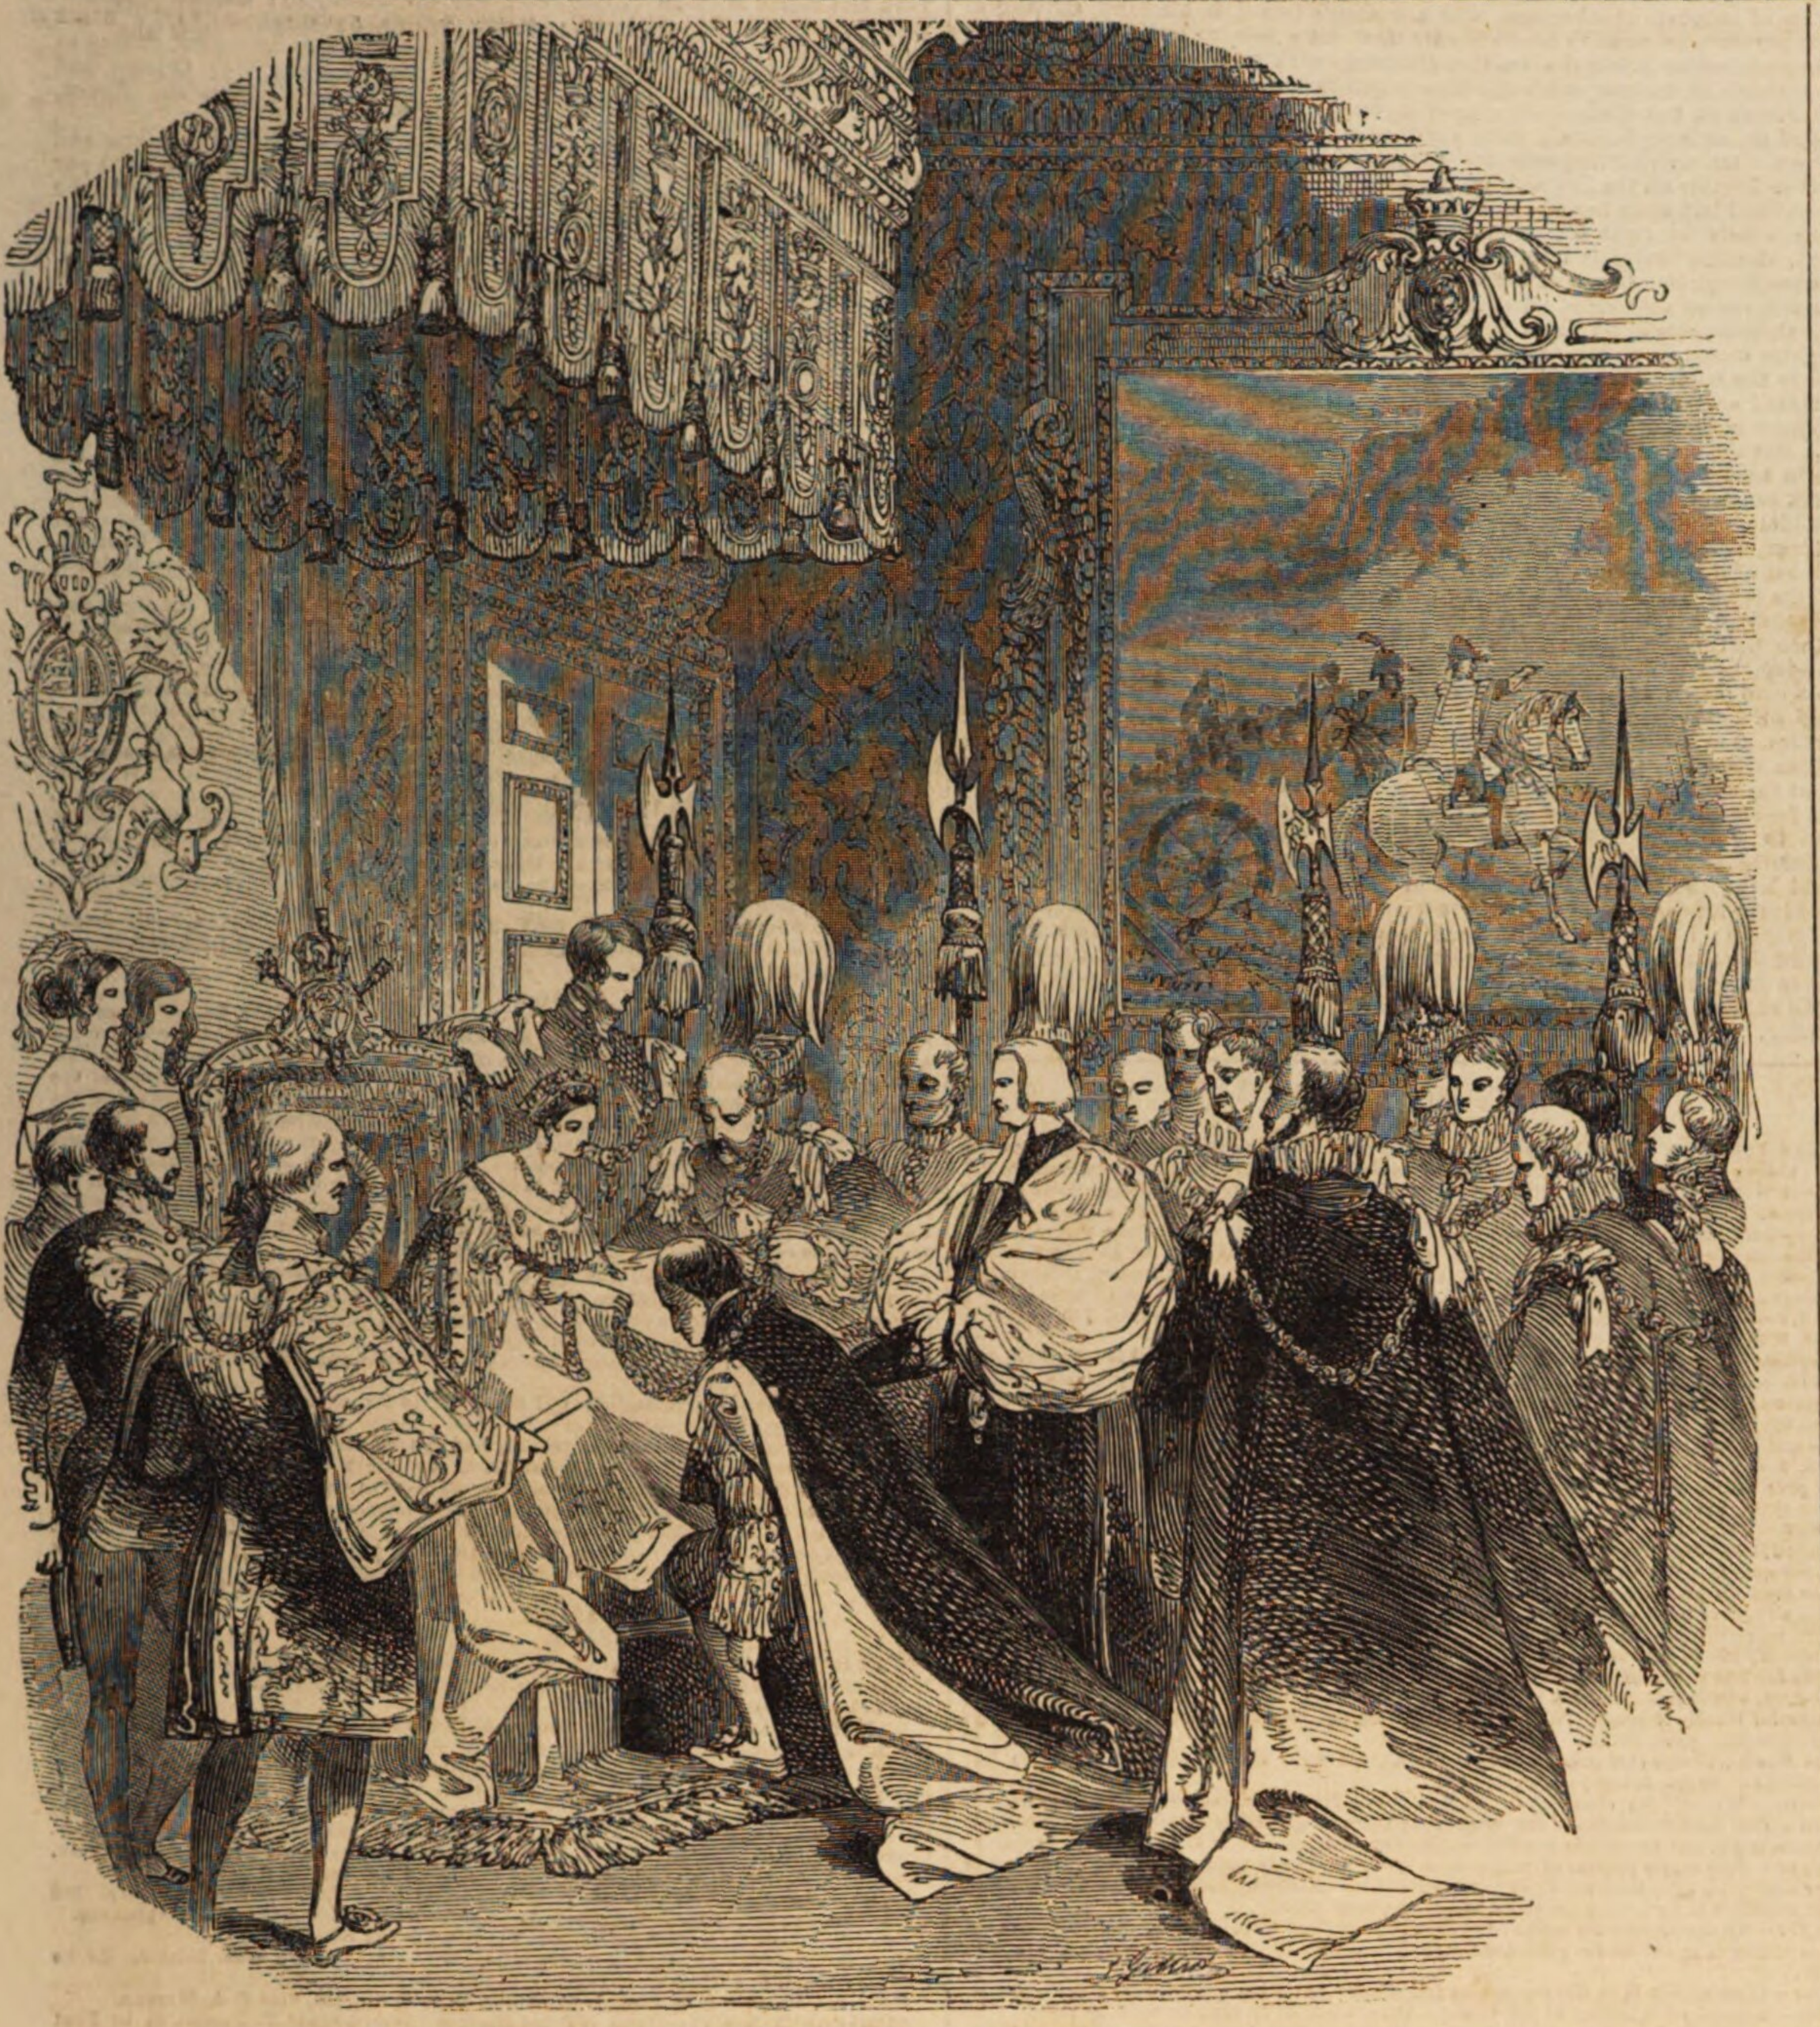
The Star of the Military Grand Crosses is formed of rays or flames of silver, thereon a gold Maltese cross, and in the centre, three imperial crowns proper upon a glory of silver rays within the motto, which is surrounded by branches laurel proper issuing from an escrol azure with the words "Ich Dien."

The Civil Knights Grand Crosses retain the old Badge and Star of the Order; which last is of silver, formed of eight points or rays, charged with three imperial crowns proper, upon a glory of silver rays, surrounded with a circle gules, on which is inscribed the motto of the Order. The Badge is of gold, and contains a rose issuing from the dexter side of a sceptre, and a thistle from the sinister, all between three imperial crowns, encircled by the motto, "Tria juncta in uno."

The Star of the Knights Commanders is in the form of a cross patée of silver, having the same centre as that of the Grand Crosses, but without a gold Maltese cross thereon.

The dress of ceremony worn by Knights of the Bath, on solemn festivals, such as coronations or installations, consists of a surcoat of crimson, lined and turned up with white; over this is worn a red mantle lined with white, fastened with rich gold tassels, and with the star of the Order embroidered on the left side.

The rest, smallclothes, and stockings are white, the two former of white satin.



INSTALLATION OF A KNIGHT OF THE BATH.

The shoes are of white leather, the spurs of gold, and the hat, which is somewhat high crowned, is adorned with a plume of white feathers.

Our illustration represents the Ceremony of the Sovereign investing a Knight with the Order, in the Throne-room, at St. James's Palace.

An investiture took place on Tuesday, at Windsor Castle, by the Queen's command. At half-past two o'clock the Knights assembled in the Guard Chamber, and were there robed in the splendid mantles and collars of the Order, in which they afterwards proceeded to St. George's Hall. The Chapter was held in the Reception-room. Her Majesty and Prince Albert having entered the apartment, preceded by the Lord Chamberlain and the Lord Steward, the ceremony commenced. The Knights Grand Crosses present were—his Royal Highness Prince Albert, first and principal Grand Cross, and Acting Great Master of the Order; his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, his Grace the Duke of Wellington, Viscount Strangford, Sir Edward Paget, Sir George Murray, Sir George Cockburn, Sir Edward Codrington, and the Earl of Clarendon. The Queen, who wore the mantle, collar, and star of the Bath, was seated at the head of the table, having Prince Albert on her right, and the Duke of Cambridge on her left; the Knights Grand Crosses being seated on each side of the table. Sir Arthur Aston was then conducted from St. George's-hall between the two junior knights present, the Earl of Clarendon and Sir George Cockburn, preceded by the Gentleman Usher of the Order, and Bath King of Arms bearing the insignia of the order on a crimson velvet cushion. Sir Arthur was ushered to the right hand of the Sovereign, and, kneeling, the sword of state was delivered by the Lord Chamberlain to the senior Knight Grand Cross, who presented it to her Majesty. The Queen then conferred with it the honour of knighthood on the new Knight Grand Cross, who on rising had the honour to kiss the Sovereign's hand. The riband and badge presented by Bath King of Arms were received by Prince Albert, and handed to the Sovereign, who placed the same over the right shoulder of Sir Arthur, and also presented to him the star of a Civil Knight Grand Cross of the Order. The new Knight then withdrew. The Earl of Ellenborough was introduced between the Earl of Clarendon and Sir George Cockburn preceded by the officers of the order, and had the honour of knighthood conferred upon him with the sword of state by his Sovereign. The noble earl was then invested by the Queen with the riband and badge of the Order of the Bath, and also received from her Majesty the star of a Civil Knight Grand Cross. His lordship then had the honour to kiss her Majesty's hand, and retired from the Royal presence. The Knights Grand Crosses were called over, and with the officers of the Order retired from the presence of the Sovereign with the usual reverences.

The Queen gave a grand dinner in the evening, to which all the Knights Grand Crosses of the Order of the Bath present at the ceremony were invited. The banquet was served in the Waterloo Chamber. The state service of gold plate was used on this occasion. Down the whole length of the middle of the table were a succession of beautiful specimens of ornamental gold plate. Opposite to her Majesty, in the centre of the table, was placed the St. George's candelabrum, flanked at a little distance by two large scent jars of the time of Queen Anne, in gold, and of most curious workmanship; further still were the beautiful candelabra designed by Flaxman, the subject "The Garden of the Hesperides," and at each extremity of the table were the "Venus icepails," designed by Baily. The interstices in this line of magnificent objects were filled with epergnes of most elegant design filled with artificial flowers. Down each side of these, which formed the centre of the table, was placed a row of gold candelabra bearing a profusion of wax lights, and beyond these, towards the edge of the table, were placed the gold dishes of various descriptions, in which the viands of the banquet were served. Around the room was a succession of side tables, on which were displayed shields, salvers, and other articles of massive character, in gold plate. The apartment was also illuminated by the five brilliant crystal chandeliers.

STRIKE OF THE BARKING FISHERMEN.

Our illustration shows a group of fishing-smacks, belonging to Barking, in Essex; of which vessels, on Tuesday last, no fewer than sixty were lying in the river, a little below Woolwich, their crews having brought them home from sea, and struck work. The following details are abridged from the Morning Chronicle:—The total number of these smacks, nominally sailing from the port of London, is about one hundred and sixty, and they are one of the principal sources of supply to the Billingsgate market. They are wet-bottomed vessels, generally of from fifty to sixty tons, and carrying each three men besides the captain, and about the same number of apprentices. Their principal fishing grounds are off the coast of Holland, and during the cod season in the North Sea and about the Orkney Islands. In the summer and autumn, it is not unusual for many of them to work out of Harwich, Lowestoff, or Yarmouth, on the eastern coast. The kind of fish they are employed in catching varies with the season and locality: it is mostly cod, sole, haddock, or plaice. A smack's cargo commonly contains more than one of these varieties.

Where several smacks are the property of a single owner, or of two or three in the same family, they are generally worked in fleets of from fifteen to thirty sail, each smack in its turn bringing to market the fish caught by the whole fleet. In this way, a large fleet is enabled to keep up a regular and constant supply; thus a fair average of the market is secured, and the time of absence from home rendered less variable and uncertain. Frequently, however, the smacks only come up the river as far as Gravesend, and having discharged their cargo of fish into the hatch-boats that ply between that place and the London market, they take in fresh provision and return to sea. This is called making a "Gravesend voyage." It tends to keep the men longer from their homes and families, but effects a great saving of time to the owners. Formerly these Gravesend voyages were not so common as they are at present; and the men generally found means to get home on the average once a month. But to meet the increased competition that the supply of fish by railway has introduced, the owners have made them more frequent, till the usual time of absence has increased to six or eight weeks, and often more. One extensive proprietor, the owner of about 50 vessels, has also for the last year employed a very fast sailing cutter to carry provisions to his smacks, and those of the numerous small owners who are his dependents, and to bring their fish back to meet the boats at Gravesend. By this means, the crews of more than half the smacks belonging to the place have been kept out at sea for periods of from three to six months. This lengthened absence from home and its comforts, the working fishermen have long felt to be a great privation. The middle class of owners thinking probably that a partial return to the old system would place them on a more equal footing with the extensive proprietor above referred to, lent a favourable ear to their complaints, and with their concurrence the crews of seventy vessels have struck and returned home. The other owners have, it is said, promised to take an additional hand in each vessel, to prevent any being thrown out of berth, should the men's demands not be acceded to. The apprentices, of whom more than two hundred are already on shore, will, of course, be thrown upon their masters' hands.

The demands of the men are for increased wages and shorter voyages. Their present rate of wages is: men fourteen shillings a week, and mates sixteen. They want this to be advanced two shillings in each case, and the time of absence to be limited to one month. The majority of the owners seem inclined to grant them this, but others are averse to all concession. If the strike continue long, the loss to large owners will be very great. Those who continue at sea will obtain high prices for such fish as they can bring to market, though it is doubtful whether this advantage will be more than overbalanced by their participation in the general loss.

GLOUCESTER COLLEGE SCHOOL

THE COLLEGE SCHOOL, GLOUCESTER.

The College School at Gloucester, of which the annexed view is an accurate representation, is one among the many foundations erected or revived at the Reformation in various places throughout the kingdom, for the encouragement of that species of learning, which, taking its origin from Constantinople, and enriched in its progress through Italy by the accession of native literature, had already begun, not only to excite the curiosity of the learned, but materially to affect the habits of thought of the masses in Europe, at the commencement of the 16th century.

The study of the Greek language in particular, as it had been one of the chief causes of the downfall of the Roman Ecclesiastical power, by opening the New Testament in the original, and affording an aid to scriptural interpretation hitherto unknown; so by the general spirit of liberty, created by the perusal of the profane authors, which constitute its literature, it had caused so complete a revolution in the views of the educated classes as to render them very ill disposed to submit again to that mental tyranny from which it had been one means of releasing them. Without question it was this policy which induced the advisers of Henry, in the educational foundations reconstructed by him, to make the reading of Greek an essential part in the system pursued, and to the example thus early set, may be ascribed the fact, that while in most foreign schools, the study of Greek forms a subordinate feature in scholastic and collegiate pursuits, and its acquisition is not generally considered necessary, in England the great test of Scholarship a based upon an accurate acquaintance with that noble language. That this taste for Greek in particular, has been fostered by the old Grammar Schools none can doubt, and to no one of them are the public more indebted than to the Cathedral School at Gloucester, for perhaps it may be but partially known that this school was the first to break down the barbarous custom of teaching Greek, through the Latin language, and first dared (for at that time it was a daring act) to assert in practice, that as the English was nearer the Greek in idiom, so it was the best medium for initiation into that language. One of the great reformers in this respect, whose name is well known to our literary readers, was the Rev. Thomas Stock, late Head Master of the College School at Gloucester, who by means of our wide circulation will be known at the same time, as not only the reformer of an absurd custom in the higher departments of education, but as also the originator of Sabbath Schools, for although Robert Raikes has generally had the credit of the establishment of these foundations, he, in fact, was only the trumpeter of Stock—the one founded, the other filled the schools. In the Gloucester College School, men of the greatest eminence in after life received their education. Dr. White, the famous orientalist and Bampton Lecturer, was taught there. Originally he was only a poor woolcomber, but afterwards he became Canon of Christchurch, and Professor of Hebrew in the University at Oxford. Among the school exercises is found, often repeated, the name of Mansel, late Bishop of Bristol, and Master of Trinity College, Cambridge. Of living men, one of its brightest ornaments is the Rev. Joseph Parsons, Vicar of Newnham, in Gloucestershire, joint editor of the Great "Oxford Septuagint," a work of enormous labour, for which he is rewarded by the church with poverty and neglect, while his predecessor, Holmes, retired on a good Deanery. Though "last not least," Dr. Philpotts, the present Bishop of Exeter, was educated in this establishment, of whom it is sufficient here to say, that he has justly been exalted to the highest honours of his sacred calling.

Nor in the department of ancient literature alone does this old Grammar School still retain its creditable position. Dr. Evans, its present Head Master, has the good sense to perceive that something besides a knowledge of Latin and Greek is required in the present day. Mathematics, Drawing, German, and French, are studied by the pupils; and, as our reporter was able to ascertain, by an inspection of the Establishment without a previous appointment, the domestic comforts of the scholars are most carefully provided for. Recently, a most commodious suite of rooms has been built by Dr. Evans, from designs by Messrs. Daukes and Hamilton of Gloucester, consisting of a dining-hall, a lavatory, and dormitories, most chastely fitted up and admirably arranged, all of which are well suited for the purposes for which they are intended.

The accompanying sketch of the building was drawn by Mr. J. H. Brown, one of the assistant-masters of the College School. On the right appears the spire of St. John's Church, to which is attached the first Sunday-school established in this kingdom.

THE CLOCK OF THE ROYAL EXCHANGE.

The clock of our Exchange is now going, and what is of equal importance, it is going accurately. The citizens are proverbially fond of true time: no men spend so much in procuring a good chronometer; and no pride is greater, or less harmless, than that which they exhibit in showing its performance to others. And they are right. Correct time is an important thing in the metropolis of England; and a large share of its commercial prosperity may be traced to the habits of punctuality which its regular observance has induced. The old 'Change men, the minute watchers, the four o'clock men "to a tick," have accordingly been in raptures during the past month, in finding that they have at last got a public time-keeper, which rivals the Greenwich time-ball, in exact and constant accuracy. The clock of the Royal Exchange has not varied one half second during the last four weeks! They have reason, then, to rejoice, for the achievement is every way creditable to the gentlemen by whom it has been accomplished. We propose, therefore, to give some account of the various contrivances by which this marvellou time-keeping has been effected; and we hope to make our description perfectly intelligible by the accompanying very accurate engravings, drawn from the clock itself. Before, however, we proceed to the details, a few particulars may be mentioned, descriptive of the circumstances under which the clock originated. It appears that the Gresham Committee, for rebuilding the Royal Exchange, being desirous of procuring a clock which would give the instant of mean time at Greenwich, solicited the assistance of the Astronomer Royal in the adaptation and arrangement of the clockmaker's machinery, and generally in the regulation and approval of the entire work. This very responsible duty was undertaken by that gentleman with a zeal which bespeaks his love of science, and his readiness to serve the public to the extent of his great mathematical acquirements. The committee, in making this appointment, acted with great prudence, and with a just appreciation of Mr. Airy's talents; for we may mention that, in addition to his unrivalled knowledge of the exact sciences, he also possesses a most intimate acquaintance with practical mechanics, and a rare skill in combining its powers for the accomplishment of new purposes. One of his earliest papers, in the Cambridge Philosophical Transactions, written when a very young man, is a memoir on "The Mechanism of a Clock Escapement;" and one of his later ones, in the same publication, is a most important communication on "The Curve of Wheel Teeth." The committee, acting under Mr. Airy's advice, proceeded to advertise for a clock for the tower of the Royal Exchange, which, in addition to the ordinary excellences, should be

I. So true in its continuous action, that the first blow of each hour should be accurate to a second of time; and

II. That as a protection against varying temperatures, the pendulum should be a compensation one.

Several turret clock-makers were consulted on the subject, and many plans, "from all sorts of people," underwent discussion; but it was finally determined to commission Mr. Dent, the chronometer maker, with the charge of constructing the "perfect clock"—a task which it was considered his great experience in the arrangement of delicate and complicated mechanism eminently fitted him. Thus appointed, it became the aim of that gentleman's ambition, regardless of expense or labour, to do his bidding—as far as rust and friction, wear and tear, and all the infirmities to which this wasting earth is liable, perfectly, and—shall we say so?—everlastingly. And nobly he has performed the work. In accomplishing the primary condition of the committee, the first arrangement that suggested itself to his busy mind was, that it would be necessary that the "train of wheels" up to a certain point in the mechanism should move forwards suddenly at certain small intervals (20 seconds), thus allowing the snail, or "let off," as seen at a, Fig. 1, to move instantly forward, so as to let fall the lever b, an operation which could not possibly be accomplished by the slow motion of the ordinary clock; for as a portion of the machinery (which is visible externally by the motion of the minute hand) passes suddenly forward three times in every minute, it will be evident that as the pendulum receives an impulse once in every two seconds, that an auxiliary train must be in motion while the larger wheels remain stationary, an arrangement which is technically termed by the French "a remontaire," and is generally used by the clock makers in France in the construction of their best public clocks. The clock in the Bourse at Paris is of this construction. Before referring to it in the subjoined drawing

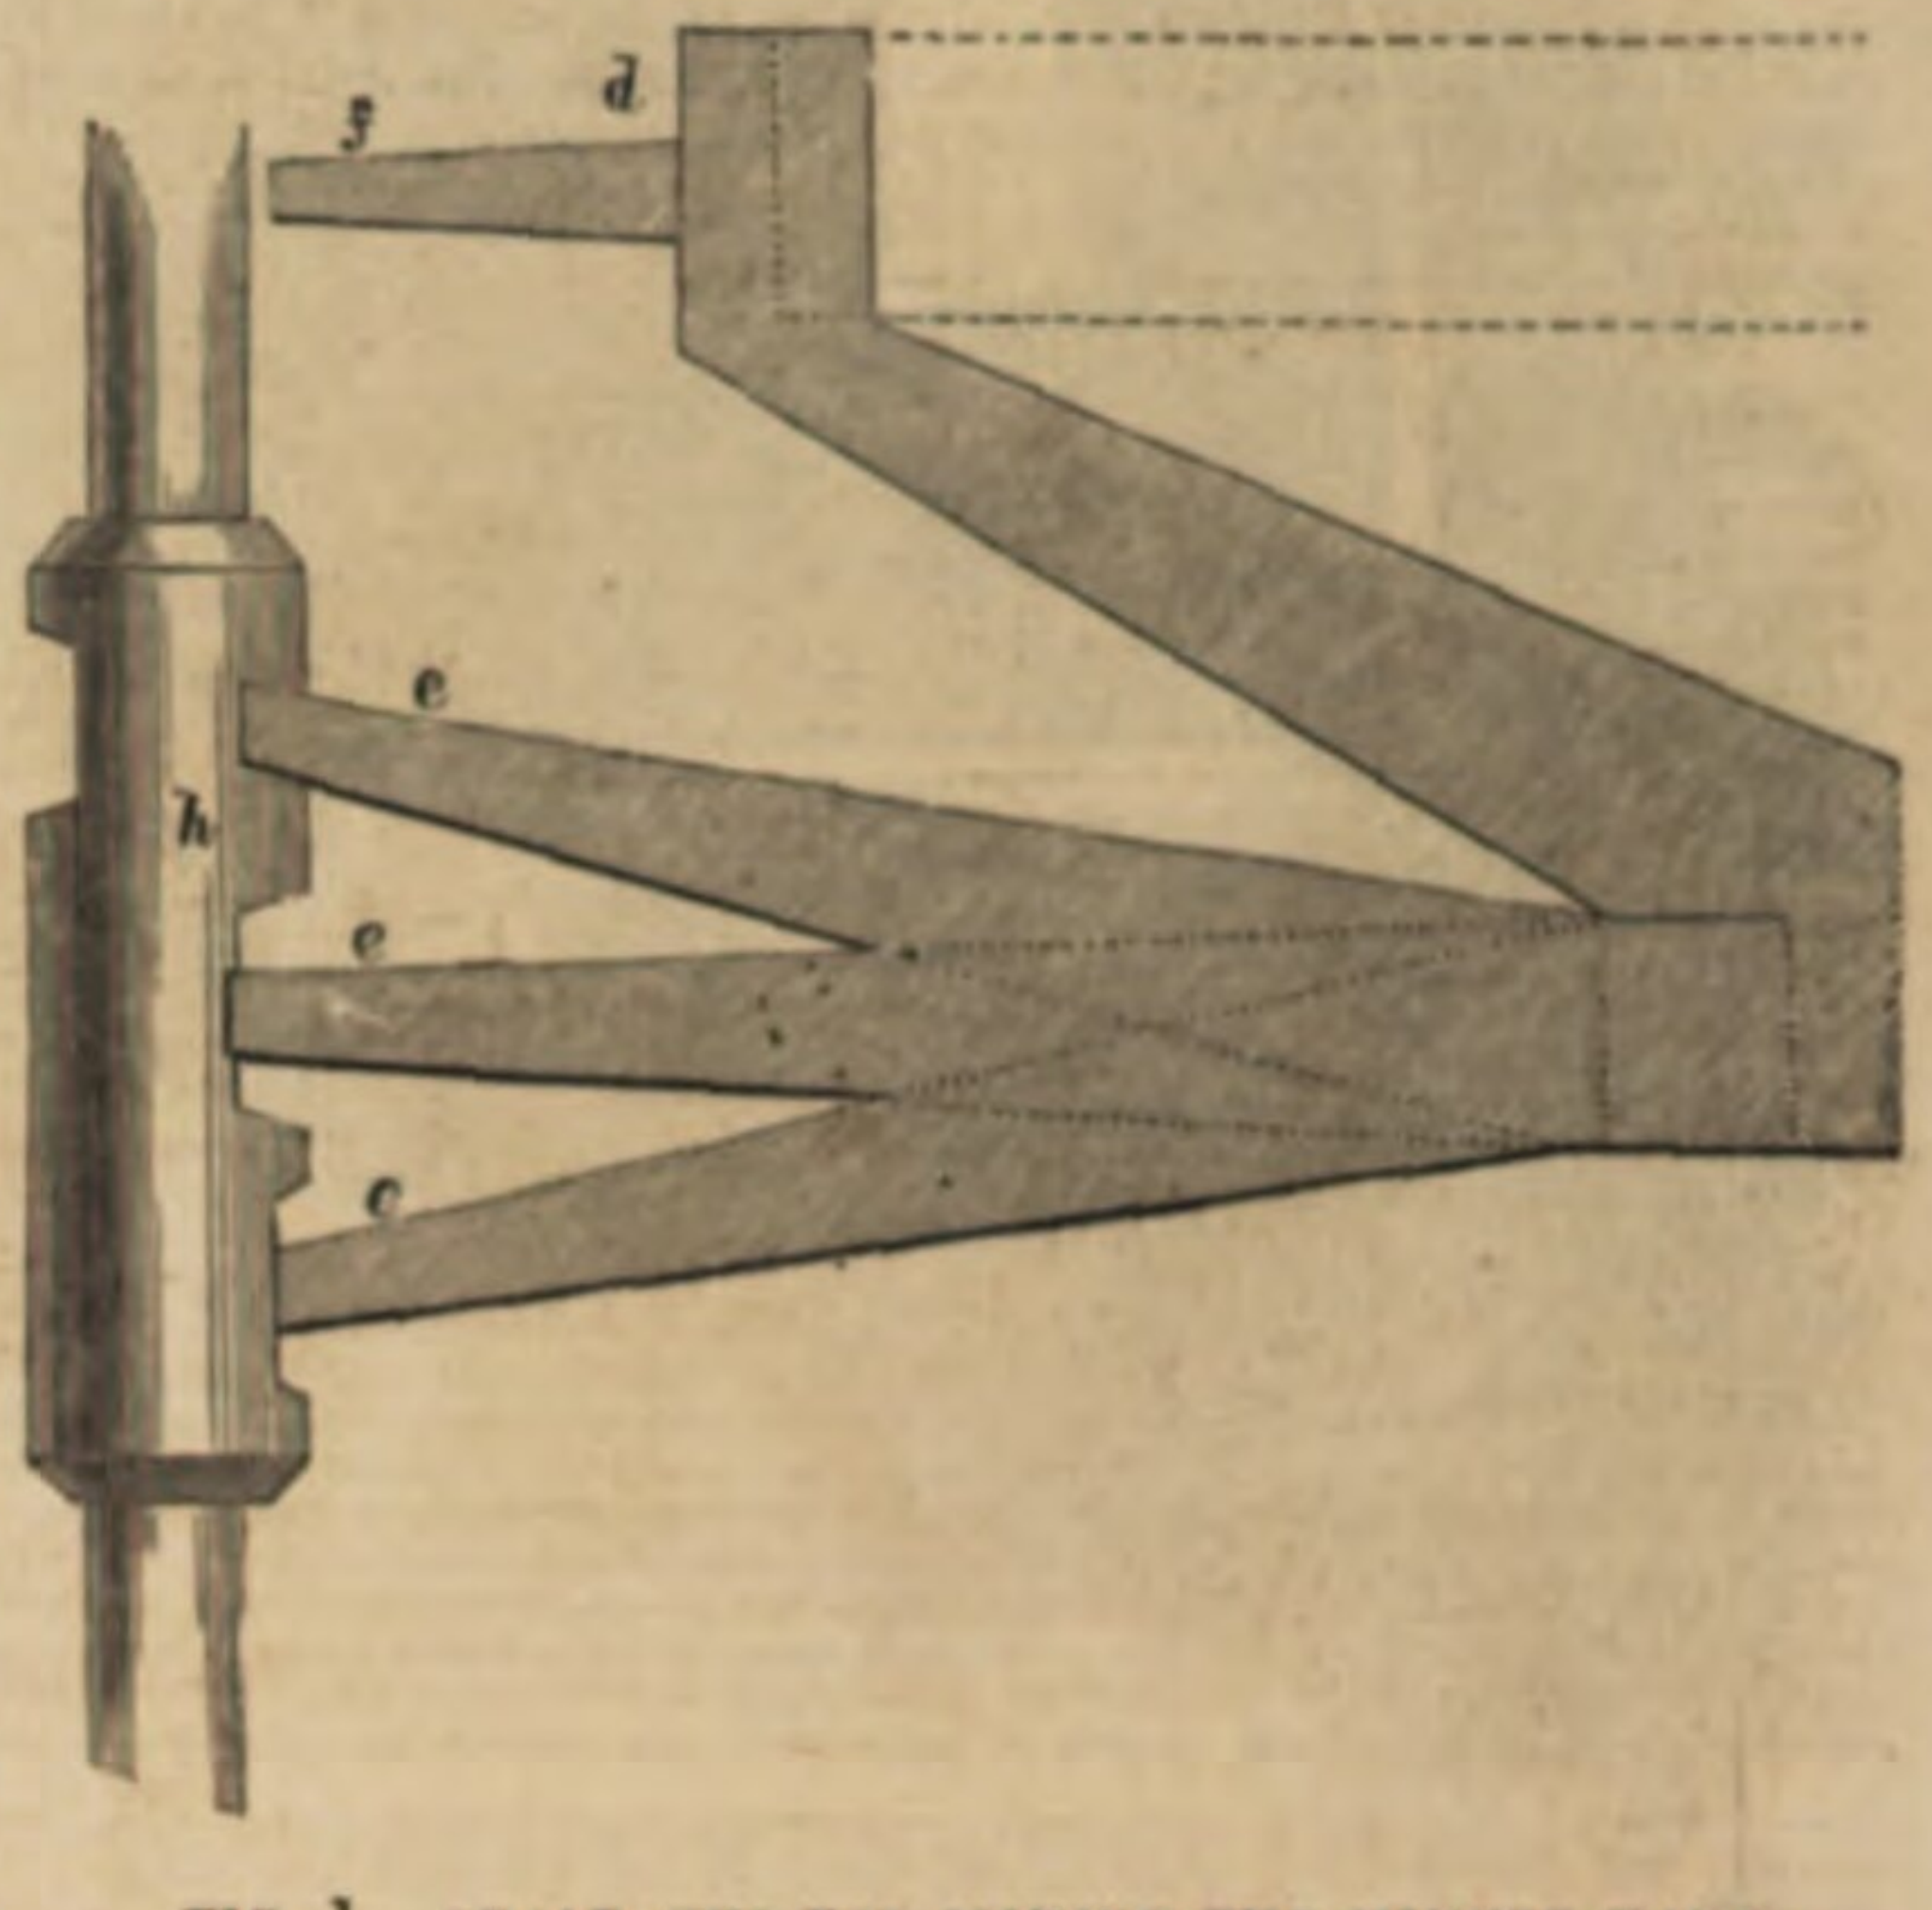

FIG. 1. APPARATUS FOR MOVING THE MINUTE HAND

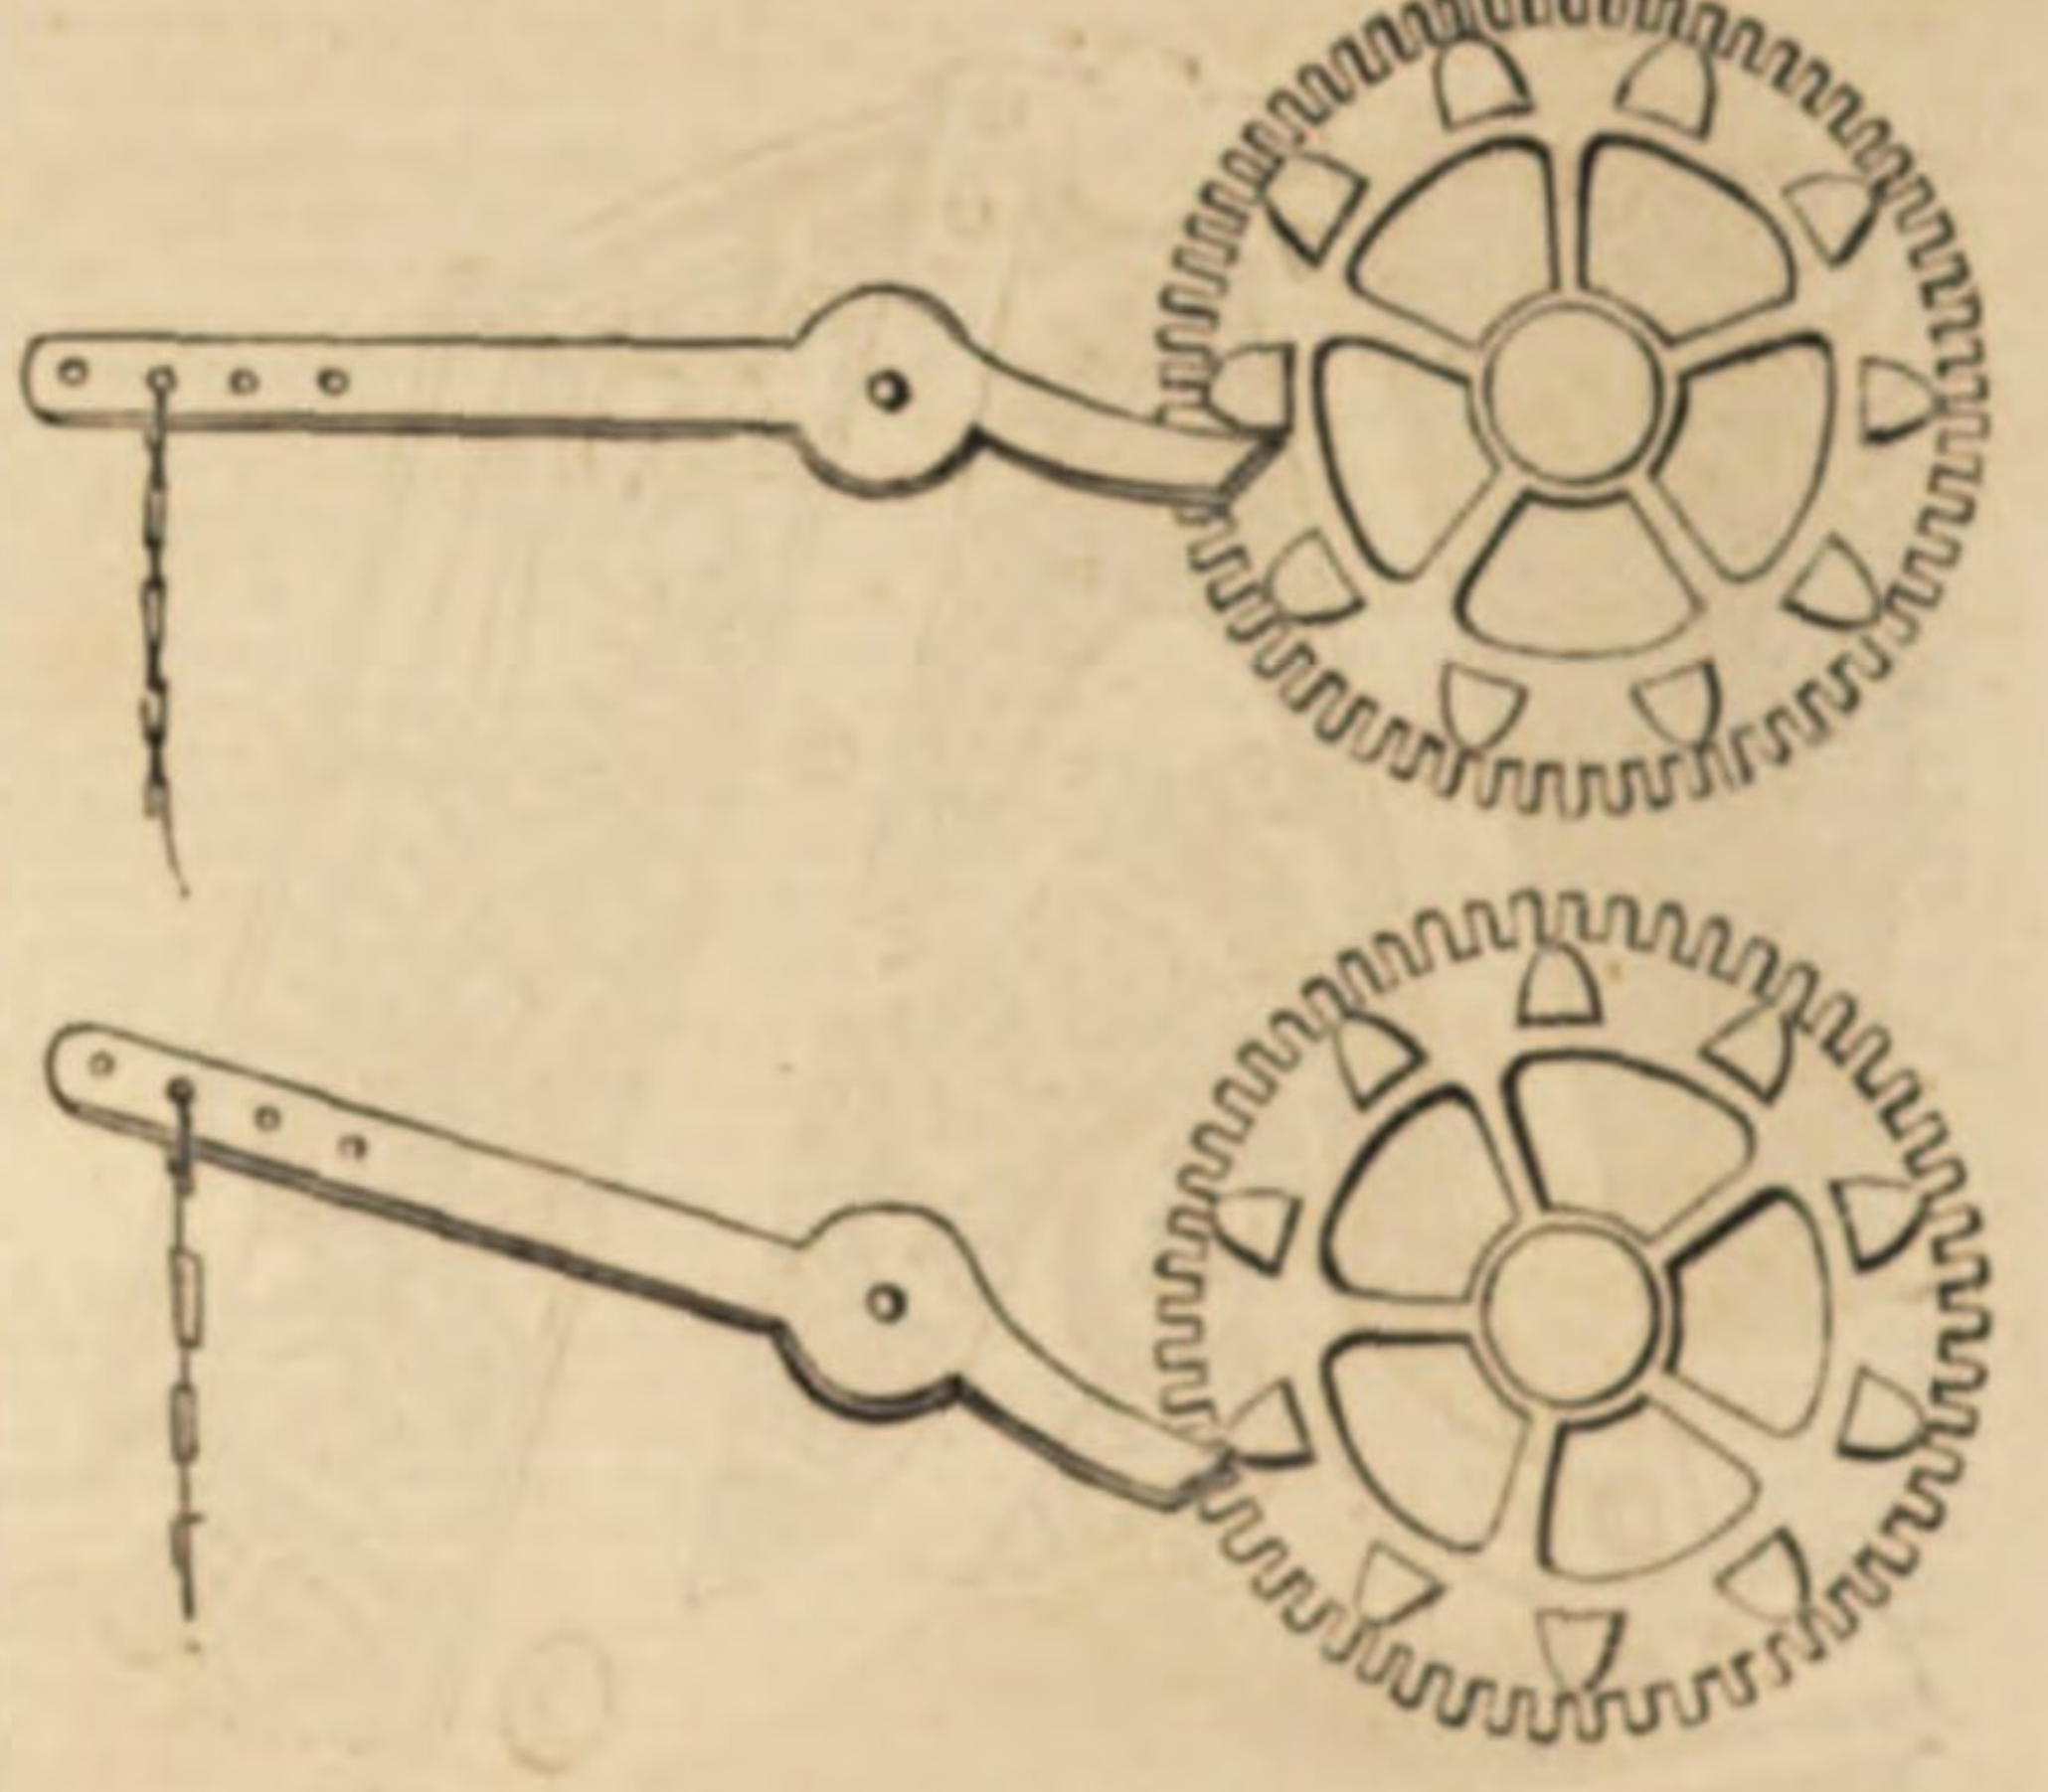

FIG. 2. APPARATUS FOR LETTING OFF THE CHIMES.

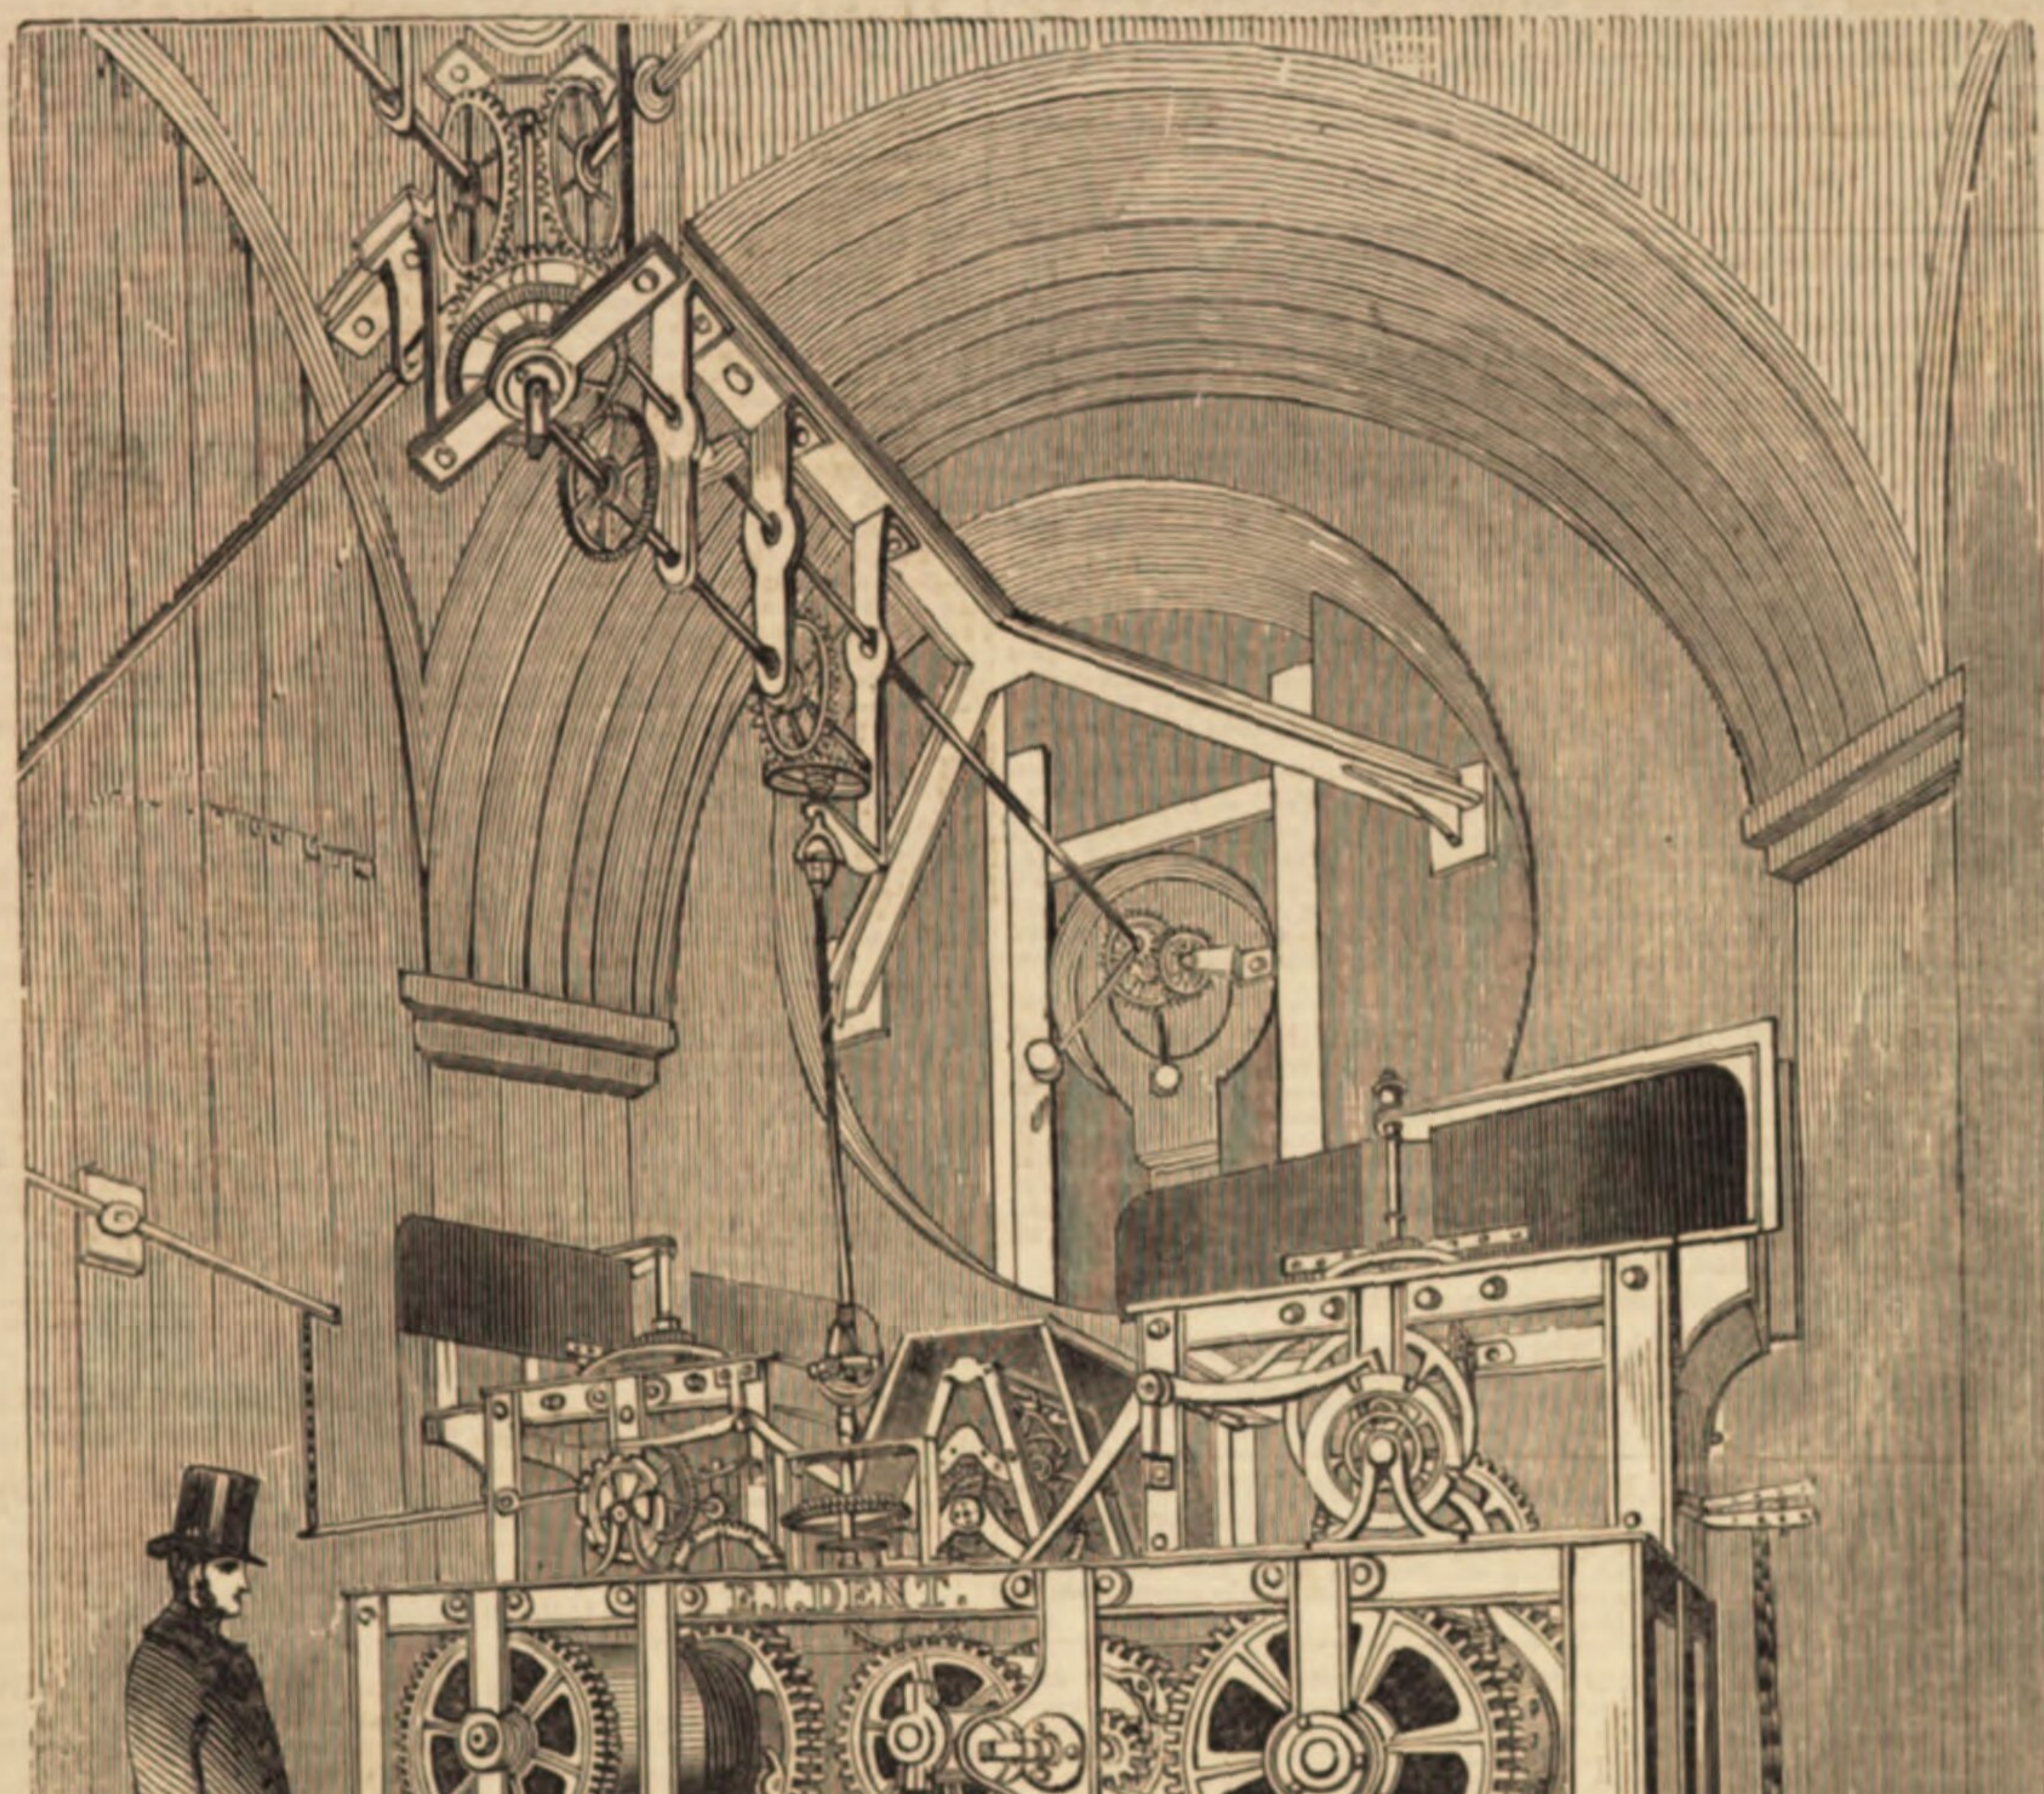

PERSPECTIVE VIEW OF THE GREAT CLOCK OF THE ROYAL EXCHANGE.

(Fig. 4), we may briefly explain its construction, and what is its use. At the place of introduction in the wheel work of this auxiliary-train, we must suppose the machinery to be divided into two separate trains—the first part, including all the larger machinery, with that for driving the hands: and the second part, engaged in raising a ball at certain intervals (20 seconds), which ball, falling through a small arc of about 40 deg., by its gravity causes an impulse to be given to the pendulum; and it follows that, so long as this ball is raised by the larger mechanism, the impulse to the pendulum may be fairly termed equal at all times, and not subjected to the variation of force to which public clocks are usually subjected from the varying friction, change in the fluidity of the oil by temperate, or the effect of the wind on the hands of the four faces. which are nine feet in diameter. We will now endeavour to explain this auxiliary force. The internal toothed wheel, Fig. 1 d, and the long teeth, e, and the shorter teeth, f, are all firmly fixed on the same axis. g is a small wheel acting upon the inner teeth of d, and it is by means of this wheel, that the ball c is raised every 20 seconds.

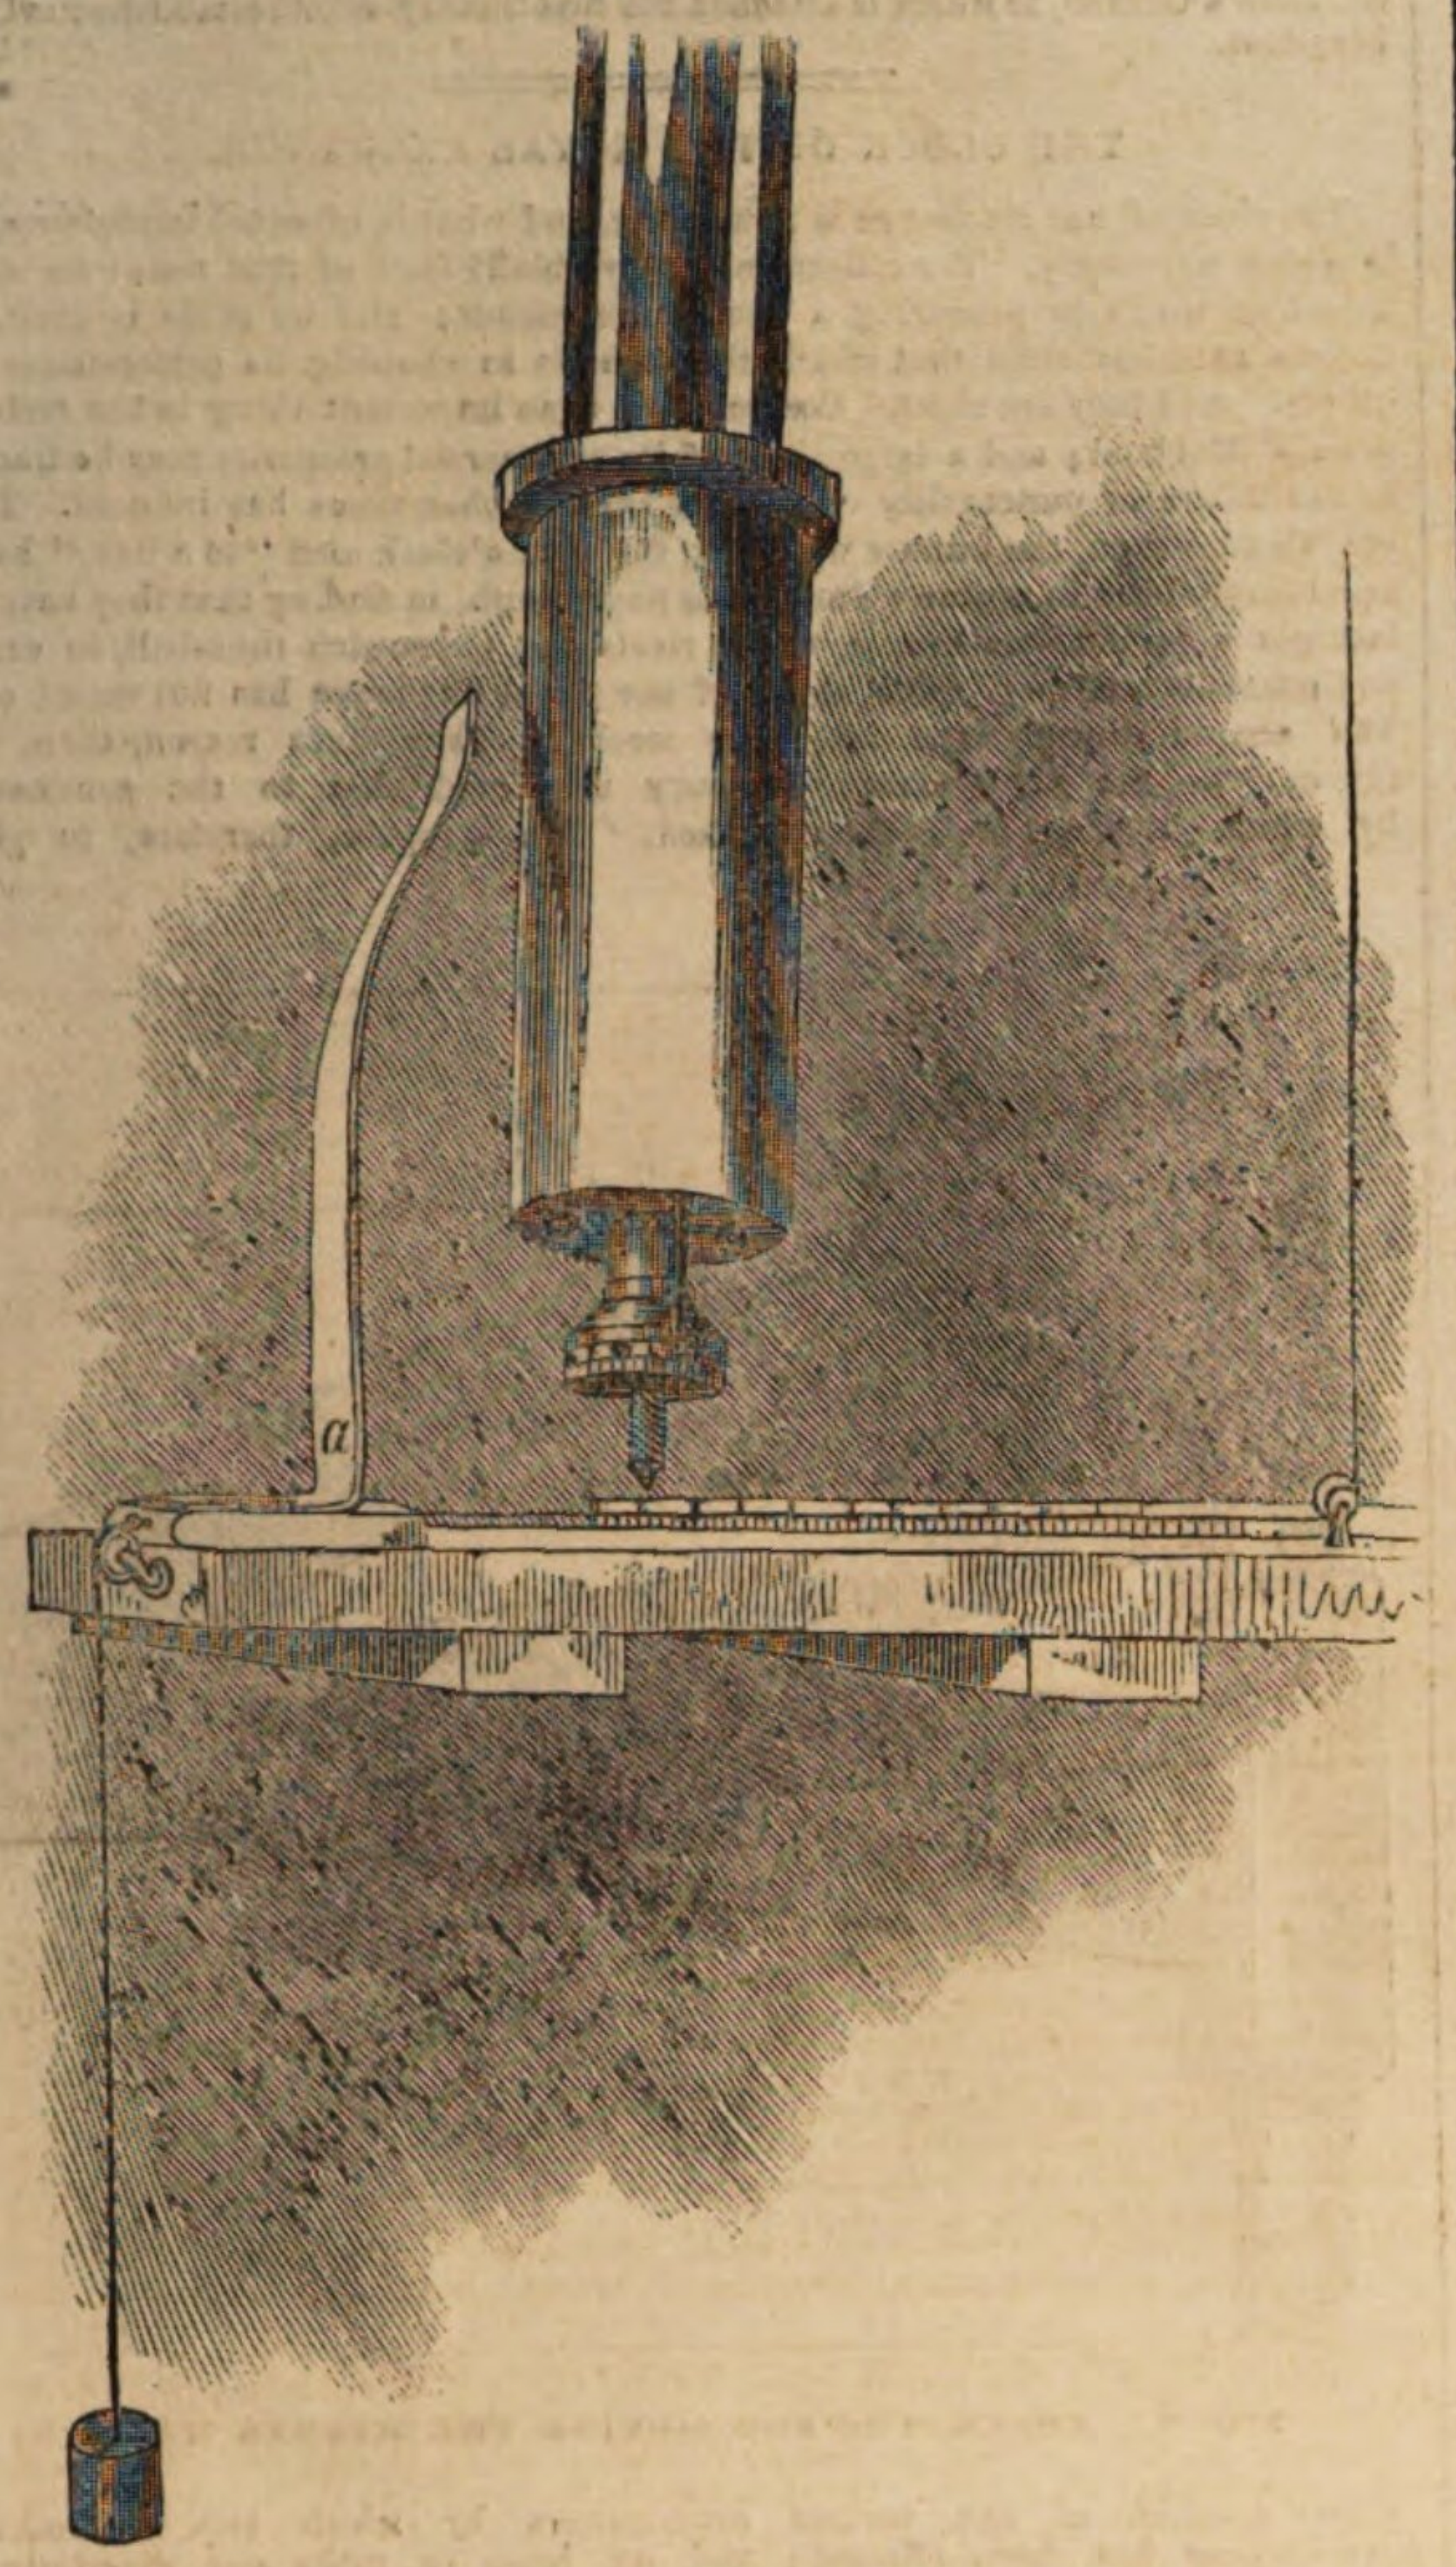

FIG. 3. THE COMPENSATION PENDULUM.

h, seen better in Fig e, is a hollow cylinder, having three openings, cut about half way through, each at an angle of 120 degrees, in separate planes, and it is firmly secured on the escape wheel, or box, i. To explain this action, it is necessary to keep in mind, that the escape wheel revolves once in every minute, and as it carries on its axis the cylinder, h, it will present an opening every 20 seconds to allow the long teeth, e, to pass through. The teeth of e is always kept pressed against this cylinder, except during the instant of passing from one tooth to the succeeding one; and the pressure of e is communicated from the clock weight through the wheels, and at this junction the clock force terminates, and the auxiliary fore (or ball) is wound up at the instant when the succeeding tooth of e, is passing forward to a resting place on the cylinder, h. The internal teeth of d, raises the gravity ball, c, to its maximum height, by means of the small wheel, g, which is seen to act in the inner teeth of d. We have endeavoured to exhibit in a popular manner the circumstance that the impulse is given to the pendulum by the falling of this ball, or, in other words, by gravity, and not by the clock weight, as is the case in the ordinary construction. The pins in the edge of the inner toothed wheel, are impact pins, and the short spring fixed to the pillar, on which it has a circular motion, is the impact spring: the force of impact of the long teeth against the cylinder is regulated; and from the shortness of the impact spring, its elastic force increases in a similar ratio to the momentum of the wheel.

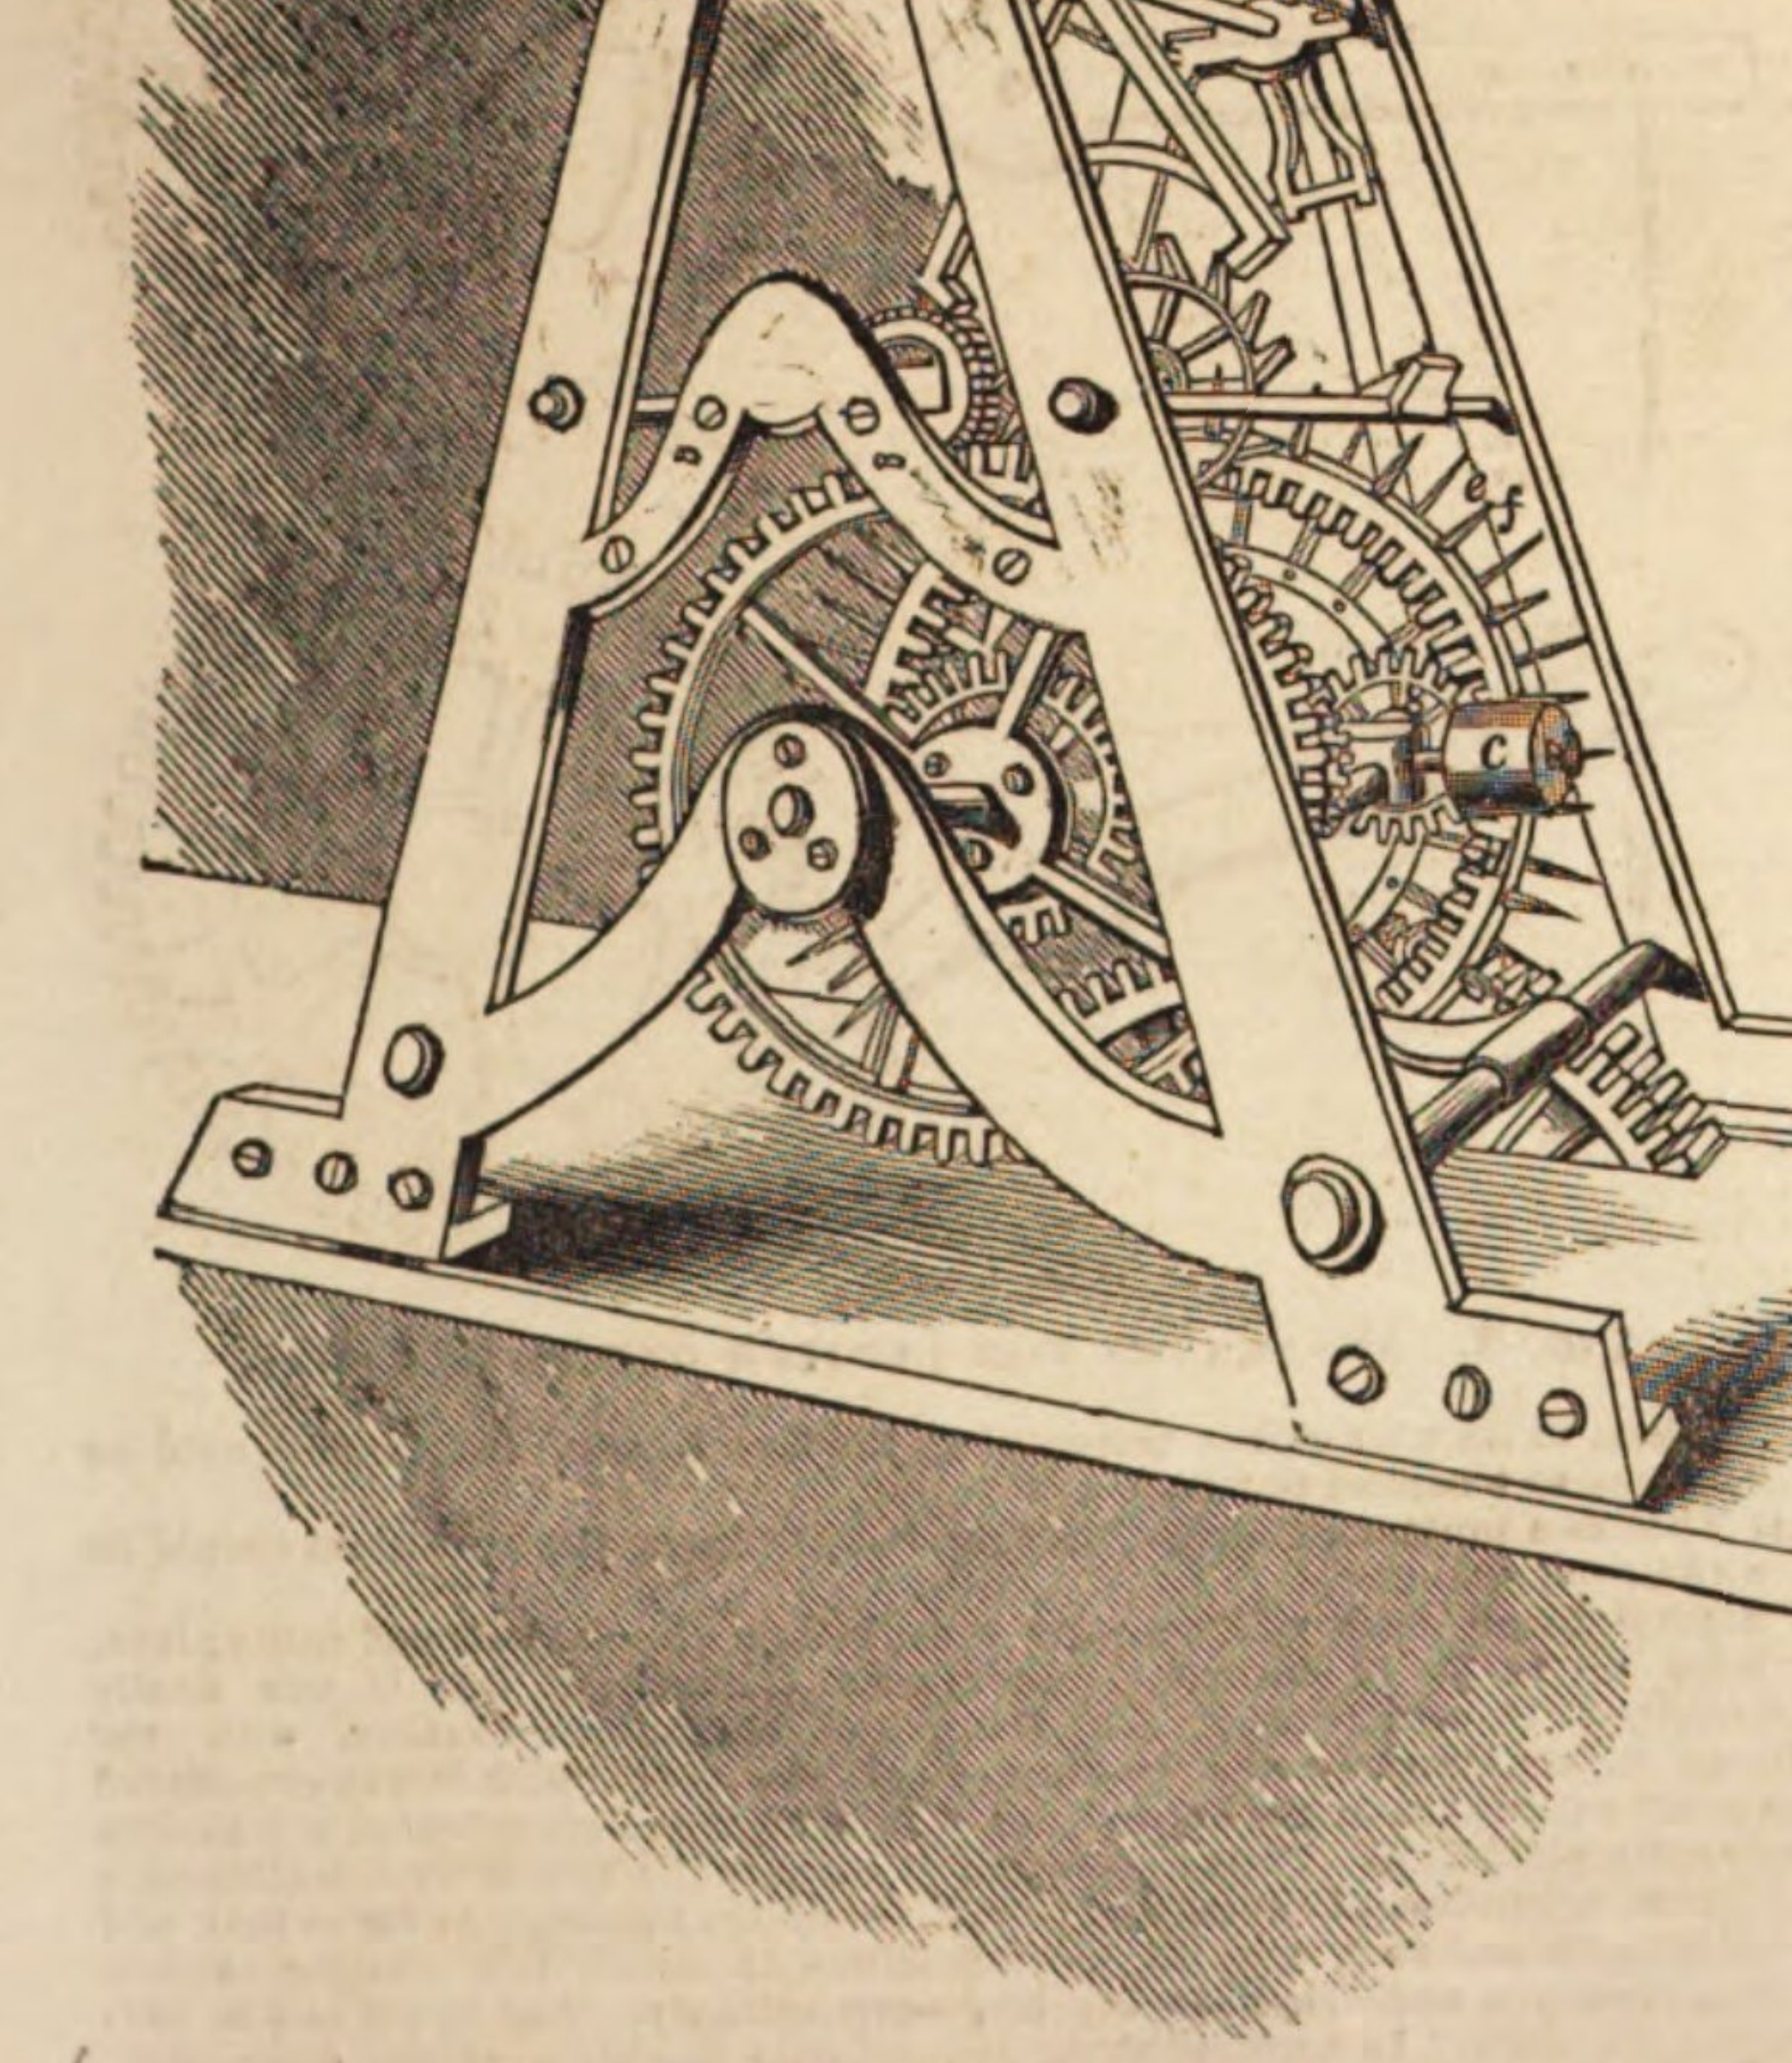

FIG. 4. THE ESCAPEMENT.

Mr. Dent obtained Mr. Airy's approbation of this arrangement; and he at the same time suggested that, in order to strike the first blow of the hour, it would be necessary the hammer should be raised nearly to its greatest height; but as it would have to overcome some] obstruction in making the start, Mr. Airy proposed that the end of the hammer tail should be made to rest on a circular part of the lift, concentric with the wheel, or, if possible, that it should have a trifling inclination, so that the weight of the hammer should tend to move forward the wheel-work rather than offer it any obstruction. Mr. Airy's very important improvement is seen at a, in Fig. 2; and Fig. 1 shows the position of the hammer before it is raised for the instantaneous fall. By this arrangement the blow struck on the bell is as momentry as the mind is capable of determining.

We have alluded to Mr. Airy's zeal in the prosecution of mechanical science, and we have now to notice an invention by him introduced for the first time into a clock. It is a contrivance by which the clock is kept going, whilst it is being wound up. Harrison was the inventor of the going-force in a chronometer, but from it being contained in a wheel, it was of a very limited power. Mr. Airy, when erecting the Northumberland telescope at Cambridge, required a weight of several hundred pounds to keep the telescope in motion during the time occupied in winding it up, and the means which he then adopted for overcoming the difficulty, he has applied, with perfect success, in meeting a similar requirement in the clock The barrel on which the line pulls is placed in a separate frame from the clock frame, as seen in the large cut; to the end of this frame is fixed the end of the line, which has usually a permanent fastening; and when the re-winding commences, by means of the pinion, which is fixed in the clock frame, the instant the wind-up commences, the end of the line, which is fastened to the end of the frame, instantly pulls round the wheel-work with the same force as when moved by the clock weight: and, as the arrangement is on the principle of the lever, it affords the nicest adjustment in making both powers equal.

The compensation pendulum presented the next difficulty, but, like all others, it was perfectly overcome. Its use is, as the public are aware, to correct the varying temperatures to which the clock must of necessity, in its exposed situation, be subjected. The compensation is effected by the equivalent contraction and expansion of a system of combined rods of zinc and steel: the centre rod is of steel, the whole length of the pendulum; and at the bottom of the pendulum, as shown in Fig. 3, is placed the zinc column. It is evident, that if the rod lengthens downwards by an increase of heat, the column of zinc standing on the nut, perfectly free of the steel rod, will expand upwards. On the top of the column of zinc is fixed a metal cap, d, into which is firmly fixed two steel rods, and at the bottom of them, the pendulum-bob, from which it follows that the bob hangs by means of these two rods from the top of the zinc column, and quite independent of the centre rod. The zinc column expanding upwards by an increase of temperature, raises the pendulum-bob, while at the same time the rod lengthens by the increase of heat. It will be seen that the zinc column is shorter than the steel rod, which arises from zinc expanding and contracting more than steel, for equal increments and decrements of heat.

The clock being required to be set to within a fraction of a second, it was found that if the pendulum was stopped by hand, it would be next to impossible to put so large and heavy a mass as nearly four cwts., in motion, to such a small portion of time. Again, the difficulty of setting it, to vibrate in the same plane, as well as to give the usual extent of arc of vibration, rendered it impossible to accomplish the regulation, or, more properly, the "setting it," to the required nicety. Mr. Airy at once suggested an ingenious and simple mode of overcoming the difficulty. He directed the clock to to be started at a very small losing rate, and then that a spring, shown at a, Fig. 3, should be brought against the pendulum, by means of a line, in the clock-room, so that it might be made to touch the pendulum slightly, and cause a corresponding gain in the clock, which it does to the minutest fraction of a second. In fact, it affords the means of putting the beats of a great turret clock and a comparing chronometer in coincidence.

The regulation of the pendulum, to bring it nearly to mean time, is effected by a screw at the bottom, taking care that the rate of going is always a losing one. The screw is not afterwards to be moved, but for the regulation of any small portions of time; there are weights prepared to place on each side of the top pendulum-bob. By this plan, there is no occasion, at any time, to stop the pendulum; and the smaller weights will correct with certainty periods of less than a tenth of a second daily. Should the clock gain, the weights are, of course, removed.

We have only to add that Mr. Dent, in making this extraordinary clock, was obliged, like Lord Rosse in the construction of his telescope, to commence his labours by organising an extensive workshop for the manufacture of the tools necessary for the due performance of the various curious and important works required.

THE QUEEN'S STAG HOUNDS.—The Royal Stag Hounds had a bye day on Wednesday, the meet taking place at Salt Hill, at which the Earl of Rosslyn, Lord A. St. Maule, and a field of between fifty and sixty, were present. The celebrated hind Eclipse, upon being uncarted in a field of Mr. Mason's near the Farnham-road, took away towards Burnham, doubling to the right to West Burnham and Farnham Common, crossing to the Beeches, leaving Hall Barn Park to the right, and then on to Holtspur-gate. Thence it made away for Penn, doubling round to Loudwater, and was taken at Wycombe Marsh, after an exceedingly fast run, especially to the Beeches, of an hour and a half. In consequence of the sharp frost of the preceding night, the stag was not turned out until one o'clock

THE HAIR.—Of the numerous compounds constantly announced, for promoting the growth or reproduction of the Hair, few survive even in name, beyond a very limited period, whilst ROWLAND'S MACASSAR OIL, with a reputation unparalleled, is still on the increase in public estimation. The singular virtues of this successful invention for Restoring, Preserving, and Beautifying the Human Hair, are too well known and appreciated to need comment. The very facts of the high and distinguished patronage it enjoys, its general use in all countries, together with numerous testimonials constantly received in its favour, are authorities which stamp its superior excellence and title over all attempts of a similar nature. Being universally preferred, its consequent great demand excites the cupidity of unprincipled shopkeepers, who vend the most spurious trash as the "GENUINE" Macassar Oil; whereas, the genuine article is wholly the invention and property of A. ROWLAND and SON, and the amalgamation of its costly exotic materials (solely imported by them) renders abortive any attempt to discover its component parts—thus proving the imposition of all other articles bearing the title of "Macassar Oil." The genuine article has the words ROWLAND'S MACASSAR OIL engraved in two lines on the Wrapper; and on the back of the wrapper nearly 1500 times, containing 29,028 letters.—Price 3s. 6d., 7s.; Family bottles (equal to four small), 10s. 6d.; and double that size, 21s. per bottle.—. All others are FRAUDULENT COUNTERFEITS ! ! !

READ the following TESTIMONIAL in favour of PARR'S LIFE PILLS, which is sufficient to convince the most prejudiced person that they are all that is required to conquer disease, and consequently, prolong life.

To T. ROBERTS and Co.

Sirs,—I beg to hand you the following testimonial, which I have just received from Mr. Williams, Union-street, Nottingham. Yours, obediently,

G. BATTERS, Chapel-bar, Nottingham.

Sir,—Printing is a great blessing to mankind, for now I am enabled to make known, through you, a perfect Cure, by taking PARR'S LIFE PILLS, of extremely bad Indigestion, a Bilious disorder, and Sick Headache, which I have been subjected to for years; and money enough has been paid to physicians and surgeons, which now would have been a little fortune to me. I wish every fellow-creatute clearly to understand that I was wonderfully relieved by taking one box of PARR'S LIFE PILLS. Accident threw a testimonial in my way of a miraculous cure of a bilious attack and sick headache. The second box enabled me to go about my business with spirit and alacrity; and by taking two or three more boxes, I am happy to add my humble testimony of a perfect cure of that dreadful disorder—bilious and sick headache, which rendered me, before I took PARR'S LIFE PILLS, unfit for business. Considering the loss of time and pain, persons would find that one box of PARR'S LIFE PILLS is worth, instead of 1s. 1½d., as many guineas. May all persons make trial of PARR'S LIFE PILLS, is the sincere wish of

Yours, thankfully, M. WILLIAMS, Union-street, Nottingham.

To Mr. G. Batters.

PARR'S LIFE PILLS are sold by all respectable Medicine Vendors. See the words "PARR'S LIFE PILLS," in White Letters on a Red Ground, on the Government Stamp.

Just Published, Demy 4to., neatly bound in cloth, with Engravings and Diagrams, price 6s.,

THE HAND-BOOK TO THE PIANOFORTE, comprising an easy Rudimental Introduction to the study of that Instrument and Music in General; the Art of Fingering, according to the modes of the best Masters, exemplified in various Exercises, Scales, &c., in all the Major and Minor Keys; and interspersed by Relaxations from Study, consisting of Popular Melodies and Romances, and Selections from Pianoforte compositions of some of the most celebrated Masters. Also, a short and easy Introduction to Harmony or Counterpoint, and a New Vocabulary of Terms. By J. AUGUSTINE WADE, Author of "The Dwellings of Fancy;" "Songs of the Flowers;" "The Two Houses of Grenada," an Opera; "The Prophecy," an Oratorio, &c. &c.

"From the first 'example' to the last 'exercise,' everything is brought before the learner in the clearest manner, and the means of conquering each new difficulty as it arises literally placed at his fingers' ends. Indeed, after carefully digesting some sixty pages, and mastering the 'digital' and other exercises here given, he need not fear the thickest army of semi-demi-semis, or the most whimsically-noted passage of the most gifted manipulator of the key-board. The work comprises, in addition, a brief and excellent treatise on the elements of harmony, developing the laws of composition in a simple and sound manner; and we altogether warmly recommend the book to public favour."—Literary Gazette, October 19.

"The book now before us is the most admirable instance we have ever met with of a man acknowledged as a poet and composer condescending to construct a threshold to harmony. Mr. Wade has written the best first book we ever read."—Sunday Times.

"This is one of the best works of musical instruction which has been brought under our notice; the author unites an earnest love of music with sound knowledge of the art, and has, therefore, given a life and animation to his lessons, which relieve the dry and technical details of teaching."—The League, October 12.

"An ingenious and tasteful work, comprehending a large amount of information in a comparatively small space. The volume seems to us calculated to be very useful; and it is certainly ornamental also, being handsomely printed and bound, and embellished with a striking portrait of the celebrated pianist, Franz Liszt."—Watchman, October 9.

"We regard it, on the whole, as very able and useful, and recommend it to the attention of students of the Pianoforte."—John Bull, October 19.

OPENING of the NEW ROYAL EXCHANGE.—Future English Historians have a fine field for elegant narration in recording the gorgeous spectacle of Queen Victoria opening the New Royal Exchange. The tens of thousands who witnessed this ever memorable event, when they beheld their Queen, it was as if the very windows spoke; such eager looks, such vivid, sparkling, animated eyes, gazing with rapture on the glorious scene! while the all-attractive charms of the fair actresses shone resplendent in their power, and the white and swan-like neck, the rich, luxuriant tress, and the pearly set of teeth, formed admirable trophies of the Inestimable Qualities of ROWLAND'S KALYDOR, ROWLAND'S MACASSAR OIL, and ROWLAND'S ODONTO. The august patronage conceded by our gracious Queen, and the several Sovereigns of Europe, together with the beauties which adorn the circles of princely and regal magnificence; and the confirmation, by experience, of the infallible efficacy of these creative, renovative Specifics, have characterised them with perfection, and given them a celebrity unparalleled. They have proved the theme of the poet; they are celebrated in the periodical literature of the whole civilised world: the lays of Byron, and the voice of the universal press, have proclaimed the incomparable virtues of the "Oil Macassar," and of its accompanying preparations.—Evening Paper.

THE MINNESINGER'S SERENADE.

And when upon thy beauty gazing,
  I'll think there's nought on earth beside,
That's worth thy Minnesinger's praising,
  Thou'll be his only joy and pride;
My spirit shall not else rejoice
  Than in thy smile and in thy voice:—
Then, O my Light of Love, appear!
A look will gild each anxious tear

That from my longing eyes doth stream,
Here in the jealous star-light's beam:—
The dew-drop hangs upon the willow,
  The bird of night begins to wail,
The sun is deep beneath the billow,
  The moon is up in lustre pale;
Oh, come, sweet Mistress of the Night!
Oh, come and bless thy Minstrel Lover's sight!

NEW MUSIC.

That's my Marquesa, a Seguidilla, written and sung by Mr. C. Mathews; the music partly composed and adapted by T. German Reed. Reed and Sons, High-street, Islington.

A very pleasant melody, well harmonised. The different accents, however, on the words "Marquesa" and "Rosa," mar the rhymth, and make more nonsense of the words than they would have otherwise proved to be. We never heard of doves having blue eyes before Mr. Mathews informs us of the fact (?) in the second verse of this Seguidilla; and, moreover, we do not think that they are to be often found in Spain,

'Mongst the Moor-tinted maidens of that clime.

The following game played at Vienna between Napoleon and the Automaton Chess Player must be considered more as a curiosity than as an example of a well contested game. Judging from the specimen before us, the great general does not appear to have been very au fait at this mimic game of war. Contrary to the rule laid down by the proprietor of the Automaton, Napoleon, who played with the black pieces, insisted on having the first move.

The same postage is to be charged on letters transmitted between any part of the United Kingdom and the Colonies through Belgium. The charge is to be progressive for letters exceeding half an ounce. British newspapers may be sent from the United Kingdom to Belgium free. On newspapers published in Belgium, and sent thence direct to any part of the United Kingdom, the charge is to be 1d. each. There also is to be the following charges:—Printed prices-current, commercial lists, and courses of exchange published in the United Kingdom, and sent thence direct to Belgium, 1d. each; printed prices-current, commercial lists, and courses of exchange published in Belgium, and sent thence direct to any part of the United Kingdom, 1d. each.; British newspapers sent from the United Kingdom to her Majesty's colonies, or foreign countries, through Belgium, 2d. each.

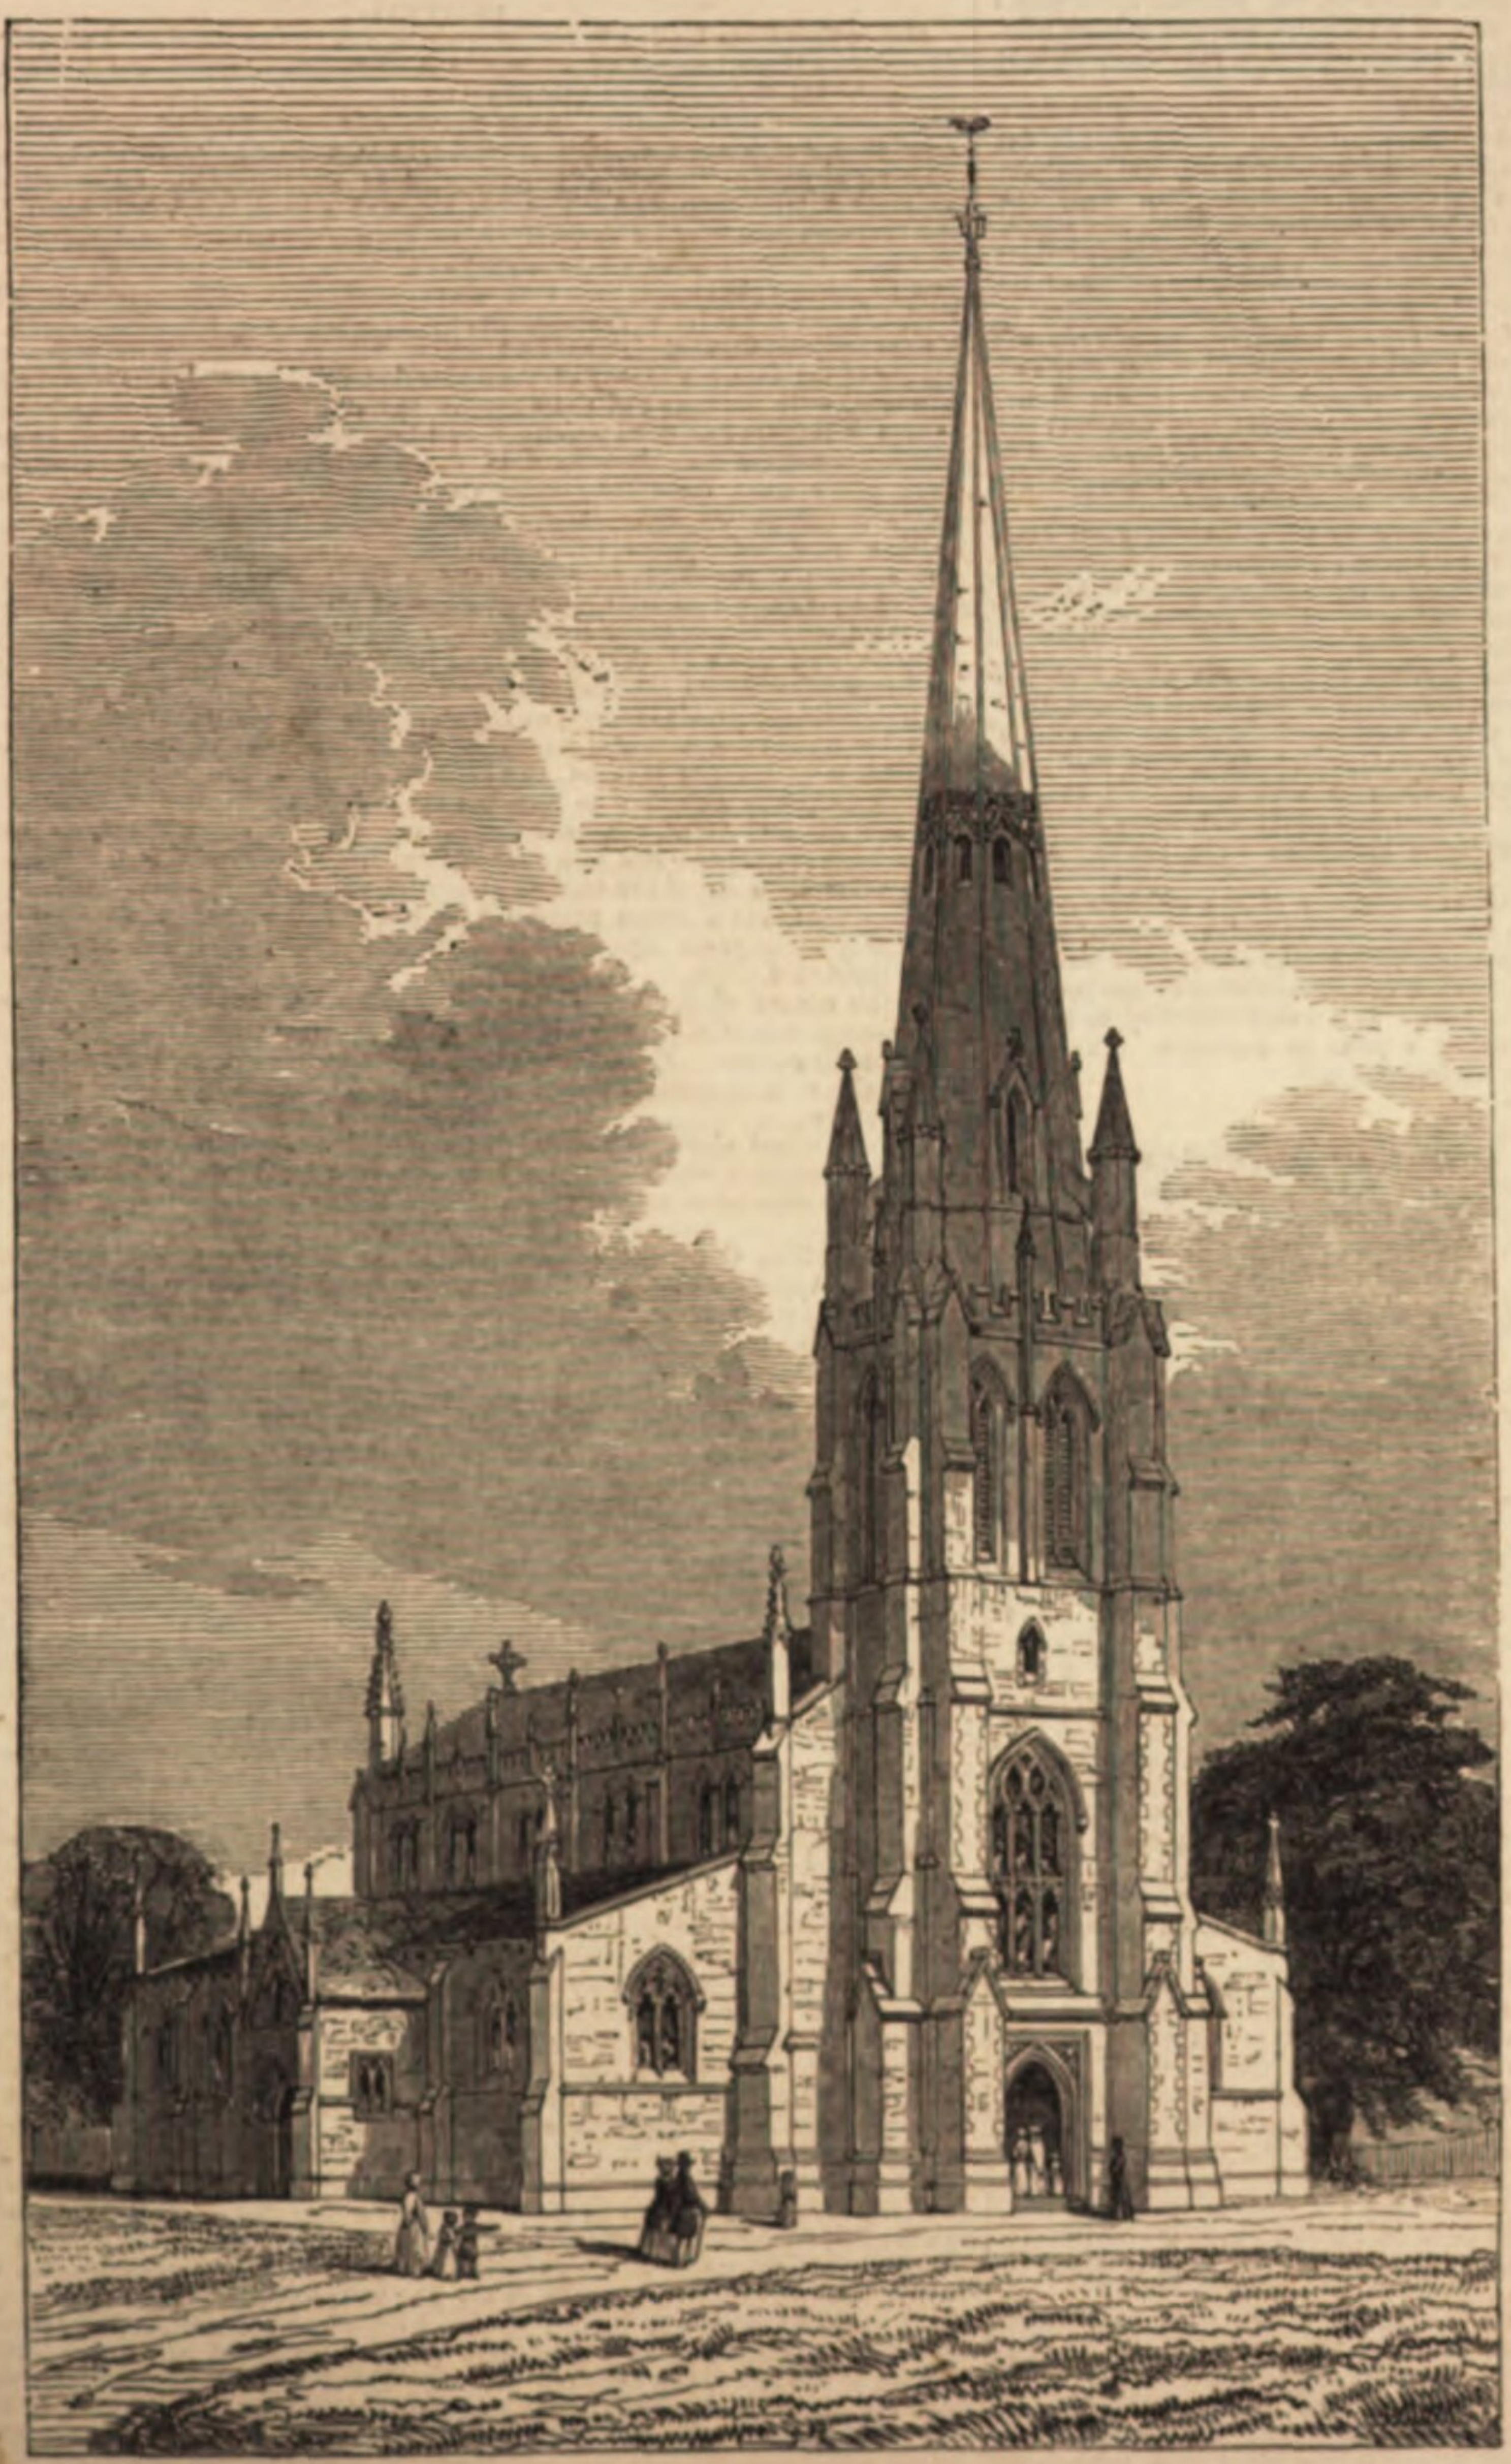
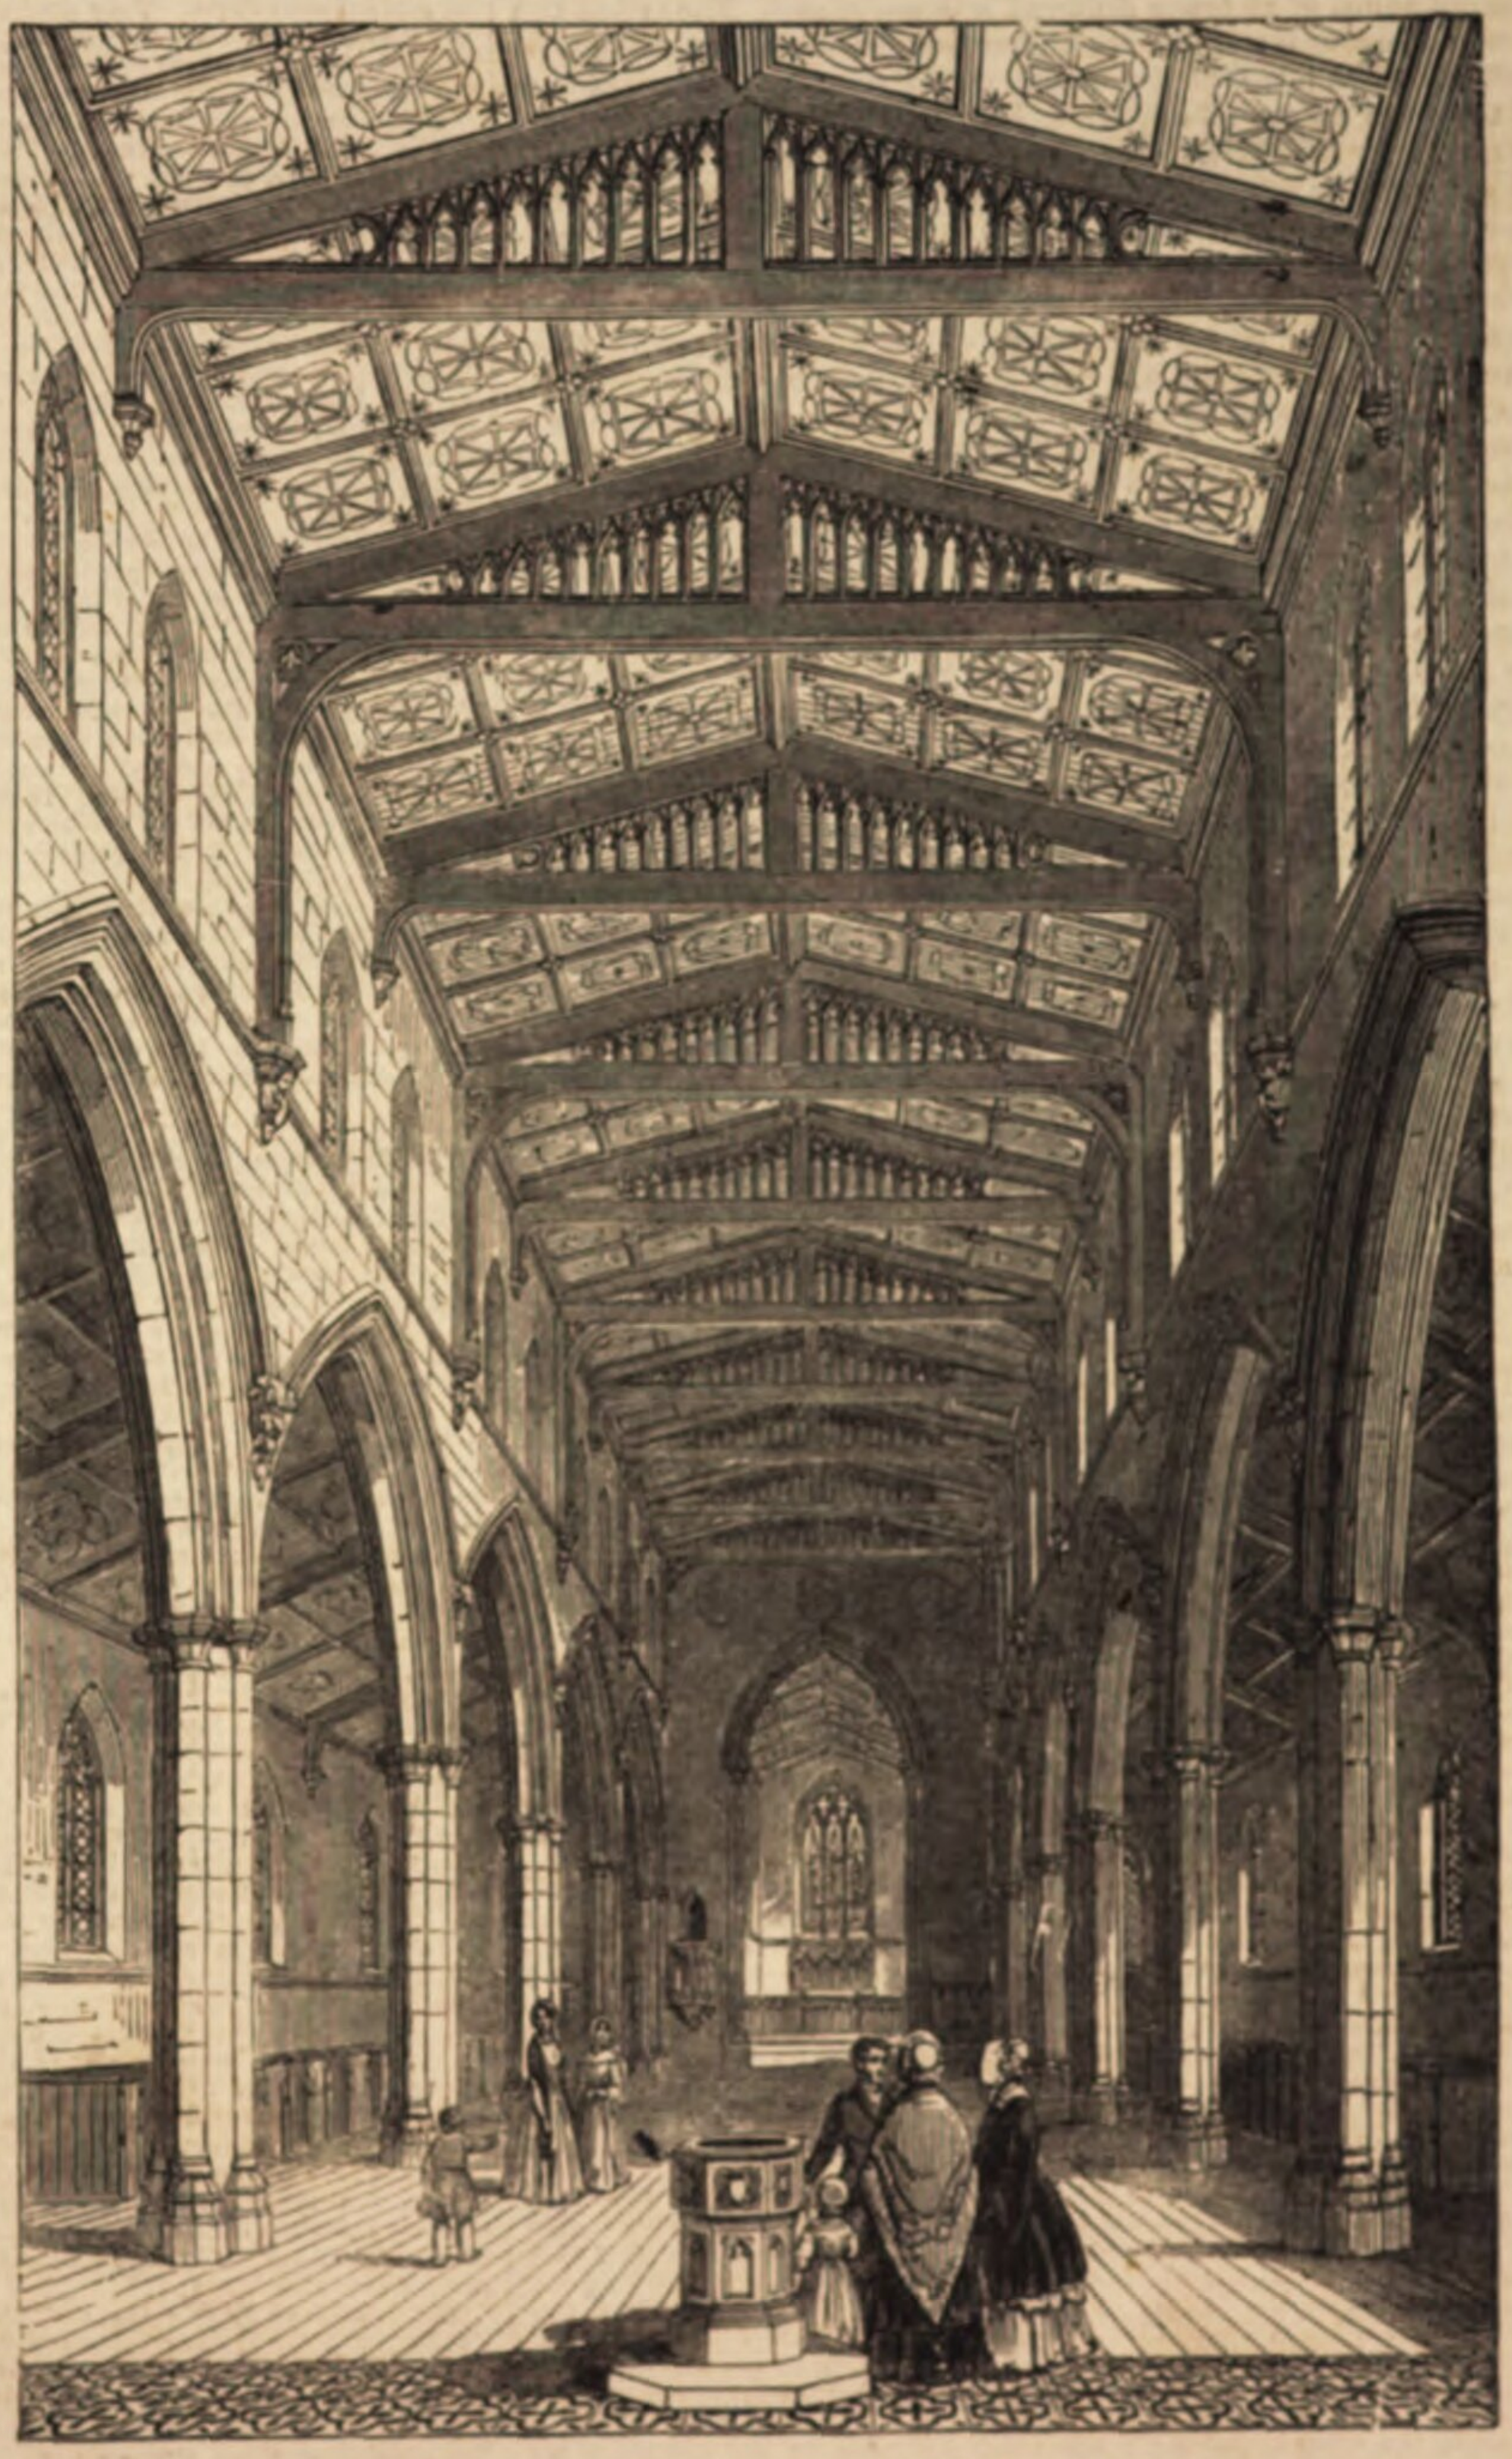
DIVISIONS IN THE CHURCH.

IN PROPORTION as the attacks on the Church from without have diminished in number and virulence, its divisions have multiplied within. A few years ago it had to encounter the agitation against tithes; that somewhat settled, or at least abated in virulence, by the Tithe Commutation Act, it had to meet the excitement of the church-rate question, which was at one time made one of the watchwords of party, and had, like all other questions, its champions and martyrs. That storm, too, has blown over; there was never, probably, for the last half century, a period at which the Church of England had so little to battle with in the shape of active enmity. But in another direction the prospect is less satisfactory. Within the Church, there is dissension, uncertainty, confusion; opinions are in the full career of conflict; practices co-exist that are widely different; and, unless some authority is brought to bear on the questions that agitate the hierarchy of the English Establishment, there is no slight danger, at no distant time, of a complete division.

The section of the Church—for we dislike the word party in connection with such a subject—that has received the designation of Puseyite, sprang from the endeavour of a few conscientious clergymen to awake within the Establishment a more lively attention to the duties that devolve upon it, and to oppose a bolder front to the advances of dissent. It was, in fact, a revival. Much piety, much learning, undoubted zeal, were brought to the task, and had these been wisely directed, the result would have been one of more unmingled good than that which has actually been effected. But the piety and learning that could not be denied them had been excited and nourished among the works of men of other ages, and had grown more familiar with the practices of the past than they were with the requirements of the present. They attached over-much importance to outward forms and practices, seeing in them that significance and force which questionless did once exist, but which had long departed; and, noting this, they fell into the error of believing, that to revive those forms and observances would revive the spirit also from which they sprang. They failed in what they intended, and succeeded to an extent they probably did not dream of, in what they perhaps never meant. The people were startled by the revival of things so long forgotten as to be quite obsolete, and alienated from the reformed Church by practices that had so strong a likeness to those of Rome. On the other hand, those who had let their minds dwell on these forms, as ministers of them, became captivated by their symbolism, and became equally estranged from the Reformed Establishment, but in another direction. They were attracted towards the Church of Rome, and many, as it is known, openly became members of that body. So difficult is it to say to the mind when launched on any course of inquiry, thus far shalt thou go and no farther. This is the danger of reviving usages more or less kindred to another faith, and from it has arisen all the difficulties that now beset the Establishment. And that revival has been accompanied by other manifestations which, to large numbers of reflecting persons, were more alarming. The publications of the Oxford school were an evident bridging over of the gulf, between the Anglican Church and that of Rome—a gulf which, as long as either Church remains what it really is, can never be closed, the difference being one of essence and principle, not of forms or observances. These, in whatever shape they have appeared, have had one tendency, visible in many of the "Tracts for the Times," in more than one sermon, and in all the "Lives of the



ST. MARY'S NEW CHURCH, HERNE HILL.



INTERIOR OF ST. MARY'S NEW CHURCH, HERNE HILL.

Saints," which, long ago abandoned as legends only, have been revived as authentic, and are now held up as examples. The general impression to be derived from them is, that the authors and compilers, or editors, regard the reformation as an evil, cast a "longing, lingering look" towards Rome, and believe it to be even now a kind of fountain of truth,—of that truth which it was the belief of the Reformers could only be found in the Scriptures. These views are supported by the effect of the practice, the importance they attach to forms, their insisting on the wearing of the surplice in preaching, the changing of the communion table to an altar, the lighting of tapers, the revival of the offertory, and many other points which, if not directly popish, have a papistical tendency.

The effect of all this is the reverse of what is, perhaps, intended There are many things in which the people now will not let the clergy think for them, and believing that much of what we have pointed out is vain and empty and not essential, they are shocked and estranged. Hence arise bickerings and differences between the pastor and the flock—between those who should be of one accord. The parishioners, startled at some innovation, remonstrate; they are answered that the rubric or the practice of the Church warrants it; but the rubric has in many points become a dead letter; whole generations of Bishops and Priests have passed away, knowing it is to be presumed what the usages of the Church were, and have not thought of reviving them; the plain, but reverend and impressive service of our Church, united as it is to its beautiful Liturgy, has been, as we are accustomed to it, from time immemorial.

The people, therefore, unsatisfied with the answer of the clergyman, appeal to the Bishop; and at this point the greatest anomaly and difficulty connected with the whole question begins to be visible. If all these usages were essential, and if the neglect of them was a culpable omission, who should have pointed out the error, and pressed for a stricter observance of them, but the Bishops, the Episcopi, the overseers of the Church? If they are not essential, why insist on them now to the creation of much bitterness and unseemly contention? The heads of the Church appear, with respect to this question, to have been the last to pay attention to it; while the inferior clergy went through the ritual according to the usual form, they were never blamed for neglect, nor told they were coming short of the duty incumbent on them. But when the innovations they introduce begin to excite remark, and the Bishops are appealed to decide, the latter seem to have no fixed rule or principle to guide them; the clergy were right while they accepted things as they were; when they change them—without Episcopal authority—they are right also. The difference between the Bishops themselves is little less remarkable than that between the clergy and the people. One Bishop gives his opinion on the point of candles and surplices, and turning to the East, in such a manner as to compromise the dispute on all of them—not settle it. Another decides at once, and absolutely, that the innovations are right; yet, as a priest, he himself for the greater part of his life must have discharged the duties of his ministry in ignorance, at least in non-observance, of the very practices he now insists on so strongly, that he would not scruple to sanction his clergy in wearing the Alb! Another dignitary of the Church may be found, who evidently thinks these things vain and empty, and nothing worth. Yet all these are members of one body, governed by one code of articles, one rule, one rubric, which cannot admit of so many different interpretations. The evil of this discrepancy in matters of the highest importance is beginning to be felt, and with it is seen the nature of the remedy. The Bishop of Exeter has addressed a letter to his clergy, on what he well describes as "the diversity of practice in the worship of Almighty God, which, in concurrence with other unhappy causes, has threatened to involve us in a state of painful, I had almost said perilous, disunion." He has called together the General Chapter of his Cathedral, and sought their advice in the matter, and the result is, that he advises the clergy of his diocese to refrain from further change till time has been given to collate what is the practice of the several deaneries, with the view of establishing a general uniformity. But one diocese is not a whole kingdom, and it is over the whole kingdom that the evil is spreading. Unless the Bishops are content to give full scope to what their Right Reverend Brother of Exeter describes as "the fatal consequences of change, introduced, as it has elsewhere been, by private individuals, whether from simple desire of novelty, or as part of a systematic attempt to bring back our Church nearer to the corrupt usages from which it was reformed," they must determine what the practice of the Church really is, and not leave it to the caprice of individuals who have lost in the study of the Folios of the Fathers, all recollection that there has been such an event as the Reformation. At the point at which we have arrived a convocation of the heads of the Church seems to be the only remedy. There is some doubt whether the Bishops can meet as a body; but, from the urgency of the case, they must at all hazards try if under our Constitution they have really less power than any other men engaged in one common object. The alternative is an endless series of disputes, with the necessity of Episcopal interference in every separate case, or allowing those who are infected with an overstrained admiration of the forms of the Romish ritual to introduce them little by little, till Churchmen are driven to become Separatists, or to take refuge in the arms of Dissent. The house that is divided against itself cannot stand.

ST. MARY'S NEW CHURCH, HERNE HILL, DULWICH.

This highly-embellished structure (from the designs of Messrs. Stevens and Alexander) has just been completed, and will very shortly be consecrated for divine service. Although it is not, as regards extent, comparable with some of the magnificent ecclesiastical edifices throughout the country, this new church, in ornamental beauty, may indeed be said to stand unrivalled. It occupies a commanding position on Herne Hill, near Dulwich and Camberwell; and its fine tower and spire are very effective, for a considerable distance. Throughout the whole structure, ancient architecture has been strictly adhered to. The style is that which is technically called the perpendicular Gothic, somewhat resembling that of the fifteenth century.

Through the liberality of the wealthy and respectable inhabitants of the neighbourhood, the architects have been enabled to complete the interior decorations on a truly superb scale. The whole of the windows have been filled with stained glass—almost the only example in modern church building. The eastern window has emblems of the four Evangelists; the north and south have the arms of the Archbishop, the Bishop, and the Vicars of Camberwell and Lambeth. The west window bears the arms of her Majesty, his Royal Highness Prince Albert, and her Majesty the Queen Dowager. The aisle windows presented by the subscribers are emblazoned most richly with their arms. The fittings are low seats of polished oak, constructed after the ancient method, in lieu of pews. The principal passages and the chancel are paved with encaustic tiles of various colours; and the steps to the chancel are of a most elaborate and beautiful design, in porcelain, on which the arms of those who have subscribed £100, or upwards, are emblazoned. The Lord's Prayer, Belief, and Commandments, are beautifully written in illuminated characters upon porcelain slabs; and the panels of the pulpit are filled with paintings of the Evangelists, St. Peter, St. Paul, &c. The whole of the tile and porcelain work is the gift of Mr. Garrett, of the firm of Copeland and Garrett, of Lincoln's-inn-fields.

The tile work is a very fine specimen of art, and is the first of the kind ever executed. The whole of the ceiling is divided into panels, by moulded beams and Gothic tracery. After the ancient manner, the beams are decorated with scriptural texts, in illuminated characters; and the panels of the ceiling are painted with elaborate designs of Gothic character. Notwithstanding this abundance of colour and decoration, the general effect is solemn and subdued, arising from the equal distribution of the rays of light from the stained glass; and although the appearance is at first apparently gloomy, everything is efficient for the solemn purposes of worship. A good effect has been produced by placing the organ in a recess in the north aisle; and still more by the absence of all galleries, so that the design of the interior is complete and unbroken. The pulpit is also situate in accordance with the ancient custom: its exterior is of stone' a portion being rough, and hammer-dressed.

The principal features of the exterior of the church are a lofty stone tower and spire. The general dimensions of the body are 80 feet long, by 50 feet wide; the total length is 120 feet. Accommodation is afforded for upwards of 700 persons. The total funds have been provided by private subscription, with the exception of a donation from the Church Commissioners. The original estimated cost was £4500, exclusive of all the ornamental work, stained glass, &c., for which sum the church has been built. The presents of ornamental work have been extremely numerous.

From the contiguity of the structure to the metropolis, it will, no doubt, be an object of curiosity for some time to come.

The Church has been entirely completed for the last three or four weeks, and the delay in the consecration, which the architects ascribe to a dispute respecting the endowment, has caused much disappointment. Several members of the nobility have expressed their intention of witnessing the ceremony.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

PARISIANA.

(From our own Correspondent.)

PARIS, Wednesday.

Much interest has been created by the performance of three new choruses for female voices, composed by Rossini, of which, the first two were written by him at the age of twenty. The execution of this new work of the great maestro took place at a musical soirée, given by one of the principal editeurs de musique, for this purpose. M. Henri Herz presided at the piano, and the audience consisted of some of the principal artists in Paris. What attracted most attention at this soirée after the morceaux themselves, were two portraits of the immortal composer—one a picture by Scheffer, the other, a bust by the sculptor, Bartolini; the latter taken when in the full vigour of youth, displaying him young, handsome, animated, and witty; the other, in later years, old, morose, and with that expression of care, which years and experience have given him.

Constant interchange of presents takes place betwixt Queen Victoria and Louis Philippe. A fête has just been given at the Royal Park of Raincy, to celebrate the arrival of some superb cows, and a Durham bull, as a present from your Queen.

You have doubtless heard of the Sclavonian prophet, Towiausky, whose mystical fancies and questionable auguries have involved him more than once with the tribunals of justice. Another of his doctrines has just been revealed by a professor of the French college, which deifies Napoleon, supposing him to preside, as a mysterious spirit, over the destinies of man. Towiausky has till now inhabited Switzerland, where he made a daily pilgrimage to the tomb of the great Kosciusko, and where he was surrounded by a crowd of disciples. He has now just left that country for Belgium, where he is followed by his absurd, but unhappy proselytes. He has some in Paris much wiser; they follow him, but in imagination alone. Our "France of 1830," who stirred up the Poles to revolt, alas! now only affords them in adversity barren sympathy.

The anniversary of the Polish Revolution has just been celebrated, by a ceremony at which Prince Czartoriska presided. The speech of the Prince on this occasion was a model of simple eloquence, and moved the auditors to tears.

A dinner was given on St. Hubert's Day, by all the most distinguished huntsmen in Paris, in honour of the patron of the chase. On this occasion the centre of the table was occupied by a stuffed stag, killed by the editor of the Journal des Chasses.

A fertile subject of pleasantry—of satire, but bereft of its sting—with the Parisians, is the amount of duty which, from the recently published reports of taxes, appears to be paid by M. Guizot in his own arrondissement which elects him deputy to the Chamber. No more than twenty-five centimes (twopence halfpenny) is his assessment! It must be remembered, however, that in other arrondissements he pays something more. However, to the eternal glory of M. Guizot, he is remarkably poor in spite of so many high offices he has held and so many opportunities of making a fortune like his political rivals—at the expense of the State. I have often seen him in his present palace in his most palmy hours. But even in the Senate, where in France he is unrivalled, I have never been so struck by the innate greatness of the man as in the little apartment he has occupied for years in the Rue Ville l'Eveque, when driven from power. The apartment is so small, there is scarce room to turn round in the area left by the piles of books and papers, and the court yard is in ruins; but you may see within the noblest work of God, an honest man, and the light of genius sheds its glory on all around.

Our popular writers evince an inclination to divide in two classes, and to place themselves in the ranks either of feuilleton novelists or of imitators of Boileau. They dart their satire in every direction, à tout propos, and very often on the most absurd and false grounds. Witness the late diatribe of the well-known poet, M. Barthelemy, against your country. This gentleman having received assistance from Government twelve years ago, on condition of never attacking it again, has just recommenced his periodical sarcasms, which are read with the avidity with which, unhappily for human nature, such publications are sure to be greeted everywhere. They give occasion, moreover, for general discussion: one answers his attacks, another accuses him of treachery, another praises him, another exalts him to the skies—in fact, he has done what is always acceptable to the Parisians—he has given them something to talk about.

Letters from Rome mention the death of one of the most eccentric celebrities of that city. A poor workman, by name Filippo Theodoli, of the Strada dei Bianchi, had for 20 years past amused the whole town by the cazzi and the drolleries of his wooden performers at the Teatro dei Baratini. He made his puppets the vehicle of jokes innumerable on all the personages, great and small, in Rome, and more than once had been sent to the Castle of St. Angelo to reflect on the impertinent liberties he had taken with the great names, by means of his wooden representatives—who were the worthy heirs or rivals of the statue of Pasquinore in the Piazza, on whose pedestal, for six centuries, have been inscribed the epigrams and satires against the Papal Governments of the wits and wags of Rome. The highest classes of society did not disdain to attend the performances at the Burratini, and a certain French prelate was amongst the most assiduous of the spectators. Theodoli received from the Impresario five francs for every five evenings, in which he engaged to amuse the company for three hours!

Paul Delaroche, who has acquired such celebrity by his picture of Lady Jane Grey, has just finished a portrait of the Pope; at the last sitting, his Holiness made him a very brief compliment, and, looking at the canvass, said, "Almeno dico qualche cosa."—("At least, I say something.") It is said that this portrait is intended for the Queen of the French.

You have heard how insurrection for four months laid low the glories of the Polytechnic. Our Parisian youths are much interested in the issue of a melancholy event which occurred a short time since—another effect of the disorderly spirit which reigns amongst the pupils of the great Polytechnic, that has produced so many men of science. In the idle hours that have ensued its closure by Government, one of the students killed another in a duel; and, being brought before the tribunal, and acquitted, he has been remanded upon the appeal of the Attorney-General.

A most amusing spectacle strikes you on crossing any of the toll-bridges in Paris. Crowds of passengers are seen at all hours waiting at the toll-gates for the receipt of the five centimes (one halfpenny), which they are obliged to pay, in order that they may obtain restitution, in case the termination of the lawsuit now pending should abolish the payment of tolls. It is a sort of lottery, in which they put a halfpenny for the chance of drawing a prize in damages. Anything for excitement, is the motto of our volatile Parisians.

FRANCE.

The Paris papers, as might have been expected, are exceedingly annoyed at the recent attacks of Mr. O'Connell upon the French, and against Louis Philippe, and even the Republican and most violent prints condemn him in unmeasured terms. The condition of Spain occupies much of the attention of the Parisian journalists, who condemn in an indignant and feeling strain the recent sanguinary conduct of the Spanish Government. Under the head of Spain will be found an account of the atrocious executions of the son of Zurbano and other persons, which have elicited the generous sympathies of our contemporaries.

The Journal des Debats contains an extract of a letter from Naples, dated Nov. 26, which gives an account of the celebration of the marriage of the Duke d'Aumale to the Princess of Salerno, which took place on the previous day, in the chapel of the palace, with great pomp. The Duke d'Aumale, accompanied by the French Ambassador, the Duke de Montebello, arrived at the palace about ten o'clock, and soon afterwards the civil contract was signed in the presence of the King and Queen of Naples, and other parts of the Royal family, the Prince de Joinville, &c The chapel where the marriage ceremony was celebrated was brilliantly illuminated. After the accustomed forms, the Duke d'Aumale and the Princess of Salerno approached the altar. The Grand Almoner having asked the Duke d'Aumale if he consented to take the Princess Marie Caroline-Augusta de Bourbon, Princess of the Two Sicilies, as his lawful wife, replied in French in the affirmative. The Grand Almoner put the question to the Princess if she would take for her lawful husband Prince Henri-Eugene-Philippe Louis d'Orleans, Duke d'Aumale, son of the King of the French, and the Princess leaned forwards towards their Majesties, then towards her august parents, as if to ask their consent. The King and the Prince of Salerno having made a sign of approval, the Princess replied in Italian voglio. The Archbishop then said a prayer, and when the ring had been placed on the finger of the bride, the Duke and Duchess d'Aumale returned to their places. There was a grand gala at the Theatre de San Carlo in the evening.

The Moniteur contains an ordinance, stating that, "in consequence of various mournfully celebrated trials which have taken place for some years past," a commission is appointed to examine into the question whether the selling of arsenic may not be entirely prohibited without detriment to medicine and trade. The commission is to consist of MM. Gay Lussac (President), Roard, Dumas, Payen, Orfila, Yvart, Bussy, de Roulz Lemire, Meilheurat, and Senac. The preamble to the ordinance adds, that the Academy of Medicine, the College of Pharmacy, the Council of Public Health, and the Commission of Arts and Manufactures have already been consulted as to the means of altering the colour and external character of arsenic in such a way as to render the use of it difficult for criminal purposes, without immediate detection on the part of those to whom it is to be administered.

The Gazette de France says:—"News was received a few days back from Tahiti, which the Ministry has not dared to publish. The restoration of Queen Pomare was therein announced, and it was stated that the event took place in the midst of disquieting demonstrations. As was to be expected, the French were in consternation, and the English missionaries exhibited an insulting joy. The despatches which contained the orders of our Government were taken out by an English vessel, and this circumstance, it is said, has augmented the humiliation and discouragement of our seamen. At the moment when this intelligence left the island, a great fermentation reigned there, and grave complications were apprehended."

SPAIN.

Our letters from Spain give the details of the barbarous execution of Zurbano's son and brother-in-law, Juan Martinez, and two servants, at Logrono, on the 25th ult. It appears that the most urgent appeals were made to the Government for clemency; but, so far from listening to them, General Oribe was dismissed from his command only for suspending the execution. The Madrid correspondent of the National gives the following affecting account of the circumstances. His letter is dated the 25th ult.:—

"The Government has just caused General Oribe to be deprived of his command of Logrono, for not having immediately shot Zurbano's brother in law and son, after having merely proved their identity. Oribe is not suspected of compassion, but he was on the spot; he saw what interest Zurbano's relations excited in that country, where the services rendered, in the name of Isabella, by all his family, were well remembered. Men of all ranks and all opinions had besought the execution to be deferred, and the prisoner's wife had proceeded without delay for Madrid, accompanied by a deputation from the town and province, who went with her to implore the Royal clemency. A most heart-rending scene took place on this occasion. At the moment when the two Queens were leaving the palace, the young wife of Benito Zurbano threw herself at their feet, and, with her eyes streaming with tears, and her voice broken with sobs, prayed and supplicated them at least to spare the life of a being so dear to her. The deputation joined in her request, and from the whole group arose expressions of the liveliest grief. All the persons who stood around appeared most deeply affected. The Queen Mother, it must be acknowledged, could not behold such a spectacle without feeling a strong emotion; but her daughter, the worthy daughter of Ferdinand, remained cold and unmoved as a statue. Neither the cries and despair of the poor woman at her feet, nor the supplication of the inhabitants of Logrono, nor the pity which for a moment affected her mother's soul, nor the emotion of the bystanders, could even cause a palpitation in this wretched creature's heart, who contented herself with drily replying to the unfortunate wife, 'The Council will decide on the request.' The Council accordingly assembled; and, to be present, Narvaez interrupted the pleasure which he was enjoying at Carabanchel with the illustrious Munoz. No delight in Narvaez's mind is equal to that of ordering an execution. He, therefore, hurried in, and after the Council orders were dispatched, at the same time, for the dismissal of Oribe and for the execution of Zurbano's son and brother-in-law! Again blood! Always blood! They will spill it until its fumes suffocate them! Oribe, besides, is not the only one deprived of his post."

Benito Zurbano was a young man, aged 28, esteemed in the army, in which he held the rank of major.

The following are the circumstances out of which the arrest of Benito Zurbano was made. General Ruiz, Colonel Gavila, and the Commandant Casanova, were arrested at the moment they were again crossing the frontier. They arrived at nine o'clock in the evening of the 24th ult. at Oleron, where they are detained. During the night of the 20th ult. Zurbano and the horsemen who accompanied him endeavoured to penetrate into the village of Mansanares. The inhabitants received them with a fire of musketry. It was in consequence of this affair that the insurgents abandoned their arms and horses, and the eldest son of Zurbano (Benito), his brother-in-law (Martinez), and two servants, were captured.

Of General Zurbano himself there is no certain intelligence.

The Madrid news is to the 27th ult. The Gazette publishes an account that the second son of Zurbano, with seven other individuals, had delivered himself up to a detachment of the troops sent in pursuit of him. The faction of Leche, in Upper Aragon, it says, has been obliged to disperse before the Queen's troops, and to take refuge in France.

In the sitting of the Chambers, articles 25 to 37 of the Reform Bill had been adopted.

It is stated that Narvaez was created a grandee of Spain, with the title of Duke of Ardoz, on the same evening that he gave the ball to her Majesty. The following anecdote is related on the subject:—It appears that, after several preparations had been made for the Queen's appearance at the festivity, a scruple of conscience suddenly struck the Marquesa de Santa Cruz, who informed her Majesty that it was a horrible violation of etiquette for the Queen of Spain to visit any subject under the rank of grandee, and she feared that such a shocking occurrence would be attended with the most frightful consequences. On hearing this interruption to her amusements, the Queen began to get into bad humour; and in a fretful manner told her camerista that she should have thought of telling her so before, and that rather than miss the opportunity of diverting herself, she would create Narvaez a grandee of Spain on the spot. The Marquesa wished for nothing better; the matter was soon got over, and before the Queen stepped into her carriage, the "Hero of Torrejon" was a grandee of the first class and Duke of Ardos! The affair had previously been arranged between Narvaez and the Marchioness.

The court-martial appointed to try General Araoz, at Cadiz, for participation in the late conspiracy, having found him guilty, orders were sent from Madrid on the 24th to execute the sentence.

PORTUGAL.

Our letters from Lisbon to the 27th ult speak of the continued success of the Ministry. The Chamber of Peers, by a majority of eight, has passed the bill declaring all the edicts of the Government, twenty-nine in number, promulgated during the prorogation of the Cortes, and consequently without the sanction of the Legislature—laws in force from the date of their promulgation. The twenty-nine "laws" were presented to the Chamber en masse, and all separate examination and discussion opposed successfully by Cabral. Thus the Ministry may now be considered as having triumphed over all opposition and as perfectly secure for some time to come.

A frightful calamity by fire took place in Lisbon on the 21st ult., attended with the loss of twelve or fourteen lives. The fire broke out in the lower part of a house in the Rua Madalena, and spread with such rapidity as to prevent the escape of the families of any of the upper floors by the stairs. The inhabitants, however, were informed of their danger in sufficient time to have effected their escape, if ladders had been procured, and two were standing in the public square in the immediate neighbourhood of the fire, where some government works were going on. Repeated applications were urgently made to the officer on guard in the square, for permission to take away these ladders, and these applications were barbarously refused. The unfortunate inmates of the burning house were at the windows of the rooms in front of the house, shrieking and calling in vain for assistance for upwards of an hour. At length ladders were procured, and two or three persons were saved by the intrepidity of a French resident, and some of the officers and crew of a French vessel of war that is stationed here, whose conduct is deserving of the highest praise, as was that of an Englishman, who rendered essential service on this occasion. The ladders were too short to communicate with the windows of the third floor, but from one of them a young girl jumped to a ladder, and was caught in the arms of a Frenchman, who contrived to keep his footing on the ladder while he held her, and her life was saved. Another woman made the some desperate attempt, but missed the ladder, and was dashed to pieces on the pavement. Some others flung themselves out of the windows and met with a similar fate. It is a strange circumstance that a house adjoining the one recently burned, was destroyed by fire thirty about years ago, when the loss of life was nearly equal to that which lately occurred.

In the course of the same day, Mr. George Vanzeller, a highly respectable merchant of this city, either shot himself or was killed by the accidental discharge of his fowling-piece. No person having been present at the moment the report was heard, it is impossible to say whether he fell by his own hand intentionally or otherwise.

The municipal elections throughout Portugal have been carried in favour of the Government, a result by no means surprising, when it is stated that even soldiers are allowed to vote at them.

TURKEY.

Accounts from Constantinople, of the 17th ult., announce several diplomatic changes. Among others, the displacement of Fethi Ahmed Pacha, the Sultan's brother-in-law, from the high and responsible post of President of the Supreme Council, which office is now filled by Suleyman Pacha, late Lieutenant-General of Riza Pacha, and President of the Military Board at Scutari. The celebrated Tahir Pacha has been appointed Governor of Adrianople, for which he will set out in the course of a few days. Some persons imagine that the object of the Ministry, in thus naming him, is to remove him to a distance from the capital, where he was suspected of maturing secret plans for the ultimate overthrow of the present Ministry. It will be recollected that before Reshid Pacha was appointed to Paris, he was named to Adrianople, and refused to go, even at the risk of being exiled for disobedience to the orders of the Sultan. The late governor of that city, Osman Pacha, has been appointed Governor-General of Bosnia. The Ambassador in London, his Excellency Aali Efendi, is recalled to to Constantinople, and the well known Sarim Efendi appointed in his place.

THE OVERLAND MAIL.

INDIA AND CHINA.

The usual monthly Overland Mail has arrived with dates from Bombay of the 1st November, Calcutta of October 17th, and China of August 30.

The intelligence from India is comprised in the following summary. A revolt had broken out at Kholapore, in the Mahratta country, which rendered it necessary for the British forces to interfere, and the consequence has been the storming and capture of a strong fortress called Samunghur, which took place on the 14th of October last. The circumstances of the case are these:—

The Rajah of Kholapore being a minor, his government had been administered by agents, whose despotic and oppressive conduct appears to have provoked a revolt; and the Rajah having been permitted by treaties to maintain 1000 men, they were sent into the provinces to put down the insurrection. The insurgents, however, soon routed them, and then retired within the mountain fortresses in the neighbourhood. The British troops, bound by treaty to assist the Rajah in coercing his refractory subjects, marched, under Major-General Delamotte, against one of these forts, Samunghur, which they took by storm, after a sharp conflict, putting many of the garrison, who continued their resistance, to the sword. The enemy endeavoured in the first instance to escape, but were effectually intercepted by the British cavalry. Between five and six hundred of the enemy were killed, and as many more wounded or taken prisoners. After the capture of the place, five hundred infantry, under Colonel Outram, the present political agent for the Southern Mahratta country, were despatched to Kholapore, whither in a few days the main body of the army, under General Delamotte, would proceed.

It was understood that the Rajah and Colonel Outram were about to visit the disturbed districts, and endeavour to bring about the surrender of the forts and restore the general tranquillity. The British forces were to be divided into two brigades, one from Bombay, and the other from Madras, until a larger subsidiary force should be formed. Much blame had been attached to Mr. Reeve, the late political agent, to whose rashness the outbreak is alleged to have been in a great measure owing, and who had been superseded by Colonel Outram.

The storming of the fort of Samunghur, and the defeat of the body of insurgents that came to its relief, had in part lowered their courage, yet their demands were still as forcible as ever. They had lost about 500 men at Samunghur and near it; yet their resolution to defend their properties and their rights seems to be unshaken. The Madras and Bombay Governments were exerting their utmost influence to put an end to those commotions.

The latest news from Kolapore was, that all hopes of a pacification by negotiation are at an end.

Her Majesty's 22d Regiment marched from Sattara for the disturbed districts, where there will be soon 13,000 men assembled.

Scinde, it appears, is now perfectly tranquil. Sir Charles Napier had adopted the plan of marching the troops away from the rivers' banks during the time when the exhalations from the mud while drying rendered their residence there exceedingly dangerous. Sickness prevailed to any remarkable extent in only four regiments, one of which, her Majesty's 13th, was at Kurrachee, having marched from Sukkur, and two were at Shikarpore, viz., the 2d Light Cavalry and the 69th Bengal Infantry; and the fourth, the 64th Regiment of Bengal Infantry, was at Sukhur. The amount of sickness in those four corps was above 1100, being about half of all the cases in the whole of the Scinde army. The other 18 corps, and especially the Bombay regiments, were very healthy.

There is no news of the slightest political importance from either Calcutta or Madras. Sir Henry Hardinge continues with his council at Calcutta, studying the duties of his office. He had already directed his attention to some local improvements, and to the establishment of a better system of education among the natives.

CHINA.

There is nothing important from China. The French Ambassador arrived at Macao on the 15th August. The American Ambassador had negociated a treaty similar to the one entered into by the British authorities, but with additional explanatory clauses. The latter was about to return to the United States.

A British expedition had been sent from Singapore, to root out the piratical tribes on the north west coast of Borneo. It was composed of her Majesty's ship Dido, Captain Keppell, and the East India Company's steamer Phlegethon. The expedition proceeded in the first instance up the river Sukarran. The boats were at first repulsed, but having been reinforced, the seamen and marines landed, destroyed the fortifications, and took sixty guns. Mr. Wade, first lieutenant of the Dido, Mr. Steward, and several men, were killed in the affair. The capital of the King of Kole, by whom the Honourable F. Murray was murdered, had been destroyed. The ship Ceylon, D. Legusen master, from London to Bombay, was lost, on the 1st of October, on the northernmost reef of the Laccadives, marked in all the charts eighteen miles too forward. The ship Brilliant, from Calcutta to Bombay, was lost, on the 16th October, on the point of the Sauger Sands. The crews of both vessels were saved.

COMMERCIAL NEWS.

India.—The Calcutta Money Market, on the 17th ult., was easy. Capital for all purposes was abundant, and transactions of safe character were met by advances and accommodation on the same favourable terms hitherto obtainable in the market: the amount of unemployed capital consequent on the still unfavourable disposition of the remittance exchange was considerable, which induced investment in the public funds and other securities, the valuations of which were forced up almost beyond precedent.

From Bombay, Nov. 1, it is stated that "the harvest, we believe, will be equal to the average of former years, but so long as the crops continue on the ground our market will continue dull." The trade in cotton and piece goods was dull. In twist and yarn some improvement had been manifested.

China.—Our intelligence comes down to the 30th of August. At Canton, several heavy purchases of silk had been made. The teas which had been brought to market were all bought up at prices varying from 39 to 43 taels. The following are the prices at which purchases have been made:—Congou old, 12 dollars to 16 dollars; new ditto, 39 dollars to 43 dollars; Caper new, 19 dollars to 27 dollars; souchong old, 15 dollars to 20 dollars; souchong new, 30 to 50 dollars; orange pekoe new, 27 to 34 dollars; orange, fine scented, 30 to 70 dollars; twankay, 14 to 24 dollars; young hyson, 50 to 56 dollars; hyson skin, 15 to 32 dollars; gunpowder, 43 to 70 dollars; imperial, 40 to 67. The market was dull for all descriptions of cotton. All the Hong Kong merchants were summoned into the city of Canton on August the 12th, when the authorities demanded a further payment of 5,000,000 of dollars as their portion of the Canton ransom money. The Hongs refuse to pay, and the general impression is that they will be imprisoned. Meanwhile Howqua, Sanqua, and some of the more wealthy of the Hongs, have left their Hongs.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

Deeds of Gifts and Wills.—In the Court of Queen's Bench on Monday, a case was tried—Alexander Beresford Hope v. Harmer and others, Executors of Henry Philip Hope—which involved an important question as to the revocation of a will by a deed of gift. It was an action of trover brought by the third son of Lady Beresford against the executors of his uncle, to recover a cabinet of diamonds and other precious stones, estimated to be worth £50,000, and which the plaintiff claimed under a deed of gift executed by the deceased in favour of the plaintiff, in April, 1838. It appeared that the deceased, Mr. Henry Philip Hope, who was the brother of the late Mr. Thomas Hope, of Duchess-street, was, like all the other members of the family, a person of large wealth, of which he expended a considerable portion in gratifying his inclination for articles of taste and vertu. He had a most valuable and peculiar collection of Dutch pictures, another of bronzes, one of China, and a collection of diamonds and other jewels, worth about £40,000, which were the subject of the present action. He had three nephews, sons of Mr. Thomas Hope and of the present Lady Beresford, with all of whom he lived upon affectionate terms, and who were all the objects of his bounty, and to whom he made considerable bequests by his will. To the eldest, Mr. Henry Thomas Hope, he gave his collection of pictures; to the second, Mr. Adrian Hope, he gave the bronzes and china; and to the third, who was the present plaintiff, he gave the collection of precious stones which were the subject of the present action. The manner in which he conveyed the jewels to the plaintiff was, however, different from that in which he transferred the other legacies to the other brothers. In 1838, he executed a deed of gift, in consideration of natural love and affection, to Mr. Alexander Beresford Hope, whereby he conveyed to him absolutely and irrevocably the jewels in question, which he described in the deed as being contained in a casket of certain dimensions. The description of the casket being, however, inaccurate in this respect, was amended by the donor, who wrote the true dimensions over the original words and authenticated the alterations in the margin. The object of conveying the diamonds by deed was to evade the payment of the legacy duty, which would attach upon a bequest by will, but neither the diamonds nor the deed were delivered to the donee, who, according to the evidence, appeared not to be aware of his uncle's intention until he received the deed of gift in a sealed envelope from Lady Beresford upon the death of Mr. Henry Philip Hope, in 1839. By his will, of which the defendants were executors, he left the residue of his property to his three nephews, and the question at present for consideration was, whether the deed of 1838 operated under the circumstances in such a manner as to vest the whole of the collection of diamonds in Mr. Alexander Hope as a gift, or whether, supposing such deed to be ineffectual for that purpose, the diamonds became part of the residue, and so were divisible equally between the three nephews of the deceased. It was stated that one of the diamonds cost the deceased £14,600! Among the witnesses called for the plaintiff, was Mr. Hertz, of whom Mr. Philip Hope had purchased a great portion of the gems contained in the cabinet. He deposed to the state of the cabinet in 1832, 1838, and subsequently. He had seen Mr. H. P. Hope deposit the vellum writing in the drawer of the cabinet, and had been frequently informed by Mr. H. P. Hope that he had given the cabinet to Mr. Alexander Beresford Hope. On his cross-examination by Sir Thomas Wilde it was elicited that, between 1832 and 1838, a great many jewels, which had formed part of the collection, had been sold or exchanged. He also admitted that a sapphire had been purchased for the collection.—Viscountess Beresford stated that the plaintiff was her son; that her eldest son, Mr. H. T. Hope, had inherited the bulk of the property of her late husband, Mr. Thomas Hope; that the property of her late husband's brother, Mr. Adrian Hope, who died in Holland, had been divided into two parts, one part of which had been inherited by Mr. H. P. Hope (who had a great aversion to the legacy duty), and the other part had been divided equally between her sons, Henry Thomas, Adrian, and Alexander Beresford; that Mr. H. P. Hope had left his pictures to Mr. H. T. Hope, and his china and bronzes to Mr. Adrian Hope, and that Mr. H. P. Hope had asked her, in 1828, if she thought that Mr. Alexander Beresford Hope would preserve his collection of gems intact if he left them to him, to which she replied in the affirmative; that in April, 1838, Mr. H. P. Hope gave her ladyship a sealed parcel, to be delivered to Mr. A. B. Hope, after his (Mr. H. P. Hope's) death. That parcel, by the evidence of Gibbs, the footman, and of Banks, the butler in the Beresford family, was traced into the possession of Mr. Alexander Beresford Hope, and by the evidence of Viscountess Beresford, was proved to have contained a deed of gift, dated April, 1838, of the gems in question, to Mr. Alexander Beresford Hope.—The deed was then put in and read, as was the probate of the will of Mr. H. P. Hope. The case for the plaintiff having closed, Sir T. Wilde, for the executors, contended that it was evident the deed was not intended to operate immediately, for Mr. H. P. Hope was very fond of the jewels, and therefore was not likely to have given his nephew the power of ousting him of possession during his lifetime. No one knew of the deed; not even Lady Beresford or Mr. Alexander Hope, as long as Mr. H. P. Hope lived. Mr. H. P. Hope was averse to the payment of the legacy duty, and there could be no doubt but that he intended this deed to operate as a will. In fact, it was a will and not a deed, for he had never parted with his power over the deed, or over the property, until his death. The deed, therefore, was not a perfect deed, and the party could take nothing under it. He asked the jury, did Mr. Henry Philip Hope intend that his nephew should have the power of depriving him of possession of the jewels the day after he had executed it, for if he did not, the deed was void? He submitted that the so-called deed was not a deed at all; that there was nothing to show that it was intended to operate as a deed. There was, besides, an alteration made in the body of the deed in describing the cabinet, which was sufficient to vitiate it. The cabinet described in the deed was a former old cabinet; that description had been erased, and a description of the dimensions of the present cabinet inserted in pencil. That erasure being unaccounted for, vitiated the deed entirely. The property, therefore, remained undisposed of, and passed by his will.—Lord Denman, in summing up, told the jury that the question was, whether the delivery under the deed of gift had been so complete as to vest the property in the plaintiff. If it were not, then the plaintiff could not claim the property. If the deed were properly executed, so that the person witnessing the deed, or any other person knew of its contents, although the donor might not, that would be a good delivery. They would therefore consider whether he intended, at the time of executing the deed, to part with the property to Mr. A. B. Hope; if he did, the execution was a good one. There was, however, a difficulty upon the face of the deed itself. The description of the cabinet was most important. If the original description, that of the old cabinet, had stood, great doubts might arise as to whether anything was given at all, but that description had been altered; the question was, had or had not those alterations taken place before the execution of the deed. If they had been made before execution the deed was valid; if not, the deed was invalid. The question for their decision was, did Mr. H. P. Hope intend to part with the property to Mr. Alexander Beresford Hope, when he executed the deed. With regard to the clause reserving to Mr. H. P. Hope an almost unlimited power over the property during his life, it was a questian of law for consideration afterwards what might be the effect of that clause, rather than a question for the consideration of the jury.—The jury, after a short consultation, returned a verdict for the plaintiff—damages, £40,000.

The Romford Bank of Johnson, Johnson, and Mann.—Mr. Mann appeared at the Bankruptcy Court on Monday, for the purpose of passing his final examination, and was examined at considerable length as to the amount of the capital (stated in the balance-sheet to be £17,000), which he actually had in the business of the firm, when it appeared that the property at Aldgate would realise £10,000, and leave a surplus of about £12,000 in aid of the respective estates. Mr. Commissioner Goulburn considered the bankrupt's balance-sheet to be perfectly satisfactory, as well as his explanations, and passed his final examination. His Honour also directed the applications for the certificates to stand for the 4th Jan. next. The declaration of a dividend was advertised for the same day, but none took place, as considerable difficulty has arisen in ascertaining to which estate the surplus really belongs, and under such circumstances the payment of the dividend has been deferred to afford time for further inquiry.

Extraordinary Bill Transactions.—The Case of James Gibbs.—This extraordinary case was again heard in the above court on Wednesday, before Mr. Commissioner Holroyd. The present proceedings arose out of an order by the Chief Judge of the Court of Review, that the matter should be referred back to the Court of Bankruptcy for re-examination by the Hon. Commissioner. Mr. Edwin James, for the assignees, having briefly recapitulated the leading facts which led to the adjournment of the bankrupt's examination, with fixing a day for his passing, and having read the order from the Court of Review, added that it would that day be the duty of the assignees to examine fully into the correctness of the bankrupt's accounts. He had, indeed, filed a sheet which was particularly intricate, and, as he (Mr. James) was instructed, anything but satisfactory. The transactions therein stated extended over a period ranging from 1823 to 1843, the date of the fiat. The debts amounted to some £121,000, the liabilities to £80,000 more, making in all about £200,000. But there were some of the transactions so singularly striking, so very extraordinary, that, on first sight, they might be deemed altogether improbable. The bankrupt had been what is termed a scrivener; he raised money for parties upon annuities or otherwise; his transactions had been of a most extended character, and yet all the books produced by him to that court, were only two in number—a cash book and a ledger. The ledger, however, was itself no voucher, but a mere echo of the cash book. Was the bare fact not a startling one, that a man supposed to carry on cash operations to an amount above a million of money, could do so with only one cash-book? He asked if it were possible to do so? That cash-book was also grossly inaccurate in its details, and dated only from 1835, for some book which had existed before that period, had been destroyed. They were not told why, but he (Mr. James) could, perhaps, assign a reason. At that time a bill had been filed against the bankrupt by Lord Glammis, and when called upon to produce the book, it was discovered that it had been destroyed. That was certainly a remarkable coincidence, if nothing more. The bankrupt's profits appeared to have been about £5000 a-year, and yet when he came to that court there was one sum of £90,000 charged for discounts and commission. They had not had one voucher for even £5 of that amount. Not one voucher from the man who had £5000 a year, and who yet charged £90,000 in his sheet for discount and commission. It was preposterous. But that sum of £90,000, large as it was, had to be increased by £15,000, which he had charged against another, when he himself, and he only, was personally liable for it. The learned counsel then entered into a detail of the bankrupt's transactions with Lord Kensington—transactions running over a term of years, and involving accounts upon bills and annuities—the considerable sums realised, with scarcely an exception, having been appropriated by the bankrupt to his own purposes. The discount, then, upon the amount so appropriated by the bankrupt being £15,000, would, if added to the £90,000 unaccounted for, make £105,000. There were other transactions of a similar kind with Major-General Wyndham. The bankrupt, on the 11th November, 1842, a time when he was notoriously embarrassed, had written a letter to that gentleman, stating that he had an excellent opportunity of investing money to considerable advantage, and he persuaded General Wyndham to entrust him with bills to the amount of £18,000. These he discounted for his own use at 40 or 50 per cent., and he had now got, of course, to account for the money. He also got General Wyndham to advance him £10,000, in two notes of £5000 each, under pretence of lending them to a man named Youde, at a large rate of interest; but that amount also he retained in his own hand. Such was but a specimen of the manner in which his business was transacted. His transactions in bills were very large indeed, but though he had a book of bills payable, he had exhibited none of bills receivable. That there had been such a book was perfectly clear, for it would have been impossible to carry on such a business without it. The profits accruing from bills of costs amounted in one year to £23,000, yet the drafts of those bills had been also destroyed.—Mr. W. C. Wright, accountant for the assignees, was called, and verified the statements advanced by the learned counsel.—The bankrupt was then placed in the witness-box, and examined by Mr. James: He had no vouchers for any part of the £90,000. He never had a book of bills receivable. The date of bills due could be ascertained by the cash-book. The dates in that book were not always correct, but he could not explain why they should not be so. In some cases "lumping sums" were set down to certain accounts, which might balance them exactly. He did not put them down, nor did he intend that they should be so balanced. His intention was to pay General Wyndham's bills when they became due. He had not done so. They were all dishonoured.—After some further examination the matter was adjourned for six weeks, in order that the bankrupt might furnish vouchers, where that could be done, or give the names of the parties to whom the amounts had been given, and the dates at which those payments were made.

In re the Rev. Dr. Kenny.—The insolvent is the rector of St. Olave's, Southwark, and this day came up upon application for his interim order. His schedule states debts and liabilities (the latter chiefly upon accommodation bills) at from £7000 to £10,000. The reverend doctor's living was set down at about £650 a year, of which he proposed to set aside £350 a year for the benefit of his creditors. The insolvent regretted much his present position, and was willing to give every information in his power. After some further discussion, the further hearing was adjourned to the 24th, the insolvent in the interim to furnish the required information.

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.

Manslaughter by the Captain of one of the Waterman Steamers.—A young man, named Samuel Simms, was indicted for having, while in command of the Waterman steamer No. 6, improperly run down a small boat, rowed by Edward Everett, a licensed waterman, and containing four passengers, by which the said Edward Everett and another person were drowned. The circumstances were mentioned in our paper at the time. The jury found the prisoner guilty, but recommended him to mercy. The Common Sergeant sentenced him to four months' imprisonment.

Mr. Henry Brenton, an apothecary, at Lambeth, who, it will be recollected, was committed for the alleged manslaughter of his wife, has been tried and acquitted.

A Daring Swindler.—Thomas Field, alias John Eaglesfield, alias William West, aged 65, described as an "agent," was indicted for unlawfully obtaining, by false pretences, 5s. 6d. of Edward Hammond, a similar sum from William Wall, and 2s. 6d. from William Harding. The three charges were included in one indictment, containing three counts. Mr. O'Brien appeared for the prosecution. It appeared that the prisoner, under the name of West, was convicted at the June session, 1843, of this court, of defrauding several poor persons, by pretending that there were fortunes lying in the Court of Chancery belonging to them unclaimed, which he undertook to recover on being furnished with means to take the necessary steps. He was sentenced to only one year's impsisonment. The moment he was at large he commenced his old trade, and between June and October, in the present year, he had defrauded above fifty poor creatures, whose disappointed hopes, after having been excited by his fictions, produced a far greater amount of suffering than the loss of the few shillings, severe as it was to them, imposed. His mode of proceeding was in all cases precisely the same. He introduced himself as the agent of Mr. William West, 55, New-cut, Lambeth (one of his own nommes de guerre), an attorney, whose business was to discover heirs-at-law and next of kin, and to do every thing else kind and charitable to the needy and afflicted. There was a large sum of money, a freehold property, and securities in the funds, varying in amount according to his humour from £400 to £900, left by a distant and forgotten relation of his dupe and from ten to sixty years in Chancery. A petition should be filed, which would cost only 5s. 6d.; and if, as in many instances was the case, the dupe had not the means of raising even a crown, the prisoner took half a crown or 2s., or whatever else he could squeeze out of their sanguine hope and desire to be relieved from pinching poverty. Accordingly, as they appeared to be utterly destitute or still squeezable, he dropped the case or tried it on again, giving up only when no more could by possibility be had.—The jury returned a verdict of Guilty upon each count of the indictment.—The prisoner, who was said to have been formerly an attorney, displayed the most surprising impudence. Although perfectly aware of his being thoroughly known, he kept up his air of plausibility, and cross-examined the witnesses with an affectation of good faith and candour that would have been quite amusing, had not his proceedings brought so much misery to his victims.—The Common-Sergeant, in passing sentence, asked him how he happened to have grown eleven years older during his one year in prison? He was only 54 at his former trial in 1843, and he now called himself 65.—The prisoner made no reply.—The Common-Sergeant sentenced him to transportation for seven years. The court has adjourned till next sessions.

POLICE.

The Late Forged Transfer at the Bank of England.—Wednesday was fixed for the re-examination of William Burgess, charged with uttering two forged transfers for £8000, which stood in the books of the Bank of England in the name of Mr. William Oxenford. Precisely at twelve o'clock, the Lord Mayor took his seat, and immediately afterwards the room was crowded to excess. William Burgess was shortly afterwards placed at the bar, in the custody of John Forester. He was dressed in a suit of black, over which he wore a dark brown taglioni. He was in excellent spirits, and, being very lame, he was accommodated with a chair as on the last occasion. He is a tall young man, about 26 years of age, with light sandy hair and no whiskers.—The Lord Mayor (to Burgess): Have you any professional adviser?—Yes, my Lord.—Mr J. C. Salomon, solicitor, said he appeared for the prisoner.—Mr. Ware, from the office of Messrs. Freshfield and Co., the Bank solicitors, attended to prosecute.—Mr. Salomon (having consulted with the prisoner) said he was instructed to ask for a remand.—The Lord Mayor: On what ground?—Mr. Salomon said for the purpose of obtaining evidence in his behalf, and on that ground he thought there would be no objection to a remand on the part of the solicitors for the Bank.—Mr. Ware said he had a number of witnesses present. Unfortunately, one witness, whose evidence was very important, was attending a trial at Westminster, on subpœna, and it was possible that he might not be able to give his evidence today. As there were so many witnesses present, perhaps it would be the best plan to take their evidence, as it would save them much inconvenience. Mr. Salomon was quite in favour of this course. Mr. Oxenford was then called. He said he was an official agent in the Long-room, Custom-house. Prior to the 3d of September last he was possessed of the sum of £9800 in the Three per Cent. Consolidated Annuities. (The book containing the entry of the fraudulent withdrawal of £8200 was then shown to him). Examination continued: The transaction recorded in the book is not in my handwriting; neither are the two signatures, "William Oxenford." I never gave any authority to William Burgess, or to any other person, to withdraw the sum of £8200 out of the £9800, which stood in my name in the Bank books.—Mr. Thomas Ingall, a clerk in the Bank of England, was next examined—On Tuesday, the 3rd of September last, the prisoner came to the counter and said to me, "Please to witness this transaction." The person who was with him purported to be the owner of the stock; his real name, I believe, was Joseph Elder. The prisoner wrote his name, and the person who was with him signed the name of "William Oxenford."—Mr. Salomon: Is it usual for Bank clerks to identify persons transferring stock? Witness: It has been the practice for a considerable time.—Mr. Salomon: It is a very improper practice.—The witness said the system had been discontinued since the fraudulent transfer.—Mr. Tokely, a stock-broker, examined: I have known the prisoner about twelve months, from his being a clerk in the office in the Bank in which I was in the habit of transacting business. In the latter part of August he came to me and stated that a friend of his, who had £8200 in the Three per Cent. Consolidated Annuities, was desirous of raising £8000. On the morning of Sept. 3rd he brought me the necessary papers filled up for the transfer of £8200. To the best of my knowledge he was not accompanied by any person. I sold the stock to a gentleman named Clement Smith. It was divided into two portions. Mr. Ware said the other witness to whom he had alluded could prove the payment of the cheque. John Forester was next examined—In consequence of a warrant granted by Sir William Magnay (the late Lord Mayor), on the 2nd of November last, for the prisoner's apprehension, he proceeded to America, and arrested him soon after his arrival on Brewster's Island, near the lighthouse, and about eleven miles from Boston, and brought him to England.—Mr. Salomon then applied to have the prisoner remanded until Wednesday next.—The Lord Mayor: Burgess, have you any objection to be remanded to that day?—Burgess: I have no objection, my lord.—He was remanded accordingly.—The prisoner throughout paid great attention to the evidence, and frequently conferred with his solicitor.

The Tender Mercies of the Poor Law.—At Wandsworth Police-office, on Tuesday, William Wallace, John White, and William Brown, farm labourers, out of employment, were charged with refusing to work in the Kingston Union.—Robert Oddbertare, the porter, said the prisoners were admitted on Sunday night; they had their supper given to them and went to bed. Next morning they were each required to crush ten pounds of bones before they had their breakfast. They refused to do this, and were given into custody. Wallace was casually relieved on Friday last, and then he did the work.—Mr. Paynter asked how much time would be occupied in crushing ten pounds of bones?—The porter replied not more than two hours.—The prisoner Wallace said it was a good four hours' work, and then, after it was done, they had only half a pound of dry bread given them, and this was called a breakfast.—Mr. Paynter: Is this so; is no cheese given with the bread?—Porter: No, sir. They have the bread only, and it is according to the diet-table issued by the Poor-law Commissioners.—Mr. Paynter observed that at the Wandsworth Union they gave cheese with the bread, and he thought they might do so at other Unions.—The prisoners said they had only straw to lie on, and they thought four hours' hard work too much labour for a bit of dry bread.—Mr. Paynter observed that if the prisoners went to the Union as casual paupers, they must expect to pay in labour for the food given them. He should commit Wallace for ten days, as he had acted as ringleader, and the two other prisoners for seven days each, with hard labour.—[And is it come to this in "merry England"? It is a lamentable reflection that men who, perhaps, form part of that body which used to be the "country's pride," must work four hours for half a pound of dry bread. Labour has become, indeed, a worthless commodity, when it can produce only such Lenten fare as this. This precious "diet-table" of the Poor-law Commissioners should be reformed as speedily as possible. Until there be some change, all that can be understood by the provisions of the New Poor-law Bill is starvation.]

Another Lady Thief.—At Bow-street, on Tuesday, a middle aged woman, respectably dressed in deep mourning, and appearing to walk lame, was charged with the offence of shoplifting. She had given the name of Leah Mary Roper, and stated that she resided in Fleet-street.—The evidence went to show that on Monday evening the prisoner entered the shop of Messrs. Hardwick and Co., drapers, 324, High Holborn, and, after looking at a variety of articles, made a few small purchases, at the same time expressing her admiration of some rolls of satinette which were lying upon the counter. She gave the assistant half-a-sovereign, and requested him to give her a bill of the goods she had bought, for which, with the change, she said she would presently call again. Her agitated appearance on leaving the shop, excited the suspicion of the young man, who then examined the pieces of satinette, one of which, forty-eight yards in length, and worth about £6, he found missing. Shortly afterwards, the prisoner having returned, she was taken aside, and questioned upon the subject. A policeman was called in, to whom, after once denying the charge, she acknowledged her guilt, and promised to take him to the pawnbroker's opposite, where she had pledged the satinette for £4. The officer accompanied her there, and saw her throw four sovereigns upon the counter, requesting the shopman to return the property which she had just put in pawn. This was done, and the satinette was immediately identified by the prosecutor's assistant.—A young man in the service of a drapery firm in Leicester-square gave the magistrate some information respecting a number of similar transactions on the part of the lady, who, it appeared, had been carrying on this mode of pilfering for several years past with great dexterity, having always evaded the vigilant efforts of the police to discover her retreat. It was stated that until recently she had resided in Agar-street, Strand, where about thirty or forty duplicates were at one time found under the carpet by a servant in the house.—Under these circumstances, Mr. Jardine thought it desirable to remand the prisoner till next Tuesday, when she would be committed for trial.—The prisoner, who said nothing to the charge, and appeared rather indifferent about it, was accordingly remanded.

The Tricks of Beggars.—At Worship-street on Tuesday, three men, named Edward Hayes, Charles Williams, and Michael Lyons, the two first-named without legs, and the other (Lyons) with only one leg, who have of late formed a conspicuous group in the streets of the metropolis, singing and begging as broken-down mariners, were charged with being begging impostors. Reany and two other officers found them on Saturday in Finsbury-square with three large placards displayed on the pavement before them, composed of pictorial representations of the perils of the sea, and doggrel verses describing the manner in which they had become maimed, as they now appeared. One of them was represented to have lost his limbs in the Greenland fishery, another by frost in the same inhospitable clime, and the third by accident in the timber trade in North America. Reany said that all the prisoners had often been in custody, and several times convicted, and that Lyons had never been at sea at all, and had on the former occasion stated that he lost his leg by accident in a coal-pit where he was employed. The officer added that they made an exceedingly profitable trade of begging, and had wives and families, whom they kept in the neighbourhood of Whitechapel, in as much comfort as many respectable tradespeople's. The placards, painted and inscribed as above-mentioned, were produced before the magistrate. The following verses from one of them will serve as a specimen of the whole:—

> "The ocean I've crossed, my legs I have lost,
> As plainly, good people, you may see;
> Hard is my lot, for work I cannot,
> Kind people take pity on me—
> I lost my legs by the frost in North America."

The prisoner Lyons admitted that he had not been a mariner, but that he had lost his leg in a coal pit as stated by the officer. The others said they had been sailors and maimed, as represented in their placards, and were incapable of earning the means of support. The officers proved that both Hayes and Williams had been many times convicted by the magistrates at the west-end of town, and Lyons twice convicted in the course of the present year. The magistrate (Mr. Bingham) committed the prisoners to the House of Correction—Hayes for three months, Williams two months, and Lyons one month.

Sudden Death at Lowestoft.—Mr. Hogg, portrait painter, of Lowestoft, was on Thursday found dead in his bed. The deceased feeling himself unwell, Mrs. Hogg went out for some medicine, but on her return she found him dead.

Incendiary Fire on the Farm of Mr. Abel Smith, M.P., at Watton.—A fire broke out on Tuesday evening at Bardolph's farm, Watton, Herts, in the occupation of Mr. Kimpton. The fire was first observed in a barley barn, in the centre of the extensive farm yard, at about half-past eight o'clock, and the engines were brought into play as soon as possible, but by the time the first engine arrived, five extensive and substantial barns filled with barley and wheat were on fire, and were destroyed. The loss to the occupier is estimated at £2000, who is ensured to that amount in the Phœnix. The buildings are insured in the Sun. No doubt is entertained that the barns were wilfully fired, and a labourer has been arrested on suspicion. The chief part of the agricultural implements were preserved.

DEATH OF HER ROYAL HIGHNESS THE PRINCESS SOPHIA MATILDA.

In part of our impression last week, it was our painful duty to record the death of the Princess Sophia Matilda.

An express arrived at Gloucester House yesterday (Friday) week, at two o'clock, confirming the melancholy intelligence, which took place at Blackheath, a little before one.

Her Royal Highness had taken her accustomed carriage airing the day before; on her return, however, a visible change was observed, and the medical attendants were summoned, but her Royal Highness continued to grow worse until she expired.

Her Royal Highness was sister to the late Duke of Gloucester, and in the 72nd year of her age.

This melancholy occurrence has occasioned an intense and painful sensation in the neighbourhood, where her Royal Highness's estimable character had endeared her to all ranks of society. This sudden termination of the Princess's indisposition was somewhat unexpected. For ten weeks her Royal Highness had not left her residence, until about a week since, when, contrary to all expectation, she appeared to rally considerably, and was enabled to take drives in her carriage. The Princess, we learn, was taken for a drive on the Thursday, and, on her return, she appeared more exhausted than usual, yet not so as to excite any peculiar anxiety. Next morning she felt worse, and required the attendance of her medical adviser, Mr. Wattsford, who promptly waited on his royal patient, whom he found in a sinking condition, but not presenting any dangerous symptoms; and to whom he administered the proper remedies. He expressed a desire to remain with her Royal Highness, but, stating that she was disposed to sleep, she requested him to retire that he might attend on his other patients. Her maid remained in the room with her Royal mistress, but observed nothing particular until about half-past ten, when she observed a paleness overspread the features of the Princess, whom, on approaching the bed, she discovered to be dead; thus tranquilly had the severance of soul and body taken place in the most quiet and placid manner, unaccompanied by any struggle or convulsive agony. Miss Cotes was also with the Princess in her last moments. On the change being observed Mr. Wattsford was again immediately summoned, but life was extinct. Throughout her indisposition, her Royal Highness has received the most unremitting and affectionate attention from the ladies of her household, lady Alicia Gordon and Miss Cotes; and she has been professionally attended with zeal and skill by Mr. Wattsford, of Greenwich, who, for nearly a quarter of a century, has been her Royal Highness's sole medical attendant.

Her Royal Highness the Princess Sophia Matilda was the eldest child of his late Royal Highness Prince William Henry, third son of Frederick, Prince of Wales, and brother of King George III. He was born November 25, 1743, created Duke of Gloucester and Edinburgh in Great Britain, and Connaught, in Ireland, 17th Nov., 1764, and died 25th Aug., 1805, having married, on the 6th Sept., 1766, Maria, daughter of Sir Edward Walpole, K.B., and widow of James, second Earl Waldegrave. She was born 3rd July, 1739, and died 22nd August, 1807. Their issue were 1st, Her Royal Highness, the Princess Sophia Matilda, whose decease we now record; 2nd, Her Royal Highness, the Princess Caroline Augusta Maria, born 24th June, 1744, died 14th March, 1775; and 3rd, his Royal Highness Prince William Frederick, the late Duke of Gloucester and Edinburgh, who was born 15th Jan. 1776, married, 22nd July, 1816, his cousin, the Princess Mary, the fourth daughter of George III., the present Duchess of Gloucester. His Royal Highness died without issue 30th Nov. 1834, when his honours became extinct.

The remains of her late Royal Highness the Princess Sophia Matilda will leave Blackheath about twelve o'clock, and will be interred in the family vault, in St. George's Chapel, at Windsor, on the evening of Tuesday next, the 10th instant; and, in compliance with the wishes of her late Royal Highness, the ceremony of lying-in-state will be dispensed with, and the funeral will be conducted with as much privacy as is consistent with the rank of her late Royal Highness. The funeral will be conducted by Messrs. Taprel and Holland, her Majesty's undertakers.

Tuesday's Gazette contained an order for a court mourning from Thursday last to December 15, also for a general mourning for a week from last Thursday.

ELECTION OF THE AMERICAN PRESIDENT.

Our Correspondent at New York has completed his Illustration of this animated scene with the annexed sketch of the exterior of one of the polling-places, which, heretofore, had been held at taverns; but at this election, as much as possible, at private houses, engine houses, &c. The sketch represents one of the latter: scattered about, as you approach the entrance, are tables, or wooden sheds, at which sit persons, dispensing Whig or Democratic tickets folded up; while others more actively ply the passenger on behalf of one or other of the candidates, and, not unfrequently, as they are folded, deceive you with a wrong one; so that it is very essential to open and examine the ticket before entering the room, which usually has an entrance and exit doors, at both of which are constables with crossed staves; who admit about a dozen at a time, or according to the size of the room. The voter quietly takes his place in the stream; and, in his turn, finds himself in front of a table or long desk, on which are two small mahogany or green boxes of various shapes, long or square; generally about a foot square, with a little aperture on the top, to receive the folded tickets, and respectively marked S. and E.—S.—State Governor, Members of Assembly, and E. Electors, who are respectively pledged to elect—the Democratic or Whig candidate—President of the United States. Behind the table are two inspectors—one of each party—well-known and reputable citizens, chosen by the mayor. To either of these gentlemen, the voter presents his two folded tickets; giving, at the same time, his name and residence. These the inspector repeats in a loud voice to the crowded room—waits a second or two—and then deposits both tickets into their respective boxes; and the voter retires by an opposite door to that he entered by. This is the usual mode, and all that is necessary; the person and politics of the great mass of voters in each ward being sufficiently well-known to the challengers of both parties, and immediately written down in their betting-books by two or three persons stationed near the table—under the head of Whig, Democratic, or Doubtful—so that, dividing the doubtful in half, a pretty near guess can be arrived at. These books are, of course, preserved from year to year, so that from the past they can form some anticipation of the present. If either party object to a man, on hearing his name, one calls out, "I challenge that man;" when, after undergoing a cross fire of questions, he is sworn, if a Protestant, on the plain bible; if a Catholic, on a bible with a wooden cross on the cover; there the matter rests, and his vote must be deposited. Sometimes, however, he is sent back for his naturalization papers; and, if proved to be voting illegally, instantly hurried off to the police office, to await his certain sentence of hard labour in the States' prison. In the evening, the boxes are unlocked, the tickets unfolded, and Whig and Democrat transfixed on opposite wires, and, of course, eagerly counted by the crowd; however eager, earnest, or enthusiastic, they may be, all is sober, peaceful, forbearing, and decorous. At the late election, the city was divided into districts, and these again sub-divided into wards, in each of which were one, two, or more polling-places, named by the mayor. The population was scattered, and near sixty thousand votes were taken in one day—between sunrise and sundown—as peacefully as if it had been Sabbath morning. It was, however, different formerly, when three days, instead of one, were spent in polling.

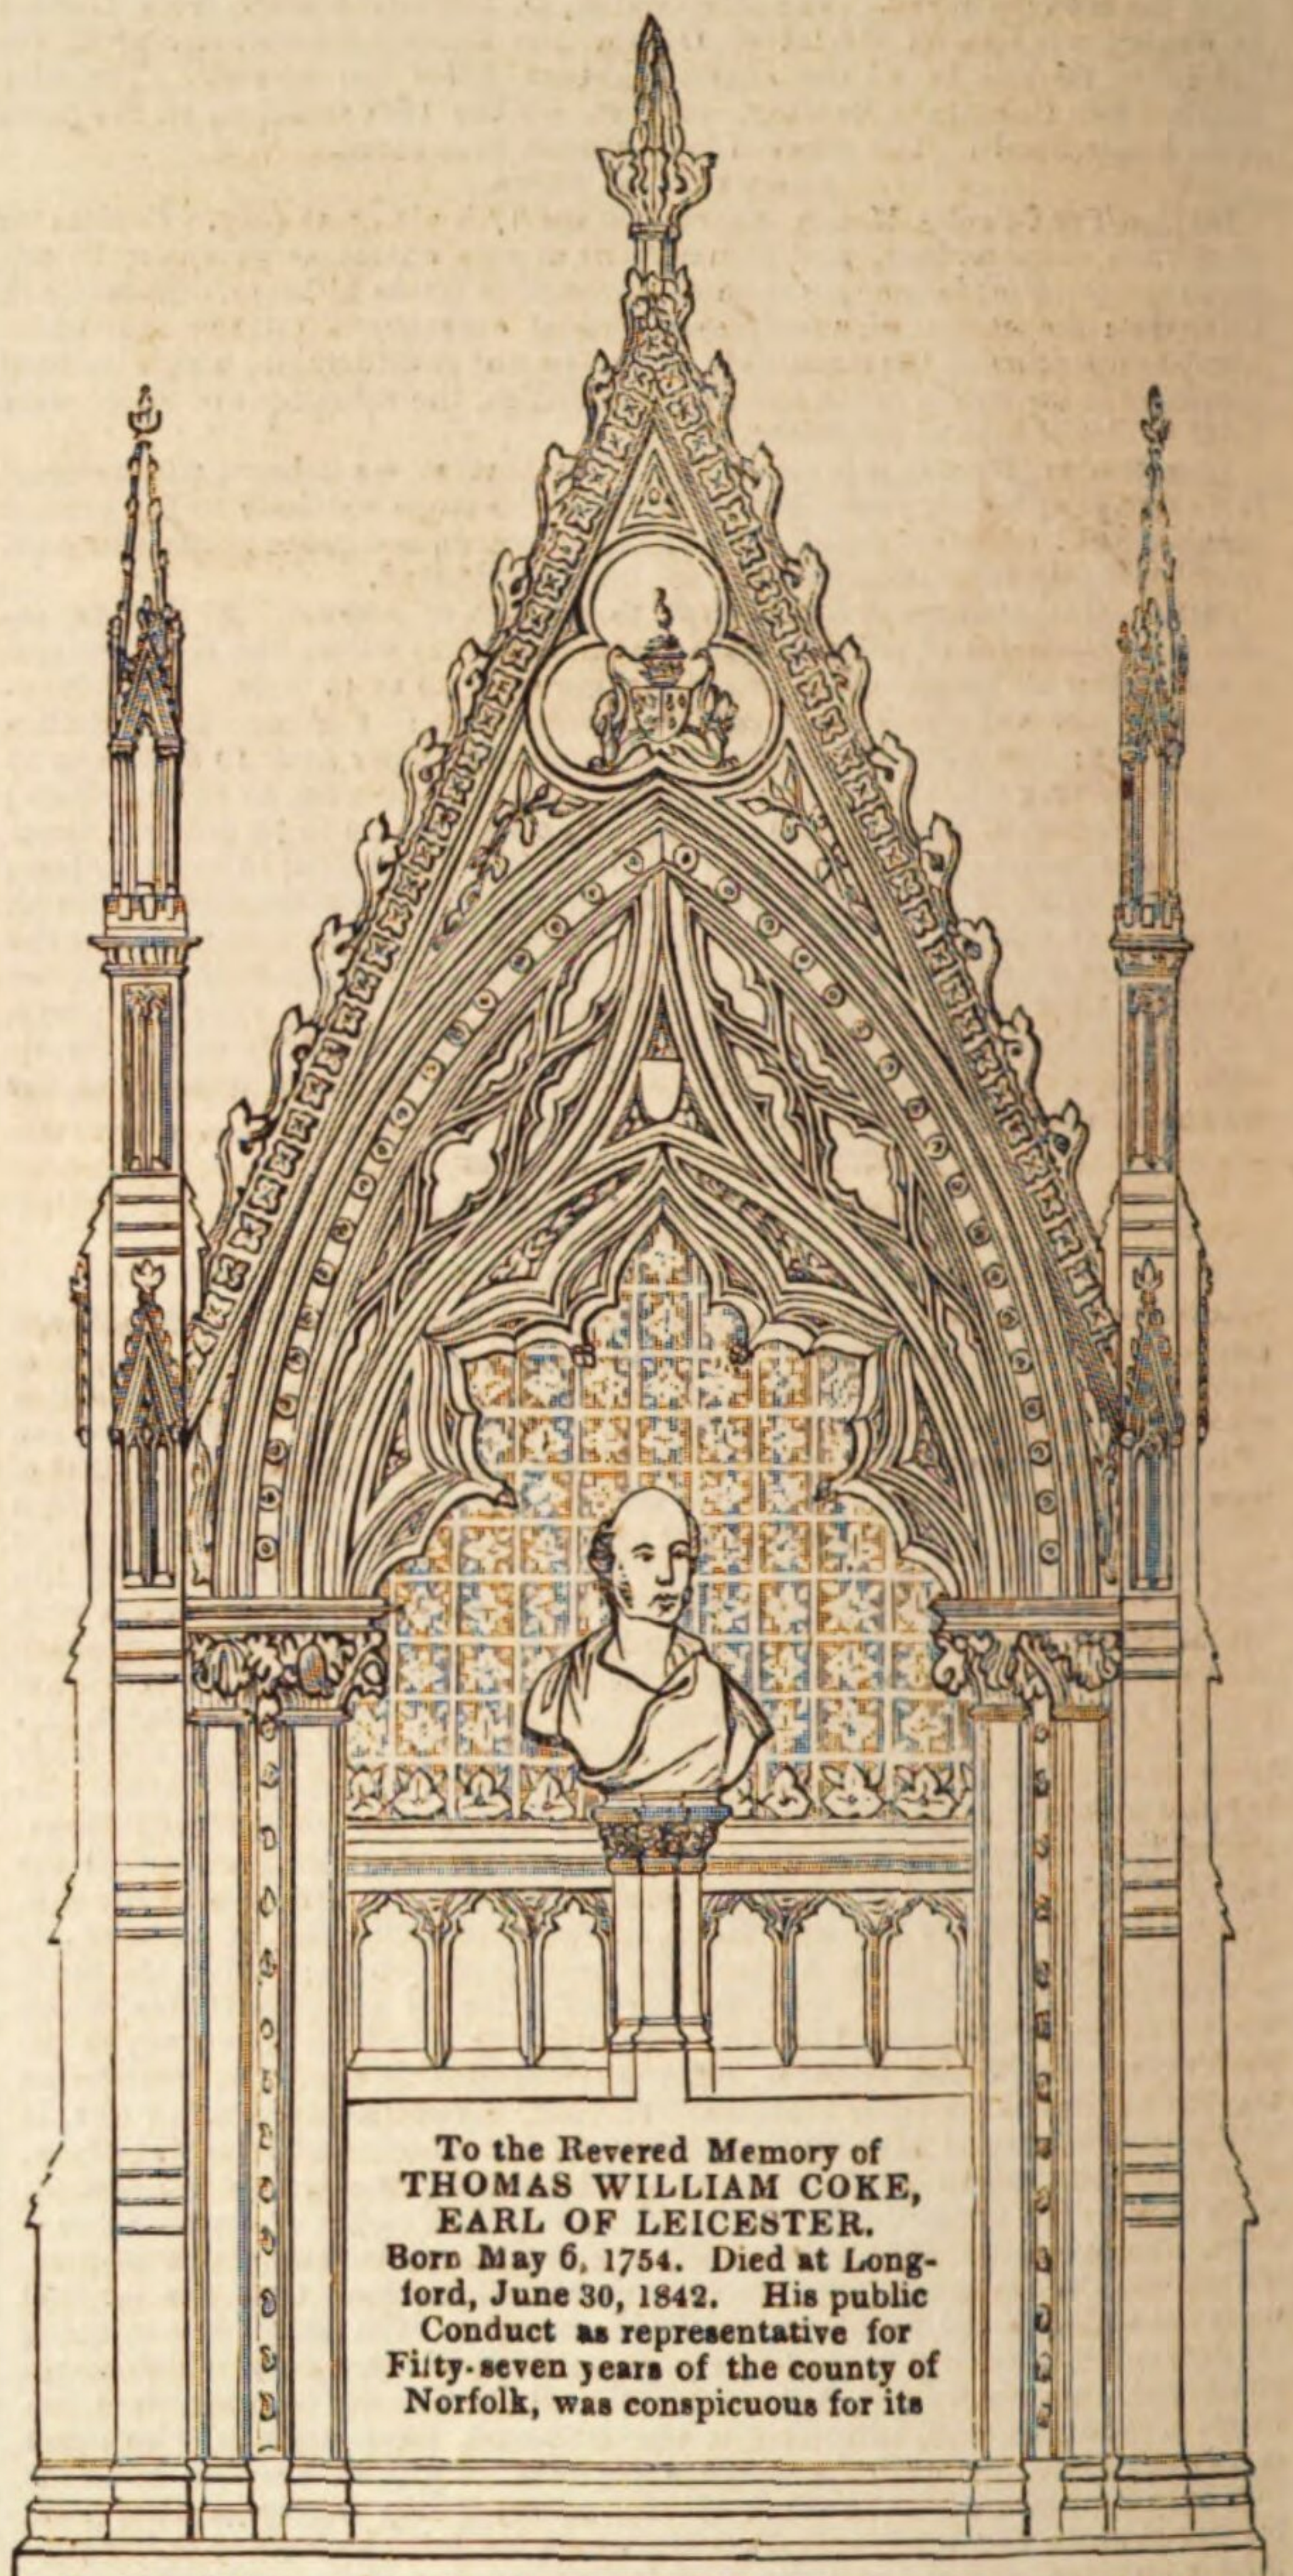
MONUMENT TO THE EARL OF LEICESTER IN LONGFORD CHURCH, DERBYSHIRE.

The memory of the late lamented Earl of Leicester—the father of the House of Commons, and the first agriculturist of his day—has been perpetuated by the erection of a most splendid monument in Longford Church, Derbyshire, it was completed at the beginning of last month; and the high esteem in which the noble earl was held, being fully proved by its expense being defrayed by individuals of all shades and classes of opinion, who, burying all other feelings than those of reverential regard, lent their assistance with the utmost cordiality.

The stone for the monument has been procured from the borders of Yorkshire, and is a fine magnesian-limestone, of a light colour. The plan is a rectangular niche, slightly recessed in the wall, and projecting therefrom about one foot. It is fixed upon a plain, solid base, three feet high. The opening of the niche in front, is about nine feet high, and about four feet three inches wide, and is flanked by shafted jambs, having floriated capitals with the ball-flower in the hollow, between the shafts; and the outer angles of the monument are strengthened by double buttresses, weathered in three stages. From the capital of the outer shafts, springs an equilateral moulded arch, with ball-flower enrichment; and from the inner shaft springs a trifoliated cinque-foiled depressed arch, the upper members of which form an ogive, connecting the under with the upper ribs. The spaces and spandrils between are filled with flowing tracery and carving.

From the level of the top of the capitals the buttresses rise two stages higher, the lower one being paneled and terminated with crochetted heads: and above these buttresses are lofty pinnacles, graduated in two stages, paneled on every face with hooded and crocketted terminations. The whole height of the buttresses and pinnacles is 14 feet 6 inches from the base. The outer arch is crowned by a high pitched pedimented hood, with carved patterns on the face, and also crocketted. The triangle formed by the above, over the crown of outer rib, is formed into a large trefoil, in which the armorial bearings of the late Earl, quartered with those of the families of Dutton and Keppel, is inserted. The arms, crest, and supporters are enamelled on a solid slab of china, executed at the Derby China manufactory. Between the jaumbs and upon the base of the monument, a plain slab is fixed, upon which the following inscription is carved in black letters, with illuminated capitals:—



To the Revered Memory of
THOMAS WILLIAM COKE,
EARL OF LEICESTER.
Born May 6, 1754. Died at Longford, June 30, 1842. His public Conduct as representative for Fifty-seven years of the county of Norfolk, was conspicuous for its Decision, disinterested zeal, and unimpeachable integrity. Pre-eminent no less

For his generosity as a landlord than for his skill and enterprize
As an agriculturist, he secured the deep affection of an attached and prosperous
Tenantry; while by his exertion and influence he extended, in a most Remarkable degree, the cultivation and rural improvements of the country. In His domestic relations he was most affectionate, kind, and hospitable;
His charity was munificent, without ostentation, and his piety
Simple and unaffected, but warm and sincere.
This Monument is erected by persons of various classes and opinions
Connected with this county,
As some record of an example, so excellent and instructive.

From the centre springs an octangular pedestal, flanked by paneling with foliated heads. A beautiful marble bust of the late Earl, from the studio of Mr. Francis, of London, is fixed upon the pedestal, and the whole of the back of the niche, above the slab and paneling, is diapered. The extreme width of the monument is 8 feet 9 inches, and its height from the floor about 20 feet.

It is fixed on the North side of the chancel of the church (which has been recently restored) and harmonises with the architectural character of that part of the building, which is a good specimen of the early decorated style, prevalent in the latter part of the 13th and commencement of the 14th century.

The work has been well executed by Mr. Hall, of Derby, from the design and under the superintendence of Mr. Henry J. Stevens, architect, of Derby.

Strike of the Coal-miners of Lancashire and Cheshire.—The accounts from Manchester speak of the existence of great excitement among the collieries. There were preparations for a general cessation from labour. Meetings of the miners have been held at Wigan, Ashton-under-Lyne, and other places, at which inflammatory language was used and a most determined spirit evinced to obtain higher wages. On Saturday last the whole of the miners in Lancashire and in Cheshire gave their employers notice that they would require at the end of a fortnight an advance of "twopence to the shilling," as they call it. These matters considered, there appears but little doubt that a general strike is in contemplation. At the Wigan meeting exhortations were made to the men to be firm, and they were told, that if they were, it would be impossible to resist them. At the Ashton-under-Lyne meeting, the following resolutions were carried:—"1. That it is the opinion of this meeting that, unless we organise ourselves, we can never better our condition. We, one and all, therefore, pledge ourselves to do so immediately, and will use every exertion in our power to obtain that which we, the miners, so richly deserve, viz., a fair day's wages for a fair day's work. 2. That this meeting agree to adhere to the question of restriction, knowing it to be the only safe way to gain our just demands."—It was announced to the meeting that upwards of thirty pits had given notice to their employers to strike work in fourteen days unless they received an advance.

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD ENGLAND.

THE BLACKWELL YEW.

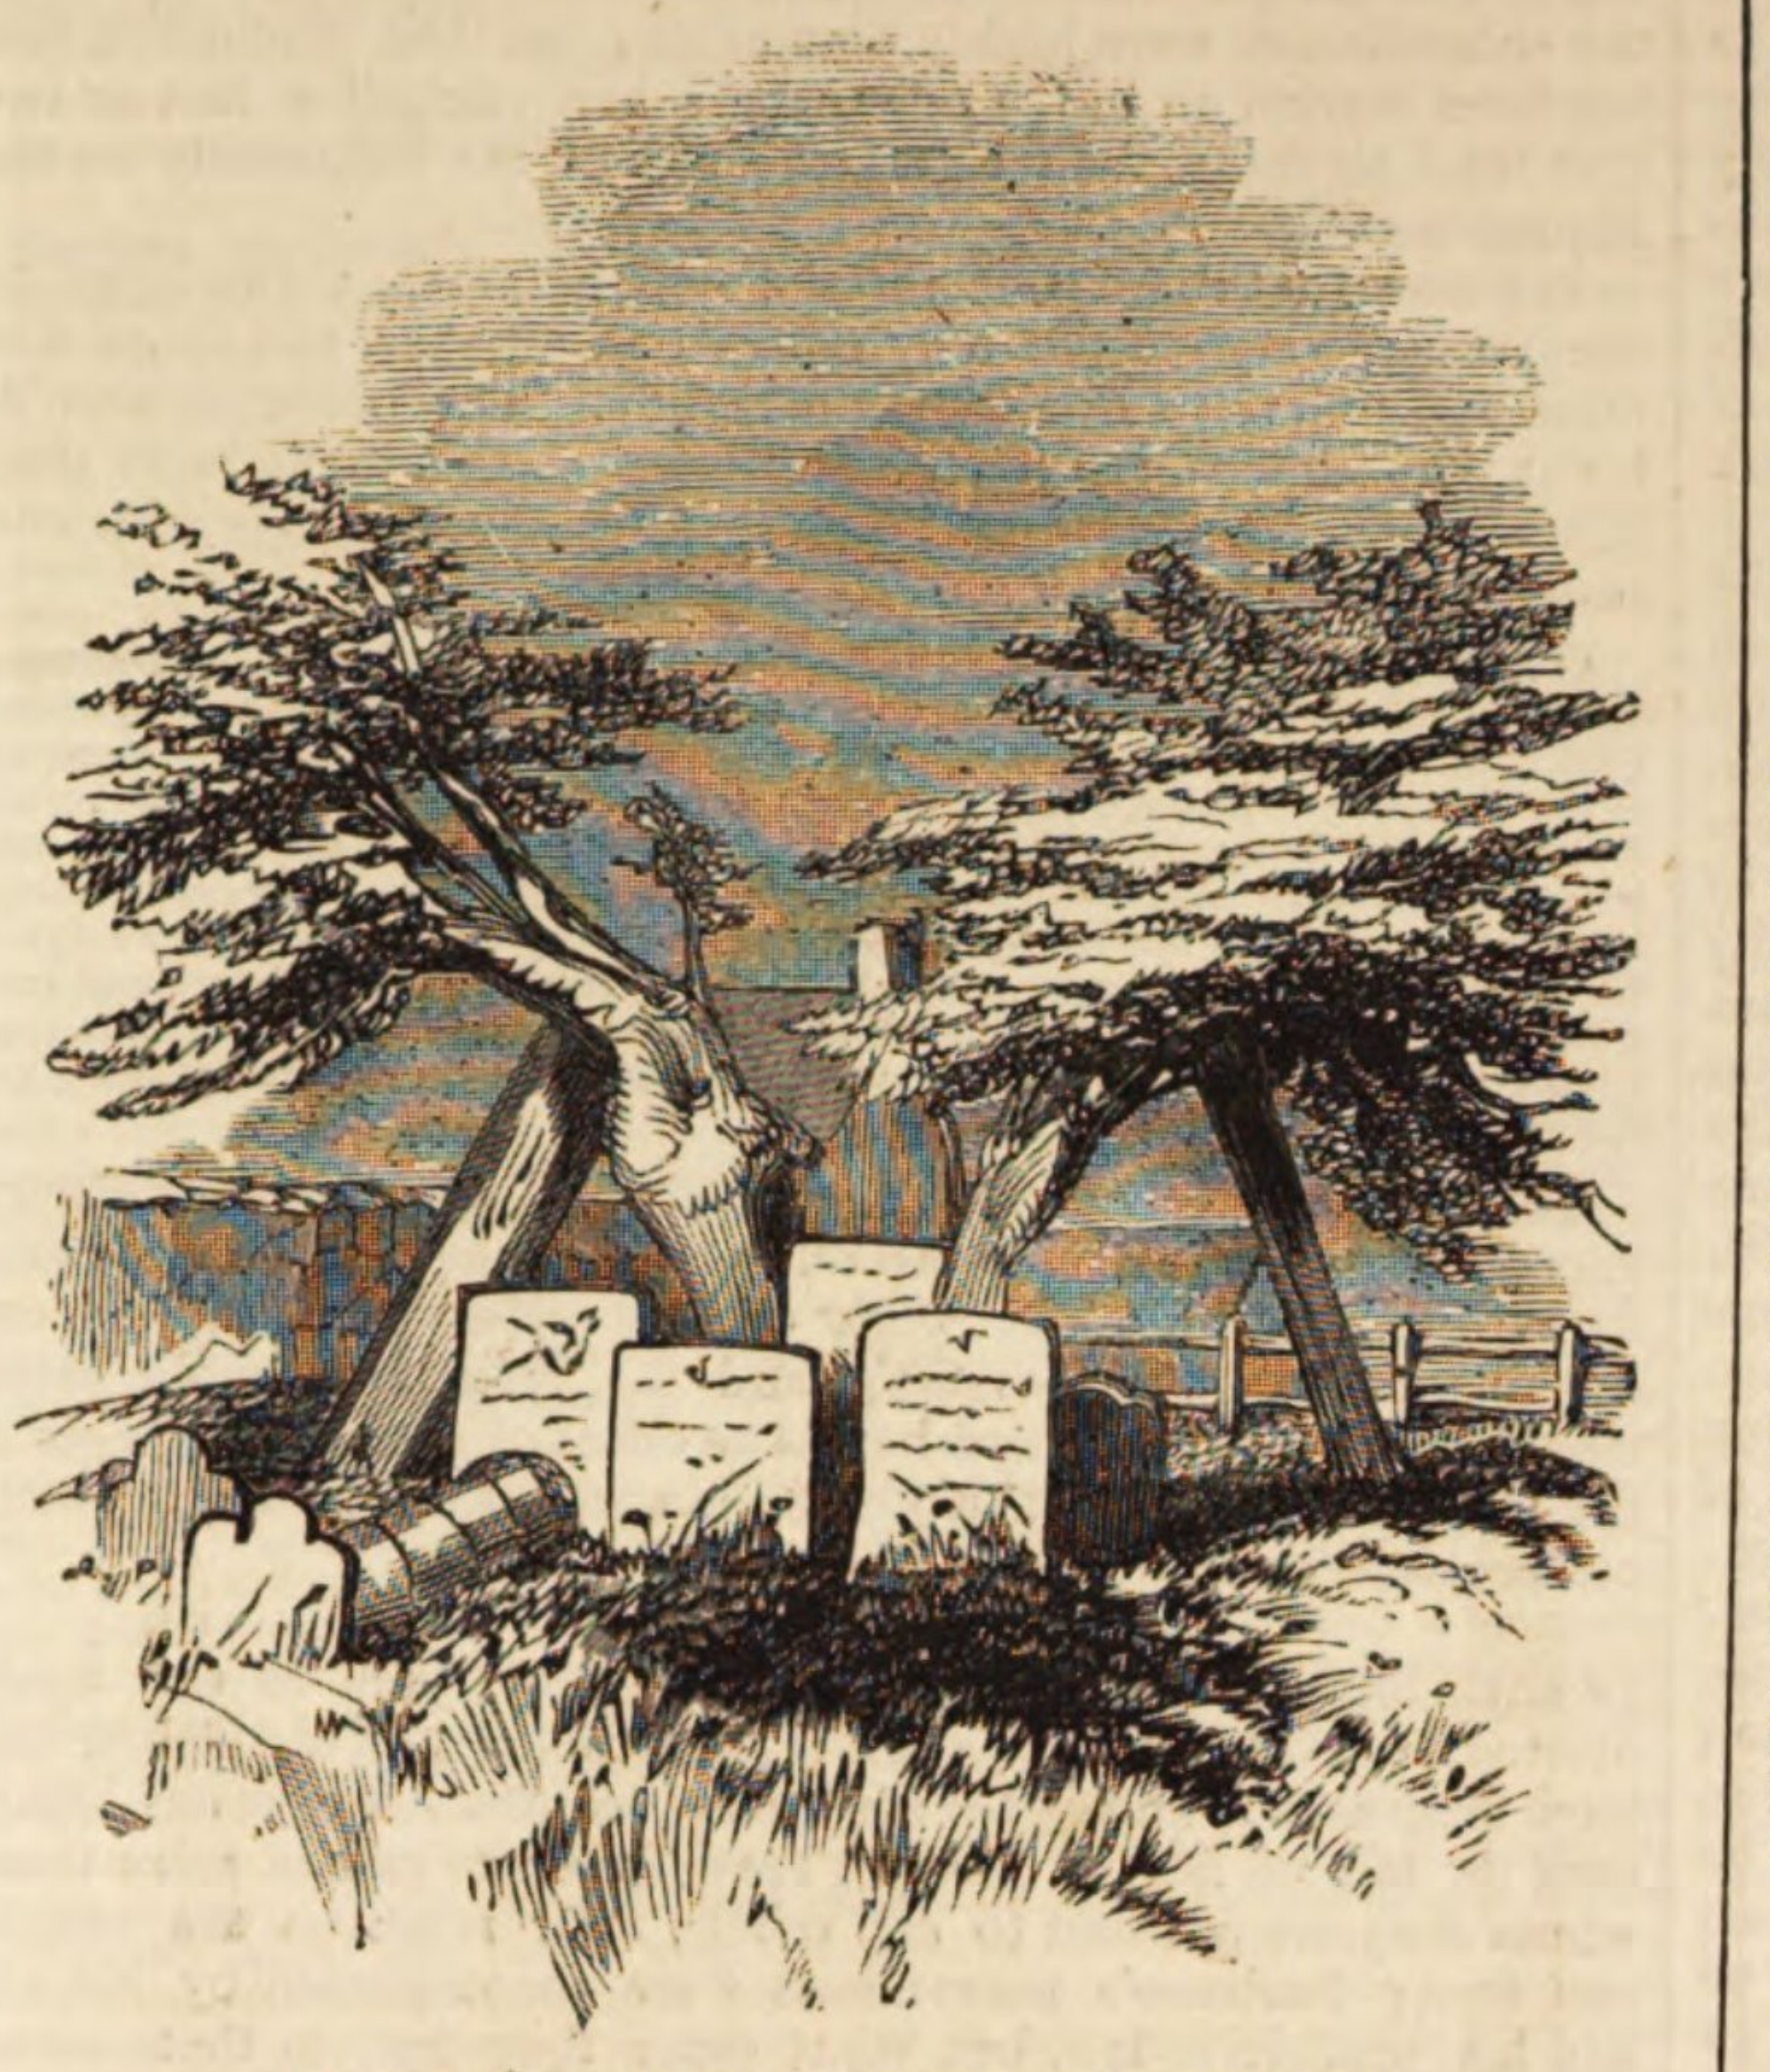
The yew tree is said to be a

> "Cheerless, unsocial plant, which loves to dwell
> 'Midst skulls and coffins, epitaphs and worms."

But this is a character more poetical than true. The situation in which it chiefly "loves to dwell," is the open chalk down, on which, in the midland districts of the country, it grows to a large size. The churchyard is not its natural habitat, having been placed there in the early ages of a credulous priesthood, to absorb the noxious vapours of the graves—a property which it was superstitiously believed to possess, and to which it still, in a great measure, owes its sepulchral celebrity. In Derbyshire, they serve the additional purpose of screening the entrance of the small wooden churches from the wind. Time, which impairs everything, has obliterated the traces of these fancied and real uses, and the "sturdy yew" is only known at present as an emblem of the dead, or as a symbol of the immortal youth to which our highest hopes aspire. It happens, however, that even in these respects, the "trusty yew" is unfortunate in its interpreters, for the church-yard tree is usually—since it has ceased to be generally planted—a ruined and mutilated object, and scarcely black or vigorous enough in its vegetation, to serve the acquirements of any allegorical purpose One such a wreck we have shown in our cuts: it stands in a nook near the secluded church of Blackwell, in Derbyshire—an ancient foundation dedicated to St. Werburgh. Many centuries have passed over its venerable "top," which is literally so thin, so starved, so shorn of its cedar-like branches, that

> "Scarce two crows could lodge in the same tree;"

the stem is split asunder, and the base exhibits that ruddy bulbous surface that indicates approaching dissolution. It is regarded as one of the landmarks of the neighbourhood, and, as such, is cherished by the villagers of the neighbourhood with much of paternal affection.



YEW TREES IN BLACKWELL CHURCHYARD

The yew tree at Darley, a short distance from Blackwell, is reputed to be the largest in the world.

EDWARD THE BLACK PRINCE'S RING.

At the request of an intelligent correspondent, we have engraved the annexed accredited relic of the celebrated Black Prince, who, for so many years, ruled Gascony, in the reign of Edward the Third. This treasurable antique is a very massive gold ring, and was long in the possession of the late General Ainslie, the author of a work on Anglo-French coinage, and himself a well-known coin-collector. The General was offered a considerable sum for this ring by a celebrated antiquary, but he would not part with it, and it is now possessed by the General's son, Captain Ainslie, at present serving with his regiment in England.

In 1827, General Ainslie published at Douai Nord, a dissertation in Latin, proving the authenticity of this interesting memorial of the flower of English chivalry. The original M.S. is in the Bibliotheque Royal, at Paris, and obtained for the General a gold medal; the following is a translation:—

"The ring, of which I am going to try and give a description and explanation, weighs 506 grains, poids de Marc de Paris, it is of gold of twenty-three carats, or, 958-1000.

"The letters are of that kind which Dom Vaines, in his 'Dictionnaire Raisonné de Diplomatic' (Paris, 1774), describes under the denomination of Manuscripts Capitals.

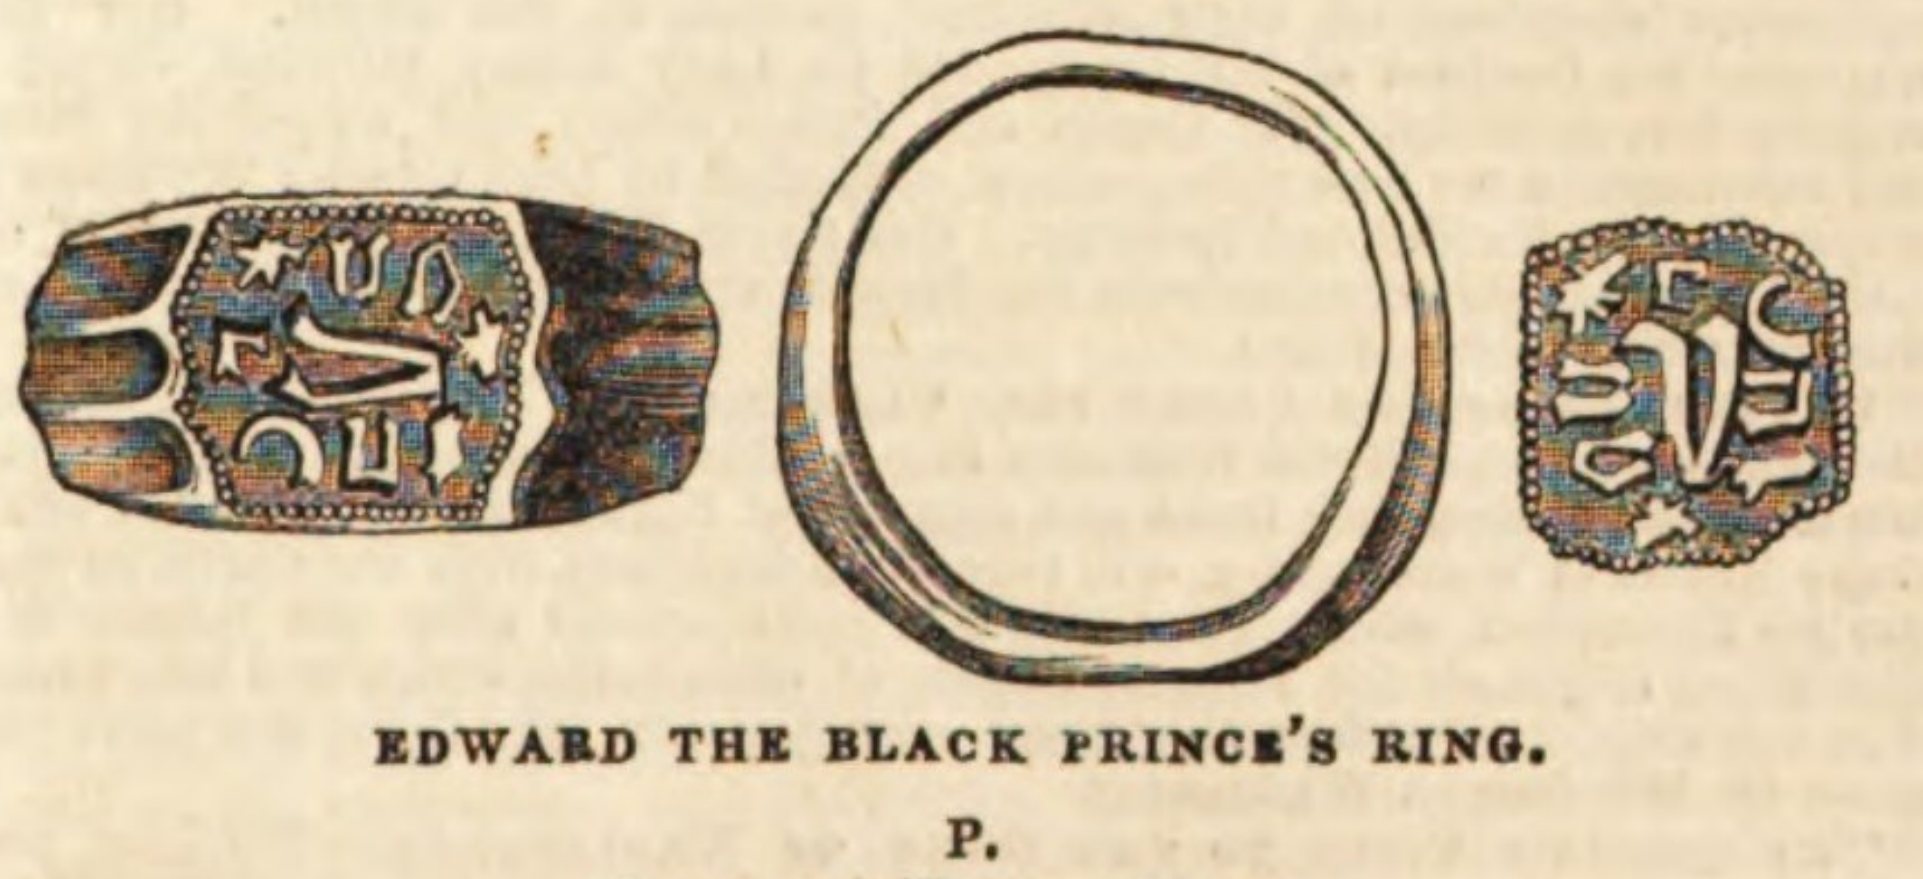
"In the middle of the floor of this ring appears a large V, between the words E D and D I, underneath the V is found a P of rather smaller dimensions than that of the E D and of the D I, having on the heraldic right a molette, with six rays, and on its left a demi-lune or crescent.

"Under the point of junction of the two limbs which compose the V, is a vine leaf; and a cordon de perles surrounds the whole in following the form of the floor or field, which is octagonal.

"The ring, as may well be supposed, is extremely massive; the work is not deprived of a certain intention to ornament; it is grooved.

"The cutting proves that, at this period, this art has made but little progress, but the work of the letters is very superior, probably, because the first was more frequently sought after, than those of heraldic emblems, which had been introduced at an age, at least, before the period at which this ring appears to have been made.

"The meaning of the words, abridged, appears to me to be translated by the following:—



EDWARD THE BLACK PRINCE'S RING.

Edwardi. asconiæ. Domine I.

"The Dukes of Aquitaine received at their investiture, which constituted their sovereignty, a wreath of roses in gold, a gold wand, and a ring.

"This interesting relic of the feudal times, was found at a depth of six feet under a public edifice, in the departement des Landes, on the great road to Spain; the workmen who discovered it, disposed of it to a person who ceded it to me after having kept it for two years."

Mr. James, author of the "Life of Edward, the Black Prince," states that, "from the extraordinary pains he took to ascertain the accuracy of every statement before he made it, he was fully convinced at the time, and still is, that the ring is indubitably genuine;" and he adds, that "he has not even heard it questioned."

General Ainslie, in a letter dated "Douai, March 20th, 1827," says:—

"I think I said that the Royal Societies of Antiquaries of France and Normandy had spontaneously elected me a member of their academies, since which I have got the like honour from two more—the Academie de Science d'Agen, and the Sociéte d'Emulation de Cambrai; the latter in consequence of a dissertation of mine, on 'My Ring,' which appeared in a periodical published in Paris, devoted to antiquarian researches, in which I have proved (hitherto uncontradicted) that the ring belonged to Edward the First, King of England, before his succession to the throne, and that it must have been given to him by Alphonso IX., King of Castile, when he married the sister of that Prince, in 1252.

THE LATE ROBBERY AT THE BANK OF MESSRS. ROGERS AND CO.

The most contradictory reports have been circulated this week upon the subject of the above robbery. It was said that some of the stolen notes had been traced, and various other statements have been made, the whole of which, however, are mere inventions. We can state from the best authority, that hitherto no clue whatever has been ascertained.

We annex an engraving of the banking-house of Messrs. Rogers, Olding, and Co., No. 29, on the east side of Clement's-lane, a thoroughfare exclusive rather than extensive. The banking-house is entered by a small lobby, and there are three apartments opening into each other: the banking-room, the parlour, and the strong-room.

The portraits of the two very active officers, Messrs. John and Daniel Forrester, are from sketches taken three days since.

The public is familiar with the great exertions used by these officers for the detection of offenders. Upon the recent apprehension of Burgess in America, John exhibited his accustomed dexterity and vigilance. It appears that when Burgess escaped from the hotel at Nahant, a small peninsula joined to the main land by a neck of land about four miles in length, he rowed in the dark for a considerable time, and at length, after having been tossed about, he landed, and made the best of his way to a small cottage in which a poor Irishman and his wife and three children resided. From thence he sent to the waiter of the hotel at Nahant his keys, with directions to take possession of the money contained in his bags, and convey it to him. John Forrester, who managed the whole business, with the ready assistance of the officers granted by the authorities, with consummate skill, took care to cut off the means of retreat or escape.

The most complete measures had been, we have been told, adopted by the Bank to render this first experiment upon the convention between England and America successful. A gentleman of considerable experience belonging to the establishment was sent over to manage one portion of the business, while John Forrester contrived and carried into execution the other.

One of the communications from America speaks thus of John Forrester:—"The utmost credit is due to Forrester for his untiring perseverance, his devotedness, and his efficiency. Sleepless in his efforts, and straightforward in his demeanour, he secured friends wherever he went, who were ready and anxious to stand by him, and also at once enlisted their goodwill in his behalf. No one could have discharged the responsible duties committed to him with more integrity, zeal, or success.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"Y.," of Liverpool, speaking of our account of the Time Ball at Greenwich, asks, "Why the hour of its descent is fixed at one o'clock, while noon is the all-important nautical hour?" We answer, that although noon may be deemed an important time in nautical affairs, yet it makes no real difference the hour being one. But without going into detail, it will be sufficient to state, that one o'clock is a more convenient time than twelve, at the observatory. The sun passes the meridian every day between about a quarter to twelve and about a quarter after twelve mean time, and, weather permitting, he is always observed at those times with the transit instrument to obtain his right ascension, and with the mural circle to obtain his north polar distance, and from that his declination; the observations thus taken can be used for obtaining the time, and the convenience, so obtained, furnishes one of the reasons for dropping the ball at one o'clock.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 7, 1844.

ON Monday last the first meeting of the "Society for the Protection and Employment of the Distressed Needlewomen, and for Clothing the Poor," was held. Lord Ashley was in the chair, and made a statement of what the Association has done, and of what it intends to do. Though it may fall, in effect, far short of its intention, yet even then it will have done much good. It contemplates operating on that received opinion among the employing and purchasing part of the public, that the miserable pittance now given for doing needlework is a necessity of the age; the employer is a trader, whose object is to make money; if he did not, he would soon cease to be a trader at all; he therefore gets his work done at the lowest possible figure. Others besides shirt manufacturers do the same thing, so the Society will have to remember that it is fighting against a general principle—one that is more rigidly acted on in England than in any other nation. It fights the battle, too, on behalf of those the least of all able to defend themselves against oppression—on behalf of those who are always weak, mostly ignorant, and universally poor. Heartily do we wish the band of champions success; but let not the benevolence of their task blind them to its difficulty. They have many a warm wish in their favour, though the spirit of modern commerce and the maxims of political economy, each the reverse of warm, are almost wholly against them; for the question of work and wages is one on which there is much to be said.

That "the labourer is worthy of his hire," is a truth of the highest importance; toil is the destiny of mankind, and though it is part of the primal curse, man is not "all unhappy," as long as he can labour; it is only when he cannot work, or, working, cannot make his wages suffice for living, that the full bitterness of his lot falls upon him. In both respects it is the vice of modern society that the difficulty should be almost universally increased. The competition of numbers reduces both the quantity of work to be done by each, and the amount of wages for that work that is paid to all. The liberal spirit that gave to the labourers taken into the vineyard at the eleventh hour the same payment as that bestowed on those who had borne "the burden and the heat of the day," actuates men no more. We have gone to the other extreme; we are not Utopian enough to expect men to be more than generous, but we may well blame them for being less than just; and from this reproach scarcely any employers of human skill, in any branch of human industry, can be pronounced wholly free. The wages of any kind of skill are calculated as much from the number and the necessities of those ready to perform it, as from the value of the work itself when done. The political economists say that this is the only true measure of value; and that if a certain quantity of labour can be purchased for a certain amount of money, it is really worth no more. If one will not do it, there are plenty who will; and so the one who is inclined to shrink from the prospect of living on sixpence a day, or even less, is driven to accept that, or the alternative of total starvation. And hence spring the "woes unnumbered," which meet us on every side—woes, sung by no "Heavenly Goddess" but recorded by the daily journals in the plainest and most mournful of prose; hence the pangs and sufferings of all those numerous classes whose labour is of that kind that the skill it demands is within the reach of nearly all, and whose universal penury joined to their numbers make them underbid each other, each individual ready to do more and take less than another for the sake of getting something to do at all. The capitalist who takes advantage of his own command of money and the general want of it, adds to his fortune, wealth increases, large houses flourish, we make a great name in commerce, we are a rich and powerful nation—but what is there beneath the surface? It is becoming evident that an abstract principle may be pushed too far, and that the relations between the employer and the employed, when the latter are wholly defenceless, require some degree of control; the opinion that such an interference can be made with safety, if judiciously managed, is gaining ground. We were driven to interfere in the case of the women and children employed in the coal mines, and if we may judge from recent accounts, not only no harm has arisen from it (as plentifully predicted there would be), but much positive good. Other instances of what is called interference between the employers and the employed are not wanting; there have have been numerous factory acts all compelling the capitalist to employ some portion of his money at all events in providing the means of increased safety to the health and lives of his labourers. The Legislature has not indeed ventured to fix the rate of wages, but it has done the next thing to it—limited to some extent the hours of labour. The principle then of some interference between two parties, one of whom may be said to stand almost at the mercy of the other, is established, and we are getting more and more convinced of the necessity of such interposition. The other principle, that of letting everything go its own way to any extreme, is obviously producing evils too great to be tolerated. The question next arises, what interposition is practicable? Sir R. Peel, in opposing Lord Ashley's Ten Hours' Bill, said, if the Government was to interfere with a limitation in the case of the Factory workmen, why should it not be called on to inquire into the evils attendant upon every trade and calling whatever? And as it was obviously impossible to do everything, the only alternative was to do nothing. The argument told exceedingly well in the House of Commons, but there is a fallacy lurking under it; carried out in another direction the same principle would put a stop to all charity and benevolent exertion, on the ground that as we cannot relieve all, it is useless to relieve any. Something it may be possible to do, even in a field where it is far beyond hope that all can ever be accomplished; and that something may, perhaps, be done, too, by other means than by calling for the interference of the Legislature.

An attempt of this kind is intended to be made by this society; looking at the vast amount of misery to be found in the labour market of this kind of industry in London alone, we confess we despair of its effecting a general change; it cannot make itself the channel through which all the work is to find all the workers, and competition will continue to keep down the rate of wages to the lowest point. But it may withdraw a few from the throng of applicants, and leave a little more room for the rest; it may accustom people to a scale of payment for this kind of toil calculated somewhat more liberally than that of the mere trader, and it may direct a large amount of private employment on some kind of system, where at present there is none at all. It may in fact be most useful as a charity, though it may not effect any great commercial reform in this direction; it will relieve a vast amount of distress, even if it should not go far to remove the causes of it.

THE arrival of the Overland Mail has not broken the political quietude of the week; the intelligence it brings from our Eastern Empire is quite destitute of what is called interest—a state of things on which both England and India may be congratulated. Scinde is tranquil, but the troops stationed there are still sickly. There have been some military operations in the native state of Kholapore, the Government of which has managed to drive the people to insurrection, and the East India Company, being bound by treaty to assist the ruling powers, have been obliged to interfere. The rising has not been against British interests or influence. The news from China is commercial only, and it speaks of the appearance of the markets there as somewhat overstocked with British goods.

THE Inquests held on the bodies of the two individuals killed by the collision on the Midland Counties Railway have terminated. In one case a verdict of manslaughter was returned against one of the officers of the Company; in the other, a deodand of £1000 placed on the engine, throws both the blame and the penalty on the Company itself. The last is the true mode of working a beneficial change. The imprisonment of a servant would be borne by a Board of Directors, with the utmost calmness and indifference; a money penalty must come out of their pockets, and makes itself felt in the part most sensible to such teaching. Undoubtedly, the subordinates were highly blameable; but the discussion that has been carried on in the newspapers has elicited a fact or two that tend to throw the far greater share of the culpability on the Management.

It seems that some time ago the staff of persons employed on the line was very considerably reduced in number, and those who remained suffered a diminution of salary. The consequences, as far as the public were interested in the arrangement, were most mischievous. They are well described in the language of a correspondent of the Times:—

> At the time of the change being first made, the result was an almost universal strike. The best engineers and the best servants—those whose experience qualified them for the higher rates established on other lines—all left the employ of the Company. But not only was this terrible mischief and danger the result. Ever since the two railways in question have been in the hands of a set of men who came there to learn their business. They are mere lines of apprenticeship, in which no man will remain longer than is necessary to obtain a knowledge of his business. It is unnecessary to point out the extreme peril to the public of such a state of things. Trains at the stations are frequently not "set" at the time appointed for their actual starting, and "half an hour after time" is the rule, not the exception.

Thus the public have been entrusted to the care of inexperienced and underpaid men, no one of whom, even if he were ever so skilful, could do the work of two. Haste, hurry, and uncertainty have been inevitable, and the result is a public catastrophe. May the deodand have the effect of opening the eyes of the Company to the fact that there is such a thing as saving without economy.

IF anything could make the civilised world wish to see Spain blotted from the list of nations it is the butchery and bloodshed that have disgraced it during the last twelve months. Every day brings over its tale of horror. When those in power cannot seize those whom they are pleased to call rebels, their relations are caught and shot; Zurbano's movements were accompanied by his son and his brother-in-law, but what share they had in them seems hardly known. Zurbano has for the present eluded pursuit, but the son and brother-in-law have been taken and shot, without even the form of a trial. We know of only one case more atrocious—that of the shooting of Cabrera's mother by General Nogueras. Even Oribe, the commandant of Logrono, a man not at all remarkable for scruples in such matters, hesitated and suspended the execution till the result of an application for mercy should be known. The moment Narvaez heard that the wife and mother of young Zurbano were on their way to Madrid, he ordered the immediate execution of his victims and dismissed Oribe from his post for having exhibited this small indication of humanity! A people that can permit such butchers to govern them deserve to be enslaved, and, from every present indication, will soon be reduced to that condition.

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

On Saturday last the Queen and the Royal Family did not leave the precincts of the Castle, owing to the reception of the melancholy news of the demise of her Royal Highness the Princess Sophia Matilda.

WINDSOR, Sunday.—This morning her Majesty and Prince Albert, the Royal visitors, and the domestic household, attended divine service in the private chapel of the Castle. The Hon. and Rev. Charles Leslie Courtenay officiated. Lord Charles Wellesley (Clerk Marshal) has relieved Colonel Arbuthnot in the duty of Equerry in Waiting on the Queen, and Major-General Sir Edward Bowater has relieved Colonel Wylde in the duty of Equerry in Waiting on Prince Albert.

MONDAY.—The Chapter of the Order of the Garter, fixed for the 12th instant, at Windsor Castle, will be held on that day; but the intended banquet in St. George's Hall, in the evening, will not be given, in consequence of the decease of her late Royal Highness the Princess Sophia Matilda. The Queen and the Duchess of Saxe-Coburg and Gotha walked for some time within the precincts of the Castle grounds this morning.

TUESDAY.—The Queen, Prince Albert, the Duke and Duchess of Saxe Coburg and Gotha, and Duke Ernest of Wurtemburg, walked on the Castle terrace and in the pleasure grounds for some time this morning. At noon their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess of Saxe Coburg and Gotha, and the Duke Ernest of Wurtemberg, attended by the Baron de Alvensleben and Baroness de Wangenheim, left the Castle to pay a visit of condolence to their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess of Cambridge, at Kew.

WEDNESDAY.—The Queen walked some time this morning on the terrace, and in the private grounds about the Castle. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent visited her Majesty and the Duchess of Saxe Coburg and Gotha this afternoon.

THURSDAY EVENING.—(From our own Correspondent.)—Her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert, accompanied by their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess of Saxe Coburg and Gotha, and the Duke of Wurtemburg, promenaded this morning in the private grounds in the Home Park. Their Royal Highnesses the Prince of Wales, the Princess Royal, and the Princess Alice took equestrian exercises on their Shetland ponies in the slopes. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent attended by Lady Fanny Howard, visited her Majesty this morning. The Queen and Prince Albert took equestrian exercise this afternoon in the new riding school, attended by Lord Charles Wellesley and Major-General Sir Edward Bowater. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent dined in private this evening with her Majesty and her royal and illustrious relatives on a visit to the Queen.

DEPARTURE OF THE COURT FOR CLAREMONT.—WINDSOR, Thursday.—Her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert, accompanied by their Royal Highnesses the Reigning Duke and Duchess of Saxe Coburg and Gotha, and the Duke Ernest of Wurtemberg, will take their departure from the Castle on Saturday for Claremont, where the Court will remain until after the funeral of her late Royal Highness the Princess Sophia of Gloucester, which will take place on Tuesday next. According to present arrangements, the Court will leave Claremont for Windsor on Wednesday.

THE QUEEN'S VISIT TO THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON.—We have reason to believe that the Queen and her illustrious Consort intend shortly to honour the Duke of Wellington with a visit, at the noble and gallant duke's seat, Strathfieldsaye, Hants. The precise day is not yet named. The Duke of Wellington, on Saturday morning, went to Strathfieldsaye, from town, expressly to give instructions for alterations requisite for the reception of his august visitors. The Duke returned to Apsley House in the evening. It is said that all the necessary preparations are to be completed by the close of next week.

The Earl of Hardwicke has arrived at the Castle, and has relieved Lord Rivers, from his duty as Lord in Waiting on the Queen. Colonel Berkeley Drummond has relieved Mr. R. Ormsby Gore, as the Groom in Waiting on her Majesty. The Queen will hold a Privy Council on Friday, the 13th instant, at Windsor Castle.

MARRIAGES IN HIGH LIFE.—Alexander Dundas Ross Wishart Baillie Cochrane, Esq., M.P. for Bridport, was on Wednesday married at Fawley Church, Hants, to Annabella Mary Elizabeth, eldest daughter of Andrew R. and Lady Elizabeth Drummond, of Cadlands Park, and granddaughter of his Grace the Duke of Rutland. The youthful bride is in her 21st year.—The marriage of his Excellency Baron de Nieumann, the Austrian Minister, with Lady Augusta Somerset, daughter of his Grace the Duke of Beaufort, took place on Thursday morning, in St. George's Church, Hanover-square. The Duke and Duchess of Beaufort, the Ladies Somerset, Lord and Lady Fitzroy Somerset, and a numerous party of relations and friends of the noble family, including the Duke of Wellington, together with a number of the corps diplomatique, witnessed the solemnity. The Duke of Beaufort gave a grand entertainment in honour of the event, at his residence in Arlington-street.

Earl Grey.—We are glad to hear that this distinguished nobleman has so far recovered from the severe illness under which he laboured as to enjoy the society of his family as usual, and to take, weather permitting, an occasional drive round his domains.

Viscount Melbourne is passing the winter at Brocket Hall, Herts, and is in improved health. Lord and Lady Beauvale are still on a visit to his lordship.

Deaths of Two Members of Parliament.—We regret to have to announce the deaths of two members of Parliament—the Hon. Robert Otway Cave, M.P for Tipperary; and Sir John Seale, Bart., the member for Dartmouth. Mr. Cave died, after a short illness, yesterday (Friday) week, at Bath, where the hon. gentleman had repaired, with Mrs. Otway Cave, for the benefit of his health. The deceased was eldest and only surviving son of the late Mr. Henry Otway, brother of Admiral Sir Robert Otway, Bart, K.C.B., and Sarah (now Baroness Braye), only daughter of Sir Thomas Cave, Bart., whose grandmother was eventually heiress of the first Lord Braye. He was, consequently, heir apparent to the barony of Braye. The hon. deceased married, the 19th of October, 1833, Miss Sophia Burdett, eldest daughter of the late Sir Francis Burdett, Bart. Sir John Seale died at his residence in London. He was descended from a good family, which has been long settled in Devonshire, where it has considerable property and influence, and some church patronage. He was colonel of the South Devon Militia, and was created a baronet under Lord Melbourne's Administration in 1838. In 1804 he married the daughter of Sir Paul Joddrel, and has left behind him a numerous family. At the time of his decease he was in his 60th year, and is succeeded in his title and estates by his eldest son, born in 1806. These deaths, of course, cause vacancies for two places.

Tuesday's Gazette announces, that the death of Sir John Henry Seale, Bart., M.P. for Dartmouth, having been duly certified to the Speaker in writing, he shall issue his warrant to the Clerk of the Crown to make out a new writ for the election of a member for the said borough, at the end of fourteen days after the insertion of the notice.

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

The Rev. Dr. Cramer, Principal of New Inn Hall, and Professor of Modern History in the University of Oxford, is appointed by her Majesty to be Dean of Carlisle.

The Divisions in the Church.—The Archbishop of Canterbury has replied to the memorial addressed to him recently, urging upon his grace the expediency of convening a meeting of the bishops, to consult upon the proper steps to be taken in the present divided state of the church. The memorial was signed by the Dean and Chapter of Exeter, and was noticed in our paper last week. The Archbishop's reply consists of a simple acknowledgment of the receipt of the memorial, and is couched in terms of great courtesy and kindness.

The Hon. and Rev. H. W. Bertie, son of the Earl of Abingdon, and Fellow of All Souls College, Oxford, has been presented to the living of Great Ilford, Essex.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

Baths and Wash-houses for the Labouring Classes.—On Wednesday a meeting of the inhabitants of St. Pancras took place at the vestry-rooms in Gordon-square, for the purpose of concerting measures to establish baths and wash-houses in that district for the accommodation of the labouring classes. Mr. Harris was in the chair. Mr. Douglas, who acted as honorary secretary, stated that the meeting had been convened in consequence of a communication received by the vestry from the parent institution, calling upon the parish to aid the society as much as possible in the establishment of a bath and wash-house for the labouring classes in that populous locality, and the vestry deeming the principle a good one, although they had no power to place the parochial funds to such a purpose, felt it their duty to form amongst themselves a committee, and call upon the parishioners generally to aid in so beneficial an object for the poor. Mr. T. H. Smith moved a resolution in support of the object in view, which, after some discussion, was unanimously agreed to. Mr. James Howarth, one of the churchwardens, was then unanimously elected treasurer, and a numerous committee were subsequently appointed to carry out the objects of the meeting. Subscriptions were then entered into, the chairman heading the list with £5, and a considerable sum was collected.

Evil Effects of the Wood Pavement.—The frosty weather of the last few days has exhibited the dangerous character of the wood paving in a striking point of view. On Thursday the road opposite St. Clement's church was in such a slippery state that horses were falling down continually, and it required very great care to prevent serious accidents. Surely the authorities ought to do something in such weather to prevent the ill consequences arising from wood pavement. Blackfriars-bridge is strewed with gravel in frosty weather, and as some such precaution is equally, if not more necessary on the wood pavement, it is to be hoped that the hint will not be lost upon those whom it may concern.

Mortality in the Metropolis.—Deaths, from all causes in the week ended Nov. 30—males 514, females 561; total 1075. Weekly average, 946.

The Weather.—The weather during the week has been excessively cold, but dry and pleasant, and the usual prognostics are rife of a severe winter. The thermometer was lower on Wednesday night than it has been this season, having fallen to 26.

Waterloo Bridge.—Thursday the half-yearly general meeting of the proprietors of the above-mentioned bridge was held at the Crown and Anchor Tavern. The Rev. Mr. Bush presided. From the report it appeared that the receipts for the last half year amounted to £8438 2s. 3d., being £424 9s. 6d. more than in the corresponding period of last year. The committee was consequently enabled to pay the interest of £5 per cent. on the company's bonds, and also pay a dividend of 12s. 8d. on the annuities. There remained a balance of £1651 17s. 6d. The report further stated that the tolls were proportionately improving, and also alluded to the several projected railways on the south side of the river having their termini in the vicinity of the bridge. The report was unanimously agreed to.

COUNTRY NEWS.

Dinner to Sir Robert Sale at Southampton.—On Monday a dinner was given to Sir Robert Sale at the Audit House, Southampton, on the occasion of his embarkation from that port for India. The room was prettily decorated with union jacks, flags, and other devices, interspersed with laurel. Immediately over Sir Robert was a banner with the words "Welcome, Sale," "Jellalabad," "Rancoon." On the right of the chairman sat Sir Robert, his nephew, Captain Barwell, Sir Henry Richardson. Peter Dickson, Esq., Captain Keele, &c. On the left, Colonel Hutt, Captain Doherty, S. Price Edwards, Esq. (collector), Major Farhill, Major James, &c. About eighty (the largest number the room could accommodate) sat down to the entertainment, the Mayor in the chair; who, after the usual loyal and patriotic toasts were disposed of, proposed the toast of the evening—"The health of General Sir Robert Sale," which was received with one tremendous burst of applause. Sir Robert, in rising to return thanks, observed that it had been twice his good fortune to receive a similar compliment at Liverpool to that he had now received at Southampton. It was his intention on approaching the shores of England, on his return from India, to have landed at that port, but fate had decreed otherwise. He only hoped that God would protect the town in the way in which it deserved. It had its railway, steam companies, and docks, and he trusted that on his return five years hence he should see the endeavours of the town crowned with success. The principal part of the company shortly afterwards left and proceeded to the theatre, which was filled to an overflow; and here again Sir Robert and his lady (who had previously arrived) were received with an enthusiasm that must have been highly gratifying to their feelings. They sat in the centre box of the dress tier, at the back of which was a neat transparency, with the words "Honour the Brave." The house was otherwise gaily decorated with flags, laurels, &c. Sir Robert and his heroic Lady sailed for India on Wednesday.

Health of General Nott.—Letters from Wales state that during the past week the general has continued to gain strength, and he is now much better than he has been since his arrival in England. So satisfactory, indeed, is the state of the gallant general's health, that he may be said to be fast approaching to convalescence. Lady Nott has taken carriage airings, and it is gratifying to learn that her ladyship's health is improved.

Attempt to Poison a Whole Family.—On Thursday week, John Wall, of Oadby, Leicestershire, framework-knitter, aged 25, was examined before I. Hodgson, Esq., on a charge of attempting to kill his sister, mother, and brother, by mixing a quantity of arsenic in sugar, and administering some to them. The prisoner's brother and sister are partially recovered, but his mother still remains in a dangerous state. The only motive that can be assigned for the perpetration of so diabolical an offence is, that the prisoner wished to get possession of a sum of money to which he and his brother and sister were entitled on the death of their mother. He was remanded.

Death of a Rich Banker at Liverpool.—Mr. Richard Leyland expired at his seat, Walton-hall, on Sunday last. His health had been sinking rapidly for some time, and for several days before his death all hopes of his recovery had been gone. As a banker Mr. Leyland had been eminently successful, and his own accumulations, added to the large fortune which he inherited from the gentleman whose name he took, had rendered him one of the richest men, if not the richest man, in Liverpool. He died childless, and it is generally believed that the greater part of his immense property will pass into the hands of his nephews.

Another Mine Accident.—Another of those deplorable and lamentable occurrences which too frequently accompany mining operations, happened at Beaufort Iron works, Monmouthshire, in one of the mine quarries, or patches, on Tuesday afternoon, by which the lives of four persons were sacrificed. The unfortunate party were at that time engaged in pushing up the rubbish tram, for the purpose of clearing the remains of a "fall," when a piece of ground from the strata, lying eight yards above, unexpectedly gave way, and fell directly on them, literally crushing nearly every bone in their bodies, and in a moment depriving them of life. It appears there is not the slightest blame attributable to the watchman, but that the occurrence has been the result of pure accident. The ground was apparently safe, and there was not the slightest indication of danger. The names of the deceased are Isaac James, aged eighteen; Cecilia James, eighteen (brother and sister); Charles Pensham, twenty-one, and Margaret Davies, eighteen.

Fatal Accident at Winchester.—A very melancholy accident occurred at Winchester on Wednesday. Mr. Kindersley, brother of Mr. Kindersley, of Lincoln's-inn, was out with the hounds in the morning, and in attempting to jump over something in his road, was thrown from his horse, and before medical assistance could arrive was a corpse.

The Barking Fishermen.—These mariners have almost all returned to their fishing smacks, and proceeded to sea, the employers having consented to their returning home every voyage, instead of stopping at Gravesend to unload their fish, and then going out to sea again without seeing their wives and families for six or nine months together. As regards extra wages, no concession, we understand, has been made, the men finding that their most grievous complaint respecting the voyages was attended to, having foregone their demand and returned to their employment.

The Alleged Manslaughter at Worcester.—The County Assize Grand Jury have ignored the bill against Mr. Hassall, of Stourbridge, charging him with manslaughter, in having accelerated the death of his wife.

A Rich Vagrant.—Mary Jones, with her son, a lad of about 10 years of age, have been committed to the Carmarthen county gaol for vagrancy, to one month's hard labour. The woman is a native of Pembrokeshire, and was sent to gaol for begging. On her person were found the sum of £6 1s. 10d. in cash, and promissory notes from the Glamorganshire and Monmouthshire Bank, and from several tradesmen in Newport, Monmouthshire, and elsewhere, to the amount of upwards of £200. Besides this large sum of money, she had in six or seven bags, 11 shirts, 10 caps, 3 cotton gowns, 15 handkerchiefs, 3 pairs of stockings, and 20 other articles of clothing. The promissory notes were sewed into the lining of her bonnet, but the cash was in her pocket.

IRELAND.

The Repeal Association.—At the meeting of the Repeal Association on Monday, Mr. O'Connell proposed a resolution to the effect, that the Repeal wardens be called upon in every district to exert themselves to procure the registry of those Liberals who were entitled to register. This was agreed to, and Mr. O'Connell next moved the adoption of the report of the committee, containing a series of rules and regulations for the establishment of Repeal reading-rooms throughout the country, as a powerful auxiliary for diffusing amongst the people early intelligence, especially on the subject of Repeal. This proposal having also been adopted, the honourable and learned gentleman favoured the meeting with a very long rambling speech, embracing a vast variety of topics. The most remarkable part of it was an exhibition of inconsistency in regard to Federalism. It will be recollected that Mr. O'Connell has hitherto spoken of Federalism as useful to the cause of Repeal. Upon this occasion he completely threw it overboard. He said, "He was the apostle of peaceful exertion, and the preacher of moral combination. As such he had invited the Federalists to join them; but instead of joining them they had deceived them. They were good-natured people enough, but they were not genuine Irishmen, for they thought that Irishmen ought not to govern themselves, and the love of fatherland did not burn brightly in their bosoms. He now declared that he expected no aid from them." Mr. O'Connell then commented at great length upon the ten propositions noticed in our Irish news last week. On referring to the tenth, that the Union enormously augmented the disastrous effects of absenteeism, he observed, that if they had a Parliament of their own, they would be able to tax absentees to the extent of 75 per cent., or even 80, in order to compel them to reside in Ireland, and that for the principle of taxing absenteeism they had a precedent in the income-tax of Sir Robert Peel, who hunted out the Irish absentees residing in England, and made them pay that tax. (Cheers and laughter.) The hon. and learned gentleman concluded the enunciation of his oft-repeated opinions upon his ten resolutions, by moving that they be referred to a committee to prepare an address upon them to the people of England. The motion being agreed to, the rent for the week was announced by Mr. O'Connell to be £493 5s. 6d.

Brutal Murder of Two Brothers.—A letter from Tullamore, dated Dec. 1, gives the following fearful account of the shocking murder of two human beings, brothers, named Thomas and William Sheppard, on the lands of Coolfin, barony of Ballyboy, in that county, about two miles on the mountain side of Frankford. The particulars of the sad circumstance, as gathered from the evidence of a surviving brother, at the inquest held upon the scene of the catastrophe, are in substance as follow:—A family named Daly heretofore held a small farm, about twenty-four acres, on the lands of Coolfin, but, getting into arrear, they were ejected for non-payment of rent, when Ambrose, Thomas, and William Sheppard (three brothers) got into treaty with the sub-agent, Mr. Fawcett, near Tullamore, for the farm. The negociation getting publicity, a threatening notice was served at their then residence, Derrycooly, near Rahan. The Sheppards, no way daunted, got into the occupation in the latter end of August last, when another notice was also served at said place, vowing death and destruction to them should they still persevere. They still treated these notices with indifference, at the same time using, as they thought, all due caution, having the house on the lands on which they then lived at Coolfin well fortified against danger, having plenty of fire-arms, with a supply of ammunition, and a fireproof room erected therein, in which they nightly lay. Things latterly seeming to wear a friendly aspect, Ambrose weakened the garrison by quitting the place a few days ago for Derrycooly, to bring up his wife, family, and furniture; and on his return on Friday evening last, seeing their horse walking about the place with his tackling on him, and neither of his brothers appearing, he was much astonished, and going to the door he found it partly shut; he pushed in the door and called his brothers, from neither of whom he received an answer. He immediately ran into Frankford to alarm the police, who quickly repaired to the spot with him, and on searching the house inside they found Thomas dead, with his head broken into pieces, and the brain escaping. They then made a search about the place for William, but it proved a fruitless one owing to the darkness of the night. They stopped there till morning, and when the daylight appeared they found William lying in a field, near the house, with his head equally broken and the brain also escaping. No other evidence calculated to throw light on the dreadful occurrence was obtained. It is supposed that the unfortunate men were murdered while at their work on Friday morning, as, from the caution they observed at night, it could not have occurred then without loss of lives to the assailants; besides, the horse being tackled, is another proof of the deed having been done in the day; and it is supposed that Thomas, on the attack, ran towards the house for the arms, and that William's retreat was cut off from it. No alarm was made until the brother's return, and the farm, too, is in an elevated position.

THE LATE FATAL ACCIDENT ON THE MIDLAND COUNTIES RAILWAY.

CONCLUSION OF THE INQUEST ON MR. DEAN.

In part of our impression last week, we gave the following conclusion of the inquest on Mr. Dean. To this we now also add the remainder of the proceedings at the inquest upon Mr. Varnalls.

The Coroner and jury remained in deliberation three hours; and at twenty minutes past twelve on Saturday morning, the court was again thrown open.

The Coroner said, that the jury, having given a full and patient attention to the evidence adduced before them, in reference to the circumstances attending the death of Mr. John Dean, felt compelled, however painful to their own feelings, to return a verdict of Manslaughter against Robert Lightfoot. The Coroner proceeded to remark that the Jury had instructed him to say, that they could not separate without expressing their opinion, that, notwithstanding the arrangements generally prevailing on railroads, much might yet be done and ought to be done to render railway travelling more secure, especially in regard to second class carriages, which, though they may not be made as comfortable, may be made as safe, as those of the first class. The jury considered that passengers ought on no occasion to be taken on the wrong line of rails, without their previous knowledge or consent. They also suggested to railway directors that much greater safety might be secured by the general introduction of electric telegraphs upon the various lines. The jury also expressed their conviction that greater care should be taken by the company to instruct their servants in the nature of their respective duties, and that they should be perfectly and intimately acquainted with the rules in practice.

The verdict was not an unanimous one; but a sufficient number of jurors having agreed, the Coroner recorded the same.

THE ADJOURNED INQUEST ON MR. VARNALLS.

This inquiry was resumed on Monday morning in the Grand Jury room of the County Hall at Nottingham.

Mr. Hutchison, Mr. Youle, and Mr. Ellice, directors, were present; also Mr. Clarke, general superintendent; and Mr. Kirtley, superintendent of the locomotive department.

Messrs. Wadsworth and Patchitt, solicitors, attended on behalf of the railway company; and Mr. Cursham, solicitor, appeared to watch the proceedings on behalf of Mr. Lightfoot.

John Longden, the guard of the up train, and who was so much injured by the collision, was the first witness examined.

Henry Youle, Esq., a director at Nottingham end, was next examined; George Mitchell, an assistant guard and ticket collector, and Joseph England, a passenger, also gave evidence; but most of those persons were examined on the other inquest, and there was nothing in their statements.

The evidence of John Chadbourn, of Pinxton, a passenger at the time of the collision, was next taken.

Thomas Curran, fireman; Mr. Joseph Pettifer, clerk at the Nottingham station; Mr. M. Kirtley, superintendent of the locomotive department, and residing at Derby; and Mr. Peter Clarke, general superintendent, were then examined.

At half-past eight o'clock, it was agreed to again adjourn till Tuesday morning. The first witness examined on that day was—

Alfred J. Richardson, parcel-clerk at the Nottingham railway station, but from whom nothing material was elicited which has not been before given in evidence.

W. Hannay, Esq., a magistrate of the town of Nottingham, and late a director of the railway for six years, spoke, as before the town inquest, in favour of Mr. Lightfoot, and expressed his conviction that Mr. Lightfoot having left no instructions at the station, the persons there ought not to have sent off the train, and that they were to blame for not carrying out the instructions in the ninth rule, and he ascribed the cause of the accident to such neglect.

Mr. Campbell made an ingenious defence for Mr. Lightfoot.

The Coroner summed up at great length, commenting upon the various discrepancies in the evidence, and left it to the jury to decide whether they considered it proved that Mr. Lightfoot had been guilty of gross negligence; if he had not, he was not guilty of manslaughter.

At twenty minutes after three o'clock the jury retired to consider their verdict.

The jury did not return their verdict until a quarter to twelve o'clock at night, after being locked up for eight hours and a half. On their return, the names of the jury having been called over, Mr. Coroner Swann, addressing the foreman, said—"Gentlemen of the jury, are you agreed upon your verdict?"

The Foreman.—We are.

The Coroner.—Have the goodness to deliver it.

The Foreman then gave in the following as the unanimous verdict of the jury:—"We find a verdict of 'Accidental death;' and we impose a deodand of £1000 on the engines, tenders, and carriages, being the property of the Midland Railway Company. The jury are convinced the collision took place in consequence of mismanagement, and the want of a clear understanding on the part of some of the company's servants of the directions which were given; but, owing to conflicting evidence, we are not able to decide who are the parties individually implicated. We are also of opinion that much improvement may be made in the general management of the Midland Railway, particularly at the Nottingham station, which would tend materially to secure the public safety. We think it important that the servants, especially the enginemen and guards, should be properly instructed in, and duly impressed with the importance of, the printed rules, which should as much as possible be observed to the letter. We are also of opinion that Jonathan Raven, the Beeston station-master, has given evidence before this inquest which the jury can place no reliance upon, and that he ought to forfeit the confidence of the Railway Company, and be no longer retained as a public servant."

This verdict is said to have given in Nottingham very general satisfaction, the prevalent impression being that a most reprehensible system of management has, since the amalgamation of the lines, prevailed on the Midland Counties Railway, which the safety of the public and the interests of the company itself demand should be improved in a prompt and liberal manner.

Much sympathy is felt for Mr. Lightfoot. An address to the directors, calling on them to continue their confidence in him, has been very extensively signed, and by many of the leading people of the town; but Mr. Campbell, the legal adviser of that gentleman, has urged its withdrawal until the result of the trial.

Mr. Lightfoot on Tuesday afternoon surrendered himself to the authorities.

POSTSCRIPT.

The Late Princess Sophia Matilda.—The Lying in State.—A change has taken place in the intention respecting the lying in state of the remains of her late Royal Highness the Princess Sophia Matilda. We understand that the ceremony will now take place at the Ranger's house, at Blackheath, on Monday next, the 9th instant, from twelve to four o'clock.

New Minister at Constantinople.—A report has been in circulation to-day (Friday), that Sir Henry Pottinger, G.C.B., will very soon be called upon to replace our present Minister at Constantinople, the Right Hon. Sir Stratford Canning, G.C.B., on the retirement of the latter.

Representation of Tipperary.—Several gentlemen are spoken of already as likely to be called on to fill the vacancy in the representation of Tipperary, caused by the death of Mr. Otway Cave. Among others are Daniel O'Connell, jun., and the Hon. G. Hely Hutchinson.

The Weather.—Last night the frost again was very intense, the thermometer during the greatest cold having fallen to ten degrees below freezing, a very rare occurrence so early in December.

Mr. Henry Wallack, the actor and late lessee of Covent Garden Theatre, appeared at the Bankruptcy Court on Thursday, and obtained his interim order; his debts and liabilities, which were stated to have arisen from theatrical speculations, amounting to upwards of £3,000. The assets are little or nothing, and his present salary at the Princess' Theatre so limited that it will not admit of his allowing any part of it for the benefit of his creditors. He, however, promises that should he receive an increase he will immediately make some apportionment to liquidate their claims.

Sudden Death.—Mr. Francis Soutter, who for many years carried on the business of a bill and exchange broker in Adam's-court, Old Broad-street, died on Sunday last. The unfortunate gentleman, who was seen by one or two of his friends in the City on the preceding day, apparently in excellent health and spirits, entered the shop of a druggist in or near Holborn on Sunday morning (no doubt feeling ill at the time), where he almost immediately fell down dead! The immediate cause of this shocking catastrophe is at present unknown, but it is presumed that a legal inquiry will be instituted into the circumstances, although Mr. Soutter's death was, in all probability, a perfectly natural one. The deceased gentleman, whose eccentric manner and habits rendered him well known throughout the City, and who was much respected in the various mercantile and monetary circles, was a native of Switzerland.

Accident at Birmingham.—An inquest was held on Thursday, at the station of the Grand Junction Railway, at Birmingham, on the body of a young man named William Graystone, an engine cleaner, who was killed on the previous day in the station-yard, while attending to his usual occupation, in moving the engines from one point to another. He was cautioned that he had placed himself in a dangerous situation, but he said all was right; he, however, became confused, and fell in attempting to get out of the way, when he was caught by the ash-pan, and instantly killed. His left eye was forced out, and his head smashed. Verdict of "Accidental death," with a deodand of 1s. upon the engine.

Fire and Loss of Life.—On Thursday morning a fire broke out in West-place, Holywell-lane, Shoreditch. A poor woman of the name of Herring, occupying apartments in the above place, had occasion to go out for some food, leaving her three children locked up in the room. An inhabitant shortly afterwards observing smoke coming from the windows, broke open the door, when he saw a fine little boy, about five years of age, burned to death; and in one corner of the room were two little children crouched together, crying bitterly. It is supposed that, it being a very cold day, the poor little fellow went too near the fire to warm himself, and set his clothes on fire.

Fire at the Newcastle Grand Stand.—A fire broke out at the Newcastle Grand Stand on Tuesday evening. The roof and upper staircase were in flames, but from the timely arrival of an engine, and a supply of water being at hand, the fire was speedily subdued, with but trifling damage. It is supposed to have originated from the ignition of the timber in the flues. The stand is occupied by Mr. Fenwick, and the plate and other valuables were removed to the house of Mr. Brandling.

Attempt to Set Fire to the Eton Union Workhouse.—At the Eton Petty Sessions, yesterday, five men, named Parker, Taylor, Smith, Harrison, and Smith, who had been admitted into the Eton Union workhouse, as casual paupers for the night, were charged with having attempted to set fire to the Eton Union workhouse, on the evening of Friday last. It appeared, from the evidence of two other paupers who were in the vagrant ward with the prisoners, that after they had been locked up for the night, Parker ignited a lucifer match, and set fire to the straw placed for them to sleep upon, from the fumes of which the whole were nearly suffocated. Upon Hitchcock, the porter of the union, being aroused by their cries for help, he immediately proceeded to the ward, when he found a considerable quantity of the wood flooring consumed; and with some difficulty, water being fortunately at hand, the fire was put out. The whole of the prisoners were fully committed to Aylesbury gaol to take their trial for felony.

The Late Bank Robbery.—We understand that in consequence of a letter addressed to the banking-house of Messrs. Rogers and Co. by their solicitor, Mr. Hobler, suggesting a mode of cancelling all the Bank of England notes which have been recently stolen from that firm, and thus rendering the property taken valueless to the robbers and their confederates, some of the partners of the banking-house have had an interview with the Secretary of State upon the plan, and the matter is now under consideration with Sir James Graham.

Burglary in the Waterloo-road.—At Union-hall police-office, yesterday (Friday), Alexander Wilson, a notorious thief, was charged with breaking into the house of Mr. Josephs, watchmaker and jeweller, Alfred-place, Waterloo-road, and stealing a gold watch. Sergeant Fenton, No. 16 L, stated that shortly after four in the morning, as he was passing Mr. Josephs' shop, he heard a rumbling noise inside. He then listened for a few minutes, when he heard some person inside endeavouring to unfasten the shop door, which a few minutes afterwards was partly opened. He immediately called to his assistance 72 L, and rushed into the shop; the prisoner ran into the back parlour, and attempted to make his escape. Witness seized him, when they had a severe struggle until the constable came to his assistance, when he was secured. In the struggle with the Sergeant 72 L, perceived the prisoner take the watch from his pocket and throw it away. It was picked up by 111 L. On searching him two chisels used in forcing drawers, a box of matches, and part of a candle, were found in his pockets. The prisoner had been several times summarily convicted for being found concealed in shops for an unlawful purpose.—Mr. Josephs said that the watch was safe on the mantel-piece in the back kitchen at three o'clock in the morning. At four he was aroused by hearing the scuffle in the shop. He went down, and saw the prisoner in the back parlour struggling with the officer. The watch produced was his property. The entrance was effected by climbing the chapel wall at the rear of his house, and forcing open the back kitchen door.—The prisoner owned being found on the premises, but he denied stealing the watch. He had endeavoured to get an honest living, but was unable to do so, which drove him to desperation.—Mr. Traill committed him for trial.

FOREIGN.

Spain.—Accounts from Madrid of the 28th ult. state that the Government had received official intelligence of the execution at Logrono of the son and brother-in-law of Zurbano. The news had caused a great sensation at Madrid. The Heraldo endeavours to justify the Ministry. A number of officers of high rank had been banished from Madrid. Among these are General Ferrez, formerly Inspector-General of cavalry, who has been banished to Talavera, General Tena to Cuenca, General Camba (formerly Minister of War) to Navarre, General Van Halen to Valencia, General Chacon (formerly Captain-General of Madrid) to Old Castile, General Olloqui to Seville, General Vallapadierna to New Castile, General Isidro to Gallicia, and General Lebrun to Aragon. Several persons of rank had also been banished from Seville, and orders had been issued by the Political Chief that all persons having in their possession fowling-pieces shall give them up within five days, under pain of confiscation, a fine of 100 ducats, and being placed under the surveillance of the police as suspected.

SPECULATIONS ON THE RAILWAY.

LONDON AND BRIGHTON RAILWAY.—THE GREAT OUSE VIADUCT.

There are few of us who do not look back with pleasure to the time when we lost ourselves in the wonders of the "Arabian Nights' Entertainments." Even now, we think we could enter as intensely as formerly into their gorgeous imageries—their glowing scenes of lights, genii, and music—

> After the fashion of the time,
> And humour of the golden prime > Of good Haroun Alraschid,

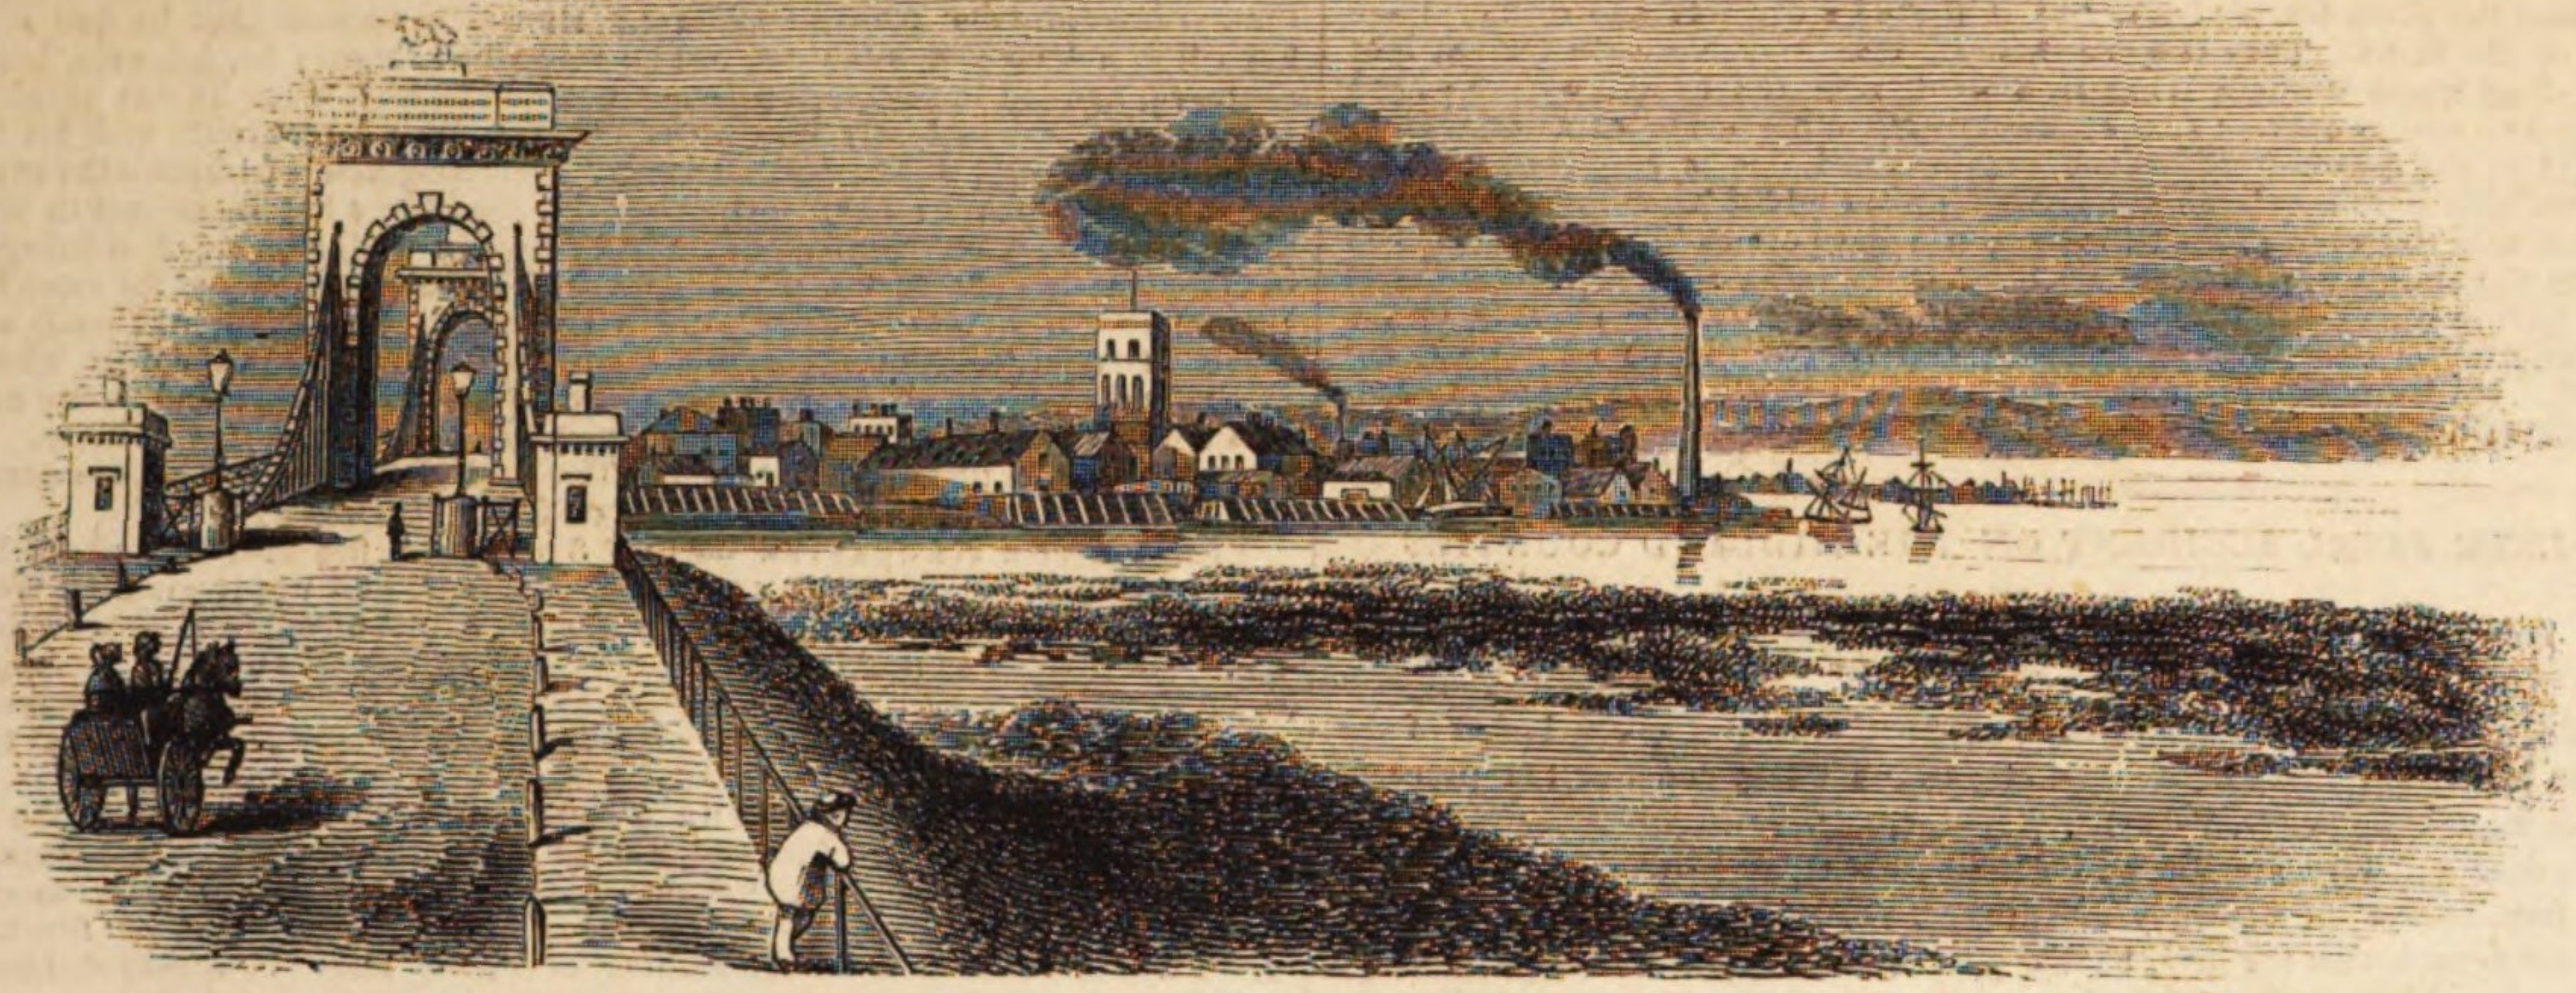
as Mr. Tennyson hath written in his book of sweet poetry. One story we especially remember—we forget the name, but it was towards the end, and treated of the efforts made by certain princes to restore some dear one, who was on the point of death. One had an apple which bore life in its very odour; another possessed a telescope that carried the sight to any spot that might be desirable; and the other owned a carpet which transported through the air any persons seated on it wherever they chose; and these wondrous things were all put in action on the emergency in question. Perhaps this is the only part of the "Entertainments" at which we should not marvel so much now-a-days. Science is a sad destroyer of romance; and modern inventions have made the magic treasures just spoken of less wonderful. Mesmerism, if we are to believe what we read, leaves the powers of the apple far behind; and telescopes, already advertised by cunning opticians "to see about eight miles," we doubt not, will be so improved ere long as to see anywhere, especially when they can combine the polarization of light with electro-magnetism.



SHOREHAM.

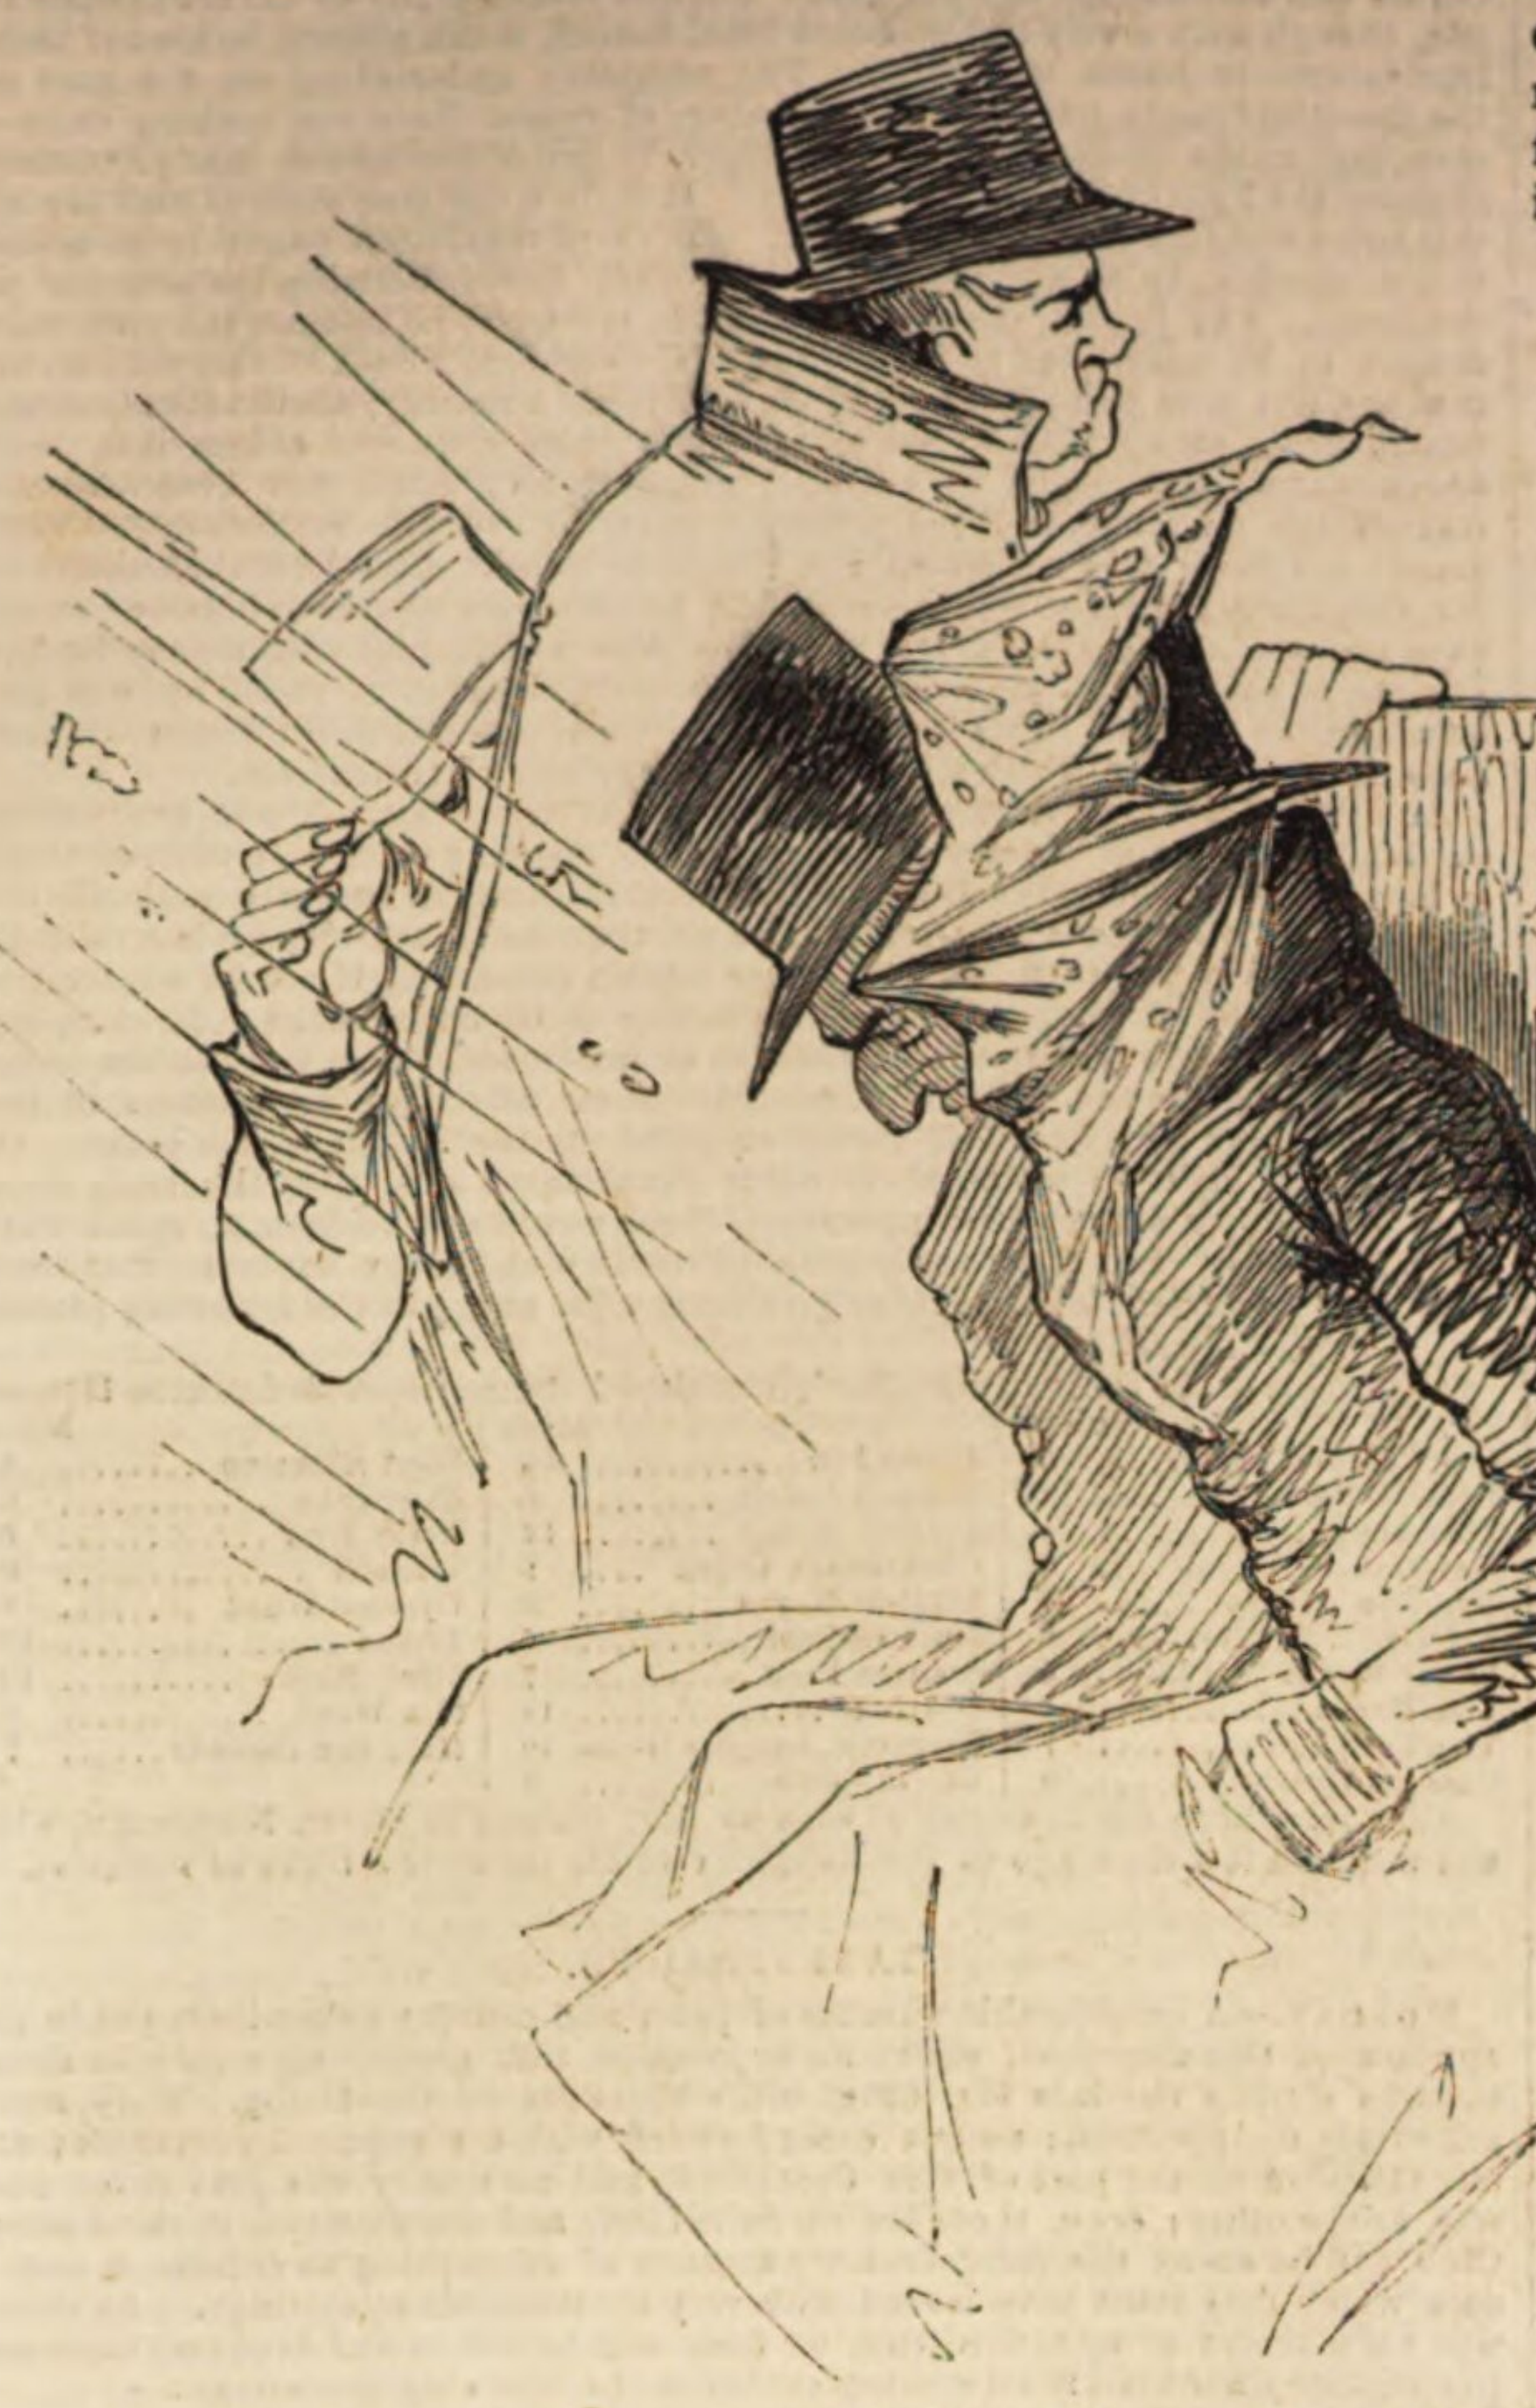
And then the transporting carpet—we always looked upon that as the most surprising possession—and it occupied our mind the deepest. There was a slip of stair carpet used as a nursery rug, which we always were convinced was the pattern, as firmly as a child's associations only allow; and we used to sit upon it and wish it would take us off—somewhere—anywhere—so long as we went. Alack! balloons and aerial ships have sadly reduced its importance, and railways, above all, leave us little cause to regret, that after all, there never might have been such a thing, except flying through the brain of the astonishing Scheherazade.

And wonderful is the railway transport of the present day! We are not of those who regret "the good old coaching times," and "the roadside inns;" the "four sparkling tits" and the other conventional things to be lamented. Nor had that much coveted position, "the box seat," any extraordinary charms for us. Beyond what was connected with the horses they were driving, and the public-houses they passed, we generally found the coachmen mighty dull and heavy men. A few miles, outside, in sunny summer weather, were all very well; but the cheerless umbrella-covered drag of a whole day, and night too, had in it nothing to regret. Now the chances are, we are comfortably housed at Brighton, before, under the ancien regime, our vehicle would have clattered up to the Greyhound at Croydon. The Brighton Railway is our especial favourite. The transit is rapid, and the contrast striking: you are not obliged to wander to out-of-the-way parts of London to get to the terminus and, above all, the scenery upon the line is unusually diversified and champaigny—if we may use the term.

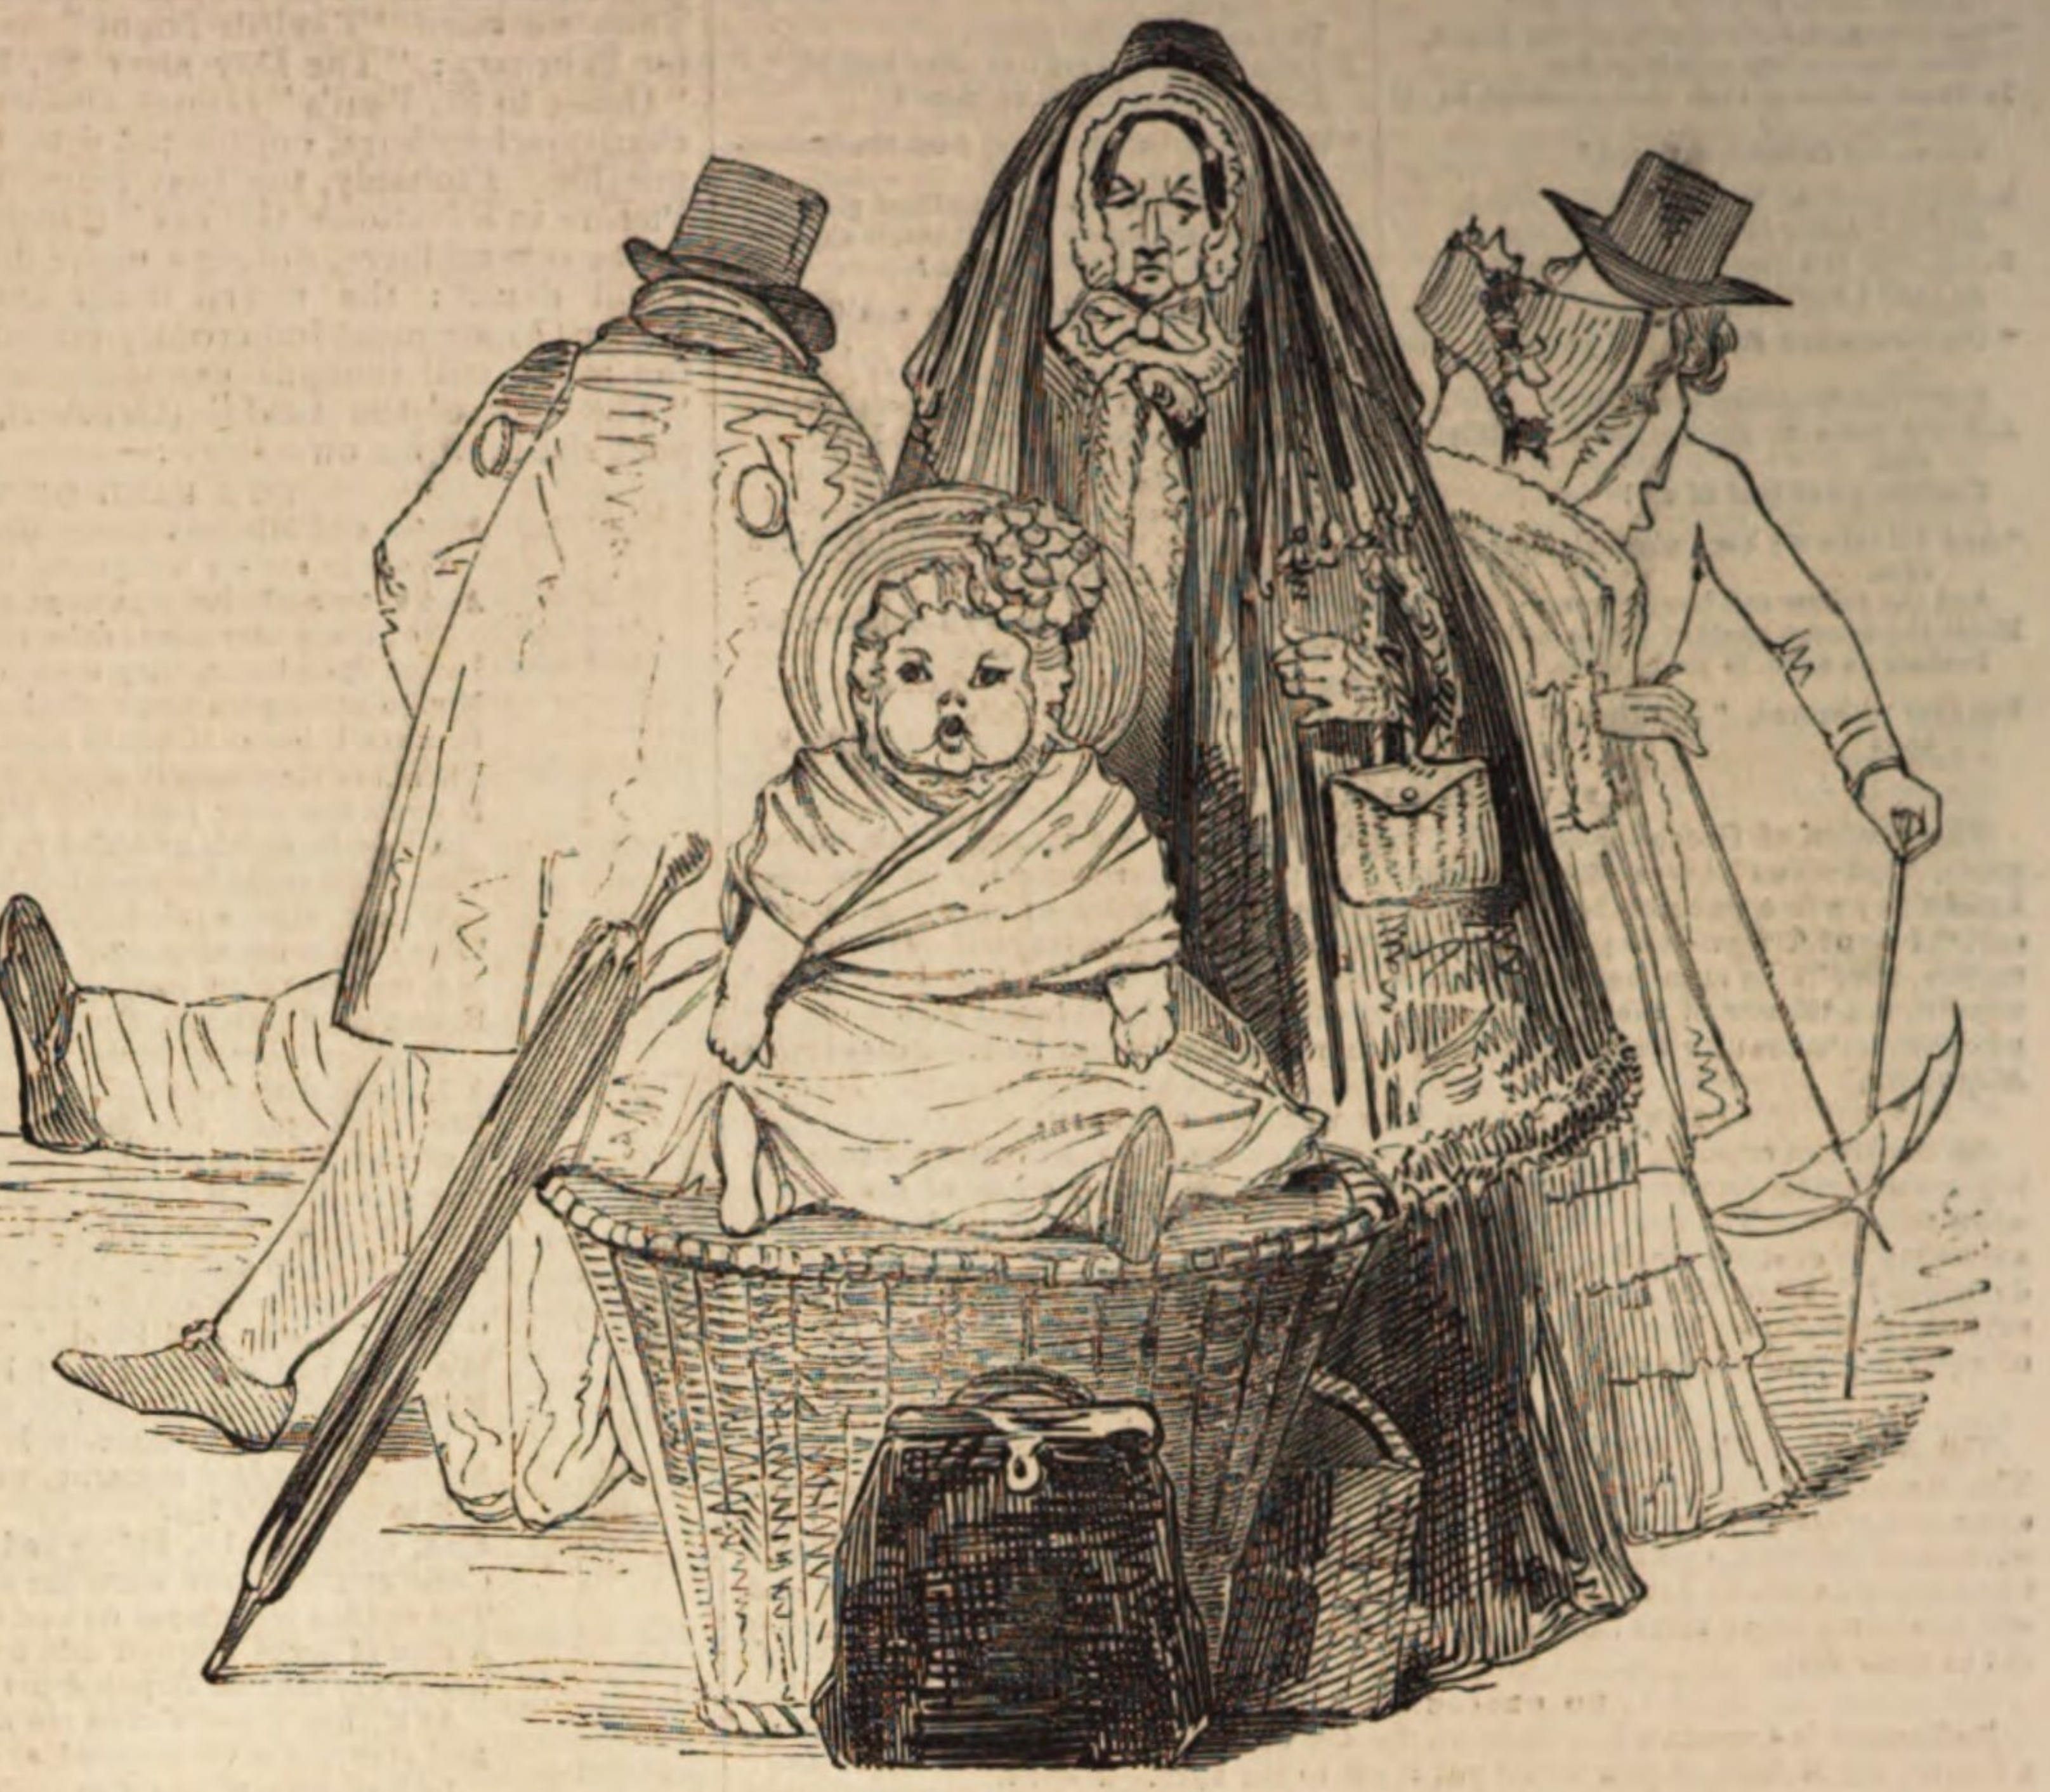
TRAIN PASSING.

Who for one instant would compare the trouble and extortion of the old coachyard to the comfort of the station? We are snugly under cover, and have leisure to look about us, and make out our own histories of the people around. Carriages are revolving on the turnabouts, to be added to the train; luggage-barrows are rumbling down the platform, and porters are burying themselves in the lockers, head first, like bees in bell-flowers; some passengers are arriving; others are waiting for those who have not yet done so. Right before us is a widow lady—she must be the grandmother—guarding a fine chubby little baby, seated on a hamper, and crowing at the train; kicking, too, as far as the marvellous swaddling of shawls in which he is enveloped will admit of. He cannot be going to Brighton for health—his cheeks are bursting with it. London is not such an unwholesome place after all, then; in spite of all the squalid pictures of the virtuous-indignation gentlemen, it is wonderful to see the plump little fellows who roll out of doors and into the gutters, even in the Rookery. In this case, the father and mother, we wager, are already at Brighton; but they cannot get on well without baby, and grandmamma—she lives in the house—is entrusted with the charge. The pretty girl in the Polka mantle is conversing earnestly with the young gentleman whilst her valetudinarian papa is twaddling with one of the hangers-on. Be sure she has reminded him, for the hundredth time, to write to-morrow; and she is not without faint hopes of taking his arm on the Chain-Pier on Sunday.

FIRST CLASS PASSENGERS.



THIRD CLASS PASSENGERS.



WAITING FOR THE TRAIN.

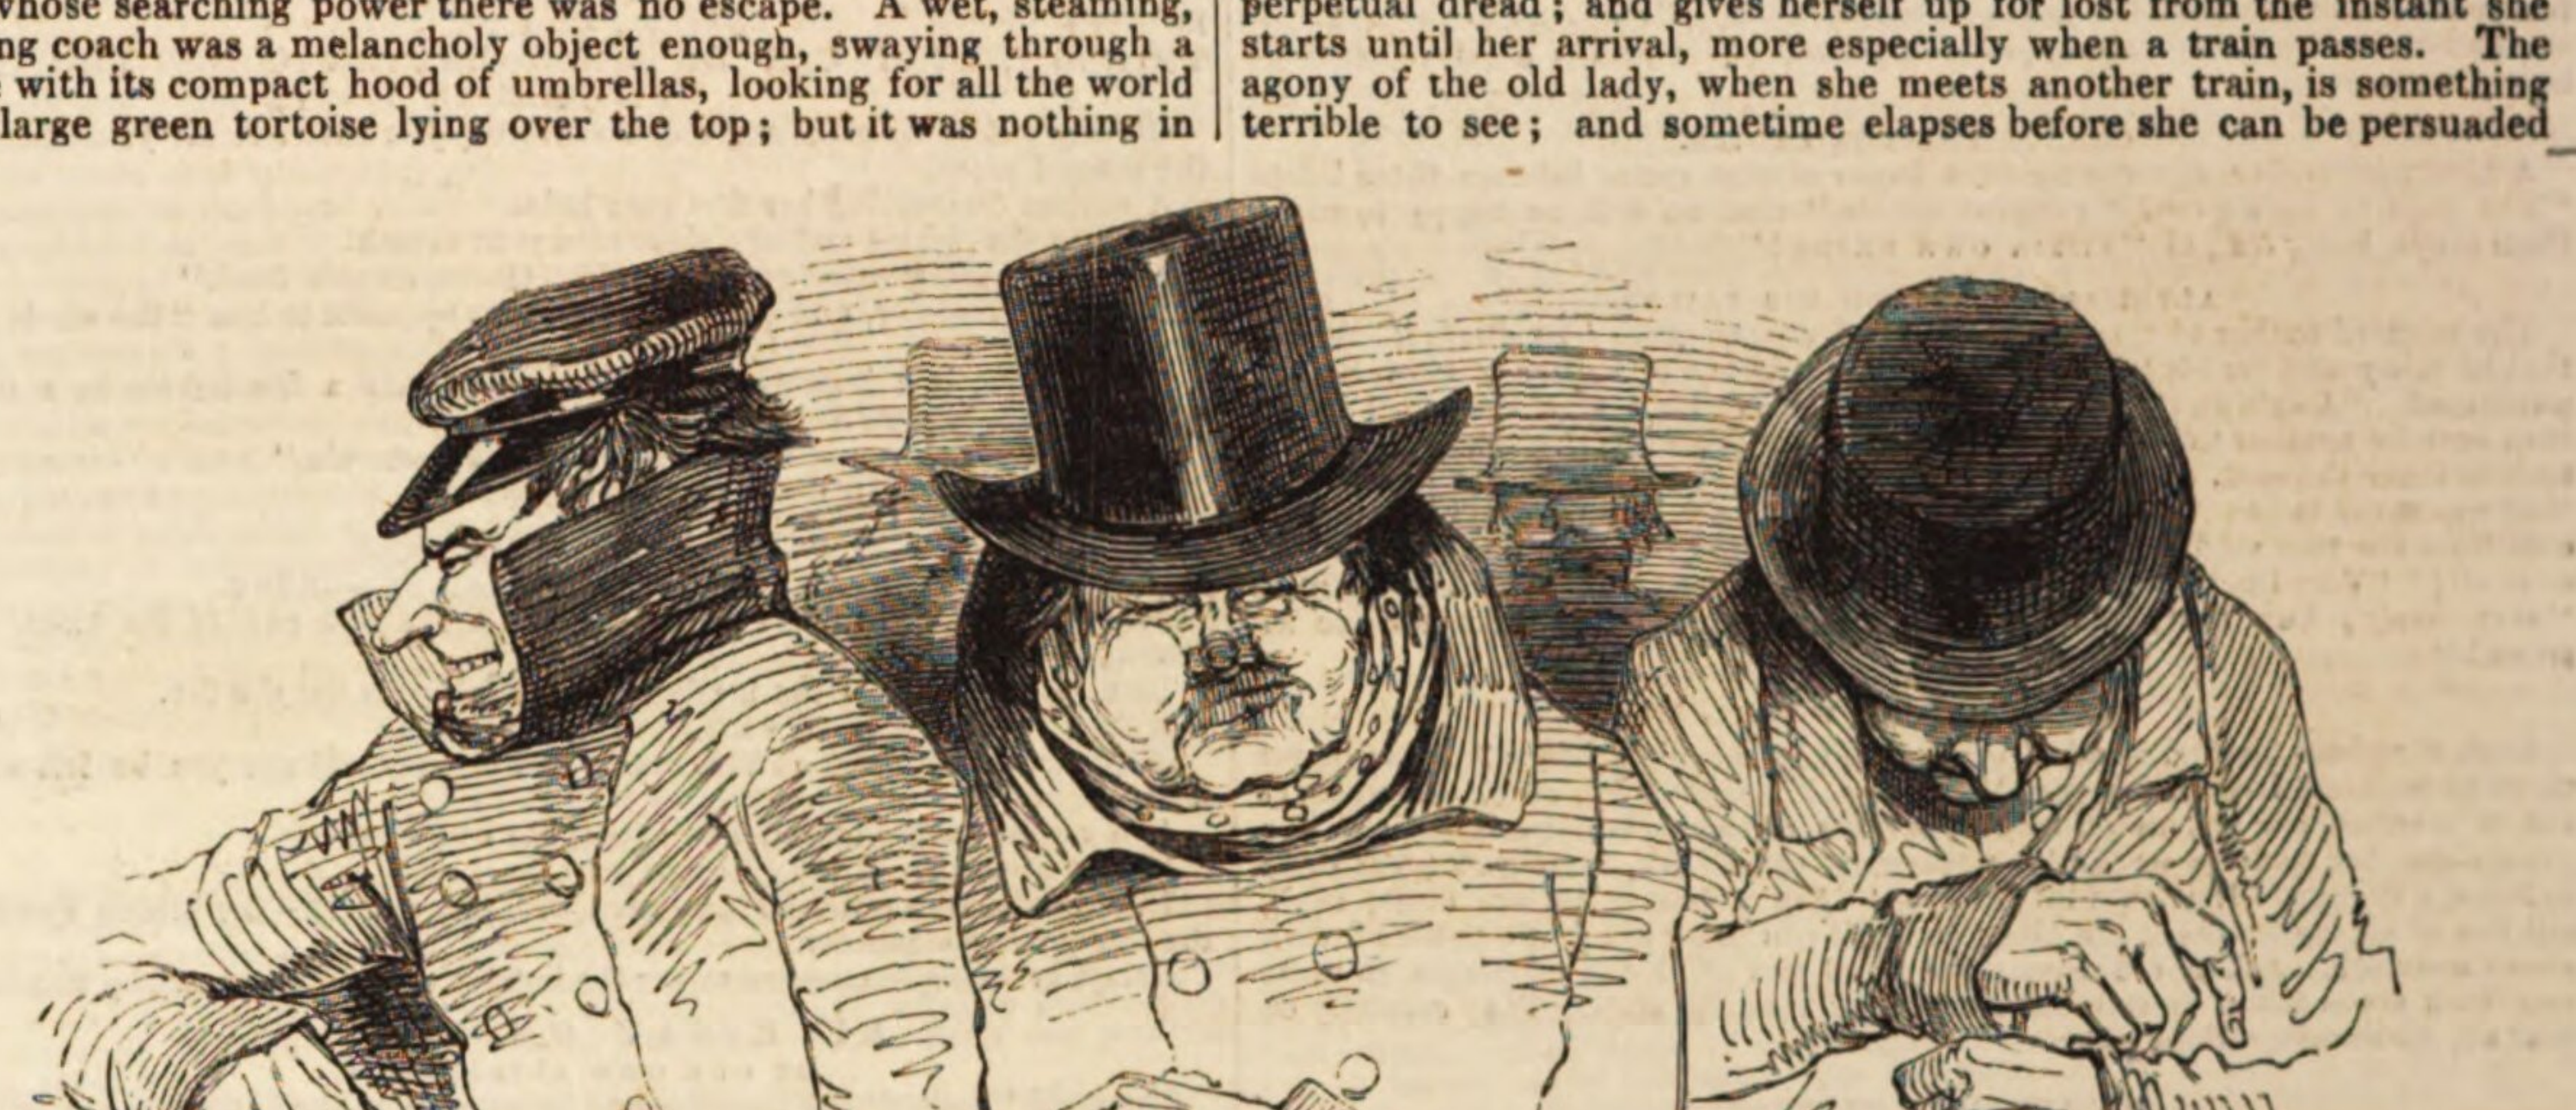
The bell rings, the door slams, the last newspaper is sold, and the train is off. The gentleman walks by the side of the carriage containing the Polka mantle, smiling and nodding alternately, to the end of the platform; the cars move out of sight, and ere long, another set of passengers are waiting as before.

Although comfortable enough, there is little sociability in a first-class carriage on a railway; everybody seems to have an idea that he is the only one who is really entitled, by payment and position, to a seat therein, and so is afraid of compromising his dignity by speaking. There is, consequently, no conversation: the heads of the four corner occupants are usually looking out of the windows, and the centre ones looking at each other. By the same rule, however, that you rarely see a pretty woman in an omnibus, so you scarcely meet with ordinary ones in a first-class carriage. Look at the group opposite to us. The old gentleman in the centre is deeply absorbed, looking neither to the right nor left; the young soldier finds, most unaccountably, that the view from the window on the other side, is far more attractive than on his own, and consequently keeps his gaze fixed in that direction; and the young lady must be putting mesmeric influence into action, and reading with her fingers, for her eyes are anywhere but on the page, and she has not turned over a leaf for five minutes: what can she be thinking about?

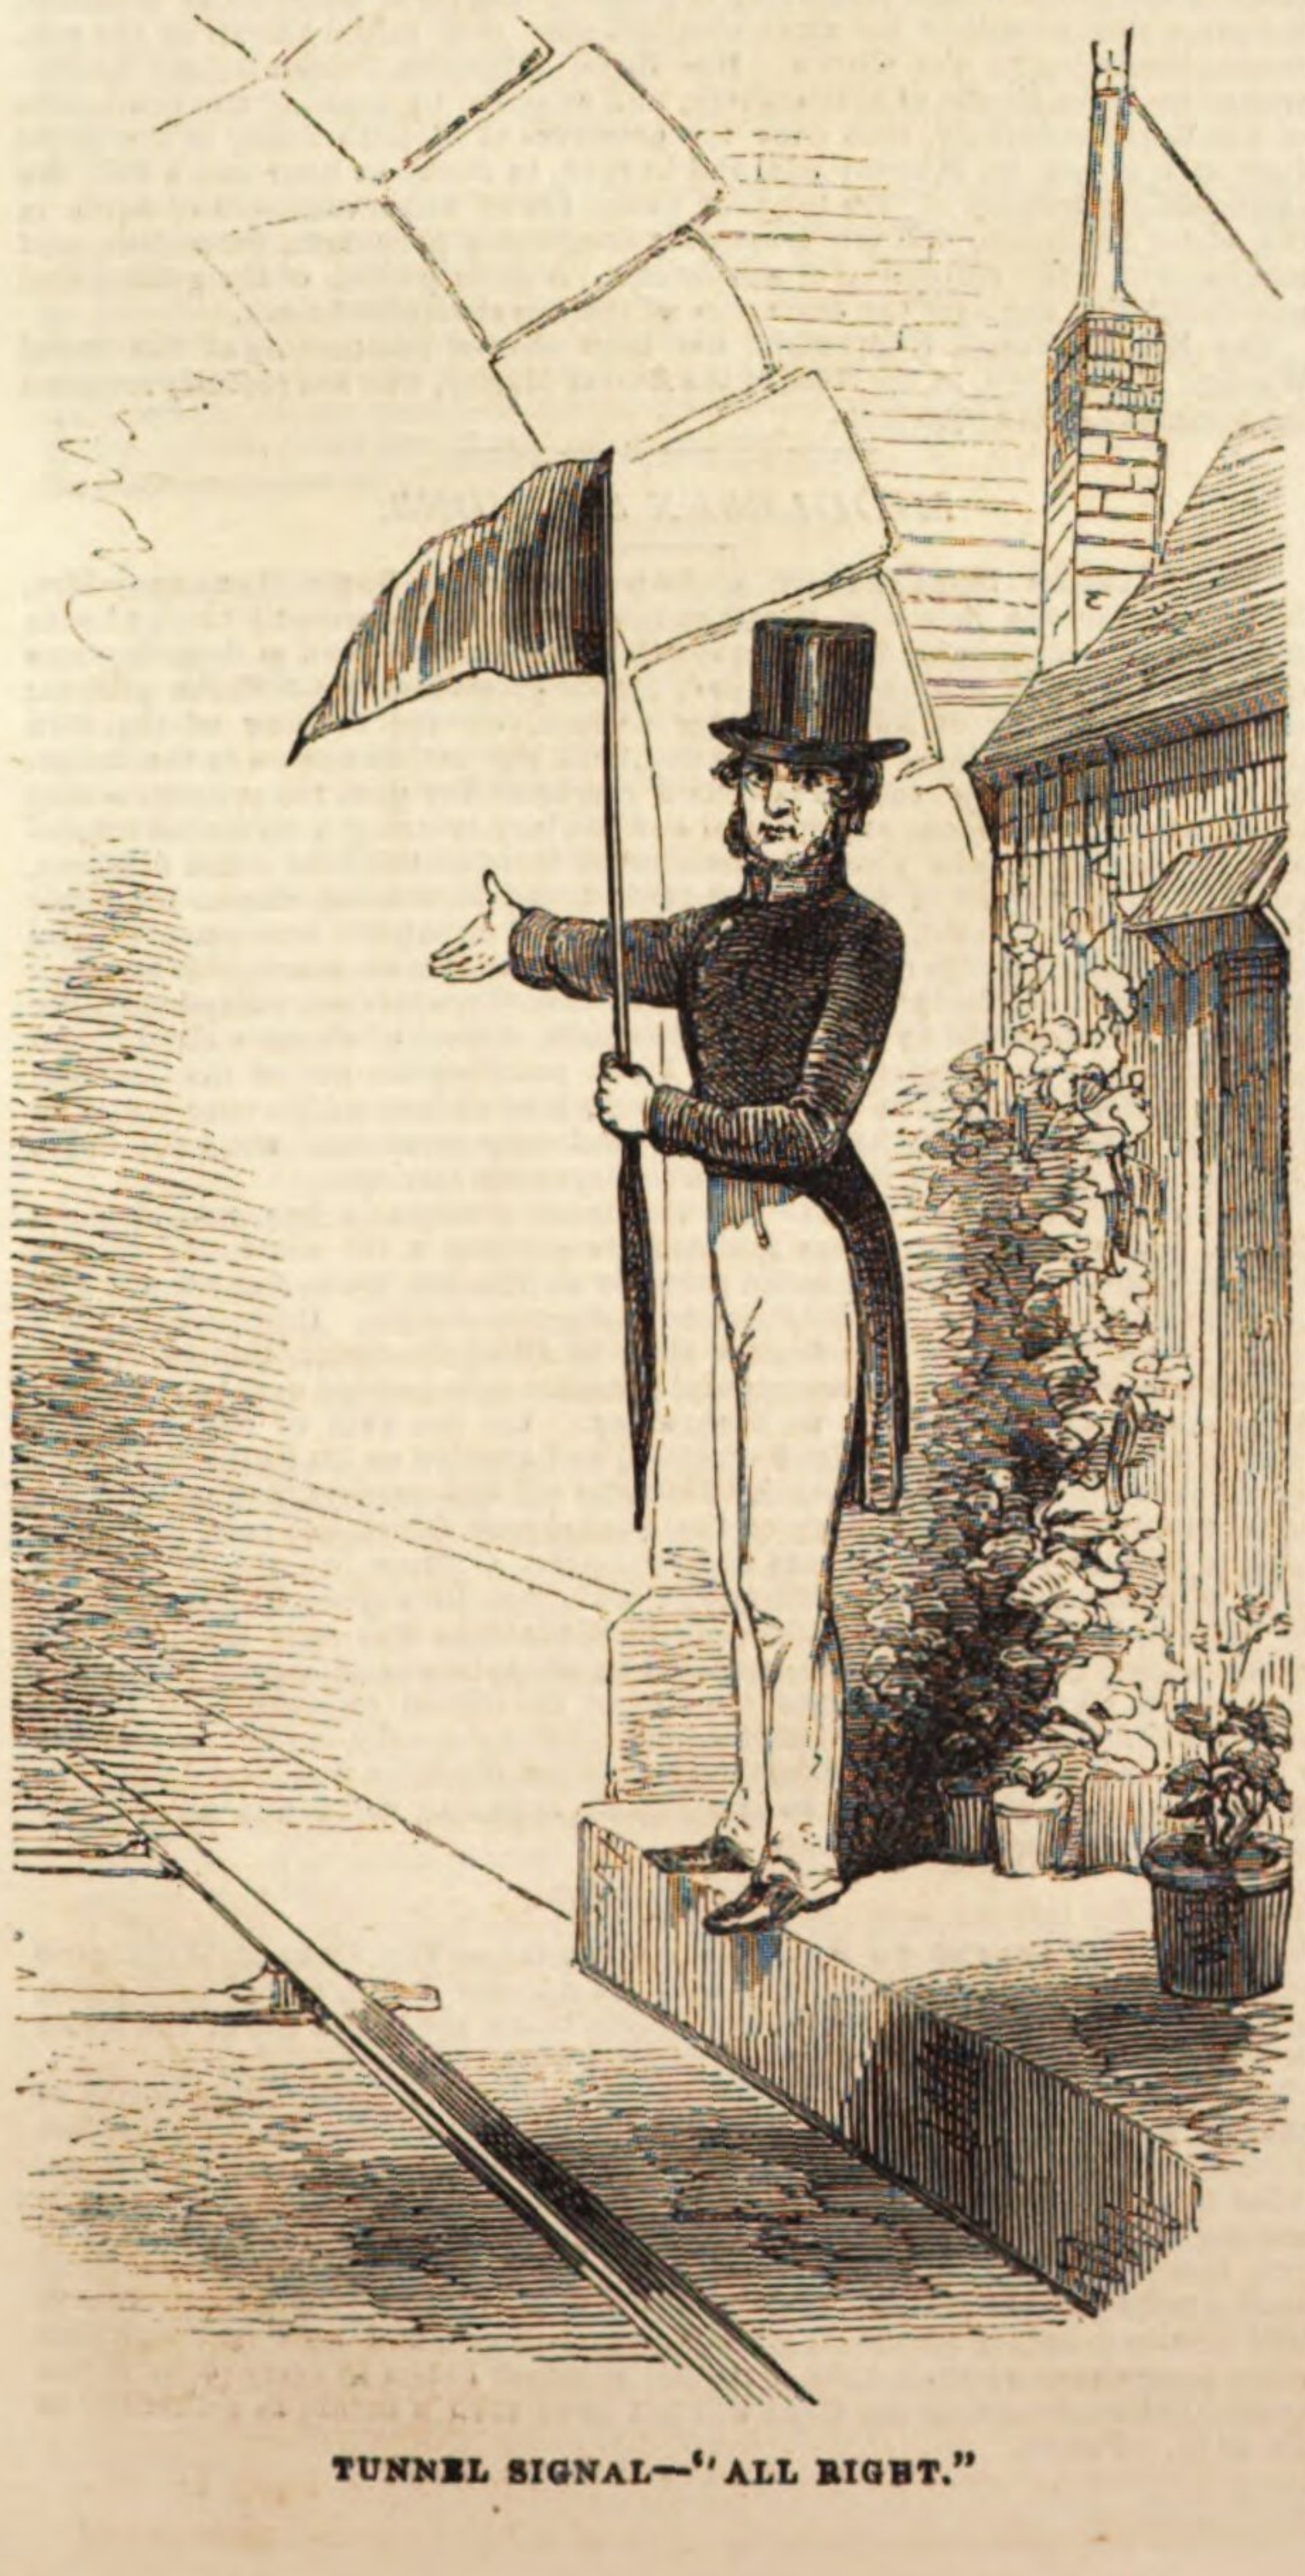
Your regular second-class travellers are deep fellows. They come early to get a back seat—or at all events, to sit with their backs to the engine. They watch the weathercocks, too, and make their selection of place according to the wind; and if it be warm weather, are chatty and communicative, especially as many of them are in the habit of meeting every day in the train. The chances are, that they will joke about the engine, calling it a horse, alluding to "a feed of coke," saying "poor creature!" when it whistles, and indulging in other facete observations: except on Monday afternoon, when the talk is purely agricultural, and about the state of the fields on the side of the line, being carried on by the farmers returning from Mark-lane. But in cold weather the second-class travellers talk but little. They wrap up the minute they get into the train, preparing for the worst; and after a few exchanged courtesies—lending an umbrella to the outsider, or spreading a cloak over two or three pairs of knees—you hear their voices no more.

The rattling pig-pens upon wheels, misnamed third-class carriages (before the late alterations), were despicable affairs, with the wonderful property of always meeting the rain in whatever quarter the wind might be blowing. They were a species of horizontal shower-bath, from whose searching power there was no escape. A wet, steaming, dripping coach was a melancholy object enough, swaying through a village with its compact hood of umbrellas, looking for all the world like a large green tortoise lying over the top; but it was nothing in forlorn appearance to an open car. There was no escaping the rain. If you turned your back to it, it filled the nape of your neck; if you faced it, you had overflowing pockets, with an additional cataract from the front rim of your hat, which before long was as limp as wet brown paper. Some rash people covered their heads with their handkerchiefs, but it came all the same, it was only prolonging the misery, as you did not know next where to put the handkerchief when you removed it. Everything was ruined from your health downwards, and these were called "cheap excursions."

Ten to one, but in the second class carriages you will find "the old lady." We particularise her thus, for she is nearly always there. You first find her in great distress about her box—which is a box unlike any ever seen before—at the omnibus. Then it is a source of the deepest trouble when she arrives at the terminus, because it will not go into any locker or under any seat; and is finally put in a remote van, where the old lady would like to go too, if she were not nervous. Her ideas of steam-power are limited; she looks upon the engine as something between clockwork and gunpowder, which keeps her in perpetual dread; and gives herself up for lost from the instant she starts until her arrival, more especially when a train passes. The agony of the old lady, when she meets another train, is something terrible to see; and sometime elapses before she can be persuaded that a dreadful accident has not happened and everybody is crushed. But she becomes somewhat tranquillised by the time she reaches the next station; and at every stoppage inquires of the local policeman and attendant time-keeper if her box is safe—they knowing nothing in the world about it—or looks sharply after every passenger who gets out, for fear he or she should walk off with it. Besides her box the old lady has usually a supplementary parcel of miscellaneous purchases, half crammed into an odd basket half tied up in a pocket handkerchief.



SECOND CLASS PASSENGERS.



TUNNEL SIGNAL—"ALL RIGHT."

Not the least source of wonder to us, on the railroad, are the various signals along the line. The mast-like bear-poles, with the letter O's and broad arrows at the top: the huge fans, and coloured bulls-eyes, like broken up chemist's windows, wandering along the line; the flags, and switches, and telegraphs are intensely mysterious. We have never been able to form the most remote or wildest notion as to their use or meaning, for nothing ever seems altered from the usual mode of progression in whatever state they are, and when we see the policeman, with upheld flag and extended arm pointing in the direction we are going, we rather incline to the belief that it is a sign of politeness on his part to welcome us into the tunnel, rather than any masonic understanding between the engineer, stoker, guards, and himself.

THE LONDON AND BRIGHTON RAILWAY.

Having glanced at the living characteristics of this very popular railway, let us introduce to our readers the details of the principal works upon the line.

Immediately upon the announcement of a railway to connect Brighton with the metropolis, there sprung up a very active competition, which must be fresh in the memory of many readers, with its lavish expense, its numerous pamphlets, reports, and counter-reports: one party for avoiding tunnels at the expense of favourable direction; another fearlessly adopting them for the sake of obtaining the shortest line and the easiest gradients. The Parliamentary contest lasted two sessions, and cost, for a considerable time, £1000 per diem!

The line selected by the Government engineer was that laid out by Sir John Rennie, which was known also as the direct line. Shortly after the passing of the act, it was greatly improved, in consequence of a minute survey by Mr. Rastrick, to whom its construction was intrusted, aided by other engineers. Owing to these preliminaries, the works were not actually commenced until July 12th, 1838; and, exactly three years after that date, the greater part of the line was opened, although many of the works are almost unrivalled for magnitude.

The entire railway is fifty miles and a half in length, thus bringing the Daphne of the metropolis (as Brighton has been classically termed) within the length of the shortest coach-road. The line traverses a considerable portion of the counties of Surrey and Sussex, and affords the passenger some charming prospects of Kent: so that in attractions for pleasure-trips it is scarcely equalled by either of the other metropolitan railways.

We will start from the quadruple terminus lately erected in a recess leading out of Tooley-street, near London-bridge. The structure is strikingly handsome, and has been engraved in our journal. We call this a quadruple terminus, because it serves for four railways—the Greenwich, the Dover, the Croydon, and the Brighton; the entrance to the latter being at the furthest corner of the building.

The remarkable connection of the four lines must be first briefly explained. Thus, for a short distance, there is but one line; then, the Croydon diverges to the right, forming to Croydon, also, the Brighton and Dover lines; from Croydon the last two depart, in undivided companionship, as far as Redhill, about 21 miles from London, where they separate, each to seek alone its respective destination.

Well—the train being fairly started, we bestow a parting glance at the Grammar School of St. Olave, a good specimen of Old English architecture, but most disadvantageously placed—and thus we leave the noble pile of offices reared on arches formed of upwards of 8,000,000 bricks. To the left, we look down upon one of the most singular districts in the vast capital of England—densely crowded with inhabitants, and buildings allotted to tanners and parchment-makers; there too are rope-makers' walks, and glue-makers' sheds; lofty chimneys, pointed gables, and flat smoky roofs; the whole scene diversified with plots of well-stocked garden-ground. Next we reach the timber viaduct leading to the Bricklayers' Arms terminus of the South Eastern Railway. To the left

EVENING MELODIES.—THE SERMON OF THE WOODS.

"Hark! how it broods o'er hill and brook,
That first autumnal blast;
Look on our charms once more! thou 'lt look
In vain when thou hear'st the last.

"Our bloom, that with early spring began,
With the coming gale must flee.
Is there nothing that thou shouldst do, O man,
Ere we bid farewell to thee?"

So murmured the leaf on the noble oak,
And the flower on the fragile stem;
But in wild and careless tones I spoke,
As thus I answered them:—

"Oh, leaves and flowers! if ye needs must die,
I will deeply mourn your fall;
And I'll press to my lips, with a plaintive sigh,
The last green leaf of all!

"And I'll take my harp where the rose grows dim,
And the yellow oak-bough waves:
Midst the solemn swell of a funeral hymn,
Ye shall go down to your graves."

But they whispered, "Not thus, O man, not thus Should thy farewell visit be:
The passing wind can make moan for us—
There are other thoughts for thee.

"Hast thou asked thy heart if thy mind is hushed
To a calmer, holier frame;
If passion's tears have less often gushed,
Than they did before we came?

"When thou turn'dst away from the freshening sod,
And the haunts of the woodland glen,
Hast thou felt more humbled before thy God,
More kind to thy fellow-men?

"There was ONE whose voice was in each lone grove,
In the hush of each quiet scene;
And HE spoke of a deep, calm, holy love—
Oh what has thine answer been!

"Of a love untainted, unconfined—
Of a love that should be giv'n
To the flowers, to the woods, to all mankind,
But most of all to Heav'n?"

Then thought I how, when all earth was fair,
This heart was far too wild
For aught like this to enter there;—
And I wept as a very child.

A NOVEL SPECIES OF PLEDGE.

The passion of George Frederick Cooke, the actor, for strong drink was so great, that when he was without money, or means of raising it, he has been known to go to a pawnbroker's, where he was in the habit of applying, and to say, "I want five guineas; but I have nothing to pledge but myself—give me the money, they'll be sure to redeem me when they want me." And having sent word to the theatre of his situation, he has frequently been found seated on the pawnbroker's counter with a duplicate pinned to his button-hole.—Ainsworth's Magazine.

ABERNETHY AND THE YANKEE CAPTAIN.

An American captain, on being one morning shown into Abernethy's consulting room, immediately, in Yankee fashion, emptied the contents of his mouth upon the floor. The man of medicine stared, keeping his hands in his pockets, according to custom, until the patient should explain. "What shall I do for my dyspepsy?" asked the American Captain. "Pay me your fee, and I'll tell you," replied the doctor. The money was produced, and this advice given, "Instead of squirting your saliva over my carpet, keep it to masticate your food with."

THE SIAMESE TWINS.

The New York Herald gives the following odd account of the Siamese Twins:—The Siamese Twins, who married two sisters in Wilkes county, North Carolina, some two years ago, have now each a daughter. They contemplate, with their wives and children, making a tour through this country in a year or two. The twins enjoy excellent health, are very lively, talkative, and apparnetly happy, and will doubtless prove more interesting and attractive in their second tour than they did in their first.

DO OBLIGE US FOR ONCE.

Parliament is announced to open on the 4th of February. Really, it would be a favour, Sir Robert, if you would put it off to the 29th.—Punch.

A STRANGE MARRIAGE.

Married at Moate Farrell (Ireland), last week, Polly M'Glynn, widow of the late Patrick White, James Gray, and John Hanley, at the early age of 89 years, to William Tuite, pig doctor in ordinary and dancing master extraordinary, at the youthful age of 84 years, after burying his fifth wife. Their combined ages make a total of 173 years, and ten marriages.

SIR WALTER SCOTT'S MEMORY.

The late Allan Cunningham spoke very partially of Scott, who was a great friend of his. I asked him if he credited the power of Scott's memory in reciting the whole of Campbell's "Pleasures of Hope" after a slight perusal of the manuscript. He doubted the truth, as Campbell and Scott were not intimate, being opposite in political opinions. He, however, fully believed in Scott's ability to do so. His friend, James Hogg, he said, told him, that when reciting one of his own ballads to Sir Walter Scott he stuck fast and could not proceed. Scott said to him, "I'll try, Jamie, if I can recollect it." With this he went through the whole of the ballad, though it was three years since he heard it.—Tweddels's Yorkshire Miscellany.

WARMTH OF THE INTERIOR OF THE EARTH.

The increase of the temperature observed in mines is about one degree Fahrenheit for every fifteen yards of descent; and, should the increase go on in the same ratio, water will boil at the depth of 2,430 yards. Lead would melt at the depth of 8,400 yards. Everything would be red hot at the depth of seven miles. Gold would melt at the depth of twenty-one miles; cast iron, at the depth of seventy-four miles; soft iron, at the depth of ninety-seven miles. And at the depth of one hundred miles there must be a temperature equal to the greatest artificial heat yet observed.

CHANCE FOR THE LADIES.

A Liverpool furrier, advertising in a paper of that town, informs those ladies "who wish to have a really genuine article," that he will be happy to make them muffs, boas, &c., of "THEIR OWN SKINS!"

ALPHONSE KARR AND HIS TAILOR.

The talented author of "Les guèpes" and various other jeux d'esprit—relates that he lately sent for his tailor to make him a coat out of a piece of cloth he had purchased. "Can't do it," said the tailor; "there isn't stuff enough." Karr then sent for another tailor, wh,o after carefully measuring the material, undertook to make the coat. In due time the garment was delivered, and Karr's first visit was to the tailor. "Me voila malheureux!" said he; "behold me in the coat from the very stuff you said was insufficient! you see there was stuff enough after all!" "Very likely," said the man of measures, with imperturbable sang froid, "very likely; but the son of the tailor who made it is NOT SO BIG AS MINE!"

SKETCH OF THE WOMEN.

Ain't it curious, squire, wedd n' is never out of women's heads? They never think of nothin' else. A young gal is always thinkin' of her own. As soon as she is married, she is a match-makin' for her companions; and when she is a grain older, her darter's weddin' is uppermost agin. Oh, it takes a great study to know a woman. How cunnin' they are! Ask a young gal the news, she'll tell you of all the deaths in the place, to make you think she don't trouble herself about marriage. Ask an old woman she'll tell you of all the marriages, to make you think she is takin' an interest in the world that she ain't. They certainly do beat all, do women.—Sam Slick.

AN AMERICAN PROPHECY.

The American papers were some time since prodigiously occupied with what they term Millerism, (not Joe Millerism), but a prophecy of a second advent, which was to precede the end of the world, which was to take place in October. The following is a copy of a placard pasted on the door of a tailor's shop in Fifth street, Philadelphia—"This shop is closed in honour of the King of Kings, who will appear about the 22d of this October." In another paragraph the writer says—"Get ready, friends, to crown him Lord of All." The destruction spoken of was to occur through the agency of a hail-storm, the stones to be about sixty-three pounds in weight.

CARROTS A SUBSTITUTE FOR EGGS IN PUDDINGS.

It is not generally known, and will not, perhaps be credited, that boiled carrots, when properly prepared, form an admirable succedanenm for eggs in the making of puddings. They must, for this purpose, be well boiled and mashed, and afterwards passed through a coarse cloth, or horsehair sieve. A pudding composed partly of the above material will be found to be considerably lighter than if the same had been made with eggs, and will impart a far more grateful and agreeable flavour.

A DEATH BED.

Louis IX., in his dying moments, caused himself to be removed from his couch, and placed upon ashes. In this situation he expired.—Crowe's France.

COMMERCIAL CURIOSITY.

A gentleman, near Aylesbury, has in his possession a Bank of England note for sixpence, issued in the year 1700, of which the following is an exact copy:—

No. 165.

I promise to pay to T. Caddel, or bearer, on demand, the summe of sixpence.—London, 8th day of May, 1700.

For the Governor and Company of the Bank of England.

——6d. JOHN WAGE.

The sum of fifty guineas has been offered for this curiosity.

SWEDISH CUSTOM.

The old Swedish custom of announcing each hour with a trumpet from the church steeple, and singing a song, to assure the people that no conflagration is to be observed, is still kept up at Upsala, and in all the ancient towns of Sweden.—James's Tour.

THE ROMAN ARENA.

The place where the gladiators fought in the Coliseum was called Arena, because it was covered with sand or sawdust, to prevent the combatants from sliding, and to absorb the blood.

VOLTAIRE IN ENGLAND.

Voltaire, during his sojourn amongst us from 1726 to 1729, published his Essays on the Civil Wars in France, and on Epic poetry, subjects connected with his "Henriade," as well as the dedication of that poem in English, his knowledge of which, then little cultivated in France, he perverted into an engine of detraction against our stage. In 1773, in his eightieth year, on receiving from the late Joseph Craddock, a copy of the tragedy of "Zobeide," partly derived from "Les Scythes," one of the feeble productions of the patriarch's old age, the homage was thus acknowledged, embodied in a complimentary letter not at present in Voltaire's published correspondence:—

"Thanks to your muse, a foreign copper shines, Turned into gold and coined in sterling lines."

LITERATURE.

THE COMIC ALMANACK FOR 1845.

Cruikshank's plates to this very lively brochure are, as heretofore, its paramount attraction. The subjects chosen by this prince of graphic humourists are germane to the month; and, to the extent of our recollection, as novel as they were in the first year of this Almanack. Thus we have "Twelfth Night" for January; "Valentine's Day" for February; "The Day after St. Patrick's Day" for March, &c. "Going to St. Paul's" (June), affords the artist a treat—for, his spare charity-schoolboys, contrasted with the well-fed authorities, are admirable. Probably, the best plate, however, is "Boxing Night—A Picture in a National Gallery" (December): the variety of expression in the several faces, during a melée fight, are such as only Cruikshank could depict: the mixed fright and pugnacity of the holiday audience (?) are most ludicrously pourtrayed; in this class of subjects the artist still remains unapproached. Another excellent plate is "The Fall of the Leaf" (October), a dinner-table upset; but the poet shall tell his own story:—

THE FALL OF THE LEAF.

Mister and Mistress Henry Brown
Were in society but young beginners;
And their ambition was to gain renown,
By giving very nice récherché dinners.
It was their boast, they used to say,
Not to attempt a great display;
In a small house it would have been misplaced,
Therefore they merely aimed at perfect taste.
It was a standing joke with Mister Brown—
A joke in which he hated to be foiled—
That there could be no other house in town
Where taste so ruled that roast—ay, and the boiled.
'Twas the commencement of the autumn season,
After some time in his own mind reviewing it,
Brown gave a dinner, simply for the reason
That few—except himself—would think of doing it.
A London dinner-party in September,
Brown did opine, was something out of the common line;
A sort of thing to talk of and remember.
The arrangements having been completed,
The guests are round the table seated;
Of turtle-soup each one had got a plate—
Some one remarked the summer had been brief—
"Yes!" Brown exclaimed, "'tis in the season late,
We must be looking for the fall of the leaf."
He'd scarcely said the words, when, with a crash,
Down came the dinner-table flap,
Sending some iced sauterne, with sudden splash,
Into his lady's lap.
Fish, water-bottles, knives and forks, épergnes,
Came rattling down upon her all in turns:
The sudden movement no one could control—
A slice of bread went off into a roll.
Decanters seemed disposed to fall,
As if they'd had a drop too much;
And stoppers never stopped at all—
In fact, refused to act as such.
'Twas a mishap, and yet, the truth to tell,
Mister and Mistress Brown both had their wish;
They hoped the dinner would go off all well,
And so it did go off—ay, every dish!

From among the miscellanies, we quote a few specimens, which is very pleasant quizzing of some of the hobbies of the day: they are truly piquant:—

GARDENING FOR LADIES.

THE MAMMA'S CALENDAR FOR JULY.

Your daughters now demand your serious attention. Dress and plant them in rows for evening parties. Weed poor relations. Sift Debrett's peerage well through, and do your best to nail the oldest branches. Lay traps for bets at races, and hoe young gentlemen for gloves. Calculate the advantages of foreign, as compared with English husbandry, and cultivate whichever promises to turn out best. Remove younger daughters to the nursery, and towards the 30th transplant young sprigs to narrow beds at preparatory schools. Cut your box at the opera, and look forward to Spa watering for the autumn. Trim your old man well, if he does not come out handsomely: if the trimming should fail, forcing must be resorted to. Put your frames in muslin bags, and cart away loose furniture to the Pantechnicon. Graft slips on window-panes, labelled "To Let," and harrow your servants with board wages. Clear out your husband's purse, or, if he is rather backward this year, transplant him to back kitchen; and, screening yourselves from exposure, drill policemen to say, "The family have gone out of town."

THINGS WHICH CAN BE MUCH BETTER CONCEIVED THAN DESCRIBED.

Getting out of an omnibus, and discovering you have left all your money on the mantel-piece.

A woman discovering her first grey hair.

Putting the lighted end of a cigar into your mouth.

A person's indignation on being told "Queen Anne's dead."

Meeting a creditor, and being obliged to sit opposite to him "the whole way" in an omnibus.

Being asked, in a drawing-room of ladies, to take a few tickets in a raffle—"the ticket only a guinea!"

Breaking your strap in the pas seul in "La Pastorale."

The wine at a public dinner.

CHINESE PROVERBS.

DRAWN FROM BO-HE AND SUE-CHONG.

Never do anything hastily: remember it is the last cup of tea which is the strongest.

Be not too prodigal: the kettle when too full puts out the fire.

A little scandal is to tea what an olive is to wine.

Butter not your bread on both sides, lest in your old age you be left without bread to butter.

It is a wise washerwoman who knows her own twankay.

Measure your green according to your black.

Happy is he who can take the rough with the smooth—the strong hyson with the fine pearl gunpowder.

Delays are dangerous—remember the hottest toast will get cold by standing.

AN ESSAY ON COMETS.

BY OUR OWN ASTRONOMER.

The word "comet" has been derived by some from the Latin coma, a tail; but the better derivation is comma, because it never can come to a full stop.

Every comet has a tail, or train, which may be compared to some of those monster trains which are occasionally the subjects of newspaper paragraphs.

What a comet is we do not exactly know. It is certainly an eccentric body, but there are so many eccentric bodies in these days, that this hypothesis affords us no assistance.

A comet has a curious propensity to cut and come again, at very long intervals.

Astronomers talk of the mean distance of a comet from the earth, but as no comet ever came nearer than several thousands of miles, which is anything but a mean distance, we should be glad to know the meaning the astronomers attach to the word alluded to.

The comet of 1770 has very shamefully broken its appointments with the astronomers, and shown a degree of unpunctuality, which is no less perplexing than it is unbusiness-like. The comet ought to have entered an appearance, according to the law of comets, every five years and a-half; but the eccentric body has been non inventus ever since, and we should be glad to see it regularly outlawed from the solar system.

Comets are generally called periodical bodies because their tails are so exceedingly lengthy, like those which are continued from month to month in some of the periodicals. They differ, however, in one respect, the former being very luminous, and the latter utterly destitute of brilliancy.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

If this weather should last, "a hunting we will go" must cease for a time to be the chorus of your lover of woodcraft. Already we have had a succession of dry days that would alone jeopardy the chase; but added to these we now have frost—and the ground rings under the hoof like bell-metal. The late Lord Forester used to say, "as soon as I awake at Melton, I listen, and if I hear the sound of pattens, I jump out of bed, and into my boots, for I know it's a hunting morning." A friend of ours cannot look on while the streets are being watered without a shudder—it is too painfully prophetic of drought—

"The fallows dusty, and the furrows dry—
That sight ungrateful to a sportsman's eye.

Still, albeit for the present the prospects of the fox-hunter are not genial, we will not close our article without putting before him an antidote to blue devils and frost of the cerulean nose—a stretch of the whereabouts of a pack, we beseech him, for Diana's sake, to taste the quality of the first open day.

During the week, there were several coursing meetings—the only one of account being the Champion meeting at Newmarket. The Allington Hill afforded plenty of racing, but no very superior sport, in consequence of the hares being bad. All the leading coursers of the south sent their dogs to this favourite rendezvous, as also a few of the northern magnates of the leash. Lord Stradbroke was the Napoleon of the long tails. The chief sporting issue of the last six days, however, was the tryst on Monday, at Tattersall's, by command of the Jockey Club, for the settlement of the late Mr. Crockford's Derby book; the terms being, that on the giving of a guarantee to pay the late St James's-street millionaire's bets, by the representatives, that they should be entitled to receive, and that all those, his debtors, who should neglect such order, would be pronounced defaulters, and dealt with as such. Now it's no joke for your legs or professional gentlemen of the ring to have the bread—which means the turtle and punch, the venison and champagne—taken out of their mouths, which would inevitably be the result of closing the subscription rooms at Hyde-park Corner and Newmarket against them. For this reason many of them attended to pay, though with a very bad grace—which, indeed, is the general fashion of their liquidation—in losses of honour. The necessary undertaking on the part of the Crockford party not being forthcoming, of course there was nothing done—save that smiles lit up certain grim visages, in lieu of the frowns that previously shut out the light of their countenances. It is time the true state of turf law on this point was laid down in the books. An extra regulation ought to be added to the existing rules and orders of the Jockey Club, declaring the practice to the letter. The justice, the spirit of such a law must be against the precedent sought to be established in the case of Mr. Crockford's book. The winners on that account were without a remedy—are without a remedy, should the representatives of his estate think fit not to recognize their claims—a course they may adopt without any breach of personal honour, which would not have been the state of the question, had the principal survived over the settling day. Why should one party have an option and the other none? Clearly, if the balance of Mr. Crockford's book be on the wrong side, his residuary legatee or legatees, would have cause of action against the executors who might part with money for the purpose of paying non-liabilities—clearly nobody ought to be called upon to pay irresponsible persons. This is our view of the matter—but as Sir James Graham isays, it is an affair in which all people must take care of themselves.

And now a word of advice in anticipation of the thaw. There are among our readers youths of enterprise, and adults of sporting spirit; to such of these as may never have seen the Duke of Beaufort in the field we write with all the emphasis of type and steam-press—lose no time to do so. There is a railroad that will convey you to Badminton, after a town breakfast, if you be a metropolitan—hot water to fetch you from Timbuctoo to Gloucestershire. If antiquity or descent should regulate the precedence of fox-hounds, then none in the world should rank before the Badminton kennel. Some of their performances in the field have never been excelled, rarely equalled in the annals of the chase. Of the princely style in which their noble owner turns out, and the truly regal fashion of all his sporting arrangements, there would not be room to speak were there necessity. But these are household words with the fox-hunters—that their truth may be tested, let the reader give them tryst at any of the following places, and judge for himself.

TATTERSALL'S.

MONDAY.—A considerable number of town and country subscribers put in an appearance this afternoon, under an impression that something would be done towards closing the late Mr. Crockford's accounts on the Derby. They were grievously disappointed; no one came forward with the required guarantee; no one attended on the part of Mrs. Crockford, and no money was paid either one way or the other; ergo, there are no defaulters, and the Stewards of the Jockey Club will be saved the disagreeable necessity of attempting to enforce a mandate which they must have issued with very considerable misgivings. As there was no attempt at agitation (this, we fear, will be left to the lawyers) business proceeded rather briskly on coming events at the following quotations:—

Nothing new turned up, but it may be remarked, that Idas, Young Eclipse (is he Lord George Bentinck's after all? it is so suspected!), Pam, and Anti-Repealer, the lions of Monday's betting, were again in considerable estimation, but without any change of position; the outside betting was also in keeping with the previous quotations. MR. CROCKFORD'S ACCOUNT.—We understand that a gentleman of long standing on the turf will produce the requisite guarantee on Monday next, and that the following Monday will be fixed for the settlement of the account. You may "Call spirits from the vasty deep," &c., &c., says Shakspeare, but will they come?——nous verrons.

EXTRAORDINARY SPORT IN THE ROYAL PRESERVES, AT WINDSOR.—In consequence of the great care which has been bestowed, during several months past, in the breeding and preserving of game in the royal domains at Windsor, the game this season is far more plentiful than ever before known on the preserves belonging to the Crown. His Royal Highness Prince Albert, accompanied by Duke Ernest of Wirtemberg, and attended by some of the gentlemen of the Royal household, shot over the preserves at Flemish Farm, in the Great Park at Windsor, on Monday last, and bagged, in about an hour and a half, the extraordinary number of 210 head of game, 110 of which consisted of hares in the finest condition, and the remainder comprising pheasants, partridges, and rabbits, with a fair sprinkling of woodcocks. A great portion of the game killed was distributed amongst the domestics of the Royal establishment.

MIDDLESEX SESSIONS.

THE ALLEGED ROBBERY BY A LADY, AT THE SOHO BAZAAR.—Mrs. Jane Tyrwhit, the lady who, it will be remembered, was recently charged with stealing a telescope, value 2s. 6d., at the Soho Bazaar, was tried at these Sessions on Thursday. The charge on the part of the prosecutor was that the prisoner entered the Bazaar at half-past four o'clock, on the evening of the 25th ult., and after purchasing a thermometer, took the article named in the indictment. Numbers of persons of rank and respectability gave the prisoner a very high character for honour and probity, and the jury returned a verdict of acquittal. Mrs. Tyrwhit, who generally manifested through the trial much firmness, became deeply affected at hearing the verdict, and in a voice, almost inaudible from emotion, she said, "Before God I declare my entire innocence."—The Learned Assistant-Judge: Any protestation of innocence on your part is uncalled for. The jury have declared you innocent. Mrs. Tyrwhit then walked from the dock, and was received by a number of friends, several of whom walked down from the bench to congratulate her. Upon reaching the hall of the Court on her way to her carriage, she was received with loud cheers, which were taken up by those outside on Clerkenwell-green, and were continued until she drove away, accompanied by her friends in their respective carriages.

ANOTHER LEGAL SUBTLETY.—At the same sessions, a boy named John Bamin, aged thirteen years, was indicted for stealing a till containing various moneys, which were described as the property of Thomas Wells and others. The circumstances of the case were of rather a singular nature. It appeared that a person named Sweetman, who kept a shop in Charlotte-street, Fitzroy-square, became bankrupt, when his property and premises were handed over to the keeping of one of the messengers in bankruptcy. On the 28th of November the prisoner entered the shop of Mr. Sweetman, and crawled on his hands and knees behind the counter, from whence he took the till and moneys, and tried to get out of the shop. The messenger of the Bankruptcy Court, however, heard the noise, and took the prisoner into custody.—Mr. O'Brien, on the part of the prisoner, contended that the indictment could not be supported, inasmuch as the property was described as belonging to Wells, who was only the trade assignee, whilst, in point of law, the moment an assignee was appointed to a bankrupt's estate all the property became vested in the official assignee, who, in this case, was Mr. Groome. The learned counsel having quoted several authorities in support of his position, the Court held that the objection was fatal to the indictment, and directed the jury to bring in an acquittal, which was accordingly done, and the prisoner left the bar.

FRIENDLY WARNING TO REBELLIOUS JERSEY.—The Duke of Wellington is in a terrible passion with the Jerseyans. He declares if they do not keep quiet, he will send them a dozen pioneers with orders to dig the island out of the ocean an bring the earth up to London to fill flower-pots.—Punch.

THE WOODEN WALLS OF ENGLAND.—A newspaper paragraph informs us that "if an acorn be left for some weeks suspended by a string over the surface of some water contained in a hyacinth-glass, it will throw down long roots, whilst its stem will rise upwards, and become decorated with leaves." This is cheering to know, as the British navy need never be in want of timber as long as there is a hyacinth-glass and a bit of twine left in the kingdom. The idea of growing oaks in a second-pair-back is so rich to us, that we intend to-morrow to plant four-and-twenty acorns on all our mantel-pieces, and have no doubt that in less than a year we shall have a perfect Windsor Forest in every room in the house. Let us hope that the Oaks will not be of such a nature as eventually to take us in.—Punch.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

Fatal Coach Accident.—On Saturday an accident, attended with fatal consequences, occurred near to the entrance of the town of Beaconsfield, Buckinghamshire, to the Prince of Wales Oxford coach. The coach left the Bull Inn, Holborn, at eight o'clock on Saturday morning, driven by Mr. William Taplin, one of the proprietors. At Uxbridge the horses were changed, and the coach proceeded on towards Beaconsfield, having at that time only two passengers outside, an aged couple, who had a few days previously come up from Oxford. Just as the coach was ascending the hill at the entrance of Beaconsfield, the leader shied at a short white post at the side of a ditch, and at the same instant the reins broke, by which Mr. Taplin lost all command over the horses; they drew the coach up a bank, and it was overturned. Mr. Taplin and both passengers were thrown to the ground with great force, and, when picked up, the two passengers were found to be in a state of insensibility. Mr. Taplin had three of his fingers broken, and his nose and face were most seriously cut and bruised. The male passenger had sustained serious injuries of the head, and his wife had her collar bone fractured, injury of the ribs, &c. The male passenger lingered until between 12 and 1 o'clock on Sunday morning, when he died. Mr. Taplin is recovering from his injuries.

The Suicide of the Two Lovers.—It having been reported that the bodies of the unfortunate couple would be interred in one grave, on Sunday afternoon, in Beaumont Cemetery, Stepney, a large concourse of persons of both sexes assembled to witness the sad, though novel, ceremony. They, however, were somewhat disappointed, as the relatives of the ill-fated young woman objected, notwithstanding her dying wish, to laying her remains with those of her deceased suitor. The parochial officers expressed a hope that the bodies should not be buried together, as such a proceeding might be calculated to give a kind of countenance to such tragedies. Accordingly the body of the female was, on Saturday afternoon, consigned to its final resting-place in Globe-fields burial-ground, Globe-road, Mile-end. The funeral was kept strictly private. On Sunday afternoon the body of the young man was privately interred in Beaumont's Cemetery. It has not been noticed that a box belonging to the young man was broken open, and all the letters which the poor girl had sent to him were found secured in an envelope, with the following superscription:—"Anguish and sorrow. The inclosed letters were given to me by my dear Elizabeth. Let them be a living monument of my cruelties, and as a memento of grief—(signed)—C. A. D."

Two Lives Lost on the South Eastern Railway.—A great sensation was caused at Dover on Wednesday night, by a report that two lives had been lost in one of the tunnels between Dover and Folkstone. Upon enquiry it was found to be too true: the sufferers were George Coveney and Edward Jackson; both have left wives, and, it is believed, families. The deceased were employed as labourers on the South Eastern Railway, near the Warren, and when the accident happened, were on their way home from work. They were in the Abbots Cliff Tunnel, and probably were walking on the rails. The up-train which leaves Dover 40 minutes past 5, passed them; and it is supposed that from the noise and smoke they neither saw nor heard the down-train, which should reach Dover at 26 minutes past 5, enter the tunnel; in consequence of which they were knocked down by the engine, and the train passed over the bodies and killed them. The scalp of Jackson's head was dreadfully torn, and was lying on his breast; indeed, both bodies were severely lacerated. The bodies have been brought into Dover, and notice given to the coroner.

Fatal Accident on the Blackburn and Preston Railway.—On Tuesday afternoon an accident occurred at King's Bank, Hoghton-bottoms, on the new line of railway now constructing between Blackburn and Preston, by which one man was killed, another so seriously injured that he is not expected to recover, and a third much hurt, though not to a dangerous extent. It appears that the line at King's Bank goes through a pretty deep cutting at the side of a hill, and the deceased, with the two others, were engaged in making the cutting, and were at the time of the accident at work between the hill side and a waggon. They were just about to leave work for the day, when a large portion of the upper part of the hill, it is calculated to the extent of nine or ten tons, gave way, falling upon and burying the men beneath. Assistance was immediately procured, and when the unfortunate men had been extricated from their position, it was found that one of them must have been crushed to death against the waggon instantaneously. The second was injured to a very dangerous extent, and his life is despaired of. The third, we are happy to state, was much less hurt, and it is hoped that he will speedily recover from the effects of the accident. Every possible assistance was rendered to the survivors. As a proof of the narrow escape the third man must have had, we may mention that a snuff-box, which was in one of his pockets, was completely crushed. The deceased was about eighteen or nineteen years of age. This is the second accident which has happened at this place.

Fire in the New Road.—Early on Wednesday morning a fire broke out upon the premises of Mr. Treeby, builder, Milton-street, New-road. In a short time there were in attendance six engines. The fire burned most brilliantly, the glare being distinctly seen from the bridges. Abundance of water being at hand, the engines were soon got to work, but not a vestige of stock or building, except the walls, could be saved. The occupier is insured in the Phœnix. The cause of the fire is not known, no one being in the house at the time of the outbreak.

Shocking Death.—Last week two women had occasion to go up Llangattock mountain (Breconshire), and one of them took her little girl with her, who, by some means or other, unfortunately got separated from her mother, and on account of the density of the fog, the night passed without any trace of her being discovered. On the following morning, however, she was found in a sitting posture, with her hands crossed over her bosom, quite dead.

Army Movements.—The following removals of troops are ordered to take place:—The 56th Foot from Ireland to England, the depôt of the 14th Foot from Ireland to England, and the 67th Foot from England to Ireland. The 72nd Foot embarked at Cork for Gibraltar, on the 27th ult.

Extensive Sale of Acorns.—Curiosity has been rife in Godalming during the last few weeks to account for the very extensive demand which has taken place for acorns. One individual, it is said, has been commissioned to buy up no less than 2000 bushels at 1s. per bushel, and so great is the competition for the article, that pig-keepers are quite unable to keep pace with the rise in price. Some suppose that they are wanted as a substitute for bark in tanning leather, while others, no less wise, hint that they are to be used for adulterating coffee. Be this as it may, they are all sent off as quickly as purchased, to London, there to be made some use of.

EPITOME OF NEWS—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

On Tuesday week was caught in a net in the Thames, between Pangbourn and Mapledurham, by Mr. Ford's fishermen, a fine jack, in capital condition, and weighing nearly 30lb. This same fish has often afforded sport to the angler, many marks of the hook being apparent in his mouth, and one eye is destroyed.

The King of Sweden whilst waiting for the legislative modification of the criminal code, has issued an ordonnance ameliorating the application of corporal punishment as far as the army is concerned. His Majesty abolishes altogether the punishment of the stick, which was both cruel and brutalising, and substitutes for it a few blows on the back with the flat part of the sword, rather by way of degradation than otherwise, or in certain cases a number of stripes with a rod, never to exceed 25.

The law officers of the Crown have given their opinion that the words of the Mutiny Act exempt, as they were intended to exempt, all military officers in uniform dress or undress, and their horses, from the payment of toll when passing through turnpike-gates or bridges erected by the authority of Parliament.

On Monday night, about eight o'clock, the northern lights, which are looked upon as the prognostics of a severe winter, were visible for a considerable time in the neighbourhood of Islington, Kingsland, Hackney, &c. A deep red glare was first observed at the west, and then slowly moved toward the east.

The Senate and College of the Ancients of Hamburg have declared in favour of emancipating the Jews. What principally decided the two highest bodies in the state to consent to this act of justice was the consideration of the immense sacrifices which the Jews of Hamburg have made to succour the numerous victims of the fire of 1842, and the spirit of patriotism and charity with which that body has been animated for a long series of years. The emancipation of the Jews will be, it is said, complete, except that they cannot form part of the Senate.

The same journal adds that the duties on certain articles will be entirely removed.

The last American papers announce the loss on the 4th of October, of the American ship Elizabeth, Captain Paton, with, it is much apprehended, the sacrifice of twenty-two persons, including the commander, the chief mate, several of the crew, and many passengers. It appears by letters from the South of France, that Lord Brougham and Mr. Leader, the member for Westminster, are at their beautiful seat at Cannes in the South of France, and that many English families are about to have residences built there, so that a sort of English colony will be founded. It is added that Lord Brougham is busily engaged in the correction of the proof sheets of his great work on the French Revolution. This work is very extensive apparently, and will be published on the return of the Noble Lord to London. He will leave his country seat in Provence so as to be present at the opening of Parliament. Mr. Leader is engaged with his magnificent building, the foundations of which are laid.

According to a letter from the banks of the Danube, in the Augsburg Gazette, the engineers appointed to survey that river, and report on the practicability of improving it, so as to facilitate navigation, have declared that there are no obstacles which cannot be overcome at a moderate outlay.

A letter from Alexandria of the 20th ult., states that the Pacha of Egypt has announced his intention of making a railroad on his own account to Suez. Last Monday week a dreadful murder was perpetrated at Helder (Holland) by a mechanic, who, on his unexpected return from Amsterdam, found within his house a former acquaintance with whom he had long been at enmity. Urged by feelings of jealousy, on finding that his wife had received this individual during his absence, he took up a knife and plunged it into her heart. The poor woman died in a few seconds. After an attempt at suicide, the assassin was arrested and conveyed to prison.

Lieutenant Selby, of the Indian navy, has recently ascended the River Kuran, in Southern Persia, in the steamer Assyria, to a much higher point than ever had been visited before by Europeans. He reached as far as Shusteer, a Persian town, containing a population of 8000 souls, and the Dizful, one of its tributary streams, to within 13 miles of the town of Dizful, and about the same distance of the ruins of Susa, one of the ancient capitals of Persia, and the Shushan of the Book of Daniel. This discovery throws open the richest provinces of Persia, which have hitherto been impenetrable, from want of roads, to English trade and commerce.

SCOTLAND.

Attempted Assassination at Kelso.—Yesterday week an atrocious attempt at assassination took place at Kelso. The victim is James Cockburn, a farm-servant at Quixwood, in the parish of Abbey St. Bathan's, who was on that night to have been married to Jean Steele, or Rankin, widow, residing at Lintlaw, in the adjoining parish of Buncle. The bride and bridegroom were to have met at Dunse in the evening, in order to have had their nuptials celebrated. The bridegroom, with an acquaintance of the name of James Youl, was proceeding to the place of meeting in Dunse, and when at a place called Preston Cleugh, about half a mile to the north of Preston, at about half-past five o'clock in the afternoon, was fired at with a gun or a pistol from the plantation adjoining the east side of the road. The shot took effect in the back. Youl also received some of the shots in his arm; and being stunned by the murderous attack, and seeing Cockburn fall, he fled to Preston for assistance and protection to himself and Cockburn—having procured which, and returning immediately to the spot, Cockburn was found as he fell, but there was no trace of the murderer. On the examination of Cockburn's wounds, he was found to have received about 160 slug and round shot in the back, which was dreadfully lacerated. On recovering sensation, he was heard to say "that it was a poor revenge," and when asked if he suspected any one to have done the deed, he said that he thought it was John Johnston, who resides at present with Jean Rankin, as hind for her, the bride to whom he was to have been married. Johnston at that time was in the room, and was then apprehended, and, having undergone an examiaation, has been committed for trial. The poor woman was much distressed at hearing what had befallen her intended husband, who is in a very dangerous condition, and not expected to survive.

Railway Accident.—A lamentable accident took place last week in the drift-way, or guide mine, of the tunnel at present forming under the New Town, Edinburgh, in connection with the Edinburgh, Leith, and Granton Railway, which proved fatal to no fewer than four of the workmen. How the accident occurred is not known, as all who were in the tunnel at the moment have perished; but it is supposed that the water, which had accumulated in the upper mine, had suddenly broken in upon them, and swept them all away in the torrent.

THE MARKETS.

Corn Exchange (Friday).—We had a fair average quantity of English wheat on sale here to-day. As was the case on Monday, the best parcels were in steady request: but all other kinds were a mere drug. The show of foreign wheat was not large, yet the inquiry for it was heavy, at previous figures. Our supplies of barley, both English and foreign, are large, which caused the barley trade to be excessively heavy, and prices to have a downward tendency. Malt was in slow request, but not cheaper. Oats, beans and peas were steady, at full prices.

Arrivals.—English: wheat, 6950; barley, 9640; oats, 2630 quarters. Irish: wheat, —barley, —; oats, 14,670 quarters. Foreign: wheat, 1180; barley, 15,240; oats, 6800, quarters. Flour, 4710 sacks. Malt, 4760 quarters.

English.—Wheat, Essex and Kent, red, 39s to 47s; white ditto, 44s to 54s; Norfolk and Suffolk, red, 38s to 43s; ditto, white, 40s to 47s; rye, 37s to 38s; grinding barley, 27s to 32s; distilling, 28s to 32s; malting ditto, 35s to 38s; Lincoln and Norfolk malt, 61s to 62s; brown ditto, 57s to 60s; Kingston and Ware, 63s to 64s; Chevalier, 65s; Yorkshire and Lincolnshire feed oats, 22s to 23s; potatoe ditto, 24s to 25s; Youghal and Cork, black, 21s to 22s; ditto, white, 22s to 23s; tick beans, new, 36s to 37s; ditto, old, 40s to 42s; grey peas, 36s to 37s; maple, 35s to 37s; white, 36s to 38s; boilers, 38s to 40s, per quarter. Flour, Canadian, 21s to —; Baltic, 20s to —, per barrel.

The Seed Market.—Linseed cakes are in active request, at fully the late improvement in the quotations. In all other kinds of seeds, comparatively little is doing at late rates.

The following are the present rates:—Linseed cakes, English, £12 to £13; ditto, foreign, £7 12s to £8 10s, per 1000.

Bread.—The prices of wheaten bread, in the metropolis, are from 7d to 7½d; of household ditto, 5½d to 6½d, per 4lbs. loaf.

Six Weeks Average that governs Duty.—Wheat, 45s 11d; barley, 35s 5d; oats, 21s 5d; rye, 34s 8d; beans, 37s 9d; peas, 35s 3d.

Duties on Foreign Corn.—Wheat, 20s; barley, 3s; oats, 6s; rye, 8s. 6d; beans, 5s 6d; peas, 7s 6d.

Tea.—In this market, a very large business has been transacted, during the week, yet we have no further advance to notice in the quotations. The stock is now 29,016,000lbs against 30,030,000 do, at the same time in 1843.

Sugar.—All descriptions of sugar have been in somewhat inactive inquiry, since our last report. Holders have been firm, but buyers have mostly held off in anticipation of lower prices.

Coffee.—This article still continues to have a quiet appearance. The supplies in warehouse are small, if we except those of Ceylon, which are unusually large. The good ordinary qualities of the latter are selling at 53s per cwt.

Fruit.—Currants are in brisk request, at higher prices. The quantity cleared for home consumption during the past seven weeks, has been about 2700 tons. Valencia raisins are brisk, at 50s per cwt.

Rice.—There is only a moderate business doing in rice, yet the quotations are supported.

Provisions.—The arrivals of Irish butter still continue small, owing to which, the demand is active, at fully the late advance in the quotations. Clonmel has sold at 90s to 102s; Cork, 94s to 98s; Carrick, 96s to 98s; Waterford, 70s to 98s. The supply of foreign butter is on the increase, yet sales proceed steadily at 100s to 108s for Kiel, and 100s to 106s for Friesland. The bacon market is steady, at 46s to 48s for prime sizeable Waterford, and 44s for heavy. Lard is in brisk request, at 60s to 68s for Waterford bladdered, 60s to 64s for Belfast: 56s to 60s for kegs, and 52s to 54s for firkins. Other kinds of provisions are quite as dear.

Oils.—Most kinds of oil continue to be taken off steadily, at fully last week's quotations.

Tallow.—For P.Y.C. there is only a limited demand, at 40s 6d to 40s 9d on the spot, and 41s to 41s 6d for the three first months of next year. Odessa Y.C. is selling at 40s, and Siberia at 40s 3d, per cwt. Town tallow is in good supply, at 41s to 41s 6d nett cash.

Hay and Straw.—Coarse meadow hay, £3 10s to £4 15s; useful ditto, £4 16s to £5 4s; fine upland ditto, £5 5s to £5 12s; clover hay, £4 10s to £6 0s; oat straw, £1 10s to £1 13s; wheat straw, £1 14s to £1 16s, per load.

Wool.—There is more inquiry for selected qualities of foreign and colonial wools, at full prices. English parcels are a mere drug.

Potatoes.—The supplies of potatoes are on the increase, in consequence of which, the trade is heavy, at from £2 10s to £3 10s per ton.

Hops (Friday).—Comparatively speaking, very little business has been transacted this week, in new pockets, yet prices are steadily supported. Bags, the supply of which is on the increase, command full rates of currency. Sussex pockets, £7 0s to £8 0s; Wealds, £6 18s to £8 0s; Mid Kent, £8 0s to £10 10s; East Kent, £7 7s to £8 5s; Choice ditto, £10 0s to £12 0s; Farnhams, £10 0s to £10 15s.

Coals (Friday).—Adairs, 17s 0d; Chester Main, 19s 9d; Townley, 17s 6d; Belmont, 21s 9d; Hylton, 21s; Lambton, 22s 6d; Adelaide, 21s 3d, per ton.

Smithfield (Friday).—The supply of beasts here to day was somewhat extensive, but of very middling quality. For the primest Scots the demand was steady, at full prices, but otherwise the beef trade ruled very dull. We had on offer 70 oxen and cows, together with 180 sheep, from Rotterdam, in good condition; while the arrivals from Scotland comprised 90 Scots. The numbers of sheep were small, yet the sale for that description of stock was inactive, at barely Monday's quotations. Calves were in limited supply, and sluggish inquiry, at late rates. In pigs, very little was doing. Milch cows sold at from £16 to £19 each.

Per 8lbs to sink the offal:—Coarse and inferior beasts, 2s 6d to 2s 8d; second quality do. 2s 10d to 3s 6d; prime large oxen, 3s 8d to 3s 10d; prime Scots, &c., 4s 0d to 4s 4d; coarse and inferior sheep, 2s 8d to 3s 4d; second quality ditto, 3s 6d to 3s 8d; prime coarse woolled sheep, 3s 8d to 3s 10d; prime Southdown ditto, 4s 0d to 4s 2d; large coarse calves 3s 0d to 3s 6d; prime small ditto, 3s 8d to 4s 0d; large hogs, 3s 0d to 3s 6d; small porkers, 3s 8d to 4s 0d; sucking calves, 18s to 32s; and quarter old store pigs, 16s to 20s each. Beasts, 916; cows, 180; sheep, 4510; calves, 132; pigs, 379.

Newgate and Leadenhall (Friday).—There was a fair average amount of business doing here to-day, at full prices:—Per 8lbs by the carcass:—Inferior beef, 2s 4d to 2s 6d; middling ditto, 2s 8d to 2s 10d; prime large ditto, 3s 0d to 3s 4d; ditto small ditto, 3s 6d to 3s 8d; large pork, 2s 6d to 3s 4d; inferior mutton, 2s 6d to 2s 10d; middling ditto, 3s 0d to 3s 4d; prime ditto, 3s 6d to 3s 8d; veal, 3s 0d to 4s 0d; small pork, 3s 6d to 4s 0d.

Bradford Piece Market, Thursday, Dec. 5.—There is a full average attendance of merchants here to-day, and their operations a little more extensive, which, we expect, will be continued for some weeks, in order to enable them to get a supply of goods ready to meet the next fair at Leipzig in January. The change in the weather during the week is also looked favourably upon by the home trade houses, whose business has not been so extensive as was looked for. In prices no marked difference is notable.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

The intention of the Bank of England to reduce the interest upon the usual quarterly loans to the same rate as that adopted for discount (viz., two and a half per cent.) has not at present had the effect of depressing the value of money to the extent anticipated. The Share Market, however, at the beginning of the week was very buoyant, from the belief that money would be procurable at an easy rate for some time to come. But as the week advanced the spirit of speculation became less active, it appearing that the leading capitalists were inclined to await the effect of the new French and Canadian loans upon the Money Market before they operated. This supposition is in a manner confirmed by the still declining state of Exchequer Bills, which have gradually receded in value during the week. Consols have, on the contrary, been very firm, from the number of investments that are usually made just previous to the shutting giving them at one period a considerable advance upon the relative value of the heavier stocks. On Tuesday, which was the last day for transfer previous to the closing of the books for the dividends, Consols yielded a fraction, the Bank broker having sold largely, and re-purchased in Three-and-a-Quarter per Cents. Nothing has occurred since to vary prices. Consols now quote, without the January dividend, and the closing price is, for the Opening, 99⅞; Reduced closes at 100¼ to ⅜; New Three-and-a-Quarter per Cents, 102⅜ ½; Bank Stock, 208; Exchequer Bills, 55 to 53; India Bonds, 73 to 78.

At the opening of the week in the Foreign Market there appeared to be some disposition for speculation in the Foreign House. Spanish Actives quoted 24⅝ ¾; Three per Cents., 36⅝ ¾; and Mexican was 36⅝. But although prices have been tolerably well maintained, there has not been an advance in any of the stocks worthy of recording. An appearance of a rise in Spanish or Mexican, or any of the low priced Stocks, always brings realisers into the market, which is not now sufficiently supported to maintain quotations, much less to rise upon, even small sales. Portuguese quotes an advance, the news continuing favourable, and closes at 57⅞ to 56. Spanish Actives are 24⅞ to 25; Three per Cents, 36⅝; Venezuela, 43; Dutch Two-and-a-half per Cents, 63¼; Four per Cents ditto, 96⅞; Belgian, 102½; Brazilian, 88½; Mexican, 30½; Peruvian, 27.

The buoyancy of the Share Market at the commencement of the week has not been fully maintained. The French Lines are rather flatter, and with the exception of Birmingham Stock and Great Western, shares in general are a trifle lower. The closing quotations stand as follows:—Birmingham and Gloucester, 96½; Bristol and Exeter, 71; Caledonian 4⅝; Chester and Holyhead, 5⅞; Direct Northern, 2¼; London and York, 3⅜; Great Western, 145; Birmingham (Stock), 220; Brighton, 48½; Croydon, 17; Manchester and Leeds, 117; Manchester and Birmingham, 52½; Midland, 108; Newcastle and Darlington, 58; Norwich and Brandon, 12⅛; Rugby, 1⅛; South Eastern and Dover, 38; Trent Valley, 8; Yarmouth and Norwich, 25; Sheffield and Lincoln, 1½; South Western, 80; York and North Midland, 104; Boulogne and Amiens, 5½; Orleans and Vurzon, 11½; Orleans, Tours, and Bordeaux, 7½; Paris and Orleans, 41¼; Rouen and Havre, 23.

Saturday Morning.—The Consol Market was firm yesterday, and the closing price was 100 ex div. for the Opening. There was nothing of importance in the Foreign Market; and the Share Market was steady, but without any great increase of business. Edinburgh and Glasgow have been done at 61, and Rouen and Havre at 22⅜.

LONDON AND BRIGHTON RA ILWAY.—BRIGHTON TERMINUS.

branches off the Greenwich line; and at its extremity, the eye dwells with interest on Blackheath, the domes of Greenwich Hospital, the Observatory on the hill, and the charming country stretching from those edifices. There is a steep gradient here of one foot in every 100, which continues rising from the New Cross Station (in part destroyed by fire a few weeks since) to the Dartmouth Arms, 5¼ miles from town.

Speedily, the New Cross Locomotive Establishment is reached. "On the right, a delightful cluster of villages appears, inviting all to whom they are accessible, and they are easily so to multitudes, to many a delightful ramble. Camberwell, Peckham with its Rye Common, and its noble Forest Hill, Dulwich with its interesting gallery of pictures, Sydenham Common, and Norwood with its Beulah Spa, are all there. Nor is the left without great interest. There is Eltham with its old palace; Bromley, deriving its name most probably from the broom growing so plenteously around; the little church and the almshouses of the Licensed Victuallers, on Penge Common; the spire of Beckenham Church, backed by the beautiful woods of Gwyder House; and the Addiscombe Downs, knee deep in lichens and heather."—Illustrated Guide to the London and Dover Railway.

The actual commencement of the railway is at about nine and a quarter miles from London Bridge, the trains running for that distance, over the rails of the Greenwich and Croydon Railway Companies.

A mile onward, we reach the first of the great localities along the road—the Croydon station, where are four distinct lines of rails, an arrangement which ensures the safety of passengers at the stations; the main line being left free for the passage of any special train, and the current train being turned off into what are technically termed the "sidings." Croydon is a place of considerable interest, with its spacious collegiate church; and the Archiepiscopal Palace, and Addiscombe House in the vicinity.

We pass eastward of the town, with the Sanderstead Hills and Banstead Downs on the left, as we emerge from a short cutting, and advance upon an embankment about two miles in length.

Next we reach the Godstone-road station (13½ miles), leaving the coach-road to the right, along which, perhaps, a snail-paced waggon may be creeping, as if in contrast with the almost electrical speed on the iron road; and, perchance, reminding us that near this very spot, some one and forty years since, was laid down an iron tramroad—though, for horse-power instead of steam. Nevertheless, this was one of the earliest germs of the grand railway system.

About a mile and a half onward is the Station with the genuine rustic appellation of Stoat's Nest. From the junction with the Croydon line, the railway rises with this slope for about eight miles, to the high ground at Merstham, where a cutting of great depth keeps the railway far below the natural level of the country, being 120 feet deep in its greatest perpendicular descent; by which we enter the Merstham Tunnel, the first on the line, about 1780 yards in length, and the construction of which occupied three and a half years.

Regaining day-light as abruptly as we left it, by a slight inclination of the head, we perceived the interesting Norman church of Merstham, with its shingled spire immediately to the right. Next, upon an elevated ridge, flanked with noble trees, is the mansion of Galton Park, formerly the seat of Sir Mark Wood, Bart., next of Lord Monson, and now the property of the Countess of Warwick. Adjoining the house is a small stone church in the pointed style, built a few years since by Lord Monson.

By an embankment, 20 feet high, we reach the Reigate Station (21¼ miles), where the Dover line branches off to Tunbridge. Reigate lies about two miles to the left, and is noticeable for its fine church, in the early English style; and its sand-rock caves, in which the Barons are reported to have held their meetings antecedent to the signing of Magna Charta. Immediately above is the site o the castle of the powerful Earls of Warren and Surrey, the entrance to the fortified ground being denoted by a modern gateway.

We next cross the beautiful tract called, from its geological structure, Red Hill, where is another station, and a few poles to the right, the new coach-road to Brighton, and its red-brick inn.

Crossing the embankment at Earlswood Common, we gain a fine view of Leith Hill, the highest point in this part of England—nearly 1000 feet above the sea level. Thence the eye crosses a picturesque country to the wood-crowned range in which is the famed Box Hill, nearly over against Dorking.

At 25½ miles, we reach the Horley Station, at a short distance from the village, with its pretty church spire. Here the line begins to rise, and the view continues uninterrupted.

At 29½ miles, is the Three Bridges and Crawley Station, which is the nearest point to Crawley and Horsham. The line here passes over a long embankment, and now commences a descent of 1 in 264 feet. After passing through several cuttings, we enter the Balcombe Tunnel, 1122 yards long, the construction of which was, indeed, a triumph of engineering skill. We soon reach the Balcombe Station, 33½ miles; and in the valley beneath, may be traced the sinuous river Ouse.

This romantic valley is crossed by a beautiful viaduct, consisting of 37 brick arches, of 30 feet span: its total length is 1437 feet, or rather more than a quarter of a mile; and the height varies from 40 feet at the abutments, to 96 feet at the point where it crosses the river. This is the noblest work on the line: it is of Italian design, by Mr. J. U. Rastrick, F.R.S., F.S.A.; resident engineer, Mr. E. J. Maude. The entire structure is shown in the large engraving at page 360. The prospect from the road line is an unbounded scene of beauty, stretching across the Wealds of Sussex, Kent, and Surrey—a lovely succession of hill and dale, woodland and pasture, dotted with farmsteads, cottages, and churches—those matchless charms of an English landscape.

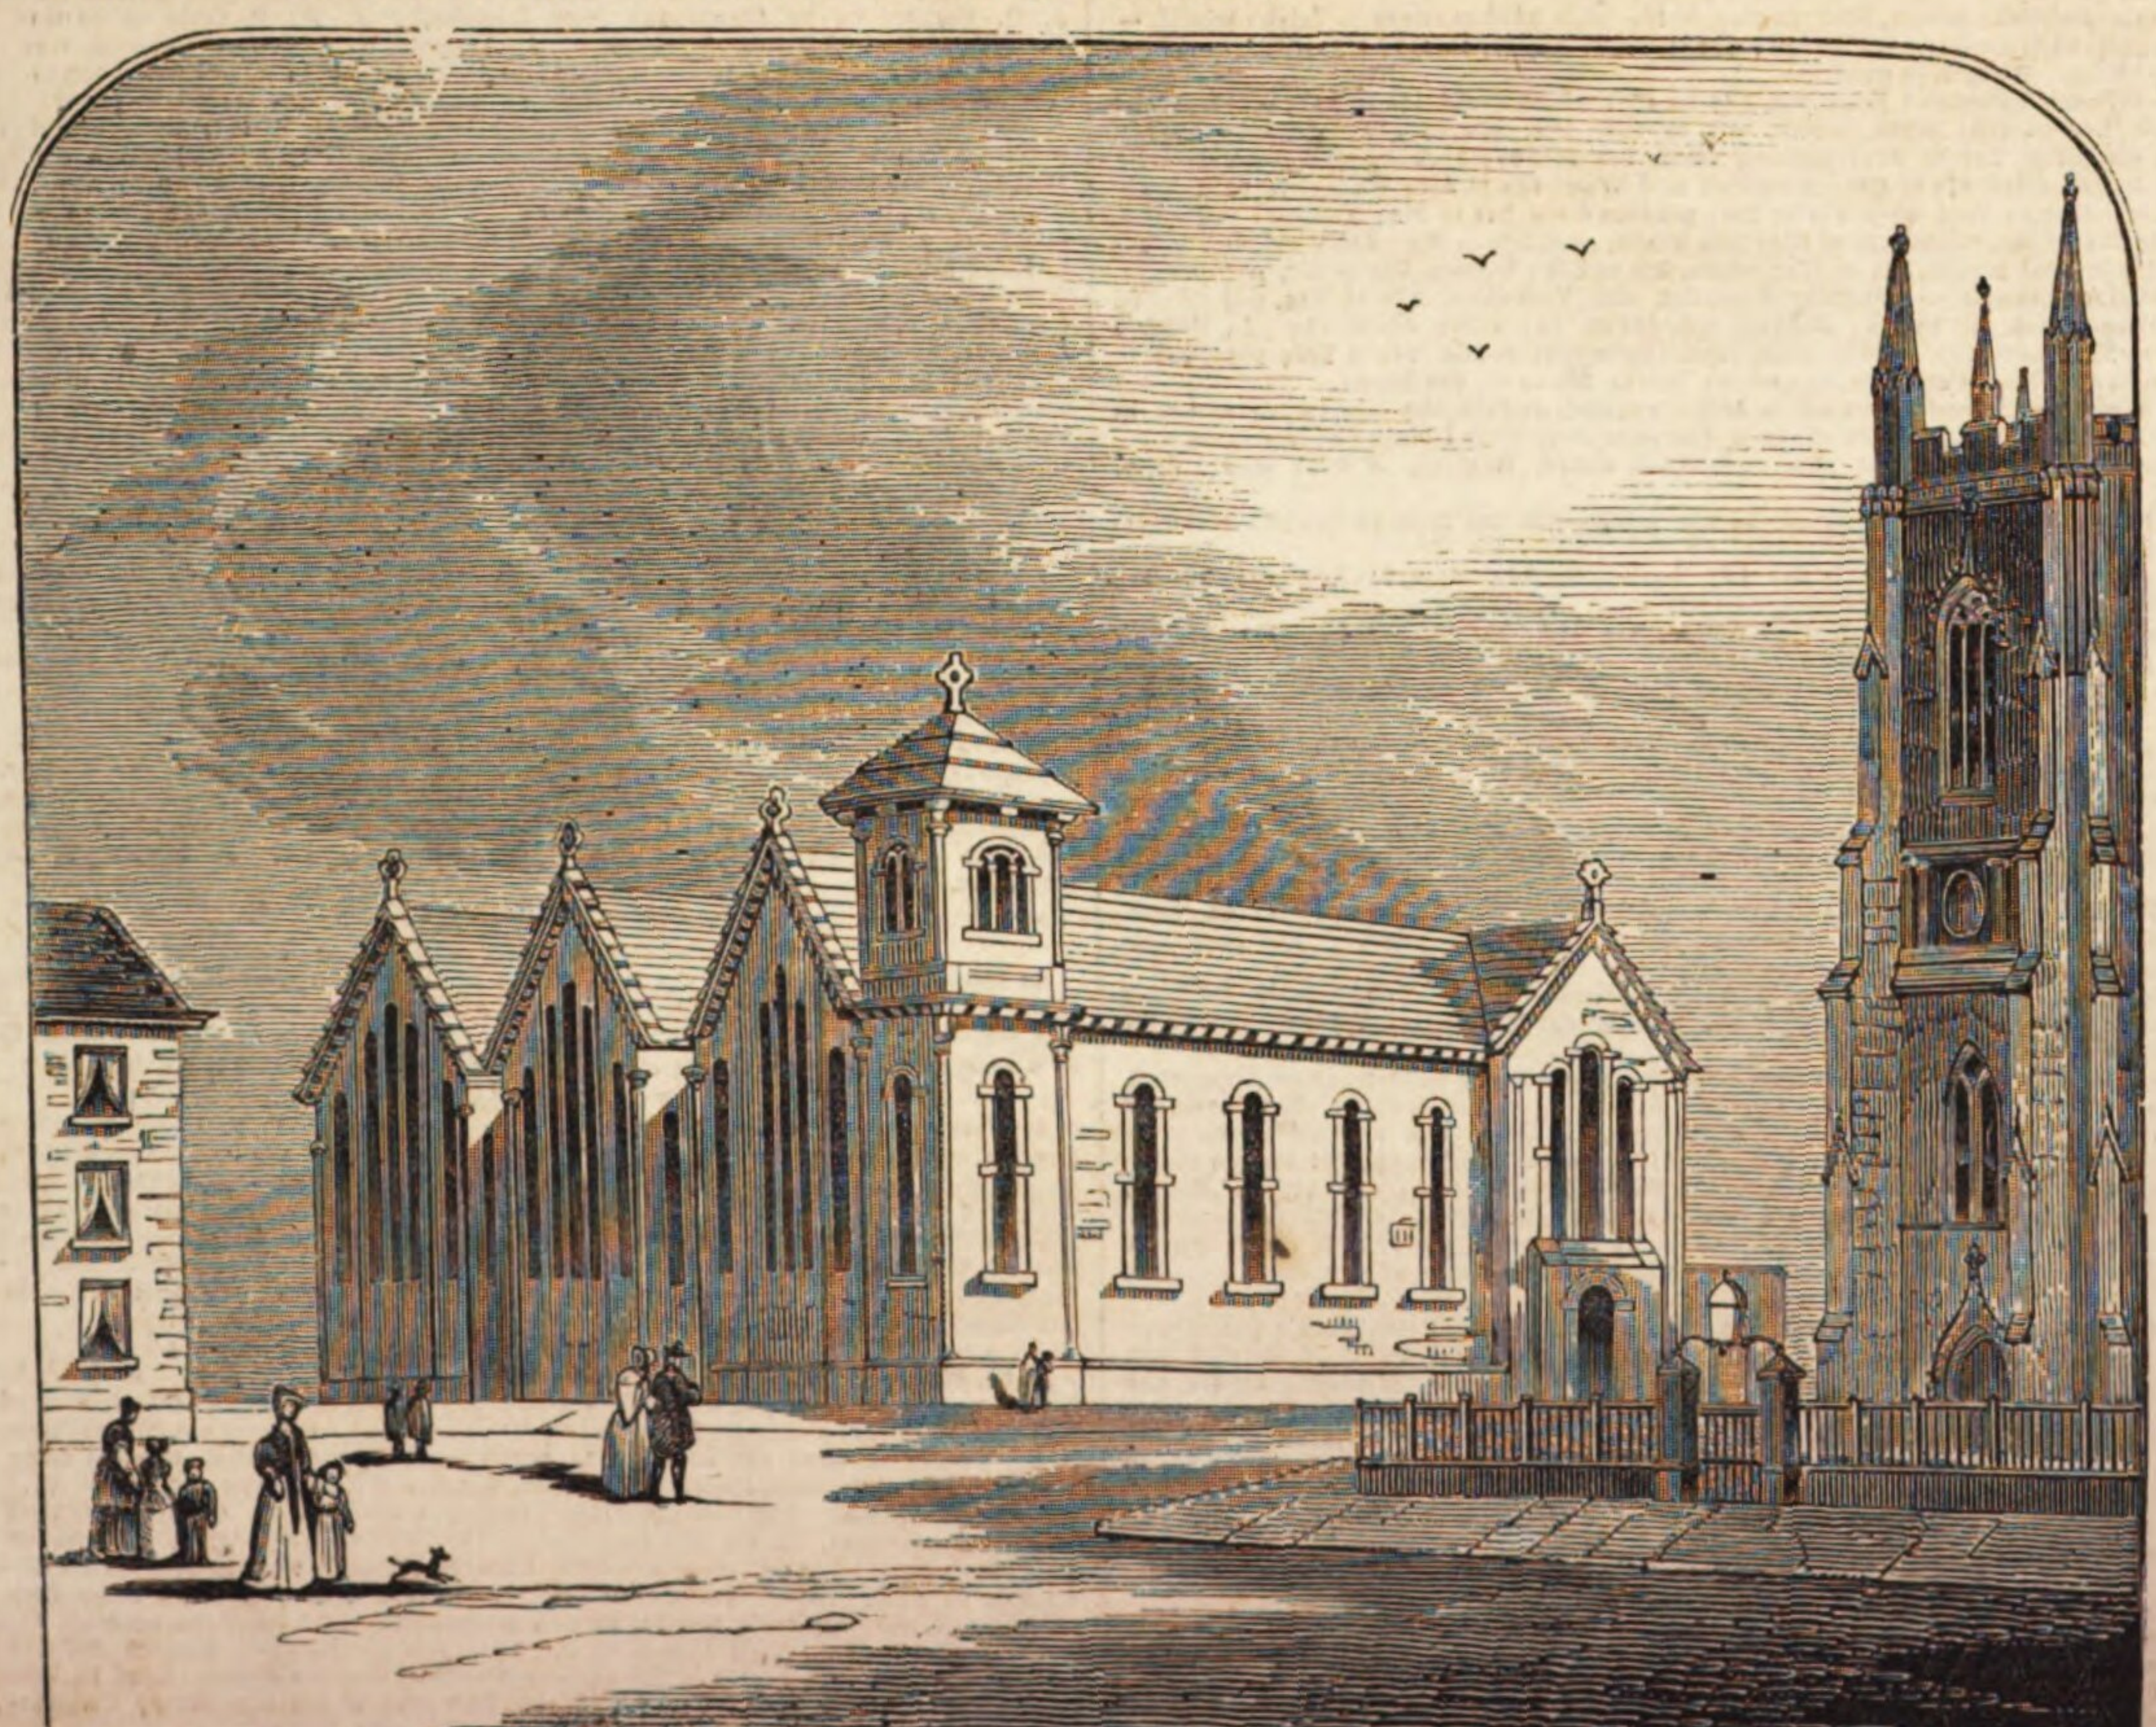
Passing through a somewhat monotonous cutting, we reach Hayward's Heath Station (thirty-eight miles), one mile from Cuckfield, the turnpike road to which we pass beneath, immediately on quitting the station, through a short tunnel of 700 feet. Alack for Cuckfield, Crawley, and Reigate, once the pride of the Brighton road—now occasionally re-echoing with the crack of a solitary whip!

A cutting of nearly two miles leads us to an embankment across St. John's Common, covered with furze and flaunting gorse. A minor station—Burgess Hill—is next passed, and we reach Hassock's Gate Station, seven miles from Brighton, and forty-three miles and a half from London. Around this station lie Ditchling, celebrated in olden time for its itinerant singers (probably a relic of mumming), and Hurst-pier-point, near which is Denny, a fine massive brick mansion, of the year 1595; and in the adjacent parish is a moated farm-house, of Caen stone, with indications of a portcullis, and other feudal appurtenances. The most interesting objects to the right of this portion of the line are a few half-timbered farmsteads, with massive brick chimneys, apparently of considerable antiquity.

Returning to the railway, we soon reach the Gothic entrance to the Clayton Tunnel, which, like that at Merstham, is cut through chalk, and is about a mile and a quarter long; a shaft of this tunnel crowns the highest point of the hill, and may be seen for many miles round.

Immediately beyond Clayton Tunnel is an immense open cutting through chalk, and then we reach Patcham Tunnel, 1440 feet in length.

A succession of chalky precipices now indicates the approach seaward, and we soon reach the fiftieth milestone, and arrive at the Brighton terminus, engraved at page 364; an elegant structure in the Roman style, with a commodious portico, &c.



ST. GEORGE'S SCHOOLS, SHEFFIELD.

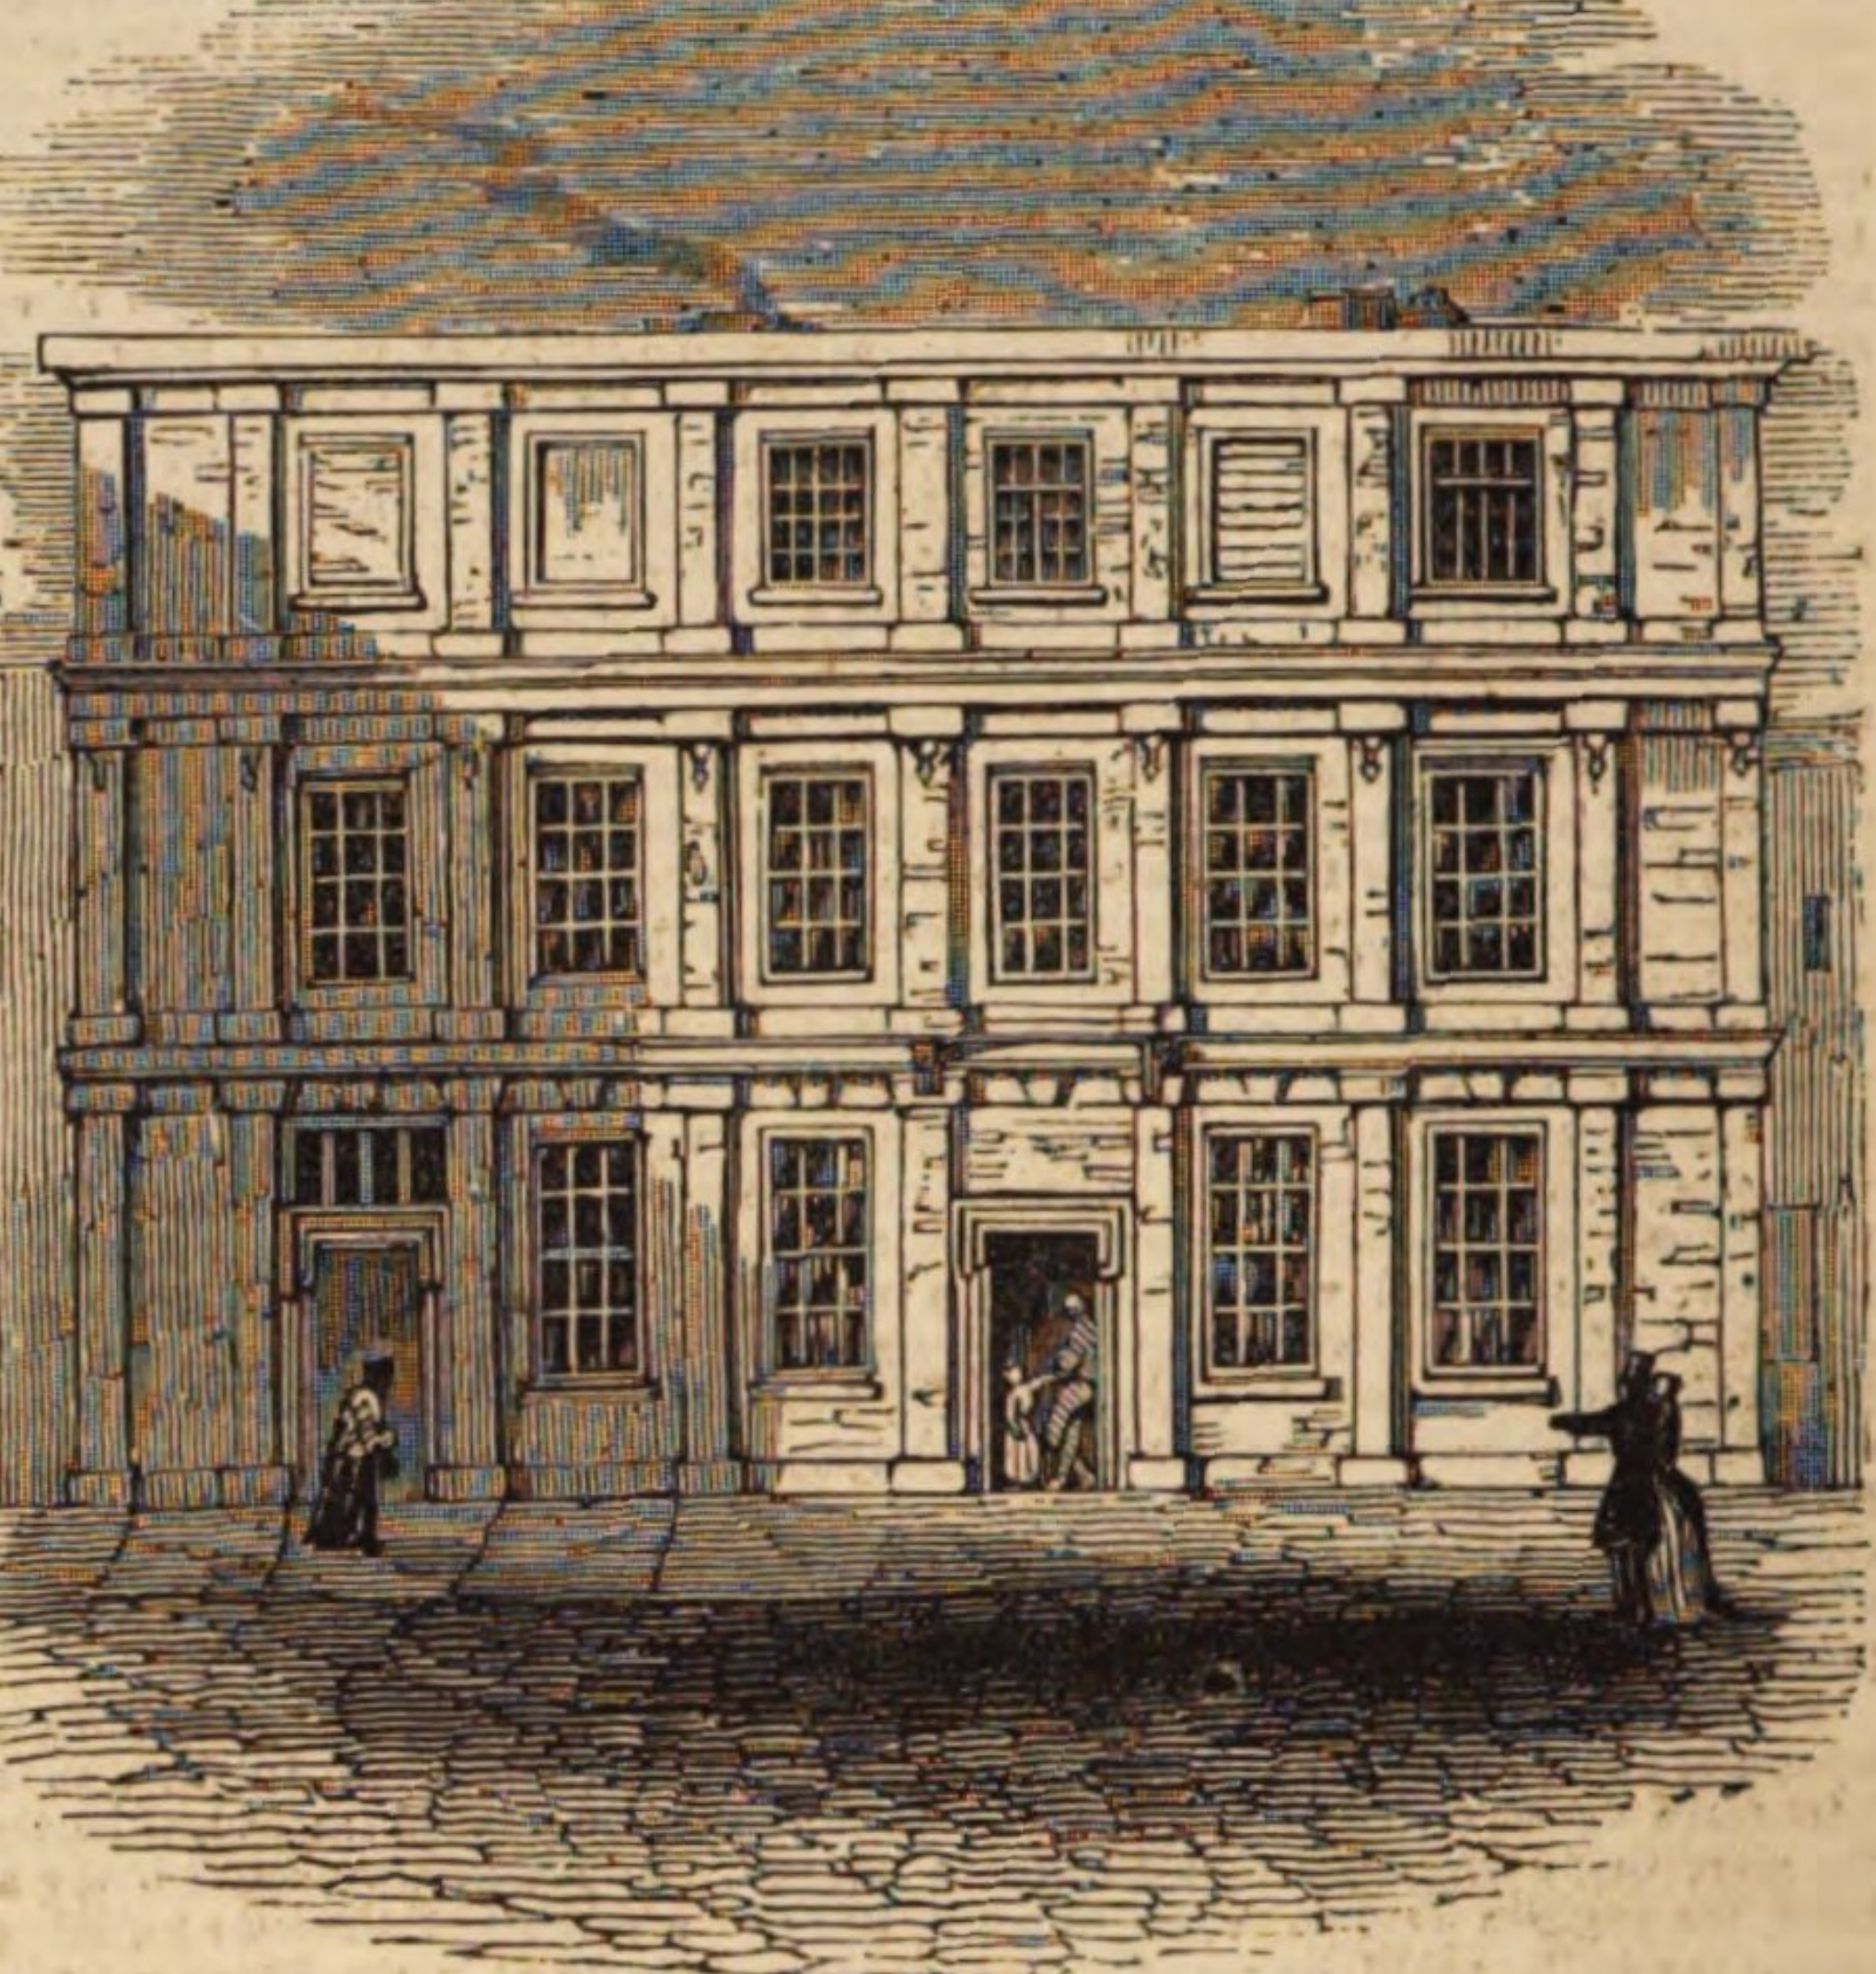
From this point is a branch line to Shoreham, a passage of ten minutes. After passing through a tunnel, we burst upon the sea-side, with the village of Hove and its little Saxon church; the walls of Aldrington church; and the villages of Portslade, Southwick, and Kingston; till by a continuous embankment, we arrive at Shoreham, near to its fine large Anglo-Norman church. The scene shown in the engraving is the most picturesque view of the town, with the handsome suspension bridge across the Adur, built by Mr. Clark, at the expense of the Duke of Norfolk, in 1833.

We find the cost of the London and Brighton Railway, stated at £2,634,058; cost per mile, £57,262; passengers per week, 11,317; receipts per week, £3,073.

The Royal Exchange.—The arrangements have now all been completed for giving possession of the various parts of this great work. All the shops and offices are let, and the agreements have been signed by the tenants, many of whom are in possession, and are fitting them up with considerable taste and effect. In Lloyd's subscribers'-room there will be mahogany seats and tables for the subscribers, 800 or 900 in number; and in the commercial or club-room, similar seats and tables are to be placed for the accommodation of 300 or 400 persons. Round the room and in appropriate stands will be laid the journals and newspapers from all parts of the world. In the merchants' area the tessellated pavement has been entirely removed, and the surface is now covered with an exceedingly hard and smooth coating of the asphalte of Seyssel of a uniform and pleasing colour. The merchants' area will, it is confidently reported, be given up to the merchants on the 1st of January, and complete access will be given to all public portions of the building a week or ten days previously.

ANCIENT HOUSE IN GRAVEL-LANE.

This fine old mansion, in Old Gravel-lane, Ratcliffe-highway, has just been taken down: it was originally handsome and spacious, and appeared to be of the age of Elizabeth. The mansion has enjoyed considerable celebrity for years past, from a tradition of its having been the residence of the Count Gondomar, Ambassador from the Court of Spain to this country, in the reign of James I. To the intrigues of this nobleman is attributed the execution of the long-pending sentence on Sir Walter Raleigh; it being the object of James I. to secure the favour of the Court of Spain, to bring about the marriage of the Infanta with his son Charles I. The above mansion is mentioned in Pennant's "London;" and, being a fragment of Old London, is worthy of record by illustration.



ANCIENT MANSION, GRAVEL-LANE.

ST. GEORGE'S NEW SCHOOLS, SHEFFIELD.

Considerable interest has been attached to the laying of the first stone of the above schools, on the 14th ult., by the Right Hon. the Lord Wharncliffe, Lord President of her Majesty's Council. His lordship on his arrival was received by the committee and clergy of Sheffield and its neighbourhood. Soon afterwards, the procession was formed (the children, about 800 in number, belonging to St. George's Schools passing the Grammar School, where his lordship and the clergy were assembled), and proceeded from Charlotte-street, up Portobello, and along St. George's-terrace, to the site of the schools, at the top of Beet-street. The ceremony was commenced by the singing of the 100th psalm, after which several portions of Scripture were read by the Rev. W. Mercer. Prayer was then offered up by Mr. Mercer, and a glass bottle, containing a number of documents and coins, afterwards deposited by Lord Wharncliffe into the receptacle prepared for it under the foundation-stone. Some passages of Scripture were next read by Mr. Mercer, prior to the stone being lowered to its appointed place.

The stone was then laid by Lord Wharncliffe in the usual form. The handsome silver trowel used by his lordship on this occasion was kindly presented by Mrs. Hatfield, the lady of Mr. Hatfield, of the firm of Waterhouse, Hatfield, and Sansom.

Two verses of a hymn were next sung, after which

Lord Wharncliffe, standing upon the stone, thus addressed the assembly—"Now, my friends, we have this day begun a building for the benefit of the inhabitants of this neighbourhood. It is not necessary for me to say anything in these days of the advantages of education, nor is it necessary for me to impress upon you that no education is worth the having which is not founded upon religion. The inhabitants of this district will now possess the means of having their children educated in connection with the Established Church of this country, whose doctrines, I firmly believe, are the purest that exist; and if we follow those doctrines out, they must lead to our eternal salvation. I, therefore, earnestly hope that the work of this day will be blessed by God, and that you, the inhabitants of this district, will cause your children to benefit by the opportunity now afforded you, and that hereafter they will thank you and thank us for the work of this day. I have only to add that it gives me pleasure that, in my official situation, I have been able materially to assist in the completion of this work: but I should not do the inhabitants of this district justice if I did not say that it is their liberality which has enabled us to show ours also. We have proceeded upon this principle;—we do not think it is prudent, neither does the Legislature desire us, to do all that is to be done in the way of education, but that it is necessary to assist those persons who really show an interest, by means of their subscriptions, in the work which they are anxious to promote. I am glad of this opportunity of addressing you on this occasion, and I trust that God will bless the work."

A psalm was then sung, and the Rev. Mr. Mercer having addressed the assembly, the proceedings terminated.

These buildings, of which the first stone has been so auspiciously laid, are to consist of three separate schools, with suitable class rooms. The Girls' School, fronting St. George's Church, 60 feet by 40 feet; the Infants' School, forming the centre division, and fronting Beet-street and Siddal-street, 60 feet by 40 feet. These dimensions do not, of course, include the class rooms. There will also be comfortable dwelling houses for the master and mistress; the basement of the building being occupied by library, soup kitchen, play-grounds, &c. The estimated cost, without fittings, is nearly £4000, which sum includes £1200 for the site alone. To meet this, about £1200 has been raised by subscription, £1393 granted by the Privy Council, and £649 by the National Society, and £509 from other available sources. The design of the building has been furnished, and the work will be carried out under the able superintendence of Messrs. Worth and Frith, architects.

After the conclusion of the ceremony of laying the stone, Lord Wharncliffe, the Clergy, and Committee of the Schools, proceeded to the Cutlers' Hall, where luncheon was provided. About a hundred and thirty ladies and gentlemen sat down, between one and two o'clock, to the repast. The Rev. W. Mercer presided. Lord Wharncliffe, in returning thanks for his health being drunk by the company, said, "I believe that mankind, in this country at least, are convinced that unless persons are educated—unless they receive not merely a secular education, but one founded upon religion—you cannot make them good men or good citizens. In all efforts for this object I beg of you all to bear in mind that the education which I firmly believe the Legislature and Government of this country will be willing to encourage, is an education founded upon religion, and connected, if possible, with the Established Church. But I say so without any disparagement of the efforts of other classes of religionists. They, undoubtedly, are the parties that have exerted themselves in this cause; and I am not quite sure, to speak fairly upon this subject, whether their efforts have not been the means of exciting yours in this work. Still we, I say, who belong to the Establishment, and who have adopted its creed, cannot but feel the advantage to the people of this country of an Established Church, and desirous to inculcate the doctrines of that church in the minds of their children."

We have abridged these details from the very interesting report in the Sheffield Mercury.

GREAT ANNUAL MIGRATION OF THE RUSSIAN TARTARS.

Recent letters from the Crimea are occupied with accounts of the descent of the nomadic tribes of that country from their summer residences in the flat hill tops to their winter dwelling places in the warmer temperature of the plains. The spectacle of a whole people in the act of migration—following, with hardly more intelligence than "the stork in the heavens, who knoweth its time," the impulses of the changing seasons—is one of serious and universal interest; and as these wandering Tartars themselves embrace at the present time a large share of European attention, we have felt the opportunity to be a favourable one for introducing a family of them to our readers. The cut represents a Tartar household pursuing their precipitous way down the side of a torrent valley, on their march to Christmas quarters in the genial neighbourhood of Balaklava.

Few more picturesque sights could be imagined than those which the incidents of such a journey would furnish. The bivouac of a party of the travellers at night, is said to present a picture of barbarous interest. They are described as crouching in wild groups round wood fires, busily engaged in cooking their kukurutz, and, ever and anon, breaking the general silence by loud vociferations of joy, vengeance, or disaster. In the English edition of Professor Pallas's "Travels through the Southern Provinces of the Russian Empire," published in 1802, a very interesting plate is given of one of these Tartar encampments, in which the Professor, notwithstanding the rudeness of his company, passed a very pleasant evening. The wealthy elders of the tribe had each formed their own little settlement, and the line of demarcation was distinctly drawn between their families, who occupied little knots of tents, round which their own herds were straying.

In one of the earliest works we have upon Russian Tartary, published in Holland, in 1600, we find their habits of life described as essentially those of a shepherd, dwelling like Jacob, in tents, "the drought consuming him by day, and the cold by night." And strongly indeed is this picture corroborated by their mode of life to the present day. We still find the same ancient and pastoral style of existence corresponding with that of the patriarchal princes; their wealth entirely consisting in their flocks, with which they wander from pasture to pasture, as their will leads them, having no fixed habitation or positive house property, but bearing their tents here or there, whenever it may suit them to make a settlement.

Sober and frugal in their habits, they are content with the spontaneous produce of the earth, and rarely crave more than the natural wealth they possess, as the shepherd princes of the land; living almost wholly upon bread and milk, even animal flesh is a rarity to them, for they spare the herds they own in consideration of the wool and milk, until unforeseen accident or natural death puts their flesh at their disposal. They possess little moveable property besides the utensils of cookery, tents, and horse furniture; being, in truth, as near savage independence as a man can well be who is not a savage. It has been conjectured, that to this severe mode of life, the absence of petty thefts amongst them is to be attributed.

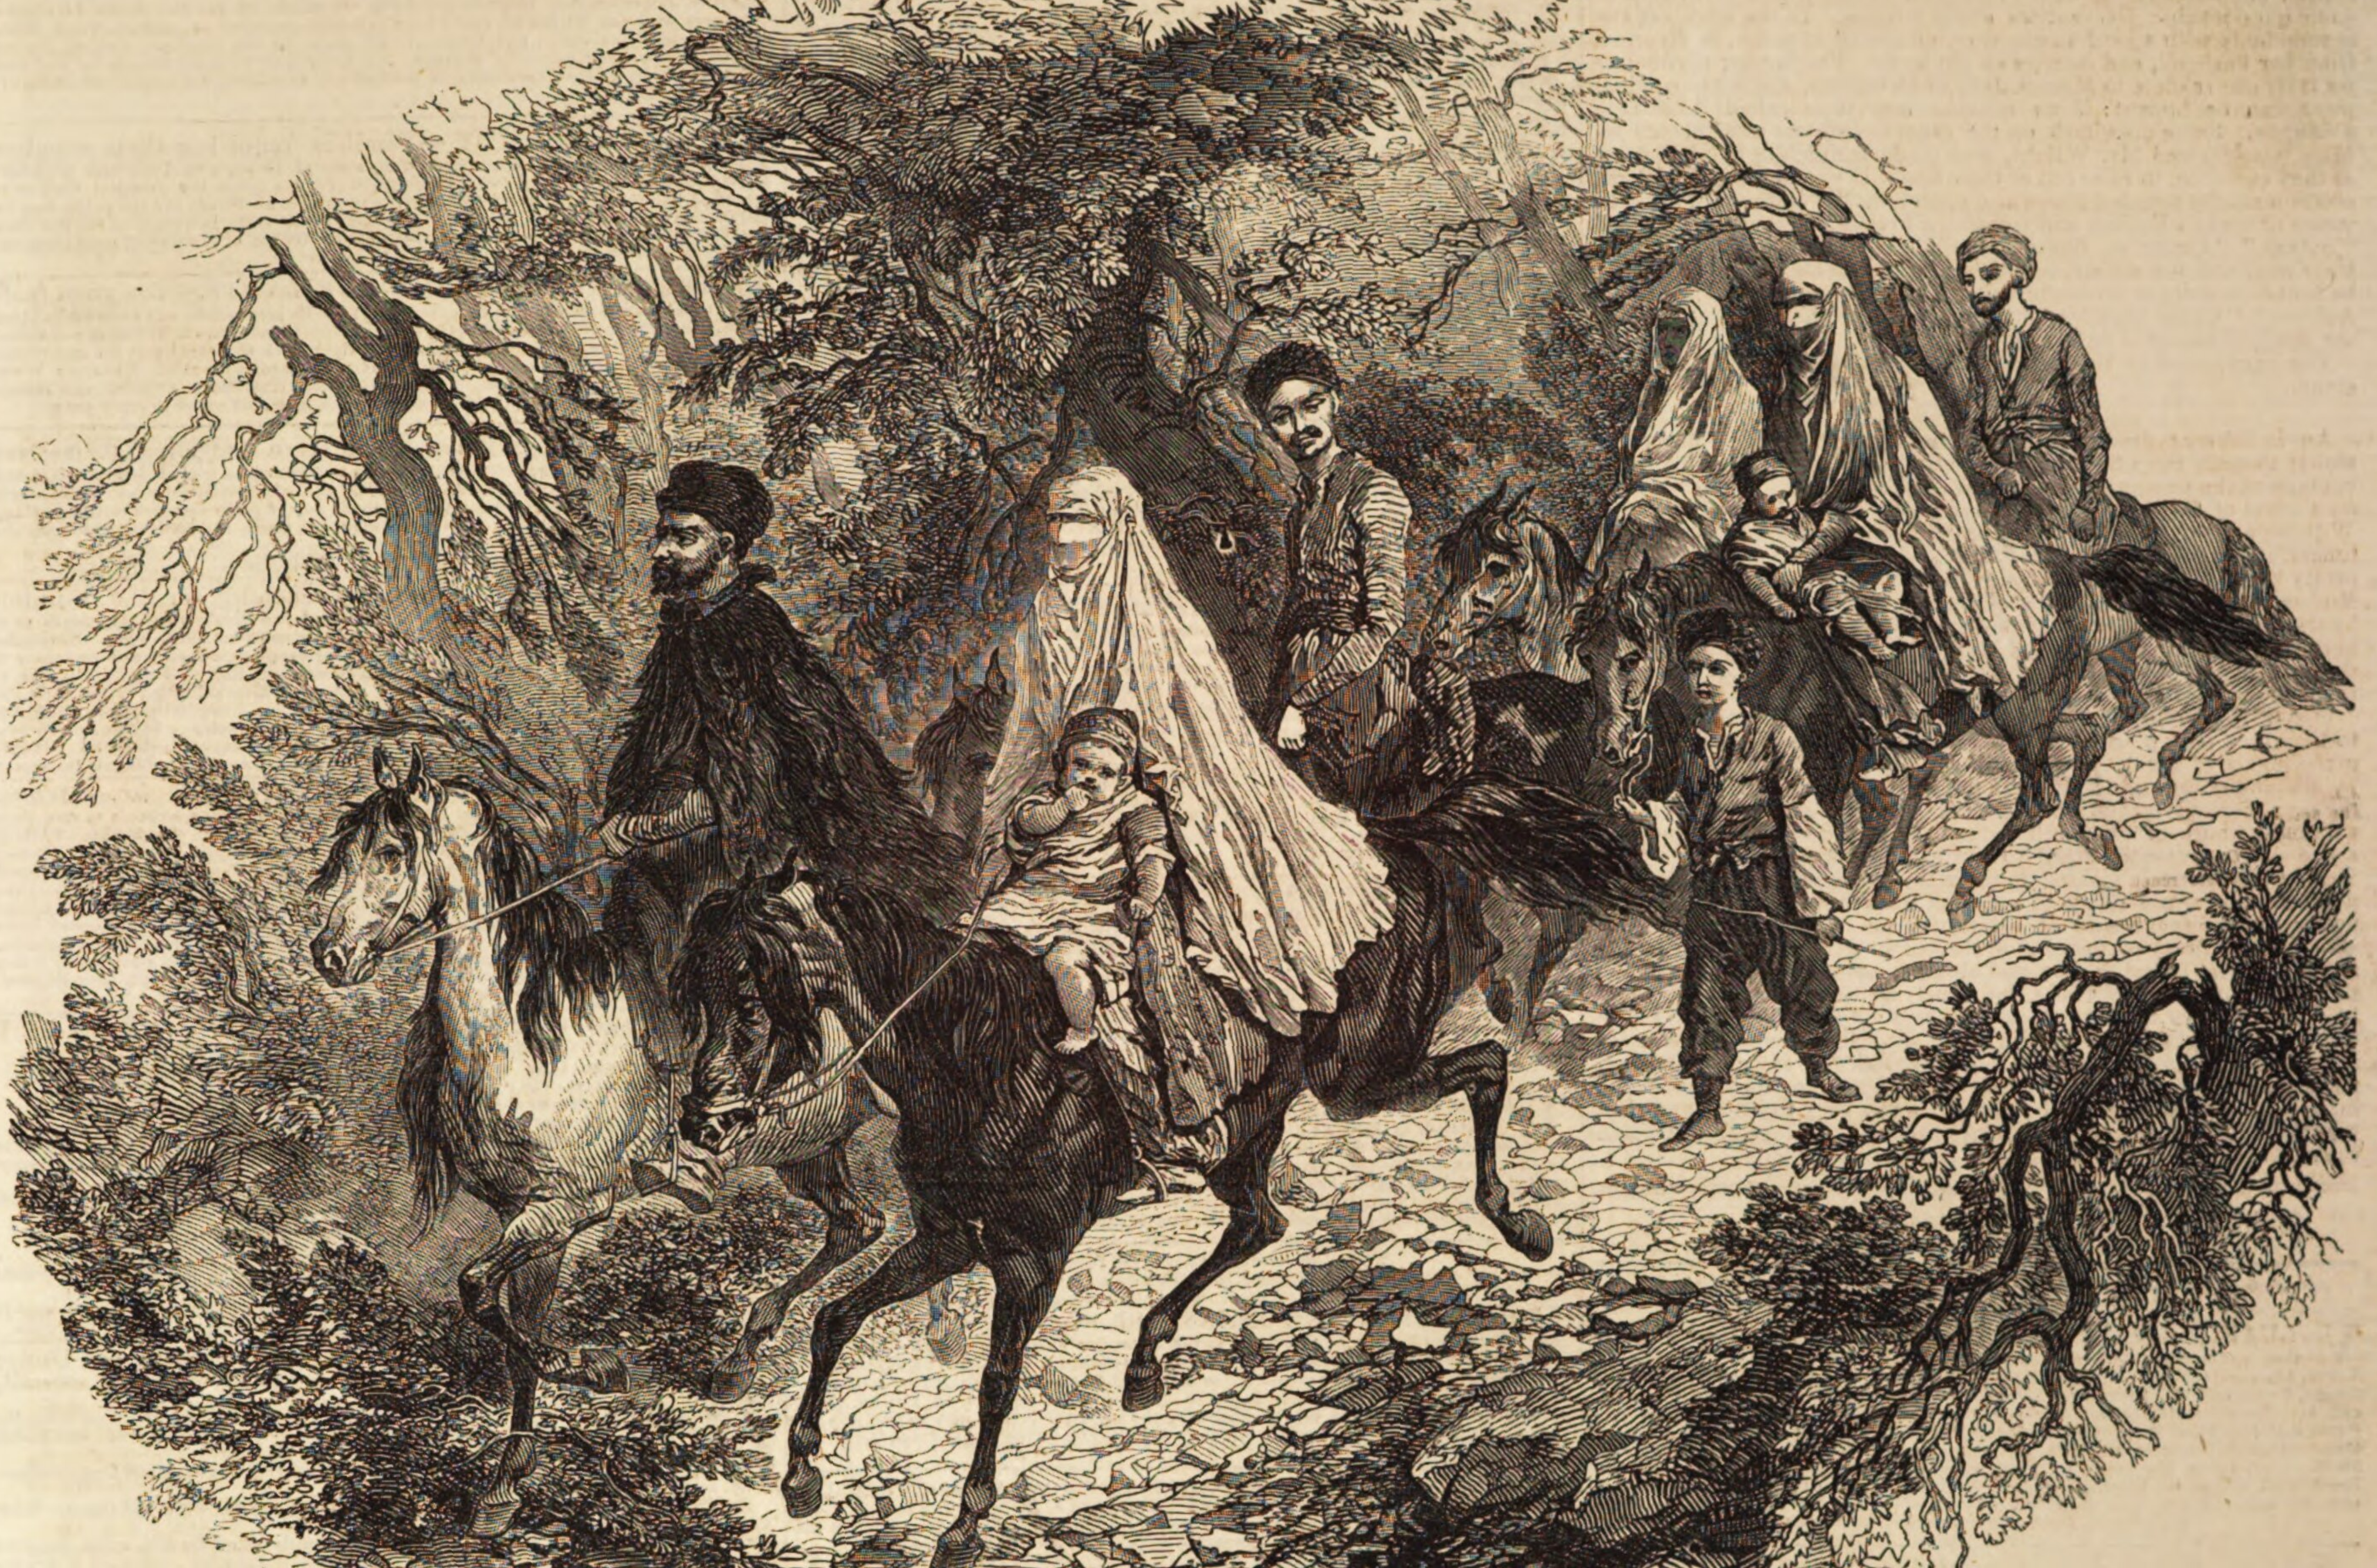
Mr. Spencer, in his "Travels in Tartary and the Caucasus," says, "I have ever found them to be a peaceable, inoffensive, hospitable people, and their employment being pastoral, it is very rarely that any act of cruelty or violence is recorded against them; and I always preferred the shelter of their humble huts to the dwellings of the foreign colonists, many of whom are deserters and vagabonds from every part of Europe: the Christian population of the Crimea being a complete menagerie." It would seem, therefore, that Russia is not to be believed, when she circulates, as she has done extensively, reports prejudicial to the Tartar reputation. The object, indeed, of the oppressor of the Caucasian races appears to have been to frighten travellers, and particularly the monied English, from penetrating into those abodes of freedom, the mountain homes of Krim Tartary, by terrific bugbears of the dangers to be apprehended in purse and person from the natives.

The manner of travelling most commonly in vogue with the Tartar tribes is on the horse—of which they have several very hardy and sure-footed varieties; but the camel is very often used for connveying their wives and females. They also make use of the madjar, a long narrow vehicle, covered with dried sheepskins, and supported by wooden wheels; the whole of this carriage is constructed without the use of iron, the bark of the linden tree being used instead of nails, and box-wood wherever the vehicle is subject to friction. This vehicle, however, is, notwithstanding its frailty, used in carrying astonishing loads. Owing to the fact that the Tartars never grease their wheels, the traveller has very frequently the pleasure of a serenade of one of the most detestable sorts of music that can well be imagined.

The tribes are not only rich in flocks of sheep, but are abundantly possessed of every variety of black cattle. These they use in drawing their chariots and luggage-carts, when camels are not plenty enough to supply their need; for this laborious animal is one of the best calculated to endure the climate and to do the toil required in the Crimea.

The costume of the tribe is moderately gay, but very inelegant—the inelegance principally arising from their injudicious mixture of colours. Silk, corals, and pearls are are not scarce amongst the wealthier Tartars, and they are generally (more particularly the females) provided with what they consider amulets and safeguards.

Russia is determined on subjecting the free spirit of the Tartar to its own servile admeasurement of political obedience. When this has been accomplished, the shepherd will make his last migration from the hills; his flocks and his herds will be sold to the highest bidder, and he himself will become the victim of "civilisation" (?). To this end, we are told, that since the Crimea has been more nearly connected with Russian settlers, the influx of foreigners has been greater, and the number of those "wandering" has imperceptibly diminished, and the people have become more keenly sensible to the charms of a settled life. But for all this, and in spite of its Christian professions, we may entertain a not very reserved opinion that Russia feels but little interest in the religious, moral, or political welfare of its Tartar subjects. She wishes them under her thumb, and desires to use them in the subjugation of others—that's all.



ANNUAL MIGRATION OF A TARTAR FAMILY.

THE THEATRES.

COVENT GARDEN.

M. Jullien is most fortunately gifted with the art of hitting the public, and suiting his productions to the popular taste. High-school musicians may deride his musical knowledge, and affect to despise his compositions as evanescent trash: but M. Jullien puts forward a Polka, or a national set of quadrilles, thousands go to applaud, and keep time to their inspiriting measure with heads, heels, sticks, and umbrellas; they are reiterated at public balls and evening parties, and the fortunate arranger finds the reward of his tact and ingenuity accordingly. Since last season the house has been entirely redecorated, and its appearance even surpasses that of last year. The buffet at the extremity of the promenade has a very striking effect from the front of the house, and all the ornamental arrangements are made in the best taste. On Tuesday evening M. Baumann, the bassoon-player, took his benefit; and, to judge from the look of the house, it must have been a very excellent one. The beneficiare executed, with his usual expression, the cavatina, "Una voce poco fa" from "Il Barbière," and elicited a most rapturous encore, which, however, he did not take.

The Welsh Quadrilles formed the conclusion of the first part of the programme, composed by M. Jullien, as a companion to the English, Irish and Scotch ones—although certainly not equal to them. There was an addition to the orchestra of nine harps, the leading one being played by Mr. Ellis Roberts, the gentleman to whom was awarded the first prize at the late congress of Bards and Minstrels; and who had the honour of performing before her Majesty at Burghley House. But the great attraction of the evening was the Distin family, who have been for the last six months in Paris and Germany, during which time they have lost no opportunity of improving themselves or their instruments. The latter, now used by them, are of silver, and were presented to them by Louis Philippe, in consequence of the pleasure he received from their performance during the late Exposition. Their instruments, termed "Sax Horns," were originally invented by M. Sax, of Paris, but have been greatly improved by the Distins, who performed, on Tuesday, the magnificent "Robert, toi que j'aune," and Donizetti's touching "Fra Poco"—the finale to "Lucia di Lammermoor," in both of which they were most enthusiastically encored. We really advise all who have not heard them to take an early opportunity of so doing.

M. Jullien advertises another grand Bal Masqué on the 16th inst. The amusement is scarcely germane to English notions: but certainly the last was the most brilliant and well-conducted affair, up to an hour, when it behoved all to leave, that we had ever seen in London.

HAYMARKET.

"Young England," was the popular title of a farce produced here on Saturday evening with success, from the pen of Mr. Morton; and derives its name, not from any political characters of this "new generation" introduced into it, but from a little baby of a few months old, upon whom the plot turns. Mr. Parley (Buckstone) is left at the railway terminus, at Southampton, with an infant placed in his arms by accident; and his terrible perplexities arising therefrom, added to his personation of somebody else from motives of pure good temper, plunge him into all sorts of equivoques and dilemmas, in which Buckstone's absurd terror can be readily imagined. There was nothing very novel in the situations, but they were brought in with tact, and although wonderfully improbable, kept the audience in continuous laughter. It was announced for repetition amidst unmixed applause.

A second successful piece was brought out on Wednesday evening, called "Somebody Else"—an adaptation of Madame Albert's favourite piece of "Georgette"—we understand, from the pen of Mr. Planché. There is not much plot in it; but it is of that light class of pieces which formerly found such favour at the Olympic, in its palmy days, under the Vestris management—very intelligible, very elegant, and, what is more, very safe. "The Swiss Cottage," from Adolph Adams's opera, "Le Chalet," is a good specimen of this style. A young Swiss wheelwright has fallen in love with a young girl confided to his care by her brother, who is from home. But he is engaged to another—a lively, mischief-loving lass; and at this time the brother returns, bringing with him a suitor for his sister. The coquettish Minne (Madame Vestris) pretends to be the sister, marries the new comer, and leaves the young wheelwright free to follow his own choice, after giving rise to an amusing equivoque.

It will be seen that there is not much in all this, but it went smoothly enough, telling well with the audience. There was a very pretty scene; and a very pretty song, sung by Madame Vestris, and encored. The lady was also called before the curtain at the end of the vaudeville, which was announced for repetition amidst general applause.

ADELPHI.

What the management of this hitherto excellently conducted theatre could be thinking about, when it presented its audience with so unmitigated a piece of trash as "Sidonia di"—something or another—we forget what—we cannot imagine. If the manager thinks he can make the Adelphi Theatre the rubbish-basket of the Haymarket, he is much mistaken, and will find it out considerably to his cost. It is true the class of pieces which the Adelphi requires is not of the highest or most refined order; but of that class they should be good; and there is as much art requisite in amusing this audience as that of a higher theatre, although, of course, it is of an inferior grade. The food may be coarse and roughly seasoned with which they are fed, but still it must be, procuring some sort of excitation of the palate, and not such a water-gruel phantom as the vapid translation which was dished up on Monday night. There was a sleepy, heavy mediocrity about it, which laid hold of the mind, already mystified by the entire unintelligibility of what it saw and heard, and steeped it into a lethargy; and not until the nightmare had disappeared, did a few strong constitutions show that they had sufficient vitality left to hiss. There is something healthy in a vivid and peremptory condemnation; and the rubbish thus explosively got rid of is forgotten; whilst such receptions as that of "Sidonia," linger on the public mind, and are of infinite injury to the house. We shall not follow the example of our daily contemporaries, and commit ourselves by attempting to describe that which the piece does not possess—a plot. Let it suffice to say, that Madame Celeste plays the heroine, a milliner, and is married, in the first act, to a Duke, who is then immediately arrested by the Archduke of Austria, the time being the war of succession in Spain. In the second act she appears as a Franciscan Monk, which gives rise to some questionable pleasantries about religion. In the third act she is somebody with a hard name, very influential at court, is divorced from her husband, and marries an old lover. For further particulars we refer our readers to Messrs. Jeffs or Delaporte, where the original piece can be bought: if we mistake not, it is called "Le Duc d'Olonne. Some drawback on the general badness was effected by Miss Woolgar and Mr. Wright, who made as much of two bad parts as they could do, in rôles out of their line. It was announced for repetition amidst mingled hisses and applause. We confess we begin to weary of broken English and translated French. "Bankers' Clerks," "Satans," "Cæsar de Bazans," "Sidonias," may be very well in their way, and for a time, but they soon nauseate. Can no author be found to write a domestic English drama, such as the "Wreck Ashore," "Grace Huntley," or any others of that class for which the Adelphi was once so famed.

The pantomime at this house will be from the pen of Mr. Buckstone.

LYCEUM.

An indifferent drama, produced on Thursday week, has crept slowly through the intervening evenings, but we fear with little advantage to the treasury. It is called "Home Again," and is founded on a novel of Captain Chamier's, termed "Ben Bradshaw, the Man Without a Head." As it will not probably make its appearance much longer, it is unnecessary to analyze it; we will merely mention a very pretty ballad sung by Mrs. Keeley in the last act, composed by Mr. Rodwell. Beyond this, it was all "slow," although capitally played by the ladies and gentlemen concerned in it. The Christmas piece here will be a burlesque in the style of "Aladdin," and founded on the old tale of "Valentine and Orson"—Mr. and Mrs. Keeley taking the characters of the savage man and his knightly brother.

One of the drollest "unrehearsed stage effects" we ever remember to have seen took place at this house on Wednesday night, during the performance of the "Seven Castles." The curtain had been lowered by mistake at the end of the first act, instead of the drop; and when the men discovered their error, they pulled it up again, after an interval of a minute or two, still without letting down the drop. The scene which presented itself to the audience was as follows:—Mr. Keeley was leisurely picking up some head-dresses which were lying upon the stage, previously to carrying them off. Mrs. Keeley was giving some directions to an elderly female in plain private attire, who had an immense bundle of clothes in her arms. Two of the scene-shifters, in paper caps and blouses, were sitting quietly on the throne of the palace of Pride, apparently waiting to remove it, whilst Miss Farebrother, whose potent wand had wrought the change in the last tableaux, was flying before a scene, which some men were hurrying, like a huge covered clothes-horse, across the stage. The effect upon the audience was very ludicrous. First, they took their seats, imagining that it was part of the play; next, they tittered, and then burst out into a roar of laughter and burlesque applause, amidst which the real act-drop descended.

JULLIEN'S MUSICAL NOVELTIES.—M. Jullien has the honour to acquaint the Nobility and Gentry, as well as the Musicsellers of the kingdom, that he has just published the following New Pieces of Music, which are now being performed at his Annual Series of Concerts, at the Theatre Royal, Covent-garden, London; and nightly receiving the enthusiastic plaudits of the most crowded audiences ever assembled within the walls of a theatre, viz.:—

The Welsh Quadrille, composed as a companion to the Irish, English, and Scotch Quadrilles.

The Original Mazurka and the Cellarius Valse, with a complete choregraphical description by MM. Cellarius, Delaborde, and Coulon.

A new edition of La Valse a Deux Temps, with a splendid illustration of the position by Brandard, and a correct description by E. Coulon.

The Post Horn Galop, composed and performed by Herr Kœnig.

Jullien's complete collection of Polkas, consisting of nine sets, in which are fifteen different Polkas; many of which are now published for the first time, including the Queen and Prince Albert Polka, with magnificently illustrated portraits.

The above may be had also in one collection, most beautifully bound and embellished, with splendid illustrations by Brandard. In this form they will be found most useful at Soirées Dansantes, and, from the great elegance and novelty of the volumes, are excellently suited for presents of a recherché character.

CHAPMAN AND HALL'S MONTHLY SERIES.

A COLLECTION OF ORIGINAL WORKS OF FICTION AND BIOGRAPHY.

This Series will be found to differ in some very important respects from every other hitherto presented to the public.

I. It will consist exclusively of new and original works, chiefly of the class of Novels and Romances.

II. The price of each work will be less than one-half the sum charged for an equal amount of matter in the ordinary system of publication.

III. The means by which the saving of cost will be effected will involve no sacrifice of literary or typographical excellence.

IV. The quantity of matter given in each Part will be found to obviate a very general objection made to Serial Works, on the ground of a too frequent suspension of the interest.

The Novel will be published in Four Monthly Parts, of the post octavo form. Each Part will contain one hundred and sixty handsomely printed pages, and be sold for Three Shillings. Unless special exceptions are made, and it is expedient to issue a story in a single volume, it is intended that while every Novel in the Series shall contain the ordinary amount at present included in Three Volumes, it shall be completed in Two, and sold for Twelve Shillings.

The Biographies will never exceed Two Parts, or One Volume.

The first Novel will be MOUNT SOREL; OR, THE HEIRESS OF THE DE VERES. By the Author of the "Two Old Men's Tales."

The First Part will be published on the First of January.

MORAL STRENGTH; or, the Nature and Conquest of Evil Habits considered. By WILLIAM MOUSLEY, M.A., Vicar of Cold Ashby; late of Queen's College, Cambridge; Author of Plain Sermons on some of the leading Truths of the Gospel.—"This is an excellent subject, and much that is useful will be found in the treatment of it. This is very well arranged; and a glance over the table of contents raised great expectations of the book, which many passages in it satisfied. There is much good and practical advice given."—British Magazine. "We are glad to have placed in our hands so acceptable and useful a volume as this on Christian duties. Mr. Mousley, though he points out many useful courses and plans for the conquest of evil habits, insists above and before all on the renewing of the heart, and the sanctification of the life. It is a very good volume."—Church and State Gazette. "The attention of the excellent writer is directed towards those evil habits which result from our corrupt nature. We can most warmly recommend this work. It puts every thing upon its right basis, and instructs us in virtue in the only effectual mode in which virtue can be taught."—Bell's Weekly Messenger. "Mr. Mousley's directions in his earnest and convincing little book on Moral Strength are practical, plain, and enforced with that sincerity and earnestness that seldom fails to make an impression upon the mind. The work displays a close acquaintance with the workings of the heart and mind, and the temptations of the world, and is pervaded with a spirit of fervent and amiable piety."—The Britannia. "The author writes in a pleasing way on the happiness arising from a gradual increase of moral strength. It is a book containing many practical truths, and of great value to every family circle."—Northampton Herald.

ROYAL BANK OF AUSTRALIA.—This Bank grants LETTERS of CREDIT and Bills at Three or Thirty Days' Sight on its Bankers at Sydney, Port Phillip, Hobart Town, and Launceston; the terms for which may be had on application at the Office, No. 2, Moorgate-street.

By Order of the Board, G. H. WRAY, Manager.

LESSONS IN MILLINERY AND DRESSMAKING.—Mrs. HOWELL, of 304, Regent-street, sole Inventress of Teaching the art of Dressmaking in a series of Lessons, undertakes to convey to persons of the meanest capacity a correct knowledge of Cutting, Fitting, and executing in the most finished style, in Six Lessons, for One Guinea. The correctness of this mode can be fully substantiated by reference to pupils.—Apprentices and Improvers Wanted.

DESIGNS FOR TAPESTRY.—GIBBINS, 7, King-street, St. James's-square, respectfully informs the public he has just returned from the Continent with the NEWEST PAPER PATTERNS—patterns on canvass, wools, silks, and canvasses from Berlin and Vienna, which, from the low Continental prices, he can offer for sale at a great reduction in prices. An assortment of 10,000 designs for sale, and some beautifully finished specimens of needlework, calculated for elegant presents.—7, King-street, St. James's.

SUPERIOR BRANDY.—Families requiring their supplies of Brandy at this season, are respectfully solicited to apply to THOMAS GREENHOW, Distiller, 16, St. John street, Clerkenwell (for ten years the practical distiller of Messrs. J. T. Betts and Co., Smithfield Bars), who assures his friends and the public that he will furnish them with an article equal to anything in the trade, in quantities not less than Two Gallons, pale or coloured, at Sixteen Shillings per Gallon, of the highest legal strength for cash on delivery.—A liberal consideration to dealers.

PATENT PARAGON CAMPHINE LAMPS.—The great fault which was last year found with the Vesta, from its great smoke and emission of black smuts, is happily entirely obviated in the Paragon—which surpasses in brilliancy and whiteness of light, anything hitherto seen—giving the light of 16 wax candles at the cost of one halfpenny per hour. The largest stock in London to select from at C. Watson's Warehouses, 41 and 42 Barbican, and 16, Norton Folgate. The Spirit, analysed and recommended by Dr. Ure, is delivered by C. Watson's cards, at 4s. per gallon in screw cans.

BELT AND DRAWERS.—Gentlemen providing themselves with their winter underclothing, would do well to make a trial of SANDLAND and CRANE'S BELT BAND DRAWERS. They will be found greatly contributable to health and comfort, both to thin as well as stout persons; but of really essential service to those of or inclined to the latter habit. Patterns of materials, prices, and instructions to measure, forwarded, post-free, to gentlemen in the country.

Sandland and Crane, 55, Quadrant.

FESTIVITIES.—The Season approaching for the re-union of families and friends around the social board and sprightly dance reminds us of the good old custom of an interchange of Christmas and New Year's Gifts. Having for many past seasons been fortunate in recommending appropriate Presents, I now have to offer to givers' notice Lace Dress Skirts, a most economical Ball or Evening Costume, at 36s. and 45s. each (worth double those sums); also a matchless collection of the latest Parisian shapes, in Capes, Berthes, Canezous, Pelerines, Fichus, Chemisettes, Collars, &c. &c. From which extensive choice the most fastidious cannot fail to select. In Cambric Pocket-handkerchiefs I stand without a rival, for quality and cheapness.—HENRY DIXON, No. 2[illegible]7, Regent st., the corner of Princes-st., Principal Lace-man to her Majesty the Queen.

WINTER OVER COATS, WRAPPERS, &c.—Messrs. BURCH and LUCAS (late J. Albert), respectfully invite gentlemen to view their new and fashionable assortment of PATENT and BEAUFORT BEAVERS, FANCY VESTINGS, TROUSERINGS, &c. for the approaching season; the style and cut of every garment are guaranteed equal to any of the first houses at the West-end, at prices in unison with the economy of the times, feeling confident that gentlemen who may do them the honour will be perfectly satisfied with any garment that leaves their establishment. A large assortment of Great Coats kept ready made in all the different and most approved forms agreeable to the prevailing taste; being made under the superintendence of the proprietors, they are enabled to speak confidently as to their superiority over all garments of a slop description, the which are entirely excluded from this establishment.—52, King William-street, London-bridge, opposite the Statue.

For the protection of the public from fraud and imposition, the Hon. Commissioners of Stamps have directed the Proprietors' Signature to be engraved on the Government Stamp, thus—"A. ROWLAND and SON, 20, Hatton-Garden," which is affixed on the KALYDOR and ODONTO.—Sold by the Proprietors, and by Chemists and Perfumers.— All others are Fraudulent Counterfeits ! ! !

SILVER SUPERSEDED, and those corrosive and injurious Metals, called Nickel and German Silver, supplanted, by the introduction of a new and perfectly matchless ALBATA PLATE.—C. WATSON, 41 and 42, Barbican, and 16, Norton-folgate, aided by a person of Science in the amalgamation of Metals, has succeeded in bringing to public notice the most beautiful article ever yet offered; possessing all the richness of Silver in appearance, with all its durability and hardness—with its perfect sweetness in use, undergoing as it does, a chemical process, by which, all that is nauseous in mixed metals is entirely extracted; resisting all acids; may be cleaned as silver; and is manufactured into every article for the table and sideboard.

C. WATSON begs the Public will understand that this Metal is peculiarly his own, and that silver is not more different from gold, than his metal is from all others; on its intrinsic merits alone he wishes it to be tested; and from the daily increasing eulogiums he receives, he is convinced that nothing can prevent its becoming an article of universal wear.

C. WATSON'S handsomely Illustrated Catalogue and Price Current is just published; and Families who regard economy and elegance, should possess themselves of this useful Book, which may be had gratis, and post-free, from the above address.

Ladies requiring Silks or Velvets for Dresses, Mantles, Cloaks, &c., are particularly invited to a trial of the new Corbeau Silks and Velvets introduced at this house. They will be found not only more durable, but the colour very superior, unaffected by the strongest acid or even sea-water. Black and Grey and Fancy Mourning Silks, Cashmeres, Plaids and Merinos of every description. The Show Rooms are replete with every novelty for mourning, in millinery, flowers, Tulle and Nett Sleeves, Collars Berthes, Head-dresses, trimmings, &c., &c. COD LIVER OIL.—Another extraordinary case of Cure, with additional Testimony of the extraordinary value of this natural remedy in the CURE of GOUT, RHEUMATISM, SCROFULA, DISEASED JOINTS, SPINAL and GLANDULAR AFFECTIONS, LUMBAGO, SCROFULOUS ULCERS, and other external Diseases:—

OPINION OF DR. BREFELD, WITH REMARKABLE CASE OF CURE.

The Oil is of the greatest benefit in cases where the Gout or Rheumatism appear to have seized upon the whole system, and when, as the result of long suffering, the body is wasted, the process of nutrition very slow, there is want of sleep, loss of the vital powers, languid expression of the countenance, contraction of the muscles, &c. &c. Mrs. Mearman, 30 years old, had been confined to her bed, or room, and only in the warm summer months experienced a slight alleviation of her sufferings. Nearly the whole body was attacked, but principally the inferior extremities, back, and shoulders. Walking was entirely prevented by the insupportable pains, stiffness, and swelling of the joints. This patient was wasted, of a bleachy whiteness, and had lost all hope of relief, although originally of a strong and robust constitution. The use of the Oil daily was soon followed by a beneficial result, and, after some time, she was restored to a perfect state of health. This person was, three years from the time he first saw her, perfectly healthy, well nourished, blooming, and of robust appearance.

Sold in bottles, at 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., and 11s. each, by JONES and Co., 201, Strand: SANGER, Oxford-street; HOOPER, chemist, Pall-mall; JOHNSTONE, Cornhill; and all respectable Medicine-vendors in Town and Country.

CAUTION—Observe the seal and address of JONES and CO., 201, STRAND, on the wrapper.

The approaching season is hallowed by one of the most delightful offices of friendship and affection; the interchange of gifts, as remembrances of the donors, and tokens of their esteem for the receivers. While large sums are expended upon the most costly baubles and elegant trifles, it may be requisite to remark, that parents cannot make more appropriate presents than ROWLAND'S MACASSAR OIL for the Hair, ROWLAND'S KALYDOR for the Skin and Complexion, and their much-admired ODONTO, or PEARL DENTIFRICE, for the Teeth, which infallibly tend to the augmentation of that imposing exterior, which Lord Chesterfield justly observes is "a card of recommendation."

, Beware of SPURIOUS IMITATIONS! Ask for "ROWLAND'S" articles.

They are manufactured by THRESHER and GLENNY, and can only be procured at their East India Outfitting Establishment, 152, Strand, London. It is very important to notice, that every article is marked "Thresher's India Gauze," as no other material possesses the same absorbent qualities.—N.B. J. and G. Cox is prepared by an excellent process, which, while it preserves entire all the virtues of this alimentary substance, renders it equally pure and beautiful. Examined by chemical tests, it is found perfectly free from acid, and fully stronger than the best isinglass in the London market, and affords a Jelly (in a few minutes) equal in all respects to, if not richer and more crystalline than, that prepared from calves'-feet."—Agent in London, Mr. HENRY WATSON, No. 11, Old Fish-street, City.—Patent Gelatine Works, Gorgie Mills, Edinburgh.

For Jellies, it will not be found necessary to use eggs, as passing through a flannel bag is sufficient. SCENE FROM BALFE'S NEW OPERA OF "THE DAUGHTER OF ST. MARK," AT DRURY LANE THEATRE.

SCENE FROM "THE DAUGHTER OF ST. MARK."

Our illustration represents the first scene of the second act of Mr. Balfe's already popular opera, entitled "The Daughter of St. Mark," performing at Drury-lane Theatre. The scene is the oratory of Catarina, with a vaulted stone roof: it is divided into two compartments; in the inner one is a large centre window, opening on a balcony, and looking over the Grand Canal, with a moonlight view of Venice. A lamp suspended from the ceiling throws a dim light over the room, and the scenic effect is altogether remarkably successful.

The action is at the close of the scene, at the moment that the curtain of a secret chamber on the left is undrawn, and the Assassins enter, preceded by Moncenigo:—

Mon. (Exultingly)
A kingdom and a crown those tears will dry—
Catarina!—
[Pointing to the body of Catarina, then addressing the Assassins.
With her to Cyprus hie.
[The Assassins go up the stage, as Moncenigo exit at the secret chamber door, and the scene closes them in.

VICTORIA PARK.—A great many hands are now employed in the commencement of operations, and should the weather continue favourable for working, a very considerable progress will be made by the Spring. On Monday the workmen commenced laying down the oak posts and park railings on the boundary adjacent to the Grove-road. The line of road has been struck out for the new iron ornamental bridge which is to cross the Regent's Canal at Bonner's Hall; and a circle has also been marked out for a handsome carriage drive to the chief entrance from Bethnal-green. The improvements on the Old Ford-road, which partly runs through the site of the park, have been nearly completed. The plantations of the park will form an Arboretum on strictly scientific principles.

ROYAL VISIT TO STOWE.—We are enabled to announce that her Majesty has signified her intention of honouring by an early visit his Grace the Duke of Buckingham, at his princely mansion in Buckinghamshire. The precise day is not yet fixed, but we believe we may state that the Court will leave Windsor for Stowe either during the week before, or the week after, Christmas.

CHINESE DRAWING OF AN ENGLISH WAR-STEAMER.

Among our communications received by the Overland Mail, on Wednesday last, is a curious drawing of an English War-Steamer, executed by a Chinese artist, soon after its arrival at Hong-Kong. If we remember rightly, the term applied to one of our steamers, when first seen by the Chinese, was the uncomplimentary cognomen of "Fire-Devil."

The reader must make allowance for the low state of the art of drawing in China, in looking at our engraving; the colours of the drawing itself are, however, very superb. In drawings where perspective is not very strictly required, as in representations of birds, insects, fruit, and flowers, the Chinese artists are very successful; and Viscount Jocelyn assures us that the best pictures of Chinese life are to be found upon the porcelain tea-services manufactured in China.

THE DISTRESSED NEEDLEWOMEN OF THE METROPOLIS.

A meeting of the Society for the Protection and Employment of the Distressed Needlewomen, and for Clothing the Poor, at which Lord Ashley presided, was held at Willis's Rooms on Monday.

The Report gave a pleasing account of the success which had attended the exertions of the Society to provide work for this class of females at a fair price, and stated the gratifying fact, that no instance had occurred of work being detained by the persons employed. It also appeared that the number of day workers recommended from the Institution, and engaged at wages of not less than nine shillings per week, was 975. The circumstance, that so large a number of females of good character have been recommended by the Institution since its establishment, affords a strong proof of the useful nature of such an establishment. It is satisfactory to add, that benevolent individuals had rendered such assistance to the Society, that there was a balance of nearly £400 after paying all the necessary expenses.

Lord Ashley, after dwelling upon the melancholy statements which have been made public, of the destitute condition of that industrious class of women to which the Society direct their especial attention, made a forcible appeal in their favour, and said the Institution had been founded for the purpose of carrying out that good and unquestionable truth, that "the labourer was worthy of his hire." The noble lord impressed upon the meeting, that in all the charities they instituted, in all the money they bestowed, and in all the advice they took upon themselves to give, they should do all they could to encourage that mainstay of our social system, that institution of God himself, the domestic system—the system under which the mother should be kept at home, there to learn and to exercise the high and holy calling of a wife and mother. After alluding to the privations to which poor girls were subjected, Lord Ashley, with equal benevolence and eloquence, proceeded to say:—

How was it that they heard of Needlewomen rising early, and late taking rest, or perhaps no rest at all? He knew one instance of a poor woman having toiled consecutively, day after day, for 20 hours without intermission, and she desisted only because nature would hold out no longer. (Hear.) But what had ground them down to the lowest point of remuneration, if such a term could be applied to such a wretched pittance? First of all, look at the workhouses. In those establishments work was taken by parties maintained at the public expense, who were occupied in making goods for warehouses in the neighbourhood at as low a price as a penny a shirt, and sometimes only at one half-penny. Thus the public funds were used to bring persons into that very house which was held up as a terror to them, for that very house was made the instrument of their ruin and destitution. (Hear, hear.) That was the first thing to be remedied. The Noble Lord then announced that her Majesty had contributed £50, the Queen Dowager a second donation of £10, and Prince Albert £25, to the funds of the Society. Lord Ashley concluded in these terms:—

"When Napoleon asked Madame Campan what he should do for the benefit of France, that excellent woman replied, 'Train up for us a race of mothers.' (Hear, hear.) That was true as holy writ, because it was derived from it; and he hoped they would that day do something effectual towards that great consummation, not being content with saying, 'Be ye warmed and filled;" but, if a brother or a sister be suffering from want and nakedness, at once to acknowledge the relationship, and prove that all are the children of one common Father."

Resolutions pledging the meeting to use exertions to promote the prosperity and efficiency of the Society were agreed to. For ourselves, we may add that an institution which has for its object to succour and protect industry and virtue, deserves the most extended patronage, and if Lord Ashley had not already obtained the respect and gratitude of all who admire unaffected benevolence, his exertions in behalf of this institution must have insured them.

THE METROPOLITAN IMPROVEMENTS.—The various new lines of street which have been suggested in the west and east ends of the metropolis, to effect which above 600 houses have been disposed of and taken down, are now nearly ready for the erection of the houses. At the east end the line is completely marked out from Spitalfields Church to the London Docks, the vaults for the buildings on either side, between High-street, Whitechapel, and Spitalfields Church, being erected. In Cranbourne-street, formerly Cranbourne-alley, several first-rate edifices are being erected, which will be finished in a few months, and south of Sidney-alley, where the opening will be, to form the line from Coventry-street, the houses are also nearly finished. Along the line between Oxford-street and Holborn the gas-pipes are all laid down, and the water-pipes are being now placed in the ground, so that there only requires the order of the commissioners to receive contracts for the houses. Many applications have already been made for plots of ground. At the lower end of Plumtree-street three large houses are being built in the Elizabethan style, with red bricks and stone, under the direction of Mr. Pennethorn, the government architect, as designs after which others are to be erected in that neighbourhood. Nearly adjoining these, a French Protestant church, with school attached, will be raised. During the last few days about a dozen houses have been cleared away to form the line into Broad-street from Great St. Andrew's street, which has much improved that locality. In Belton-street, Christ Church, which is in the parish of St. Giles, and which is formed of Kentish rags and bricks, is completed, and presents a handsome appearance.

CONVERSION OF A WHOLE CONGREGATION OF DISSENTERS.—The Bishop of Chester consecrated a new church at Bolton, on Sunday morning, under somewhat peculiar circumstances. The building was erected twenty-two years ago for the use of the Methodist new connection, and was always well attended, on account of the learning and eloquence of the preacher. About four years ago the minister and congregation held several meetings, the result of which was that they determined on conforming to the Established Church. Since that period the building has been occupied as a chapel of ease to the parish church. A district has been assigned to it under the provisions of the 6th and 7th Victoria, c. 89, and on its consecration it became a parish church, under the name of Christ Church. The building is a plain brick structure, accommodating 80 persons, and is situated in the poorest and most spiritually destitute part of the town. The bishop licensed the Rev. Thomas Berry to the incumbency of the new parish.

HEALTH OF TOWNS.

THE increasing attention paid to social questions by those who have leisure to think and power to act, is one of the most satisfactory symptoms that meet the observer of men and things in the present epoch. Political disputes and party contests we have still, loud and bitter enough, and shall continue to have them. But along with all these men are beginning to feel that there is much to be done that may be effected by other means than changes of ministries and the conflicts of hustings and polling booths. The time was when nearly all our energies were thrown into the field where party battled with party, and where the many, fighting for the few, forgot that the same amount of strength and activity, differently directed, would have wrought out ten times the quantity of real good for themselves and for those below, but not the less among, them. Of late, even the greatest question that agitates the political world is not so much one of constitutional change as of social policy; the largest and most completely organised association of the present day, is united solely by an opposition to the regulations that affect our trade and commerce, and includes within itself men of very opposite opinions on every other question, of very different parties in what are generally understood as politics. The agitating societies of former days were directed against the Church, against the power of the Crown, and sought for organic changes in the Constitution itself. The practical character of the present age is but little inclined to indulge in Utopian visions of impossibly perfect systems of Government. It looks at the actual condition of the world around us—inquires, examines, and elicits facts; and as more men will agree as to a fact than in an abstract opinion, when an evil is clearly pointed out, there is a greater chance of unanimity as to the remedy. There may be a difference of belief, even to the degree of violent hostility, on such a question as the extension of the franchise, but there cannot, among reasonable men, be two opinions as to the advantages of a good system of drainage, or an improvement of the habitations of the poor. It is the gradual operation of a feeling of this kind that is producing the discussions on the possibility of ameliorating the physical condition of the poor; the wealthy, the noble, and the influential, are beginning to perceive that all their duty is not discharged by the due payment of their poor rate, and hence we see societies for the Protection of Female Labour, associations for providing Baths and Washing Houses for the poor, and now the proposal of a society to procure and pro mote legislative and other measures for the Improvement of the Sanatory Condition of Towns.

This society was formed at a public meeting held at Exeter Hall, on Wednesday last, presided over by the Marquis of Normanby, who has paid great attention to the subject, and more than once brought it under the notice of the Legislature.

To one and all of these efforts we say God speed! Some may fail entirely, and others may not effect all the good they purpose; many men will say their objects are impracticable, if not impossible; but when conceived in the spirit of benevolence, and supported by zeal, who can say where is the limit of human exertion, or pronounce what will be its measure of success? Time and determination have ere now produced results little short of miraculous, and will do so again. It was a very few men who commenced the movement that terminated with the abolition of slavery, and who shall say that the evils that lie close around us cannot be conquered by effort guided by the same, or a kindred spirit?

With regard to the society just formed, it has such a wide field for exertion before it, and so many obstacles to overcome, that it would be rash to indulge in speculations as to its future progress. But its great object is one on which a few words may not be altogether useless.

We have heard the present age called "the age of great cities." In England, certainly, the effect of commerce and manufactures has been to congregate men together in immense masses; towns have grown up into cities, and villages have become towns; we have Liverpools, Manchesters, Birminghams, and a Metropolis that has expanded into a magnitude to which there is nothing in the world equal. This crowding of men together, and adding house to house, and street to street, till tracts that may be measured by miles become covered with bricks and mortar, has produced many evils which are too obvious to require pointing out. The districts inhabited by poverty are the seats of disease, occasioned by want, dirt, and bad ventilation, and drainage. The bills of mortality are sad indices of the extent to which these causes are operating, and lately both in London and the larger provincial towns the deaths have been above the average. There are localities in London which are never free from fever, as there are places in Constantinople where the plague may always be found striking down its single victims, ready for that conjuncture of causes which brings it forth to slay its thousands. It is these nests of contagion, where disease is bred and nourished, that should be watched, for there danger is always existing:—

> The pestilence that hangeth in the clouds,
> The bright sun soon disperseth it,—but when
> The rank infection in some dunghill lies,
> There's work for bells and graves.

The poor, who are compelled to dwell in these abodes o wretchedness, cannot struggle against the paralysing influence of all that surrounds them; the rich are, for the most part, wholly ignorant of the state of neighbourhoods which often lie at their very doors. And yet the rich, as being exposed to the same peril that so often makes desolate the family of the poor, are interested in removing the causes of contagion, even if from no better or higher motive than personal safety. But a removal from immediate contact with an evil, too frequently causes it to be forgotten. Anything, therefore, that tends to awake attention to the subject, is praiseworthy, and the first step towards improvement. We are not sanguine of an immediate change at all; nor even at a distant date can we expect a total one; there are too many evils inseparable from poverty and destitution that cannot be remedied while that destitution exists. Bet more, much more, may be done, than has hitherto been attempted. In the future additions that are to be made to our cities and towns, the errors of former builders may be repaired, and their omissions supplied; proper drainage to every new street may be made compulsory. The means of cleanliness may be placed within the reach of all, and the young of another generation accustomed to the habit of it; these are the objects which the societies we have alluded to may endeavour to obtain. In justice to the Government, we must add that the question of the sanatory condition of our towns is engaging its attention. A commission, specially appointed to inquire into it, has already made one report, and is still engaged in farther investigations. The new Society must avoid any appearance of opposition or rivalry with the Executive or the Legislature in a matter that so legitimately falls under their cognizance. Properly conducted, the Society may be the instrument through which the public, or at least the more influential part of it, can materially assist the ruling powers.

THE EXPERIMENTAL SQUADRON OF BRIGS.

Many complaints having arisen that the building of our ships of war was confided principally to the department of the Surveyor of the Navy, a School of Naval Architecture was established for the purpose of educating young men to fill the offices of Master Shipwright, &c., at our naval dock-yards, and the result has been some clever pupils, who now fill those important stations. The Government, willing to encourage science, granted permission to certain persons (the Architectural School included) to compete with the Surveyor of the Navy in building 12-gun brigs on their own plans and specifications. The Flying Fish was built at Pembroke, by Sir W. Symonds. The Espiegle at Chatham, by a committee of the School of Naval Architecture. The Daring at Portsmouth, by Mr. White, of Cowes. The Mutine at Chatham, by Mr. Fincham, Master Shipwright of that yard. The Osprey at Portsmouth, by Mr. Blake, the Master Shipwright there (and one is now on the stocks at the yard of Messrs. Ditchburn and Mare, Blackwall).

In the construction of these vessels there was considerable difference, except that the whole of the builders adopted much of the plan of Sir William Symonds, by giving great breadth of beam, and in other particulars. They were appointed to sail together on a trial excursion and for the purpose of testing them with some of the old vessels—the Cruiser, 16, built in 1828, at Chatham; the Pantaloon, 10, built at Portsmouth; and the Waterwitco, 10, built by Mr. White, of Cowes, for a yacht, and afterwards purchased into the service, were ordered to join them in their trial of sailing—the squadron to be under the directions of Capt. A. L. Corry, in the Firebrand steam-frigate. The whole were commissioned on the 9th September, and assembled at Spithead, from whence they took their departure October 22d, under the command of the following officers:—

The FIREBRAND steam-frigate, Capt. A. L. Corry, as Superintendent. He entered the service in 1805, and was posted July 22d, 1821.

The FLYING FISH, Commander R. Harris, who entered the service in 1817, and attained his present rank 8th June, 1841.

THE DARING, Commander H. J. Matson (who as Lieutenant commanded the Waterwitoh on the coast of Africa), entered the service in 1822, and was made commander 17th July, 1843.

The ESPIEGLE, Commander T. P. Thompson, entered 1822, and present rank 23d November, 1841.

The MUTINE, Commander R. B. Crawford, entered in 1814, and promoted to present rank 23d December, 1842.

The OSPREY, Commander F. Patten, entered in 1814, made commander 10th January, 1827.

The CRUISER, Commander E. G. Fanshawe, entered 1825, present rank 28th August, 1841.

The WATERWITCH, Commander T. F. Birch, entered in 1830, present rank 30th December, 1842.

The PANTALOON, Lieutenant E. Wilson, made 12th October, 1824.

The cruising ground in the first instance was about the latitude of 51 deg. north, and longitude 9 deg. 30 min. west; but the weather being at times extremely severe they were compelled occasionally to shift as far to the southward as 46 deg. north. At the commencement of the trials, for about three weeks, they experienced hard gales, squalls, and heavy seas, that kept them continually wet. When not engaged in trial evolutions, the order of sailing was,

STARBOARD DIVISION.	LARBOARD DIVISION.
Espiegle	Cruiser
Daring	Pantaloon
Mutine	Waterwitch
Osprey	Flying Fish

Firebrand leading.

The following are the particulars relative to the trials:—The brigs were not brought into a line, or had any order in starting, but made sail from the position in which they happened at the time to be.

Soon after quitting Spithead a slight trial took place with the wind at East, and the course West-North-West. The Flying Fish had rather the disadvantage at starting, but after four hours run she gained the lead, with the Pantaloon second. The others were nearly in a line abreast, with the exception of the Osprey, which was about one mile in the rear. The brigs carried royals and studding sails.

Oct. 29. On a wind; moderate weather; royals set; rate of sailing seven knots. Time occupied 2 hours 35 minutes. Position at time of shortening sail: 1st, Flying Fish; 2nd, Daring, not far from each other; 3rd, Pantaloon; 4th, (considerably astern), Osprey; 5th, Waterwitch: 6th, Cruiser. The Mutine and Espiegle were not included in the trial.

Oct. 30. Beating to windward in a fresh breeze; topsails (single reefed), courses, jib, and boom mainsail; heavy head-swell. The Daring got to windward, with the Pantaloon second and near to her, and the Flying Fish at no great distance. The weather came on thick, and the others not placed, but much beaten.

Oct. 31. On a wind; nasty swell; top-gallant breeze; about seven knots. Position at close, after three hours trial: Pantaloon and Waterwitch leading; Daring and Flying Fish at no great distance astern; the rest far to leeward.

Nov. 5. (Daring parted company in the night previous). On a wind; variable; four hours run. Position at close: 1st, Flying Fish; 2nd, Pantaloon; Waterwitch and Mutine equal, the rest astern and to leeward.

Nov. 6. (Daring joined company). Going free; pleasant breeze; at the end of four hours, 1st, Flying Fish; 2nd, Daring; 3rd, Pantaloon; 4th, Mutine; 5th, Cruiser: 6th, Waterwitch and Osprey; 7th, Espiegle.

Nov. 8. On a wind; double-reefed topsails; cross sea. After two hours start Flying Fish carried away her jib boom and struck her foretop-gallant mast. At the close of four hours the positions were: 1st, Daring, well to windward; 2nd, Waterwitch; 3rd, Mutine; 4th, Flying Fish (without her jib); the rest to leeward.

Nov. 18. (No trial till now from the 8th; the squadron scattered by strong gales). On a wind; pleasant breeze; all sail. Position at close: 1st, Flying Fish and Daring close together; 2nd, Espiegle at some distance; all the rest far astern.

Nov. 19. Wind a-beam, rate about eight knots; under all sail; Flying Fish carried away starboard topmast studding sail-yard, and shifted it. Position at the end of four hours: 1st, Flying Fish and Daring nearly equal; 2nd, Mutine; 3rd, Espiegle; 4th, Waterwitch; 5th, Pantaloon; 6th, Osprey; 7th, Cruiser.

Nov. 21. (Without the Pantaloon.) Wind a-beam; under royals; fine breeze; two hours' trial. Positions at the close:—1st, Daring; 2nd, Flying Fish; 3d, Espiegle and Mutine equal; 4th, Waterwitch; 5th, Cruiser; 6th, Osprey.

Nov. 22. Little wind; trial of no importance.

Nov. 25. Stiff breeze; on a wind. Position at close:—1st, Daring; 2nd, Flying Fish; 3rd, Mutine; the others well astern, and to leeward.

Other trials took place, but with much similar results. The Flying Fish and Daring have proved themselves fine sea-boats; in rough weather, the former has the preference. The Daring takes the lead upon the wind, but she has a greater spread of canvass than the Flying Fish, draws two feet more water, carries seventy tons of ballast, whereas the latter has only thirteen tons. The two vessels may, however, be considered as nearly equal—the Daring, from the reasons we have stated, going to windward when close at it; the Flying Fish beating her when running free. The former rolls very much when before the wind, and pitches to straining everything in a head sea upon a wind. Still the Daring is, most assuredly, a beautiful vessel.

The brigs returned into port at Plymouth yesterday week, where they are ordered to refit; and it is reported that the Mutine, Espiegle, and Cruiser, are to proceed to the East Indies, the others to the coast of Africa, to suppress the slave-trade.

A PRINCELY PURCHASE.—Luton Hoo, or Luton Park, Bedfordshire, with the mansion and estate of near 4000 acres of land, belonging to the Marquis of Bute, has been purchased by Mr. Warde, of Cloptan House, Warwickshire, for £160,000.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

PARISIANA.

(From our own Correspondent.)

PARIS, Wednesday.

At your very doors a marvellous change is preparing. When Louis Philippe was at Windsor, he said to a certain commercial deputation, "There is one infallible recipe for our our entente cordiale: join your money with ours; make railroads—peace and amity must follow upon community of interest, and that constant communication by steam which approaches nearest in rapidity to the interchange of thought." On the road to Boulogne this revolution is begun: in a year or two you may breakfast in London at eight, and dine at six in Paris. How incalculable the results!—how immense the change! From ten to twelve hours to Dover, from five to twenty-four across the Channel (when feasible), was the time in 1815. Even the malle poste took thirty-eight hours for the journey from Calais to Paris; twenty-seven hours in 1820, and seventeen now. But the great change is in the access to Boulogne; for two-thirds of the year western winds blow perpendicularly on Boulogne, rendering its approach most perilous, when even possible, for sailing vessels; whilst steamers readily defy the danger. The first steam-boat that entered Boulogne operated a great revolution in intercourse—brought London 35 kilometres (and those the worst part of the road) nearer Paris, and began the ruin of Calais. Even so recently as 1831, the passengers annually to Boulogne were only 11,131; to Calais, 38,566; total, 49,727. Now, already in 1843, to Boulogne the number of arrivals was 56,868; to Calais, only 19,079; and the total had augmented to 75,937; whilst the population of Boulogne has increased from 10 to 40 thousand! Calais, however, retains an enduring advantage from its past intercourse: a colony of 9000 artizans, manufacturers of tulle, has been established by the English in one of its suburbs.

Within a few days, the mechanics and artizans of the capital, clubbing their small savings together, have flocked to the Bourse in such numbers, that it is expected the Government must interfere, and prevent their becoming the victims of low and artful stock-jobbers. Two circumstances have created great excitement amongst the litterateurs in Paris. It appears decided that, against every assertion and expectation, the journal La Presse, availing itself of a slip of the pen in the treaty with the publisher who bought Chateaubriand's manuscripts, his "Memoirs Beyond the Grave" (Memoires d'outre tombe), are to be dealt out piecemeal in the feuilletons of the above newspaper. The two reviews, the most in vogue in France, "La Revue des Deux Mondes," and "La Revue de Paris," having enhanced upon the degradation of literature, through the instrumentality of the newspaper novel, "Roman-feuilleton," Alexandre Dumas, seconded by all the most celebrated novel writers in France, has begun a war of the most terrible aspect against M. Buloz, the proprietor of both the reviews above-mentioned, and who is also Commissary of the King for the supervision of the Theatre Français. Most extraordinary anecdotes, illustrative of the relations of authors and publishers have been revealed, and have created deep interest and astonishment.

Literary men, philosophers, and philanthropists,—the whole of the thinking world was convulsed by Voltaire, when he seized on the execution of the Protestant Calas, to demonstrate the persecution of Catholic bigots, and the judicial murders committed through their influence. A great sensation has been produced in Paris by M. Mary Lafond proving, in his "Histoire du Midi de la France," by undeniable documents, that Voltaire had drawn on his imagination for his facts. In bringing forward the documents which determined the sentence of the judges, M. Mary Lafond proved—firstly, that the Capitouls, the grand judges of Toulouse, and the counsellors of La Tournelle did no more than obey the dictates of their conscience, in the condemnation of Calas; and, secondly, that if Voltaire, incited as much by his hatred of every form of religion as by his love of justice, had not persuaded the Cardinal de Berius, the Count de St. Florentin, the Count de Choiseul, Nicolaï, Richelieu, Dumilaville, and even Mdme. de Pompadour, to exert all their influence in this affair, the memory of Calas would have remained stained with a fearful crime, instead of being canonized by the philosophers as an innocent martyr.

Other novelties have likewise produced sensation in the Paris literary world. Heine, the celebrated German author and poet, a converted Israelite, for many years residing in Paris, has produced a new poem, entitled "Germany," full of reckless wit, here and there somewhat free-thinking and obscene; it attacks the King of Prussia and his royal colleagues with the arms of withering ridicule. The political world look at this work with anxiety, for it is published close upon that of Freeligiath, another popular poet of Germany, who, like his celebrated colleague, Herwegh, now in Paris, returned with insult the pensions of the King of Prussia, and attacked him unsparingly—whilst the Gazette d'Augsburg has migrated from the Bavarian dominions, in order to be able to vindicate its liberal opinions without censorship and restriction. The other literary novelties, independent of the amusing illustrated new-year publications, like the "Etrangers à Paris," are not very remarkable.

A pretty boudoir novel, by Countess Dash, is redolent of the Louis XV. spirit and Pompadour perfume—"La Chine Ouverte"—"China Laid Open," by "Old Nick;" and the painter Bourgat has higher merit; whilst a rechauffé of a subject upon which a hundred authors have written, not excepting Ben Jonson, in English; Voltaire, in French; and the witty Abbate Casti, in Italian (who, by the by, turned the subject into an opera buffa, to please the philosophical Emperor Joseph II.) This new work, I repeat, is entitled "Catilina Romantique." It beats everything in its absurdity—as the Americans say—"to immortal smash." The literary wags of Paris are in expectation of a great treat. M. Saint Marc Girardin, the professor, deputy, and writer in the Débats; Sainte Beuve, the classical critic; and Merinée, the author of "Clara Gazul;" are the three new academicians elected. Now it happens that it falls to the lot of Victor Hugo to make the opening and responding speeches to the two first of these literary characters on their reception, and they have been the most unsparing enemies of the romantic school, of which he is the head. Amidst the long orations and unsparing compliments and eulogies customary on these occasions, a great deal of ill-concealed animus is expected to break out, and in the literary sparring nothing but "facers" will be given.

Parisian Society is deeply agitated by the remarkable number of sudden deaths that have followed each other, even amongst the fair sex. But three days since, Madame Turrelle, the wife of a banker, fell down dead in the street; and the young and lovely Madame La Comtesse de Bethisy, an illustrious daughter of the Duke de Rohan Chabot, whilst playing in her bed with her infant suddenly fell back, and when the nurse raised her she was dead. The Parisian resource, however, for all increase of sorrows, is to drown thought in a wilder vortex of pleasure. Masquerades and fancy balls are now to begin long before the ordinary period, and every means is employed to render these mad festivitives as attractive and as intoxicating as possible.

PARIS FASHIONS FOR WINTER.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Every change of weather or of season, every fresh circumstance, however trivial, or event however great, is seized upon by our Parisian élégantes as the occasion for new triumphs of toilette. What wonder then that the approach of the winter season should bring forth under new and charming forms all those becoming resources with which the fair coquettes shield themselves from its inclemency; at the same time that they enhance their charms. Fur, the symbol of rank, in the north, as gems and feathers in Oriental climes—fur is more than ever in the highest vogue. In all the carriages rolling along the Bois de Boulogne are seen ladies wrapped in Palatine mantles trimmed with Zibeline sables—Russian mantles in velvet with pelerine and boider of Gribe—or ample Vitchemas, which, when left open under the influence of a stray sunbeam, display a splendid lining of the same fur. Velvet bonnets, trimmed with creeping willows, or follettes, and feathers glacées and with mancinis inside, composed of roses half shaded by tulle, producing a charming effect, encircling the face—are much worn with these mantles. These bonnets are also often trimmed with two large rosettes made of velvet and black lace, from which fall two lappets of the same material. The prevailing shape for bonnets is perfectly straight and of a medium size. Heron feathers are much worn for the promennde and have a very distingué appearance.

Many of our élégantes wear, over high dresses, pardessus or paletots, half wadded, drawn in at the waist, with a pelerine. The disadvantage of this form of dress, distinguished and graceful as it is when worn with good taste, is that a little exaggeration or alteration may make it quite the reverse.

The douillettes, which have been laid aside for some years, are now again in vogue; but have more trimming than formerly: gimp and velvet laces are much used for this purpose. The Vicomtesse de B. wore one, with facings and cross folds, and a châtelaine in velvet. This latter material, now going so much out of fashion in male attire, becomes daily more general in feminine toilette.

Our élégantes have added another to the list of their borrowings from our grandmothers, and have adopted (not, however, without alteration and correction) the caraco, or kirtle, which we find in all the journals of fashion of 1786. One of the most distinguished of our lionnes, the Duchesse de C., wore, the other day, a dress made in this manner; the body close up to the throat; the kirtle descended so far below the waist, as to admit of two little pockets placed obliquely, one on each side. The sleeves of this dress were nearly tight at the top, enlarging sufficiently at the wrist to show a full under-sleeve beneath, and were trimmed with a small jockey. This form of dress, made in Pekin velonté, in poult de soie glacé, or silk shot with four different colours, is extremely elegant; when made of one colour, it is trimmed with three little bands of velvet, like that worn by the Comtesse de V. the other day. Lace is also used as a trimming for these dresses—in fact it is in universal request for every species of garniture, especially for satin or velvet bonnets.

Folds and bands of velvet on satin bonnets are very distingué. I will give you, as an example, a description of the elegant morning costume worn the other day by La Mdlle. P—— de T——; it was composed of a bonnet of deep blue satin, trimmed with mancinis of pink satin ribbon inside; a douilette of iron-grey satin, with gimp and velvet to match, and a sable pelerine. Velvet capotes, trimmed with the same material, are in very good taste, but great care is requisite in the arrangement of the trimming, to avoid a heavy look, which is to be feared in the employing of this material for half-dress.

Caps and turbans in general aim at an Oriental tournure; materials brocaded in gold are much used for this purpose. We have remarked at the Italiens, and at those few soirées which have anticipated the season, a cashmere turban of an entirely new form. It is composed of a maize-coloured scarf, with a border embroidered in silver and coloured silk, and an Arabian fringe. Another coiffure in great favour is made of dahlia-coloured velvet, with a bouquet of velvet flowers, in colours to match, on the right side, and a deep fringe of pearls on the left. Agrafes of flowers are so much in vogue that they are placed on bonnets as on dresses. But as the latter, for evenings, are so often worn with two skirts, something even prettier than these bunches has been imagined to loop up the outer skirt: the flowers are arranged in a chain, which is placed at each side on a line with the knee. These chains are made of mixed flowers, are narrow at the top and terminate with a large flower at the end. It is useless to say that the trimming of the body and sleeves is to match. The head-dress similar to the rest, encircles the head in the form of a crown, but on one side droops a graceful branch, also terminated by a flower larger than the rest. Another trimming equally pretty and new is composed of ten bunches of flowers, made of roses and other flowers of the colour of flamme de pouch, as this colour has a very good effect by candle light. These ten bunches loop up the dress all round at regular intervals; rows of cord symmetrically arranged forming en tablier in front.

It is impossible, however, to form an idea of effect from the description of detached portions of dress—two toilettes which I have lately seen worn by élégantes of the highest order will give your fair readers a far better notion of the ensemble. La Baronne T—— wore the other day, in the Champs Elysées, a black velvet bonnet trimmed with a single white marabout glacé black. Her dress was of garnet-coloured satin; the body made high, plain, and forming into a point in front; the sleeves rather loose at the top, and very large at the wrist—full under sleeves of muslin with very small cuffs. Agrafes of a lozenge form to match the dress, surrounded with lace, were placed down the front, gradually increasing in size towards the bottom. A trimming of a similar kind ornamented the jockeys which surrounded the opening of the sleeves; a handkerchief with an heraldic crest, and gloves à fermoir, completed this elegant costume. The Mddle. de B——, so celebrated for her exquisite taste, appeared in a bonnet of currant-coloured satin, trimmed round the front with lace, which also ornamented the crown, and was caught up under a bouquet of mixed flowers. Her dress à Caraco was chaméléon, and that with four different colours; the body high, opening in front, without a collar, the front à nervures. The line of the waist slightly sloped towards the middle, and the kirtle round and slightly cut away in front, like the fashionable coats of two or three years ago, gradually increasing in depth behind. The sleeves tight at top and rather loose, and turned up at the wrist.

FRANCE.

The Paris papers announce an outbreak in Switzerland, arising out of religious differences. The movement appears to have been of a serious character, but details are not given. It appears that the Radical party in the Canton of Lucerne had made an attempt to overthrow the Government, but failed. In seeking to obtain possession of four pieces of cannon they were defeated. One letter expresses fears that a universal outbreak "against the Jesuits" would take place in all the Protestant Cantons.

The Duke and Duchess d'Aumale have returned te France. They were received at Marseilles with much enthusiasm. The preparations to receive them were on a large scale. A triumphal arch had been erected near that part of the port which touches the Canebiese. On its summit were on either side blazoned the arms and initials of the Duke and Duchess d'Aumale, and the sides and front were decorated with trophies representing the battles of Tangier, Mogador, the Smala, and Biscora. They landed at the triumphal arch. The Princes were on horseback, and the Princess and the ladies of honour were placed in an open carriage, and escorted by a squadron of hussars, a brigade of gendarmes, and hundreds of lighted torches. They traversed the Canebiese, the rue St. Feriol, to the Hotel d'Orient, in the rue Grignon, the air resounding with the firing of guns, the ringing of bells, and the voices of thousands of persons shouting "Vive le Duc d'Aumale," "Vive la Duchesse," "Vive le Prince de Joinville," "Vive le Roi," &c.

At ten o'clock the Royal party went to the theatre; their reception was most enthusiastic. The Princess is not regularly handsome, but her general appearance is dignified and agreeable. She is very pale and rather short in stature, her magnificent auburn hair hanging tastefully on her well rounded shoulders. Her dress was simple and elegant—white satin; on her neck she wore a necklace of topazes, a present from Prince de Joinville.

The Journal des Débats states that a letter from Vienna alludes to a report from Constantinople, of the dangerous illness of the Sultan, but it does not seem to attach credence to the report.

The chief domestic topic at Paris, as in London, is the weather. The cold is very severe in the former capital. On Monday morning, at six o'clock, the centrigrade thermometer marked 9. 4 degrees below zero (15 Fahrenheit). The last severe winter felt in Paris was in 1838, the thermometer of the Observatory being down to 19 degrees centrigrade (2 below zero of Fahrenheit).

It was believed that, should the temperature continue to fall for three days more, the Seine would be frozen over. All the accounts received from the provinces, from Germany, Belgium, Holland, and Italy, concurred in announcing the increasing rigour of the season.

On Monday, the loan of 200,000,000f. was adjudged to De Rothschild, Brothers, at 84f. 75c.; the united houses of Hottingeur and Co., and Durand and Co., of Paris, and Baring, Brothers, of London, bid 83f. 95c. The new loan rose 3 per cent. premium in the course of the day.

A fire broke out on Sunday last at the wine stores of M. Buhner, in the Rue Cadet, which occasioned loss of life as well as much damage to property. At nine o'clock, as one party of firemen, exhausted with fatigue, had been relieved by a party from the Rue Vieux Colombier, a fresh disaster added to the calamity. A wall fell out into the street and crushed several persons. The dead body of a fireman was withdrawn from the ruins, together with ten wounded, two of whom shortly afterwards expired. A Municipal Guard had his foot crushed, and several persons of the neighbourhood, who had exerted themselves most heroically, were more or less wounded. The parish priest of the church of Nôtre Dame de Lorette, who attended at the scene of desolation with one of his curates, shared the dangers of the humblest mechanic. The amount of property destroyed is said to be no less than £12,000.

SPAIN.

The letters from Spain bring accounts of more sanguinary atrocities. On the 30th ult., the second son of Zurbano, together with Don José Baltanas, a captain in the army, and Zurbano's secretary, and Don Francisco Hervias, a cloth manufacturer of Escaray, were shot at Logrono, at seven in the morning.

Don Feliciano Zurbano, the young man now shot, was a lieutenant in the army, and twenty-four years of age: his brother Don Benito, who was shot a day or two before, was eighteen. A great many arrests have taken place in the north, and amongst others Senor Gamboa, formerly Finance Minister, and who has been staying at St. Sebastian for some time, has just been thrown into prison at Toloso, on the charge of being implicated in the late unfortunate movement. The Carlist general, Iturbe, passed through Vittoria on the 1st instant, under arrest, on the way to Logrono, to be tried by a court martial, on the same charge.

There is still no certain intelligence respecting Zurbano, the leader of the late movement. The Logrono correspondent of the Eco del Comercio writes that his house had been razed to the ground, his furniture burned, and his horses and cattle destroyed. The ten men of his band who voluntarily surrendered have been sentenced respectively to six or ten years confinement in presidios. Colonel Ortega, Aide-de-Camp of General Prim, had been sent off under an escort to Cadiz, whence he was to be transported to the Havannah.

Our latest accounts from Madrid inform us that the Bill for the new Spanish Constitution has passed the Chamber of Deputies by a very large majority, so that the Cabinet of Narvaez may now be considered as firmly placed in power as it is possible for any majority to be in Spain under present circumstances. It is, however, a purely despotic Cabinet, as the recent executions prove.

PORTUGAL.

Our advices from Lisbon, which are to the 3rd instant, present nothing worth particular notice, and the passing of the Indemnity Bill in the Cortes, has divested the proceedings of that body of much of their interest. In the Chamber of Deputies, the Government have presented two projects; one for the establishment of savings' banks throughout the country, and the other for the establishment of a bank in the Corn Market department, for the sole purpose of lending money at 6 per cent. to the farmers, on the security of the corn there deposited by them.

A Royal decree has been issued ordering the collection of the new duties, imposed by the Chamber, on wine and salt, and on the importation of foreign hemp, flax, and corn.

THE WEST INDIA MAIL.

LOSS OF THE ACTÆON STEAMER.—The Royal Mail Company's ship, Avon, Captain Strutt, has arrived at Southampton with mails from Tampico, to Oct. 26; Vera Cruz, to Nov. 2; Havannah, to the 10th; Demerara, to the 3rd; Trinidad, to the 5th; Grenada, to the 10th; St. Thomas, to the 15th; and Bermuda to the 23rd, being the day of the Avon's departure.

We regret to state that this vessel brings an account of the total loss of the Actæon steam-ship, belonging to the Royal Mail Company, on the morning of the 20th of October. She was rounding the Punta Canoa, at eight in the morning, the Popa, or high land, within the city being S.S.E. The Actæon steering south, struck at 8.40, upon a sunken rock, supposed to be the Negrillo, but which, according to the chart, should have been nearer the land than the ship then was. Sail was made to force her on shore, or into shallow water. Precisely, however, at twenty minutes past eleven she went down in 6½ fathoms.

The captain, officers, and crew, on this trying occasion, behaved with the most praiseworthy courage. The captain was the last to leave the ill-fated vessel. All hands were safely got into the boats, and steered for Carthagena, from which they were about nine miles distant. They landed in safety, and were hospitably received by the authorities. There were only three passengers on board at the time of the disaster.

The Actæon makes the fourth vessel lost since the establishment of the Royal Mail Steam Company, being a quarter of the number of steam ships it has afloat. They are—the Medina, the Isis, the Solway (in which so many lives were sacrificed), and now this unfortunate ship completes the number. The Actæon, however, was the smallest of the four, being only 600 tons burthen. Her value, exclusive of stores, &c., was about £25,000. It is not known whether the Actæon was insured.

THE CAPTURE OF THE FORT OF SAMUNGHUR.—In our last we gave the details of the capture of the Fort of Samunghur, received by the overland mail. A correspondent, who was present at the engagement, has forwarded us some additional particulars, and also an accurate sketch of the fort. This interesting sketch is engraved, and will be presented to our readers next week, as the pressure of important subjects prevents us from doing so in the present number. Our correspondent states that the fort was defended by 5 or 600 men, 70 were killed in the fort, 150 prisoners taken, and the rest threw themselves over the walls, or escaped through one of the gates, only to be killed by a troop of the 5th Madras Cavalry, under the orders of Captain Græme. The colours of the 20th Regt. of M. N. I. were placed on the breach by Ensign Robson, assisted by Lieut. and Adjutant White, both of the same regiment.

To the list of officers whose daily rate of pay is twenty-five shillings, have been added the names of Major-General Sir Frederick Stovin, K.C.B., and Sir Guy Campbell, Bart., two Peninsular campaigners of considerable standing and merit.

IRELAND.

The Repeal Association.—The Repeal Association met on Monday. The Chairman was Mr. Henry Grattan, M.P., who indulged in a very long and rather violent speech. In the course of it he said the English must turn out the Tories, or be content to lose Ireland; for, in the words of Mr. Burke (whom he quoted extensively in the course of his remarks), they (the Tories) had violated the law, and proclaimed anarchy. Yes; thirteen of the best Judges of the land, and three of the law Lords had declared that they had violated the law by the the State prosecutions; and yet up started the Prime Minister in his place in the House of Commons, and announced that he was ready to vindicate his atrocity. (Cheers.) He (Mr. Grattan) came forward, therefore, to join in demanding inquiry into the late State prosecutions against O'Connell and his fellow-martyrs, in order to prevent that anarchy which was sure to follow in any country subject to such acts of gross injustice as the present Tory Ministry were inflicting on Ireland.—Mr. O'Connell followed in a speech in which much strange language occurred. The hon. and learned gentleman excused himself for not reporting on his ten propositions about the Union, according to promise. He then launched into some furious diatribes against the English press for accusing him of inconsistency. As a specimen of this effusion, we extract the epithets applied by Mr. O'Connell to a writer in a Whig London journal. The hon. and learned gentleman said, "The circumstance of his having given two characters of Lord J. Russell under different circumstances, was made the ground of an atrocious and insolent calumny against him by a writer, a miscreant who, whilst he (Mr. O'Connell) had been labouring for his country, was grovelling in a garret. He had brought his country under the notice of the whole civilized world—he had made known her wants, her sufferings, her fidelity, her religious perseverance, and all those high qualities which distinguish her people; and was this the recompense he was to receive from a nameless scoundrel scribbler in London? (Cheers.) He had already replied to him in the severest language, and what other could he have used towards a base calumniator of that kind? (Hear, hear.) He had called him a miscreant, a calumniator, and a foul liar. He repeated these epithets, for they were suitable ones, unless, indeed, the language could supply him with harsher, in which case he would admit that those terms were too mild. (A laugh.) Oh, the writer of that article was a base, a brutal, and, perhaps, a bribed wretch, for assailing him in that way. He did not care whether he was bribed or not. If he were a rascal for nothing he only proved himself the greater scoundrel. (A laugh.) He proclaimed every word of his accusation to be a falsehood." Appropriate language this, for Conciliation Hall. Mr. O'Connell announced the rent for the week to be £333 3s. 3d.

Frightful Parricide.—A murder of an atrocious kind was committed last week at Mullinahone. It appears that as William Shea, of Kilvemnon (within five miles of Callan, on the Fethard-road), was proceeding to spread a quantity of seed wheat for his son-law, named Egan, who is sick of a fever, he was hindered from the performance of his charitable office by his son, Michael Shea, who struck him on the head with a stone, and afterwards with a spade, and killed him on the spot. His skull is fractured in a most frightful manner. It appears that young Shea had been at variance with his sister's husband, the aforesaid Egan, and hence arose the altercation. The Mullinahone police were speedily in attendance, but the parricide had fled; he attempted to drown himself, but was prevented by two men, who happened to have seen him. An inquest was held, and a verdict returned according to the circumstances. The parricide is a pledge breaker. Had it not been for the timely interposition of a neighbour, he would, in all probability, have killed his wife also, with a stick or some weapon, on hearing her exclaim, "Oh, you murderer, why did you kill your poor father?"

Another Murder.—Mr Samuel M Kerrin, a respectable farmer, residing at Carrickbanaghan, county Sligo, about eight miles from the town of Sligo, was barbarously murdered on Tuesday night. He had just said his prayers in his bed-room, on a ground floor, and was stooping down to untie his shoes, when the assassin fired through the window a gun or blunderbuss, loaded with two balls, both of which entered his head, and he immediately died. There is no ground for believing that the crime proceeded from any motive of a religious, party, or political nature. The deceased was much liked by all classes, and of a most kind and charitable disposition; in fact, the universal feeling of the country is, that the awful deed originated in very different motives.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

Fracas in the Sporting World.—On Tuesday, in the Court of Exchequer, an action was tried, Scott v. O'Brien, for an assault which took place on the 1st of July, when the famous Running Rein case was tried. The parties are well known in the sporting world, and the assault appeared to have originated out of some dispute connected with sporting transactions. The nature of it will be understood by the following evidence given by Captain Hugh Brabazon Higgins. He stated that he was outside Westminster Hall on the 1st of July. There were a great number of persons assembled connected with the turf. Witness was walking with Captain Garth when Mr. Scott joined them. It was about two o'clock in the afternoon when witness observed O'Brien approaching. He seemed so much excited that witness remarked to Captain Garth that he looked very warlike. As O'Brien passed witness, Captain Garth and Scott, he said, addressing Captain Garth, "How can you walk with that wretch?" Witness had no doubt the observation was meant for Scott. Scott immediately replied by saying, "What do you mean, you thief?" O'Brien then attempted to take a stick out of Captain Garth's hand, but did not succeed. He then rushed at Scott, struck him several blows, and knocked him down. Scott got up with an intention of defending himself, but was immediately knocked down again. In fact, he had no chance whatever. Witness observed O'Brien take plaintiff by the hair of the head, and inflict on him several blows whilst plaintiff was stretched at full length on the flagway. There was no further provocation for the assault than what witness had stated. Witness saw plaintiff in a day or two after, and his face still bore marks of the assault. Witness had heard there was a dispute between plaintiff and defendant, which was referred to Captain Rous, who had decided in Scott's favour. Witness also heard that defendant had given the plaintiff the guarantee of a most respectable gentleman for payment of his debt. Was not walking arm-in-arm with plaintiff when the assault took place. Knew plaintiff, but not intimately. Had dined with him once. Also knew defendant by meeting him at Tattersall's and elsewhere. Scott was at Tattersall's the evening of the day on which the assault was committed.—Mr. Travers, the eminent surgeon, was called to prove that he saw the plaintiff shortly after the accident, when his face exhibited some severe contusions.—After some other evidence respecting the transaction, Mr. Jervis then addressed the jury for the defendant. He said it was now quite clear that Mr. O'Brien believed that Mr. Scott had been propagating reports on the turf prejudicial to his honour, and that he had been anxious to obtain an explanation from him. Stung with these imputations, which were as slanderous as they were unfounded, and which went to charge Mr. O Brien with being a levanter, and desirous of escaping from his honourable engagements. Mr. O Brien, upon seeing Mr. Scott walking with Captain Garth and Captain Higgins did use the expression "wretch," as deposed to. Now "wretch" was an unmeaning word, it might mean anything; but the word "thief," which Mr. Scott used in reply, was far more offensive, especially when applied by him to Mr. O'Brien. The defendant could not receive a greater provocation, and he inflicted such chastisement on Mr. Scott, as any one, under such circumstances, might expect from a man whose temper was not under perfect control. The Lord Chief Baron thought that a gentleman who applied the word "wretch" to another must not be surprised if the word "thief" was retorted. There was no evidence that the plaintiff had previously done the defendant any injustice.—The jury, after a short consultation, returned with a verdict for the plaintiff—Damages, £100.

ASSIZE INTELLIGENCE.

A WOMAN ACCUSED OF POISONING HER FATHER.

At the assizes at Chester, a young woman of twenty, named Mary Gallop, was tried on the charge of poisoning her father, Richard Gallop, at Monk's Coppenhall, on the 2nd of November, by the administration of arsenic.

The Attorney-General for the Principality, Mr. Temple, and Mr. Townsend, were counsel for the prosecution; and Mr. Trafford for the prisoner.

From the evidence adduced in support of the charge, it appeared that about eight months ago, the deceased, who was a joiner, and his family, removed to Crewe, in the township of Monk's Coppenhall, for the purpose of working at the extensive works belonging to the Grand Junction Railway Company. The deceased and his wife did not live happily together, and about six months ago the latter committed suicide by cutting her throat. After that the family consisted of the prisoner, her father, the daughter of his wife by a former husband, and a lodger named William Fraser. After the death of his wife, the prisoner's father treated her with considerable severity, and on one occasion, when she had roasted some potatoes too hard, he threatened to beat her with a strap. This she complained of to her half-sister, and said that as she had no comfort at home she would go to service. During the time the prisoner was residing in Liverpool she had become acquainted with a young man named Duval, and about the beginning of October, there being a cheap train from Crewe to Liverpool, the prisoner announced her intention of going by it, but her father was very angry with her, and refused to allow her to go, as he said it was only for the purpose of seeing her sweetheart, and he disapproved of the connection. Shortly after that the prisoner purchased a pennyworth of arsenic for the purpose, as she said, of destroying rats and mice. Subsequently she purchased a second pennyworth, and on the second of November she purchased two pennyworth. About three weeks before the last-mentioned day the father of the prisoner became ill, and so continued up to that day, when, after partaking of some arrow-root, he was seized with violent vomitting, which increased during the night, and early on the morning of the 3rd of November, he died. A surgeon attended him during the night and treated him for cholera. On the Sunday morning a constable named Kinty went to the house and saw the prisoner. He told her he had come for the purpose of making inquiry respecting the death of her father, and cautioned her. After this he proceeded to put a number of questions to her, which, together with her answers, he produced.

Mr. Trafford objected to this evidence being admissible, as it had been made by the prisoner under inducement, and he cited the case of the King and Drew, quoted in the 2nd vol. of Russell on Crime, p. 829.

The learned Judge overruled the objection.

It was proved by the evidence of Mr. Stevenson, a surgeon, that the body of the deceased, on post-mortem examination, presented all the appearances internally of having been acted on by some irritant poison, and both he and Mr. Rayner, of Stockport, were of opinion that death was caused by the effects of arsenic.

It was attempted to elicit, in behalf of the prisoner, that she was labouring under insanity, but the only facts deposed to by the witnesses on this point were that about six months ago, at the time her mother committed suicide, her conduct was rather strange, and that she did not sleep for a whole week, and that the mother of the prisoner had been insane, and several times attempted to destroy herself.

Mr. Trafford addressed the jury for the prisoner at some length, contending that the case was enveloped in so much doubt that the jury could not safely convict, that the probability was that the deceased had taken the arsenic by mistake, and that if administered by the prisoner at all, it was when she was labouring under the effects of insanity.

The learned Judge briefly summed up the case to the Jury, telling them that if they believed the prisoner had administered the arsenic, it was their duty to find her guilty. As to the plea of insanity, his lordship observed that there was no evidence to support it. That was a species of defence too much relied on of late years, to the danger of public security, and the great hindrance of justice.

The jury consulted together for about five minutes, and then pronounced a verdict of Guilty, but begged strongly to recommend the prisoner to mercy.

The Judge.—What, recommend a prisoner to mercy who has been guilty of the murder of a parent!

The learned Judge having placed the black cap on, proceeded to pass sentence on the prisoner. His lordship said—"Mary Gallop, after a long and patient trial, you have been found guilty by the jury, upon evidence which could leave no doubt, of the murder of your own father. That murder was committed by the most odious and detestable of all means—those of poison—an act of deliberation, evidently meditated some time before, carried into execution with perseverance, with great art and contrivance, and I wish I could see any symptoms in the conduct you afterwards exhibited of repentance, or any feelings of remorse for what you have done. It is impossible for me to show you any mercy. Prepare for that awful account to which you sent the author of your being with little or no preparation at all. Seek for the mercy of God; repent of this and all your sins; and by that means seek for that mercy hereafter which it is not in my power, consistently with my public duty, to show you here." His lordship then passed sentence of death upon her in the usual form, and the prisoner walked from the bar with a steadfast step, having manifested throughout the whole trial little or no consciousness of the situation in which she stood, beyond a wild and almost incessant roll of the eye, and an occasional flush of the countenance.

[The verdicts of juries have been much discussed of late. That given in the case of Belaney has been strongly censured, at least by implication; and in the recent case of alleged robbery at the Soho Bazaar, the decision has been impugned as if contrary to evidence, or from a supposed leaning towards a rich prisoner. Generally speaking, we think it a dangerous, or at least an unprofitable thing, to discuss the verdicts of juries. They hear the sworn testimony, and have to judge of various circumstances, some of which, perhaps, do not appear in the report, and credit should be given to them for coming to an honest and just decision. In the above case of parricide, however, there is a most strange circumstance. The French law, we are aware, admits of circumstances of extenuation in cases of murder, which reduce the punishment, but what extenuation there can be for parricide it would be very difficult to say. The Judge (Mr. Baron Gurney) might well express his astonishment. If the jury did not believe the girl guilty, they ought to have acquitted her, but it would indeed be a novel thing to make degrees in the crime of parricide. We think the Judge did some service, also, when he discouraged the practice which has of late been too much abused, of endeavouring to explain away guilt by pleas of insanity.]

The Murder of Mr. Inchbald.—At the assizes at York, on Tuesday, William Kendrew, aged 22, farm-labourer, and John Kendrew, 24, shoemaker, brothers, were charged, the former with the wilful murder of Mr. William Inchbald, at Dunsforth, in the parish of Aldborough, in the West Riding, and the latter with feloniously harbouring and maintaining William Kendrew, well knowing him to have committed a felony in shooting William Inchbald. The circumstances will, no doubt, be in the recollection of our readers. The deceased was shot on the evening of the 28th of September, on his return from Boroughbridge market, and was found dying in the road. The deceased was in the habit of carrying large sums of money about him, and exhibiting them in public houses. It did not appear that he had been robbed on this occasion. The evidence was entirely circumstantial, and the jury, after an absence of ten minutes, returned with a verdict of Guilty against William Kendrew, and of Acquittal as regarded John Kendrew. Mr. Justice Coleridge sentenced William Kendrew to death. The wretched man appeared wholly unmoved, and left the bar in the most careless manner, exclaiming, as he went, "Thank ye, if that be all."

POLICE.

The Forged Transfer at the Bank of England.—Committal of Burgess.—On Wednesday Burgess was finally examined at the Mansion-house, the evidence of two witnesses having completed the case.—Mr. Charles Chetham Lawrence, of No. 8, Lincoln-place, New North-road, Middlesex, stated that he was a cashier in the banking-house of Sir John Lubbock and Co., in Mansion-house-street. On Thursday, the 3rd of September, about 20 minutes before two o'clock in the afternoon, the check produced for the sum of £8000, drawn by Mr. Charles Keyser upon Sir John W. Lubbock and Co., was presented to him for payment by a person who was not known to him, but who was accompanied by, he verily believed, the prisoner Burgess. Witness inquired the name of the party presenting the check, upon which the person who accompanied the prisoner gave the name of Oxenford. Witness then inquired how they would have the amount of the check?—upon which one of them said, "in gold," or "part in gold," or words to that effect. Witness then stated, that as they wanted the money in gold, they had better get it at the Bank of England, and he would give them eight £1000 notes, and he accordingly gave the person who accompanied the prisoner the eight £1000 bank-notes produced.—The witness was cross-examined by Mr. Salomon, a solicitor on the part of the prisoner, but his evidence was not shaken. Mr. T. Ager, of No. 15, Edmond-terrace, a teller in the issue department of the Bank of England, stated that at about two o'clock on the 3rd of September, a person who was a stranger to him presented at the counter the eight bank notes for £1000 each produced, and required payment thereof in gold. Witness was short of money at the time, and determined to get £10,000 from the treasury, and accordingly went with Leonard Deane, one of the porters in the issue department of the Bank, to the treasury, which was in an adjoining department, to get the gold. They brought back ten bags, each containing £1000 in gold, and witness desired Deane to lay eight of the bags on the counter before the person who was then standing there, and who then produced two large canvass bags from a carpet bag, which he had with him, and put both the bags into the carpet bag and then attempted to lift it, but was unable to do so, and was ultimately assisted by two porters, who carried the two bags for him out of the Bank.—Cross-examined by Mr. Salomon: The bank-notes were presented by a stranger, not by the prisoner. The prisoner was not present at the time. Witness did not get the person to put his name and address upon the notes.—Mr. Salomon then contended that the evidence did not affect Burgess, as he had not presented the cheque or received the sovereigns. He said there was no proof whatever that the prisoner had performed any act calculated to show that he was aware that Elder, who had since destroyed himself, was any other than the Mr. Oxenford he represented himself to be.—The Lord Mayor said he believed the prisoner was a guilty participator, and decided upon committing him for trial.

Robberies at Linen-drapers' Shops.—At Bow-street, on Tuesday, Leah Mary Roper, the person who stood remanded on a charge of shop-lifting, was again examined before Mr. Jardine. Two more cases were made out against her, and it appeared that about £60 worth of duplicates for silks and satins, which the prisoner had pledged, were found at her lodgings, Michael's-place, Brompton. Several shopkeepers, who were present, recognised the prisoner as having frequented their shops; and in some cases identified pledged property which had been stolen from them. The prisoner, who said nothing in her defence, was again remanded, in order to make the evidence in some of the cases more complete against her. It was stated by the officer who searched her lodgings, that she had been in the habit of paying some of the persons with whom she dealt with the duplicates of stolen silks. The prisoner is a small, dark, and rather ill-favoured person, and is lame.

COUNTRY NEWS.

The Incendiary Fire at Watton.—At Hertford, on Saturday, Thomas Wade, who was remanded on Friday, was fully committed for trial at the next assizes.

The Accident on the Midland Counties Railway.—Mr. James Bolestridge, landlord of the Three Horse Shoes public-house, Derby-road, who was a passenger in the up-train which met with so much damage at the time of the collision, died on Tuesday morning at his own house. Mr. Bolestridge was about 45 years of age, and a remarkably good-looking man. He was formerly butler to Thomas Thornewell, Esq., of Dove Cliff, Derbyshire, and held that situation for a great number of years. Shortly after the death of his master he commenced business as an inn-keeper in Nottingham; in this latter capacity he has been attended with an extraordinary amount of misfortune. In the early part of October last, three men took up their abode at his house for a night. On their departure the next morning it was discovered that they had found their way into Mr. Bolestridge's sleeping apartment, and stole from a drawer gold and notes to the amount of £200. Mr. Edward Roberts, the gentleman who has had his leg amputated, and who was in the same carriage with Mr. Bolestridge, is still in a very precarious state. The other sufferers are all doing well. An inquest has been commenced upon the body of Mr. Bolestridge. The evidence adduced is very similar to that given on the former inquiries. The jury have not yet given their verdict.

Singular Affair at Tong.—The Shrewsbury papers, in noticing the death of G. Durant, Esq., of Tong Castle, mention a singular occurrence which took place on the occasion. In the year 1820, Mr. Durant took legal proceedings against his first wife, and, in consequence of the jury having decided in his favour, he erected a monument on an eminence on his estate at Tong Knowle to commemorate the event. Immediately on his death being known to his family, two of his sons, accompanied by 29 labourers, went to the place, and commenced excavating round it to the depth of six feet; after which they made a hole in it, and placed 50 pounds of gunpowder in a cask, and 20 pounds in another package, under the monument, and at three o'clock on the morning of the 30th a fuse was fixed to it, and set fire to, and in a few minutes the monument was laid flat on the ground without any accident. The eldest son and heir to the estate died some years ago, and on his death-bed he requested the younger branches of the family that as soon as their father was dead they would cause the monument to be blown up, that it might cease to exist with the founder, and that the memory of the scandalous cause for which it was erected and he might perish together.

Representation of Dartmouth.—There are two candidates for the representation of Dartmouth, in the room of the late Lieut.-Colonel Seale—Mr. Joseph Soames, the extensive ship-owner, on the Conservative side, and Mr. Moffatt, a London merchant, on the Liberal interest.

Sudden Death of Martin Tupper, Esq.—A distressing event occurred at Southhill Park, the seat of the late Earl of Limerick, on Sunday morning. Martin Tupper, Esq., of New Burlington-street, had long been the medical attendant of the above noble family, and was at Southhill Park when the late Earl expired, on Saturday evening. Mr. Tupper retired to his apartment about twelve o'clock, in apparently perfect health, but when his servant went to call him in the morning, he was found dead in his bed.

Late Harvest in Wiltshire.—A correspondent at Malmesbury informs us that in the northern part of Wiltshire, within these few days, two fields of barley have been cut and carried—a very rare occurrence at this advanced season of the year.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

EXPLOSION AND LOSS OF LIFE ON THE DOVER RAILWAY.

On Wednesday morning, about one o'clock, a frightful accident took place on the Dover Railway, near the Bricklayers' Arms station, Old Kent-road, by which one man, named Robert Buckley, an engine-driver, was killed on the spot, and Aaron Wilkinson, the stoker, received such extensive injuries that his recovery is utterly impossible. It appears that the train, which was exclusively a goods train, left the Bricklayers' Arms station for Dover at twenty minutes after twelve o'clock, the engine being driven by Robert Buckley, an experienced driver, attended by a fireman, or stoker, named Aaron Wilkinson. It consisted of eleven luggage waggons and a second class carriage, in which were deposited the packages for the foreign mail. There were in the break waggon the company's guards, as well as the servants of the carriers, in all five or six persons. This carriage was the last on the train, and escaped uninjured. The whole of the others, except the second class carriage, were more or less shattered by the force of the concussion. As the train advanced another engine followed in the rear, and it is stated had just reached the train, when a terrific explosion occurred. One of the guards stated that the first thing which alarmed him was a smart explosion, and the next instant it was followed by another explosion of far greater force than the preceding one, and which, with a subsequent tremendous crash, almost stunned him. The concussion threw him forward, and the carriage in which he was was so violently shaken that he thought it was falling to pieces.

As soon as the steam and smoke had cleared away, he discovered the line to be completely blocked up with waggons, which were spread across the two lines of rails, and piled, many of them, upon each other. He with the rest of the guards called to the engine driver and also to his companion, the stoker, but receiving no answer, they climbed over the pile of waggons in the direction they expected to find the engine. On arriving at the other end of the train they discovered that the engine had burst, and had gone over the viaduct, and was partially buried in the earth beneath, whilst the tender was hanging over the side of the viaduct, torn and folded up as if it had been made of mere paste board, its carriage having fallen to the ground about twenty yards from where the engine lay. In the meanwhile search was made for the engine driver, and the stoker and shortly the former, Robert Buckley, was found lying some twenty or thirty yards further up the line, where the engine went off, with one of the large waggons partly resting on his body. He was dead, and even then the body could not be extricated for upwards of an hour and a half. The stoker was found in the rear of the train, lying on the opposite rails, bleeding profusely, and apparently dead, with the whole of his jacket, except the cuffs, blown off his back. Immediately upon the arrival of assistance from the station, Mr. George, the secretary, who came with the engine, had the poor fellow wrapped in blankets, and conveyed to Guy's Hospital.

As soon as possible the line was cleared of all obstructions, so that the regular traffic might not be impeded, and at an early hour the directors, who had assembled on the spot, with Mr. Cubitt, the locomotive engineer, and Mr. Gregory, of the Croydon line, considered it necessary to forward immediate intelligence of what had happened to Colonel Pasley, the Inspector-General of Railways, and who arrived soon after nine o'clock, when a strict examination was gone into.

The result is said to be this:—The bursting of the locomotive being the supposed cause of the accident, their first object was to examine the engine as it lay embedded in the earth. After getting off the viaduct it had pitched head foremost into the earth a depth of four feet, and then turned over. They found the fire-box was blown out, as well as the whole of the fire-bars and the inner casing, between which and the outer casing the steam generated, were also torn away. The next point was to examine what effect the explosion had had upon the viaduct, and the probable cause of the engine getting off the same. They found that there had been two explosions: the first apparently took place about eighty feet from the spot where the engine was lying. The fire-bars at the bottom of the fire-box had been blown completely through the viaduct into arch No. 134, making a hole three or four feet square. The second explosion (the more severe of the two) not only blew the fire-box through the arch No. 133, but such was the force of the steam, that the engine "jumped," and descended partly on the rails and partly off, a distance of eight or ten yards, crushing the immense pieces of timber that supported the viaduct.

The stoker, Aaron Wilkinson, had his skull fractured, his left arm broken, and other parts of his person dreadfully scalded. His unfortunate companion was about thirty-two years of age; he was a single man, and resided at Ashford, near Dover, where his relatives live.

Murder and Highway Robbery in Wales.—On Friday week, between eleven and twelve o'clock, David Lewis, a butter carman, was robbed and murdered whilst on the road between Brecon and Trecastle, in the county of Brecon, North Wales. His death was caused by a pistol ball, shot through his head, and suspicion fell upon a man named Thomas Thomas, who resided with his father, at Maeseddw, in the parish of Llanfynydd, Carmarthenshire. He was the last person seen in the deceased's company, and has since been apprehended.

Another Fatal Railway Accident.—A fatal accident occurred on Saturday morning on the line of the Newcastle and Carlisle Railway, near Ryton station, about 7 miles from Newcastle. As the luggage-train, which left Newcastle at half-past six o'clock for Carlisle, was proceeding at the usual rate, it ran into a cow which was straying on the line, and the force of the concussion was so great as to throw the engine and tender over a low enbankment, the engine falling on its side, and the tender being crushed up beside it. The stoker was fortunate enough to jump off just before the collision took place, and escaped with only a few slight bruises. The engineer did not jump off, and he was crushed to death between the engine and the tender. Had the accident occurred 20 yards further along the line, where the railway runs close to the river Tyne, the whole train would have gone into the water. The trucks suffered no injury, and but little displacement. The engineer's name was Thomas Graham; he was a steady experienced driver, but the morning was very dark, and the animal was not discovered until the engine was close upon it.

Melancholy Catastrophe.—Five Men Drowned.—A few days ago Mr. De Lassaux, one of the coroners of Kent, held an inquest at Whitstable on the bodies of Edward Polhill, aged 34, William Polhill, aged 25, George Miles, aged 32, John Mason, aged 31, and Henry Pym, aged 33, the whole of whom had been unfortunately drowned on the evening of Wednesday last, while passing from Whitstable to the Isle of Sheppy. The jury returned a verdict of "Accidentally drowned," levying a small deodand on the boat.

Manslaughter by a Captain of one of the Watermen Steamers.—An inquest was held on Monday on the body of William Morgan, a seaman, who it will be recollected was, together with Edward Everest, an aged waterman, run down off the Thames Pier, Wapping, on the morning of the 25th of October, by the Waterman steam-packet No. 6, Captain Simms, and drowned, several others in the skiff having narrowly escaped a similar fate. The evidence was nearly a recapitulation of the testimony given at the former inquest held on the body of the unfortunate Everest. The jury returned a verdict of "Manslaughter" against Simms, the master of the steamer, who is now in Newgate, having been convicted of the manslaughter of Everest at the Central Criminal Court, and sentenced to four months imprisonment.

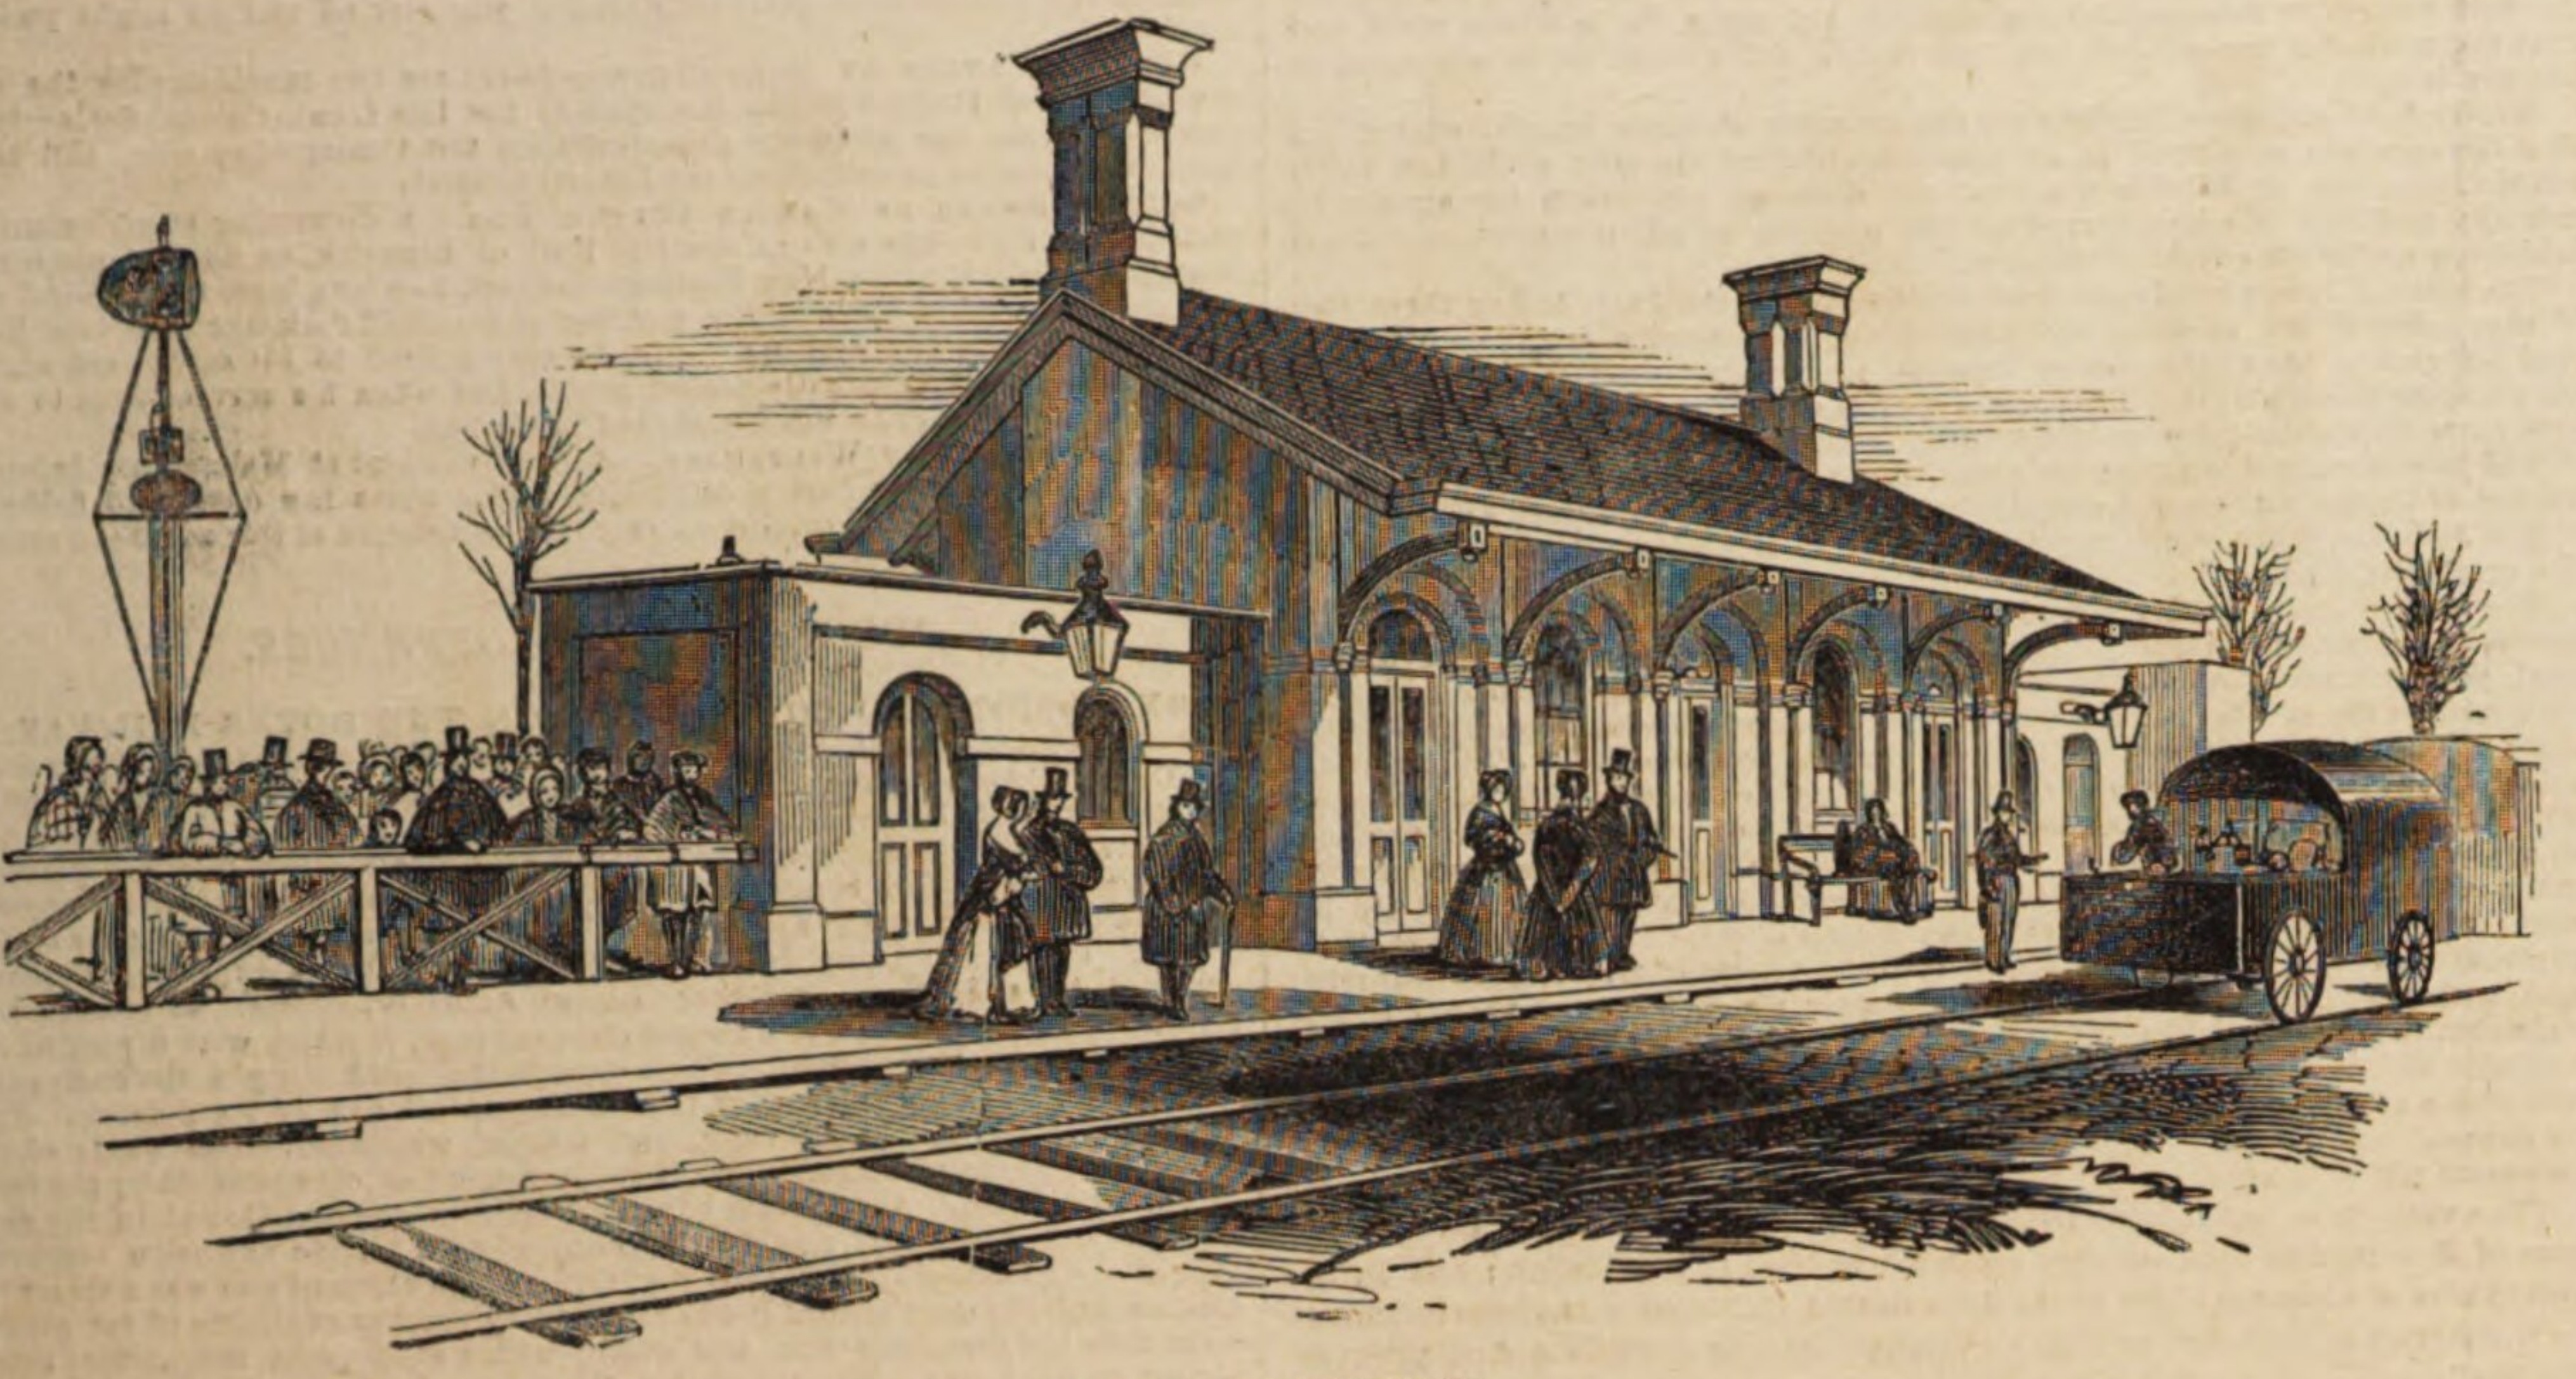
Death from Starvation.—On Monday afternoon a long investigation was entered into before Mr. Higgs, at the Golden Lion, Lower Edmonton, on the remains of a man, name unknown, aged 52, whose death was occasioned by the want of food and exposure to the inclemency of the weather. It appeared from the evidence of Richard Pugh, with whom the deceased had lodged, that he had for some weeks been out of work. He had during that period obtained a scanty pittance by vending congreve matches, balls of cotton, &c. The police interfered with him and threatened to apprehend him as a vagrant, saying that his offering things for sale was merely an excuse for begging. Deceased was, in consequence, very frightened, and did not go out with his basket again. He stopped at witness's house till the following Tuesday, when he absented himself, having till then from the day the police spoke to him lived upon stale crusts, which he got from other lodgers in exchange for congreves, and the dregs of the teapot when others had done with it. On Saturday night last, about half-past ten o'clock, witness was returning home, when he saw the deceased sitting on the ground in the street crouched up in a corner. He asked him why he did not come to his house, when he replied, because he had no money, adding that he was very cold and thirsty and had a pain in his side. Witness assisted him home, where he made him some gruel, putting into it half a pint of ale, which deceased swallowed ravenously. Deceased was then put to bed, and he died on Sunday morning. Since the Tuesday he had slept in hovels and open sheds, and had had scarcely a particle of food. The Jury returned a verdict "That the deceased died from want of the common necessaries of life and exposure to the cold."

Drayton Manor.—In consequence of the lamented demise of the Dowager Lady Floyd, Sir Robert and Lady Peel will be prevented from receiving company at the manor this winter.

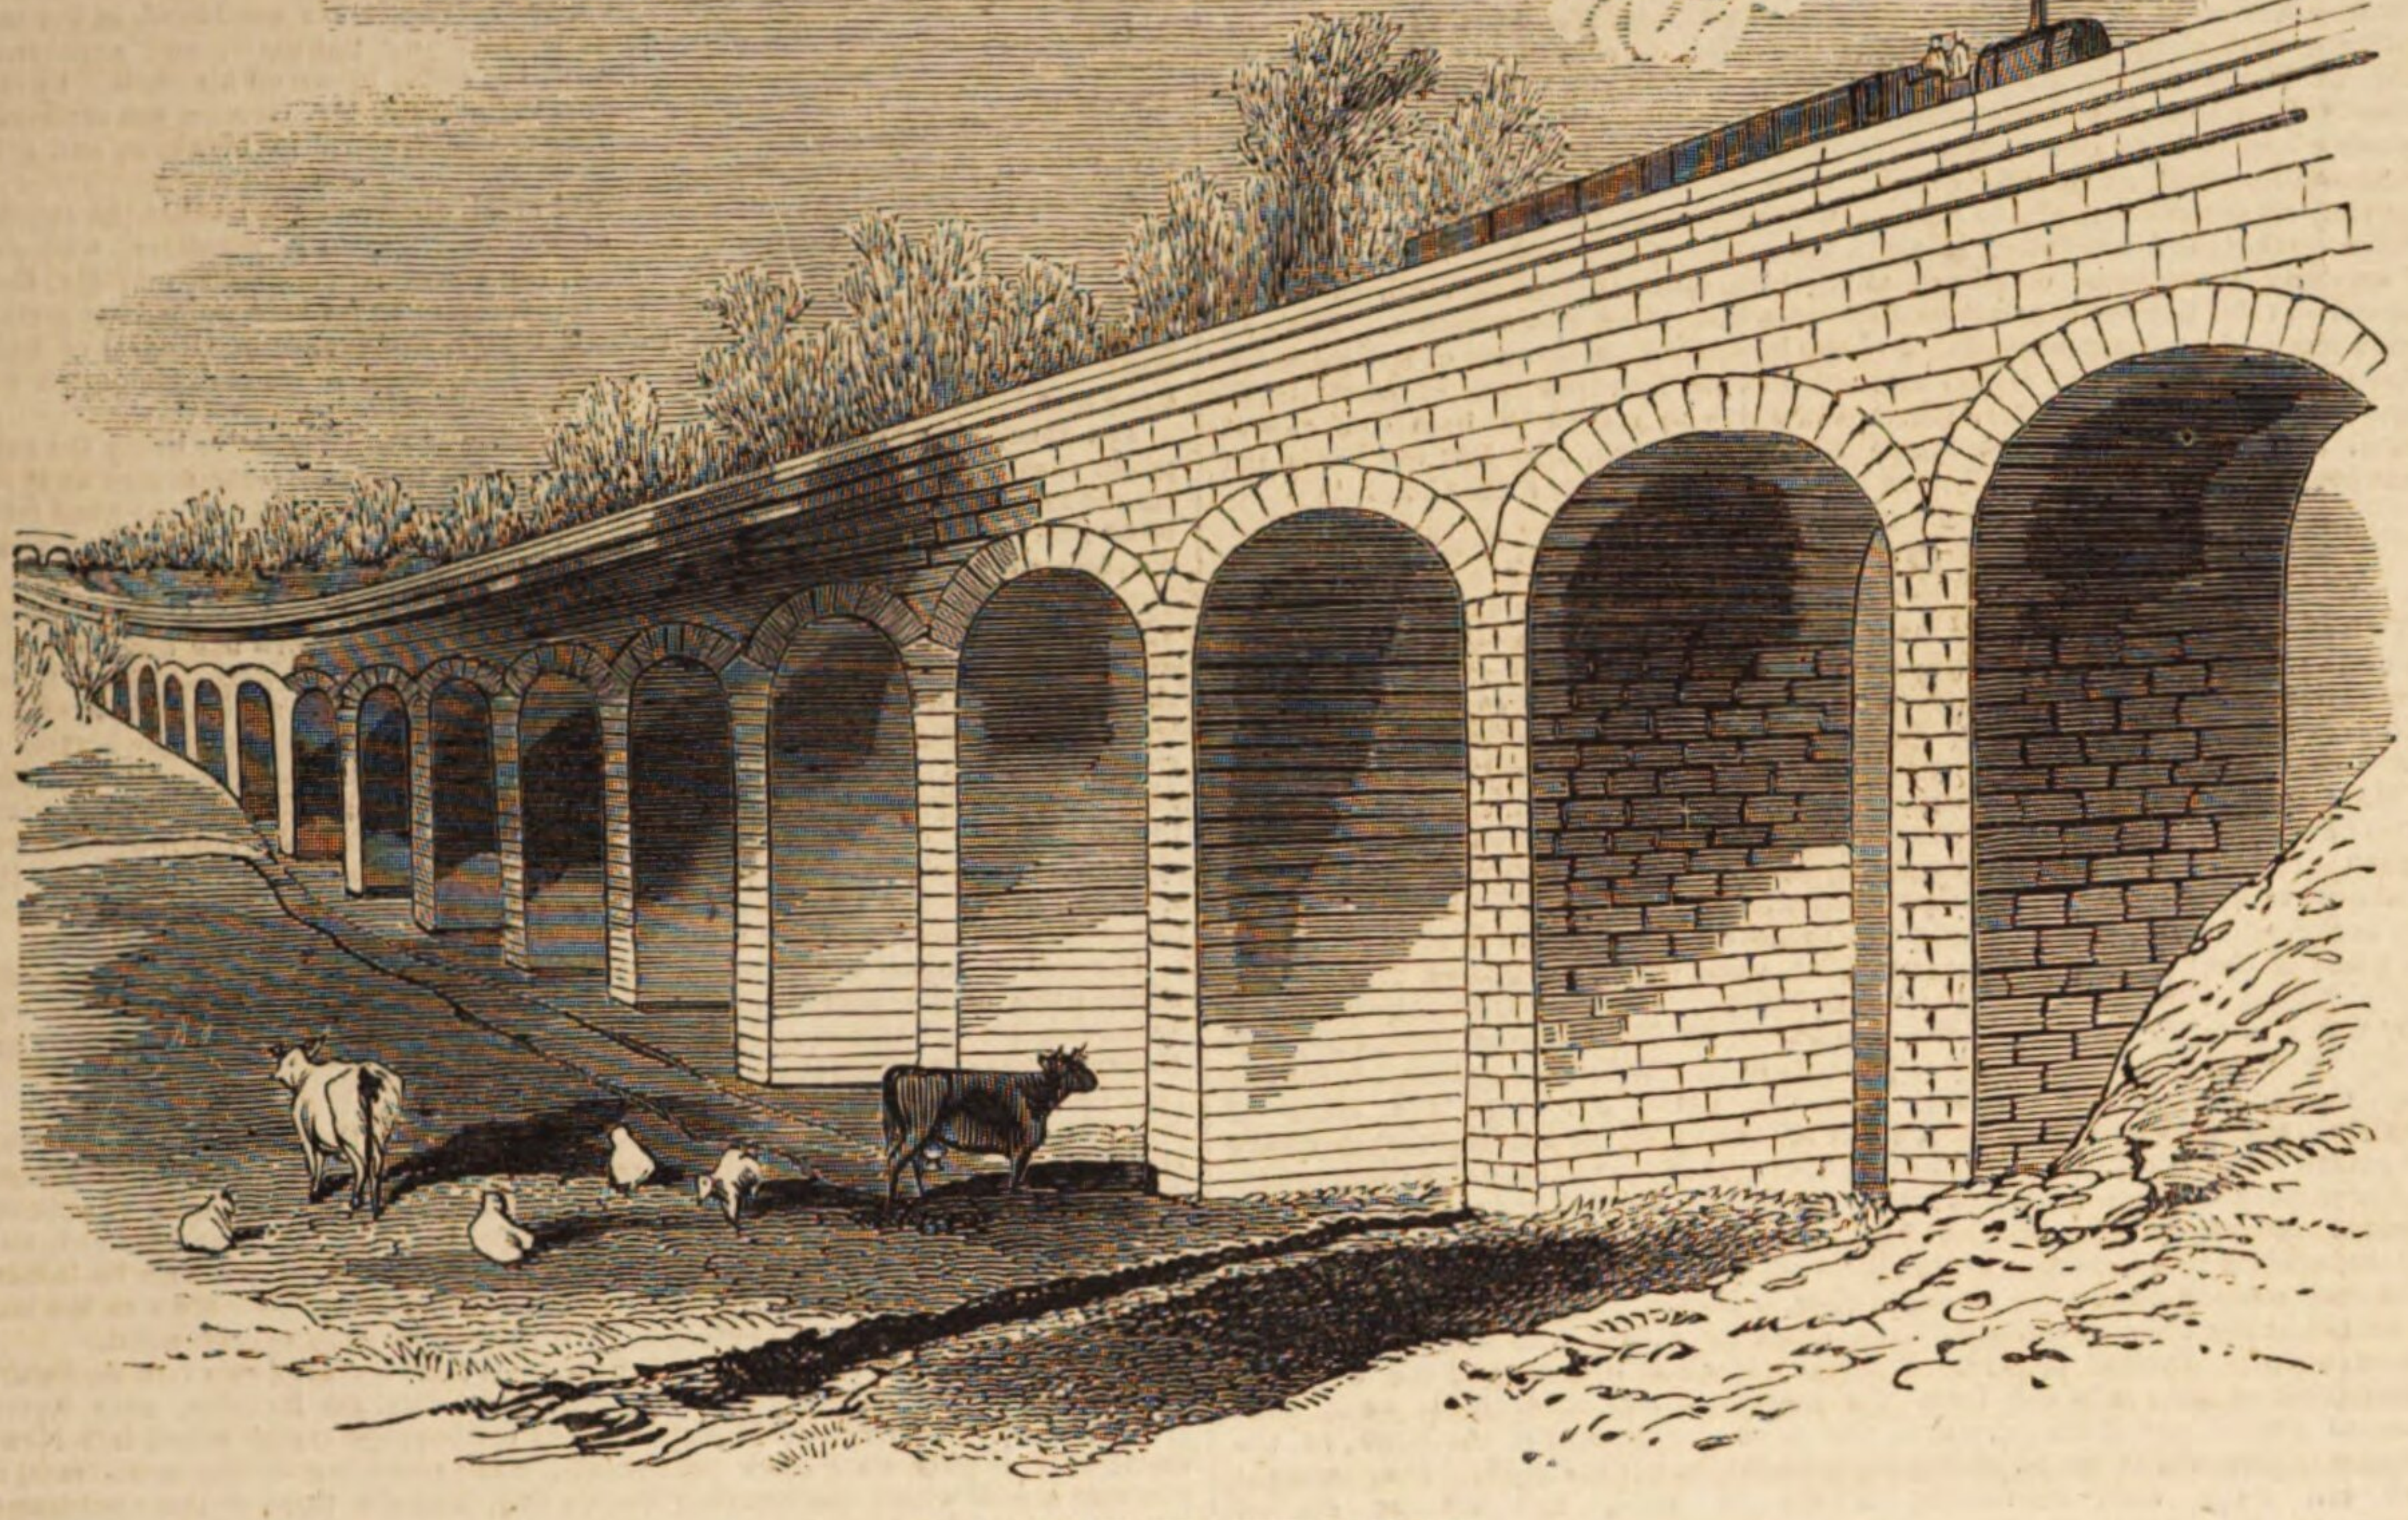
Sir Robert Peel's fourth son, Mr. John Floyd Peel, has just entered the Scots Fusilier Guards as ensign and lieutenant.

London Elocution Society.—On Tuesday evening, the first public meeting of this institution was held at the Hall of Commerce, Threadneedle-street. The programme included sixteen specimens of senatorial and forensic eloquence, and sublime poetry, relieved by one or two scenes of exquisite humour from Mr. Dickens's works, all of which were delivered with good effect. Mr. Albert Smith presided, and was much applauded on taking the chair, and on quitting the room at the close of an evening most rationally passed. The room was crowded throughout the performances.

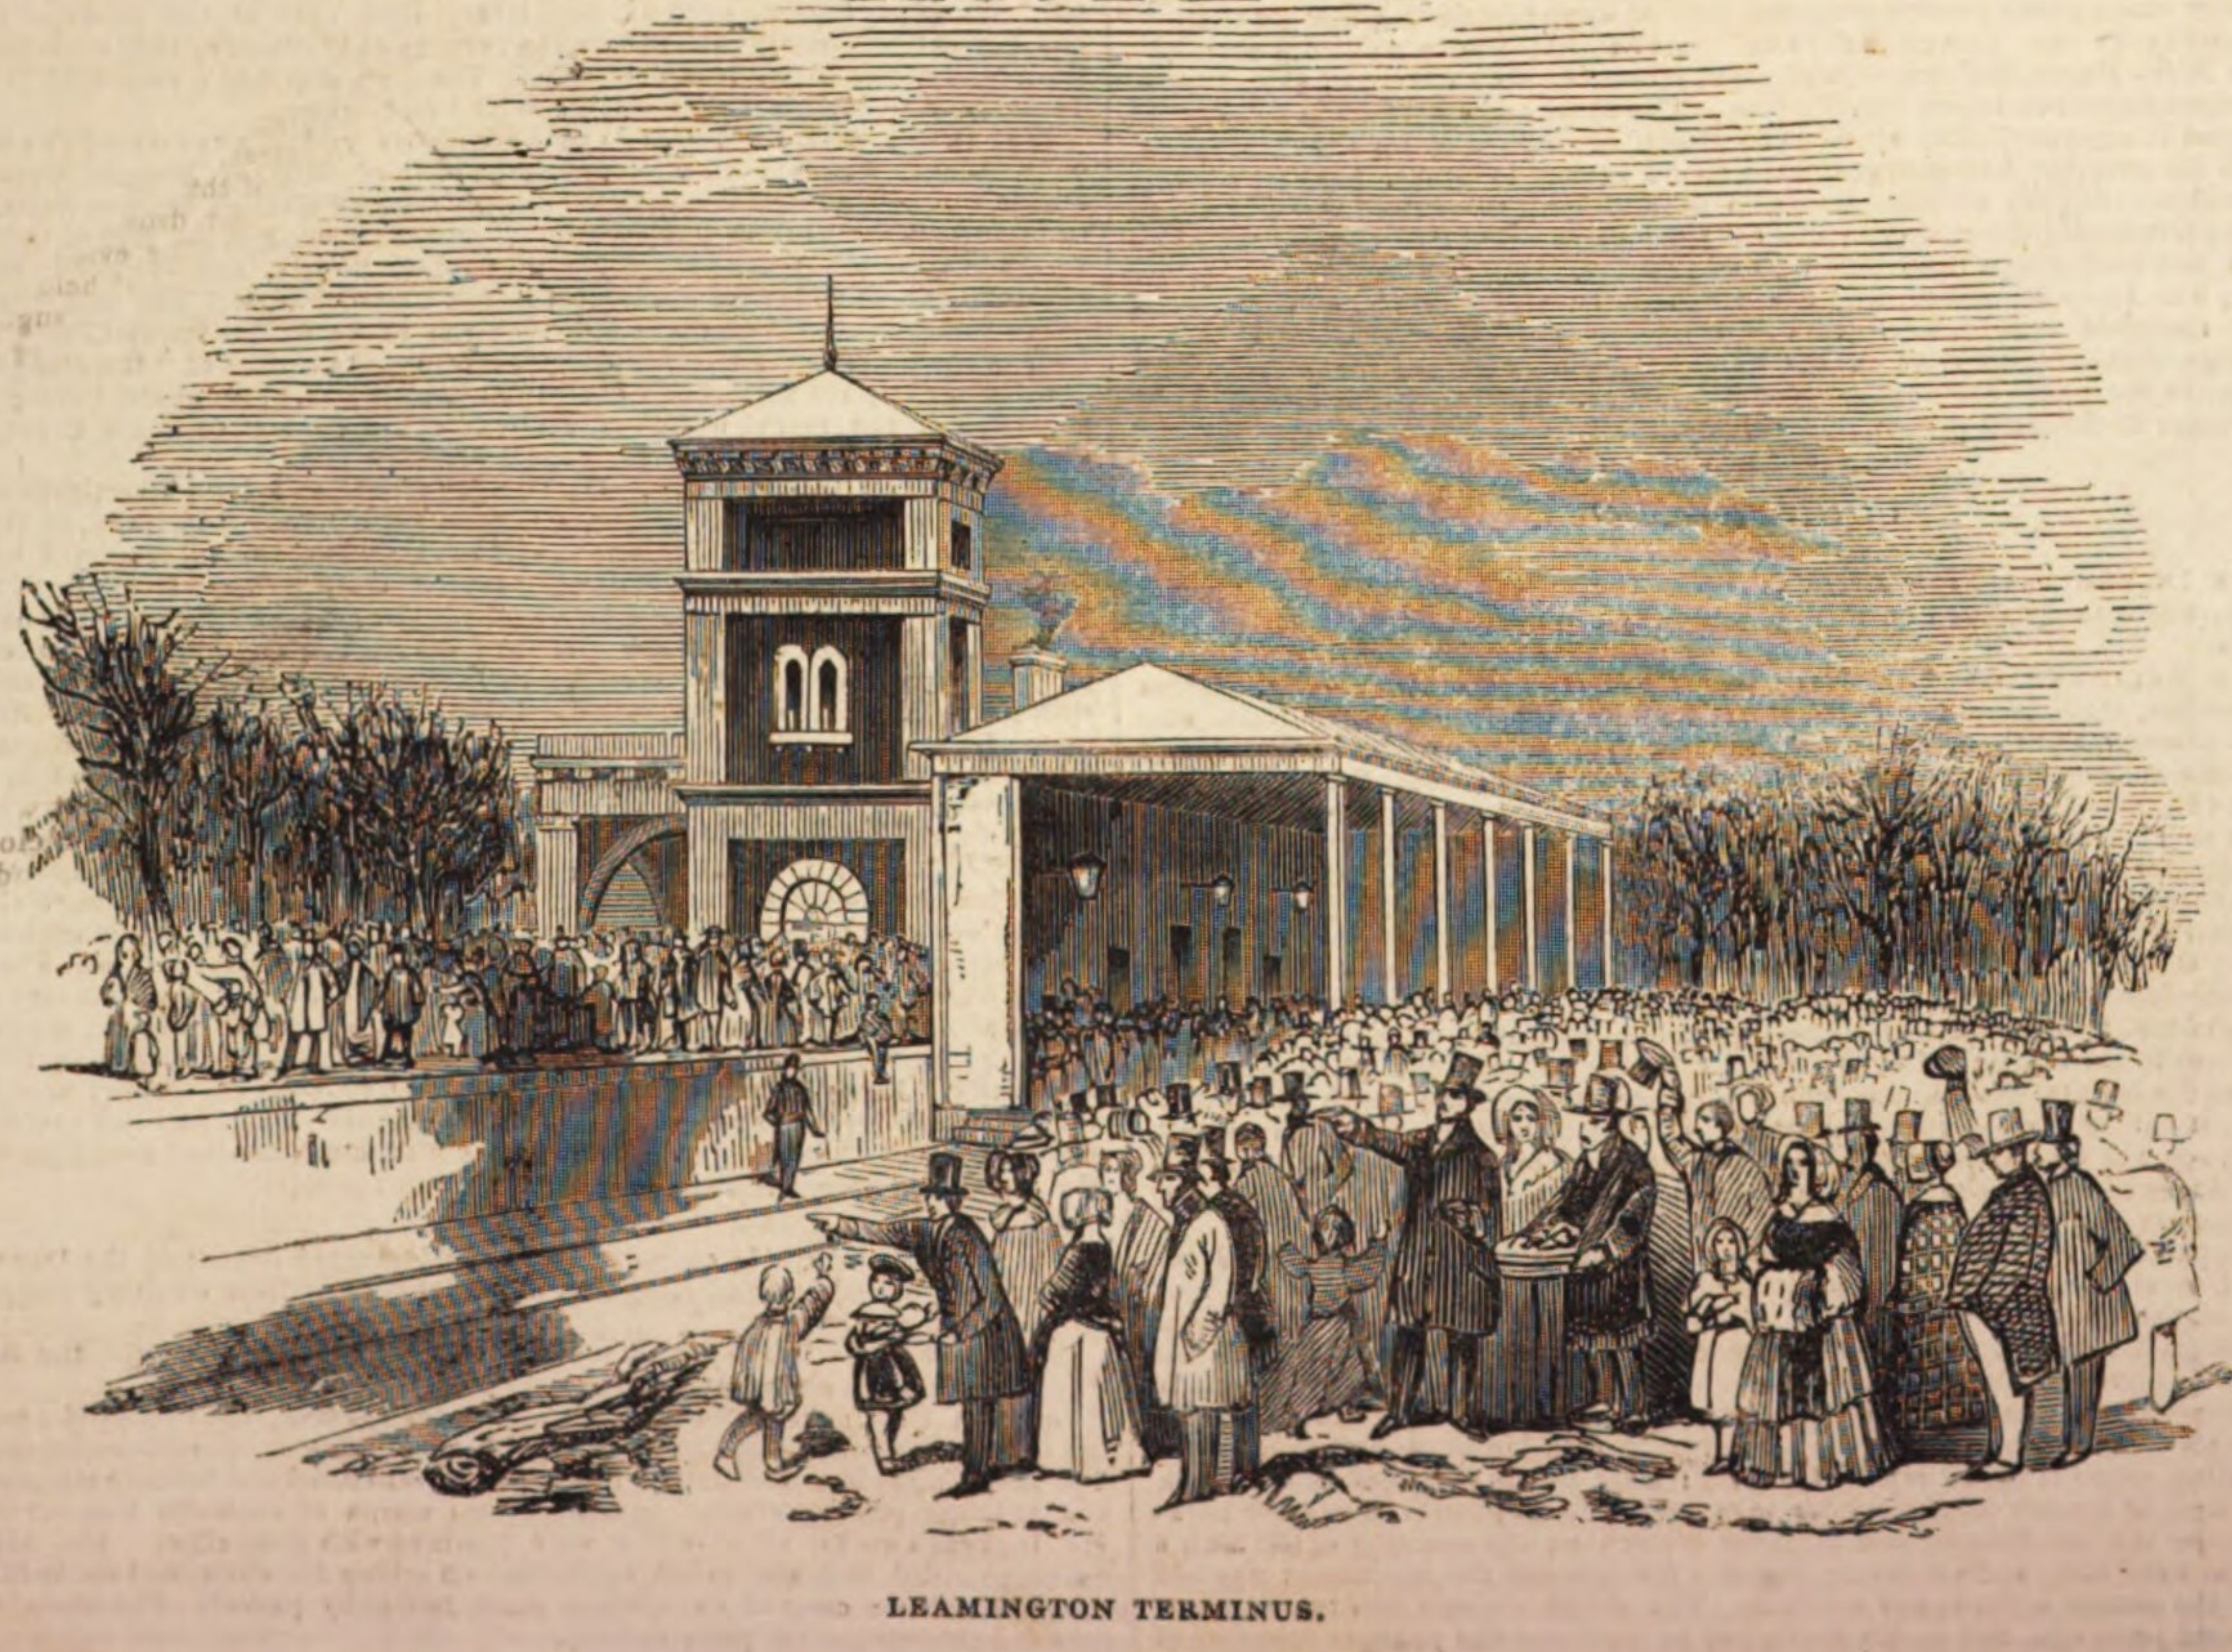
OPENING OF THE LEAMINGTON AND WARWICK RAILWAY



KENILWORTH STATION.



MELBOURNE GRANGE VIADUCT.



LEAMINGTON TERMINUS.

The "opening train," unadorned, and in simple business guise—according to the custom of the London and Birmingham Company, who seem to have a natural horror of flags and bands of music—left Coventry a little after nine o'clock in the morning; and although the weather was far from propitious, its departure was witnessed and cheered by a vast multitude of well-dressed spectators. In its course past the numerous bridges, which give a character to the rail, and at other good points of observation, the same testimonies of respect were paid to the "courageous" inmates of the snug "first classes" on this, their gallant venture. At Kenilworth, many ladies graced the triumph with their presence, and some danger was incurred by their very close proximity to the rails. At Leamington an immense assemblage of respectable persons, together with the élite of the neighbourhood, received the train, which was hereafter to put them within three hours and a half of the metropolis, with every mark of intelligent gratulation. The day then became a universal holiday. Business was every where suspended, festivities of all sorts were interchanged by the delighted people, and at night a grand dinner given to the directors and friends of the railway, came off in grand style at the Regent's Hotel, and crowned the "opening day." To those who would wish for particulars, we may say that the dinner was served at six o'clock, and that upwards of fifty first-rate gentlemen sat down to it. Capt. Musgrave (in place of Dr. Jephson) took the chair, supported by the Hon. and Rev. Mr. Somerville, Mr. Wilkinson, Mr. Stracey, Mr. Drinkwater, and other gentlemen connected with the county. The dinner, consisting of all the delicacies of the season, was served with their usual skill and precision by Messrs. Breach and Jeffereys. A deputation from the Nuneaton and Bedworth Railway Company, headed by Mr. Wilkinson, chairman, was present, and added greatly to the good fellowship of the meeting.

The tract of country through which the railway passes is picturesque in the extreme: well wooded hills, luxuriant meadows, and fertile vallies, alternate with romantic villages, and sites of abiding historic interest. The remains of Stoneleigh Abbey, Kenilworth Castle and Abbey, Warwick Castle in the immediate neighbourhood, may be cited in illustration.

The distinguishing feature of the line (which for the present consists only of a single pair of rails) is found in the undulatory character of its gradients. The entire length rises and falls like the surface of a gently rolling ocean taken at any one moment of time, and these "ups and downs," or dips, as they are called, are so contrived that the impetus acquired in running down one incline is contrived exactly to compensate for the retardation of the succeeding ascent. An obvious example of this mode of construction occurs in the Melbourne valley, as shown in the accompanying engraving. The valley is of considerable depth, and in the formation of a permanent way across it, it was held expedient to build, not a horizontal, but a curved viaduct, the lowest point being near the centre, a mode of procedure which has produced a great saving of material, and a considerable gain in the working speed. It is built of brick and stone and consists of seventeen elliptical arches, each thirty feet span.

The stations are remarkable for convenience of arrangement, and simplicity of design. The one at Kenilworth is an elegant and very light structure, fitted with spacious booking-offices, comfortable waiting-rooms, &c.; and stands within a quarter of a mile of the village, with excellent approaches, and covered reception arcade, for carriages and passengers. We give a view of it, as a model of its kind.

The Leamington Terminus, about midway between, and immediately adjoining the turnpike road from Warwick to Leamington, near the Birmingham and Warwick Canal, contains all necessary accommodation for the usual routine of railway business; but, throughout, of a greatly superior character. The waiting-rooms are replete with every modern accommodation, and are elegantly furnished with ottomans, couches, &c. The booking-offices are fitted with care for the prompt dispatch of business. At the north end is an Italian tower, intended for the reception of a forcing-pump and reservoir of water, so that a jet of water, in case of fire, may be instantly obtained.

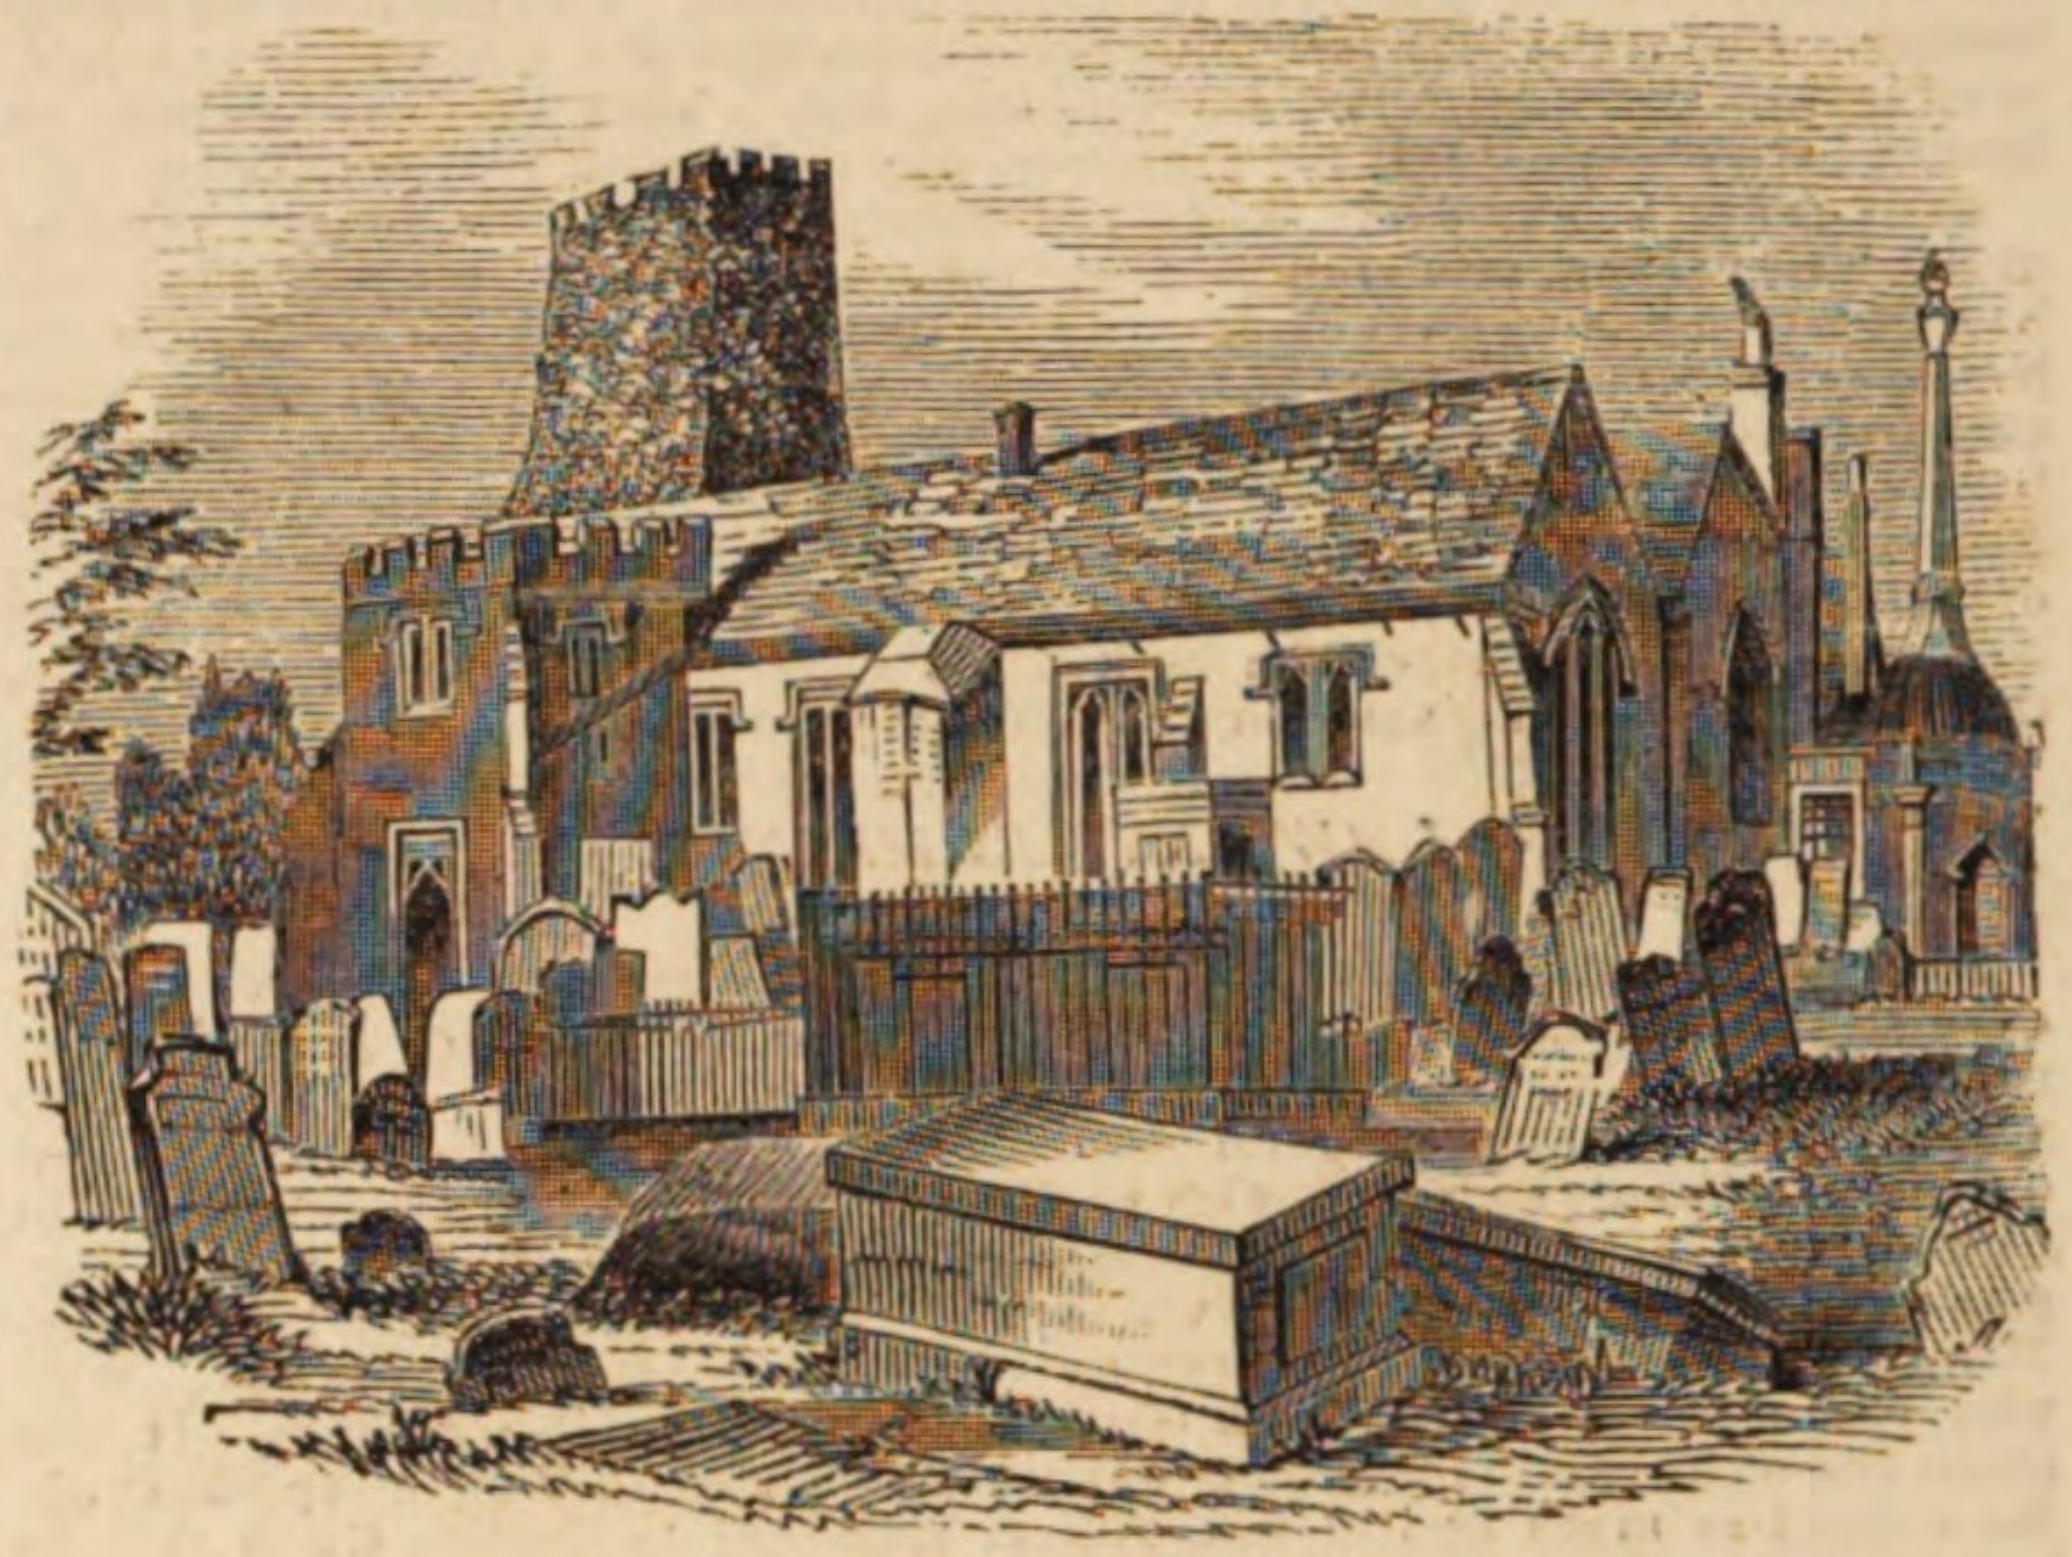
The stations, and all the works on the line, as well as the formation of the permanent way, have been designed and carried out by Robert B. Dockray, Esq, the resident engineer to the London and Birmingham Railway Company.

The length of the line is nearly nine miles; and the sum expended in its construction amounts to nearly £175,000 a very large sum, the excess having been incurred in the purchase of expensive lands.

THE TOTTENHAM CHURCHES.

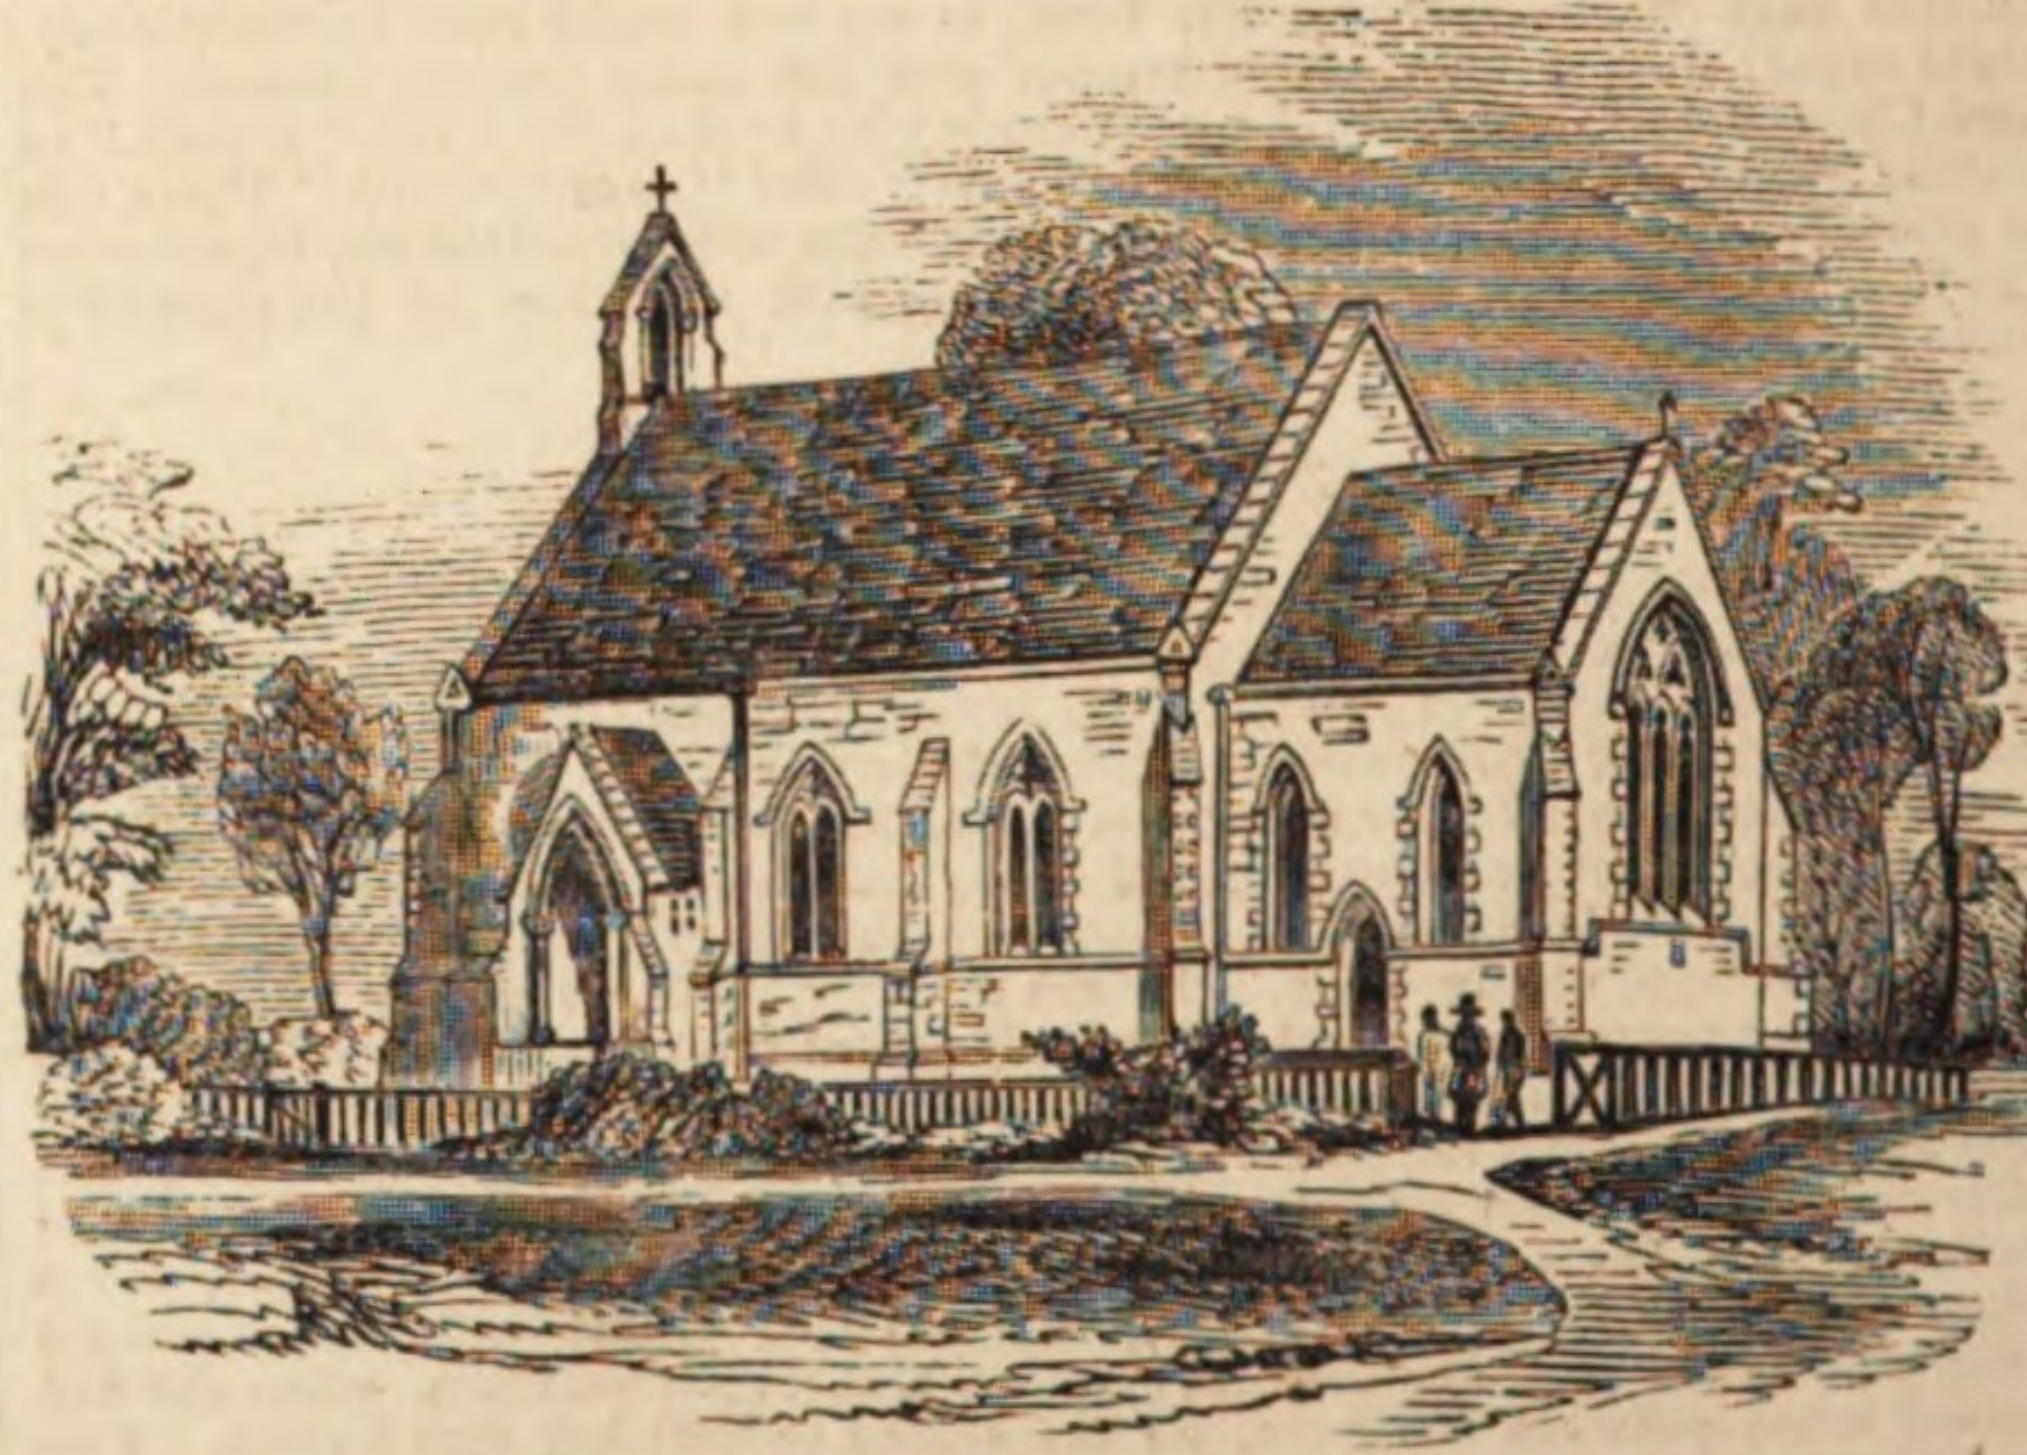
These churches have, of late, in connexion with certain rubrical observances, been the subject of much discussion; so that a brief outline of their structural character may be especially interesting at the present moment.

The village of Tottenham lies four miles east of the metropolis, at the verge of Middlesex upon Essex. The parish church, the subject of the first engraving, dedicated to Allhallows, is a vicarage in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's Cathedral. It is situated upon an eminence, almost surrounded by the Mose, a rivulet which rises on Muswell Hill. The church is built of hewn stone, flint, and rubble; its architecture is of various periods, though, probably, none older than the thirteenth century. It must have undergone considerable repair about the reign of Henry the Seventh. There is a curious old porch, with an oratory, and priests' room above it, containing the ear lukes of a confessional, perfect, and places for holy water, &c. The font is elaborately sculptured, and is much admired; and there are several fine brasses about the church. The vestry attached to the east end of the north aisle, is a modern addition, in bad taste: it was built in 1696, at the expense of Harry Lord Coleraine, and beneath it is the burial place of his family. The staircases and other traces of the rood-loft remain. The parish registers contain information as far back as the reign of Elizabeth. At the east end is a painted glass window, the gift of John Wilmot, Esq., in 1807. We must not let pass, without censure, the unsightly vestry, the ugly wooden porch outside the chancel door, and the sad defacement with plaster of some fine sculpture inside the old porch. The church will hold from 1200 to 1300 persons.



TOTTENHAM OLD CHURCH.

The second, or new church, is a gratifying result of the very beneficial exertions for "church extension." It is situated in the district of Tottenham, known as Wood Green, a hamlet containing a population of about 400, and the church affords accommodation for about half that number. The building has attracted attention and elicited much admiration from its strict architectural propriety, and from the order and neatness of its internal arrangement. The style adopted by the architects, Messrs. Scott and Moffat, is the earlier variety of the Decorated, or that of the close of the thirteenth century. It is entirely of stone, Kentish rag and Broomhill stone. The plain portions of the exterior are of Kentish rag, hammer-dressed; and the quoins, window, and other dressings, are of a sandstone from the neighbourhood of Speldhurst, in Kent: it is of a pleasing colour, and forms an agreeable variety with the Kentish rag.



TOTTENHAM NEW CHURCH, WOOD GREEN.

The church consists of a chancel, internally about 14 feet by 22 feet; a nave, about 50 feet by 20 feet; a south porch, and a vestry adjoining the north side of the chancel. The pulpit and font are elegantly sculptured in Painswick stone, by Mr. Cox, of Oxford. The service for the holy communion, which is of silver, has been made after the fashion of that which was lately presented to the new church at Malta. The roof is open; the seats are also open, so that this church adds another testimony to the daily increase of a disposition to restore the poor to their privileges in the house of God.

The history of the building of this little church may afford a useful lesson to committees engaged in any similar undertaking. For some time it had been contemplated to make provision for the spiritual of Wood-green; but the resources of the hamlet were evidently not equal to the expense of building a church. An appeal, however, was made to the parish generally: contributions flowed in, many of them anonymously; and these, aided by a grant by the Incorporated Society, has enabled the committee to meet the cost of the church, about £1700. The church was consecrated by the Lord Bishop of London, on the 3rd of October last, when the bishop preached, and a collection was made at the offertory, in aid of the building fund, to the amount of £101 3s. 4d. The festival of the consecration was celebrated with much joy, and, at the same time, with the strictest order and propriety.

Our readers may recollect that in noticing the elegant reprint of Drexelieus's "Reflections on Eternity," a few weeks since, we stated that the profits from the sale of the work are to be liberally contributed to the building fund of the church at Wood-green, by the pious editor of the above work, the Rev. H. P. Dunster curate of Tottenham.

RAILWAY SIGNALS.

Obedience to the "signals" used on a railway is indispensable to the safe passage of a train. A moment's inattention to any one of their significant monitions may be followed by the instant death of heedless unsuspecting multitudes, while, on the other hand, a due observance of them at all times, in all seasons, by night as well as by day, divests the speed of even the fastest pleasure train of danger. It is, of course, most important that the servants of a line should become practically familiar with the things signified by the symbols used in their several establishments, but we also deem it to be of much consequence that the public itself should be acquainted with them, for, were such the case, we should cease to hear of the difficulty of obtaining evidence against negligent servants, which on occasions of accident has ordinarily prevailed. Every traveller would then be an observer and a judge of the means used for his preservation, and in proportion to the vigilance of his survey would be the attention of servants entrusted with duties so important to the lives and limbs of passengers.

The signals used on railways are of great variety. Most of the lines have systems peculiar to themselves; and, in consequence, no uniform observance prevails between them, which is a practice much to be regretted, as it tends to confuse the observation of men engaged on different lines, and of engineers who change one service for another. It cannot, however, be expected that so complicated an operation, and one, too, which has grown up under the management of independent companies, should speedily reach perfection. For the present, the signals are necessarily different on different lines; but we hope to see the day, when the set, which experience has proved the best, shall be universally and compulsorily adopted. We shall now describe the signals used on the more important lines.

Those observed on the London and Birmingham Railway demand the first attention. They consist of Police Signals—Signals shown at Intermediate Stations and the Long Tunnels; and the Engine Signals.

1. POLICE SIGNALS.—When the line is clear, and no obstruction in the way of the onward course of the train is either seen or suspected, the policeman stands erect, with his flags in his hand, but showing no signal. See Fig. 1. If it be required that the engine should slacken speed, and proceed with caution, from another engine having passed on the same line within five minutes, a Green Flag is held up in the manner shown in Fig. 2. If it be desired that the engine should slacken speed, and proceed with caution, from any defect in the rails, the Green flag is lowered, and held as shown in Fig. 3. But if it be necessary that the engine should stop altogether at any given point, a Red Flag is shown, and waved backwards and forwards, the policeman facing towards the coming engine. At night the same signals are given, by means of coloured lamps. A White Light denotes the line clear: a Green Light requires the use of caution; and when the engine is required to stop, a Red Light is shown, but in place of being held steady, it is waved backwards and forwards. The engine-drivers and guards are, however, warned, that any signal, either by day or night, violently waved, denotes danger, and a necessity of stopping.

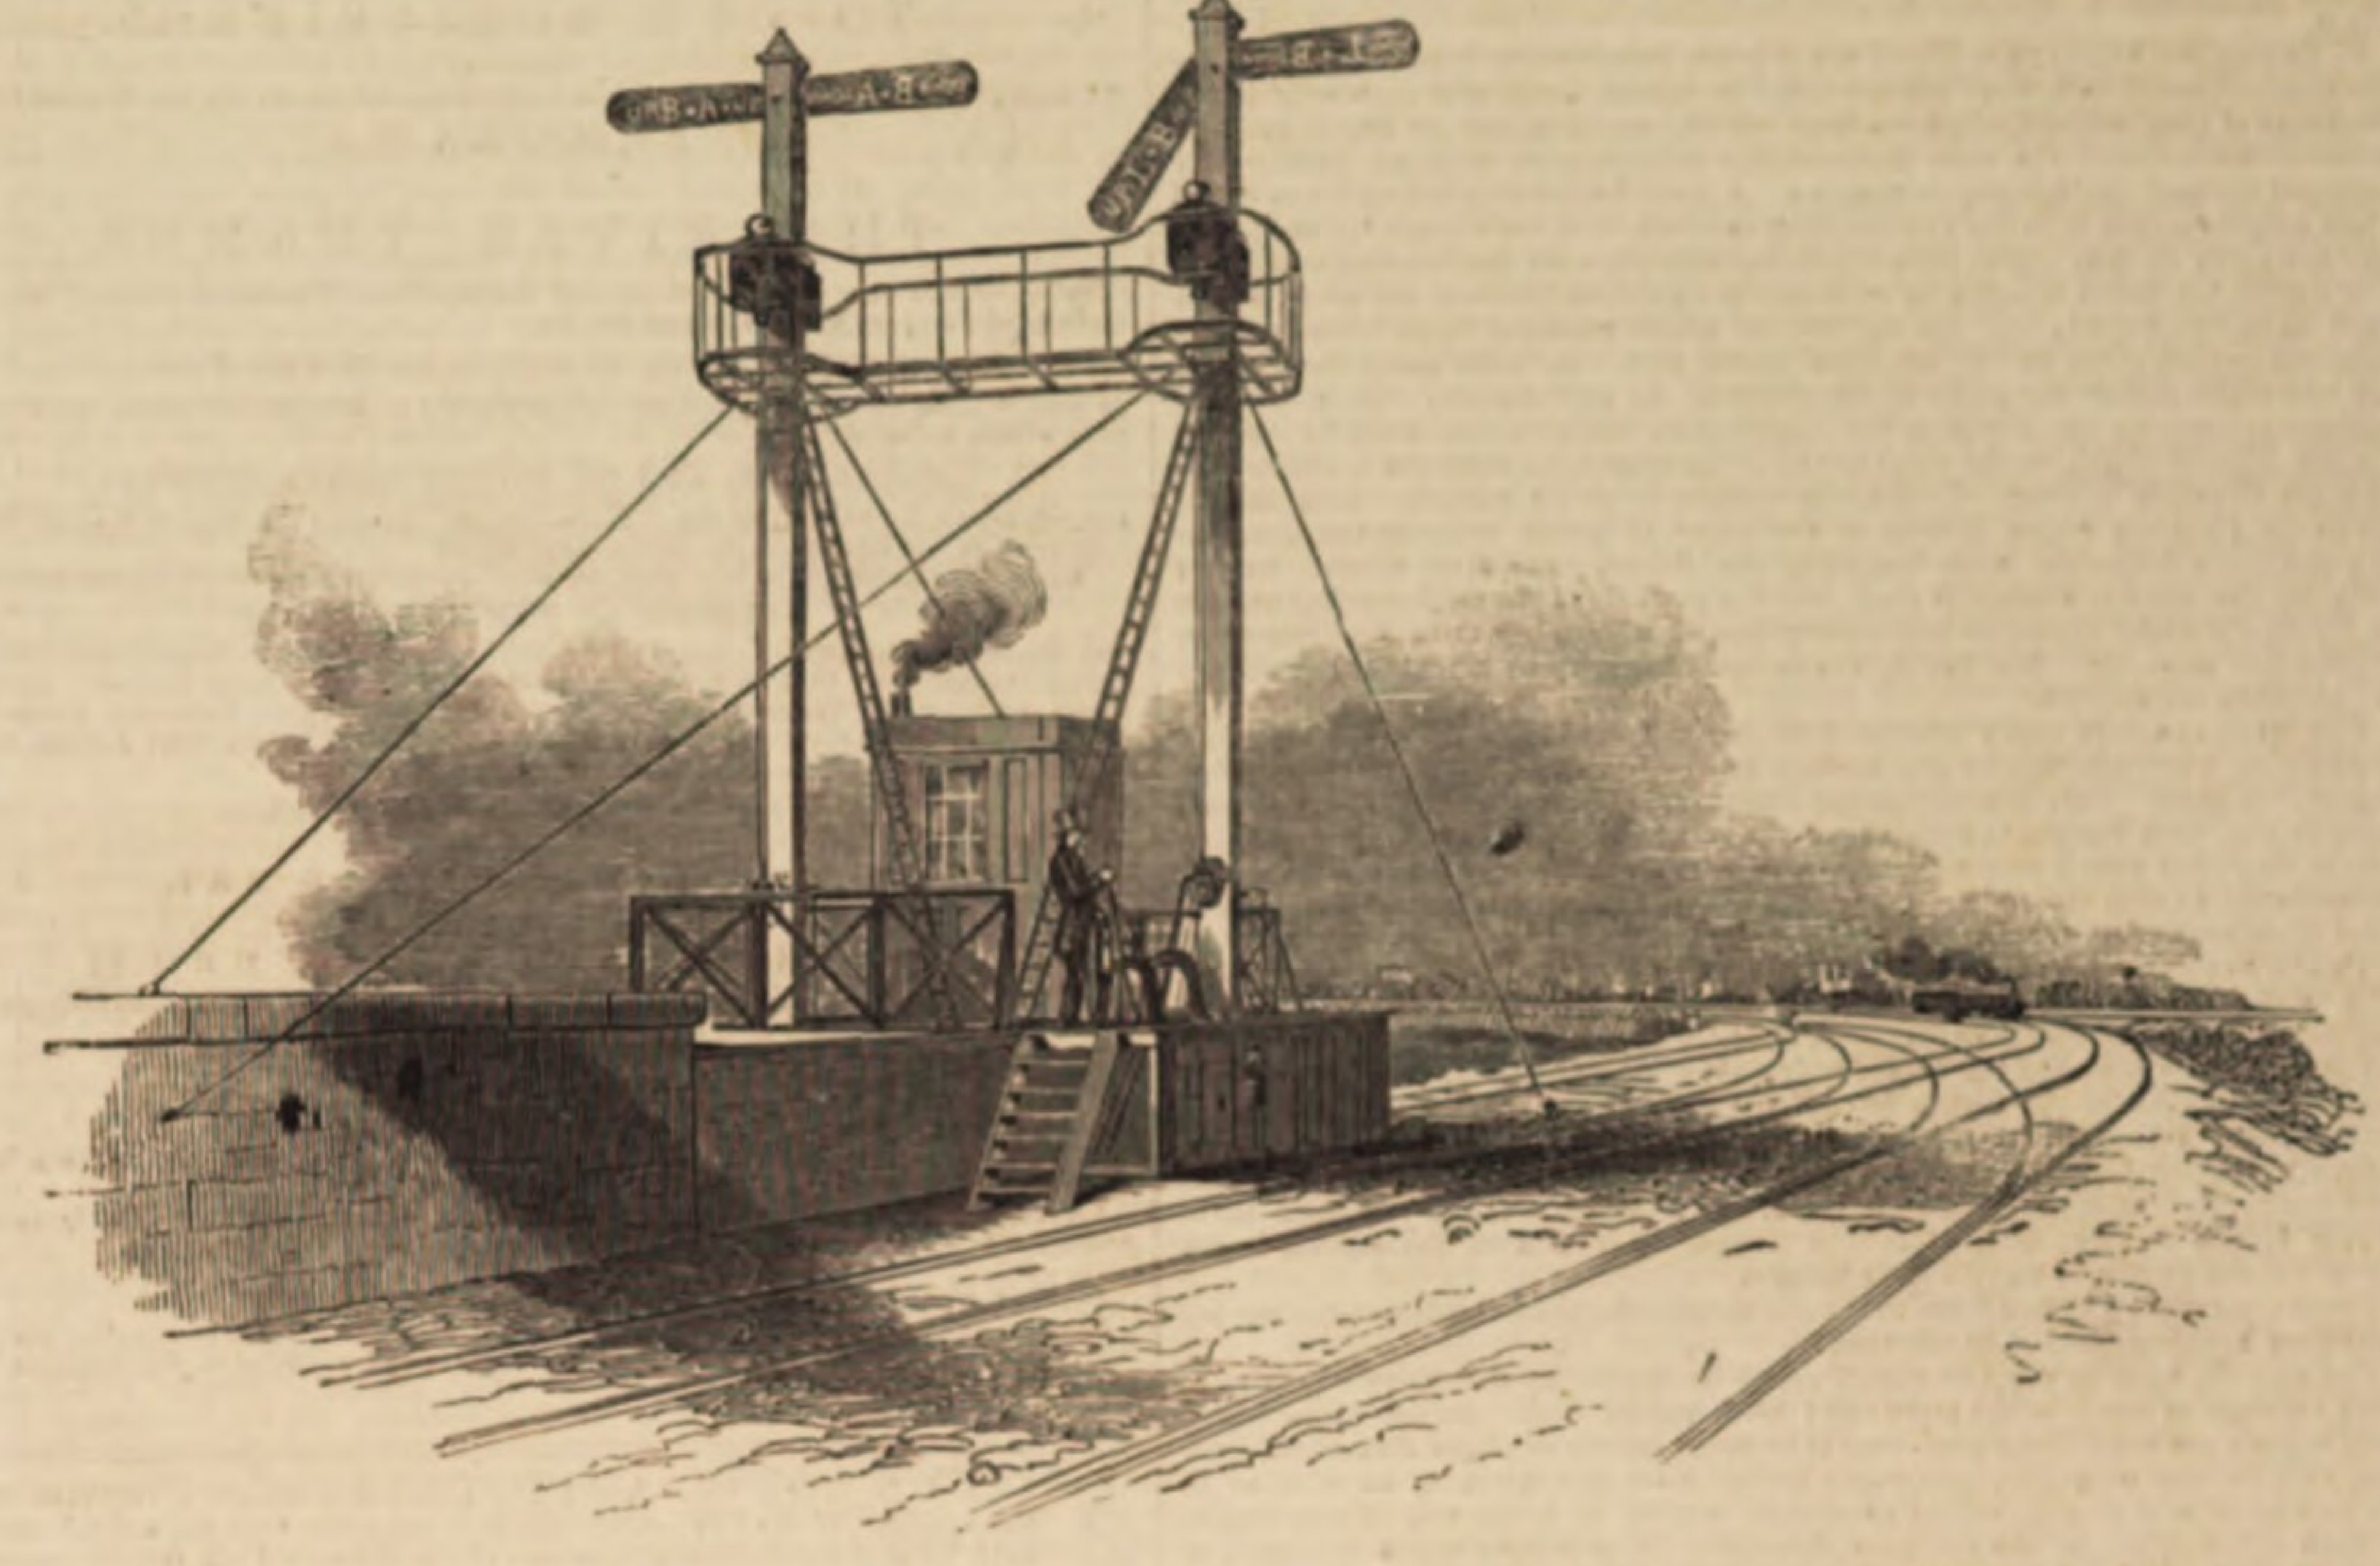
DOVER—CAUTION—RAILS.

2. SIGNALS SHOWN AT INTERMEDIATE STATIONS AND THE LONG TUNNELS.—Signal posts are erected on the "up" and "down" lines at the Intermediate Stations, and at the entrance of Primrose-hill, Watford, and Kilsby Tunnels, showing a Red Board of a large size, and a Green Board of a smaller size, as day signals. A Green or Red Light is substituted as night signals. On a train or engine passing an intermediate station, the Green signal is exhibited for the space of ten minutes, to denote that a train on the same line has passed within that period, and therefore due caution must be observed on the part of the drivers and guards. On a train stopping at an intermediate station, the Red Signal is shown, and continued for five minutes after its departure, when the Green Signal is turned on, to complete the ten minutes' precautionary signal. On a train entering one of the tunnels, the Red signal is shown for the space of ten minutes, to prevent another engine entering within that time; unless the policeman can previously see through that the line is clear, when the Red Signal will be turned off, and the Green shown, to complete the ten minutes' signal. Should the Red Signal be shown an engine passing on that line is ordered invariably to stop on coming up to it.



DOVER JUNCTION: DANGER: UP AND DOWN LINES, BRICKLAYER'S ARMS. CAUTION, UP LINE; DANGER, DOWN LINE, LONDON BRIDGE.

3. ENGINE SIGNALS.—These consist of white and coloured boards by day, and white and coloured lamps by night, placed before and behind the train, to announce its character, whether it be on passenger, luggage, or special, service. The whistle is an important adjunct to the system, as it serves to give an almost irresistible warning, to all parties within reach of its shrill and earnest notes.

In giving orders for the use of these signals, the most imperative obedience is enjoined on all parties concerned; but, at the same time, they are told not to rely on the signals being given at all times, but to exercise due and proper diligence, and on no account to be running before their proper time, or beyond their regular speed. The engine driver is also charged to stand by his "head gear," and to "keep a good look out."

In addition to these arrangements, a code of standing orders is issued, for precautions to be observed on the unexpected stoppage of an engine on the line and during fogs. For example:—Should any accident occur to cause the stoppage of an engine or train on the line, the under-guard, or breaksman, is instantly sent back at the least 600 yards, with a Red Signal, to warn any engine that may be following on the same line.

It will be seen that these arrangements are very simple, and, so far, well adapted to the intelligence of the ordinary working men to whom they are addressed, and for the requirements of a comparatively limited and uniform traffic. Signals of greater intelligence, will, however, be required when the great lines become, according to their original designation, trunk lines, loaded with the traffic of numerous branch lines, and innosculating with various junctions in their course. Engine must then be made to talk with engine, station with station, and line with line. And, that such facilities of communication will be obtained, our trust in the ingenuity of the national mind forbids us to doubt. Sounds as well as sights have yet to be used, symbols have to be multiplied till the "parts of speech" are no longer confined to the grammar book, and, above all, the subtle agencies of electricity admit of combinations which will bring the ends of the earth together. We have, therefore, much pleasure in noticing that every new railway, and every new arrangement of business on old ones, is, in most instances, accompanied with improved signals, and that the general and instantaneous correspondence of one part of the line with another, is, in a corresponding degree, facilitated and secured. One of the most recent of these improvements is to be found on the Brighton, Croydon, and Dover Railways, where an entirely new set of signals has recently been introduced. They consist of

2. POST SIGNALS.—These are placed at all the stations. Our cut represents the first from London. These Signal Posts are furnished with two arms, one moving out on one side to give signals to trains on the down line of rails, and another moving out on the other side of the Signal Post, to give signals on the up line of rails. The signal, All Right, is shown by the left hand side of the Signal Post, as seen by an approaching engine-driver, being clear. The Caution Signal, to slacken speed, is shown by the arm on the left hand side being raised half-way to the horizontal position. The Danger Signal, always to stop, is shown by the arm on the left hand side being raised to the horizontal position. The position of the arm on the right hand side, has reference to the right hand line, and is consequently a signal to trains running in the contrary direction. At night, the arrangements are as follows:—Each Signal Post is furnished with lamps, showing three colours, in both directions by night as follows:—The signal, All Right, is shown by the White Light. The Caution Signal to slacken speed, is shown by the Green Light. The Danger Signal, always to stop, is shown by the Red Light.

3. JUNCTION SIGNALS.—These are of great importance, demanding from the servants entrusted with their management an almost automatic regularity in the discharge of their solemn duties—a trust which, we are happy to say, they have hitherto fulfilled with the most praiseworthy diligence, no accident having ever occurred through inattention or mistake. A junction is furnished with two signal posts corresponding with the two meeting railways, and the signals for each railway are given on that signal post which corresponds with that particular railway. The signals for trains running to or from the right-hand railway are given on the right-hand signal post; and the signals for trains running to or from the left-hand railway are given on the left-hand signal post. At both posts the regular day and night signals are given as described in the post signals. On a train or engine approaching any junction, the engine-man holds out his hand by day, or a white light by night, to the right or left of his engine, to point out to the switchman the direction in which the train or engine is to be passed. The cut (6) shows the Junction Signal Station at the point of union between the Croydon line and the Bricklayers' Arms branch of the Dover, near New Cross. In the distance, the wooden viaduct is seen, and the position of the train marks the spot on which the awful explosion and destruction of a luggage train took place on Wednesday morning. The cut (5) shows the machinery by which the signals and the switches are worked.

FOG SIGNALS.—In foggy weather both day and night signals are given; but in addition, when accident or any sudden emergency requires, "Cowper's Fog Signal" is used. This is a detonating compound, packed in the shape of a small circular box, with flanges to fasten it to the rail, and which, on a train passing over it, explodes with a tremendous noise. The signal thus given is the warning immediately to stop the train. Our engraving shows a policeman placing one in front of an advancing train.

TRAIN SIGNALS.—Each train, after sunset or in foggy weather, is provided with White Engine and Red Tail Lights. The Brighton trains carry Two White Lights on the engine buffer beam. The Croydon trains, One White Light on the top of the smoke box, and the Dover trains, One White Light on the buffer beam, and one on the top of the smoke box. Every train carries two Tail Lights placed horizontally. A Red Tail Board by day, or a Third Red Tail Light by night, indicates that a special, or extra train, will follow. Express engines or trains, which have the preference of all others, carry a White Board in front by day, and three White Lights in front by night. The tremulous sound of the whistle is the signal for the guards to put on their breaks.

For the management and combination of the signals, the following very clear instructions have been issued to the men:—

The signals, both by day and night, are to be shown by the signal-man, until every carriage or truck in the train shall have passed him. In all cases where hand signals are used, the signal-man is to stand on the opposite side of the railway, that he may be quite conspicuous to the driver and fireman, as well as to the conductor and guards, taking great care not to be in the way of any engine or train approaching in the opposite direction. The Danger Signal is always to be made immediately after an engine or carriage of any description has passed along the line, and is to be continued for five minutes; it is also to be made whenever there is any obstruction on the line, or any danger of obstruction; and at a tunnel, whenever the state of the atmosphere, or the smoke, or any other cause, shall make it at all doubtful whether the line within the tunnel is quite free, even though more than five minutes may have elapsed since the entrance of the last engine or carriage. The Caution Signal is always to follow the Danger Signal, and to be continued five minutes; it is also to be made whenever the state of the road or other circumstances, though not such as to require the Danger Signal, make it desirable that the speed should be reduced. The All Right Signal is only to be made when the signal-man has satisfied himself that the line is clear and unobstructed, and that there is no danger to the free passage of the engine or carriage. In case of a fog, the day and night signals must be used simultaneously. When Cowper's Fog Signal is used, it must be fixed to the upper flange of the rail, by means of the lead clip, and, if possible, not less than half a mile from the place of obstruction. In the event of any accident occurring, which may cause obstruction, or of a train stopping on the main line (except at a station), the signal-man, or, in his absence, the guard, is instantly to display the Danger Signal, and send or himself hasten in the proper direction to stop any engine that may be approaching, until he has proceeded half a mile from the obstruction, when he must remain with the Danger Signal shown, until he knows the line to be again perfectly clear. Every signal-man is immediately to report to his nearest superior officer any instance of disobedience of the signals given.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"F. W. H."—There is a clock in the Palace at Hampton Court, which goes 12 months with once winding up. The method of lengthening the time of going is to add to the number of spur-wheels, and increase the weight. THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 14, 1844.

THE French Government has published a modification of its Tariff; any thing relating to the commercial affairs of one of the great powers of Europe is important to England, especially at a period when a great portion of the Continent, in pursuance of its own policy, or as a consequence of ours, exhibits a but too decided inclination to exclude us, if possible, from its markets. In France this inclination has been made more strikingly visible than anywhere else; national antipathies have sharpened commercial rivalries; the manufacturing interest of that country shares the general feeling that is often so ludicrously, sometimes also so painfully, visible in their public journals, of dislike of England and everything belonging to her; but among the commercial classes it is intensified, if we may use the term, and to them, we fear, we not only seem competitors, but enemies. To this feeling the French Ministry are of course compelled, in some degree, to yield; if it required all the political skill and sagacity of Louis Philippe and Guizot combined, to keep the war party of France from openly flying at our throats, we cannot be surprised at their not venturing on any plan of commercial reform that would expose them to the suspicion of "favouring England." And we must confess the modification of the French Tariff just promulgated is not open to any such suspicion; the Ministry may meet the Chambers without any fear of attack from the Opposition, on the ground of a prejudice in favour of England. In the whole scale of duties there is no change that can be called more than nominal; it is a change that alters nothing, and a concession that concedes as little as possible. The reductions are made on articles that no one uses, or they are so slight in amount as to be of little visible advantage. In fact, the whole scheme is open to the same charge that was so often made against the Tariff of Sir R. Peel; it deals with numberless small articles, and does not touch the great staples of commerce; the life of nations, the well-being of a people as far as they are dependent on food and clothing, are very slightly affected by remissions of duty on mother of pearl, croton oil, and rattans. If France would admit English woollens and hardware, and if England would admit French wines, both nations would gain something in wealth and comfort. But here occurs the difficulty as to who is to make the great relaxation first; and we must confess, that as we are not free from reproach on the same matter, we cannot with much justice blame our neighbours.

The Governments of both nations will probably arrive at commercial wisdom by degrees; and, in the meantime, no small consolation may be derived from this fact, that the energies of the people of each nation are gradually breaking through the barriers that confine and embarass, but cannot altogether restrain them. In no one article which England exports on a great scale, has France relaxed her tariff; on the contrary, on some she has increased the duties. Yet, in spite of this, superior skill and our natural advantages will prevail, and much as French Ministries and French manufacturers may wish to see the commerce of England crippled, the first are compelled to see it flourish, and the latter are obliged to buy. In the last ten years the imports of France from England have increased sevenfold! And, we believe, we take from France goods to a greater amount than they take from us; except the United States, we are the best customers the French possess in the markets of the world. But what we are to each other is as nothing to what we might and should become, did not hostile tariffs, that seem constructed on the principle of retaliating injury for injury, interpose; they are, from time to time, as in the present case, modified, but with no improvement that is appreciable; and, from the present state of French party, we can hardly expect it to emanate from any Government that can hold power in a nation afflicted with a thing so monstrous as a "war party," utterly opposed to, and destructive of, the intercourse and commerce of mankind, and more anxious to seek national greatness from battles than barter.

A SPEECH from Mr. Ferrand to his constituents at Knaresborough has broken the political flatness of the week. It has the defect of being excessively long, and the merit of being peculiarly personal; we call the last a merit in this case, because it will probably obtain for it that which its bulk would, under ordinary circumstances, prevent—a reading. The matter of the speech is not new; it is little more than a re-statement of the scenes and squabbles in which the Member for Knaresborough was a principal party concerned, during the last session—in all which implications, explications, and replications, valuable time was consumed, which the country thought might have been much better employed. Besides re-statements of what Mr. Ferrand did do, and did not do, and dared the House of Commons to do—with all which the public are familiar—there are various descriptions of the political characters of Sir R. Peel and Sir J. Graham, which are quite the reverse of flattering, and some prophecies of what will occur to this doomed nation and people, if they are much longer suffered to be at the head of its affairs. His glances into futurity are of very Cassandra-like gloom and despondency, and we must be excused for receiving them with very Trojan disbelief. His premises are sadly exaggerated; and his conclusions false in proportion. It is a curious phenomenon, that, according to the solemn declarations of violent party-men, it is always the worst and most worthless men in the country that are trusted with the ruling it. Thus, Sir R. Peel, according to Mr. Ferrand, is "a lunatic or a traitor:"—a lunatic on the score of his Canada Corn Bill, and a traitor, because, having got O'Connell safely caged in Richmond Penitentiary, he did not put him on the prison dietary—a bread and gruel regimen, in the opinion of the Member for Knaresborough, being the best possible quencher of political agitation. Having omitted to seize that one opportunity of distinguishing himself as a statesman, and having, over and above supporting the Poor Law, compared Mr. Ferrand to the "bottle conjurer," who did not perform what he promised, in Sir R. Peel there is no safety—he will ruin the country—he will beggar the landed interest—he will betray the Protestant Church! There is nothing he will not do, except perhaps good, of which Mr. Ferrand pronounced him incapable. "As sure as we stand here to-day, the present race of farmers will be ruined, and one-half the land of England will change hands in ten years, unless Sir R. Peel is driven from office;" "Sir R. Peel has ruined the home trade:" England certainly never had so fatal a Minister, and yet the funds perversely indicate anything but alarm, for Consols have this week been at 100! It is the same abroad; we are going to ruin headlong; not a bale of British goods will leave Liverpool in a British bottom, if nations refrain from cutting each other's throats. "It is my conviction, that if peace continues throughout the world for a few years longer, our foreign trade will be entirely gone." Sad is the prospect indeed; he is equally decisive as to China, and foreshadows the commercial policy of the Celestial Empire:—"The Emperor of China has but slight hold of the affections of his subjects, and when the poor of that country find themselves without the means of existence, by the trade forced on them from England, they will drive the manufactures of England from China, and compel their own Government to rescind their commercial treaty with England."

Were ne'er prophetic sounds so full of woe.

And for all this there is but one remedy—Sir R. Peel out of Downing-street. But, like many other men, who let their passions prompt them rather than their reason, Mr. Ferrand overdoes his enmity. People will ask if, perchance, there is no personal hostility at the bottom of all this raving about national ruin and social destruction? "All seems yellow to the jaundiced eye;" but there is no persuading the healthy one to see things in the same colour. We are no champions of the Poor-law, and we give up the cold heartlessness of much that occurs in the working of it to Mr. Ferrand's zealous detestation, wishing only that he had discretion and knowledge enough to make his enmity effective. But when he denounces as rotten the whole gigantic system of modern trade—which he has not taken the trouble to understand—and makes the most reckless accusations against a minister whose policy he cannot comprehend, he must be content to be set down as speaking from that unreasoning bitterness, which animates the disappointed partisan, angered with the position of others and dissatisfied with his own. He spares the people as little as the Premier, and declares that England has degenerated into "a nation of humbugs." Looking at the whole of the Hon. Member's public carreer, we fancy he speaks more from an intimate knowledge of himself than acquaintance with his countrymen; but if we are so fallen, he may stand as the type of the whole.

Behold a nation in a man expressed.

The French police is falling into disgrace with the Parisians. It has been so long and so successfully used as a political instrument, that it has ceased to be effective for the prevention and detection of crime, or rather its constitution and management did not so well fit it for that purpose as for the other. As far as person and property are concerned, the good people of Paris are left pretty much to take care of themselves; against the dangers of political meetings and the immorality of the outward expression of free opinions, there is not a better watched and guarded people in Europe. But the number of robberies and murders in the streets of the capital have so increased, that serious alarm has been created, especially as the police appears utterly unable to check these crimes, or even to discover them.

A trial which has recently taken place has brought to light the existence of a gang of regularly organised assassins and robbers, who have existed for eight years, and who have during the whole of that period been carrying on their nefarious trade without being discovered by the police. Fifteen have now been convicted and sentenced to different degrees of punishment, which will relieve society of their presence for a good many years; but this result has been obtained, not by the exertions and intelligence of the police, but by a quarrel among themselves, which induced one of them to give a clue to the authorities of the practices and haunts of his companions. This is the fourth gang of the same kind that has been discovered within the last few months, and, curiously enough, the police had not the merit of bringing one of them to justice. In every case one of the rogues (generally the greatest) turned King's evidence, and betrayed his companions.

Paris is, in fact, in the state London was a century and a half ago, when to walk the streets by night was an actual danger. The whole patrol system, of a guard passing round at a stated time, is even worse than that of our old and inefficient watchmen, that was broken up by Sir R. Peel for the introduction of the present police; the continual vigilance that is thus kept up in the streets, in conjunction with our generally-well supplied gas-lights, renders outrages almost impossible; the quiet and safety of our metropolis at all hours, make the dreadful crimes detailed by the Paris papers appear almost incredible. But it is the natural effect of perverting a system of police from its true purpose, and making it a political instrument, for watching opinion rather than actions. A conspiracy in Paris could scarcely escape detection; a citizen may be strangled and robbed in the streets with something approaching impunity. The facts given in the above quotation have awakened the Parisians to a perception of their true interest in the matter, and it has been seriously proposed to establish a police similar to our own. Remembering how loudly the superior skill of the French police has been vaunted, and the great opposition and dislike shown by the people to our force when first formed, this result is a great proof how well the plan was calculated to secure that great object—public safety.

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

Her Majesty and Prince Albert.—Her Majesty and Prince Albert took their departure for Claremont on Saturday last. On Sunday they attended divine service accompanied by the Dukes of Saxe Gotha and Wurtemberg. Archdeacon Wilberforce officiated. On Monday the Queen and Prince Albert took their usual walks in the gardens. The Queen and Prince Albert, accompanied by the Royal children and the illustrious visitors, returned to Windsor on Wednesday afternoon. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, Lady Fanny Howard, and the Countess Wratislaw, joined the Royal circle at the Castle at dinner in the evening.

Windsor, Thursday Evening.—(From our own Correspondent.)—Her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert, accompanied by the reigning Duke and Duchess of Saxe Coburg, and the Duke Ernest of Wurtemberg, and attended by members of their respective household, visited her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, at Frogmore, this morning. Their Royal Highnessess Prince Albert and the Dukes of Saxe Coburg and Wurtemberg skated on the lake, in front of the mansion; the illustrious party returning to the Castle to an early luncheon. A chapter of the Most Noble Order of the Garter, at which nearly the whole of the Knights Companions were present, was held in the Throne room, this afternoon, at half-past two o'clock. The Queen being seated in the chair of state, the Knights Companions took their respective seats at the table; the Prelate standing on the right hand of her Majesty, and the Chancellor of the Order on the left. The Registrar and Black Rod stood at the bottom of the table. His Royal Highness the Duke Ernest of Saxe Coburg and Gotha was, by her Majesty's command, conducted from an adjoining apartment, between the two senior Knights Companions present, to the Chapter-room, where his Royal Highness was received by the Queen and the Knights Companions, standing. The Queen then announced to the Reigning Duke of Saxe Coburg and Gotha that his Royal Highness had been elected a Knight of the Most Noble Order of the Garter. His Royal Highness was then invested with the insignia of the order, with the usual formalities, the Chancellor pronouncing the admonition. Her Majesty then gave the accolade to the newly-elected Knight; and his Royal Highness received the congratulations of each of the Knights Companions present, passing round the table, and shaking hands with each. The Marquis of Abercorn, the Earl De Grey, the Earl of Powis, and the Earl Talbot, were afterwards elected Knights Companions of the Order, and introduced and invested with the customary ceremony. The Hon. Corps of Gentlemen at Arms and the Yeomen of the Guard were on duty at the Castle. A Guard of Honour from the Scots' Fusilier Guards, with the band of the Regiment, were stationed in the Quadrangle; the band performing select pieces of music during the imposing ceremony. It was the intention of her Majesty to have given a grand banquet this evening, in St. George's Hall, in honour of the occasion, but the recent demise of her late Royal Highness the Princess Sophia of Gloucester, caused this arrangement to be abandoned. Dinner was served this evening in the grand dining-room, covers being laid for twenty-eight. The infant Royal Family were taken out for their accustomed airing this day at noon in the private plantations in the Home Park.

Benevolence of her late Royal Highness the Princess Sophia Matilda of Gloucester.—On all occasions of a public nature, whether a church was to be built or a school founded, her Royal Highness was always first to contribute her subscription on a most liberal scale. She was an annual subscriber to every charity in the parish. A year before her demise her Royal Highness placed in the hands of the vicar (the Rev. W. A. Soames) £100, to be invested for the Jubilee Almshouses, and £100 for the Blue-coat Girls School; but her liberality was chiefly felt in acts of private charity, which were dispensed with a most judicious discrimination.

Death of the Earl of Limerick.—We are sorry to have to announce the death of the venerable the Earl of Limerick, which took place at his lordship's seat, South Hill Park, near Bracknell, Berkshire. The deceased nobleman, Edmund Henry Pery, Earl and Viscount Limerick, and Baron Glentworth, in the peerage of Ireland; Baron Foxford, of Stackpole Court, in the county of Clare, in the peerage of the United Kingdom, was born on the 8th of January, 1758, consequently had nearly completed his 87th year. He succeeded to the barony of Glentworth on the demise of his father, 4th of July, 1794, was elected a representative peer for Ireland by the Act of Union, created Earl and Viscount Limerick, 11th of February, 1803, and enrolled amongst the peers of the United Kingdom, by the title of Baron Foxford, 11th of August, 1815; married, 29th of January, 1783, Alice Mary, only daughter and heiress of Henry Ormsby, Esq., of Clognan, county of Mayo, by Mary, his wife, sister of Sir Henry Hartstonge, Bart. His lordship is succeeded in his titles and estates by his grandson, the Hon. William Tennison Pery, now Earl of Limerick, who is at present in Australia. We understand that the Earl of Rosse is likely to be the new representative peer of Ireland, in the room of the late earl.

Death of the Dowager Lady Floyd.—We regret to hear of the sudden death of the Dowager Lady Floyd, mother of Lady Peel. Her ladyship, who was at the banquet given at the Royal Exchange in honour of the Queen's visit, in the enjoyment of excellent health, a fortnight back left this country for Italy, with the intention of sojourning a short time at Nice. On reaching Paris, however, the deceased lady was seized with symptoms of indisposition, which in two days terminated in her death. The deceased was relict of the late General Sir John Floyd, Bart., whom she had survived twenty-six years. By that gallant general her ladyship leaves issue Lady Fuller, widow of the late Lieutenant-General Sir J. Fuller, who died in October, 1841, and Lady Peel, wife of the Right Hon. Sir Robert Peel.

Marriage in High Life.—On Wednesday the marriage of Count de Jarnac, eldest son of Viscount de Chabot, K.C.H., and nephew of the Duke of Leinster, premier secretary to the French Embassy, and the Hon. Geraldine Augusta Foley, second daughter of the late and sister of the present Lord Foley, was solemnised at St. George's Church, Hanover-square, in the presence of a large circle of relatives.

The Royal Visit to Strathfieldsaye.—We understand that the Duke of Wellington has received an intimation from the Queen, that the day intended for the visit of her Majesty and her Royal Consort to the ducal seat in Hampshire (which was to have taken place in the course of the ensuing week) must be postponed until after Christmas. We also learn that her Majesty's visit to the Duke and Duchess of Buckingham, at Stowe, has been deferred until after Christmas.

Covent Garden Theatre.—This theatre is likely to open with éclat. Shakspeare, who has been lately banished from the national stage, will again be introduced to it. Henry Betty, who has acquired considerable renown in the provinces, is to play Hamlet on the 28th instant, and will also, we hear, appear in Macbeth soon afterwards. M. Laurent is an enterprising manager; and, if report speak true, he has in preparation various novelties of an enticing character.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

> A lusty winter,
> Frosty but kindly.—Shakspeare.

With the present week frost commenced its reign of rural monopoly—seizing on earth and water with ruthless vigour, and scattering the sylvan pleasures before the petrifying breath of its nostrils. No longer is the merry horn heard within the covert, nor the jocund fowler seen in the field: rural sports have ceased, and men and youths have but one excuse for deserting the chimney corner—the ice—the bonny ice! What a passion for skating exists in this country! The most timid rush upon a gelid death as fearless as Curtius into his chasm, and cockneys make oblations to the Serpentine as desperately as Hindoos to Juggernaut. Notwithstanding this universal taste, the use of the skate is probably the only art or science without a professor in this metropolis. Some time ago, indeed, a gentleman announced that he was prepared to lay down surfaces in drawing-rooms, and the like, on which the pastime of skating might be pursued; but the novelty had a short life: either it died a natural death, or was assassinated by the Polka. In this dearth and difficulty of instruction, and as there is every indication of a long visit from the elementary despot, we cannot do better than volunteer such hints for the aspirer after the honours of the ice as experience of the slippery subject enables us to furnish.

The first thing to be done is to procure the tools. Let the skate be plain—by no means fluted—a poor invention. Having procured his skates, the novice may learn how to affix them—as also to walk with them when attached—in doors. This is the first lesson in the balance. Next as to costume. Skirts should be eschewed, as they get foul of the legs; a dress coat is good, but a sailor's jacket best. Let the trousers fit close, and the boots lace; this will be found a great support to the ancles. Now he may take his way towards the water he has selected for his debût. We would not recommend the learner to begin on the ornamental waters of the parks—but penetrate a few miles into the suburbs, if a Londoner; the inhabitant of the rural districts will have no trouble on this head. If the ice be a little rough, so much the better; and, donning the iron, let him make his essay. At the first step—which, like all of its class, is the most trying—let him avail himself of a friend's hand, holding his feet not far apart. Losing this support, he will scramble about for a space, but, presently finding his legs, he will be able to attempt a tolerable perpendicular. Now he may strike out, keeping the leg which is on the ice straight, or bringing it into that form as soon after making his stroke as he can. Let him incline his person slightly forward, but not, like the foolish fellow in "The Pilgrims and the Peas"—

> "Hobbling with outstretched b—— and bended knees."

His whole bearing must be free from constraint or rigidity; the secret of the art is balance. Having learnt to stand and slide on the inside edge, which the inclination of the foot opposes to the surface, by pressing that edge against the ice, a means of propulsion is obtained. Then he should place the foot used in propelling, in advance, and repeating this, he will soon be enabled to shove himself onward alternately with both feet, and the first step is accomplished. He will soon, as it were instinctively, commence inclining towards the outer edge, on which all graceful skating is performed. To make the first essay easy, he should throw forward the left shoulder the instant he has impelled himself on the right foot, bring his right arm back, and look over his right shoulder, inclining his whole person decidedly and confidently towards that side. He must be in no fear of his foot-hold forsaking him, but lean over bodily: "one trial will prove its efficacy." Reversing the order, he should then give his other leg a lesson, and so on till he has vanquished all uncertainty of stroke, and accomplished "the outside edge"—the degree of A B in the science of skating. Having attained this amount of knowledge he will go on in the embellishments of his art, and according to the extent of his boldness and agility: in one season the most perfect command of the skates may be acquired by any one who combines courage with manly activity. In case of accidents, the following maxims should be borne in mind. Lose no time. Avoid all rough treatment. Never hold up the body by the feet. Strip, and rub it dry, wrap it in hot blankets, and lay it in a warm room, with the head somewhat elevated. If possible, place the patient in a hot bath; at all events, rub him briskly with the hand. Should he appear lifeless from intense cold, rub the body with snow, and restore animation by slow degrees: afterwards treat it as above; but the immediate application of heat in this latter case is full of danger.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

It is currently reported and generally believed, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer intends proposing the reduction of the Three per Cents., on the meeting of the ensuing Parliament, having met with such great encouragement in the reduction of the Three-and-a-Half per Cents., which is the cause of the continued rise of the New Three-and-a-Quarter.

Dinner to Sir Henry Pottinger.—A splendid entertainment was given to Sir Henry Pottinger by the principal merchants in London, in Merchant Tailors' Hall, on Wednesday. The Chairman, John Abel Smith, Esq., M.P., in proposing the health of the guest, dwelt on the advantages which would be derived from the commercial treaty concluded under his auspices. Sir Henry Pottinger, in returning thanks, explained the results to which that treaty would lead. He said he believed the treaty included every thing that was favourable to England and to other nations. After the time that had elapsed since the ratification, he was still of opinion that, in all the main features of the treaty, no amendment could be made. Everything had been so arranged as to be mutually beneficial to the Chinese and English. An erroneous impression had gone abroad as to the value of Hong-kong, compared with other islands that we might have claimed. Among these the island of Chusan was named, but, taking into consideration the population, and other circumstances, he was still of opinion that Hong-kong was the more suitable for the purposes of a British settlement. The meeting had nothing of a political character in it. Indeed both Lord Aberdeen and Lord Palmerston were present, and Lord Aberdeen congratulated the latter noble lord on having been the means of obtaining for this country the eminent services of Sir Henry Pottinger.

The Anti-Corn Law League.—The Anti-Corn Law League resumed their meetings at Covent Garden Theatre, on Wednesday. Nothing remarkable, however, occurred. The theatre, as usual, was excessively crowded, and there were long speeches from Mr. Villiers, Mr. Cobden, and Mr. Bright. Scarcely a new argument was brought forward. The Chairman, Mr. Wilson, however, asserted that the exertions made by the League, at the Registrations, would produce a difference in favour of the League of sixty-four votes (or thirty-two members) on Mr. Villiers's annual motion in behalf of free trade. Mr. Wilson also detailed at great length the exertions which the League were making in creating new votes for counties by purchasing freeholds. In this respect, Mr Wilson stated the League had met with great success, and they believed they had already created a sufficient number of votes to secure the representation of South Lancashire, North Cheshire, York West Riding, and other counties.

Metropolitan Pauperism and Destitution.—By Returns sent to the Rev. W. Tuckett, M.A., St. George's in the East, it appears that on November 27th, 1844, there was a decrease, compared with the corresponding period of the preceding year, of paupers in the various unions and workhouses of the Metropolis and its suburbs, to the amount of 888, and in mendicants, vagrants, and destitute persons, to the amount of 445; and by comparing the two years together, it will be perceived that when the Houses of Refuge were not open, the unions and workhouses were more frequented, and the vagrants, &c., were more scattered amongst the different parishes; but as soon as the refuges are open, no doubt, fresh arrivals will flock into the Metropolis, and take up their abodes in these places; and by supposing the refuges to be full as last year, and consequently less in the workhouses, &c., the numbers are not the tens of thousands, as generally supposed, but in round numbers the average number of these nightly wanderers is about one thousand.

Mortality in the Metropolis.—Deaths from all causes, in the week ended Saturday, Dec. 7:—Males, 518; females, 470; total, 988.—Weekly average: Males, 483; females, 463; total, 946.

EPITOME OF NEWS—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

A letter from Bilboa, dated the 4th inst., states that a Spanish vessel had just arrived, in thirty-two days, from the island of Cuba, with the intelligence that the Havannah had been nearly swept away by a terrible earthquake. No further details are given respecting this dreadful convulsion.

It may be mentioned as an instance of the improvement in commercial affairs, that the Customs' revenue of Liverpool for the past year is likely to yield upwards of £4,500,000 sterling, a sum greater by very nearly £500,000 than the amount contributed last year.

A letter from St. Petersburgh states that the Emperor of Russia, considering the expenses necessary in 1845 for the construction of the railroad between Petersburg and Moscow, orders that a loan of twelve millions of silver roubles shall be opened abroad, on the same basis as that of the 3d 4 per cent. loan. The inscriptions of 500 silver roubles each are to be divided in 184 equal sections, and to bear interest from the 1st of August this year.

According to a private letter from Oran, the colonel of the 2nd Regiment of Hussars, who was detached with his regiment, to Sebdon, having gone to shoot game with the surgeon and some privates of his regiment, was surrounded by a number of Arabs, who carried off the entire party. It is supposed that this feat was performed by some of Abd-el-Kader's troops, who are encamped on the frontiers of Algeria.

Daniel and John Forrester, the celebrated Police officers, are natives of Carmarthenshire. They were born at Nantycaws, three miles from Carmarthen, their father having kept the public-house now occupied by a man named Levi Llewellyn. Another brother was accidentally shot near Nantycaws.

Advices from Ichaboe to Oct. 3, state that there were at that date upwards of three hundred vessels lying at Ichaboe, and that four or five vessels were loading with guano at each pit, and vessels were arriving daily. A previous letter, dated Sept. 20, states that there was sufficient guano on the island to load all the vessels that could be loaded for the next six months at the then rate.

Mdlle. Brohan, an actress of the Theatre Français, some time back was knocked against in the street by a man carrying a heavy package. The blow struck her on the bosom, and caused acute pain. For two months she suffered constantly, the part affected being exceedingly swollen and inflamed. Recently, an eminent surgeon gave it as his opinion that some substance had got into the flesh, and caused the pain. He prescribed certain remedies, and two or three days after a needle worked its way out. It is supposed that having been accidentally placed in Mdlle. Brohan's dress, it was forced into the flesh by the blow. The lady is now doing well.

A letter from Brussels of the 7th inst., states that the mercury in the centigrade thermometer had fallen to 11 deg. (8 deg and a half Reaumur) below zero. The navigation in the canals from Brussels to Willebrook and Charleroy was completely stopped, and also the canal of Louvain. The ice was already several inches thick. The rivers Dyle and Senne were beginning to freeze.

The High Court of Appeal has reformed the sentence against Tschech (the intended murderer of the King of Prussia), inasmuch as he is to be beheaded, instead of being executed by the wheel. It may be expected that this sentence will again be transmuted into detention or transportation. The behaviour of Tschech was, without a moment's weakness, unchangeably firm and resolute. He insisted upon having acted by motives of general well-being, without being instigated by any accomplices. Nevertheless it is the general belief at Berlin that Tschech has acted under the influence of a conspiracy.

A letter from Tahiti, June 2, states that the chiefs of Wallis's Islands and of the Island of Fontana are henceforward under the protectorate of France, this step, which was applied for several months back, being consented to by the French Government. The Governor of Tahiti has, in consequence, dispatched a vessel to these islands to notify that they were to be occupied. The protectorate of the Gambier Islands has also been notified.

POSTSCRIPT.

Smithfield Club Dinner.—Yesterday (Friday), the annual dinner of the members of the club took place at the Freemasons' Tavern, Great Queen-street, Lincoln's-Inn-Fields. The Right Hon. the Earl Spencer presided, and there were present the Duke of Richmond and several very influential agriculturists. The secretary, Mr. Gibbs, and the officers connected with the society, were congratulated on the manner in which the three days of the show had passed off. Dinner was on the table at half-past four o'clock.

Smithfield Club Cattle Show.—The visitors, yesterday (Friday), were quite as numerous as on Wednesday and Thursday. The room containing the farming implements, &c., attracted considerable attention. A general meeting of the club took place at one o'clock, which was attended by the Earl Spencer, President, the Duke of Richmond, and other distinguished individuals. Some business connected with the distribution of the prizes was gone through.

Agricultural Protection Society of Great Britain.—Yesterday (Friday) the first general meeting of the members of this society was held at the office, 17, Old Bond-street. The Duke of Richmond presided, and was supported by the Duke of Cleveland, Mr. Pusey, M.P., Mr. Blackstone, M.P., Mr. Miles, M.P., and several other members of Parliament. A long report of the proceedings of the society was read by Mr. Byron, the secretary. The question of the introduction of Canadian corn was entered into very fully. The noble chairman said he would move for certain papers on the matter on the meeting of Parliament. The report was adopted. The annual dinner is fixed for the 2nd of February.

Important Railway Meetings.—Two important railway meetings have been held at Liverpool this week—first, for the purpose of submitting the conditional agreement entered into by the Liverpool and Manchester Company with the North Union Company, for the amalgamation of the lines, and other minor matters; and, secondly, to obtain the sanction of the proprietors of the Grand Junction Company to the consolidation of the Manchester line with theirs. The latter proposal was agreed to.

The Weather.—The weather continued to be excessively cold yesterday. Last night there was a cutting N.E. wind, and the thermometer was three degrees below freezing point. During the day the skaters continued to amuse themselves in the parks, although the ice is not yet by any means secure.

Another Steam-Boiler Explosion.—We regret to learn that a steam-boiler explosion occurred on Monday, at Messrs. Lloyd and Foster's colliery, near Wednesbury, by which the engineer was killed.

The Explosion on the Dover Railway.—This unfortunate occurrence has attracted the serious attention of the officers and directors belonging to the line, as well as of the other metropolitan railway officials, several of whom inspected the spot yesterday for the purpose of collecting information, for it has not previously occurred that the boiler of a locomotive, while running, has exploded. On further search being made by Mr. Cubitt (the engineer of the line), Mr. George, and other gentlemen, it was discovered that the safety valve was hard down, from which it was inferred that the explosion arose solely from the circumstance of the engine-driver having neglected to open it. The steam then, having no means of escape, had caused the casing to collapse, and the explosion that followed. The engine was quite new, and had only been shipped on to the line a few days since from Liverpool. The inquest was expected to have taken place yesterday, but it being doubtful whether the body was lying in Mr. Payne's district or that of Mr. Carter, some time was lost before information was sent to the right coroner, and the warrant for impannelling the jury has not been received. The body of the engine-driver, which lies at the Bricklayers' Arms-station, is that of a fine young man upwards of six feet in height, and from the appearances it is probable that death was instantaneous. The neck was broken, and also the left arm where the waggon wheel passed over. The damage done to the viaduct, engine, tender, and waggons, was roughly estimated at £5000. The stoker, Aaron Wilkinson, died last night. During the time that the men were employed in removing the waggons off the line, another accident occurred, which nearly cost an excavator his life. He, with several other men, were clearing the line, when a waggon slipped from the top of another one, and to save himself he ran forward and fell through one of the holes to the bottom of the viaduct. When picked up he was perfectly insensible.

More Incendiary Fires in Hertfordshire.—On Monday night a fire broke out on the Parsonage Farm at King's Walden, near Stevenage, occupied by Mr. G. Roberts, an eminent agriculturist. The whole of the buildings, with the exception of one barn, a cow-house, and the farm-house, which stood at a distance from the barns, were reduced to ashes. The loss is estimated at £2000. Suspicion has fallen on two labouring men. On the following night (Tuesday) another fire occurred in a wheat stack on the Bedford-road, about a mile from Hitchin. Near the stack in which the fire originated were three other stacks, and the flames extended to these with great rapidity, ending with their total destruction. The loss is estimated at £700. These fires are believed to have been the work of incendiaries.

The Late Bank Robbery.—The intention of the Bank of England to call in all the £1000 notes dated 13th May last has been officially noted to all the banks by Mr. Hobler, with the view of adopting some measures for cancelling those stolen from Messrs. Rogers.

A Lad Shot by his Relatives.—A youth, named Birch, was yesterday shot, while out in Chiswick fields shooting birds. The parties charged are the brother and cousin of the deceased, who were yesterday examined at Hammersmith Police-court, and remanded, but admitted to bail. It appeared from the evidence of a witness that he was with deceased and the two prisoners and others that morning, about eleven o'clock, in the Home Fields, Chiswick. They had for some time been engaged in shooting birds. The prisoner Wakeman (the cousin), had the gun which belonged to the prisoner Birch, and was going to shoot a bird, when the prisoner Birch went up and laid hold of the gun to take it away from him. A scuffle then took place between the two prisoners as to which of them should have and fire the gun, which was loaded with shot, when the gun exploded, and the charge entered the body of the deceased, who was standing within a yard of witness, and about two or three yards from where the two prisoners were struggling about the gun.

THE FROST.

The severe weather has continued; the thermometer at seven o'clock on Sunday morning, at the Receiving-house, Hyde Park, was 29 degrees (three degrees of frost); and during the day it varied only from 29 to 30 degrees, and at six o'clock the mercury was at 29 degrees, with a dense and cloudy sky. The parks and Kensington-gardens were throughout the day thronged by respectably-dressed persons.

The Serpentine River, in Hyde Park, was entirely frozen over; the ice was however, not more than an inch and a half thick, and was, therefore, dangerous. During the day full 5000 persons ventured, at the risk of their lives, upon the ice, notwithstanding the repeated cautions they received from the icemen of the Royal Humane Society. Shortly after four o'clock an accident occurred, which had nigh proved fatal to no less than ten persons. The first that became immersed was a young man, named Charles Fane, residing at No. 3, Harris's-place, Oxford-street. The ice gave way in the centre, between the Receiving-house and the bridge, where there were six feet of water. Sparks and Hughes, two of the icemen, instantly hastened to his assistance, but on approaching the edge of the breakage, the ice gave way, and they also were immersed, the sinking man clinging to them. At that juncture several of the icemen and other persons came to their aid, when a third breakage took place, through which seven more persons were immersed. A sailor courageously jumped into the hole, and got out three, while the others were got out by the icemen. One of the men got out by him, named Martin Connell, living at No. 3, Barrett's-court, Oxford-street, was in a very faint state, and both he and Fane were instantly conveyed to the Receiving-house, where they received proper attention, and after a hot bath, &c., were able to proceed home. On the Round-pond in Kensington-gardens, the ice round the edges was thin and insecure, although in the centre it was very firm. About 1500 persons were on it during the day without accident. On the Long-water, that portion of the ice between the islands and the Bayswater end, was most secure. About 2500 persons, during the day, were on the upper part.

On the lake, in St. James's Park, there were also a great number of person on the ice.

About four o'clock when some thousands of persons were engaged in sliding and skating, the ice gave way on the north side of the island, at the east end, and seven or eight men and boys were instantly immersed in fourteen feet of water.

Iceman Joseph Clapstone repaired to their assistance, with ladders, &c., but then, from the rottenness of the ice, giving way, he fearlessly sprang into the water, and, with the aid of one of the park-keepers and bystanders, succeeded in extricating five.

Some of the daily papers gave accounts, evidently furnished by the same reporter who every winter describes in inflated terms, and indeed in the same phraseology, under the same head, "The Weather and the Parks," the various "moving accidents" upon the ice. Some persons having fallen into the water, the attempt is made to invest the account with a certain sort of interest, by stating that a hat or handkerchief was found upon the ice, and that men have been employed in dragging, "as it is feared some persons have met a watery grave." We have watched these statements from day to day, and are happy to find that here is no confirmation of the supposition. On Thursday, the alarming statement of this reporter dwindled down to the fact that an owner had been ound for the property, which the writer describes in these terms in one of the morning papers:—"The hat and the blue handkerchief, and also the white handkerchief marked 'E. H., 5,' which were found on the previous day while dragging for the bodies supposed to be under the ice, were yesterday identified, and claimed by T. Lane, of 85, Margaret-street, Cavendish-square." As statements like those to which we allude sometimes create pain and unnecessary alarm, we think it right to give this explanation respecting them.

HUMANE SOCIETY'S ICEMAN.

An unpleasant accident took place at the west end of the lake, near Buckingham Palace, where the ice broke completely across from the northern to the southern shore, and about fifteen persons were suddenly thrown into ten feet of water.

The whole of these persons were, however, extricated and restored, and were enabled to proceed homeward.

The first snow storm of the season occurred on Sunday night, between seven and eight o'clock. Within one hour it fell rapidly, and in the outskirts of the metropolis, more particularly at Islington, Dalston, and the northern districts, the ground was speedily covered.

At seven o'clock on Monday morning, the mercury stood as low as 24, eight degrees below the freezing point.

The Parks were from an early hour again thronged.

It is computed that from 8000 to 10,000 persons were on the Serpentine during the day.

In the Regent's Park, the ice was visited by several thousand persons.

The number of persons on the lake of St. James's Park was limited, in consequence of the extreme insecurity of the ice in many places.

The frost during Tuesday was considerably diminished in severity, but there was by no means any appearance of a thaw.

The ice on the Long-water and Round-pond in Kensington-gardens was very strong and in good condition, and on them during the day the number of skaters was upwards of 2000. On the north bank of the Long-water, the Skating Club had their marquee erected, and several of the members skated on the ice during the afternoon. No accidents, we are happy to say, occurred.

On Tuesday about 2500 skaters ventured on the Serpentine, and the banks were thronged by respectably and fashionably-dressed persons. One accident only occurred during the day, and that took place about ten minutes to three o'clock, when a man named William Somers, who was engaged on the north bank of the Serpentine at the east end in cutting the ice for removal to the ice-wells of Buckingham Palace for the use of her Majesty, became immersed in ten feet water, but was speedily extricated.

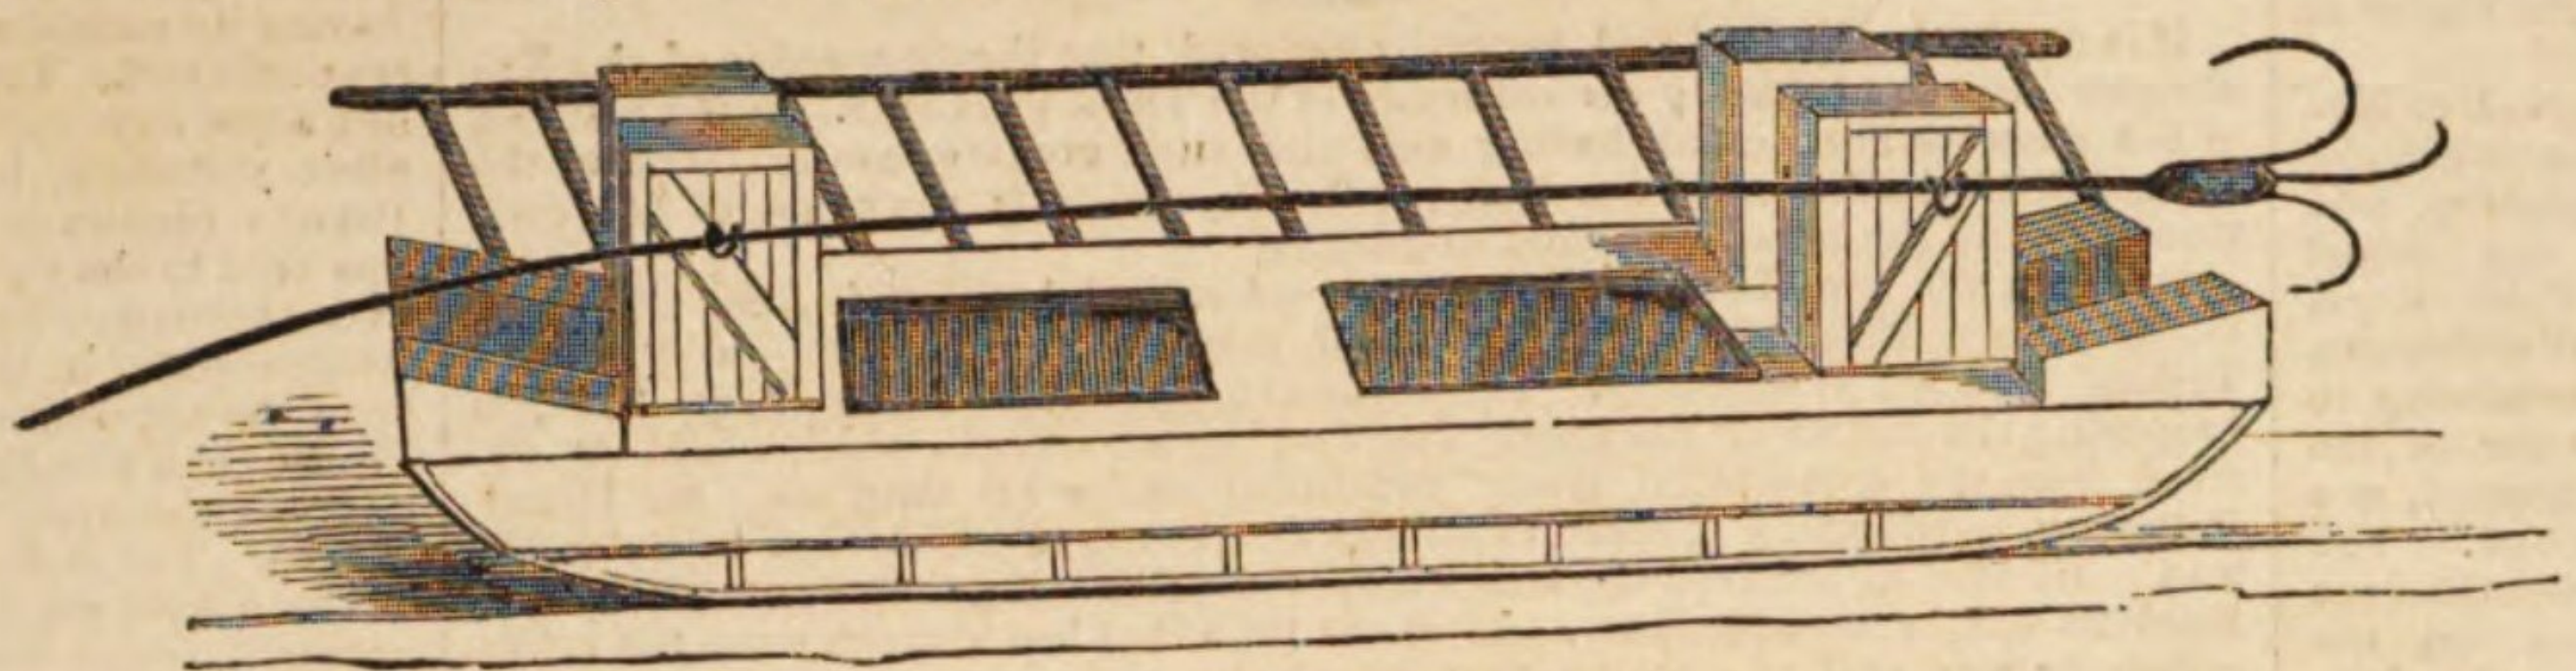
The ice on the lake in St. James's-park was on Tuesday about two inches in thickness, and rather less dangerous than on the preceding day, but by no means safe. During the day there were several thousand skaters, but no accident whatever.

During Wednesday the number of persons on the Serpentine exceeded 5000, but no accidents occurred. On the Long Water the ice is very good, and the number of skaters there was about 3000. Amongst them were several of the members of the Skating Club, whose admirable skating attracted the attention of the large and fashionable assemblage who witnessed it. The ice on the Round-pond was also very good, and about 2000 persons skated there. No accidents of any description occurred in the gardens during the day.

On the ornamental lake in St. James's Park the ice was very dangerous, owing to so much of it having been broken, but the number of skaters on the more secure parts was nearly 8000. About a quarter to three o'clock P.M. a man named George Wilson, residing at No. 1, Ebury-street, Pimlico, broke through into seven feet of water, but immediately succeeded in extricating himself, and went home. No other accident occured during the day.

On Thursday last, the skating was continued on that part of the water in St. James's Park next the Palace. The ice was much broken on the water next the Horse Guards, and no persons were in consequence allowed to approach it. Skating was also resumed in Hyde Park, Regent's Park, and the Surrey Zoological Gardens.

Up to the time of our going to press the frost continued, and the weather was intensely cold. It has been very foggy at intervals during the week. On Wednesday, a dense fog hung over the greater part of London all the morning, particularly in those parts of the metropolis adjacent to the course of the river Thames. It hung over the town like a dull, opaque, dirty brown pall; candles and gas were in requisition in all these districts throughout nearly the whole day. In some of the northern districts the day was cloudy, but the fog only slightly obtsructed business. The river navigation was nearly suspended.



BOAT FOR SAVING PERSONS FROM DROWNING.

In the Regent's-park the ice was about three inches in thickness, and the number of skaters 6000. No accidents occurred.

Our Engraving represents the spirited scene, with some of the most distinguished members of the Skating Club; a sketch of one of the "Icemen" of the Humane Society; and a Double Boat, constructed this season, for the rescue of persons from drowning. It is of cast-iron, zinked, and consists of two boats, connected by cross planks, placed at such a distance, that in cases of submersion by the ice breaking, the boats being brought to the spot, and the space between the planks being just over the aperture in the ice, the iceman may, with greater facility, extricate the person in danger; the boat is also provided with a ladder, hook, and other implements.

We have received from a Correspondent the following

LINES,

WRITTEN UPON SEEING THE SKATING CLUB IN REGENT'S PARK.

Oh! slipp'ry sport, that oft brings heads and heels
In closer contact than quite pleasant feels
To bodies corporate, or even slender
(An icy fall 's not over nice or tender),
Thou'st here, at last, attained thy true perfection,
Under the gallant Skating Club's protection!
Such whirls and darts—such swallow skims and turns—
With nose and fingers cold, our bosom burns,
In emulation warm, as hundred feet
Before our weeping eyes, like visions fleet!
Hail, noble art! etherial science, hail!
A double power is on thy freezing gale;
The young, the gay, the rich, may all endure
Its icy wing; but oh, the houseless poor!

THE CATTLE SHOW OF THE SMITHFIELD CLUB.

The annual exhibition of prize cattle, extra stock, and agricultural implements, collected under the auspices of the Smithfield Club, was, on Wednesday, for the fifth year, opened to the public at the Horse Bazaar, King-street, Portman-square, and from an early hour in the morning up to a late hour in the evening, the vicinity of Baker-street and the surrounding locality was one continued scene of bustle and excitement, and it is computed that upwards of 10,000 persons visited the building.

At eleven o'clock in the forenoon the annual meeting of the Smithfield Cattle

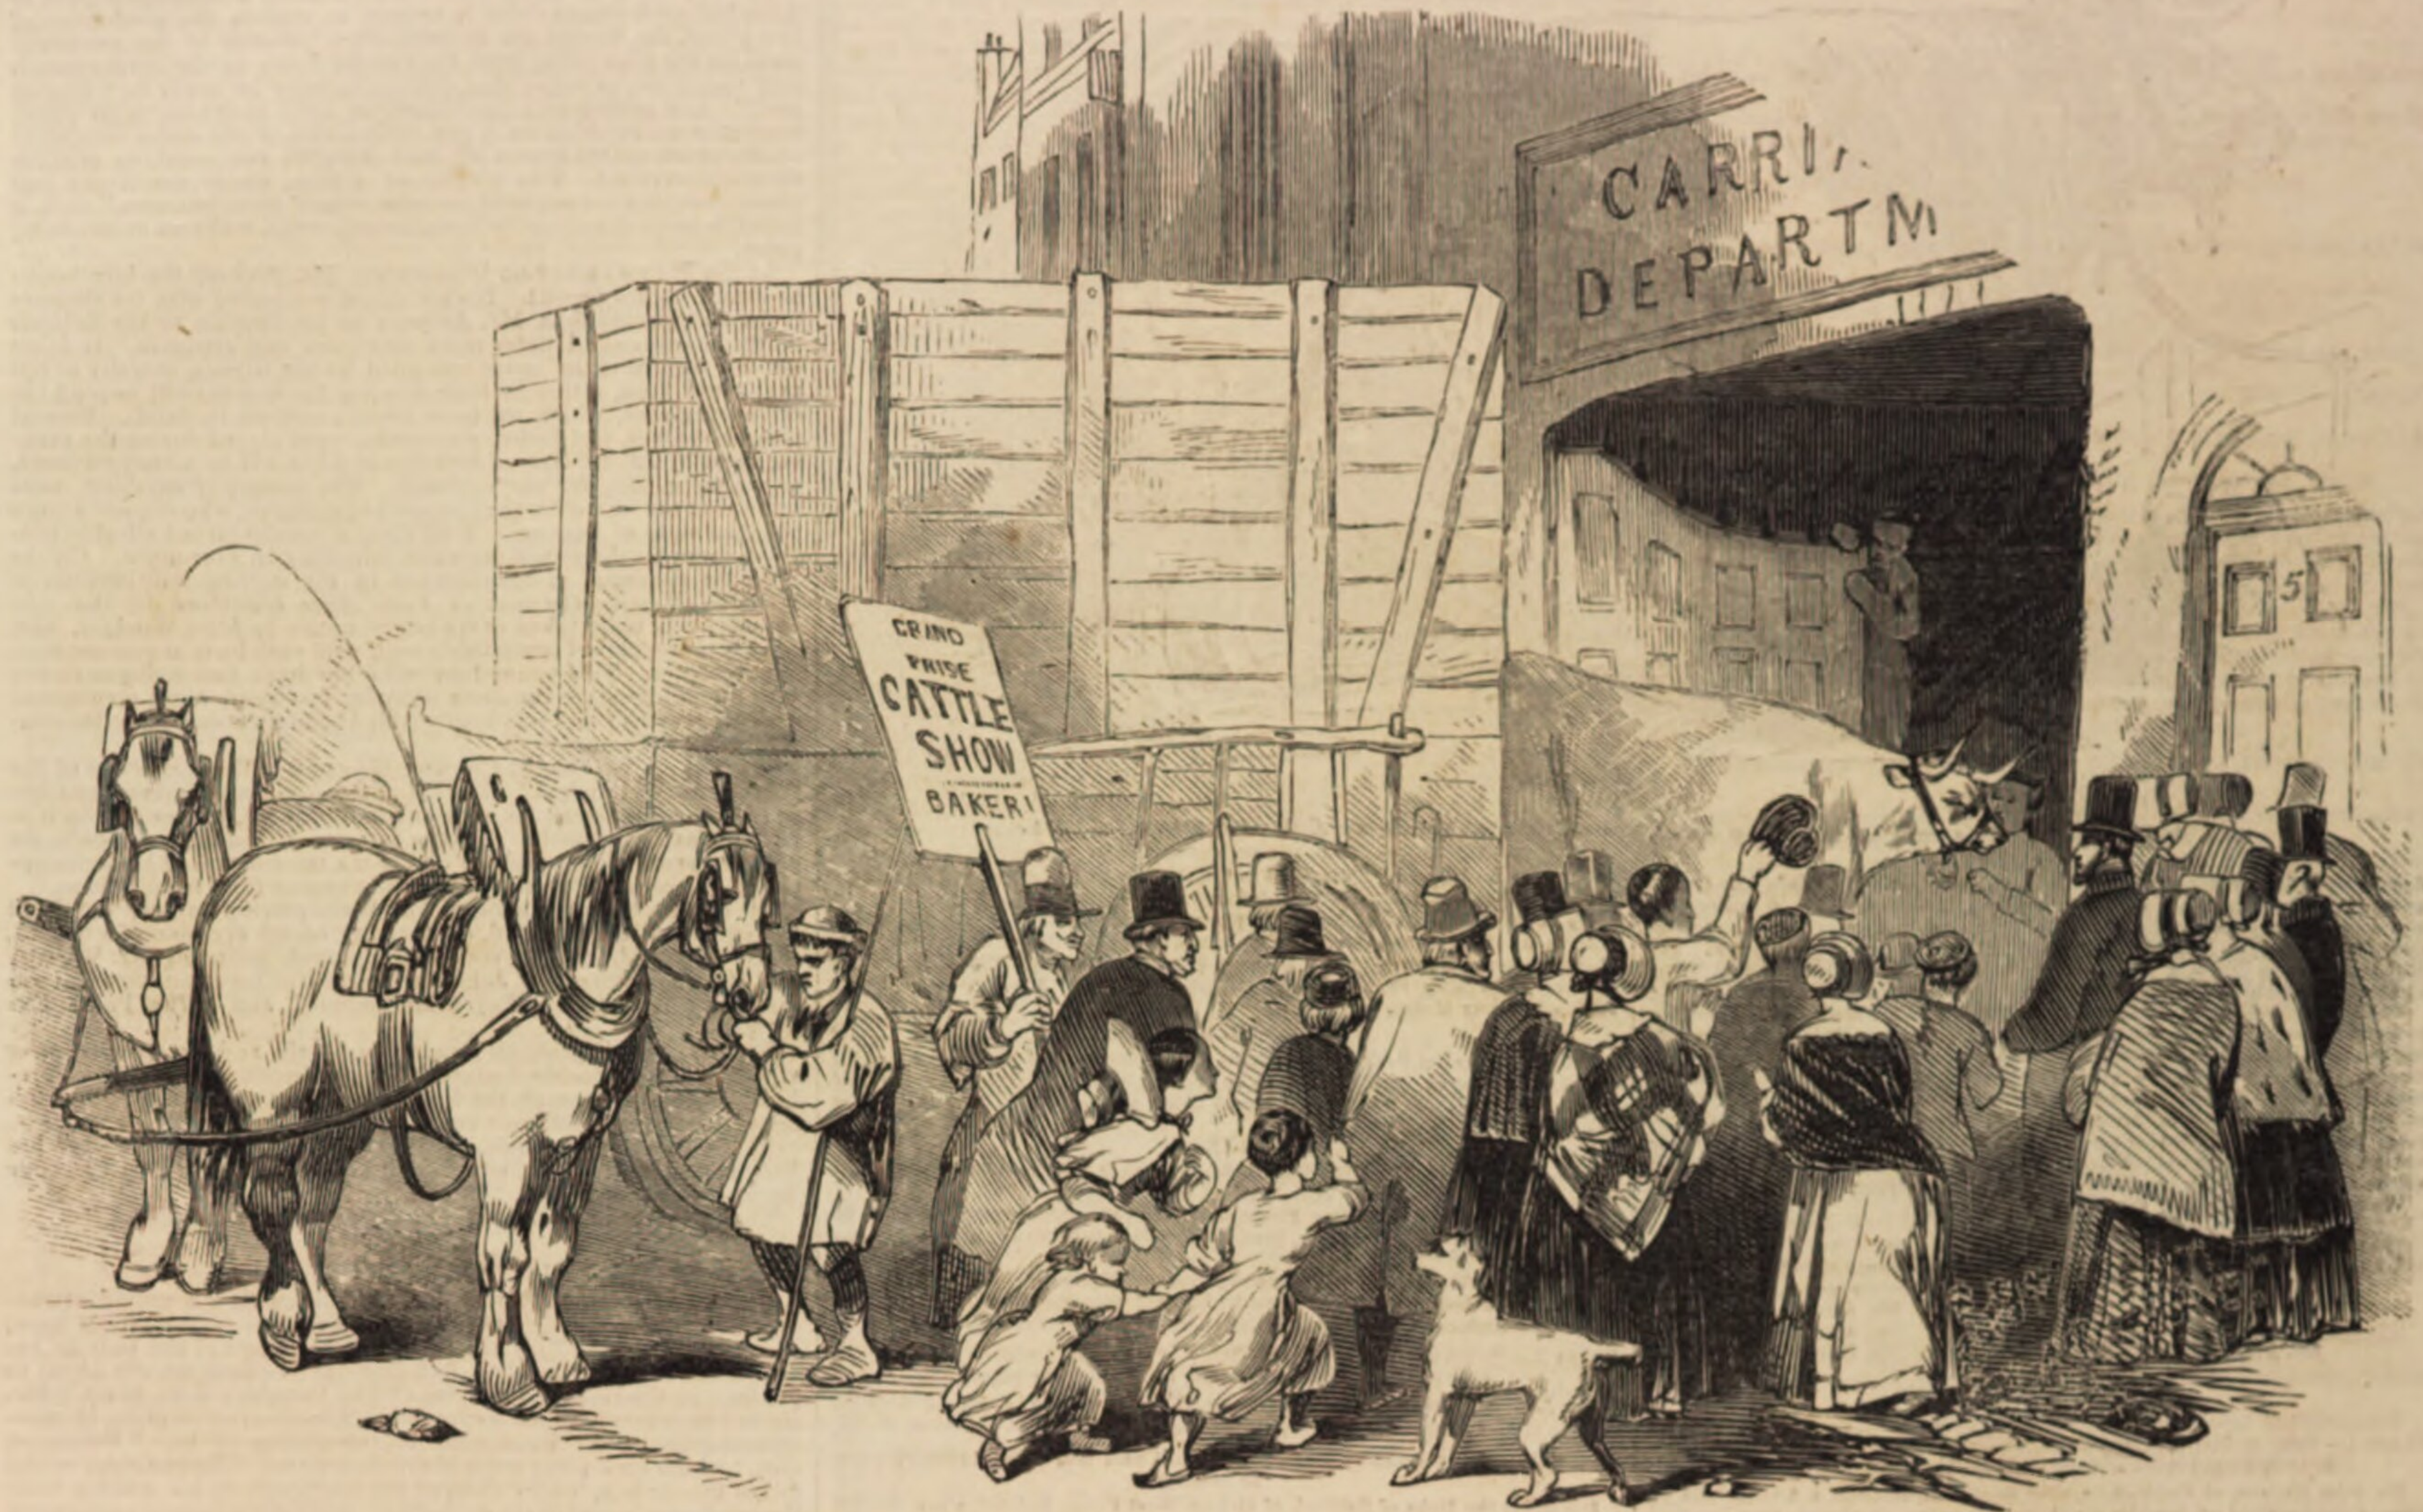
THE SMITHFIELD CLUB CHRISTMAS CATTLE SHOW.



ARRIVAL OF PRIZE CATTLE AT THE BAZAAR, BAKER-STREET.

Club took place in one of the rooms of the Bazaar, Earl Spencer, the President, in the chair. The meeting was very fully attended by the members, and amongst a large number of distinguished agriculturists present, were his Grace the Duke of Richmond, his Grace the Duke of Bedford, the Hon. Captain Spencer, Mr. Pusey, M.P., Earl Radnor, Mr. E. J. Barnard, M.P., &c. The report as to the state of the affairs of the club was read by the secretary, Mr. B. T. Brandreth Gibbs, and was unanimously approved and adopted. The award of the judges, with respect to the cattle, stock, &c., exhibited this year, was then read and confirmed, and several gentlemen congratulated the Club on the general excellence of the animals produced for competition as compared with former years.

The club then proceeded to the settlement of various questions in dispute concerning the improper entries of cattle, &c., and Earl Spencer having been unanimously re-elected president of the club for the ensuing year, and the Dukes of Richmond and Bedford, and several noblemen and gentlemen, vice-presidents, Mr. B. T. Brandreth Gibbs was unanimously re-elected to the office of secretary. After a vote of thanks to the noble chairman, the meeting broke up, and the members of the club proceeded to view the various specimens of cattle, at which they expressed themselves generally much gratified.

Soon after the opening of the bazaar to the public, considerable competition was exhibited among the butchers and salesmen to obtain possession of those animals which had secured to their owners the highest prizes.

Prince Albert's beautiful polled ox, of the Scotch breed, bred by his Royal Highness at the Flemish Farm, Windsor, was purchased by Mr. Bannister, of Threadneedle-streeet, butcher to her Majesty, for the sum of 60 guineas. The ox which obtained the first prize of £20 and the silver medal, bred by Mr. R. Smith, of Burley-on-the-Hill, near Oakham, Rutland, was purchased by Mr. Minton, of Windsor, purveyor to her Majesty, at the enormous price of 70 guineas. In class 2, the 4 years and 8 months old Hereford ox, belonging to Mr. J. T. Senior, of Broughton-house, near Aylesbury, and bred by Mr. James Nash, of Aconbury, near Hereford, which obtained the second-class prize of £20, was sold to Mr. Joseph Armfield, of Brook-street, Bond-street, for £60. The prices of the other prize oxen sold varied between 40 and 60 guineas.

In class 6, the short-horned cow bred by Earl Spencer, and which obtained the prize of £10, was sold to Mr. Ryder, of Southampton; and in class 7, his lordship's heifer, which obtained the £20 prize, was purchased by Mr. Bannister, of Windsor. The first prize in class 17, for pigs, of £10, bred by Mr. J. Buckley, of Normanton-hill, near Loughborough, was sold to Mr. J. Garland, of Oxford-market; and in class 16, Prince Albert's pen of pigs, which obtained the 2nd prize of £5, was purchased by Mr. Smelter, of Knightsbridge. The purchasers of the South-down and other sheep, bred by the Dukes of Richmond and Bedford, for which prizes were obtained, have not yet transpired.

Those animals which had obtained the highest prizes appeared throughout the day to attract the earnest attention of the visitors, but the most prominent objects of interest appeared to be the Scotch ox belonging to his Royal Highness Prince Albert, and the splendid deer brought up by Mr. Pook, of Windsor, and bred in the Windsor Great Park.

The whole of the arrangements for the accommodation of the public, both with respect to the cattle department and that in which the implements of agriculture are exhibited, were excellent in the extreme.

The show this year surpasses both in numbers and the quality of the things exhibited any former years. The Leicester sheep and the Southdown sheepare of the first quality, and the oxen and cows are many of them very superb specimens. The pigs are also good. It will be seen that his Royal Highness Prince Albert has obtained the second prize for pigs. Lord Spencer has not been so successful as in some former years, though he has obtained a prize. The Duke of Bedford has obtained several prizes, and the Duke of Richmond is also amongst the winners. The implements of husbandry and the other things connected with husbandry are more than usually numerous.

On Thursday the attendance was much greater than on the preceding days. Several purchases of sheep and cattle from the Extra Stock were made by gentlemen who attended from various parts of England for the purpose. The butchers in London and its vicinity were also very prominent amongst the buyers. The council issued a notice to the effect that a silver medal will be awarded to the butcher that shall lay out the largest sum in the purchase of cattle, not, however, including the Extra Stock. His Royal Highness Prince Albert's stock was the subject of much interest amongst all the visitors. Some sheep of the south down breed, fed by his grace the Duke of Manchester, at Kimbolton Castle, were much admired. They were sold to Mr. Ramsey, of Bath. A prize of £5 was awarded to his grace the Duke of Richmond in the sheep class. In that class Mr. Barclay, M.P., and Mr. Barnard, M.P., had some very fine stock. The Red Deer bred in Windsor Park, and the property of Mr. Pook, of that town, excited considerable interest: the age of this animal is sixty months.

The agricultural implements were exhibited in a large room over the yard; the collection was much greater than those of former years, including manufacturing carriages, ploughs, and harrows. Mr. Webster, of Hounsdown, near Southampton, exhibited one of his newly-invented levels, the design of which had been approved of by the Agricultural Society of England. Amongst the other articles exposed for view in this room were specimens of sheep and lamb clipping, composition potatoes for planting, grass seeds, mixtures for irrigation or water meadows, and for upland sheep walks, turnips, carrots, parsnips, mangold wurtzels, cabbages, with hundreds of others too numerous for detail.

We subjoin an account of the award of the prizes.

MUSIC.

GREENWICH.

An excellent evening concert was given in the Lecture Hall of this town on Monday last, which was completely filled upon the occasion by a highly respectable audience. The programme contained the names of Madame Albertazzi, Miss Dolby, Miss Davies—a pupil of the Academy, and Mr. John Parry, as vocalists; with Miss Dinah Farmer, Mr. Richardson, and Mr. Blagrove, as instrumentalists. Mr. W. H. Holmes conducted with his usual ability. We were happy to find our countrywoman, Madame Albertazzi, looking much better in health than at the close of last season. She was in brilliant voice, and in Benedict's aria, "Prendi per me," was rapturously applauded. It was, if we mistake not, her first appearance since her return from Milan, where she has been staying during the autumn to recover from a severe indisposition. Miss Dolby was, as usual, most successful; and Mr. John Parry was twice encored. A series of these attractive entertainments is announced for the winter, at the above institution; and the programme contains the names of our very best vocal and instrumental performers

THE THEATRES.

The approach of Christmas brings with it a temporary quiet in theatrical proceedings; that is to say, as regards the production of new pieces, for, behind the curtain, every member of the establishment for the time being, from the authors down to the carpenters, is fully employed, in order that everything may be ready by "Boxing Day." And getting up a pantomime or fairy burlesque is no joke: those who assemble to see it are little aware of the many intelligent heads, whose united brains all work towards one point, to produce the simplest effect. The history of a play, where machinery and transformations are required, or where the "stage business," as it is called, is more than usually complicated, would make an entertaining paper.

At the Haymarket on Wednesday, Mr. Archer, the box book-keeper, took his benefit. No individual connected with the theatres is more respected than Mr. Archer; for his conduct to the habitués of the house is at all times most courteous and attentive. It is no wonder then, that the house was filled by his friends, literally as full as it could hold, although little was put forth in the bill beyond the ordinary pieces, which we have already noticed in detail. Several pleasant polkas, and Jullien's mazurka, were played during the evening; and Mr. J. L. Hatton accompanied himself in a song, written, as we were told, for the occasion. The points, if anything, were somewhat too broad for the Haymarket audience, who require a more polished style of humour. With them a neatly-turned allusion produces more laughter than the most palpable pun ever made. On the Saturday previous, in consequence of the sudden indisposition of Madame Vestris, the part of Lady Alice Hawthorn in the new comedy, was undertaken at six hours' notice by Miss Woolgar, and, what is more, played remarkably well, with very little assistance from the prompter. This young lady, who has been fast rising in favour with the public since she came to town, last year, acted throughout with great spirit; and was loudly called before the curtain at the conclusion of the comedy.

What is to be done at Covent Garden still remains one of the "Mysteries of London." The list of the company at present put forward is certainly weak for such an establishment, but we believe it to be all that is available. In the interim M. Jullien's concerts are crowded every night; and the nearer the termination of his series approaches, the more eager do the public appear to be to visit them.

At the Adelphi, Victorine has been playing to very excellent houses as a first piece; and, on Monday, on the occasion of a benefit, several of the Haymarket company appeared, including Mr. Webster and Mr. Buckstone. Mr. John Parry also lent his assistance, and was loudly applauded in "Fayre Rosamonde" and "The Polka Explained."

The Lyceum is going on steadily and well, and the divertissement still forms an agreeable feature of the entertainments. Miss Farebrother dashes through the Polka with great spirit, and Mesdemoiselles Adele and Louise are equally effective.

At the Princess', Balfe's opera of "The Castle of Aymon," has been played every night, with "The Rent Day," or "Don Cæsar de Bazan," as an afterpiece.

The houses have been, for the period, very well attended.

DRURY LANE.

Drury Lane continues to be well attended, with the united attractions of opera and ballet. On Saturday night, the performances were, in a two-fold sense "for the benefit of Mr. Balfe;" not only as regards the treasury receipts, but also the incident we are about to relate. At the close of the opera ("The Daughter of St. Mark") Mr. Balfe was presented with a superb breakfast service of plate, in commemoration of the hundredth representation of his "Bohemian Girl," which took place some short time since. The audience at the fall of the curtain, loudly cheered the composer, on his retiring from the conductor's seat in the orchestra. After the principal performers had responded to the call of the audience, and received the customary ovation of applause, Mr. Balfe, led on by Mr. Bunn, the lessee of the theatre, advanced to the foot lights. The curtain then rose, displaying, on a table, the superb "Testimonial," tastefully arranged. Mr. Bunn retired, bowing to the audience; Mr. Balfe then spoke in acknowledgment of the high honour accorded to him, in which he was frequently encouraged by the cheers of the audience; the composer then retired amidst a tumult of approbation, and the curtain fell.

THE MARKETS.

Corn Exchange (Friday).—Very few fresh arrivals of English wheat have taken place for our market since Monday; hence the supply of that article here, to-day, was small. Owing to the severity of the weather, the millers were rather anxious buyers, and a clearance was readily effected, at very full prices. In fine foreign wheat rather an extensive business was transacted, but at no more money. Bonded grain was held firmly. The barley trade was much in the same state as last advised. The supply of English was only moderate, but that of foreign was large. No change whatever was noticed in the demand for, or prices of, malt. The large brewers are holding off for an improvement in quality. Oats, beans, and peas, were stationary.

Arrivals.—English: wheat, 2870; barley, 1960; oats, 10 quarters. Irish: wheat, —barley, —; oats, — quarters. Foreign: wheat, —; barley, 2840; oats, 2700, quarters. Flour, 4140 sacks. Malt, 1760 quarters.

English.—Wheat, Essex and Kent, red, 39s to 47s; white ditto, 44s to 54s; Norfolk and Suffolk, red, 38s to 43s; ditto, white, 40s to 47s; rye, 37s to 38s; grinding barley, 27s to 32s; distilling, 28s to 32s; malting ditto, 35s to 38s; Lincoln and Norfolk malt, 61s to 62s; brown ditto, 57s to 60s; Kingston and Ware, 63s to 64s; Chevalier, 65s; Yorkshire and Lincolnshire feed oats, 22s to 23s; potatoe ditto, 24s to 25s; Youghal and Cork, black, 21s to 22s; ditto, white, 22s to 23s; tick beans, new, 36s to 37s; ditto, old, 40s to 42s; grey peas, 36s to 37s; maple, 35s to 37s; white, 36s to 38s; boilers, 38s to 40s, per quarter. Town made flour, 45s to —; Suffolk, Stockton, and Yorkshire, 33s to 35s, per 28 lbs. Foreign.—Fine wheat, 38s to 54s; Dantzig, red, 40s to 47s; white, 42s to 49s. In Bond.—Barley, 27s to 29s; oats, 17s to 18s; ditto, feed, 15s to 17s; beans, 24s to 29s; peas, 28s to 32s, per quarter. Flour, Canadian, 21s to —; Baltic, 20s to —, per barrel.

The Seed Market.—With the exception of linseed and rapeseed, as well as cakes, selling freely, at fully the late advance, the seed trade is heavy, and previous rates are barely supported.

The following are the present rates:—Linseed cakes, English, £12 to £13; ditto, foreign, £7 12s to £8 10s, per 1000.

Bread.—The prices of wheaten bread, in the metropolis, are from 7d to 7½d; of household ditto, 5½d to 6½d, per 4lbs. loaf.

Imperial Weekly Average.—Wheat, 45s 2d; barley, 34s 9d; oats, 21s 10d; rye, 31s 2d; beans, 37s 5d; peas, 36s 4d.

Six Weeks Average that governs Duty.—Wheat, 45s 10d; barley, 35s 5d; oats, 21s 7d; rye, 33s 4d; beans, 37s 10d; peas, 35s 7d.

Duties on Foreign Corn.—Wheat, 20s; barley, 3s; oats, 6s; rye, 9s. 6d; beans, 5s 6d; peas, 7s 6d.

Tea.—On Thursday public sales of 16,000 packages took place. The biddings were firm, and a fair portion found buyers, at very full prices. By private contract, a good business is doing in all descriptions, and the rates are well supported.

Sugar. As is almost invariably the case at this period of the year, exceedingly little is doing in this market. However, the finest parcels have supported previous rates; but all other kinds are quite 6d per cwt. lower. Standard lumps are selling at 72s 6d to 73s; and brown ditto, 71s 6d to 72s, per cwt.

Coffee.—All descriptions of coffee continue in slow request, and, to effect sales to any extent, town rates must be accepted. Good ordinary Ceylon may be had at 52s 6d per cwt.

Rice.—The supply of Bengal offering is very small, owing to which, higher rates are demanded. Low white is fetching 11s to 11s 3d; and middling to fine, 11s 6d to 12s 6d per cwt.

Fruit.—For currants, the market has now become quiet, as most of the large grocers are well in stock. High rates are demanded for Chisme raisins. Sultanas are in good request, at 60s. The value of all other kinds of fruit, though the supplies are good, is well supported.

Provisions.—In Dutch butter a very steady business has been doing, at 110s to 112s for Friesland; 106s to 108s for Kiel; and 104s to 108s for Holstein. The market for all kinds of Irish butter is steady, at fully the late advances. Bacon is in increased inquiry. Lard is firm, at 58s to 61s, for kegs landed. Other kinds of provisions support previous figures.

Tallow.—Rather more business is doing in this article. P.Y.C., on the spot, is quoted at 40s 3d to 40s 9d; and for delivery, 40s to 40s 3d per cwt. Town tallow, 41s, net cash.

Hay and Straw.—Coarse meadow hay, £3 15s to £4 15s; useful ditto, £4 16s to £5 4s; fine upland ditto, £5 5s to £5 10s; clover hay, £4 10s to £6 0s; oat straw, £1 12s to £1 14s; wheat straw, £1 15s to £1 18s, per load.

Potatoes.—The supplies of potatoes being considerably on the increase, the sale for them is inactive, at from 40s to 70s per ton.

Hops (Friday).—As is almost invariably the case at this period of the year, the demand for all kinds of hops is in a very sluggish state. In prices, however, we have no alteration to notice, yet holders are looking forward to an improvement in them:—1844's: Sussex pockets, £7 to £8 5s; Wealds, £6 18s to £8 0s; Mid Kent, £8 0s to £10 15s; East Kent, £7 7s to £8 0s; Choice ditto, £10 0s to £12 0s; Farnhams, £10 0s to £10 10s.

Coals.—Townley, 20s 3d; East Hetton, 23s 6d; Hetton, 25s 3d; Stewart's, 25s 3d; Cassop, 24s 6d; Carodoc, 24s 6d; Lambton, 25s 3d; Tees, 24s 6d, per ton.

Smithfield (Friday).—As might be expected on the near approach of the great Christmas market—which will be held on Monday next—the supply of beasts on sale to-day was large, and, generally speaking, of superior quality. The primest Scots, &c. sold readily, at an advance of 2d per 8lb.; but all other kinds were heavy, at previous currencies. Only 8 beasts from Rotterdam were brought forward; but from Aberdeen we received 170 Scots—25 of which unfortunately died on the passage. The numbers of sheep were only moderate, yet the mutton trade was inactive, at barely Monday's quotations. Prime small calves sold freely, at more money; but all other kinds of veal were dull. In pigs a good business was doing. Milch cows moved off slowly, at from £16 to £19 each.

Per 8lbs to sink the offal:—Coarse and inferior beasts, 2s 10d to 3s 0d; second quality do. 3s 2d to 3s 6d; prime large oxen, 3s 8d to 4s 2d; prime Scots, &c., 4s 4d to 4s 6d; coarse and inferior sheep, 2s 10d to 3s 4d; second quality ditto, 3s 6d to 3s 8d; prime coarse woolled sheep, 3s 10d to 4s 0d; prime Southdown ditto, 4s 2d to 4s 4d; large coarse calves 3s 4d to 4s 0d; prime small ditto, 4s 2d to 4s 4d; large hogs, 3s 0d to 3s 6d; small porkers, 3s 8d to 4s 0d; sucking calves, 18s to 30s; and quarter old store pigs, 16s to 20s each. Beasts, 1429; cows, 169; sheep, 4530; calves, 147; pigs, 379.

Newgate and Leadenhall (Friday).—We had a large supply of meat offering here to day, yet the trade was brisk, at our quotations:—Per 8lbs by the carcass:—Inferior beef, 2s 8d to 3s 0d; middling ditto, 3s 2d to 3s 4d; prime large ditto, 3s 4d to 3s 6d; ditto small ditto, 3s 8d to 3s 10d; large pork, 2s 8d to 3s 4d; inferior mutton, 2s 8d to 3s 2d; middling ditto, 3s 4d to 3s 6d; prime ditto, 3s 6d to 3s 8d; veal, 3s 2d to 4s 2d; small pork, 3s 6d to 4s 0d.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

The principal topic of conversation at the Stock Exchange during the week, has been the delay in announcing the name of the successful competitor for the Canadian Loan. Friday, the 6th of December, was the day appointed for the opening of the tenders, since which nothing has transpired till within the last day or two, either with regard to the names or prices of the respective biddings. It appears that all the tenders, with the exception of one, made by Messrs. Hammond, Scott, and Co., were below the limit fixed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. This left two courses open to him, one to declare the limit, and afford a chance to those below it; the other to propose to the parties whose offer had exceeded it to take the remainder on the terms of such offer. The latter course was adopted, but Messrs. Hammond, Scott, and Co. did not accept of more than their original offer, amounting to £120 000 at 112. This will compel the Chancellor to declare his minimum, and should Messrs. Hammond, Scott and Co. decline, Mr. Maubert will be entitled to the option. A few days must necessarily elapse, before the result can be known, but in the meantime a keen controversy has arisen among the members of the Stock Exchange, as to whether the Chancellor, upon the declaration of Messrs. Hammond and Co. to take the £120,000, should not have at once declared his minimum, and thus have afforded the opportunity of those below it advancing to that price. Consols, however, have not been affected by it, and on Tuesday the closing quotation was 100⅜. Some large sales in Reduced, on the following day, caused a flat market, and the price receded to 100¼. There have been no fluctuations of any consequence since, the Exchequer Bill Market alone betraying some slight symptoms of reaction. The closing quotations of the week are, Bank Stock, 208; Reduced Three per Cents, 100½; New Three-and-a-Quarter per Cents, 103⅞; Exchequer Bills, 58 to 56; Consols for the Opening, ex. div. 100¼.

The financial exposé of the Portuguese revenue has produced a favourable impression in the Foreign Market, and Portuguese has advanced in consequence. From a detailed statement it appears possible that forty contos may be relied on as a balance of the year's revenue after meeting all current expenses. It must be remembered, however, that the proportion of converted bonds that has hitherto remained a passive security, will come into operation as a Three per Cent Stock from January next. The closing quotation of the week for the existing stock is 56¾ to 57¼. The new French Three per Cent Scrip made its first appearance here on Tuesday, and some bargains were done in it at 2½ prem., it afterwards improving to 2¾. Spanish has also evinced an increase of activity, having improved from 24⅝ to ⅞, to 25⅛ for the Five per Cents; the Three per Cents, 37¼. The latter have only maintained their price, although the dividend upon them is advertised, closing at 37¼ to 38, but the former have receded to 24⅞ to 25. Brazilian continues about 89½. Mexican, on Thursday, made an advance and closed at 37¼. Dutch Four per Cents have also improved to 97⅞ to 98. The Two-and-a-Half per Cents, 63⅞ to 64; Belgian New Scrip is 1¼ prem.; Columbian, 14⅜; and Belgian, 101½ to 102½.

The Share Market has maintained tolerable firmness, although business has not been quite so brisk during the past week. Considerable speculations still exist in the French lines, which continue to have an upward tendency. It must be, however, remembered that this is rather the result of purchases made on account of the Paris Bourse (where extraordinary speculation is now indulged in), than from any increased estimation in this country. A reaction in Paris would, therefore, have a most depressing influence on the English Share Market, and is a circumstance by no means improbable. The closing prices of the French lines are:—Paris and Lyons, 3½; Paris and Rouen, 39¾; Boulogne and Amiens, 5 to ⅛; Orleans and Bordeaux, 7 to 6⅞; Orleans and Vurzon, 10⅞ to 11⅛; Rouen and Havre, 22¾ to 23¼. The English lines close as follows:—Bristol and Gloucester, 37 to ½; Caledonian, 4½; Cambridge and Lincoln, 1⅞ to 2; Churnet Valley, 3½; Eastern Counties, 13⅞ to 14; Edinburgh and Glasgow, 62; Great Western, 147; Birmingham Stock, 221 to 222½; Blackwall, 6⅞; Brighton, 50; Greenwich, 9⅝; South Western, 83½; London and York, 4⅛; Lynn and Ely, 2½; Glasgow and Dumfries, 24s.; Lincoln and Sheffield, 23s. to 21s.; Manchester and Leeds, 118; Midland, 109½; Newcastle and Darlington 60½; Norwich and Brandon, 12½; Dovers, 38½; Trent Valley, 8¾; Sheffield and Manchester, 97¾ to 98¼.

SATURDAY MORNING.—The result of the negociation for the Canada Loan transpired yesterday. The Chancellor of the Exchequer declared his minimum to be 111½, at which price, Messrs. Hammond and Co. have taken the remaining £80 000. Mr. Maubert, it appears, bid for the whole amount, at 111⅝, and had Messrs. Hammond, and Co. rejected the last offer, he would have been entitled to the next preference. Both the English and Foreign Markets were flat yesterday. Consols closed at 100⅛ to ¼ for the Opening. The Railway Market was also less animated, with a small amount of transactions.

LYING IN STATE AND FUNERAL OF THE LATE PRINCESS SOPHIA MATILDA.

Meek Spirit of as noble charity
As ever grac'd the hand of royalty,
How many welcomes must have met thy flight
As Thou wert upwards borne to realms of light
On angel pinions—many a soul in Heav'n
To which on Earth thy pious hand had giv'n
Relief in sad and lone extremity,
Will clap its wings against the crystal sky
And shout with joy to see thee soar above
Into the mansions of Eternal love!
Pity and Mercy were thy Handmaids here—
With Memory they'll often weep a tear
Upon thy honoured grave, and sighing say:
A gentler Spirit never pass'd away!

THE LYING IN STATE.

It having been publicly announced that the remains of her late Royal Highness would, according to the usual custom on the death of any member of the Royal Family, lie in state on Monday at the Ranger's House, Blackheath, there was a considerable influx of visitors to Greenwich from the metropolis during the morning. In the course of Saturday the necessary arrangements were made for the melancholy ceremonial, and the entrance-hall, staircases, and different apartments through which the public were to pass were hung with black cloth, and illuminated with wax lights, daylight being completely excluded from all the apartments.

The route laid down for the spectators was marked out by barriers erected through the entire range of apartments thrown open to the public.

Very long previous to the hours appointed for the admission of the public, a vast number of highly respectable persons assembled in the vicinity of the Ranger's House, anxious to be among the earliest visitants when the doors should be thrown open. The great majority of those present were of the fair sex, and there was scarcely one who did not pay a tribute of respect to the memory of the deceased Princess by appearing in mourning.

A guard of honour of the Coldstream Guards was on duty at the principal entrance, the colours of the regiment covered with crape, the officers wearing black silk scarves with crape fittings, and the drums muffled. The troops lined the corridor leading to the hall, which was entirely covered with black cloth.

The Earl Delawarr, Lord Chamberlain of her Majesty's household, arrived in the forenoon at the Ranger's House from town.

The dining-room was appropriated for the mournful solemnity. At twelve o'clock the Lady Alicia Gordon, Lady in Waiting on her late Royal Highness, entered the apartment, conducted by the Lord Chamberlain. Her Ladyship, who was attired in the deepest mourning, took her seat as chief mourner at the head of the Royal corpse, supported by Miss Cotes and the Hon. Mrs. Cust, Bedchamber Women to the late Princess, also attired in deep mourning. Pages of her Royal Highness stood at the feet of the corpse.

The ceiling, sides, and floor of the room were completely covered with black cloth. Over the Royal corpse was a large canopy, the interior fluted and gathered to the centre, formed by a white rosette.

The corniche of the canopy was silvered, and the drapery black, with white fringe.

The body was covered with a very large pall of black velvet, having a deep border of white satin, each side of the pall having three escocheons, containing the arms of the Princess in a lozenge, and her Royal Highness's coronet above. The pall was removed at the feet of the body, displaying the coffin of crimson velvet with silver ornaments.

The whole of the arrangements connected with the funeral were under the superintendence of Mr. Banting, of St. James's-street, the Royal undertaker, to whom much praise is due, for the very efficient manner in which the whole ceremonial was conducted. The lying in state, and fitting out of the apartments at the Ranger's House, Blackheath, gave much satisfaction to the Lord Chamberlain, and the ladies and gentlemen who had composed the household of her late Royal Highness. The following is an accurate description of

THE COFFIN.

The outside coffin is very similar to that which contained the remains of his late Royal Highness the Duke of Sussex. It may be necessary to add, that the corpse is also enclosed in a leaden coffin, according to the usual custom. The outside case is made of stout mahogany, and is covered with crimson Genoa silk velvet, of a very costly description, which is finished by a margin of silver studs most appropriately wrought. There are ornamental engraved plates at the angles, with the coronet on each encompassed by lines of studs. The sides, top, and foot are panelled in three compartments by triple rows of studs also. Very massive panels adjoin each of the handles, which are composed of solid silver. The lid, which is panelled to correspond, contains a raised silver coronet, denoting that her royal highness was a junior princess. The centre panel bears the inscription plate, &c. At the foot of the coffin is a raised ornamental device of a flambeau reversed, encircled by a serpent, which signifies the end of time. The inside of the coffin is lined with white satin, trimmed. The entire length is about six feet four inches, and the breadth two feet four inches. The case was constructed at the establishment of Messrs. Taplin and Holland, but the remainder of the work, including the ornamental portion, was executed at Mr. Banting's establishment. The pall, which bore the escutcheon, was of rich black satin.

The inscription on the coffin follows:—

DEPOSITUM
ILLUSTRISSIMÆ PRINCIPISSÆ
SOPHIÆ MATHILDÆ
FILIÆ ILLUSTRISSIMI PRINCIPIS
GULIELMI HENRICI
DE BRUNSWICK LUNENBURG
DUCIS GLOCESTRIÆ ET EDINBURGI
COMITIS CONNACIÆ
ET NOBLISSIMI ORDINIS PERISCELIDIS
EQUITIS DEFUNCTI
OBIIT VICESIMO NONO DIE NOVEMBRIS
ANNO DOMINI MDCCCXLIV.
ÆTATIS SUÆ LXXII.

On the coffin rested the coronet of her Royal Highness, as a junior Princess of the Royal family, having a cross paté with strawberry leaves, instead of the fleur de lis.

Above the chief mourner, at the back, was a large and handsome escocheon of the Royal arms with supporters, surrounded by a number of silver sconces with wax tapers.

On each side of the coffin were massive silver candlesticks with large wax burners, placed on circular pedestals covered with black cloth.

The room was lighted by silver sconces, each sconce containing two wax candles, and at the sides of the room, between the rows of sconces, were inserted small escocheons of the arms of her late Royal Highness in a lozenge surmounted by a coronet.

The chief mourner and her attendants being seated, the public were admitted to witness the ceremony by the grand entrance, passing thence into the hall, the ceiling, sides, and floor of which were entirely covered with black cloth, sconces with wax tapers lighting the apartment.

From the hall the public entered the dining-room, and, after viewing the lying in state, quitted the mansion by a different entrance, through an ante-room, which was covered with black drapery.

At two o'clock the Hon. Mrs. Legge relieved the Hon. Mrs. Cust. The pages of the late Princess were relieved every hour.

A succession of spectators continued to pass through the rooms without any intermission, from the commencement of the ceremony until its close, preserving throughout the greatest order.

The fittings up of the different rooms and arrangements for the ceremony were executed by Mr. Banting within a very limited period, under the direction of the Lord Chamberlain.

A party of the metropolitan police was on duty during the day, under the command of Mr. Mallalieu, and maintained the greatest facility of ingress and egress.

The domestic household of her late Royal Highness passed through the rooms a short time previous to the public being admitted to the ceremony.

The demeanour of the public was extremely creditable, all persons observing a solemn silence during their progress through the apartments, and evincing their sympathy and respect for the amiable Princess, who had been a kind and liberal benefactor to the poor of the town and its vicinity. During the day the bells of the several churches were tolled at intervals, and the flags of the steamers and shipping in the river were hoisted half mast high, and so continued until after the funeral ceremony.

THE FUNERAL.

On Tuesday the ceremony of the interment took place, and great numbers of persons assembled at an early hour, near the Ranger's House, Blackheath, to witness the funeral obsequies of one so generally respected, and, locally, so much endeared by acts of private benificence.

Shortly after eleven A.M. a company of the Coldstream Guards took possession of the ground in front of the Ranger's Mansion, and a party of Life Guards, under the command of Lieutenant the Hon. Mr. Cotton, attended as a guard of honour.

About half-past twelve o'clock the vicar, curates, churchwardens, and a number of the most respectable inhabitants of Greenwich, who had previously assembled in the vestry-room of St. Alphage Church, arrived, along with the governors, overseers, and children (two hundred boys and girls) of the parochial charity-schools, Chesterfield-walk, and were immediately marshalled in the procession.

Precisely at one o'clock, the coffin, containing the body of her late Royal Highness, was borne on the shoulders of ten gentlemen, and placed in the hearse, the troops presenting arms, and the gentlemen around taking off their hats.

The procession having been formed, it moved slowly down Blackheath-hill in the following order:—

Four of the Metropolitan Patrol Police.
The Knight Marshal's Men, in uniform, with crape on their caps, and wearing black silk scarves.
Charity School Children, headed by Inspector Field and Mr. Fisher, High Constable of Greenwich, each wearing black silk scarves with crape fittings.
Eight poor Widows, who lived upon the bounty of the late Princess.
Thirty Greenwich Watermen, dressed in blue jackets and trousers, wearing crape in their hats.
Governors of the Parish of Greenwich.
The Parish Beadle in full dress.
Overseers of the Poor of Greenwich.
Churchwardens.
Curates of Greenwich.
Vicar of Greenwich.
Tradesmen of Greenwich, all in deep mourning.
A Mourning Coach drawn by four horses, in which were the Pages and Dressers of her late Royal Highness.
The Carriage of her late Royal Highness, drawn by six horses, in which was the Coronet of her late Royal Highness, on a crimson velvet cushion, Attended by Sir Archibald Murray, Bart.
Four Mutes on horseback, bearing mourning emblems.
Three Life Guardsmen.
THE HEARSE,
Containing the Body, drawn by eight horses, decorated with Escocheons of her late Royal Highness's Arms.
A Mourning Coach, drawn by six horses, conveying the Executors and Executrixes named in the will of her late Royal Highness.
A Detachment of the First Life Guards.
A Mourning Coach, drawn by six horses, conveying the Chaplain and Medi Attendant of her late Royal Highness.
A Mourning Coach, drawn by six horses, containing the Lord Chamberlain's Officers.
The Carriage of her Royal Highness the Duchess of Gloucester, drawn by six horses.
A Detachment of the Second Battalion of the Coldstream Guards.

The procession moved over Blackheath-hill, through Deptford, New-cross, Peckham, Camberwell, Camberwell New-road, Kennington-oval, over Vauxhall-bridge, up Grosvenor-place, through Hyde-park, and along the Edgeware-road to the Paddington terminus of the Great Western Railway, which was reached at five o'clock P.M.

The hearse was then transferred to a truck, and with the mourning coaches, conveyed by special train to Slough. The journey was performed with great rapidity, except that the speed was slackened between Ealing and Hanwell, where the down trains have to pass on the up line, on account of repairs to the down line.

PROGRESS OF THE PROCESSION FROM SLOUGH STATION TO WINDSOR.

The military appointed to receive her Royal Highness's remains at Slough marched from Windsor shortly after five o'clock.

The troops consisted of a company of the 2d Battalion of the Scots Fusilier Guards, and a detachment of the Royal Horse Guards (Blue). The former, under the command of Capt. Hamilton, were stationed along the platform as a guard of honour, at the point where the hearse was transferred from the railway; and the latter, under the command of Captain Corbet, who were also drawn up in line within the station-yard, formed the escort to conduct the procession from Slough to Windsor.

The cavalry each bore a lighted flambeaux, and every third man of the infantry did the same.

The train conveying the hearse and mourning coaches drew up at the Slough Station, precisely at twenty minutes to seven o'clock. The same activity in removing the carriages from the trucks prevailed here as at Paddington, and notwithstanding there were upwards of thirty horses to remove from the boxes and reattach to their respective carriages, at a quarter past seven the procession was reformed, and being here considerably increased by the addition of the equipages of the various members of the Royal Family, in a very few moments it moved towards Windsor in the following order:—

Knight Marshal's Men.
Footmen and Grooms of the Royal Family, in state liveries, with silk hatbands and gloves, bearing flambeaux.
Footmen and Grooms of her late Royal Highness, in deep mourning, bearing flambeaux.
The Mourning Coaches, the Carriage of her late Royal Highness, and
THE HEARSE,
In the same order in which they proceeded from Blackheath
The Carriages of
THE QUEEN,
The Queen Dowager,
His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge,
Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Gloucester,
Her Royal Highness the Princess Sophia,
Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent.

The road between Slough and Windsor was kept by the Royal Horse Guards, two privates of that regiment being stationed at short intervals throughout the whole distance from the railway station to the Castle-yard.

The cavalcade, as it emerged from the Slough station, and proceeded towards Eton, had a very striking effect, and the darkness of the night, not a star being visible in the firmament, contributed to increase the interesting character of the scene.

The shops in Windsor and Eton, which had been partially shut during the whole day, out of respect to her Royal Highness's memory, were wholly closed before six o'clock.

The mournful cavalcade passed through Eton shortly after eight o'clock, and crossed Windsor bridge as the clock chimed the quarter past that hour. Both in Eton and Windsor the inhabitants were for the most part assembled at their doors, and as the procession passed in solemn silence through the streets, nothing could possibly exceed the decorum observed by the whole of the spectators assembled.

ARRIVAL AT WINDSOR.

The necessary preparations for the interment of the deceased Princess in the choir of St. George's Chapel were completed at an early hour in the morning, and during the afternoon, by permission of the authorities, the public were admitted to view them. There was nothing in the arrangements beyond those invariably made upon all similar occasions. A platform, covered with black cloth, extended along the entire length of the centre aisle of the nave, from the west door to the entrance of the choir. A temporary porch was erected in the Castle yard, at the south door, where the procession entered the chapel, and this as well as every other portion of the fittings was hung with black cloth.

In the north aisle of the nave a gallery was erected capable of accommodating about five hundred persons, and here those of the public who were fortunate enough to obtain tickets of admission took up their stations before seven o'clock.

The nave was lighted by wax candles, placed in candelabra, which were arranged at short distances on either side the raised platform.

The only ornament in the choir which was hung with black cloth, in character with the other portions of the sacred edifice, was a Royal escocheon in front of the pulpit.

This portion of the chapel was lighted by six magnificent gilt chandeliers suspended from the roof, and containing wax candles.

A company of the second battalion of the Scotch Fusilier Guards, under Colonel Moncrieffe, were drawn up within the Castle yard, in double lines, extending from Henry the Eighth's gateway, to the entrance of the chapel, every third man bearing a lighted flambeau.

The procession entered the Castle yard at twenty minutes past eight o'clock, its approach being announced by the military band playing the Dead March in Saul.

THE FUNERAL CEREMONY AT ST. GEORGE'S CHAPEL.

The Earl Delawarr, Lord Chamberlain of her Majesty's Household, and Sir Charles Young, Garter King of Arms, received the Royal corpse at the entrance of the chapel, where also a number of the ladies and gentlemen who formed part of the procession, and the Dean and Canons of Windsor were assembled.

The procession moved down the south aisle, the choir singing, "I am the resurrection and the life saith the Lord" (Croft), and the procession moved down the south aisle and up the nave into the choir in the following order:—

Pages of her Royal Highness the Duchess of Gloucester.
Pages of her late Royal Highness.

THE LADIES INVITED.—Lady Georgiana Bathurst, Lady in Waiting on the Duchess of Gloucester; Lady Fanny Howard, Lady in Waiting on the Duchess of Kent; Lady Caroline Murray; and Miss Vyse.

THE GENTLEMEN INVITED.—Sir John Morillyon Wilson, of the Queen Dowager's household; Baron Knesebeck, Equerry to the Duke of Cambridge; Colonel Sir George Couper, Bart., First Equerry to the Duchess of Kent; the Hon. Captain Liddell, First Equerry to the Duchess of Gloucester; Lord Wrottesley; Captain Fead, R.N.; the Hon. Major Legge; the Hon. Captain Waldegrave; the Hon. and Rev. Charles Leslie Courtenay; and the Rev. Mr. Cotes.

The Lord Chamberlain of her Majesty's Household, had on his right Sir William Martins, Gentleman Usher, and on his left Sir Noel Harris, Gentleman Usher.

The Pall was supported at the feet by Mrs. George Bankes and Mrs. Morier, and at the head by the Hon. Mrs. Henry Legge and the Hon. Mrs. William Cust.

(Sir Charles Young, Garter Principal King of Arms, carrying his Sceptre and wearing his Badge of Office, was supported on each side by a Gentleman Usher.

The Chief Mourner was the Countess of Gainsborough, veiled, her train borne by Mrs. Waldegrave, veiled. The countess was supported on the right by Lady Gardiner, veiled, and on the left by the Hon. Mrs. Brand, veiled.

Arrived within the choir, the coffin was placed upon trestles near the centre, the feet being turned towards the altar. The coronet and cushion were placed upon the coffin. The chief mourner sat at the head, the supporters on each side of her. The supporters of the pall sat near on either side, and the Lord Chamberlain at the feet of th corpse. The other members of the procession took their several places. The choristers occupied their usual positions. His Royal Highness Prince Albert, wearing his Field-Marshal's uniform, with a mourning scarf, occupied his stall as a Knight of the Garter. The Marquis of Exeter stood on the right of the Prince, at the south side of the choir, wearing his insignia of the Garter. Sir Edward Bowater was next the Marquis of Exeter, and the Earl of Hardwicke and Colonel B. Drummond stood at a short distance to his right. On the north side were the officers of the Guards and some other gentlemen who took part in the ceremony. The rest of those who had formed the procession through the nave stood on the floor in the body of the choir.

The burial service was performed by the Dean of Windsor, Dr. Hobart.

During the service the coffin had remained where it was first deposited, near the centre of the choir. It was now brought down to the grave, near the Sovereign's stall, and, the pall and coronet having been removed, it was lowered. While it was being brought down towards the grave the choir sang—"Man that is born of a woman," by Croft, with the verse by Purcell, "Thou knowest, Lord, the secrets of our hearts." The Dean, who now stood over the grave, then read the prayer, "For as much as it has pleased Almighty God." After which the choir sang—"I heard a voice from Heaven." Then the Dean read the Lord's Prayer and the prayer, "Almighty God, with whom do live." After which the choir sang the second anthem, "Her body is buried in peace, but her name liveth evermore."—Handel. The ceremony concluded with the final prayers.

The Garter King at Arms then proclaimed her late Royal Highness's style, according to the usual form, and while those who had been present at the ceremony were leaving the chapel, Dr. Elvey, the organist, played the "Dead March."

The choir consisted of Messrs. Salmon, French, Palmer, Harris, Mitchell, Turner, Mudge, Bridgewater, Foster, James Mitchell, and Smith, assisted by the 10 chorister boys. The choral parts of the service were chanted in a manner fully bearing out the high character of this choir. The whole of the musical arrangements were under the direction of Dr. Elvey, the organist of St. George's Chapel.

The whole ceremonial was as private as it could be, consistently with custom and the rank of the deceased.

The attendance of the military within the chapel was on this occasion dispensed with.

The musical service, which was very beautifully performed, was chiefly selected from the score written expressly for the funeral of Queen Caroline in 1737.

At the conclusion of the service the public, previously admitted by tickets to the nave, were permitted to enter the choir and view the coffin as it rested, which remained stationary a few feet below the surface of the ground.

The body was deposited in the vault of the Gloucester branch of the Royal Family, which is situated near the Sovereign's stall, on the right, upon entering the choir. The ceremony was concluded at half-past nine o'clock.

The tomb in which the remains of her late Royal Highness were deposited is at the south-western extremity of the choir, and close to the stall of the Sovereign of the Order of the Garter. At the eastern end of the vault, which is between seven and eight feet square, are eight catacombs to contain that number of coffins—two tiers for three in each, and the upper tier to contain two. In the lower tier are de-

NEW VOCAL DUET—"LET US ROVE," Sung by Miss Lucombe and Miss Dolby, Composed by E. J. Loder, price 2s.—"This is a charming morceau and cannot fail to become as popular as Horn's "I know a bank." The melody is very pretty and catching, while the solos given to each voice heighten the effect. The repetition of the leading subject tells well. We strongly recommend this Duet to all soprano and contralto singers."—Vide Sunday Times.

FRUITS and FLOWERS.—MAUND'S BOTANIC GARDEN.—On the 1st of January, 1845, this work will contain the commencement of The Fruitist, a treatise on useful fruits, with Engravings. Persons desirous of possessing the work should order it of their bookseller from the above date—the commencement of the new volume. Price:—Large, 1s. 6d.; Small, 1s.; Monthly. The "Botanic Garden," as originally issued, contained figures of hardy ornamental flowering plants, drawn and coloured from nature, with popular descriptions and information, useful and interesting to every possessor of a garden. Independently of this, there will hereafter be given in each monthly number as follows:—

1. A portion of the Auctarium, containing miscellaneous information connected with the cultivation of the Flower, Fruit, and Vegetable Garden.

2. A portion of the Floral Register, with neatly-executed Miniature Engravings, and detailed descriptions of New Flowers, chiefly founded on the works of leading Botanists.

3. A portion of The Fruitist, a Treatise on Garden and Orchard Fruits; being descriptions of the best sorts of apples, pears, and other fruits, with Engravings of each sort: their qualities will be compared, and management made easy to the most inexperienced cultivator.

4. A portion of a Dictionary, in which are explained words chiefly used in Botany and Agriculture, illustrated with Cuts. Written by the Rev. Professor Henslow.

These several portions form distinct works.

Of the "Botanic Garden" there are published ten quarto vols., besides two vols. of "Floral Register and Auctarium," to which the purchaser of any six vols. is entitled gratis. For typographical arrangement and execution, and the correctness and beauty of Engravings, it may with confidence be asserted, it is not excelled by any similar publication. Each volume is in itself quite complete, and may be purchased separately, and others may at any future time be had, precisely to correspond in binding. They are bound in handsome emblematically gilt cloth boards, and gilt edges, at £2 each; and the small paper, with less elaborately coloured plates, 25s. each. For the accommodation of Gardeners and small Cultivators wishing to obtain a knowledge of Flowers and Gardening, the more fully to enjoy its advantages, a reprint of the early part of the work has been issued, called the "Gardener's Edition of the Botanic Garden." The plates are partially coloured, and the price but 6d. Monthly. Of this, two Parts, of twelve numbers each, are completed, price, in gilt cloth, 7s. 6d. each.—R. Groombridge, London.

"This volume is handsomely printed, and beautifully bound in a new style of exquisite delicacy and richness. BREIDENBACH, 38, Park-street, Grosvenor-square, and Manufacturer at Cologne. This Eau de Cologne is no spurious imitation of Farina's, but the genuine article itself; and, as such, defies all competition.

SUPERIOR BRANDY.—Families requiring their supplies of Brandy at this season, are respectfully solicited to apply to THOMAS GREENHOW, Distiller, 16, St. John street, Clerkenwell (for ten years the practical distiller of Messrs. J. T. Betts and Co., Smithfield Bars), who assures his friends and the public that he will furnish them with an article equal to anything in the trade, in quantities not less than Two Gallons, pale or coloured, at Sixteen Shillings per Gallon, of the highest legal strength, for cash on delivery.—A liberal consideration to dealers.

REAL GLENLIVAT WHISKY.—This celebrated WHISKY, produced in Glenlivat, upon the estate of his Grace the Duke of Richmond, in the Northern Highlands, is now publicly introduced into London, under the patronage of his Grace. ANDREW USHER and Co., of Edinburgh, established there for 25 years, the sole consignees, announce that they have established at 1, NORTHUMBERLAND STREET, STRAND, a depôt for the sale of the above unequalled Whisky in its native purity and strength. By his Grace's permission the ducal arms on the seal and label will distinguish the real Glenlivat from all others. Price 21s. per gallon.

EMPLOYMENT.—Persons having a little time to spare, are apprised that Agents continue to be appointed in London and Country Towns by the EAST INDIA TEA COMPANY, for the sale of their celebrated TEAS (Offices, 9, Great St. Helen's Churchyard, Bishopsgate street). They are packed in showy leaden canisters, from an ounce to a pound, with the prices and weight marked on each packet, and but little trouble is occasioned by the sale; the licence is only 11s. per annum, and many, during the last nineteen years, have realised considerable incomes by the Agency, without 1s. let or loss. Application to be made (if by letter, post paid) as above.

PRICE'S PATENT CANDLES burn without snuffing, like the finest wax, and are cheaper in proportion to the light given than the commonest tallow ones. They are sold by respectable Dealers throughout the country at or under One Shilling per lb., and Wholesale to the Trade by EDWARD PRICE and CO., Belmont, Vauxhall, and PALMER and CO., Sutton-street, Clerkenwell. Purchasers must insist upon being supplied in the shops with "PRICE'S PATENT CANDLES," or they are very likely to get some of the imitations, on account of the greater profit afforded to the dealer by these latter.

CHRISTMAS AND NEW YEAR'S PRESENTS. The approaching season is hallowed by one of the most delightful offices of friendship and affection; the interchange of gifts, as remembrances of the donors, and tokens of their esteem for the receivers. While large sums are expended upon the most costly baubles and elegant trifles, it may be requisite to remark, that parents cannot make more appropriate presents than ROWLAND'S MACASSAR OIL for the Hair, ROWLAND'S KALYDOR for the Skin and Complexion, and their much-admired ODONTO, or PEARL DENTIFRICE, for the Teeth, which infallibly tend to the augmentation of that imposing exterior, which Lord Chesterfield justly observes is "a card of recommendation."

, Beware of SPURIOUS IMITATIONS! Ask for "ROWLAND'S" articles.

BETTS'S PATENT BRANDY CAPSULED.—Consumers of Brandy are respectfully informed that J. T. BETTS, Jun., and Co. will not be responsible for any BOTTLED BRANDY that is not protected against fraudulent substitution by the Patent Metallic Capsules, embossed with the words, "Betts's Patent Brandy, 7, Smithfield-bars." Sold by the most respectable wine and spirit merchants in town and country, at 3s. 6d. per bottle, the bottle included. Betts's Patent Brandy is used, in preference to foreign, at Guy's, St. George's, and the other principal Hospitals, &c., throughout the Kingdom. Attention is especially requested to the security afforded by the Patent Metallic Capsules. Country dealers are advertised in the provincial journals and lists of London dealers may be obtained at the Distillery, where quantities of not less than two gallons may be supplied, in bulk at 18s. per gallon, and in bottles, the case and bottles included, at 20s. per gallon.—7, Smithfield bars.

FURS.—RUSSIAN and CANADIAN FUR COMPANY, 244, Regent-street.—The Proprietors respectfully inform the nobility, gentry, and public in general, that their Stock for the ensuing season is now complete, and consists of several novelties, both continental and of their own introduction, which have met with the approbation of the highest patrons of fashion, the élite of the aristocracy. They particularly call attention to their Stock of RUSSIAN TABLE and ERMINE, which have procured for them such high reputation, and which are not to be equalled, for quality and price, by any other house in the world. Every kind of Fur, from the American and European Continents, may be procured at this Establishment, or, at the Manufactory, 19, Lambs-conduit street, in immense variety, twenty per cent. lower than is usually charged.—E. C. BOURNE, Managing Proprietor, Russian and Canadian Fur Company, 244, Regent-street.—N. B. Furs cleaned, altered, repaired, or exchanged. Prices of cleaning Furs, Muffs, and Boas, 2s.; Cardinals, 3s.

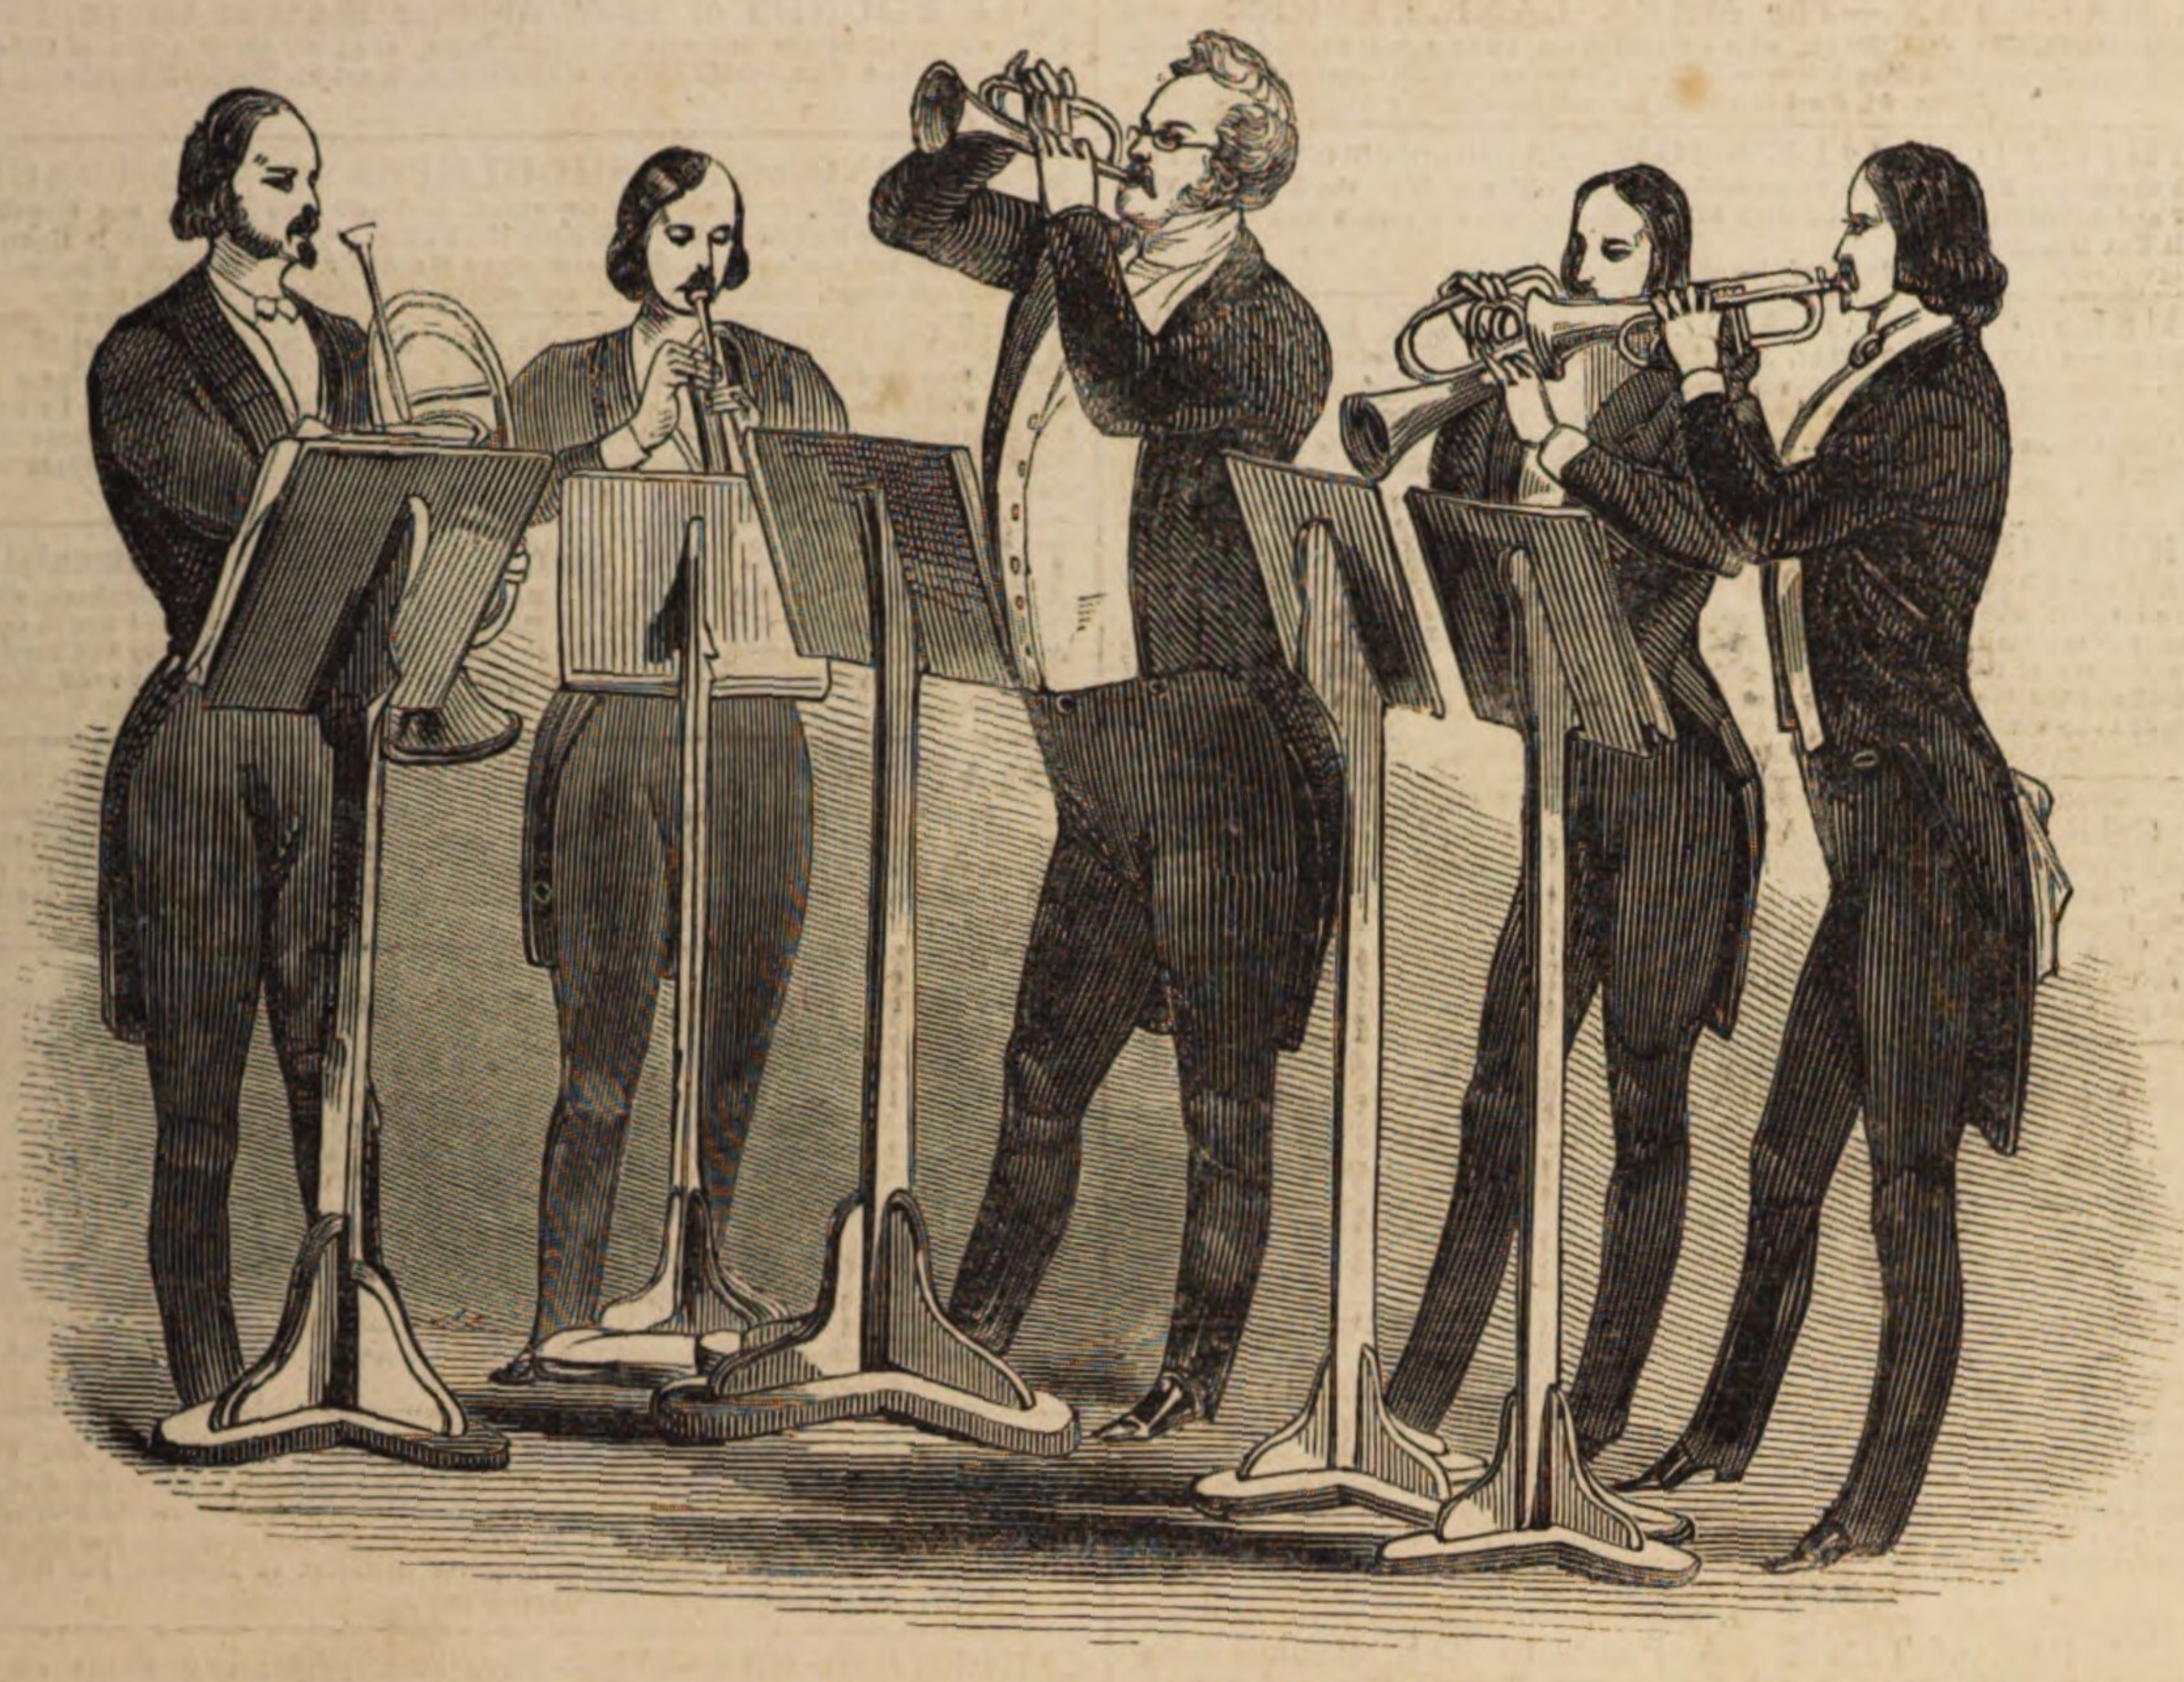
An extensive stock for selection, finished with the utmost care, at the lowest prices consistent with security for the finest manufacture and the maintenance of that reputation for superior workmanship which has distinguished their house for so many years. Compensated duplex and lever Watches, to counteract the variations of temperature, upon the principle of their chronometers, to which Government awarded the prizes three years in succession; small elegant lever and horizontal Watches in gold cases, engraved or engine-turned for ladies or gentlemen: small flat silver detached lever and horizontal watches, for youths, at very moderate prices; marine and pocket Chronometers, new and second-hand; ornamental and every description of Clocks; Regulators upon the most approved principles. A library, museum, and laboratory, are attached to the School, and the charge for board, lodging, washing, lectures, &c., is so arranged by the Committee of Management as to include every expense, except for books, at Twenty Guineas the Half-year. A Separate Class will be formed of those pupils who are not sufficiently advanced to attend the Lectures, the charge for which will be Sixteen Guineas the Half year. The Introductory Lectures of the several Professors will be public, of which due notice will be given. Prospectuses in detail are ready, and applications for admission to be addressed to "The Head Master, Agricultural Training School, Hoddesdon, Herts," of whom every information may be obtained.



THE DISTIN FAMILY.

THE DISTIN FAMILY.

The first appearance of these highly-gifted gentlemen at M. Jullien's Concerts, was noticed in our journal of last week. They have repeated their performances, with increased effect, during the past week.

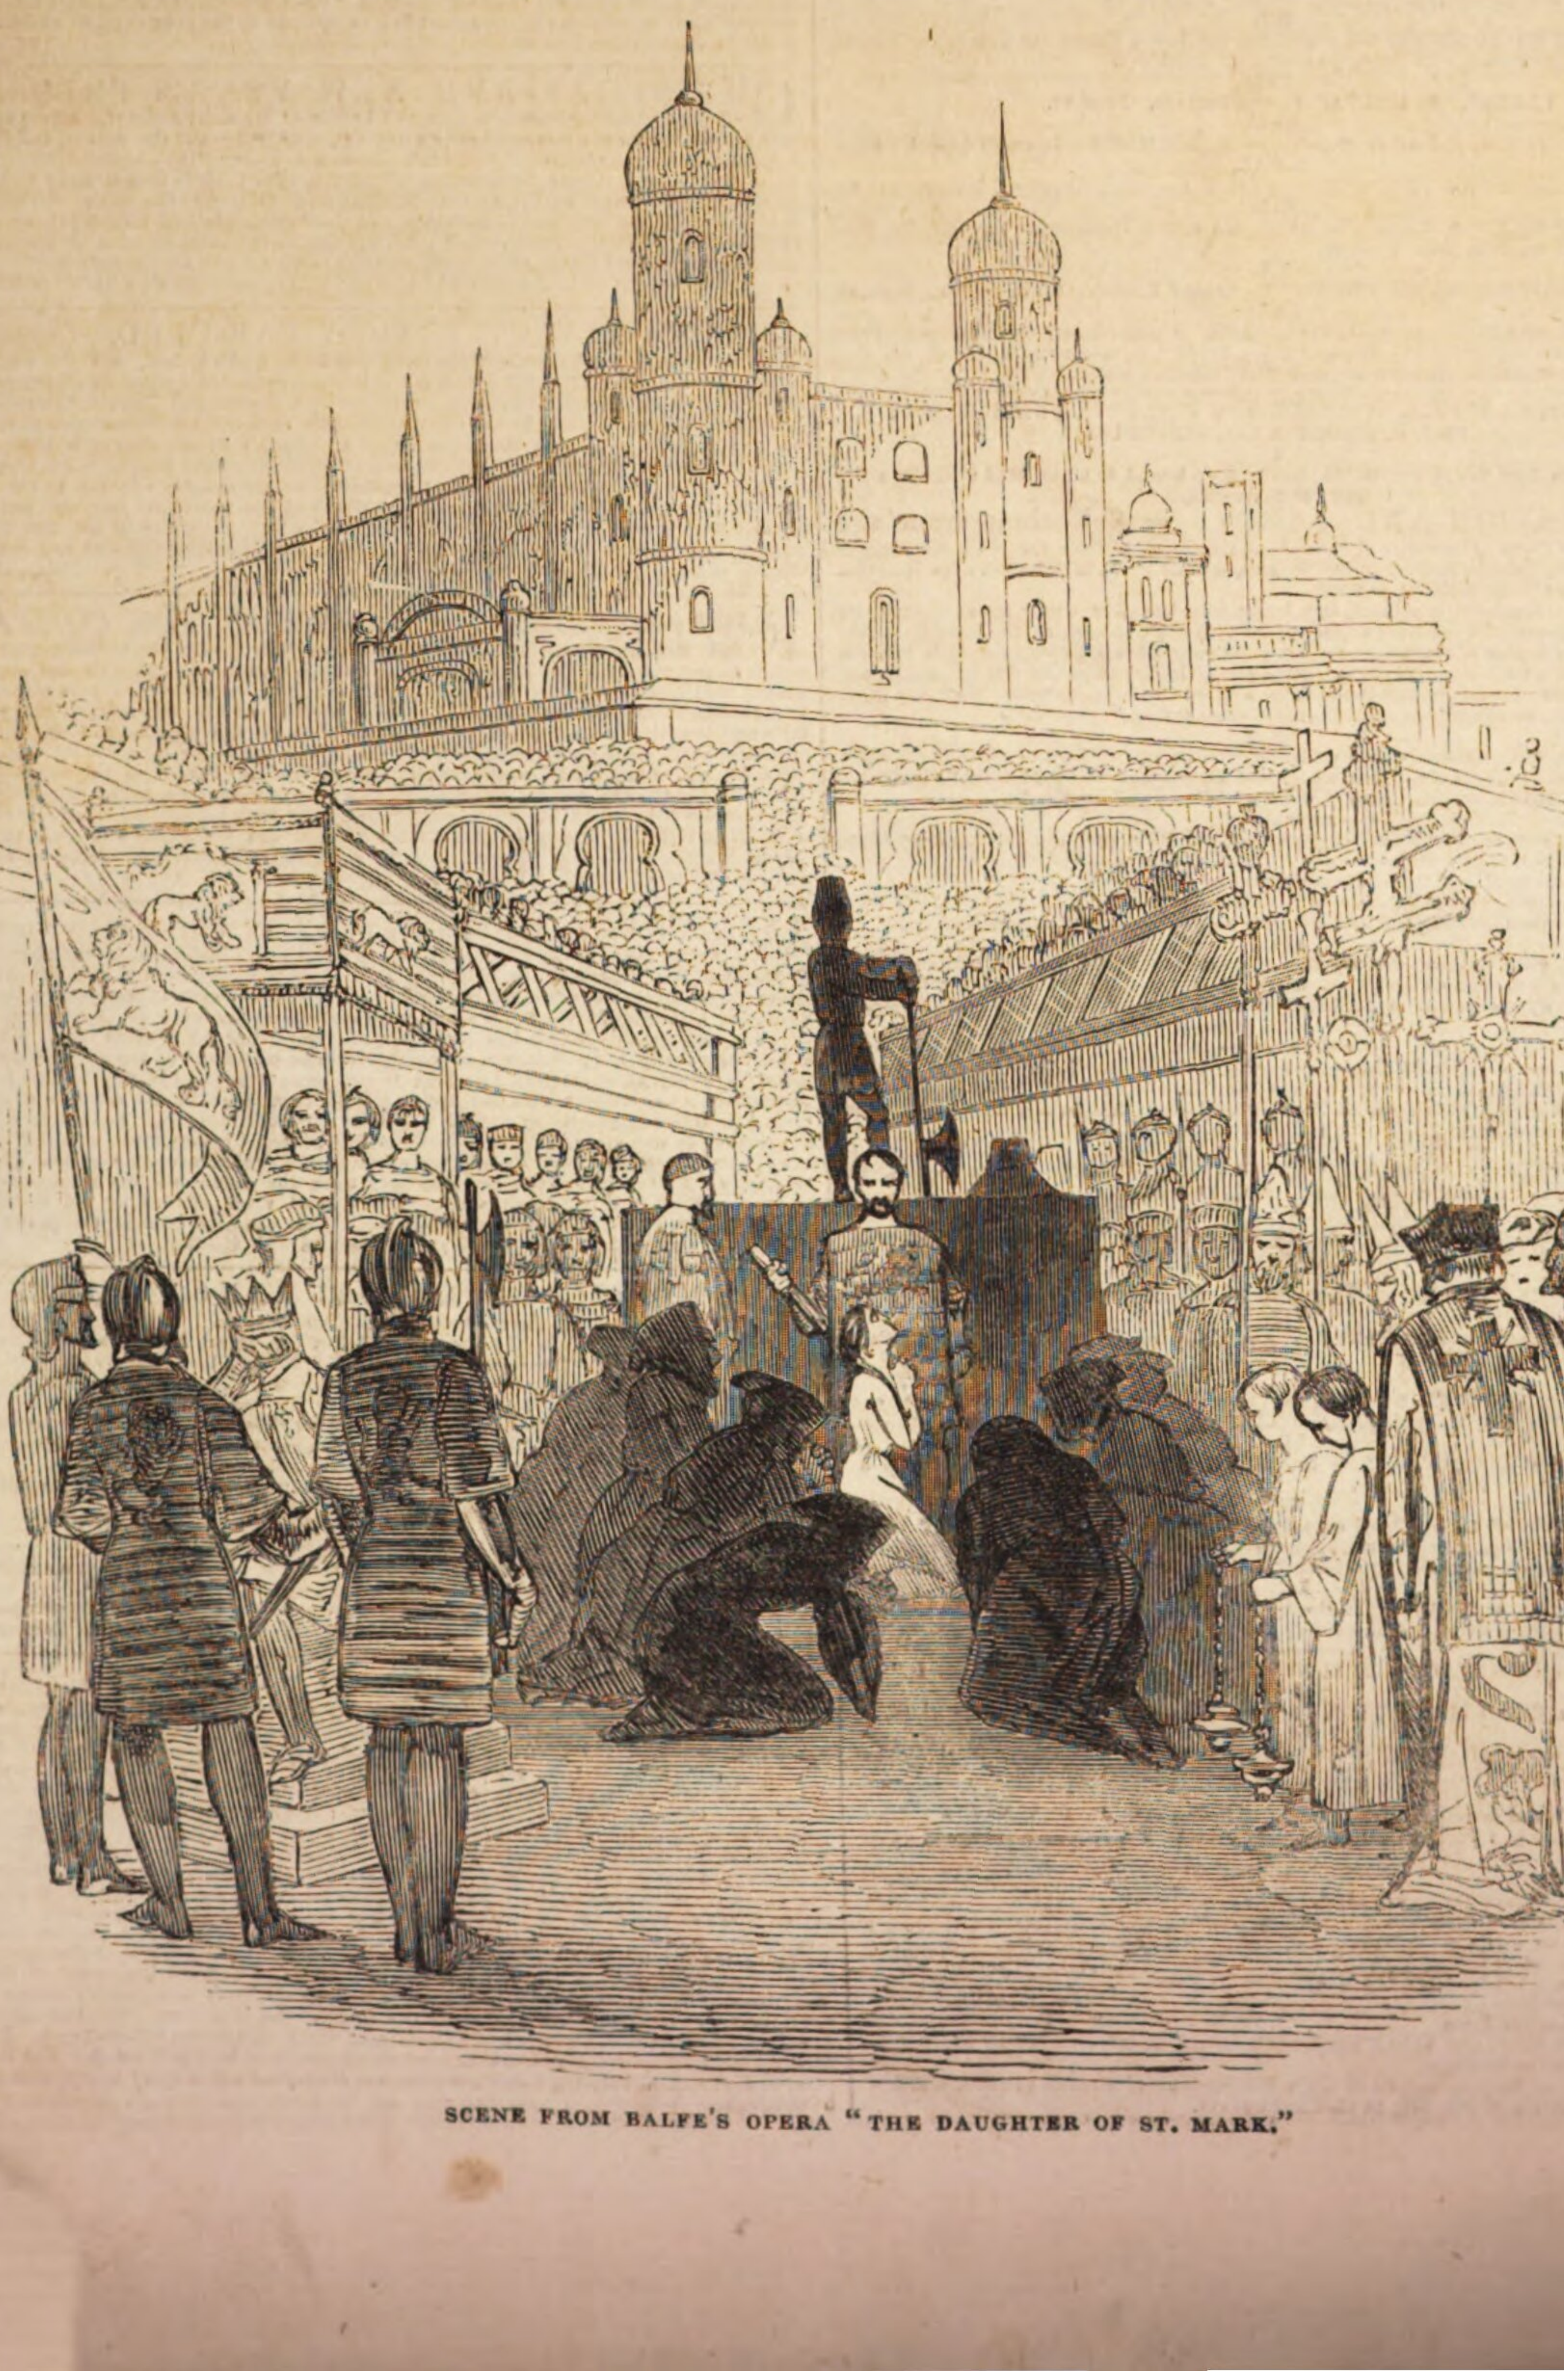
Mr. Distin and his four sons have been for several years before the public. Mr. Distin, sen., for more than nine years, was principal trumpet in the private band of King George IV.

The Distin Family have visited various parts of Scotland, Ireland, and England, and have given upwards of seven hundred concerts. In December, 1843, they proceeded to the continent, and were invited to make a trial of some newly-invented instruments, manufactured by M. Adolphe Sax, in Paris. Upon the introduction of the Distin's improved Sax Horns in Paris, they at once ensured success.

Invariably receiving the most enthusiastic applause, Mr. Distin was requested by M. Habeneck, the Director of the "Conservatoire Royale de Musique," to perform some of Sebastian Bach's and Handel's compositions—(the former, in particular, having very difficult passages for the trumpet)—which he did, and also the obligato to Handel's "Let the Bright Seraphim."—This composition had not been played in Paris for many years, as no French trumpet-player would attempt it.

Mr. Distin's reception was a most brilliant one, the audience and orchestra manifesting their delight by the most enthusiastic plaudits. The directors then presented him with a handsome silver medal, accompanied with a very flattering letter and address (an honour unprecedented for an English artist in Paris). Mr. Distin and his four sons were also presented with a splendid silver medal by the Committee of the "Societé libre des Beaux Arts," with a very complimentary address, for their performance at their great concert at the Hotel de Ville.

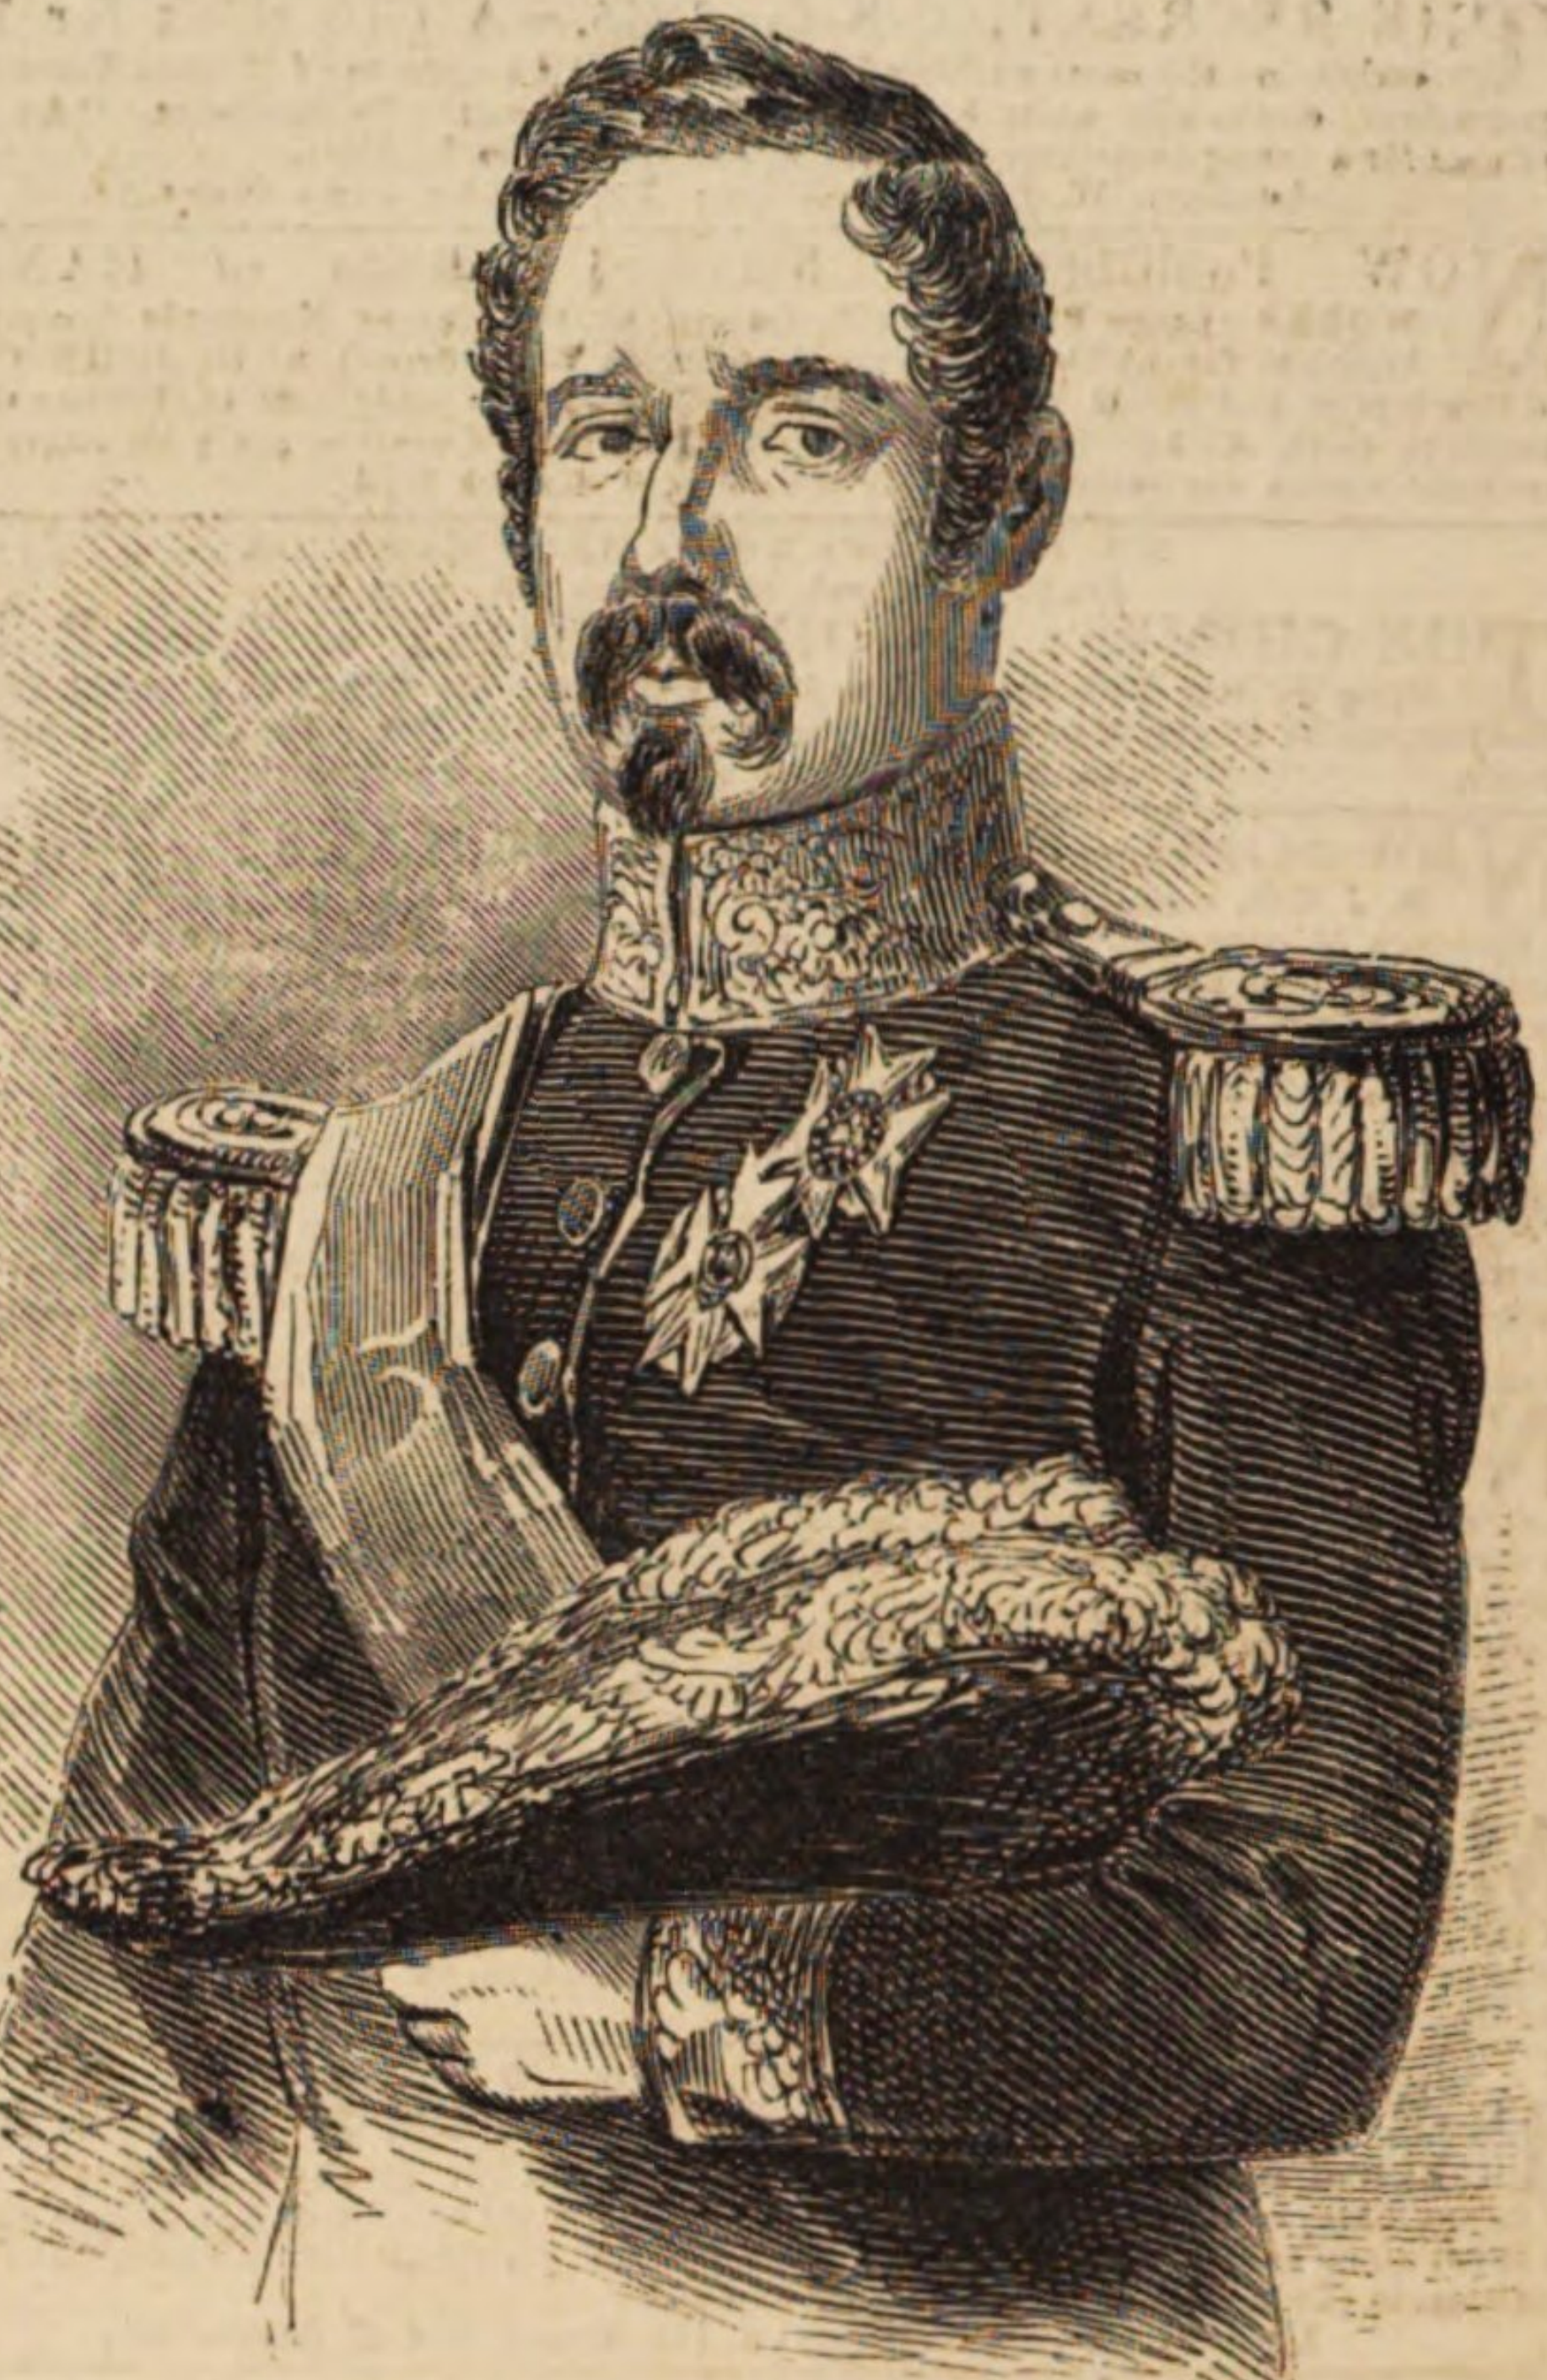
The Distins are at present the only performers on the Sax Horn, which unites the powers of the French horn and those of the cornet-à-piston, but is infinitely superior to both, for it combines the mellowness and sweetness of the former, with all the brilliancy and power of the latter. The pieces which the Distins perform are of their own arrangement, and do credit to their musical skill.



SCENE FROM BALFE'S OPERA "THE DAUGHTER OF ST. MARK."

GENERAL NARVAEZ.

Raimon Maria Narvaez is the Minister at War and President of the Council in the present Ministry of Spain; he is, in fact, the Dictator of that country, having had talent and energy enough to seize the reins that fell from the hands of Espartero. He has been unscrupulous in the means he has employed to attain his position, and to keep it appears to be perfectly ruthless, shedding blood with a frightful indifference. At this moment the attempt at revolt, headed by Zurbano, having failed, that position is firmer than ever, though his policy is universally condemned, and is now censured even by the organs of that French party by whom he was at first supported. Narvaez is the son of a farmer of the province of Arragon, who, to the business of a cultivator of the earth, added the more profitable calling of a contrabandista or smuggler. His son entered the army, and during the convulsions of the long civil war has been thrown upwards to the higher ranks of his profession, and through his military influence has now reached the highest rank in the state. Such a career has not been without its perils, and to judge by the number of conspiracies that have been discovered, or said to have been discovered, during his administration, the excessive precautions he takes to secure personal safety are not unnecessary. On the 6th of November, 1843, he was fired at while proceeding in his carriage to the theatre; the assassins missed their aim, but the general was covered with the blood of his aide-de-camp, who was mortally wounded beside him. He has restored Queen Christina, subjugated her daughter, and is now abolishing the Constitution, thus re-establishing in Spain as perfect a despotism as ever existed there.



NARVAEZ.

As the political state of Spain is daily assuming a more interesting complexion, we have despatched one of our artists to Madrid, for the purpose of sketching the principal scenes and events, which we shall shortly present to our readers.

Presentation of Prizes at the Royal Academy of Arts.—On Tuesday, being the anniversary of the foundation of this national institution, the usual meeting was held in the evening for the purpose of distributing the premiums to the students for the works performed by them within the walls of the academy during the past year. The present is the distribution for what is called "the intermediate year," the grand distribution, which includes premiums for original composition, being "biennial." About nine o'clock the President, Sir M. A. Shee, accompanied by the principal members of the Royal Academy, entered the large exhibition room; having assumed the chair, he, in a few prefatory remarks, complimented the students generally on the exertions they had made and the ability they had evinced in the competition. The prizes having been distributed, the president again addressed the students, urging them to endeavour to make progress in their art.

Leamington Spa.—The winter season of this favourite resort of the haut ton has commenced with its usual gaieties, and, to judge from the number of houses taken and the rank and fashion already arrived, it may fairly be anticipated that it will be one of the most splendid seasons this fashionable watering place has ever seen. The first subscription ball at the Upper Assembly-rooms took place last week, and was most numerously and fashionably attended. And, considering the early period of the season, the hunting gentlemen have mustered in good numbers. The hounds are in excellent condition, and have already had some good runs.

Sudden Death in Holborn.—Mr. Wakley has held an inquest on the body of Mr. Francis Soutter, aged fifty-eight, a Swiss Jew, and formerly a bill and exchange broker, well known in the City, whose sudden death we mentioned last week. It appeared that on Sunday week deceased came stumbling into the shop of Mr. Jones, chemist, 171, High Holborn. He afterwards fell on the floor, and whilst Mr. Jones was administering a cordial he breathed his last. Mr. C. Ravenhill, stockbroker, of Old Broad-street, said he knew deceased, who was a bill and exchange broker of many years' standing. He was much reduced in circumstances. His lodging was unknown, and so were his relatives, if he had any. Mr. Bennett, surgeon, opened the body, and said the cause of death was apoplexy. Verdict, "Natural death."

THE LAST SCENE OF "THE DAUGHTER OF ST. MARK" AT DRURY LANE THEATRE.

This extraordinary scene is, in the language of the libretto, a "Public Place in Nicosia," the capital of Cyprus. In the centre is an elevated stage, or scaffold, hung with black cloth, upon which stands the headsman; and an avenue of soldiers extends from thence to the front of the stage. On either side are erected superb pavilions for the King, Court, Archbishop, and Clergy. In the square formed by the soldiery, Black and Grey Penitents are kneeling. Immediately beneath the headsman stands a herald; and before him kneels the suppliant Catarina. The populace crowd on all sides, up to the extreme extent of the scene; the King conceals his face in his hands; Moncenigo stands by his side; a deep bell tolls, and muffled drums are beating.

Chorus of Penitents.

Pray for the soul's repose,
Pray for the peace of those Whose thoughts on Heaven are bent.
Cat. That Heaven knows
I am innocent.

Chorus of Women.

Pray for a sister's woes,
Whose erring days now close.
May Heaven forgive a life mis-spent!
Cat. "That Heaven knows
I am innocent!"
Herald. For treason to the State,
Deem'd fatal in the Council's eyes,
For dishonour to the King,
Catarina Cornaro dies!
[Addressing CATARINA.
Wherefore the law should stop its dread intent,
What canst thou plead?—
Cat. —That I am innocent.
Herald (aloud). Who can allege a reason why
The guilty should not perish?—
And. (rushing frantically through the Soldiers.)
—I!!

This is altogether one of the most effective tableaux ever placed upon the stage; and is, to our thinking, superior to the stupendous staircase scene, with Famagosta in the distance, in the previous act of the opera. In the scene here engraved, the painters have succeeded admirably in depicting the vast crowd of spectators; in the distance is the church of St. Sophia, a fine Gothic building, converted into a mosque—excellently painted.

CHRISTMAS.

PUBLIC men, public measures, and public opinion, so far as all of them are merely political, are, at no period of the year so completely forgotten and overlooked as during the preparations for Christmas, and the festivities of the season itself. Nor is it to be regretted; the evil spirit too often evoked by the conflicts of men and parties should sometimes be exorcised and laid to rest; and at what season could this be more fitly done than at this, when the thoughts are recalled by sacred associations to things holy and solemn, and by social usage to those kindly and cheering observances that have given—and we hope long will retain—to Christmas the adjunct of "Merry." It was a beautiful belief—one we can scarcely bring ourselves to call a superstition—which disarmed, at this season, the malignant beings of the popular imagination of all power to harm mankind at the epoch of the birth of man's Redeemer.

> Some say that ever 'gainst that season comes,
> Wherein our Saviour's birth is celebrated,
> The Bird of Dawning singeth all night long,
> And then, they say, no spirit dares stir abroad.
> The nights are wholesome: then no planets strike—
> No fairy takes—no witch has power to charm
> So hallowed and so gracious is the time.

But there are other spirits than these, and unhappily they are almost ever present, who are our worst tormentors; the most potent enemies of man are his own bad passions, his strifes, uncharitableness, and envyings that "suffer not to rest."

That there should be one period of the year, then, when these can be, even in part, forgotten or suspended, is a thing to rejoice over. One of the great sources of public bitterness being politics, it is pleasant to see all that belongs to them put for a short time in abeyance, and as far as we are able we will heartily assist in doing so, turning with pleasure to the many other associations which the recurrence of Christmas brings.

Some of them are too sacred to be dwelt on here; the feeling of reverence that should surround the cradle of the Divine Founder of our faith, cannot permit that they should be brought into conjunction with lighter and trivial things; they may be alluded to, inasmuch as they cannot but be remembered; but more than an allusion would be out of place. Remembering, then, the humble roof in the village of Bethlehem, which was once the shrine to which came the star-guided steps of the Eastern Kings, with offerings of gold and incense, foreshadowing the homage the nations and monarchs of the world were yet to pay to the Christian faith, let us pass over all the mighty space of time between that hour and this, and noticing not the wondrous changes it has effected, let us come at once to our own day and time, to the period in which our own lot is appointed.

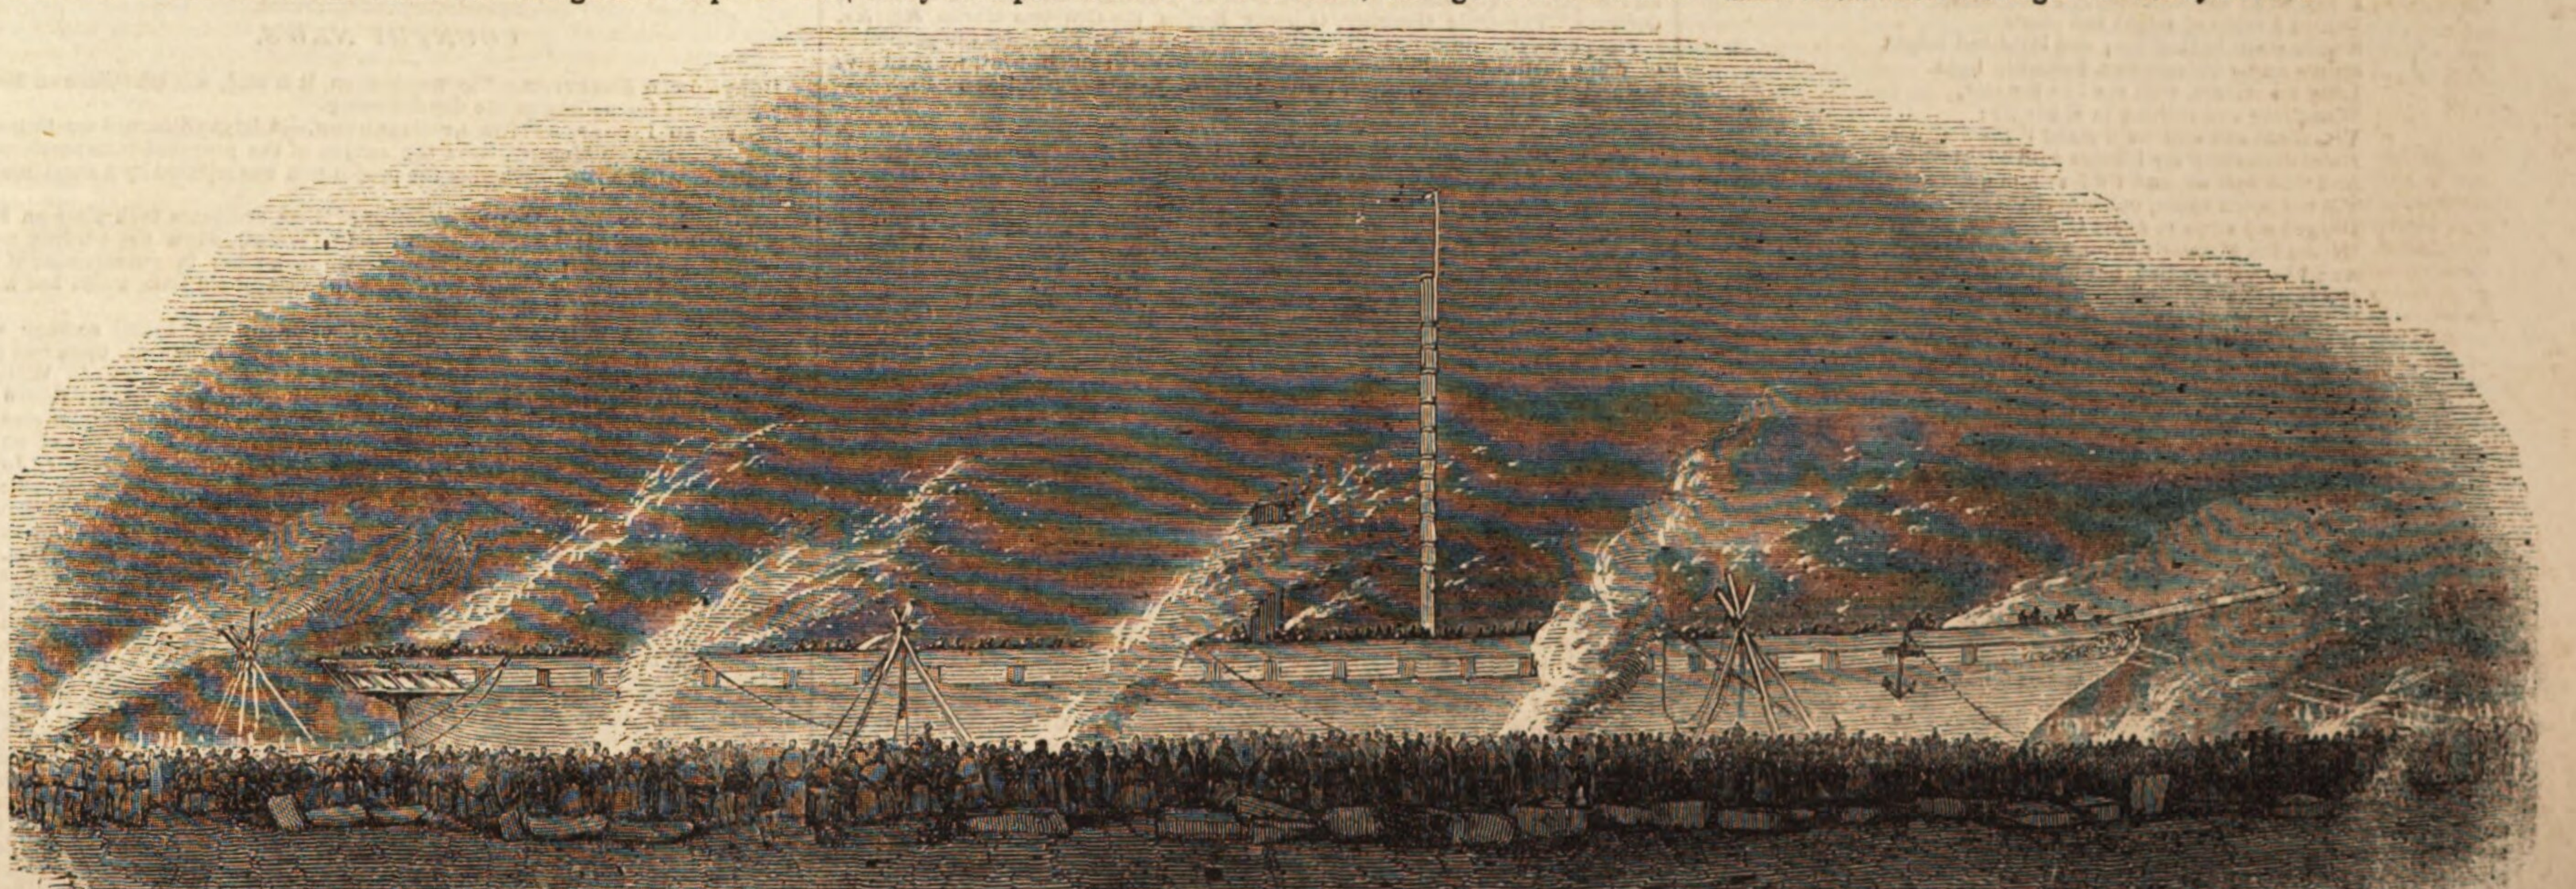
How did last Christmas leave us? How will this Christmas find us? In two things there is a certainty that will apply to all; we are older in time and richer in experience; in all else what variety of change; which, however, great as it is, does not diminish the heartiness of the welcome we all give to Christmas!

Why should it do so? It is a good, old, and hearty English festival, that has received much of its spirit from the character of the nation, and national peculiarities are the last things that ever alter. The Frenchman of to-day is the same as his ancestor was described by Cæsar, and the Englishman is now what he was in the days of Crescy and Agincourt. Steam and Railways, and the modern manufacturing system, have not changed his spirit; they have merely given his energies a new direction. Nay, is it not his energies that have produced them? Why then should Christmas be less welcomed than of yore? We have more than our forefathers means of celebrating it worthily; let not the only thing lacking, be the heartiness and goodwill with which our predecessors went about it. "Old England" did its part in this respect, and it is one of the best points as yet visible among the peculiarities of "Young England," that it is disposed to observe more freely the spirit of our Festivals. It wishes even to restore those which have died away—a thing we take to be impossible. But if it will turn its attention to the very few—we might almost say the solitary one—yet spared us, it may effect some good. Mayday is gone, nothing but a miserable mockery of it remaining; but there is body, life, and spirit in Old Christmas still; it is one of things we hope the world will "not willingly let die." So far from it we trust to see it flourishing yet in all its pristine vigour. Our hope is founded on many indications of better influences at work among us than society has as yet received credit for. Christmas was once famous above all things for its carols and songs; this was when we were a musical nation, ere mirth and music too perished under the sway of the fanaticism of the Commonwealth. Are we not becoming a musical people again? Do not teachers of the art count their pupils, and not unskilful ones, by thousands? Is not Exeter Hall vocal with the choruses of Handel, and does not Crosby Hall give a fainter, but still a kindred response; while both are, beyond a doubt, gradually, but surely, forming the taste of the many? The old social essentials of Christmas were good cheer, song, and charity; that we are not deficient in the first let our shops and markets testify; they look as if a horn of plenty had verily been poured out in each of them; the sight of them shakes for the moment our belief in the possibility of hunger and want till it is too quickly restored by the sight of some famishing creature gazing on the abundance like Lazarus on the table of Dives. And the sight immediately recalls the necessity of that third great essential, Charity, with all the force of contrast. Now much is said of the hard, utilitarian, commercial character of the age, nor do we mean here to dispute that in many things "the world is too much with us." But at the same time we should not underrate the extent of what the age does for the poor and destitute, with all its utilitarianism. To say that England raises a greater amount of money every year for the poor, will not be perhaps admitted as a proof of the prevalence of charity as a national feeling; it will be said the fund is greater than that raised by any other nation, because more than in any other nation it is needed; and it is besides a compulsory one. But is not the amount given as alms by private benevolence vast also, to say nothing of our countless institutions which have the relief of suffering and destitution of various kinds for their object? Much of the misery we see, exists because those who could relieve it, are ignorant of it; but when brought to their knowledge, we do not see any culpable reluctance to give the relief required. Were not thousands of pounds raised last winter directly it was known that human beings were herding in the Parks by night without shelter or food? Is not every case of more than usual distress exposed at the police-office, followed by abundant contributions, even though some of them prove to be impositions? That the ignorance in the upper ranks of much that exists below them, is great, we admit, but that benevolence has diminished, we deny.

And Christmas is the season at which a still more active exercise of it is called for; it is one of the best acknowledgments of individual and national blessings. Our country is at peace:—

> No war nor battle's sound
> Is heard the world around:
> The idle spear and shield are high uphung;

and no alloy of national hate diminishes that "goodwill towards men," which was the first blessing that heralded the coming of the Prince of Peace. The people are busy and labour is employed. An abundant harvest crowned the year with increase—and the people are fed. For all these blessings thanks at this season of joyfulness are due. But let us not forget the while, that in these blessings, all are not partakers. There is the workless hand, the cold hearth, the shivering frame, the hunger-wasted countenance. These we have with us always, the dark contrast to the bright side of the social picture. To say to these be ye warmed, and be ye filled, is not enough. We must act as well as feel; relieve as well as commiserate; and one of the best companions to the cheerful hearth and plenteous board which welcome Christmas in thousands of happy English Homes, is the thought that Charity has shed a reflex of their light in some dark retreat where that light was sorely needed.



"THE GREAT BRITAIN" STEAM-SHIP LEAVING CUMBERLAND BASIN, BRISTOL.

"THE GREAT BRITAIN," STEAM-SHIP.

At length this Leviathan of Steam Navigation has been released from her long imprisonment, in Cumberland basin, Bristol. The scene was, indeed, a spectacle in every stage; and merits minute detail and illustration. The mighty vessel itself, our readers will remember, has already been described in Nos 63, 64, and 65, of our journal; with several engravings.

The morning of Wednesday, the 11th, about seven o'clock, being the highest tide in December, was appointed for the passage of the Great Britain through the lock of Cumberland basin, the last barrier to her free egress to the sea. To allow this, the bridge which crossed the lock, and a portion of its masonry, had been removed; and, all things being thus prepared, at the above early hour, notwithstanding the severity of the frost, and the cutting of a bleak easterly wind, tens of thousands had assembled to witness the great labour. They were, however, doomed to disappointment; for the tide not having risen as high as was expected, on the first moment of its being evident that there was not likely to be sufficient water, the great vessel was hauled back. No sooner had the water fallen than large gangs of masons were set to work, under the scientific and practised eye of Mr. Brunel, to open the space for her passage on the evening's tide; and everything was done to render the vessel's draught of water as light as possible.

As in the morning, so at night, Captain Hoskin was obliged to make a dash at the lock, at the very last moment of the tide's rising, which it did to thirty-three feet, and no more. The following details of the mighty spectacle, and of the trial trip, on Thursday morning, are from the Bristol Mirror:—

"We cannot attempt to describe in appropriate language the splendid appearance of the Great Britain as she entered the lock, and passed as it were through the crowds of people assembled on the occasion. On either side of the lock blazed barrels of tar, with very short intervals between them, to the distance of more than 200 yards, the illumination from which, on the giant ship, the water, and the faces of the multitude, is not to be described. She passed through at a rapid pace, touching nothing but the rail of one of the bridges, which was hooked by the anchor and carried away like a thread. She was moored by the side of the wing wall outside the lock for the night, to be ready for her passage down in the morning.

At about seven o'clock in the morning, vehicles began to arrive from the country, and by eight o'clock every possible place where there was standing room seemed as on the night before to be occupied by anxious gazers. At about ten minutes past eight, the Sampson steam-tug, of sixty horses power, in which was Captain Claxton, R N., was seen to take her in tow, and very soon after the word was given to turn ahead. Slowly and majestically, she left the entrance amidst the cheers of thousands, which were re-echoed by those on board. It was extraordinary to see with what ease she appeared to gather way, and to steer, even before two other steamers were attached, one on either side to her quarters, although the flood tide, which was against her, had not done running.

After passing the Hotwell-house, the steamers alluded to added their powers to those of the Sampson, and the crowds of people who accompanied her by the side of the river were very soon brought to a run. She passed Round Point with the greatest ease, and all the other points of the river, and reached Kingroad, a distance of nearly seven miles, in an hour and eight minutes, three-fourths of the way without any tide in her favour. Considering that she was towed by steam-boats whose united power did not exceed one hundred and twenty horses, it is to be assumed that she is adapted for gliding through the water upon the most approved principles.

Having arrived at Kingroad, preparations were made for putting her engines in motion. They were pronounced to be ready between eleven and twelve, and the steam tugs, which up to that time had been holding her against the wind and tide, were ordered to let go, and the word given to turn a-head. It was not deemed prudent to put the engines at first to the test of a severe trial, and for some time they were kept going at about seven revolutions, which were allowed gradually to increase up to the time of her arrival at the Holms, when they had reached between eleven and twelve, the speed of the ship being in the proper proportion to the progress of the screw, at this time it having reached about eight knots. Long before she arrived at the Holms she had left behind one of the steam tugs; the other, well known to be the fastest steam paddle-boat out of the port, more than held her own up to this time. Near the Holms this gallant ship was twice turned round, and she came round in much less time, and in a much smaller circle, than, from her extreme length, and the strong breeze blowing against her could have been anticipated.

A snow storm threatening, it was deemed prudent to put her head homewards, with the view of arriving at her anchorage before dark. She returned at about the same speed until she came near Blackmore, about four miles from Kingroad. The fast Sampson was at this time, about half-past four, alongside of her. The engines were then allowed rather to exceed sixteen revolutions, which is equal to forty-nine of the screw; the speed of the ship suddenly increasing to better than fifteen knots, when she left her little competitor rapidly behind. She came to an anchor about five o'clock; and we understood, on board, from the scientific gentlemen concerned, that no doubt remains on their minds as to her being able to accomplish from twelve to fifteen knots, without the aid of her canvass, none of which was bent on the trial. The slip, or loss of the screw, was eight per cent.; the loss, we were told, of paddle-wheels in sea-going steamers under similar circumstances would have been 20 per cent. The steam was cut off at a foot, and six of the fires were not lighted at all, so that even at twenty revolutions or upwards, there is no doubt there will be plenty of speed. The driving chains and the shaft of the screw made no noise whatever. In the fore-cabin nobody would have known that an engine was at work, and in the after part it was necessary to feel the pillars with the hand to ascertain whether there was really any vibration.

It may be as well to state, as an answer to the objections that have been made to the navigation of our port, that a vessel of such vast dimensions as the Great Britain went down on a spring tide, and came up at dead low water; having gone on the last of the ebb, and came back on the first of the flood.

With all our hearts we congratulate the Directors and the Company upon the result of this great undertaking. Like many others interested, we may have felt doubts upon many points; but it is now our conviction that this ship is destined not only to work a great revolution in naval architecture, but, in conjunction with our well-tried Great Western, to remunerate the Company for the risks they have incurred, and the anxiety they have gone through."

At three o'clock on Thursday, a large party sat down, in the saloon of the ship, to an excellent cold collation, which being despatched, several toasts were drunk; including the health of Mrs. Miles, who had christened the Great Western and the Great Britain; of the Directors, of Mr. Guppy, Captain Hoskin, and Mr. Smith (the patentee of the screw), and last, though not least, "the health of Captain Claxton, R.N.," was received with overwhelming cheers. "He was," says the Bristol Mirror, "the life of the meeting, as he has been the very soul of the undertaking, and most sincerely do we rejoice with him on the magnificent result of his unwearied exertions." Shortly after the meeting broke up.

The ship having arrived in Kingroad, the visitors landed at about seven o'clock.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

PARISIANA.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Paris, Wednesday.

"Germany," the poem of which I spoke to you before, as a satirical witty work, by Heine, residing here, creates a great sensation in Paris, where one translation has already been published, and others are handed about in society. The following, translated from the original German, is a sample of the more innocuous parts of the poem:—

Paganini had a familiar spirit—
A little red man would Napoleon visit,
Upon th'eve of events and great occasion—
A battle, perhaps, or a foreign invasion.
Socrates, too, had an imp they say,
To do his biddings night and day.
I, too, when writing at night's lone hour,
Behold a spirit of might and pow'r
Stands silent behind me; and lurid and bright
Shines under his mantle a flickering light.
Lofty his stature, with eye like the star,
Wand'ring aud shifting in Ether far;
Yet, silent and still, he'd stand i' the distance,
Ne'er disturbing my labours with slightest resistance.
And time past on, and I'd lost him quite,
Till the Spirit again, one moonlight night,
Dogged my steps to sweet Cologne,
'Neath the Minster's shadow cold and lone,
And I turned appalled, nor longer could bear
His marble aspect and eyes' cold glare.
"Speak! what art thou! tell me, pray!
Why, when to loftiest moods a prey,
And lightning thoughts my mind obey,
Thou standest, strange being, ever behind?
Why 'neath thy mantle terribly shines
That light, like the sparkle of ruby mines?"
And the Spirit it answered, crabbed and sour,
"Pray don't be pathetic, for this is mine hour.
Of the Past no phantom or popinjay I,
But calm and practical, silent and dry;
Your mind's meditations, your every thought,
By me to fruition is ultimate brought.
I execute slowly, but surely act I:
Thou art the Judge—Executioner, I.
At Rome, as you wot, in days of yore,
An axe was carried the Consul before.
Thou, too, hast thy lictor, but he follows behind
With the axe of the headsman.

* * * * *

Then linger not longer; hence! forward! haste!
Thou man of strange thoughts!"

One need not be a conjuror to be able to predict that the Paris season which formerly dovetailed so exactly with our own, will soon run neck and neck with it, to the injury of both. The pleasures in private society have not yet begun; the diplomacy alone are a-field, giving réunions. The houses, the most reputed for such pleasures, are those of Lady Cowley, Countess d'Appony, Countess Brignolé, and the Prince de Ligne. The Countess d'Appony is the most renowned for her fêtes. She it was that first introduced in Paris, morning balls, where the whole élite of the city thronged, although daylight is cruelly trying for the skins of our Parisian beauties. These morning balls soon became the rage, but being imitated by all classes on account of the economy of illumination, they have now lost all fashion, and even the accomplished Countess would not revive them at her county seat at Auteuil, near Paris, the season before last.

The inclement weather victimising the crowds thronging at this season to Paris, the present is a glorious time for the triumphs of empiricism. Homœpathy, Hydropathy, and Mesmerism, have now outlived the liking of the Parisian gobêmouches. Now the system in vigour is that of the well-known Raspail, a great natural philosopher, and a still greater radical, and carrying the most singular eccentricity in all his opinions. He avers that the diseases of the body depend upon the two great affluence of parasytic animals preying upon our organs, and, although invisible, as demonstrably present as the monsters you behold in a drop of water, at your Polytechnic. His universal panacea and antidote is camphor, which destroys these invisible enemies, and the camphor must be inhaled. You therefore see, in all directions in the streets of Paris, persons moving about, having quills in their mouths: in these quills are bits of camphor, which they inhale with the air they breathe. Thousands of persons flock to consult Raspail, and all his advice is gratuitous, which renders it probable he will have no disciples amongst the doctors.

Mesmerism affords, at Paris, as elsewhere, a fertile subject of discussion, and the incredulous, who everywhere form a larger portion of the community, are now triumphing in the failure of a recent experiment, made by two zealous believers. They presented themselves a short time ago before the Academie de Sciences, affirming that it was possible by the mere influence of will, to imbue a piece of iron with a large quantity of magnetic fluid. M. Arago was delegated by that learned body to examine into this phenomenon. The experiment failed, but these gentlemen attributed its non-success wholly to the influence of the determined scepticism of M. Arago. A French Abbé, M. Lorebert, has recently published a book on the so-called science, defending it from the attacks of disbelievers, on the one hand, and the disapprobation of the church on the other.

I told you in a former letter, how much the number of sudden deaths, which have lately taken place in high society, had affected every one. Another is now added to the number. The Duc de Lorges, who, as you remember, lost his amiable wife shortly after her return from England, where she had, with her daughter, graced the salons of the Duke de Bordeaux, has now sustained another heavy affliction. The Countess du San D'Allemans, his sister, died at the château de Font Perthius, after an illness of three days, in the arms of her mother, the Dowager Duchess de Lorges. Her funeral was attended by crowds of weeping peasants. By this event, the great ligitimist families of La Rochejacquelin and Civrac are placed in mourning.

Another death has contributed to cast a gloom over Parisian society, especially that of the faubourg St. Germain. It is that of the young and talented Prince Elim Tchersky, the author of a collection of French poetry, as yet unedited, and of a tragedy destined to the genius of Mdlle. Rachel. He has been carried off by an inflammation of the chest. One of the most distinguished and witty of our poets, M. Emile Deschamps, has undertaken the editorship of these works of this youthful and lamented author.

The faubourg St. Germain has another cause for agitation. Prince Robecq de Montmorency, who bears one of the proudest and most illustrious names in France, has been brought before the Police Correctionelle, and sentenced to a month of imprisonment, and a fine of a thousand francs. You heard of the late trial of this nobleman, for endeavouring to cause sedition among the people. He was then acquitted; but the French Government, unwilling to lose hold of him, have now accused him of a delinquency which falls under the cognisance of the police—that of distributing, without a licence, a quantity of busts of the Duc de Bordeaux, which had been already placed under the ban of Government. These busts had been executed by the elegant and handsome Lion of Paris, Count Emilien de Neiwkerkerque, a successful sculptor, although a rich man. His principal performance is the statue of William of Nassau, in one of the principal squares of the Hague.

The danger to which one of our elégantes has been lately exposed, and her rescue by a préux chevalier, afford another topic of conversation in Parisian society. This lady, taking an excursion with a friend, in her carriage, which was harnessed à la Daimmont, and drawn by two horses—the one on which the postilion rode, was frightened by the horse of a cabriolet which was passing, and after throwing his rider, set off at a furious pace, dragging his fellow horse along with him. The danger was extreme; the carriage threatened every moment to be shattered to pieces, when a young and fashionably-attired gentleman who was passing, rushed forwards, seized the horses' heads, and although the frightful rapidity with which they were going caused him to be dragged forwards some yards, to the imminent risk of his life, he managed at last to master and to stop them. After having calmed the horses, and given them back to the care of the young postilion, who was more frightened than hurt, he did not wait to receive the thanks of the grateful and terrified ladies, but disappeared immediately. It has been since ascertained that this courageous individual is a young and noble Spaniard, the Marquis de St. Jago.

According to one of our newspapers, M. Guizot has been attacked by an affection of the larynx, so severe that his doctors do not answer for his cure should he persist in sustaining his official duties this session.

The Marquis Joachim Napoleon Pepolé, grandson of Murat, the King of Naples, and brother-in-law of Napoleon, has lately married the Princess Frida de Hohenzollern Sigmaringen, daughter of the reigning Prince. The young couple inhabit Bologna.

The Parisians amuse themselves with punning on a late threatened collision of two Royal personages:—The King of Hanover and the Duke of Brunswick, both travelling on the same railway in Germany, in two trains going in different directions, an accident like the late deplorable one detailed by your newspapers appeared inevitable, but the carriages were most fortunately stopped in time to avoid the danger.

The Royal Family are now all assembled, including the King and Queen of the Belgians, but the arrival of the youthful Duchess d'Aumale amongst them must have appeared to her somewhat inauspicious. I told you last week of the disasters of her passage: the weather continued unpropitious to the end; and on the morning after her arrival at Paris, the eyes of the young bride—accustomed to the cloudless skies and eternal sunshine of her own land—were greeted with a fog so dense, that it would have emulated your brouillard de Londres, and a white sheeting of snow, which had not even respected the dwelling of Royalty, or the Temple of Hymen. Her reception, besides, lacked its intended gaiety, in consequence of the sudden postponement of the fêtes at Fontainebleau. It was certainly remarkable that three Royal marriages, whose honeymoon had been there celebrated—those of the Duchess de Berry; the Princess Marie of Wurtemburg, a daughter of Louis Philippe, who died early; and the Duchess of Orleans—should have all terminated so unhappily.

ENGLISH THEATRICALS IN PARIS.

(From our own Correspondent.)

On Monday evening the Salle Ventadour was crowded to excess to witness the performance of "Othello." The selection of this tragedy for the début of Macready before the critical world of Paris, was in bad taste; if it were necessary to open the season with a work of Shakspeare's, it should not have been one in which the fiat of the London public had declared the actor's incapacity. The result proved our anticipations to be well founded. The applause which greeted the performance was solely due to the genius of the author, and in compliment to the spirit of the entrepreneur, excepting, indeed, the last acts, which were played by Miss Helen Faucit, with a simple energy and a purity, which made the climax of the tragedy her own. Her appealing oath in the fourth act in the scene of Othello's rage, was the only great and involuntary burst of cheering fairly won throughout the performance. The great improvement in Miss Faucit since Mr. Macready's departure from America is incredible. In juvenile tragedy, indeed, she now stands pre-eminently alone. The great impression of the evening was, unquestionably, made by her graceful and interesting impersonation of the gentle Desdemona. The performances did not commence till eight, and it was half past eleven before they had concluded. Amongst the élite of literature and art who studded the brilliantly fashionable audience, we recognised Jules Janin, Alexandre Dumas, Duprez, Lablache, Anna Thillon, Girardin, Theophile Gauthier, Osborne, Berlioz, the Countess Merlin, &c. &c.

The despatch with which this correspondence is sent precludes the possibility of doing justice to an illustration of the performance; in our next, we shall give a criticism of the performances up to Wednesday, with illustrations.

FRANCE.

Our intelligence from France comprises several articles of interest. The insurrectionary movement at Lucerne has been suppressed, but considerable excitement prevails there and in several other cantons. The Duke d'Aumale, with his newly-married bride, had arrived in Paris. When they reached the Tuileries, the King and the Queen of the French descended to the foot of the grand staircase to receive their new daughter-in-law. All the members of the Royal Family were assembled at the Palace. According to the Commerce, about the 15th of January, the Prince and Princess de Joinville will, owing to the delicate state of the health of the latter, quit Paris, and repair for the winter to a country-house hired for them at Hyéres. The Nouvelliste of Marseilles gives the following portrait of the young Duchess d'Aumale:—"The Duchess d'Aumale is a blonde and rather fragile young woman, with a lively countenance and a Bourben nose. All who are admitted to her presence speak in the highest terms of her excellent disposition and her high mental qualifications. Her toilet is charmingly simple; over a white dress her Royal Highness wears a white scarf variegated with pink, and a blushing rose adorns her beautiful hair." The King and Queen of the Belgians are also now on a visit in Paris.

The Moniteur publishes the terms of the treaty between France and Morocco, but it is not necessary to recapitulate them, as the main points were mentioned at the time of the conclusion of the treaty.

The Journal des Débats of Monday contains a sort of official disclaimer of the Oceanie Francaise, the newspaper established at Tahiti by Captain Bruat, and condemns the tone adopted in that publication towards the English. It is reasonable to suppose that the French Ministry are annoyed at the insults heaped by this journal on the English, to which, probably, they give no sanction whatever; but of the fact that the paper was established by Captain Bruat, and is under his controul, there can be no doubt.

The celebrated church of St. Eustache, at Paris, narrowly escaped total destruction by fire on Monday evening, owing to the carelessness of a workman, who left a lighted candle in the organ-loft. The fire commenced in that part of the building; it destroyed the organ, one of the most celebrated in Europe, but the pictures and other valuable property were saved, owing to the great exertions of the fire-brigade and the authorities.

The Constitutionnel says, that the marriage of Queen Isabella II. with the Count of Trapani is finally determined on; and that the affair has been definitively arranged by the Prince de Joinville and the Duke d'Aumale during the recent visit to Naples. The Constitutionnel thinks that this marriage, instead of pacifying Spain, will be the signal for a renewal of the civil war, by destroying the hopes of the Carlists, and rendering them desperate. It also disapproves of the marriage, as likely to lead France into further difficulties, while it cannot be expected to obtain the sanction of the northern powers.

Another accident occurred on the left bank of the Versailles Railway between Chaville and Sèvres on Monday, in consequence of the pin breaking which connected the bar of the luggage-waggons with that of the passengers' carriages. The train was thrown off the rails. The engineer was killed on the spot and five passengers were more or less wounded. The accident did not cause any interruption to the traffic.

The Journal des Débats of Tuesday contains an article upon the prospects of the ensuing Session, which may be considered as an official manifestation of the confidence of Ministers that their opponents will not be able to defeat them. The Débats contends that M. Dupin ought to be re-elected President of the Chambers, instead of M. Sauzet, but, at the same time, it does not consider the question as altogether a Ministerial one. It says:—"It is evident that it is not upon the Presidency that this question will be tried. The Ministry will no more be saved if the Chamber elect M. Sauzet, than it will be lost if M. Dupin be elected. The votes are perfectly free, and one reason alone remains to be weighed—that of capacity. We are far from saying that M. Sauzet is an incapable President—we only consider M. Dupin to be more capable; and as it is important that the Chamber should be presided over by the greatest capability, we think that the majority should give its votes in preference to M. Dupin. We mean no more."

The thaw still continued in Paris, and throughout France. The ice which had formed in the rivers Seine and Marne had broken up, unaccompanied by any unpleasant incident.

SPAIN.

We are glad to find by our accounts from Madrid that the Govenrment is now disposed to adopt a more lenient course in reference to the late insurrectionary movements. Colonel Rengifo, Captain Pedro Garcia, and Surgeon Manuel Arrilla, who after the sentence of the court-martial held at Madrid, had been placed en capilla previous to their execution, were, after a meeting of the Cabinet Council, pardoned by the Queen.

A letter from Figueras of the 13th inst., states that the partisans of Espartero were assembling on the neighbouring frontier to enter Lampurdan, and that General Seoane appeared to be their principal chief. The latter was assisted by an aide-de-camp of Espartero, who had hitherto eluded the surveillance of the French police. On the same day a battalion of the regiment of Saragossa entered the town. The inhabitants of the country were animated with the best possible spirit, and were only awaiting orders to rise en masse against the rebels.

On the 8th the news reached Madrid of a popular movement having taken place at Carthagena. It is stated to have been checked without bloodshed.

No intelligence whatever has been obtained respecting Zurbano.

A letter from Bayonne says:—"Twenty inhabitants of the lately revolted districts of Echo, Anso, and Siresa, Upper Arragon, arrived at the French frontier town of Bedous on the 6th, and presented themselves before the Police Commissary. They looked the very picture of famine, cold, and despair, having passed several days in the mountains almost without food, and exposed to all the rigours of the present season. Twelve of the inhabitants of Echo and Anso, who took a part in the insurrection of these places, have been shot by the order of the Captain-General of Arragon."

PORTUGAL.

We have accounts from Lisbon to the 10th inst. The discussions in the Chamber of Peers have lost their interest for the present; but the Chamber of Deputies has been engaged with some propositions on local matters, which excited some attention.

A sumptuous entertainment was given a few days ago by her Majesty, at the Palace of Belem, to celebrate the birthday of her brother, the Emperor of Brazil. All the Ministers of State were present, as well as the corps diplomatique, together with many of the nobility and persons of distinction: a good deal of pomp was mixed up with the festivity of the occasion. The Queen and Royal family continued to inhabit the palace above mentioned, owing to the alterations at the Necessidades not yet being completed, and it is expected that it will be their residence during the winter.

TURKEY.

A private letter from Constantinople dated Nov. 27, has reached us, which states that considerable sensation had been caused by the sudden departure of the English Ambassador, Sir Stratford Canning. There had latterly been several discussions between our Ambassador and the Grand Vizier upon points respecting which there was some difference; for instance, the recent conduct of the Pacha of Trebizond towards the British Consul there, and the alarmists of the capital spread a report of an important rupture. On the other hand, it is stated that the Ambassador had merely departed on a shooting excursion to the Dardanelles, and had availed himself of the departure of an English vessel which had sailed to obtain a supply of stores and provisions.

UNITED STATES.

Arrival of the Britannia.—The Britannia steamer has reached Liverpool with New York papers to the 30th ult. Their news, however, is unimportant. The message of the Acting President was expected at New York on the 3rd inst., and will probably reach England by the next vessel, as it generally arrives about this time of year.

New Orleans papers contain later dates from Texas. The Clarksville (Texas) Northern Standard of October 16, contains a paragraph from another Texan paper, in which it is said that President Houston has received another communication from Santa Anna, of a pacific character. It is further stated that the contemplated invasion of Texas by Mexico is abandoned, and it is settled that England and France have offered to obtain an acknowledgment of Texas independence, on condition that Mexico shall have the right to renew the war whenever Texas offers herself to the United States.

There was little alteration in stocks at New York. The cotton market was dull.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

Army Movements.—The following removals of troops have just taken place, namely, the 6th Foot from Chester, en route to Ireland; the 8th Foot from Bolton to Chester, to succeed the 6th Foot; the 16th Foot from Dublin to Cork; and the 56th Foot has arrived at Liverpool, from Dublin.

Death of Rear-Admiral Edward Boger.—Intelligence has been received of the death of the above gallant flag officer, after a protracted illness. He died at Lipson, near Plymouth, last week, at the age of 69 years. The deceased admiral had been in the naval service of his country above fifty years.

Death of Sir John Jamison, Kt.—Intelligence has been received of the demise of the above venerable knight, well known some years backs as an eminent physician in the navy, and one of the inspectors of hospitals and fleets. He died at his villa, near Sydney, on the 29th of June last.

It is rumoured in the naval circles that Admiral Sir Charles Ogle, Bart., is likely to succeed Admiral Sir David Milne, G.C.B., as Commander-in-Chief at Plymouth.

The Expected Brevet.—It is confidently said that the long-expected brevet will take place at the commencement of the new year. This has been long due to the army, and we are sure that it will be gratefully received.

Portsmouth.—The Royal yacht Victoria and Albert is complete, all but her ventilating apparatus, which is being fitted under the superintendence of Dr. Reid. It is expected she will leave the dock and make trial of her speed after her alterations in a few days. The St. Vincent, 120, progresses rapidly in her refit in dock. It is expected she will be able to leave in about two months.

Portsmouuth, Tuesday.—A court martial was held to-day upon Mr. Bellis, mate of the Excellent, charged by Captain Sir Thomas Hastings, with dereliction of duty in absenting himself from his watch on the 7th inst. Evidence was given, and the court pronounced the prisoner guilty. He was ordered to be severely reprimanded, and to remain on the mates' list two years more than the ordinary term before advancement in his profession.

COUNTRY NEWS.

Dartmouth Election.—The nomination, it is said, will take place on Monday next, and the polling on the day following.

Proposed Incorporation of Brighton.—A large adjourned meeting was held at Brighton on Monday, upon the subject of the proposed incorporation of Brighton. After a long discussion the proposition was rejected by a considerable majority.

Explosion of Fire-Damp.—Another of these accidents took place on Friday last, at the Edwards Colliery, Pontypridd (Wales), when five persons were severely burnt. It appears that the explosion took place in consequence of Simon Davies (the manager) and his son going into an old stall, which had been discontinued working, with a naked candle.

Murder of a Police Officer at Liverpool.—A brutal outrage was committed at an early hour on Sunday morning last at Liverpool, upon two police officers named Fairclough and Price, by a young man, named William Jones. Jones had been dreadfully abusing his sister in a house situated in Whitfield-street, Toxteth-park, in that town. The two officers interfered to restore peace, and they prevailed upon them to re-enter the house, out of which Jones had violently driven his sister. Immediately afterwards, however, Jones came out with a poker in his hand, and suddenly struck both the officers over the head. Serious injuries were the consequence, from which Fairclough died on Monday afternoon, and Price was disabled. Tuesday the prisoner was remanded by the magistrate to abide the issue of the coroner's inquest.

A Murder Committed Two Years Ago.—A man named James Crowley has been apprehended at Chester, charged with the murder of William Tilsey, on the 25th of Dec., 1842. From the statement made before the magistrates, it appeared that Crowley's father, having reason to dread some fatal act of violence on the part of his son, had one of his farm-servants, named William Tilsley, sworn in as a special constable for his (the father's) protection; and on Christmas Day, 1842, the family and a party of friends having just taken their seats at the dinner-table, the prisoner's mother suddenly started up, and said to her husband, "For God's sake go up-stairs; there's James coming across the field with his gun to shoot some of us." The old man accordingly hurried from the apartment, and the prisoner, who had been seen by his mother through the window advancing in the way she described, went round to the back of the house, and thrust the muzzle of his gun through a pane of glass. In the meantime Tilsley went out to expostulate with the prisoner, who, on seeing him, retreated a few paces exclaiming, "It's you, is it?" and at the same time fired at the unfortunate man, and shot him dead upon the spot. He then shouldered the gun, and was heard to say as he walked away, "I've another charge for somebody else." Crowley was heard of no more until a few days since. He has, it appears, been in the United States in the interim, but has resided ever since March last in Chester. A woman with whom he has recently lived, in a fit of jealousy betrayed him. The prisoner admitted that he shot Tilsley. He was ordered to be taken to Warwick, where he will undergo further examination.

Suffocation of Three Persons by Charcoal.—On Saturday night last, three husbandmen in the employ of John Oakley, Esq., farmer, at Darling, near Chatham, were found dead in their bed-room. It appears that the men, whose names are John Stedman, aged 25 years, Thomas Webb, 18, and George Wright, 17, lodged at the bailiff's cottage, on the opposite side of the road to the farm-house, and in consequence of the severity of the cold, they had begged the bailiff's wife to warm their room. On Saturday last, the night being very cold, she allowed them to do so, and as the bed-room had not a fire-place, she procured a stable lantern, filled it with charcoal, and placed it in the centre of the room. About eight o'clock on Saturday night Stedman retired to rest, and he was followed about an hour afterwards by the other two, Webb and Wright. Nothing was heard of them until next morning. Not coming down stairs at the usual hour, about seven o'clock, the bailiff went up stairs to rouse them. Wright was found lying on the floor behind the door; he had evidently dropped down dead the instant he entered the room, which must at the time have been filled with carbonic gas. Webb was lying on his back on the bed, with his hand to his handkerchief, as if he had been seized by death in the act of untying it. Stedman had his jacket off, and had partly removed his trousers from his person, and had fallen back on the bed. At the inquest, which was held on Monday, the jury returned a verdict—that the deaths of the young men were accidental, caused by suffocation by charcoal being burnt in the bed-room.

IRELAND.

Repeal Demonstration at Waterford.—What is called a Repeal demonstration has taken place at Waterford, in the shape of a banquet, over which Thomas Meagher, Esq., the mayor of that town, presided; but it was rather a sorry affair. There was very little in Mr. O'Connell's speech worth notice. The honourable and learned gentleman spoke very confidently about procuring Repeal. He said he was as certain of it as of his own existence. Various circumstances might lead to it at once: but he harped principally upon the idea of its being brought on by the threat of danger to England. He said:—"There is no event menacing England—there is no event menacing the public peace of the world that will not give us Repeal more readily than I can pronounce the word. (Cheers.) England would then want the people of Ireland, and the people of Ireland she can have by buying them, for they want a price for their services, and that price is Repeal. (Loud cheers.) It cannot be remote when we consider the accumulating strength of such a nation as the Irish, amounting, I may say from the first authority, to 900,000 grown up men—not including the boys of from eleven to fourteen, who are rather handy. (Laughter.) Yes, circumstanced as Ireland is, with the physical force she contains—with the determination she is evincing—with the combination that is rapidly accumulating into an entirety—with those facts before us and with the state of Europe in our contemplation, I say it is impossible that the Union should not soon be repealed." (Cheers.) Mr. O'Connell next touched upon the old grievances, and mooted a new and very singular one—the apathy of the English people and the indifference of the English press to the affairs of Ireland. "The English press will not report the real state of the country, nor put forward our grievances. They would do so if the English people felt an interest in the subject, for then their own interests would be affected if they did not do so, but their interests are not affected by their neglect, which proves the foregone apathy of the English people. (Hear.) It is all the same to them, for they have us fettered and handcuffed, as they think, in the chains of the Union, and that we are not able or willing to break them. They were never more mistaken since the world began. (Loud cheers.) We are both able and willing to break them—(cheers); and with the blessing of heaven we will break them into fragments. (Cheers.) The Irish shall not continue in chains. (Cheers.) The hour of thraldom is going by, and it is the duty of those who require security for the integrity of the empire and its continued consolidation under the same crown, to look to our complaints, and endeavour to mitigate them by doing us justice." This is really very rich. The English press has been literally swamped with "Ireland and the Irish," and yet O'Connell has the face to complain that the press neglects Irish interests. So far from not reporting "Irish grievances," the columns of the English papers have been choked with them, very often, no doubt, to the annoyance of their readers.

The Repeal Association.—At the meeting of the Repeal Association on Monday, Mr. O'Connell made a speech of considerable length, but of little novelty or interest. Much of it was devoted to attacks upon the English press. The impudence and insolence of one writer, he said, was only equalled by his ignorance. Mr. O'Connell said he was again unprepared with the report from the committee on his ten propositions. The learned gentleman of course again alluded to his trial. He said:—By the Clontarf proclamation the Government had challenged the people of Ireland to war, but finding that they would not fight, they went to law with them. From October to May the litigation had been going on, and would he could turn his back on those who caused that litigation, and he defied them to state any crime of which he had been guilty. There were crimes committed, but not by Repealers. They had the satisfaction of keeping him in gaol for 100 days, when they had no right to detain him for the hundredth part of a minute. Mr. O'Connell, in conclusion, called on the people to rally as if they were only really beginning to agitate for Repeal (cheers), and as if all they had hitherto done were as nothing. 1843 was the year for monster meetings; 1844 for peace, patience, and for legal triumph; 1845 should be marked by the weekly collection of the Repeal rent." (Cheers.) Surely Mr. O'Connell has something better to promise for 1845 than the weekly collection of the Repeal rent. This the people have been well accustomed to in former years. Mr. O'Connell announced the rent for the week to be £179 12s. 2d.

Shipwrecks off Kingstown.—A letter from Dublin, dated Dec. 16, states that there has been some boisterous weather, which has produced the most disastrous effects. The shore at Seapoint, a mile and a half on the Dublin side of Kingstown, is strewn with butter barrels and the wreck of a vessel of very considerable size. It is supposed she was bound from Cork for London, with a cargo of butter. Several other serious injuries have been done to the shipping both in Kingstown and in Dublin harbours.

Murder in the County of Clare.—Another murder has been committed in Clare, where the magistracy had assembled last week to devise measures for bringing to justice the persons concerned in the assassination of Mr. Arthur Gloster, a magistrate. Yesterday week Thomas Heffernan, a farmer, residing near Ennis, the assize town of the county, was fired at by some miscreants who lay in wait, and died instantly. The murder was committed about three o'clock, and it is stated that some of the neighbours of the victim were quite near at the time. This murder, like almost all the crimes perpetrated in the south, was connected with disputes about land. It appears that Heffernan was proceeding by ejectment against his mother and brother-in-law. The latter, whose name is Clancy, has been apprehended on suspicion of being accessory to the murder.

More Murders.—On Friday week a murder of a most atrocious nature was committed on a female respectably dressed, but whose name could not be discovered. On the following day an inquest was held, and adjourned till next day, in order to ascertain, if possible, some clue to the perpetrator of the foul deed. But the police were unsuccessful in their pursuit of the murderer. It appeared from the evidence that the deceased and the supposed murderer were travelling on the road from Tramore to Annstown, at one o'clock on the Friday; and at two o'clock on the same day the poor woman was found on the road, about one hundred yards from a cabin, into which the murderer went to light a pipe, with her head completely smashed, and it appeared from the appearance of the body that death must have been instantaneous, as no signs of struggling or protracted death appeared on her person. The Tipperary Vindicator gives the following account of another murder:—"It affords us the deepest pain to record another of those crying murders which have brought down on our county a notoriety so unenviable. In this case the parties were nearly related. An uncle was the victim, two brothers the alleged perpetrators of the awful deed which has deprived him of life! Britt is the name of the persons; the scene of the dreadful deed near Inch, Borrisoleigh; the cause of quarrel some dispute about land, or the right of passage through a green lane. For a long time these persons have been squabbling and litigating at the Borrisoleigh Petty Sessions. On Tuesday, it would appear, they all met in the green lane, the cause of their contention—a violent altercation commenced—blows ensued—and the uncle, overpowered, fell a sacrifice."

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

Opening of the Royal Exchange.—On Wednesday the public were allowed free access to the Merchants' Area, which was much crowded during the day. This interesting circumstance took place at eleven o'clock, and the building remained open till dusk. This will now occur every day, and on the 1st of January it will be given up to the merchants for their use. The Gresham Committee have adopted this arrangement, for the purpose of allowing a natural curiosity to be gratified, without the interruption which it would have caused to the merchants, if the free access of the public and the removal of the merchants from the temporary Exchange had occurred at the same time. The avenue to the eastward remains closed, in order to facilitate the finishing and furnishing of Lloyd's apartments, which are entered from the eastern area, and which are in a great state of forwardness.

Association for Promoting Relief of Destitution in the Metropolis.—Thursday last the first annual meeting of this association was held at the Hanover-square Rooms. The Bishop of London presided; and there were present, Lord Sandon, Sir Robert Inglis, M.P., Hon. Mr. Cowper, M.P., and several other clergymen and gentlemen. The Lord Bishop addressed the meeting at some length, and entered into details respecting the destitute condition of the poor. The secretary, Mr. Healy, then read a report, which referred to the state of the poor in London, in 1843, the moral evils resulting, remedial measures proposed, &c. The report stated, that at the commencement of the winter of 1843, public attention was drawn to the condition of the poorer classes of the population, and that at a meeting, presided over by the Bishop of London, the association was formed. With reference to funds, the report stated that they were diminishing. The total funds were £12,428, of which, there had been expended £9127. The report was unanimously adopted.

Testimonial to Father Mathew.—On Thursday evening a public meeting was held at Exeter Hall, for the purpose of considering the best means of relieving Father Mathew from the pecuniary embarrassments in which his labours and sacrifices in the cause of Temperance have involved him. The body of the Hall was crowded, the platform was not quite so well filled, and there was an unusually small proportion of females present. Many persons in the meeting wore the Temperance medal. Lord John Russell presided. In his opening address he highly eulogised the zealous labours of Father Mathew, and the moral reformation of which he had been the instrument in Ireland. Resolutions approving the objects of the meeting were moved and seconded by the following gentlemen:—Sir E. Codrington, J. S. Buckingham, Esq., W. Ewart, Esq., M.P., Mr. S. C. Hall, and the Rev. Mr. Sherman. In the course of the evening, it was stated that Father Mathew's present liabilities incurred in the Temperance cause amount to £7000. A collection was made, and a subscription commenced, to which Lord John Russell gives £25. The committee of the Temperance Society is empowered to carry out the object of the meeting.

Meeting of Paper Manufacturers.—An important meeting of paper manufacturers took place at the London Coffee-house on Thursday, Mr. John Dickinson in the chair, at which various statements were made to show the injurious operation of the duty on paper, and resolutions were agreed to with a view to the adoption of the best steps for procuring its repeal.

King William's Statue in the City.—The colossal statue of King William IV. has been placed on the pedestal in King William-street, fronting London-bridge. The figure is fifteen feet three inches in height, and weighs 20 tons. It was cut out of two enormous blocks of granite, and the work has occupied the artist (Mr. Nixon) nearly three years. The dress of the statue appears to be that of an Admiral's uniform, a cloak hanging gracefully over the shoulders. The right hand bears a scroll.

The Weather.—Last Saturday afternoon the frost gave way, and there was a gradual thaw in the night. During the early part of Sunday morning, however, the ice on the Serpentine was quite dry, and from between seven and eight o'clock until about nine the skaters enjoyed some excellent sport; but their number having then become much increased, and the cracks in the ice having been affected by the thaw, some water oozed through, and eventually the whole surface became covered, in some parts to the depth of full an inch. Throughout the middle of the day and the afternoon the number of spectators was very great, but the number of skaters during the day did not exceed 4000. Towards evening the ice became very dangerous. About three o'clock much amusement was occasioned by a lady, accompanied by a respectably dressed man, appearing with skates on the ice. For about an hour she performed various evolutions with much ability, but she then had a fall, and immediately left the ice. On the Round-pond in Kensington-gardens the number of skaters, on Saturday, was 3000, and on the Long-water 4000, without any accidents. On Sunday, on the latter piece of ice, the number of skaters was nearly the same. In the Regent's-park, on Sunday, the ice was sloppy and dangerous, but during the day there were upwards of 9000 skaters and sliders. The pickpockets mustered very strongly in all the parks, particularly in St. James's, where, from the absence of the police, it is supposed they made a rich harvest. It has been foggy during the week in London, and on some occasions lights have been necessary in the day-time. The temperature was much warmer during the early part of the week, but on Thursday there was a very cold wind, and symptoms of a return of frost.

Fire in the Commercial-road.—On Tuesday forenoon a fire broke out in the marine signal light manufactory in the occupation of Messrs. Robeson and Highams, the patentees, in the Commercial-road, East, near the Regent's Canal. The progress of the fire was unusually rapid, and in the course of a few minutes the building became one complete flaming mass. The firemen were unable to extinguish the fire before the stock in trade and the building were nearly destroyed. The Messrs. Robeson and Highams are uninsured.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

The Condemned Parricide.—The wretched convict, Mary Gallop, now under sentence of death in Chester Castle, for poisoning her father at Crewe, has since her condemnation manifested a great change of temper and disposition. She has made a full confession of her guilt. It appears that she would be twenty-one years of age next March. She has lived with her parents at Warrington, Runcorn, Liverpool, Windsor near Liverpool, and lastly at Crewe. During her residence in Liverpool, she formed an acquaintance with a youth, who is still in his apprenticeship; on leaving that town, she corresponded with him, and a warm attachment was the result. She was in the habit of showing the letters to her mother, but her father resolutely forbad all intercourse between the lovers. About half a year ago, the mother committed suicide; and so determined was the unhappy convict to maintain her intimacy with the object of her affections, that she contemplated taking a servant's situation in Liverpool, for the purpose of obtaining interviews with him. The father persisted in refusing his assent; and one day, as her sister was relating an instance of some woman having poisoned her husband by mixing arsenic in a pudding, the dreadful thought took possession of Mary Gallop's mind, that if she could so kill her father, there would be no hindrance to the indulgence of her desires. Accordingly she mixed some arsenic with the dough of which she made some tea-cakes; and subsequently put a portion of the deadly poison into some arrow-root, which she administered to her father in his illness. The fatal sickness and death of her parent followed as the sad consequence of her wickedness. She now manifests the deepest contrition for her crime. The execution of the miserable girl is fixed for Saturday next, Dec. 28.—[This is the character whom a jury recommended to mercy.]

The Explosion on the Dover Railway.—Since our last an inquest has been held to inquire into the cause of the death of Aaron Wilkinson, fireman, belonging to the "Forester" locomotive engine, which exploded, and so injured him that he died, as already stated. The evidence was given principally by the same parties as in the case of Robert Buckley. The only new feature presented itself in the deposition of Mr. Berry, of the firm of Berry, Curtis, and Kennedy, the makers of the engine, who deposed that he could only account for the explosion by the excessive pressure of the steam, and that most decidedly there would not have been any explosion had the safety-valve been open—that is, had there been sufficient water in the tubes. He did think it was purely accidental. After a few minutes' consultation, the following verdict was returned:—"That the deceased came by his death by the accidental explosion of a locomotive steam-engine."

Dreadful Wreck near Harwich.—During the heavy north-easterly gales on last week, a vessel was lost on Languard East Beach, near Harwich, accompanied with shocking loss of life. The vessel was the Hero (a schooner of 180 tons), belonging to Amsterdam, Mr. South, master, to which port she was bound from London. The crew, seven in number, including the master, took to the rigging for safety, but the excessive darkness of the night prevented them being seen until the ship had almost broken up. The principal officer of the Scout revenue cutter endeavoured to save them by a line, which he had contrived to throw over the wreck by the aid of a common rocket; however, the poor fellows were so benumbed with cold, that they were completely powerless, and sunk into the boiling surf and perished.

Death from a Nail.—On Tuesday Mr. Baker held an inquest at the Cumberland Head, City-road, on the body of Emma Farr, aged seventeen months, the daughter of a shoemaker. It appeared that deceased was at play with her brother, and during their frolics she fell off the bed on which she was at the time, upon the heel of a shoe, on which was a nail sticking up. The nail penetrated the back part of the head to the depth of half an inch. Mr. Wright, a surgeon, was in attendance upon deceased, and extracted the nail; she, however, lingered for a few days, and died on Sunday night last. That gentleman said deceased had died from the effects of the injuries she had sustained. Verdict, "Accidental death."

Deaths of Children from Fire.—On Monday Mr. Wakley, M.P., held an inquest in the Middlesex Hospital, on the body of Anne Dobson, a child, eight years old, who was burnt to death during her parents' temporary absence from home. Mr. Wakley observed that the loss of life by fire amongst children was truly awful. During the past few days he held inquests on thirteen who perished by fire. Mr. Deputy Coroner Mills said that very lately a score of children were burnt. A juror attributed the lamentable loss of life to the parents being obliged to go out in search of their daily bread, whilst they left their children in their rooms by themselves, not having the means either to pay a person to watch them, or to send them to school. Mr. Wakley remarked that the trifling outlay of a shilling in the purchase of a fire-guard would prevent such tragical occurrences.

Fatal Accident.—On Tuesday evening, an errand-cart belonging to Mr. Maynard, of Barking, was upset by a heap of paving-stones, opposite the Hall of Commerce. A man named Dean was passing with a truck at the moment, and was so injured by the van that he died before reaching St. Bartholomew's Hospital. A boy, who had been sitting with the driver of the van, was also severely injured.—[Sargood, the driver of the errand-cart, was examined before the Lord Mayor on Wednesday, on the charge of having been instrumental in Dean's death: and a witness named Kyte, who said he had placed the stones in the street, and that they had projected into the carriage-way, and thus caused the accident, was ordered into custody. Sargood was held to bail.]

Sudden Death in a Catholic Chapel.—On Tuesday night an inquest was held at the Three Swedish Crowns, Old Gravel-lane, before Mr. Baker, on the remains of Mary Roach, a pauper, belonging to the parish of St. George's in the East, aged 72 years. From the evidence it appeared, that on Sunday morning last the deceased was at the nine o'clock mass, in Virginia-street Chapel, and while engaged in prayer suddenly fell against a young woman, named Ann Bryant, who was kneeling alongside her. Mr. Henry, a medical gentleman, who was one of the congregation, was in immediate attendance on the poor woman, but all earthly assistance was of no avail, and the poor woman was instantly a corpse. Mr. Henry gave it as his opinion that apoplexy was the immediate cause of death, and the jury returned a verdict to that effect.

Steam-boat Collision off Ostend.—The Princess Mary and the Princess Alice came into collision on Tuesday, as the former, in a dense fog, was leaving Ostend with the mail, and the latter entering. No lives have been lost, but much damage has been done to the vessels, the Princess Mary suffering the most; a week or two will, however, put her right. The mail was landed. A vessel will be immediately put upon the station to fill the Princess Mary's place until she is able to resume her post.

Suicide on a Railway.—On Sunday night shortly before the train which leaves Manchester for Birmingham at a quarter-past six o'clock, had reached Wilmslow station, it passed over something on the rails, which afterwards proved to be the body of a young woman, about twenty-eight years of age. It appears that her name was Elizabeth Frith; that she had left her home at Audley, in Staffordshire, a day or two before, and had since been wandering about. Just before the passing of the train, she had placed herself across the rails, being in a state of insanity; but nothing was known of it till after the accident took place. An inquest was held on the body at Wilmslow on Monday night, when the jury returned a verdict to the effect, that she had placed herself across the rails while in a state of insanity, and was then and there killed. She was struck by the buffer, and one of her legs was nearly taken off. She died almost immediately.

A Mother-in-Law Killed by a Policeman.—On Wednesday afternoon the following fatal occurrence took place at the lodgings of James Clark, police-constable No. 55, of the C division. It appears that Clark having returned home after attending as a witness at Marlborough-street Police Court, had a violent altercation with his wife respecting some family disagreements, during which the wife's mother interfered, taking part with her daughter, when Clark took her by the shoulders and gave her a violent push, from the effects of which she reeled backwards, and fell headlong down the stairs from the first-floor landing, and sustained such injury that she shortly after expired. In the course of the evening Clark surrendered himself at the station-house of the C division in Vine-street, Piccadilly.

EVENING MELODIES.—II. THE POET DREAMT OF HEAVEN!

The poet dreamt of Heaven!
He strayed, a little child, amidst the glen
Where in his boyhood he'd been wont to stray;
He heard the very sounds he loved so then
And knew the very forms. 'Twas in this way
The Poet dreamt of Heaven!

The Mother dreamt of Heaven!
She saw her children decked in gems and flowers;
And one, whose health had always been amiss,
Was blooming now as those celestial bowers
He laughed to roam among. And, dreaming this,
The Mother dreamt of Heaven!

Her Children dreamt of Heaven!
Oh! 'twas a glorious land, where daisies grew,
And hidden music round it sounded low;
And playtime lasted there the whole year through,
And angels came and joined with them. 'Twas so
Her Children dreamt of Heaven!

The Trav'ler dreamt of Heaven!
The sun one morn with trebled splendour rose,
And showed his wearied eyes a place at last,
Where all was taintless joy, and calm repose,
And quiet thinking of the dangerous past.
They said its name was Heaven!

The Mourner dreamt of Heaven!
Before his eyes, so long with sorrow dim,
A glorious sheen, like lengthened lightning blazed;
And from the clouds one face looked down on him,
Whose beauty thrilled his veins. And as he gazed,
He knew he gazed on Heaven!

And let them all dream on!
Heav'n's for the pure, the just, the undefiled;
And so our lives, by holy faith, are such.
Our dreams may be erroneous, varying, wild;
But oh! we cannot think and hope too much:
So let them all dream on!

A CLASSICAL ACCOUNT OF THE ORIGIN OF KISSING.

Pliny, in his Natural History, says that Cato was of opinion that the use of kissing first began between kinsmen and kinswomen, however nearly allied or far off, only to know, by kissing, whether their wives, daughters, or nieces, had tasted any wine.

A NEW INVENTION FOR STEERING A SHIP.

A useful invention is now in the act of being applied to one of our men of war. It is called a "manœuvrer;" it is the proposition of R. Foulerton, Esq., and consists of an Archimedean screw, fitted through the deadwood of the ship at right angles with the keel, and set in motion by the capstan, for the purpose of turning the ship round when, from calm weather, the helm has no effect on the vessel.

THE SHORTEST DAY.

Why, how is this! past nine o'clock!
I fear I'm very late;
I really thought—it is so dark—
That it was only eight.
I shall be scolded terribly,
And nothing can I say
Except, what everybody knows,
It is the shortest day!

It's very dark! I cannot see
At all what I'm about:
Ay, there—I knew it would be so—
My stocking's wrong-side out.
It is not worth while getting up;
I care not what you say;
But really we should stay in bed
All through the shortest day.

I cannot see to dress myself;
I shall be such a fright;
But to be sure it matters not,
The day is more like night.
The air is thick as thick pea-soup,
You scarce can see your way;
I'm half afraid to grope about
Upon the shortest day.

I wonder what blind people do,
Of optics quite bereft—
I've made a blunder in my shoe,
My right foot's in my left!
Misfortunes never single come,
I've heard old sages say,
And thus I'm bother'd on all hands
Upon the shortest day.

I wish the sun would show his face:
Alas! I must show mine—
He's shrouded quite in murkiness,
And won't come forth to shine.
He's really very stingy now,
And won't bestow a ray,
To save our noses from lamp-posts
Upon the shortest day.

The men who make the almanacks
Are very waggish folks,
But there's no reason why the world
Should suffer for their jokes;
For though it's dull, it's very clear,
No matter what they say,
That there is not a day at all
Upon their shortest day.

The morning star won't lend his light
To lead me to the latch,
I must find my own lucifer—
Give me a patent match!
But were I fairly in the street,
A waggon or a dray
Might pulverise me in the fog,
And end my shortest day.

And thus all thro' this doleful time
We risk both life and limb,
One cannot stir an inch in peace
When all is dark and dim.
There is no antidote against Such sorrows in array,
Except that nothing can last long
Upon the shortest day.

A FRENCH BULL.

A Paris paper states that, in consequence of the scenes of disorder which have sometimes arisen at the churches during midnight mass, that ceremony will this year be performed at eight o'clock in the morning. This reminds us of a change once made in the meetings of a provincial club in Ireland, which was thus announced:—"Notice is hereby given, that the quarterly meetings of this society will in future be held every six weeks, and not every two months, as formerly."

AN ECCENTRIC CENTENARIAN.

A Chester paper mentions the death of Mrs. Walker, of Chorlton, near Nantwich, who lived to more than 103 years. She had a peculiar fondness for the feline race; she has been known to have as many as 15 cats at one time, and though she was never known to sell one, she once exchanged four for a bushel of wheat.

ANECDOTE OF BUNYAN.

One day, when Bunyan had preached with peculiar warmth and enlargement, some of his friends came to shake hands with him after the service, and observed to him what "a sweet sermon" he had delivered. "Ay!" he replied, "you need not remind me of that; for the devil told me of it before I was out of the pulpit."—Southey's Life of Bunyan.

PRECEPT AND EXAMPLE.

Thomson, the author of "The Seasons," wrote in bed his beautiful rhapsody on early rising, commencing "Falsely luxurious! will not man awake?"

A NEW DEFINITION OF LIGHT.

"What is light?" asked a schoolmaster of the booby of a class. "A sovereign that isn't full weight is light," was the prompt reply.

WIT OF LOUIS XVIII.

At a masked ball at the Opera in Paris, the Count de Provence, afterwards Louis XVIII., who was enormously fat, went in disguise, where Madame de Stael, who, although well-looking, was celebrated for her immense feet, accosted him rudely, "I know you, beau masque, by your burly figure." "And I you by your piedestal" (pied de Stael), retorted the witty Prince.

THE POLK FAMILY.

The new President of the United States is of Scottish lineage, and his curious looking name an abridgment of a good old Scotch one. Mr. Polk's father or grandfather is said to have been a Lanarkshire man, of the name of Pollock. In the somewhat peculiar dialect of the upper ward of that county the name is pronounced Poke, and hence, probably, the orthography adopted by the Transatlantic branch of the family.

STATISTICS OF THE COLD IN PARIS.

In 1067, 1210, 1305, 1354, 1408, and 1420, the Parisians had very severe winters, and in 1408 the soldiers' rations of wine were cut with an axe. In 1433 the frost set in on the last day of the year, and lasted three months. The winters of 1460, 1480, 1493, 1508, and 1522, are recorded as excessively cold. In 1514 wine was cut with an axe throughout France, in the casks. In 1662 and 1663 the frost continued in Paris from Dec. 5 to March 8. In 1676 and 1677 the Seine was frozen over for 35 days consecutively. The average cold of a great number of years at Paris is about 10 or 11 degrees centigrade above zero. At 9 degrees centigrade the Seine freezes. The severest cold hitherto known at Paris was in 1795, when the thermometer fell to 23 5 10.

STATISTICS OF DRUNKENNESS.

A very curious document has been lately drawn up on the origin, causes, results, metaphysics, philosophy, and physiology of drunkenness. One of the most curious chapters is that which contains a table of the various circumstances to which inebriety may be attributed. The report divides intoxication into several heads, including the muzzy, which is a sort of minor branch. Among the muzzy, six cases out of ten may be traced to spasms, and that one-nineteenth arises from birthdays; that among confidential clerks inebriety is rare, but when it occurs, pickled salmon, or the arrival of a friend from the country, are found to be the most usual causes of the malady. Drunkenness has also been known to arise, in some instances, from taking up a bill; but as the latter is an operation which persons given to intoxication seldom perform, the number of cases to be attributed to this source is very insignificant. A wife's birthday has often been known to lead to a total prostration of the husband; but it is a remarkable fact, that the day is frequently mistaken in these instances; and, such is the power of imagination, that a man has been known to drop down into the gutter eight or nine times in a year, through having fancied that the birthday of his wife occurred repeatedly in the course of a twelvemonth.—Punch.

THE HEALTH OF THE METROPOLIS.

The industrious fleas were so indisposed last week, that they were confined for three days to their Witney blanket. Napoleon is still laid up with chilblains, owing to the severity of the weather. His charger, also, is suffering from weakness in the knees, in consequence of the slipperiness of the wood pavement of the Pembroke table. They are not expected to perform again with their usual animation before the return of the spring.—Punch.

A STRANGE CERTIFICATE.

The following original medical certificate was presented to the magistrates at Hammersmith a short time ago:—

"With Dr. Collier's compliments,

"I certify that the within-named Mr. George Seaman is confined to his house with gout in both feet, and totally unable to comply with any summons, except it come from the other world, as is not improbable from day to day.

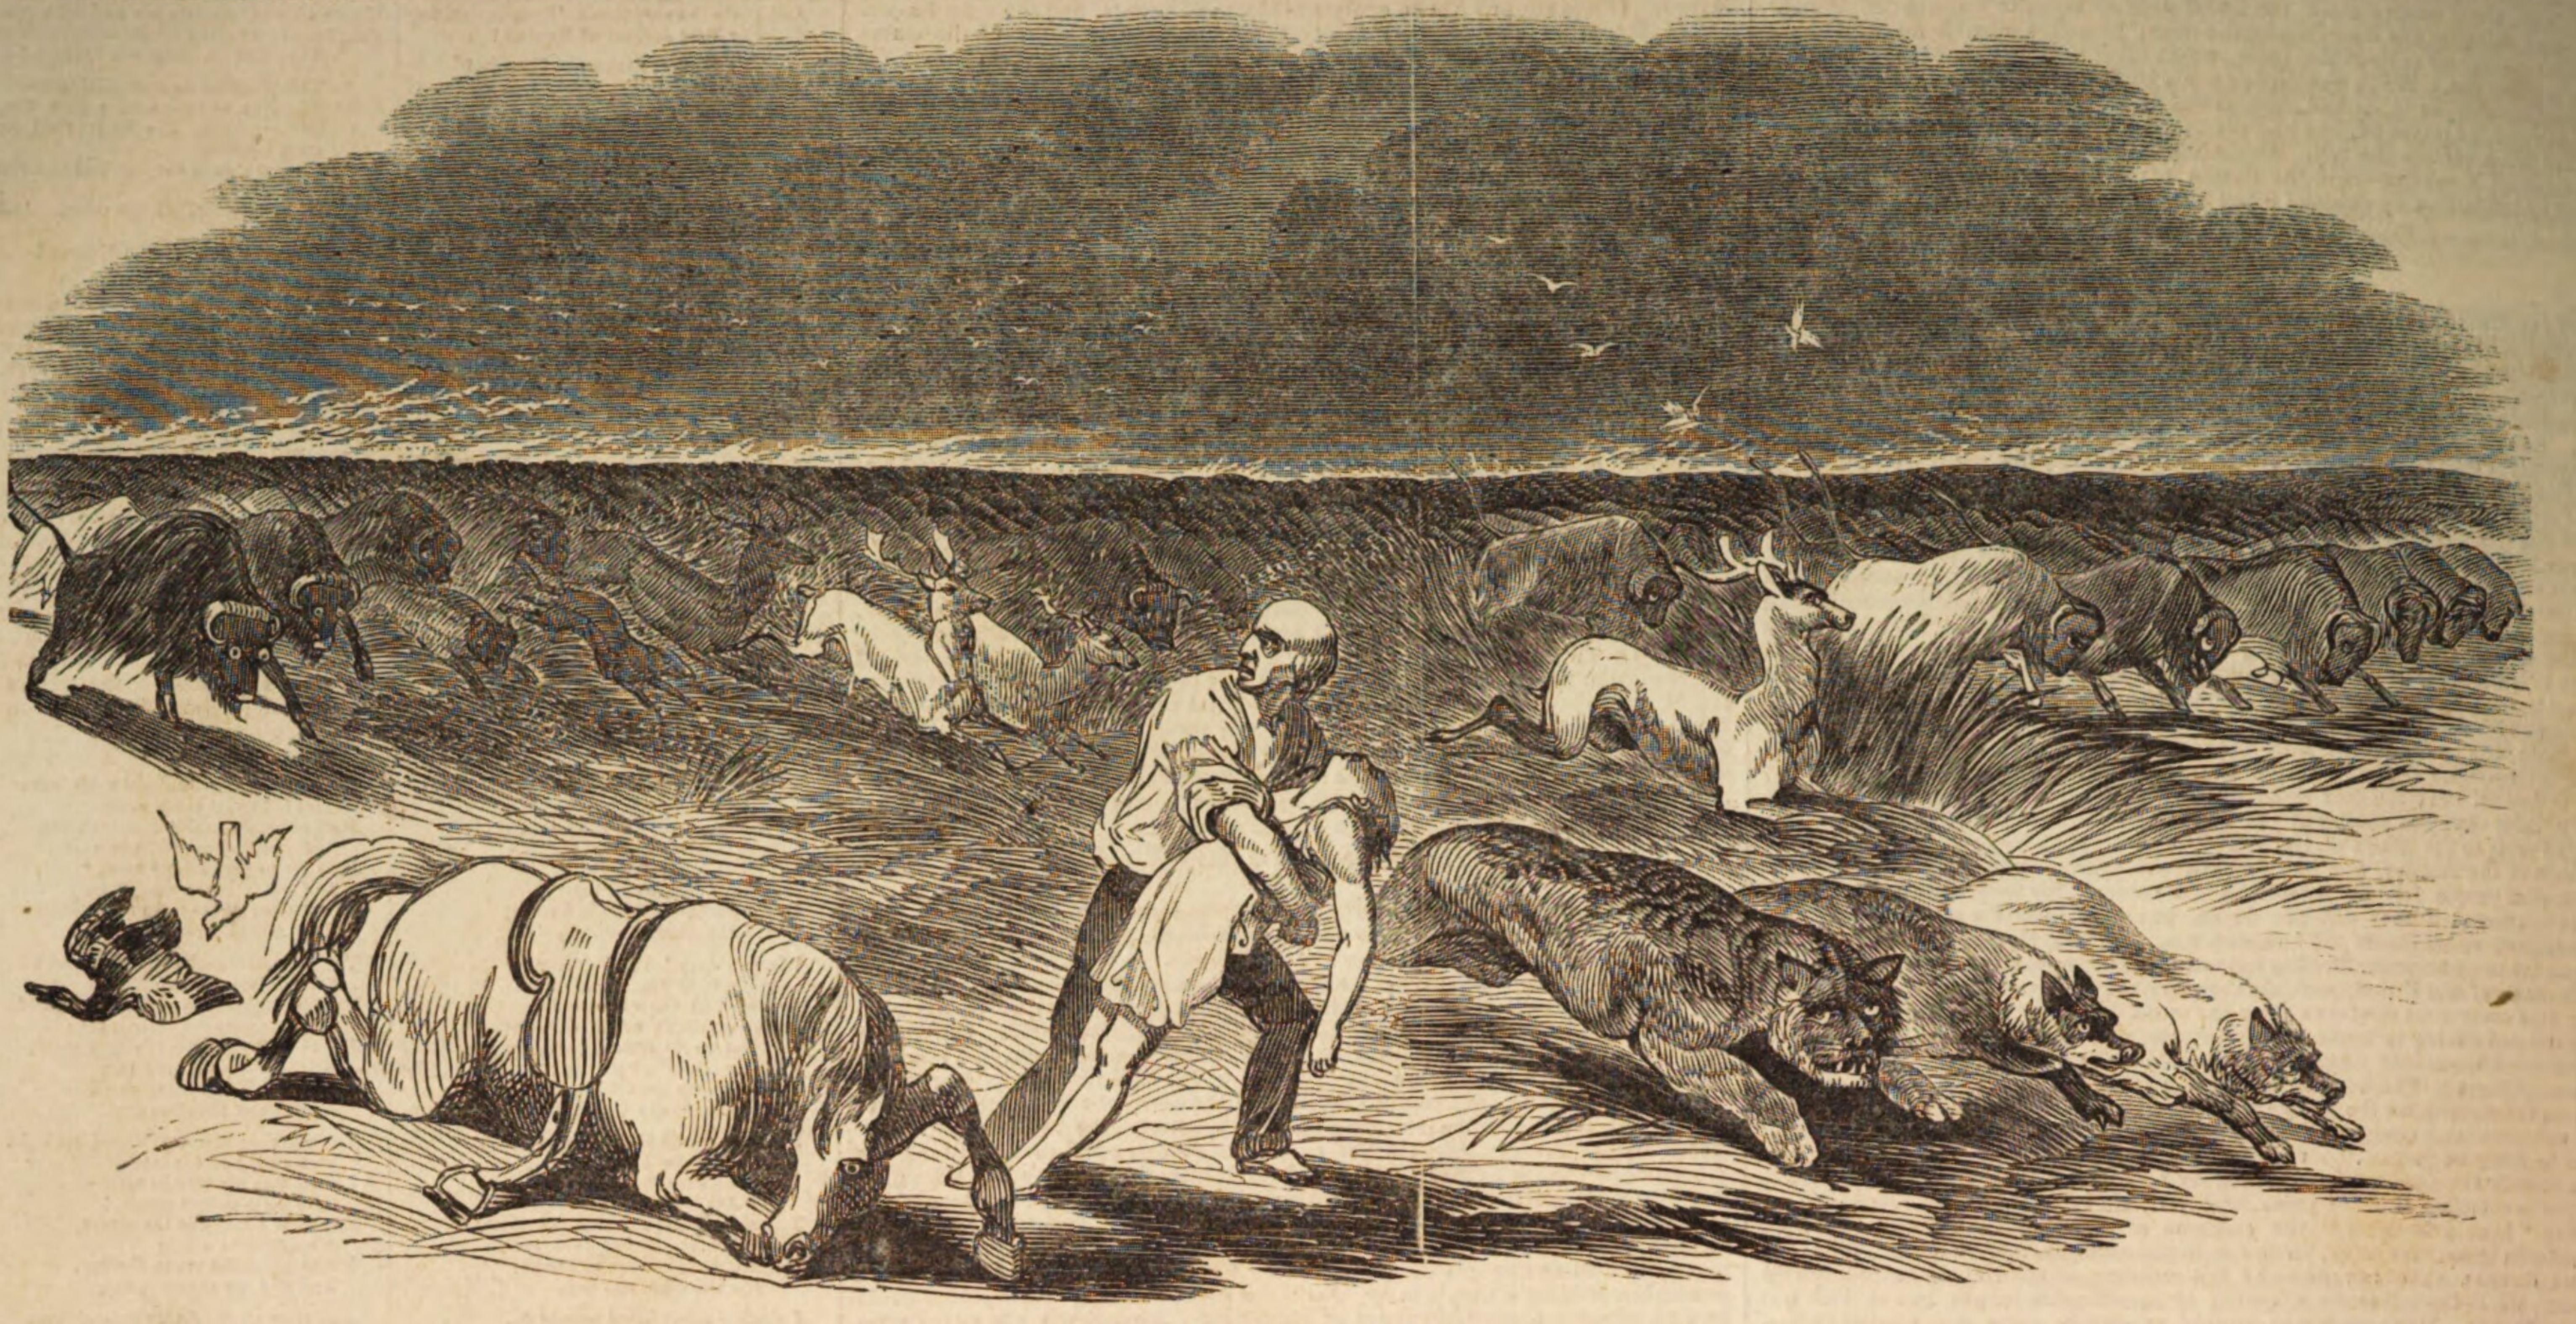
LITERATURE IN BELGIUM.

The activity of the newspapers of Brussels has been excited of late to an incredible point. Two of the principal journals announce that they will give (gratis) to their yearly subscribers "The History of the Consulate and of the Empire," by M. Thiers, which will be published in Paris, in next January, besides a weekly distribution of the best French romance. A bookseller of Brussels has paid to the editor of the history of M. Thiers 50,000f., to be at liberty to publish that work at Brussels the same day as it will appear in the French capital.



AMERICAN PRAIRIE ON FIRE.

AMERICAN PRAIRIE ON FIRE.

Conflagrations of prairies, of vast extent, have been of late, by no means unfrequent in "the far West." Thus, in a recent New York paper, date November 16th, we find the following paragraph :—

"A fire broke out in the Monticello Prairie, a few miles back of Alton Ill, on Thursday week, which destroyed many buildings and a considerable amount of personal property. The citizens of Alton turned out en masse, to render assistance in saving property and arresting the progress of the fire, which is said to have raged with great fury."

Our correspondent adds: "Several bodies have been found; and among them, a father with his son in his arms, burnt to death."

The terrific catastrophe of a prairie on fire, such as our artist, in New York, has depicted, has been nowhere more vividly described than in the very attractive "Adventures of Mons. Violet," edited by Captain Marryat:

The breeze freshened, and I heard the distant and muffled noise which in the west announces either an earthquake or an "estampede" of herds of wild cattle and other animals. Our horses, too, were aware of some danger, for now they were positively mad, struggling to break the lassoes and escape.

"Up," I cried, "up Gabriel, Roche! up, up, strangers! quick! saddle your beasts! run for your lives; the prairie is on fire, and the buffaloes are upon us."

They all started upon their feet, but not a word was exchanged; each felt the danger of his position; speed was our only resource, if it was not already too late. In a minute our horses were saddled, in another we were madly galloping across the prairie, the bridles upon the necks of our steeds, allowing them to follow their instinct.

For an hour we dashed on with undiminished speed, when we felt the earth trembling behind us, and soon afterward the distant bellowing, mixed up with the roaring and sharper cries of other animals, was borne down unto our ears. The atmosphere grew oppressive and heavy, while the flames, swifter than the wind, appeared raging upon the horizon. The fleeter game of all kinds now shot past us like arrows; deer were bounding over the ground, in company with wolves and panthers; droves of elks and antelopes passed swifter than a dream; then a solitary horse or huge buffalo bull.

The atmosphere rapidly became more dense, the heat more oppressive, the roars sounded louder and louder in our ears; now and then they were mingled with terrific howls and shrill sounds, so unearthly, that even our horses would stop their mad career and tremble, as if they considered them supernatural; but it was only for a second, and they dashed on.

A noble stag passed close to us, his strength was exhausted; three minutes afterwards we passed him—dead. But soon, with the rushing noise of a whirlwind, the mass of heavier and less speedy animals were close upon us; buffaloes and wild horses, all mixed together—an immense dark body, miles in front, miles in depth: on they came, trampling and dashing through every obstacle. This phalanx was but two miles from us.

* * * * * *

It was an awful sight! a sea of fire, roaring in its fury, with its heaving waves and unearthly hisses, approaching nearer and nearer, rushing on swifter than the sharp morning breeze.

Away we dashed, over hills and down declivities; for now the ground had become more broken. The fire was gaining fast upon us, when we perceived that, a mile ahead, the immense herds before us had entered a deep, broad chasm, into which they dashed, thousands upon thousands, tumbling headlong into the abyss. But now the fire rushing quicker, blazing fiercer, than before, as if determined not to lose its prey, curled its waves above our heads, smothering us with its heat and lurid smoke.

A few seconds more we spurred in agony; speed was life; the chasm was to be our preservation or our tomb. Down we darted, actually borne upon the backs of the descending mass, and landed, without sense or motion, more than a hundred feet below. As soon as we recovered from the shock, we found that we had been most mercifully preserved: strange to say, neither horse nor rider had received any serious injury. We heard, above our heads, the hissing and cracking of the fire; we contemplated with awe the flames, which were roaring along the edge of the precipice—now rising, now lowering, just as if they would leap over the space and annihilate all life in these western solitudes.

We were preserved; our fall had been broken by the animals, who had taken the leap a second before us, and by the thousands of bodies which were heaped up as a hetacomb, and received us as a cushion below. With difficulty we extricated ourselves and horses, and descending the mass of carcasses, we at last succeeded in reaching a few acres of clear ground.

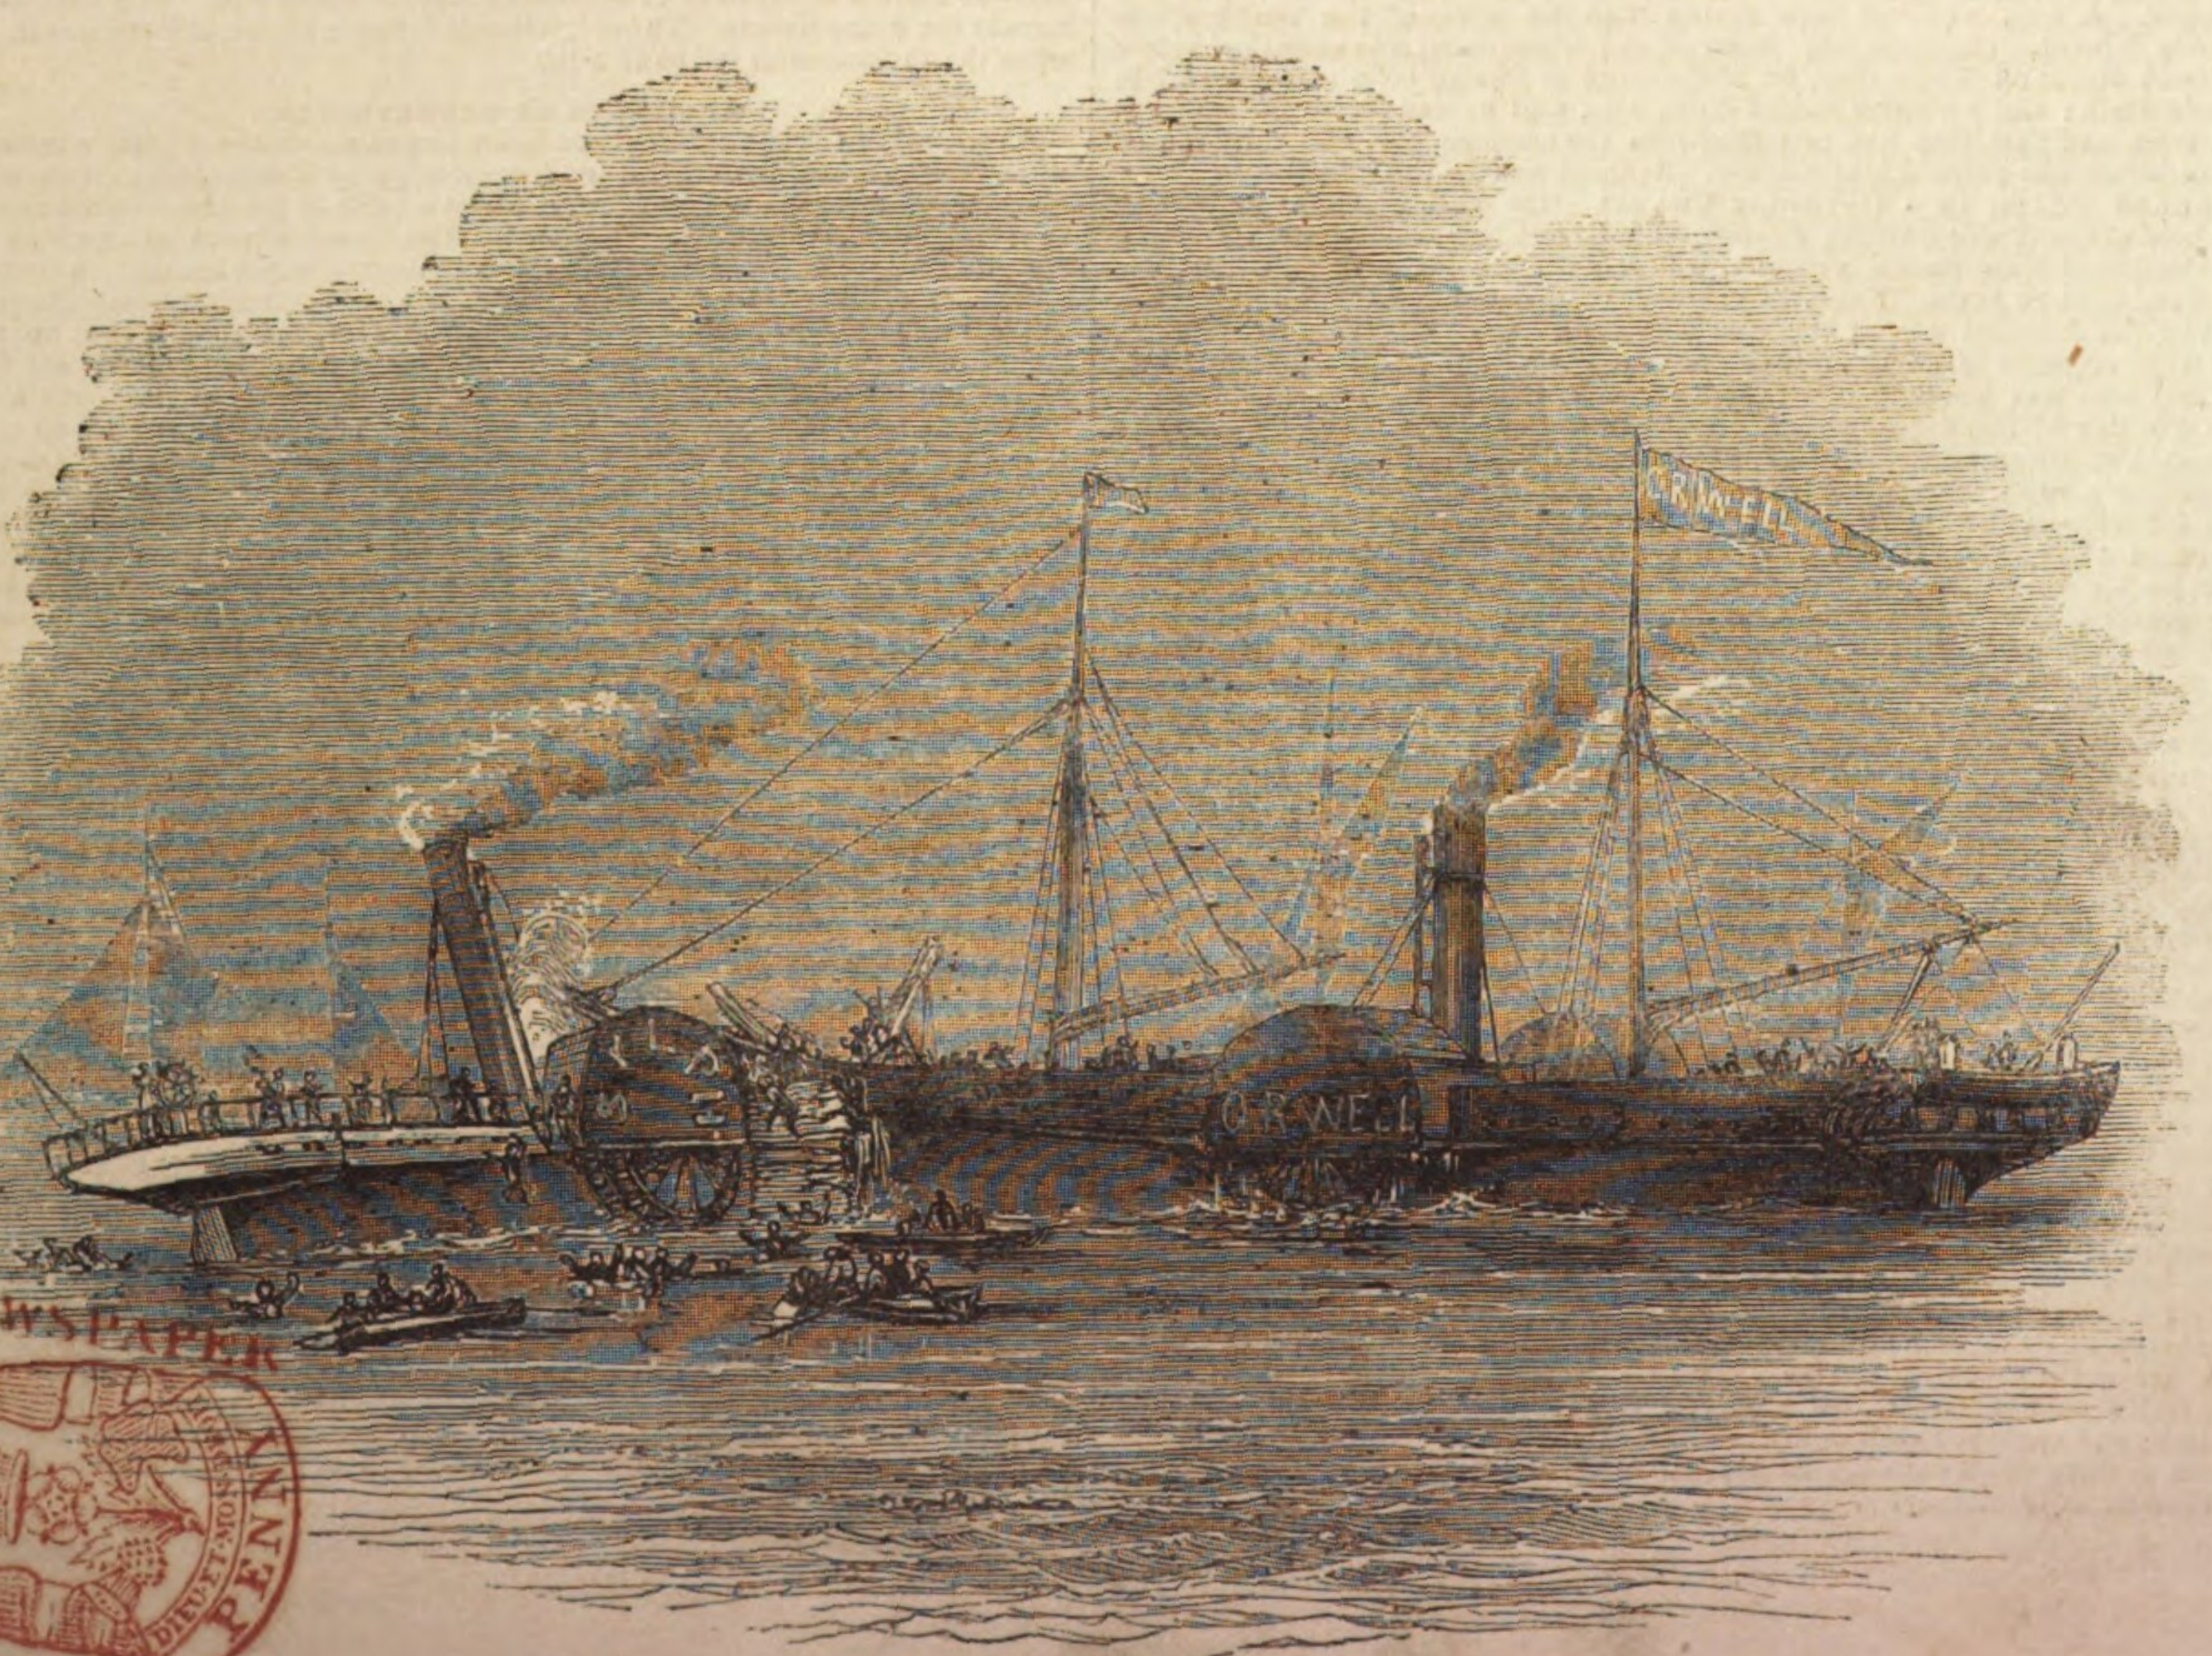
ALARMING STEAM-BOAT COLLISION.

A steam-boat collision, involving fatal results, took place on Tuesday afternoon, about half-past two o'clock.

As the Sylph, belonging to the Old Woolwich Steam-packet Company, was proceeding on her down-passage to Woolwich, having just left the Greenwich stone pier, and when off the east end of the Royal Hospital, she was run down by the Orwell (Ipswich steamer), proceeding to London-bridge-wharf. A dense fog prevailed at the time, and the shrieks of the passengers on board both vessels were heart-rending in the extreme. In an instant nearly thirty watermen put off in their boats, and arrived just in time to save several persons from the ill-fated Sylph, before she sank in deep water.

It appears that the Orwell struck the Sylph on her starboard-bow, and cut her nearly in two. Immediately on the Orwell receding from the Sylph, three of the cabin passengers were carried to the surface by the rush of water thus created. They were picked up, and taken ashore by the boats in attendance, as well as the crew of the Sylph, and numerous deck passengers who had been washed overboard. One of the officers of the Orwell rushed on board the sinking vessel, with an axe in his hand, and rescued two persons who were wedged in between the broken timbers and the vessel's side. These were also taken on shore. Some children were picked up, and taken on board the Orwell. One person, whose name is Sheppard, was taken to the Union public-house, East Greenwich, with his skull frightfully fractured, one eye knocked out, and a leg and arm broken: he is since dead. The Orwell remained with the Sylph till the last, when the Witch steam-boat, belonging also to the Old Woolwich Company, arrived, and towed, or rather dragged, the Sylph towards the south shore.

The passengers belonging to the Orwell were landed at Greenwich, and were forwarded by railway and omnibus to their respective destinations. The Orwell was much behind time, having been two days on her passage from Ipswich.

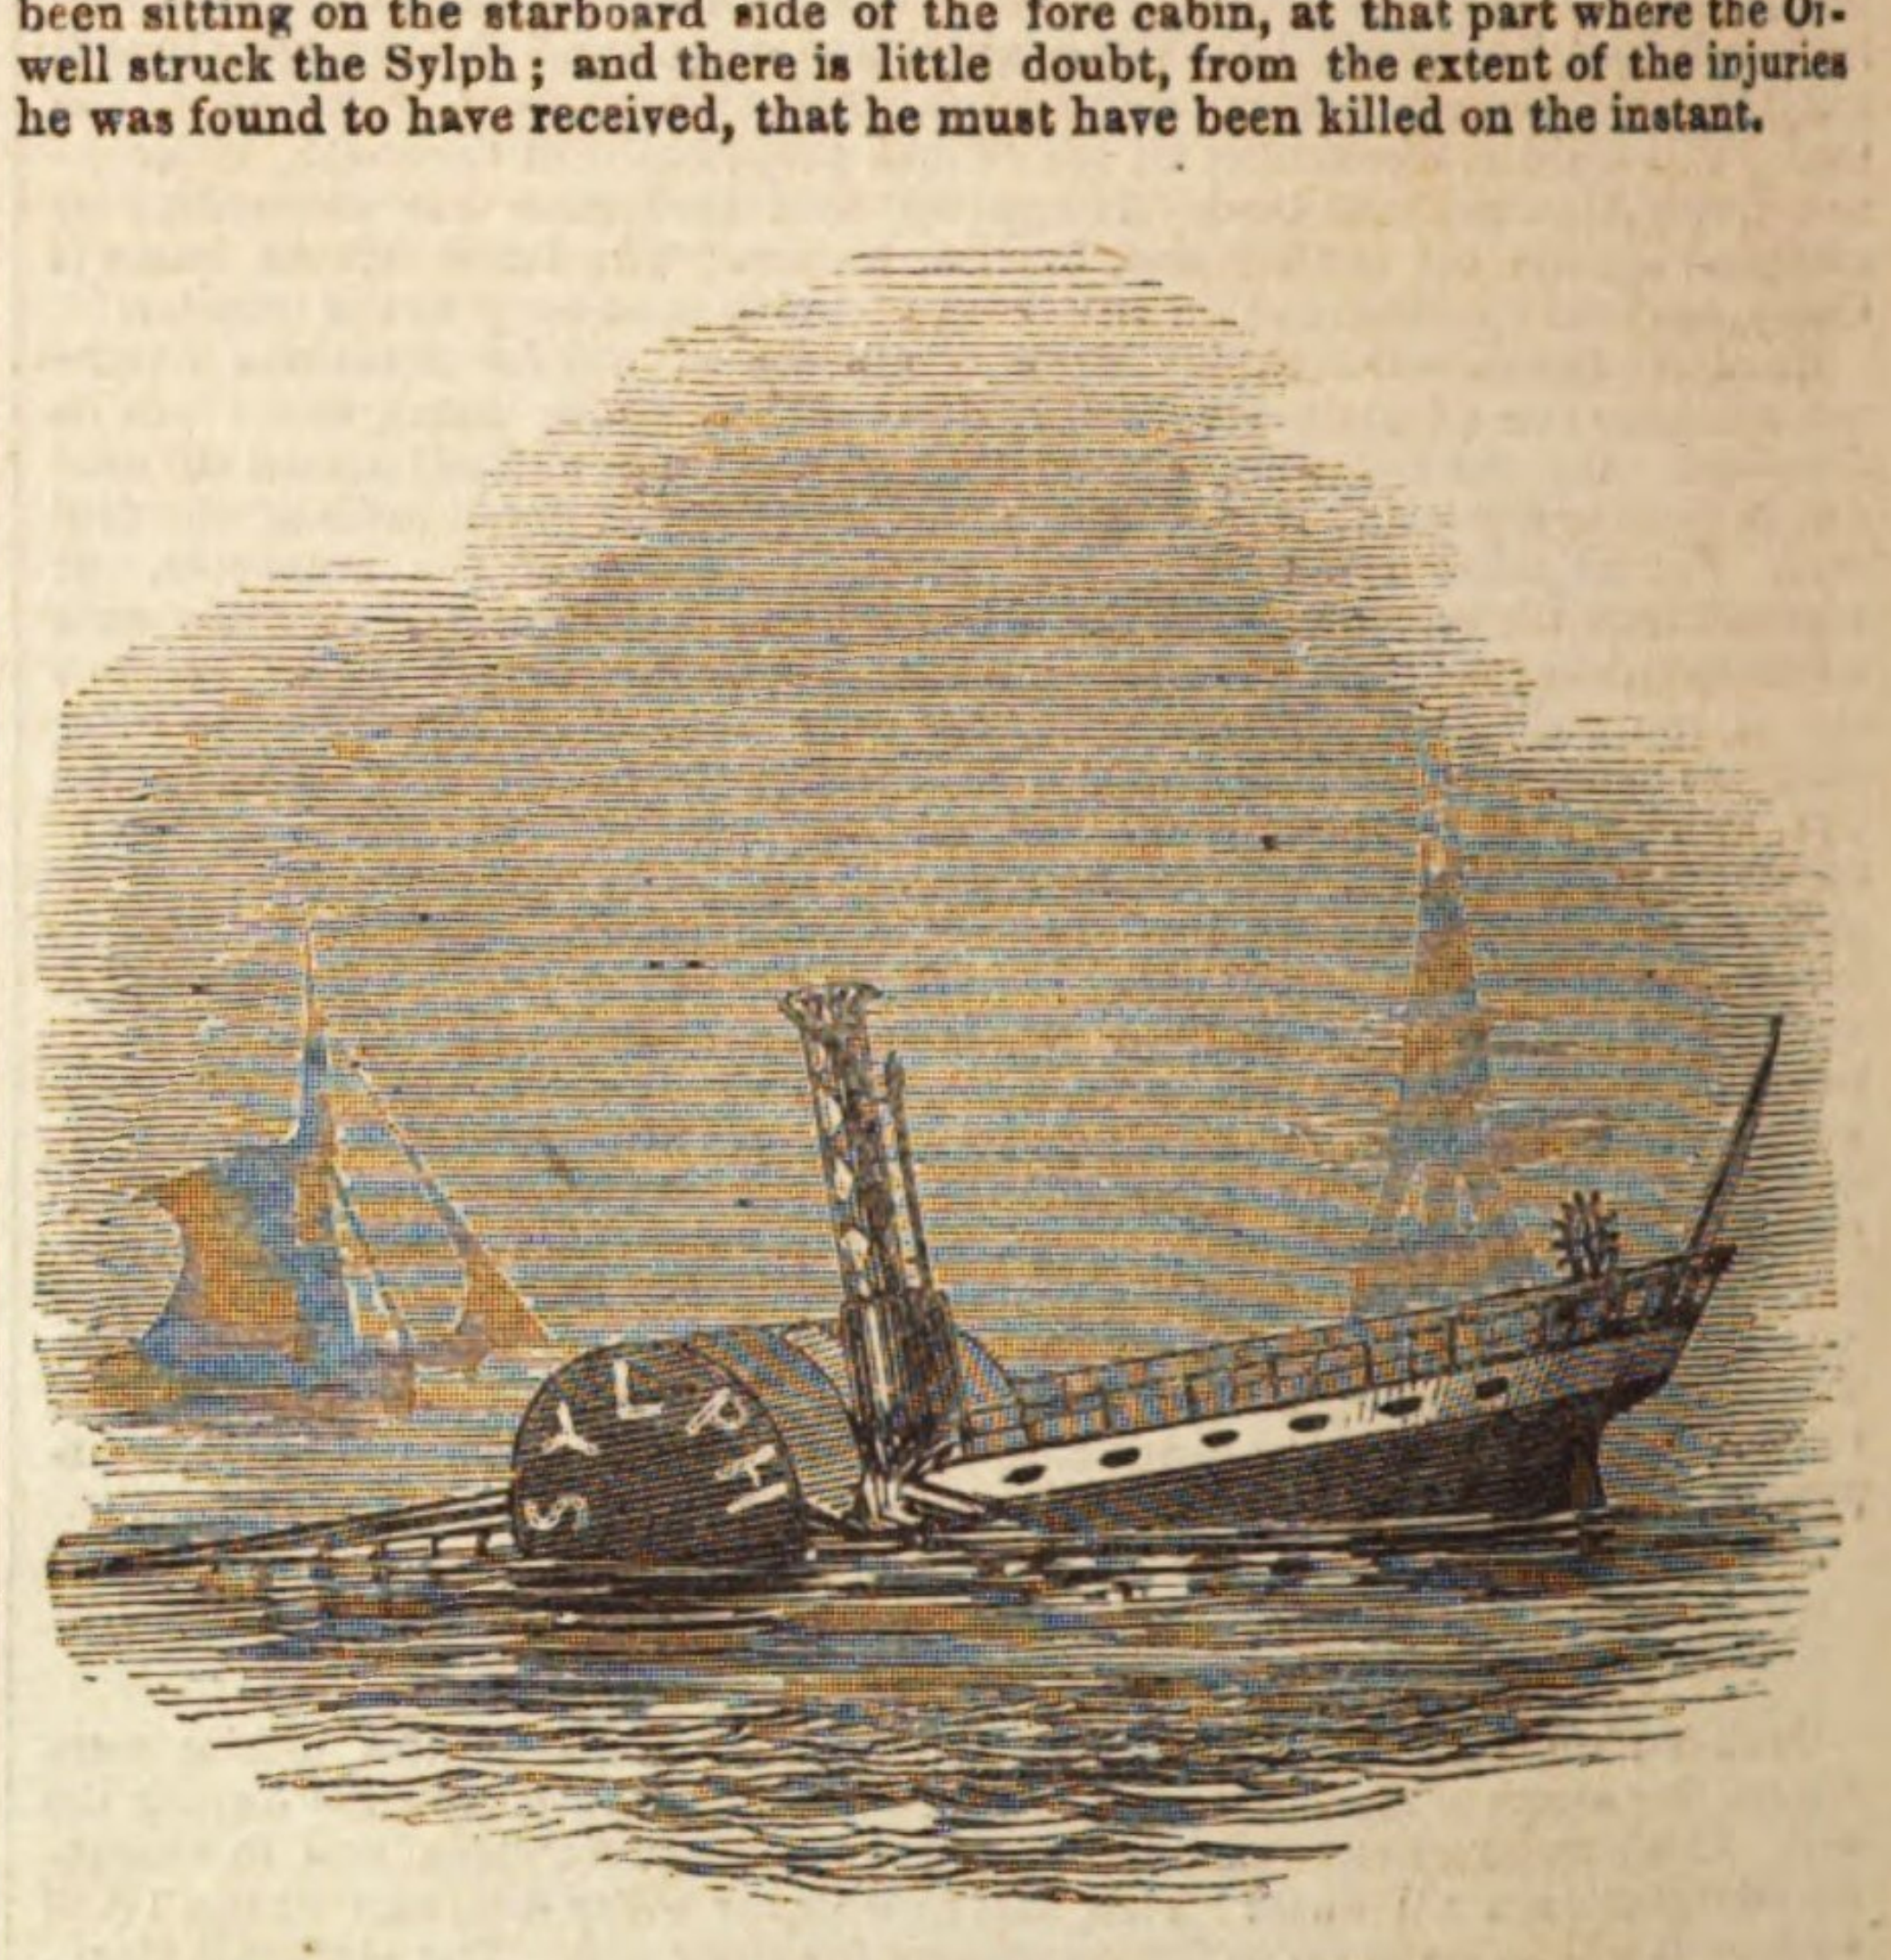


COLLISION BETWEEN "THE ORWELL" AND "SYLPH" STEAMERS, OFF GREENWICH.

NEWSPAPER
ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS

The statement of Captain S. Rackham, the commander of the Orwell, all connected with this melancholy event, is to the following effect:—The Orwell was due at five o'clock on Monday evening, but on coming up the river, and when on the other side of Gravesend, the fog was so heavy that it was found necessary to cast anchor. About nine o'clock next morning she heaved her anchor, but in consequence of the continuance of the fog she came up the river at a very slow rate. Between one and two o'clock she was off Woolwich, and was two hours making the distance from that point to Greenwich. When off the latter place the Sylph was making for the pier, and, it being high tide, she was under the necessity of going at her full speed. In crossing from the north to the south shore the Orwell came in sight of the Sylph, when the pilot, whose name is Wiggens, being at the wheel of the Orwell, seeing the danger which the smaller boat was in, called out, "Stop her; ease her," and the Orwell was backed three turns astern. Unfortunately, the Sylph was not able to clear herself; for, although the backing took place, she was struck in the fore-sponson, or in front of the paddle-box on the larboard side, and instantly filled, the figure-head of the Orwell coming across the deck of the Sylph. The cries and shrieks of the unfortunate passengers were truly alarming; but before any aid could be rendered, the Sylph pitched head downwards. The crew and passengers of the Orwell rendered every assistance, and dragged several of the ill-fated passengers through the aperture that had been made; but for this, the loss of human life must have been much greater.

From the difficulty of obtaining accurate particulars, some exaggerated accounts of the number of persons drowned obtained circulation, but from subsequent search it appears that the loss of life is confined to the two men brought ashore. Sheppard is a man well known in Greenwich and Woolwich as a carrier between the two towns. It is evident that this unfortunate man must have been sitting on the starboard side of the fore cabin, at that part where the Orwell struck the Sylph; and there is little doubt, from the extent of the injuries he was found to have received, that he must have been killed on the instant.



WRECK OF THE "SYLPH."

The other unfortunate man was a seller of oranges on board the Greenwich and Woolwich steam-boats. When taken from the wreck the poor fellow was alive, and although the greatest despatch was used in conveying him to the Dreadnought hospital-ship, he died before reaching it.

It cannot be ascertained how many persons were on board the Sylph at the time of the accident, but it is almost certain that the two abovementioned are the only sufferers.

As to the cause of the collision, there is but one opinion among those connected with the river. It is on all hands acknowledged to be the result of accident; but then some of the old pilots say, that they would not have ventured to take a vessel in such hazy weather. The Orwell, which at the time of the collision was in the charge of Mr Wiggens, pilot, received no damage whatever.

The ill-fated vessel the Sylph was only built last spring, and was an iron boat, being built on the newest principle; she was divided into three compartments—the forepart, including the fore-cabin, the engine-house, and afterpart; each of these is completely water-tight, and although one portion may be struck and knocked in, yet the other portions cannot be affected by the water; and from this circumstance alone is to be attributed the saving of some of the passengers; for the instant she filled the stern rose out of the water, and to that part all the passengers on deck rushed, where they clung hold of the seats, sides, &c., until rescued from their perilous situation. The Sylph was of about 50 tons burden, while the Orwell is of 150 tons, having two engines of 40-horse power, and has been under the command of the present captain (who, for skill and attention, bears a very high character) for about three years.

The damage done to the Sylph is very great. She is nearly cut in two just before the paddle-box, the fore part being only held on by the keel. She is a complete wreck, and it will cost a great sum to put her again afloat. Her machinery has received no further injury than what would arise from immersion.

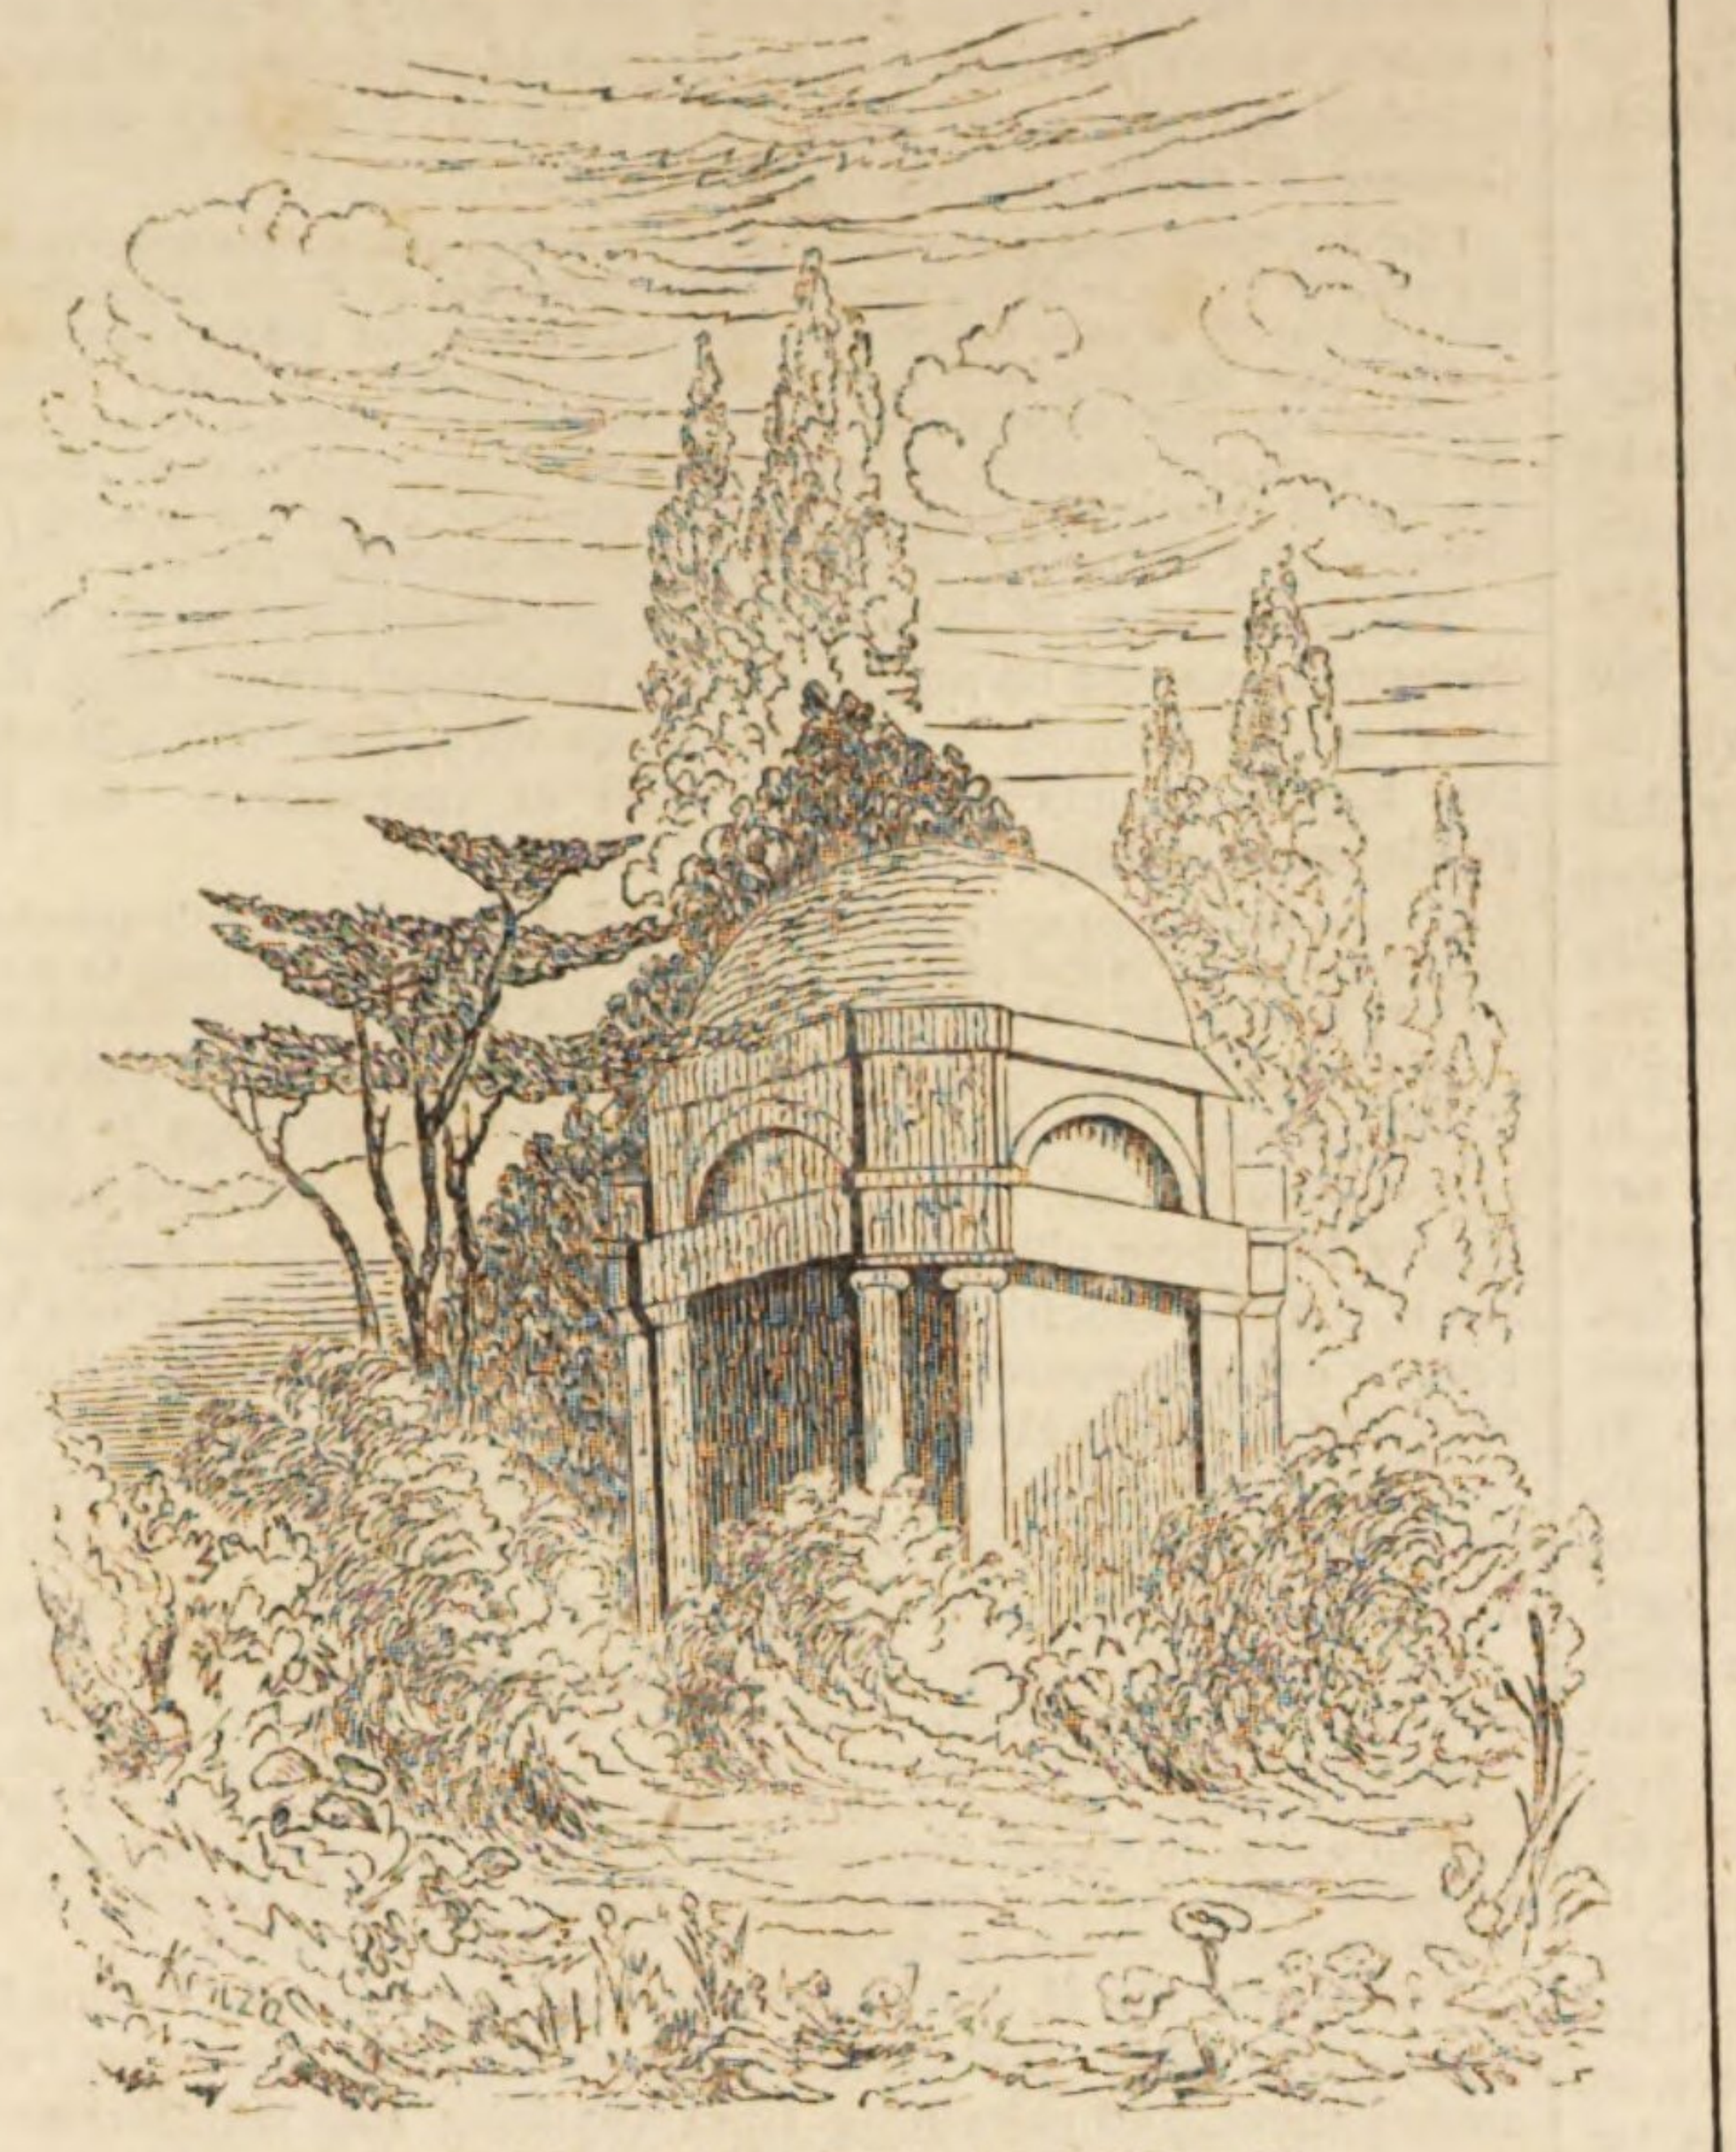
According to another version of the accident, the poor creatures in the water were struggling to keep afloat, and clutched at everything they fancied within reach. Four women who thus floated out of the cabin were secured. One of them had an infant in her arms, and holding the infant, and at the same time grasping the splinters of the wreck in the greatest possible human agony, turned to the people with the most piteous supplication, saying, "For God's sake save me." Her appeal was not made in vain, for she was saved and her child too. In the meanwhile, the crew, who had returned to the Sylph, with the assistance of the crew of the Orwell and the watermen, picked up two or three other females, one of whom was hauled out of the cabin by the steersman; and two children floating on the water were also saved and taken on board the Orwell. Just as the Orwell was coming on board, a woman was sitting on the cabin skylight, and most probably owed her life to one of the crew calling to her "For God's sake to go aft."

The others were all females. Miss Williams, of Woolwich, Mrs. Kelly, Mrs. Morris, and Mrs. Rennell, were supported to the Golden Anchor public-house, where they fainted on arriving. They were put to bed, and restoratives having been applied, they soon recovered. On board the Dreadnought three females were conveyed, named Maria Green, Rachel Tustin, and Esther Sullivan. They were put to bed, and the two latter left the ship as soon as their clothes were dry. Mrs. Green, up to two hours after the accident, had bewailed the loss of her infant, but, to her great joy, it was restored to her in safety. This poor woman received a blow on her face, but she was well enough to quit the Dreadnought on Tuesday night.

Prince Albert's Polled Ox.—On Monday, in pursuance of the desire of her Majesty, when viewing the black polled ox of the Scotch breed bred by his Royal Highness Prince Albert at Norfolk Farm, at the Smithfield Club Cattle Show on Saturday, that animal, instead of being removed to the residence of Mr. Bannister, butcher, who had purchased it for sixty guineas, was conveyed to Windsor Park, where it will in future be kept. The moment Mr. Bannister was made acquainted with the wishes of her Majesty, he intimated his desire to relinquish all claim; and, indeed, expressed a hope that her Majesty would permit him to make it a present. This, however, was declined.

BURNS' MAUSOLEUM.

In the eastern corner of St. Michael's churchyard, at Dumfries, stands a small Doric Temple, known by the name of Burns' Mausoleum, in which the remains of the poet Burns and his two children are interred. They were originally interred in the opposite corner of the churchyard, but in the year 1814, a meeting, consisting of noblemen, gentlemen, clergymen, and some of the principal citizens of Dumfries having been called, it was determined that "a Mausoleum ought to be reared over the grave of Burns." The situation in which the remains of Burns had been interred being rather low and confined in an angle of the churchyard it was found necessary to erect it in the opposite corner.



BURNS'S MAUSOLEUM, AT DUMFRIES.

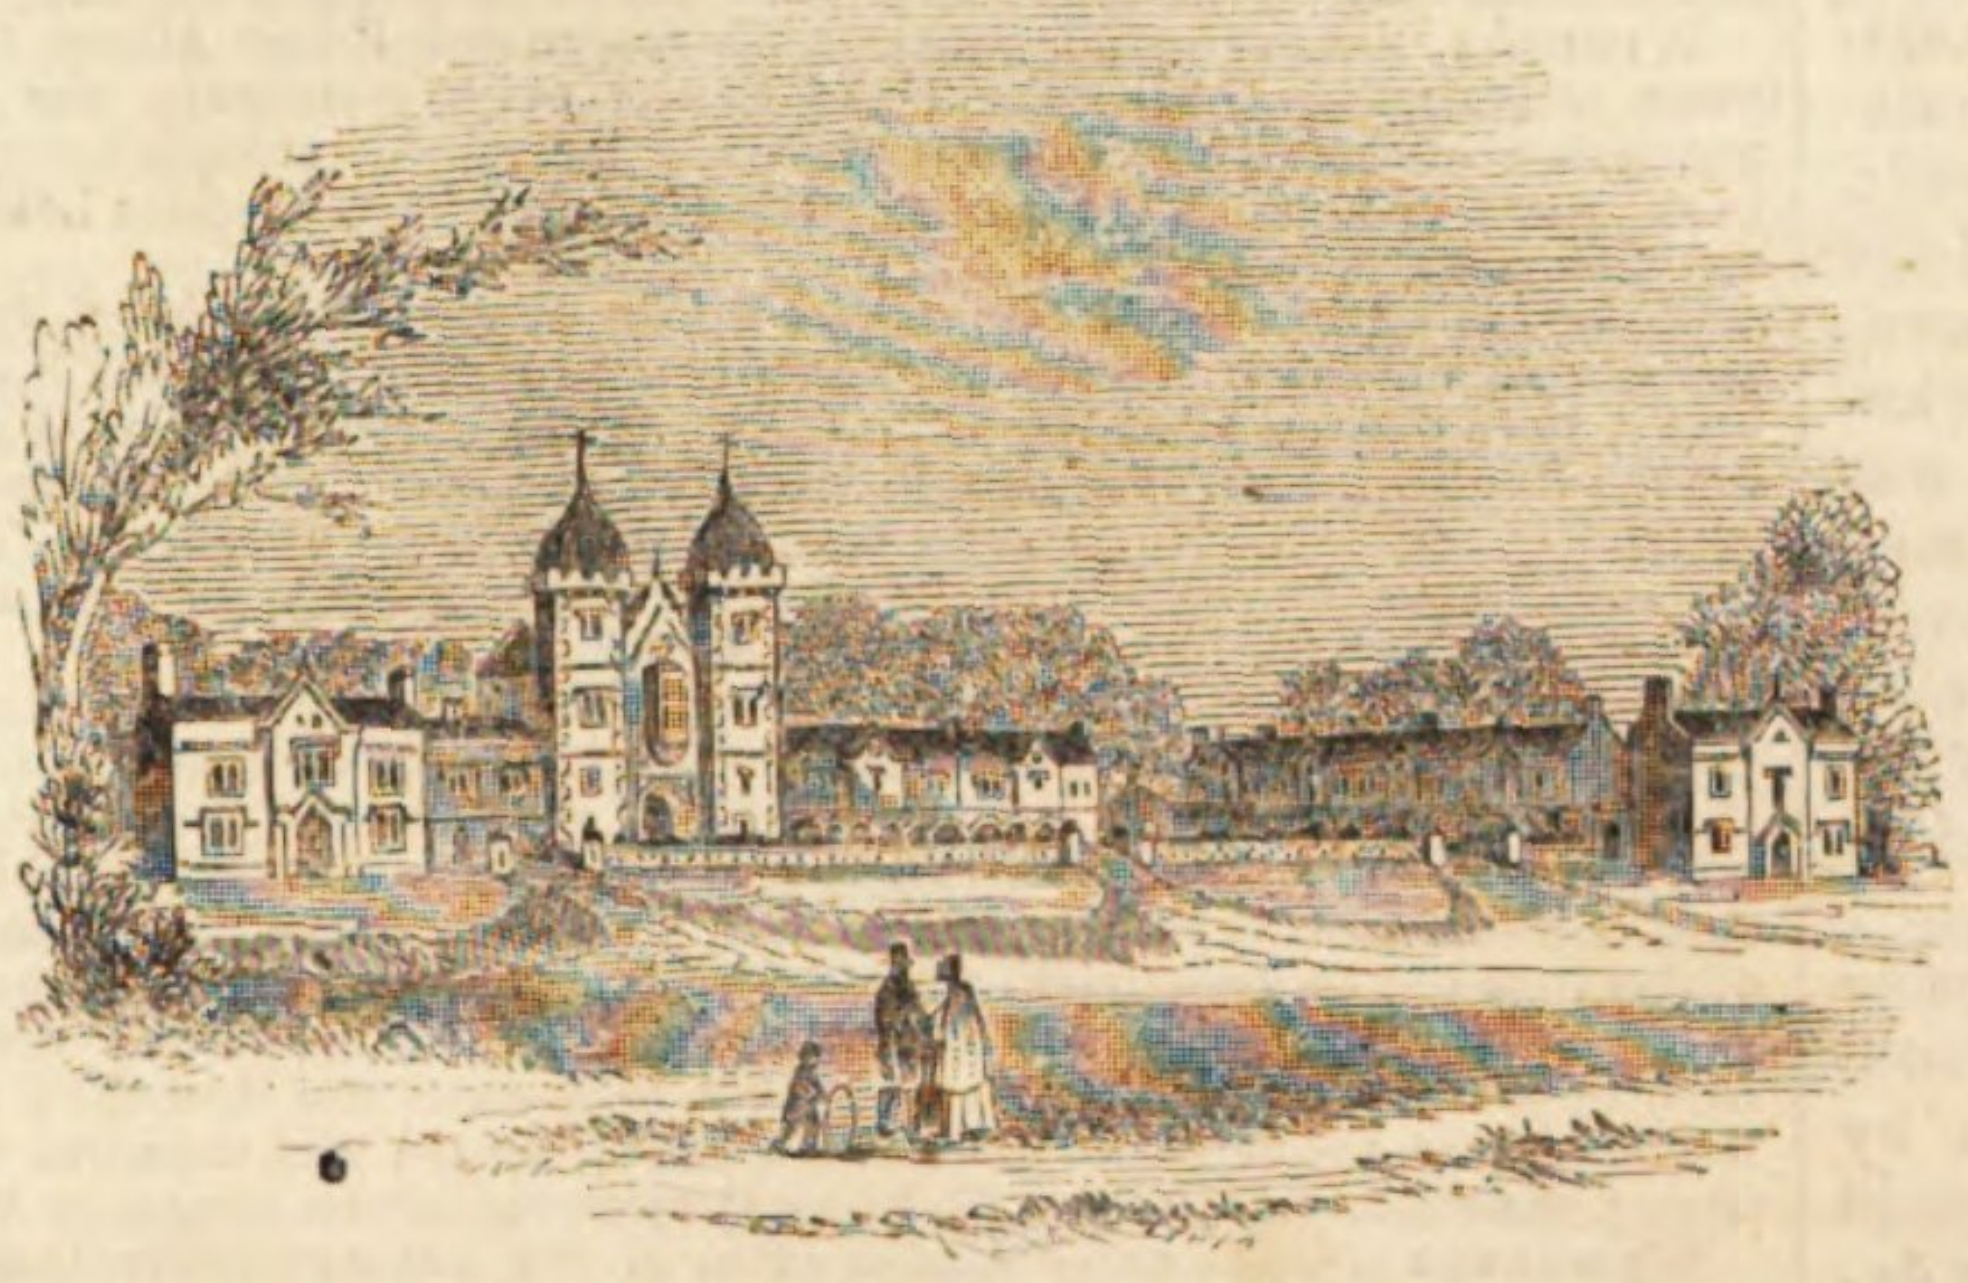
Allan Cunningham, in his "Life of Robert Burns," speaks rather sarcastically of this erection. He says:—"The body of Burns was not, however, to remain long in its place. To suit the plan of a rather showy mausoleum, his remains were removed into a more commodious spot of the same kirk-yard, on the 5th of June, 1815. The coffin was partly dissolved away; but the dark, curling locks of the poet were as glossy, and seemed as fresh, as on the day of his death. In the interior of the structure stands a marble monument, embodying with little skill or grace, that well known passage in the dedication to the Caledonian Hunt:—'The poetic genius of my country found me, as the prophetic bard Elijah did Elisha—at the plough; and threw her inspiring mantle over me.' Nor is the indifferent sculpture redeemed by the inscription. The merits of him who wrote 'Tam O'Shanter,' and 'The Cottar's Saturday Night,' are concealed in Latin. Here, as to a shrine, flock annually vast numbers of pilgrims; many, very many, are from America; not a few from France and Germany; and the list-book contains the names of the most eminent men of England, Scotland, and Ireland."

The architect was Mr. T. F. Hunt, of London.

ALMSHOUSES ON PENGE COMMON.

In our journal of last week, we corrected an error in our description of the goodly prospect from the London and Brighton Railway; the Almshouses there seen having been built for Poor, Aged, Decayed, and Maimed Free Watermen and Lightermen of the river Thames, and their Wives and Widows, and not for the Licensed Victuallers, as we stated.

The Almshouses are pleasantly situated upon Penge Common, on a piece of ground given to the Watermen's Company for the purpose, by Mr. John Dudin Brown, of Sydenham, who has also been a very liberal contributor to the asylum. The houses are intended for the reception of a portion of a large body of men who did great service to their country during the late war; and who have been thrown out of employment by the great changes that have taken place on the river Thames by the introduction of steam navigation, the building of bridges, docks, &c. Upwards of 4000 members of this body served in the Royal Navy, whilst others enrolled themselves in the various corps of River Fencibles, ready to defend their country against any sudden invasion; and, at the present time, in case of war, such a number of Free Watermen and Lightermen, as the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty shall have occasion for, are compelled to serve in the Royal Navy.

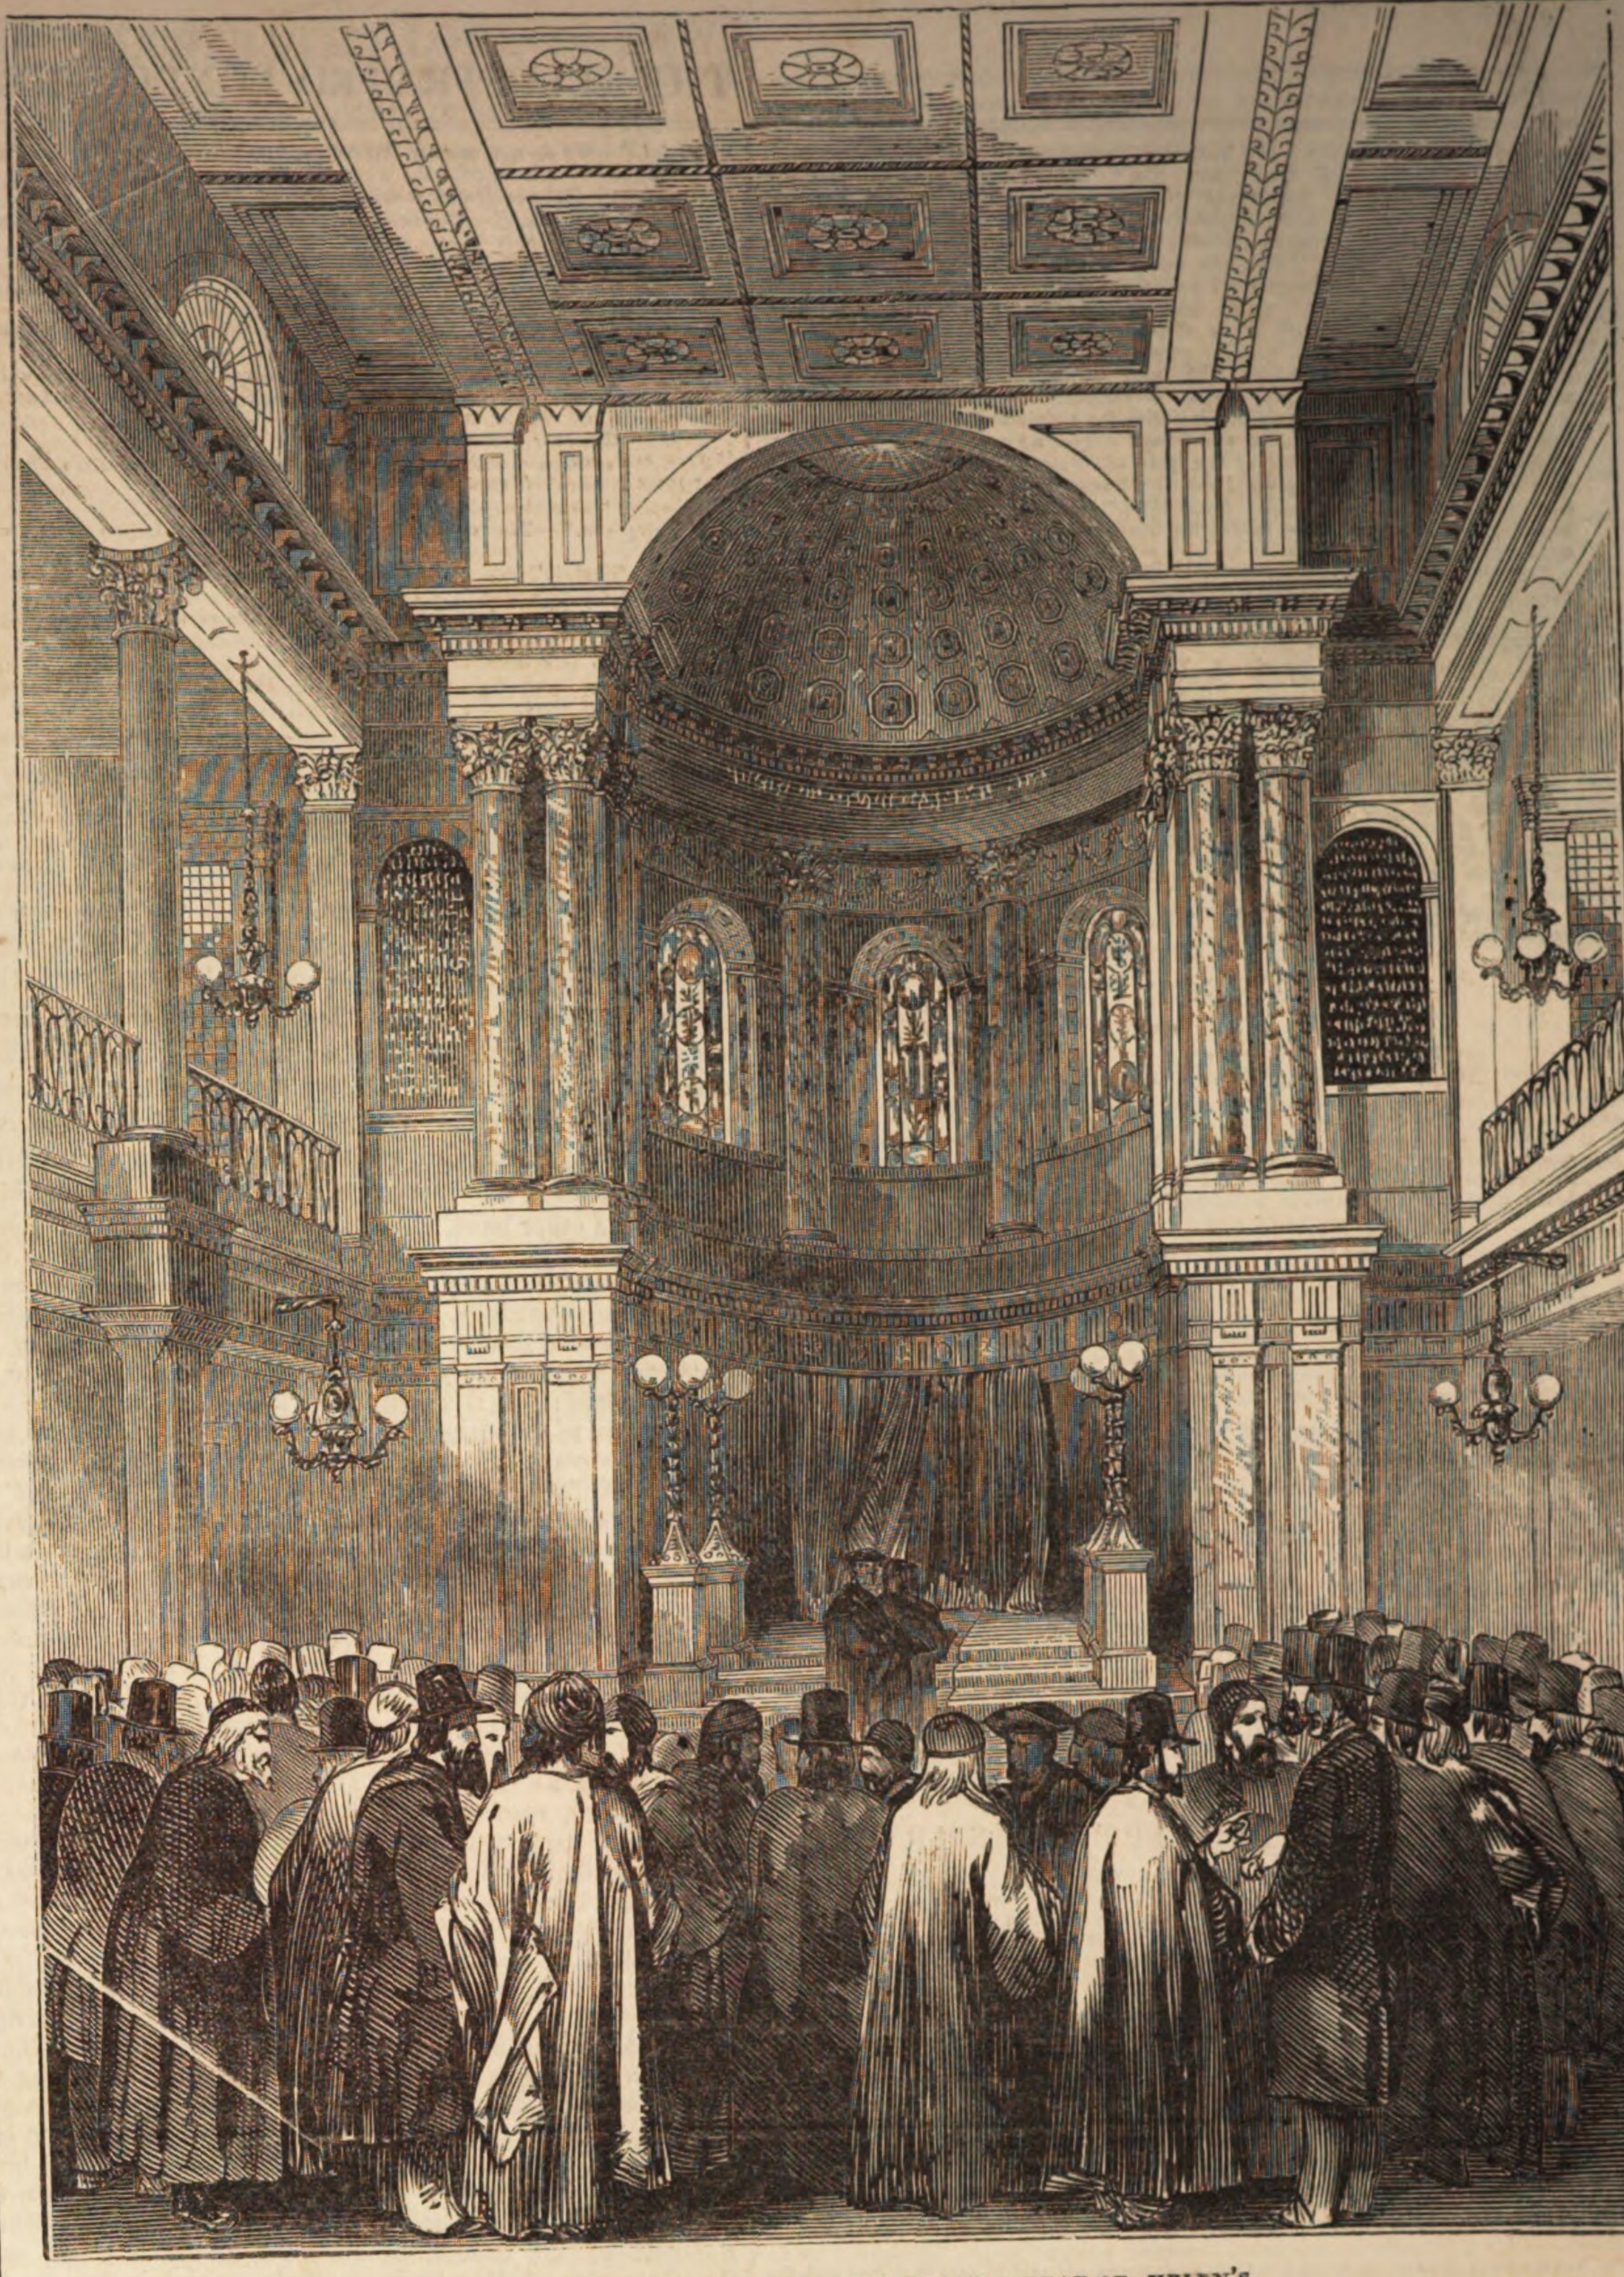


ALMS HOUSES FOR FREE WATERMEN AND LIGHTERMEN, PENGE, SURREY.

Another claim which this body has upon the consideration of the public is, that the funds arising from the Sunday ferries, which are exclusively applicable to the relief of the poor aged and decayed Watermen and Lightermen, and their Widows, and on which nearly seven hundred and fifty pensioners are now depending for support, are rapidly diminishing.

The charity is under the patronage of her Majesty the Queen Dowager; and the presidency of Mr. Alderman Lucas.

The almshouses are built in the old English style, from the designs of Mr. George Porter, architect to the Institution; and they are among the best erections of their class in the suburbs.



ELECTION OF RABBI, AT THE SYNAGOGUE, GREAT ST. HELEN'S.

ELECTION OF CHIEF RABBI OF THE JEWS.

An event has just occurred of great importance to the Jewish nation. In the absence of a High Priest, the post of Chief Rabbi of the English Jews is regarded as one of the greatest sarcedotal importance. The religious destinies of the "scattered people" may be influenced, or even consummated by his councils; he is their mediator with Heaven, the shadow of their former priests and kings, and may one day "lead them forth as sheep" to reoccupy the now desolate land of their fathers. His principles are as important as his position. A Christian bias, or even a liberal tendency in favour of a due regard to our "evidences," would expose both himself and his flocks to the displeasure of foreign synagogues, and to the certain abhorrence of the lower and less educated orders. On them, then, and on many other equally important grounds, his election is regarded with feelings of the utmost concern. The Jew can perform no more solemn official acts than in giving his vote for Chief Rabbi. It was not, therefore, without feelings of considerable interest, we went last Saturday to the synagogue of St. Helen's-place, to hear the termination of the contest announced, which ended in the elevation of the Reverend Doctor Nathan Marcus Adler to the supreme authority. A multitude was present. A din of strange sounds saluted our ear, as we visited in succession the little knots which separate religious interests had brought together. A strong eastern character was stamped on every countenance. Every man was recognised as a foreigner, and felt to be a Jew. The election was over, and the fate of the several parties sealed. Each one would, of course, have had his own man elected; but yet every one spoke of Dr. Adler in terms of kindness. He was said to be a learned man, strongly given to philosophic inquiry, and more deeply affected with the spirituality of religious observances than is usual with the Jews. A revival and a change was therefore looked for, and in that hope we left the company, but not without fear, when, in parting, we learned that the new Rabbi, who lives at Hanover, is under the special patronage of King Ernest.

The synagogue, which is the most beautiful in the metropolis, was well seen on the occasion. Our cut conveys an accurate idea of it.

NEW CAB.

Perhaps a greater change has not taken place in anything which comes under the immediate observation of the public, than in the various metamorphoses the street cabs have undergone during the last few years.

Vehicles of all kinds have been started as candidates for public favour, some of which have survived the ordeal of public opinion, and others condemned to return from whence they came, and from thence to no one knows where, for they have not been visible since. We have had Broughams, which are now the most numerous; then came the "pill box" cab, which seemed to have been constructed for no other purpose than allowing the "fare" cheat the driver with impunity by quietly letting himself out—while the unconscious cabman proceeded to his destination vainly anticipating being paid for "the job." This was fatal to the existence of the "pill box," and it was consequently consigned to an early tomb. This was succeeded by "Hanson's Patent Safety," which may be called the aristocratic cab, for no first-rate man on town would think of stepping into any other: they are also great favourites with the public generally, being always first off "the stand." We have since had the "Tribus," which, though compact and handsome, does not possess any great advantages over the Brougham—yet its appearance will always carry the day with the uninitiated. The last improvement which has appeared is that which our engraving represents; it is the invention of Mr. Okey, landlord of the Hero of Waterloo, in the Waterloo-road who is also the builder and proprietor. It is constructed to carry four inside, and is, consequently, to be called a "Quartobus." Its appearance is very compact and elegant; and to a person seated inside, has an unusually light and pleasing appearance.

The great improvement consists in the front and hind wheels being not more than a foot apart, the draught being consequently much easier than in the old cabs, the wheels of which are nearly five feet asunder.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 21, 1844.

THE quarrel between the Ministry and the Directors of the East India Company, was apparently concluded by the concurrence of both parties in the appointment of Sir H. Hardinge as the successor of Lord Ellenborough; but if forgiven, we doubt if the display of independence on the part of the Directors has been forgotten. The approaching Session will, it is more than probable, prove that it is not. The conduct of the Board will be exposed to a scrutiny that we hope will clear up the mystery that has shrouded the matter ever since it occurred; and the Ministry will, on the other hand, be put on its defence, for so decidedly accusing a body of men generally believed to be rather the reverse of rash or flighty, of "gross indiscretion," in removing a servant whose writings, sayings, and doings, they had reason to think somewhat dangerous. If a restriction of the power of the Directors is not actually attempted, it will at least be canvassed and discussed: this is inevitable. The question will then arise, if a transfer of their authority is made to the Government at once, either by vesting it in the Board of Control, or the Foreign or Colonial Offices, will the affairs of India be better administered, either for this country, or for the interests of the Indian Empire itself? On this point, the Directors will have a strong case, not founded perhaps so much on their own good policy, as from the errors and mismanagement they can point out in the conduct of the Ministers of the Crown in past times, with something of a tendency to the same failings in the present. A great deal is said of the necessity of having all power vested in Ministers duly appointed by, and responsible to, the Crown. There is a good deal in a phrase, and much may be done with its aid till it comes to be examined. The responsibility of Ministers, in modern times, resolves itself, for the most part, into this:—After a tolerably long course of what their own party call successful policy, and their opponents stigmatise as blundering, and when they can no longer command a "working majority," they resign, leaving a legacy of financial and other difficulties to their successors. With a majority, a Minister has no fear of what is called responsibility, and without one, no man will ever be in the position that incurs it. What security has responsibility been against Governments pursuing the most mischievous courses? The responsible Ministers of the Crown were those who, by ignorance and obstinacy, lost the American Colonies. We had a responsible Ministry not many years ago that suffered Canada to break out into open rebellion before it could be driven to proper activity. And, to come down to the present time, have we not had the bitterest complaints from our Colonies of the conduct of Downing-street? At this moment the Governor of New Zealand is said to be deluging the Colony with paper money: the denouncers of the last regulation of the Currency should emigrate immediately. All sorts of things are done in Colonies that are never heard of here, and if they do turn up awkwardly in Parliament, the Minister for the time being has the "office" to fall back on, and by clever special pleading and piles of documents, generally has the best of it; if more than usually hard pressed, he can assert his "responsibility," and farther than this the attack cannot be pressed. The fact is, our Colonies have outgrown the possibility of being governed by one man, and he wholly unacquainted with them, placed at some thousands of miles distance, and tossed in and out at every change of political influence. Our Colonial-office is the growth of ages,—in some shape or other is as old as the Corporation of the East India House. That quiet, permanent body of merchants, holding no seals of office, and not mixing in political intrigues as the means of gaining political power, have built up and established an empire that has no equal in the present, and has scarcely had an equal in the past. Their government has produced the ablest statesmen, diplomatists, and generals of the last century: the conqueror of Napoleon himself was formed by his early campaigns in India. Looking at the men that have been chosen by the Colonial-office for Colonial Governors, and seeing how often political influence, and nothing else, has procured their nomination, it would be a rash assertion to say that under the same system we should have established as great an empire as we now govern in the East.

On comparing results, a calm judgment on both would decide that if any change is required, it should rather be one that would assimilate the Government of the Colonies to the system by which the affairs of India are managed, than one that should place India under the unchecked authority of the Crown by delivering it over to a "department," with a minister at its head who could give but little security as to his policy, except that he would be "responsible." A great system is long in breaking up, but with a governing head, engaged in all the conflicts of party, at a great distance, and compelled to see every thing through an atmosphere of routine and red-tapeism, our Indian empire would not hold together for one generation. It is well, then, that the public should look a little at results, and be prepared for the discussion that is inevitably at hand.

THE dinner given to Sir H. Pottinger at Liverpool, has far more interest than the banquet given to the same distinguished negotiator in London. At the latter there was little but the usual fluent compliments that come so naturally and are forgotten so soon, a little mutual official flattery between Lord Palmerston and the Earl of Aberdeen, and a short address from the guest of the evening that might as fitly have been spoken anywhere else or another occasion, being little more than one of those "neat and appropriate" addresses incumbent on every man to deliver in reply to the personal honour of a toast. But at Liverpool there has been a great improvement on this; the speeches are more characteristic, and take a wider range; they go beyond the threadbare congratulations of the concord that led two Ministries of opposite politics to agree in pursuing one line of policy in relation to China; and contain some remarks on that great empire and its inhabitants themselves, which contain information or opinions of value and weight. The speech of Sir H. Pottinger, for instance, gives some account of the spirit in which he conducted the negotiations, from which it appears that he acted more as a mediator for adjusting differences between the two parties, than as the agent of England demanding terms and enforcing conditions of peace. He also furnishes some particulars of the Chinese authorities with whom he had to deal, and they give a favourable idea of the Chinese character, at least as it is displayed by the rulers of the people. We have heard much of the craft, cunning, and double-dealing of the Chinese, and among the common mass in ordinary affairs, there is doubtless more than enough of it; an undue love of gain, and an overreaching spirit, are the vices of commerce, and of them the Chinese have not the exclusive possession. But among their negotiators and governors are to be found men of sound and clear views, great knowledge of business, and the power of adapting their policy to altered circumstances, which indicate a high degree of cultivation, though of a different kind from our own. Thus Sir H. Pottinger says of the Chinese High Commissioner, Ke-Ing:—

> I believe, there does not exist an individual with more statesmanlike views in any country in the world—a man by feeling conscious of all the amenities of life, and particularly alive to that feeling which actuated and influenced those negotiations and characterised his conduct throughout. I could, if it were admissible in such a society and on such an occasion, relate to you instances of Ke-Ing's conduct as would astonish you; and I trust, that on some future occasion, her Majesty's Government will—if it were only to do him and the Chinese character generally justice—make his despatches and letters public.

The suggestion of making these documents public we strongly hope will be acted on; if faithfully translated, the "Blue Book" they would furnish would be what very few "Blue Books" of this kind are—entertaining as well as instructive. Sir Henry Pottinger again says:—

> If those despatches and letters were published, it would not only astonish you, but all the world, to find such sentiments as they contain, expressed by one whom we have been in the habit of considering a self-secluded Chinese Mandarin.

We have evidently rather underrated the talents of the Chinese Government, and we only require more knowledge to arrive at juster opinions of them. But, leaving this personal topic, Sir Henry Pottinger alludes to the treaty itself, which he again repeats (as if for the benefit of the wilfully ignorant conductors of the French press), secures to all the nations of the world the same advantages as England. It is no exclusive compact with this country; it was made by England, indeed, but it was in the name of the whole civilised world, and not for her own exclusive benefit. This was an advantage quickly perceived by the Chinese:—

> The moment that I explained to the High Commissioner, Ke-Ing, the great advantages which must follow from such a provision in the treaty which I had the honour of conducting—advantages to China and to all other nations affected by it—he immediately concurred in my views and co-operated with my exertions, and did me the honour of requesting that, in case of any unforeseen difficulty arising in future, between China and those other European nations, I might act as the mediator between them, as the representative of England.

The advice Sir H. Pottinger gives of the necessity in our future intercourse with the Chinese, of conciliating the lower classes among them, and refraining from anything like interference with their political affairs, is valuable; and his opinion of the "incredible" and "unlimited" demand there is likely to be in that empire for our manufactures will be most satisfactory to those on whom the assertions of the market there being already overstocked, may have made some impression. Lord Stanley enlarged more freely on the questions involved in the proceedings than his colleague, the Earl of Aberdeen, on the occasion before alluded to. He enforced the necessity of the strictest observance of honour and good faith in all our transactions with the Chinese, and gave the following testimony, decisive from a Ministry, and referring no doubt to the punctual payment of the instalments of the ransom.

> We have heard the Chinese spoken of as a tricky and over-reaching people, and that there may be such persons amongst them, particularly amongst the inferior dealers, I have no doubt; but I do not believe that such is the general character of the Chinese nation. On the contrary, so far as our later experience has gone, it has led me to believe that there is no nation which more highly values public faith in others than the Chinese; and, up to the present moment, I must say that there never was a government or a nation which more strictly and literally fulfilled the engagements into which it has entered.

He concluded by an impressive warning, that the Government, by arms and negotiations, had done its part, and that the issue was now intrusted to the merchants of England; and to them it may safely be left. It is a great credit to the men of Liverpool that they should have given so high a tone and so interesting a character to the proceedings of their complimentary dinner to Sir H. Pottinger. What was London about that its banquet was so commonplace in comparison with it?

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

On Saturday last the Queen and Prince Albert came to town to see the cattle show. Her Majesty and the Prince returned to Windsor to dinner.

The Queen and Prince Albert came to the door of the principal entrance to take leave of their Royal relatives. His Royal Highness Prince Albert rode out on horseback, attended by Major-General Sir Edward Bowater. The Countess of Charlemont has succeeded the Marchioness of Douro as the Lady in Waiting on the Queen. Viscount Hawarden has succeeded the Earl of Hardwicke as the Lord in Waiting on her Majesty; and Admiral Sir Robert Otway has succeeded Colonel Berkeley Drummond as the Groom in Waiting.

WINDSOR, THURSDAY EVENING.—(From our own Correspondent.)—In consequence of the unfavourable state of the weather during the whole of the day, her Majesty has been prevented from taking her usual airing. The infant Royal Family have also, from the same cause, been confined within the Royal residence. His Royal Highness Prince Albert, attended by Major General Sir Edward Bowater, took equestrian exercise in the New Riding-school. In consequence of her Majesty being slightly indisposed yesterday evening, the military band and her Majesty's private band were countermanded. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, attended by Lady Fanny Howard and the Countess of Wratislaw, had the honour of dining at the Castle this evening.

DEATH OF LADY ANNE SMITH.—Lady Anne Culling Smith, daughter of the Earl of Mornington, died at Hampton Court Palace on Monday. This highly respected lady was sister of the late Marquis Wellesley, of the present Earl of Mornington, the Duke of Wellington, Lord Cowley, and of the Hon. and Rev. Dr. Wellesley.

LEAMINGTON SPA, Dec. 16.—Among the latest arrivals are Lord and Lady Montagu, the Baron Philipp Waldenorff, Sir George and Lady Scovell, the Countess Alexander Dembinska, and the Duke of Sutherland's family. THE LATE EARL OF LIMERICK.—The remains of the late Earl of Limerick lay in state on Sunday last, at South-hill Park. The hall and two of the principal apartments were prepared for this solemn occasion, and ingress was freely given to all who presented themselves between the hours of two and four o'clock. At ten o'clock on Tuesday morning the mournful cavalcade left South-hill Park for Ireland.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH.—The Earl of Ellenborough, who has been visiting the Marquis of Salisbury at Hatfield House, has returned to Southam, where he intends to remain until after the Christmas recess.

The Marquis of Lansdowne has sustained some injury in his foot, which is so severe as to prevent the Noble Marquis from quitting Bowood for the present.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

"An unaccustomed spirit Lifts me above the ground with cheerful thoughts."—SHAKSPEARE.

All hail to the "southerly wind" which has blown us, once more, open weather! Being Metropolitans, we cannot be expected to offer an equally cordial greeting to the "cloudy sky." The hounds are again up and at it; the cover rings with the music of the tin tube, more tuneable than all the silver Saxhorns that ever were inflated, and hunters on two legs and on four "are lifted above the ground with cheerful thoughts." O, youth of spirit! thou hast been afield? If not, we conjure thee by the shade of Diana to cultivate a day with the Quorn. Even ask thy governor's permission: unless his heart be colder than congelation he wont refuse. The thing's as "easy as lying"—four hours by rail, and there you are up to the eyes in the cream of Leicestershire! The preparation is quite as simple, remember simple, that's the English for gentlemanly. Anything "spicy" in cattle or costume is wilful murder on propriety. Anderson should furnish you animals—he has always a select assortment fit to go at a moment's notice at that jewel of a box of his, Old Oak Farm. We need not add another word about your stud. Then the personal turn out. Of course, you will case in complete pink—it's as old as Henry the (—— ?), and very becoming to boot. Apropos des bottes dont patronize the pack; let them be orthodox tops, well got up, though not to the extent of liquid constructed of champagne and apricot jam. The most important article of your toilet, however, will be the "ineffables"—of these, the secret is that the supply be unlimited; order your buckskin builder, in short, in the words of the immortal Brummel, to "keep everlastingly sending leather breeches." Thus, in a short-nap beaver, that has seen some service, spurs, not too long in the neck, but still spurs, which are the rudders of unruly steeds, and a Malacca crop, with a lash you may go forth to a meet at Barkby or Widmerpool like a finished gentleman from top to toe.

The farrier of Melton, as the metropolis of the chase, is known to every man with a soul above buttons—no scandal meant as regards tailors. Though it boasts not so remote an origin as some of its contemporaries, the Quorn Hunt is no parvenu. It was founded towards the middle of the last century, by that Nestor of Sportsmen Hugo Meynell, and has since enjoyed the patronage of a series of hunting sages. In 1800, Mr. Meynell sold his hounds and horses to the late Lord Sefton, who carried on a princely career at Melton. Then came Thomas Asheton Smith—Tom Smith, No. 1—and if he wasn't the broth of a boy in the field, then is Captain Barclay a milksop. Lord Foley succeeded Tom, and then came the squire—that Crichton of British Sportsmen—George Osbaldeston. To this day Leicestershire had reached its zenith; its hounds could fly, and so could its horses—and as for its riders, they were the sort to get across a country—men that when they came to a felo de se place, used to send their hearts over first, and then follow them. After Mr. Osbaldeston Lord Southampton took the country—then the lamented Sir Harry Goodricke—then Mr. Rowland Errington—Lord Suffield—Mr. Thomas Hodgson, and last, not least, Mr. Greene, of Rollestone, who has earned as well merited a popularity as ever was bestowed upon any Master of the Quorn. As Leicester is a railway station, and a most convenient place as a residence for those who desire to hunt with this distinguished pack, the following meets are given, with their distance from that town.

TATTERSALL'S.—MONDAY.

The Derby betting was more animated than usual, leading to various fluctuations, and holding out no slight encouragement to the round betters. The most decided favourites were Idas, Pam, Calypso's dam, Old England, and the Rebecca colt, the odds respectively averaging 18 to 1, 22 to 1, 33 to 1, 33 to 1, and 35 to 1, all taken with avidity except the latter. The Cobweb colt, Anti-Repealer, and Young Eclipse were on the totter. The other favourites maintained the previous quotations. The question in regard to the qualification of Iron Master is before the stewards, and will be decided after Christmas. Mr. Crockford's account was proceeded with to a considerable extent, and on the surface all was remarkably placid, but we hear that two or three are contumacious and that the power of the Jockey Club is very likely to be tested.

BOAT RACE BETWEEN CLASPER AND COOMBES, AT NEWCASTLE.—This long-expected match between the champions of the north and south waters came off on Wednesday; the distance being from Tyne-bridge to Lemington Point, for £180—Coombes staking £100 to Clasper's £80. At the appointed signal they started, Coombes gradually drawing a-head; when off Skinner Burn, Clasper unfortunately run into a keel—an accident which his opponent did not take advantage of as he might have done, but kept leading him by about five or six boats' length; when, however, he had got this distance, he ceased to exert himself as powerfully as he had done, apparently reserving his strength for any push which Clasper might make. At this time £40 to £10 was offered upon Coombes, and accepted. At the Curds and Cream House Clasper made a desperate effort, and decreased the distance between them to about 80 yards, and, that space apart, they rowed beautifully evenly to the winning-point, neither of them gaining or losing scarcely an inch in the whole distance, which was done in 34½ minutes. The race was good throughout, and has added to the fame of both the men. A dispute took place in consequence of an alleged infringement of the articles of agreement, and the matter was submitted to a referee. A letter has since been received stating that the referee has ordered that the stakes shall be paid to Coombes.

ASSIZE INTELLIGENCE.

ATROCIOUS MURDER BY A WOMAN AT BURY ST. EDMUND'S.—Mary Sherring, aged 51, was tried for the murder of John Sherring, by arsenic, on the 30th of July last. From the evidence adduced in the progress of this painful case, it appeared that the prisoner resided at the village of Martlesham, near Woodbridge, Suffolk, with her husband, an honest, hardworking labourer, their family consisting of a daughter, Elizabeth, aged 14, and two boys, respectively 10 and 3 years; besides these children, however, this couple had two other daughters, Matilda, who lived out at service in the neighbourhood, and Caroline, who was also in service at Lowestoft. This latter girl had, about three years ago, given birth to an illegitimate boy, who had been thrown on her parents for support and protection. After that unfortunate occurrence, his mother again had another son, whose untimely death was the subject of the present inquiry. He also, together with his frail mother, became an inmate of the prisoner's roof about three weeks after Whitsuntide, he being then only four or five weeks old. Soon after the deceased and his mother came home, the prisoner was frequently heard to complain of their situation, and of the fact that no allowance had been made to her by the father of John. In the course of a conversation with Mrs. Brett, a neighbour, she said one day, about a fortnight before the death of the child, that, "If no allowance was made something must be done; if they got no assistance to the union-house they must all go," appearing, at the same time, to be in great distress of mind. In about a week afterwards, at a time when the deceased was in perfect health, she went to the village coffin-maker, and said that "John Sherring was very bad, and that there would soon be a job for a coffin;" and on the evening of Tuesday, the 30th of July, about 8 o'clock, she went hurriedly to Mrs. Brett, requesting her presence and aid, as her daughter Caroline was at Woodbridge, and "her child was overwhelmed with sickness." On going into the cottage Mrs. Brett found the poor thing lying in Elizabeth Sherring's lap, retching and straining violently, his eyes ready to start from their sockets, and his mouth covered with foam. In the absence of anything else, the neighbour suggested an emetic, but the prisoner said, "No, that will do him no good; he will not be here many hours." "Dear me," said Mrs. Brett, "why, what have you been giving him?" when the prisoner answered, "nothing but pap." No doctor was sent for, and in the night the sufferer died. Although no indecent haste was observed in the funeral, rumour soon began to busy herself about the cause of the death, and one day the prisoner went angrily to Mrs. Brett, and, accusing her of talking about the child, threatened to "make her jump for it" if she repeated her scandal. In spite of this, however, the neighbours still talked, and it being about that time ascertained that the prisoner had bought some arsenic a fortnight before the death, "to poison rats," as she said (when she had received a solemn caution as to its use and danger), it was determined by the authorities that the body should be exhumed, and subjected to chemical analysis, when the presence of arsenic was detected. The prisoner was taken into custody. The evidence proved, among other things, that she had actually registered the death of her grandson long before he died, and just at the time she bought the arsenic, and had assigned to the registrar the very causes of death, viz., "convulsions and retchings," which did afterwards mark his exit from life. When called on for her defence, she varied her previous statement as to the disposition of the arsenic, and endeavoured to screen herself at the expense of her daughters, Elizabeth and Matilda, one of whom she said had found, or shown to her in a drawer the paper in which she had originally put away the arsenic in a shed, while she insinuated that she had on one occasion missed about one-third part of the poison soon after she had bought it. The jury found her guilty, and Mr. Justice Williams sentenced her to be hanged.

SENTENCE OF DEATH FOR MURDER.—At the Liverpool Assizes, George Evans, a young man aged twenty, was tried before Mr. Baron Gurney, on a charge of the wilful murder of Jane Millen, at Manchester, on the 14th of August last. He was charged with doing it, in the first count, by inflicting a wound on the forehead with an iron bar; in the second, by a blow on the back of the head; in the third, by strangulation; and in the fourth, by both means—those of strangulation and the blows. The jury found him "Guilty," and the Judge sentenced him to death, without hope of mercy. The report adds, "the prisoner bowed respectfully to the Bench, and walked steadily from the dock."

THE ACCIDENT ON THE MIDLAND COUNTIES RAILWAY.—ACQUITTAL OF MR. LIGHTFOOT AND MR. RAVEN.—At Nottingham, on Monday, Robert Lightfoot, station-master at Nottingham, was arraigned on the coroner's inquisition for the manslaughter of John Dean. The prisoner, in a firm and distinct voice, pleaded not guilty. Robert Lightfoot, and Jonathan Raven, station-master at Beeston, were then arraigned on the coroner's inquisition for manslaughter, the former as causing the death of James Bolestridge, the latter as being present, aiding and assisting therein. Mr. Wildman, on the part of the prosecution, stated that as the Grand Jury had thrown out the bill, it was not usual, unless there were some peculiarities about a case, to proceed with the same inquiry. Certainly he (Mr. Wildman) did not find any circumstances in the present case that would justify him in departing from the usual course. He (the learned counsel), on looking at the evidence, could not but feel in that case, although the prisoner Lightfoot might have been guilty of an error of judgment, still it was an error of judgment in which his own life was as much risked as that of any other person, for it appeared that so far from wishing to neglect his duty, he left the place where he might have continued, and exposed his own person in order to prevent the possibility of a disaster occurring, which it was no part of his duty to prevent. As no evidence was offered in support of the coroner's inquisition, the jury of course returned a verdict of acquittal. Mr. Justice Patteson said, "I am very glad this inquiry has taken place. I am quite sure what the learned counsel for the prosecution has stated is correct, and, judging from the circumstances that have actually occurred, looking at everything that has taken place, it is impossible to say there was anything greater than an error in judgment; certainly there is no ground for saying there was that culpable and gross negligence which would authorise a conviction for manslaughter. I cannot pretend to say there was not an error of judgment on your part, but it is clear everything that was done by you was done to prevent the mischief taking place which did occur, owing probably to a misunderstanding between you and another person. As I understand, it was no part of your duty to have left the Nottingham station at all. That was an error in the first instance; and the second error, if there was any, seems to be this, that, although feeling persuaded, and as far as I can judge with very good reason, that the train coming from Nottingham would come on its proper line, and that that line would be free, still you did not wait to make it quite certain at the Beeston station—it would have been better to have waited, as it appears the train coming from Nottingham, whichever line it came on, was overdue at Beeston station, therefore it would have been better had you waited a few minutes; but to say because a man certainly erred in judgment in a situation of great difficulty, he is guilty of manslaughter when death occurs, is not correct." Mr. Lightfoot then stepped frm the dock, and immediately left the court.

MURDER OF A WOMAN AT SALFORD.—At Liverpool on Monday Thomas Stew was tried by Mr. Baron Gurney, for the murder of Alice Nolan, at Salford. The facts of the case are these:—The deceased worked at a flax mill in Salford, and about ten o'clock on the night of Sunday, the 7th of July, she was seen to put her hand to her throat in Brig-street, in that town, apparently in great pain, and on reaching Harrington-street she fell. On examination it was found that her throat had been cut almost from ear to ear. In order to show that the prisoner was connected with the transaction, it appeared that the deceased and himself had been acquainted with each other for some time; that he kept her company with the view of marrying her, and that he had applied to her to know whether she would become his wife. On Sunday, the 7th July, they passed the whole day together, and about six o'clock on that evening they went to the house of a Mrs. Sarah Shepherd, in Cook-street, Salford, where some few words, not of an amicable nature, passed between them. Presently, however, they made up their differences, and were as good friends as ever; and then the prisoner rushed out, and borrowed a razor and shaving-brush at the house of a neighbour named Hugh Broadhurst, with the intention, as he said, of shaving himself. He then returned to Shepherd's, and about nine o'clock the same night deceased and himself left together, and after that time the young woman was never seen alive by her friends. What became of them from nine to ten o'clock was not exactly known, but about ten a man and a woman were seen at the corner of a street, and one main inquiry in the case appeared to be whether the persons then standing together were the prisoner and the deceased. There was no doubt that the female was the deceased, and the description of the man exactly answered that of the prisoner. The conversation that passed between them was partly overheard. The man called her by the name of Alice, and she addressed him by the name of Tom, and those were the usual terms of familiarity with which they called each other. The subject of conversation had reference to their marriage. She said she would not marry him for six months at least, and this answer appeared to have disappointed the prisoner. Very shortly after, the deceased was seen to put her hand to her throat and to fall in the street, and at the same moment the prisoner was observed to run in the direction of Shepherd's house. About ten minutes after ten o'clock, he passed up Shepherd's entry, singing and dancing, "Jim along Joe," and then rushed into Shepherd's house, crying out, "Here goes it—here I'll die." Immediately after he said this he made a sort of a stumble forwards, and inflicted a deadly wound on his throat with the razor he had borrowed from Broadhurst. The wound, though not fatal, was nevertheless a very dangerous one, and it was only lately that he had recovered from the effects.—The jury convicted the prisoner, and Mr. Baron Gurney passed sentence of death upon him.—Towards the close of his lordship's address the unhappy man sank back, apparently partially insensible, in the arms of the turnkeys. At the close of the sentence he seemed to wake, as it were, from a dream, and clinging to the front of the dock endeavoured to address the court, but a few hoarse unintelligible whispers were all that could be heard, his tongue refused its office, and he was led half fainting from the dock.

MURDER OF A POLICE CONSTABLE AT BURY ST. EDMUND'S.—On Saturday last, William Howell, 28, Walter Howell, 21, and Israel Shirley, 38, labourers, living at Mutford, were tried for having, on the 30th of July last, feloniously and maliciously murdered James M'Fadden, a police constable, by shooting him with a gun. It will be recollected that the murder of M'Fadden took place under circumstances connected with a robbery of a barn, in the parish of Gislingham. M'Fadden being set to watch the premises was shot by one of the parties engaged in the plunder. The examination of witnesses occupied the whole of Saturday, and the trial was not brought to a close until one o'clock on Monday, when a verdict of Guilty was pronouced against the three prisoners. The Judge (Mr. Justice Williams) then, in the most solemn manner, proceeded to pass the sentence of death upon all the prisoners. As the prisoners were about to be removed, Walter Howell exclaimed "So you think, my lord, you have done justice: all the witnesses are perjured."

THE MURDER OF SIR THOMAS BOUGHEY'S GAMEKEEPER.—At the assizes at Stafford on Monday, two young men named Paul Downing and Charles Powys were tried for the wilful murder of Mr. William Cooper, head gamekeeper to Sir Thomas Boughey, at Audley, Staffordshire, in the month of August last. The case was one of the usual kind connected with poaching. It was stated that the neighbourhood was infested with poachers, and the prisoners had before been convicted of that offence. But as far as the murder was concerned, the testimony was entirely circumstantial. After a very long trial, and after the jury had retired for some time, the foreman said—"As far as circumstantial evidence enables us we find the prisoners guilty."—The Judge: You must say, gentlemen, whether they are guilty or not guilty.—Foreman: We find them guilty. We believe that one fired the gun, and the other aided and abetted.—Mr. Huddlestone: I submit, my lord, that the jury must decide on which count they find their verdict.—Mr. Yardley shortly argued contra.—Mr. Huddlestone: You will take a note of my objection, my lord.—The Judge: I have done so.—Mr. Bellamy again put the question to the jury, and they returned a verdict of "Guilty," with a strong recommendation to mercy.—Mr. Justice Coltman then passed sentence of death upon the prisoners, telling them that he would forward the recommendation of the jury to her Majesty's Ministers.—Downing, with an oath, protested his innocence, and was removed from the bar uttering the most dreadful imprecations against the judge and jury.

CONVICTION FOR INCENDIARISM.—At the Exeter Assizes on Tuesday, John Bendle, a miserably clad and lame man, was charged with having, on the night of the 27th of September last, set fire to a rick of oats, the property of John Land. It was proved that Mr. Land was a farmer, residing at West Buckland, Devonshire, where the prisoner existed as a pauper. Two or three days before the fire, the prisoner was met by a witness, who asked him if he was going home. [The witness stated that at this time the prisoner was living in a linhay or cow-shed, but had before been in the union.] The prisoner replied that he was, on which the witness said that he ought to go into the union. Prisoner answered that he would never go into the union again, but he would do something before Sunday that would prevent that. He had no animosity, he added, against any one in the parish except the prosecutor, and he hated him because he had used him so badly when they lived together at Mrs. Dean's. He then went on to say that before Sunday he would burn down his house or his barn. On the evening of the fire it was proved that the prisoner had bought a box of lucifer matches. The prisoner, by another witness, was seen near about the time that the fire took place, within a quarter of a mile of the spot on which the rick stood. On the same evening, another witness stated that he saw the prisoner, who told him that he set fire to Mr. Land's rick. The jury immediately returned a verdict of Guilty, and Mr. Baron Alderson sentenced him to be transported for life.

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.

THE FORGED TRANSFER AT THE BANK OF ENGLAND.

William Burgess, the Bank clerk, accused of uttering two forged transfers for £8200 Three per Cent. Consols, was tried on Thursday at the Central Criminal Court, by Mr. Baron Rolfe. The prisoner was described in the calendar as 23 years of age, and the indictment charged him with feloniously aiding and assisting a person unknown to personate an owner of a certain share of and in a public stock, value £8200, with intent to defraud William Oxenford thereof.

The Hon. J. S. Wortley, Q.C., Mr. Adolphus, and Mr. Clarkson appeared as counsel for the prosecution.

Mr. Bodkin and Mr. Charnock defended the prisoner.

The evidence in support of the case was given at great length, but all the material facts have been so recently published, that it would be useless repetition to report the trial.

The jury found the prisoner "Guilty," and he was sentenced to transportation for life.

MEETING OF MANCHESTER MERCHANTS.—An important meeting of merchants took place in Manchester, on Tuesday, for the purpose of adopting measures to procure the repeal of the duty on cotton wool. Resolutions in favour of that object were agreed to.

INCENDIARY FIRES.—Accounts have been received of more incendiary fires. Last Sunday night at Lyme Regis, Dorsetshire, no less than seven houses were consumed, with the furniture. There has also been an incendiary fire on Highfield Farm, Hemel Hempstead, Herts, but it was fortunately confined to the straw rick on which it originated.

THE LATE RAILWAY ACCIDENT NEAR NOTTINGHAM.—We are glad to hear that Mr. Roberts is considered to be out of danger. Mr. Neap, of Retford, who was dangerously injured, is doing well. He has received 20 guineas as compensation. James Howitt is still at the hospital, but going on well. The other sufferers are progressing slowly. Mrs. Bolestridge is extremely ill from mental suffering and anxiety, caused by her husband's injuries, and her subsequent bereavement.

POSTSCRIPT.

CHAIRMAN OF THE MIDDLESEX MAGISTRATES.—The Middlesex Magistrates met yesterday at the Court-house, Clerkenwell-green, to choose a chairman. Mr. Pownall and Mr. Rotch were proposed. The former was elected: the numbers being for Mr. Pownall, 70; for Mr. Rotch, 25.

BATHS AND WASHHOUSES FOR THE POOR.—At a meeting of the Common Council, on Thursday, the report of the Finance Committee concerning baths and washhouses for the poor was presented. It recommended that £500 be granted out of the City funds to aid the establishment of baths. On the motion "That the Court agree with the committee," Mr. Lawrence moved that the report lie on the table. On a division, after discussion, the original motion was carried by 49 to 41. A motion to reduce the proposed grant to £200 was, however, subsequently agreed to by a large majority. The court then adjourned.

THE COLLISION BETWEEN THE SYLPH AND ORWELL STEAMERS.—On Thursday an inquest was held at the Eight Bells, Greenwich, before Mr. J. Carttar, the coroner for West Kent, on the bodies of the two unfortunate men who lost their lives in the collision between the Sylph steamer, Swaisland master, belonging to the Woolwich Steam-packet Company, and the Orwell steamer, Rackham master, running between London and Ipswich. The bodies were identified as those of the two men named Sheppard and Sullivan. Sheppard, it appeared, used to run an errand cart from Woolwich to Greenwich; but having fallen into poverty, he latterly came to Greenwich by the boat. Sullivan, the other unfortunate sufferer, was about forty years of age. He was a poor labouring man, and used to earn his livelihood by selling apples. —A great many witnesses were examined, but their evidence did not throw any new light on the transaction, nor did it disclose any fact in addition to those mentioned in the account given in another part of our paper. The evidence of one witness, James Rowland, a tailor, living in Albion-street, Hyde-park, appears to afford an accurate account of the way in which the accident occurred, and we therefore subjoin it. Mr. Rowland deposed that he was a passenger on board the Sylph, and was standing on the fore part of the vessel, on deck. Just after leaving Greenwich one of the crew, who was on the look out, called "The Witch," and "A barge," and the captain nodded his head in acknowledgment, and the Sylph passed them, and took a slanting direction. He saw the Orwell coming up the river, about twenty or thirty yards distant, and perceiving that a collision was inevitable, he ran aft. If he had remained where he was he would have been injured. The fog was so dense that it was impossible to see beyond thirty yards. He had no alarm at the rate of speed at which the Sylph was going. Heard the orders "Stop her," &c., and thought that both steamers were stopped at the time of the collision. Heard some one from the Orwell call out. The captain of the Sylph was on the paddle-box all the way down. If they had been going at a more moderate speed, the collision might have been avoided; but there was not sufficient time. The fog increased from Hungerford; he thought it required caution in the management of the boat to come down the river at such a time. Every assistance was rendered by all parties. If the vessels had gone more slowly he thought it possible the accident would have been avoided if the helms had been turned. He should say the Sylph was rather nearer the north than the south side. Could not say at what rate the Orwell was going; he heard some one calling on board the Orwell, and presumed that it was with the intention of preventing collision. The Orwell might have been stationary for aught he knew. He thought he might safely say the Orwell had headway at the time of the collision, but he could not judge of the speed. It was soon after the Witch passed the Sylph that the accident occurred. The Witch passed tolerably close. Could not say that the fog increased after they left Greenwich. There was no time for observation. The inquiry was adjourned till Monday next.

SUICIDE.—On Thursday afternoon, shortly after four o'clock, Mr. Wood, jun., son of the proprietor of Wood's Hotel, Lincoln's-inn-fields, entered the shop of Mr. Rusk, boot-maker, of High Holborn, and requested permission to go up stairs; and, being a customer, it was immediately granted. Having remained for a considerable time, Mr. Rusk became surprised, and upon going up stairs, to his horror discovered the unfortunate young man quite dead, having cut his throat with a razor, which was lying on the ground. No cause for the rash act has been assigned.

THE LADY THIEF.—At the Central Criminal Court, Leah Mary Roper, the woman charged with stealing goods from several linen-drapers' shops, was convicted of stealing 48 yards of satinette, value £6 6s. the property of Mr. Hardwicke, a linen-draper in Holborn. Mr. Baron Rolfe sentenced her to one year's imprisonment with hard labour, remarking that there were two other cases against her, although it was not then necessary to go into any more than the one which had been so clearly proved.

CURIOUS SUICIDE AT WORCESTER.—On Tuesday morning Mr. J. Hanbury, glover, of Worcester, second son of Mr. T. Hanbury, one of the serjeants-at-mace of the Worcester Corporation, hanged himself in a most singular manner, and was found dead by his mother. The unhappy suicide had effected his purpose in the following manner:—He had procured a piece of small rope (a portion of a clothes-line), one end of which he had secured to the brass handle of a door communicating between the parlour and kitchen, and the other end, being thrown over the top of the door, he had tied round his neck. He then made two running loops in his silk neckerchief, in which he tied his wrists, and two flat-irons (used for ironing linen) were secured to the same neckerchief, thus adding additional weight to his body. By these means he succeeded in strangling himself, and when found was quite dead and cold. At the inquest, Mrs. Paine, a neighbour of the deceased, produced the silk neckerchief and two flat irons which were found fastened to the deceased's wrists. The neckerchief was much twisted, and the irons weighed about six pounds each. As to the deceased's mind, it was stated by all the witnesses examined that he was of a very melancholy temperament, which it was thought arose from constitutional debility. The jury found that the deceased destroyed himself while labouring under temporary insanity.

A welcome, old Christmas, a welcome once more—
Though thy head be all frosty and chill,
Thy heart is as warm with its good kindly store
Of Affections and Fondnesses still
As ev'n in the days of our earlier years,
When our smiles were more often—less frequent our tears,
We greeted thy coming, and happy were we Thy evergreen Holly and Ivy to see!

Chorus.

Then evergreen Holly and Ivy let's sing,
The leaves that crown'd Bacchus old Jollity's King!

III.

What, tho' the sweet summer months have all sped,
And silence is in their lone bow'rs—
What, tho' the roses are wither'd or fled,
Still the Holly and Ivy are ours!

Oh! thus in the winter of life may we feel,
An enjoyment that even cold Time cannot steal—
A still blooming thought of some joy that is gone,
That will light us and warm us by Memory's sun!

Chorus.

The evergreen Holly and Ivy let's sing,
Then leaves that crown'd Bacchus, old Jollity's King!

FINE ARTS.

The Beauties of the Opera. Parts VIII. and IX. La Sylphide and Don Juan. Bogue, Fleet-street.

This elegant work maintains its attraction: the portraits of Taglioni and Sontag are complimentary (but we suppose gallantly so) to the two ladies. The expression of that of Taglioni, however, wants etherialism: as La Sylphide she is en caractère—we do not want a ball-room likeness of the fair danseuse; we should have preferred to have seen her portrayed as one of those beautiful personifications of a Muse or Grace in which she has so often proved how much poetry there may be in motion. The letter-press portion continues to be a little inflated;—but it seems to be written by an enthusiast, and we therefore excuse its occasional "bombast," and even think "it a style." The incidental illustrative cuts are exquisite, and in the highest degree characteristic. We have already lavished all our praise upon the getting up of this very elegant work—we can only repeat ourselves ,and say our former meaning in other words, that it will be found an ornament to every literary table.

NEW MUSIC.

The Musical Bijou, an Album of Poetry and Music for 1845. D'Almaine, and Co., Soho-square.

This work does credit to the artists, in every department, who have been engaged upon it: the illustrations are beautiful in the extreme. We are informed that, "The whole have been copied, with slight alterations, by permission of the trustees, from manuscripts preserved in the British Museum; and executed in colours by J. Brandard;" and most beautifully we must say. The illuminated frontispiece and border are from the poems of the Duke of Orleans (father of Louis XII.), taken prisoner at the battle of Agincourt; the copy executed for Elizabeth of York, Queen of Henry VII. (Royal Col. 16, F. ii.) The illuminated title is from the same MS.—the presentation plate from various authorities—the table of contents from the Calendar prefixed to a fine missal (Sloane, 2605), and the covers; the front from a small, but rare missal (Harleian, 2936), the back composed. So much for the decorative part of the work, which, we regret to say, is the predominant excellence of the book, although many things in the vocal and instrumental departments deserve our heartiest commendation. Ubi plura nitent, we shall not be offended with the paucis maculis which may be found throughout. Amongst the latter we must mention a mutilation of Bellini's duet from "Norma," which we cannot help thinking a musical sacrilege! But, altogether, the Bijou is a most elegant work—attractive in the ensemble, if not en detail. That enemy to true music, quadrille, occupies many pages which might have been more usefully applied—but "c'est la mode;" and a man or musician might as well be out of the world as out of the fashion.

FROST FAIR ON THE THAMES.

The recent frost has called up many recollections of similar visitations in this country; though, fortunately, that which has scarcely passed away, did not reach the severity of the event depicted in our engraving.

This represents a scene from "Frost Fair" on the Thames, in 1814; sketched by Luke Clennell, with all the skill of his truthful pencil. The locality is the immediate neighbourhood of London-bridge.

Of the event we find the following interesting notice in Mr. Cruden's valuable "History of Gravesend and the Port of London," lately published:—

"1814. The winter of this year was universally severe. On the eve of Epiphany, a frost commenced, that continued for several weeks; and during a great part of that time the Thames was frozen, to the indescribable distress of many industrious classes. On the 20th of January, a great fall of snow rendered the highway between Gravesend and Rochester impassable, until it was removed by the laborious exertions of the military stationed at Chatham. The intercourse by the water highway between Gravesend and London, was obstructed, but from this there could be no release by human aid; and those, whose means of earning a subsistence was suspended, awaited, with anxiety, the relief that was to be expected only from natural causes, and they hailed with gladness the day when the thaw commenced, that opened the avenues to the resumption of productive labour."

A sort of rude fair was held upon the ice; and printing-presses were set up there, at which were printed a memorial of the duration of this calamitous visitation—the following being a fac simile:—

FROST FAIR.

Amidst the Arts which on the Thames appear,
To tell the wonders of this icy year,
Printing claims prior place, which at one view,
Erects a monument of That and You.

Printed on the River Thames, February 4, in the 54th year of the reign of King George the III. Anno Domini, 1814.

The frost soon afterwards terminated, and the Thames was again the scene of trade and industry.

"THE PROBLEM" EXPERIMENTAL YACHT.

"THE PROBLEM" EXPERIMENTAL YACHT.

This little bark has been fitted out on a new principle, by Mr. Dempster, of Newcastle-upon-Tyne. She is built of iron; the stem and stern posts meet at an angle below the centre of the vessel, where it is made strong; the angular keel is formed by the plates riveted through the stem and stern posts, and lower ends of the floor timbers. From the floor down to the angle in the keel is run full of lead, which acts powerfully as ballast, strengthens the keel, and prevents corrosion. The keel being narrow, makes little resistance to the fluid! and its strength is a safeguard to the main body of the vessel.

The extraordinary facility with which this vessel can be controlled in a gale of wind, or on a rough sea, has excited considerable interest among practical men on the Tyne, where the vessel has manœuvred with great success, according to the Newcastle journals. She has one centre or main mast with square sails, and a triangular sail, fore and aft, worked with several movements; and it is in the dexterous use of the latter sails, that the great advantages of the New Rig are exemplified. Mr. Dempster has repeatedly experimented on the Tyne with this vessel. His principal experiment is the revolving manœuvre, useful or vessels of war.

The Life-boat manœuvre is serviceable in case of a man falling overboard, by going back to pick him up, or for backing a vessel clear of dangers suddenly observed ahead. Buoys being hove overboard, and the vessel backed astern to pick them up, sufficiently showed how this manœuvre was effected. Mr. Dempster manages the vessel without assistance from any one; and her movements on the water, under his guidance, are described in the Newcastle Journal as truly surprising.

The vessel is shaped alike at each end, so that she can be propelled either way, through the water. In the manœuvre shown in the engraving, she is running at the rate of seven knots, and is about to take a rock narrow at the top, where there is one foot and a half less water than her draught; and this she passed over without injury.

This Experimental Vessel was built by subscription in Scotland; and Mr. Dempster is now in London, for the purpose of bringing his invention under the notice of the Lords of the Admiralty. "It is considered," says the Newcastle Journal, "that a vessel rigged upon this principle would form an excellent school of discipline for young men intended for the naval service, and instructing them in the nice art of manœuvring a vessel."

LITERATURE.

The Chimes: a Goblin Story of some Bells that Rang an Old Year out and a New Year in. By Charles Dickens. Chapman and Hall.

As this elegant contribution to our seasonable literature has appeared almost simultaneously on the library-table and the stage, it has, doubtless, already been perused and witnessed with delight, by thousands of the reading and play-going public. A volume of some 170 pages, like the present, and that by one of the master-spirits of the age, must be hailed by a legion of readers; and, however highly expectation may have been raised by the author's exquisite "Carol," we predict that, making allowance for "The Chimes," being the second of its class, it will enjoy a comparative share of popularity. Probably, the "Goblin" of to-day is less jocund than the "Ghost" of last year; it may not equal its predecessor in construction of plot, slight as that was acknowledged to be; nor is there the same breath of humour and rich fancy flowing through its pages: but, in what may be regarded as the higher end and aim of Mr. Dickens' writings—the reform of social abuse, and the uprooting of deeply-rooted popular error—the present work must be hailed as a well-timed production, likely to realise the most beneficial results in society; while it is replete with refined sentiments upon questions of paramount importance to the adjustment of the social balance, and which must humanise and elevate the heart of even the most listless reader. These noble objects are the under-current of Mr. Dickens' volume; whilst the work is not wanting in those touches of homely truth and humour which have proved the most extensively attractive charms of the author's previous productions.

Numerous as already may be the public acquaintance with "The Chimes," we shall glance at the framework of the story, and its most successful scenic touches. The volume is divided into Four Quarters: the first is chiefly introductory of dram. pers.: here is a specimen from the opening pages :—

A NIGHT SCENE IN A CHURCH.

The night-wind has a dismal trick of wandering round and round a building of that sort, and moaning as it goes; and of trying, with its unseen hand, the windows and the doors; and seeking out some crevices by which to enter. And when it has got in; as one not finding what it seeks, whatever that may be; it wails and howls to issue forth again: and not content with stalking through the aisles, and gliding round and round the pillars, and tempting the deep organ, soars up to the roof, and strives to rend the rafters; then flings itself despairingly upon the stones below, and passes, muttering, into the vaults. Anon, it comes out stealthily, and creeps along the walls; seeming to read, in whispers, the Inscriptions sacred to the Dead. At some of these, it breaks out shrilly, as with laughter; and at others, moans and cries as if it were lamenting. It has a ghostly sound too, lingering within the altar; where it seems to chaunt, in its wild way, of Wrong and Murder done, and false Gods worshipped; in defiance of the Tables of the Law, which look so fair and smooth, but are so flawed and broken. Ugh! Heaven preserve us, sitting snugly round the fire! It has an awful voice, that wind at Midnight, singing in a church!

But high up in the steeple! There the foul blast roars and whistles! High up in the steeple, where it is free to come and go through many an airy arch and loophole, and to twist and twine itself about the giddy stair, and twirl the groaning weathercock, and make the very tower shake and shiver! High up in the steeple, where the belfry is; and iron rails are ragged with rust; and sheets of lead and copper, shrivelled by the changing weather, crackle and heave beneath the unaccustomed tread; and birds stuff shabby nests into corners of old oaken joists and beams; and dust grows old and grey; and speckled spiders, indolent and fat with long security, swing idly to and fro in the vibration of the bells, and never lose their hold upon their thread-spun castles in the air, or climb up sailor-like in quick alarm, or drop upon the ground and ply a score of nimble legs to save a life! High up in the steeple of an old church, far above the light and murmur of the town and far below the flying clouds that shadow it, is the wild and dreary place at night: and high up in the steeple of an old church, dwelt the Chimes I tell of.

Passing over the bells of the Chimes, who had their Godfathers and Godmothers, and their silver mugs—the latter melted down by Henry VIII.—we come to the first character :—

TOBY VECK, THE TICKET-PORTER.

Whatever Toby Veck said, I say. I take my stand by Toby Veck, although he did stand all day long (and weary work it was) just outside the church-door. In fact, he was a ticket-porter, Toby Veck, and waited there for jobs.

And a breezy, goose-skinned, blue-nosed, red-eyed, stony-toed, tooth-chattering place it was to wait in, in the winter-time, as Toby Veck well knew. The wind came tearing round the corner—especially the east wind—as if it had sallied forth, express, from the confines of the earth, to have a blow at Toby. And oftentimes it seemed to come upon him sooner than it had expected, for, bouncing round the corner, and passing Toby, it would suddenly wheel round again, as if it cried, "Why, here he is!" Incontinently his little white apron would be caught up over his head like a naughty boy's garments, and his feeble little cane would be seen to wrestle and struggle unavailingly in his hand, and his legs would undergo tremendous agitation, and Toby himself all aslant, and facing now in this direction, now in that, would be so banged and buffeted, and touzled, and worried, and hustled, and lifted off his feet, as to render it a state of things but one degree removed from a positive miracle, that he wasn't carried up bodily into the air as a colony of frogs or snails or other portable creatures sometimes are, and rained down again, to the great astonishment of the natives, on some strange corner of the world where ticket-porters are unknown.

But windy weather, in spite of its using him so roughly, was, after all, a sort of holiday for Toby. That's the fact. He didn't seem to wait so long for a sixpence in the wind, as at other times; for the having to fight with that boisterous element took off his attention, and quite freshened him up, when he was getting hungry and low-spirited. A hard frost, too, or a fall of snow was an Event; and it seemed to do him good, somehow or other—it would have been hard to say in what respect though, Toby! So wind and frost and snow, and perhaps a good stiff storm of hail, were Toby Veck's red-letter days.

Wet weather was the worst: the cold, damp, clammy wet, that wrapped him up like a moist great-coat: the only kind of great-coat Toby owned, or could have added to his comfort by dispensing with. Wet days, when the rain came slowly, thickly, obstinately down; when the street's throat, like his own, was choked with mist; when smoking umbrellas passed and repassed spinning round and round like so many teetotums, as they knocked against each other on the crowded footway, throwing off a little whirpool of uncomfortable sprinklings; when gutters brawled, and water-spouts were full and noisy; when the wet from the projecting stones and ledges of the church fell drip, drip, drip, on Toby, making the wisp of straw on which he stood mere mud in no time; those were the days that tried him. Then, indeed, you might see Toby looking anxiously out from his shelter in an angle of the church wall—such a meagre shelter, that in a summer time it never cast a shadow thicker than a good-sized walking-stick upon the sunny pavement—with a disconsolate and lengthened face. But coming out, a minute afterwards, to warm himself by exercise: and trotting up and down some dozen times: he would brighten even then, and go back more brightly to his niche.

They called him Trotty from his pace, which meant speed if it didn't make it. He could have Walked faster perhaps; most likely; but rob him of his trot, and Toby would have taken to his bed and died. It bespattered him with mud in dirty weather; it cost him a world of trouble; he could have walked with infinitely greater ease; but that was one reason for his clinging to it so tenaciously. A weak, small, spare old man, he was a very Hercules, this Toby, in his good intentions. He loved to earn his money. He delighted to believe—Toby was very poor, and couldn't well afford to part with a delight—that he was worth his salt. With a shilling or an eighteenpenny message or small parcel in hand, his courage, always high, rose higher. As he trotted on, he would call out to fast Postmen ahead of him, to get out of the way: devoutly believing that in the natural course of things he must inevitably overtake and run them down; and he had perfect faith—not often tested—in his being able to carry anything that man could lift.

Thus, even when he came out of his nook to warm himself on a wet day, Toby trotted. Making, with his leaky shoes, a crooked line of slushy footprints in the mire; and blowing on his chilly hands and rubbing them against each other, poorly defended from the searching cold by threadbare mufflers of grey worsted, with a private apartment only for the thumb and a common room or tap for the rest of the fingers; Toby, with his knees bent and his cane beneath his arm, still trotted.

A character of another "order" will, doubtless, be identified among our civic neighbours: it is that of one, who, by "putting down," in the story before us, contrives to perpetrate much mischief, as in the following scene of

TOBY'S DAUGHTER AND ALDERMAN CUTE.

"Now I'm going to give you a word or two of good advice, my girl," said the Alderman, in his nice easy way. "It's my place to give advice, you know, because I'm a Justice. You know I'm a Justice, don't you?"

Meg timidly said, "Yes." But every body knew Alderman Cute was a Justice! Oh dear, so active a Justice always! Who such a mote of brightness in the public eye as Cute!

"You are going to be married, you say," pursued the Alderman. "Very unbecoming and indelicate in one of your sex! But never mind that. After you are married, you'll quarrel with your husband, and come to be a distressed wife. You may think not: but you will, because I tell you so. Now I give you fair warning, that I have made up my mind to Put distressed wives Down. So don't be brought before me. You'll have children—boys. Those boys will grow up bad of course, and run wild in the streets, without shoes and stockings. Mind, my young friend! I'll convict 'em summarily, every one, for I am determined to Put boys without shoes and stockings, Down. Perhaps your husband will die young (most likely) and leave you with a baby. Then you'll be turned out of doors, and wander up and down the streets. Now don't wander near me, my dear, for I am resolved to Put all wandering mothers Down. All young mothers, of all sorts and kinds, it's my determination to Put Down. Don't think to plead illness as an excuse with me; or babies as an excuse with me: for all sick persons and young children (I hope you know the church-service but I'm afraid not) I am determined to Put Down. And if you attempt, desperately, and ungratefully, and impiously, and fraudulently attempt to drown yourself, or hang yourself, I'll have no pity on you, for I have made up my mind to Put all suicide Down. If there is one thing," said the Alderman, with his self-satisfied smile, "on which I can be said to have made up my mind more than on another, it is to Put suicide Down. So don't try it on. That's the phrase, is n't it! Ha, ha! now we understand each other."

In the next Quarter is this exquisite snatch on

THE OLD YEAR AND THE NEW.

The Year was Old that day. The patient Year had lived through the reproaches and misuses of its slanderers, and faithfully performed its work. Spring, summer, autumn, winter. It had laboured through the destined round, and now laid down its weary head to die. Shut out from hope, high impulse, active happiness, itself, but messenger of many joys to others, it made appeal in its decline to have its toiling days and patient hours remembered, and to die in peace. Trotty might have read a poor man's allegory in the fading year; but he was past that now.

And only he? Or has the like appeal been ever made, by seventy years at once upon an English labourer's head, and made in vain!

The streets were full of motion, and the shops were decked out gaily. The New Year, like an Infant Heir to the whole world, was waited for, with welcomes, presents, and rejoicings. There were books and toys for the New Year, glittering trinkets for the New Year, dresses for the New Year, schemes of fortune for the New Year; new inventions to beguile it. Its life was parcelled out in almanacks and pocket-books; the coming of its moons, and stars, and tides, was known beforehand to the moment; all the workings of its seasons in their days and nights, were calculated with as much precision as Mr. Filer could work sums in men and women.

The New Year, the New Year. Everywhere the New Year! The Old Year was already looked upon as dead; and its effects were selling cheap like some drowned mariner's aboardship. Its patterns were Last Year's and going at a sacrifice, before its breath was gone. Its treasures were mere dirt, beside the riches of its unborn successor! Trotty had no portion, to his thinking, in the New Year or the Old.

To this succeeds a capital portrait of one who would shine in a Society for Bettering Every-body—one Sir Joseph Bowley—

"THE POOR MAN'S FRIEND."

"I am the Poor Man's Friend,' observed Sir Joseph, glancing at the poor man present. "As such I may be taunted. As such I have been taunted. But I ask no other title."

"Bless him for a noble gentleman!" thought Trotty.

"I don't agree with Cute here, for instance," said Sir Joseph, holding out the letter. "I don't agree with the Filer party. I don't agree with any party. My friend the Poor Man, has no business with anything of that sort, and nothing of that sort has any business with him. My friend the Poor Man, in my district, is my business. No man or body of men has any right to interfere between my friend and me. That is the ground I take. I assume a—a paternal character towards my friend. I say, 'My good fellow, I will treat you paternally.'"

Toby listened with great gravity, and began to feel more comfortable.

"Your only business, my good fellow," pursued Sir Joseph," looking abstractedly at Toby; "your only business in life is with me. You needn't trouble yourself to think about anything. I will think for you: I know what is good for you; I am your perpetual parent. Such is the dispensation of an allwise Providence! Now, the design of your creation is: not that you should swill and guzzle, and associate your enjoyments, brutally, with food"—Toby thought remorsefully of the tripe—"but that you should feel the Dignity of Labour; go forth erect into the cheerful morning air, and—and stop there. Live hard and temperately, be respectful, exercise your self-denial, bring up your family on next to nothing, pay your rent as regularly as the clock strikes, be punctual in your dealings (I set you a good example; you will find Mr. Fish, my confidential secretary, with a cash box before him at all times); and you may trust me to be your Friend and Father.'

In the next passages, Toby's delight at finding a hungry guest, is inimitably depicted: it is a piece of

HEARTFELT HOSPITALITY.

Toby withdrew to purchase the viands he had spoken of, for ready money, at Mrs. Chickenstalker's; and presently came back, pretending that he had not been able to find them, at first, in the dark.

"But here they are at last," said Trotty, setting out the tea things, "all correct! I was pretty sure it was tea, and a rasher. So it is. Meg, my Pet, if you'll just make the tea while your unworthy father toasts the bacon, we shall be ready, immediate. It's a curious circumstance," said Trotty, proceeding in his cookery, with the assistance of the toasting-fork, "curious, but well known to my friends, that I never care, myself, for rashes, nor for tea. I like to see other people enjoy 'em," said Trotty, speaking very loud to impress the fact upon his guest, "but to me, as food, they're disagreeable."

Yet Trotty sniffed the savour of the hissing bacon—ah!—as if he liked it; and when he poured the boiling water in the tea-pot, looked lovingly down into the depths of that snug cauldron, and suffered the fragrant steam to curl about his nose, and wreathe his head and face in a thick cloud. However, for all this, he neither ate nor drank except, at the very beginning, a mere morsel for form's sake, which he appeared to eat with infinite relish, but declared was perfectly uninteresting to him.

We purposely abstain from detailing the entire plot of the story, but must not omit to mention the incident of Toby groping his way up into the chime-loft of a venerable Tudor church; and the Goblin Sight—the tower, swarming with dwarfs, phantoms, spirits, elfin creatures of the Bells, whom he saw leaping, flying, dropping, and pouncing forth—is a truly poetic scene.

The Third Quarter carries on the satire of the tale upon what we take to be one of the phases of Young Englandism. There is a rustic fête to celebrate the birthday of Lady Bowley (an excellent sketch of a woman of fashionable charity), one of the scenes in which is the following

SPORT FOR RICH AND POOR.

The skittle playing came off with immense success. Sir Joseph knocked the pins about quite skilfully; Master Bowley took an innings at a shorter distance also; and everybody said that now, when a Baronet and the Son of a Baronet played at skittles, the country was coming round again, as fast as it could come.

At its proper time, the Banquet was served up. Trotty involuntarily repaired to the Hall with the rest, for he felt himself conducted thither by some stronger impulse than his own free will. The sight was gay in the extreme; the ladies were very handsome; the visitors delighted, cheerful, and good-tempered. When the lower doors were opened, and the people flocked in, in their rustic dresses, the beauty of the spectacle was at its height; but Trotty only murmured more and more, "Where is Richard! He should help and comfort her! I can't see Richard!"

There had been some speeches made; and Lady Bowley's health had been proposed; and Sir Joseph Bowley had returned thanks; and made his great speech, showing by various pieces of evidence that he was the born Friend and Father, and so forth; and had given as a Toast, his Friends and Children, and the Dignity of Labour; when a slight disturbance at the bottom of the hall attracted Toby's notice. After some confusion, noise, and opposition, one man broke through the rest, and stood forward by himself.

The labourer who thus gains admittance proves a very unwelcome addition to the party, by talking to the great folks in a spirit by no means relished. Here is a hard-hitting specimen :—

"JAIL, JAIL, JAIL."

"Now, gentlemen," said Will Fern, holding out his hands, and flushing for an instant in his haggard face. "See how your laws are made to trap and hunt us when we're brought to this. I tries to live elsewhere. And I'm a vagabond. To jail with him! I comes back here. I goes a nutting in your woods, and breaks—who don't?—a limber branch or two. To jail with him! One of your keepers sees me in the broad day, near my own patch of garden with a gun. To jail with him! I has a nat'ral angry word with that man, when I'm free again. To jail with him! I cuts a stick. To jail with him! I eats a rotten apple or a turnip. To jail with him! It's twenty miles away; and coming back, I begs a trifle on the road. To jail with him! At last, the constable, the keeper—anybody—finds me anywhere, a doing anything. To jail with him, for he's a vagrant, and a jail-bird known; and jail's the only home he's got."

The Fourth Quarter shifts to livelier company—

A COSY PAIR OF PORTRAITS.

Fat company, rosy-cheeked company, comfortable company. They were but two, but they were red enough for ten. They sat before a bright fire, with a small low table between them: and unless the fragrance of hot tea and muffins lingered longer in that room than in most others, the table had seen service very lately. But all the cups and saucers being clean, and in their proper places in the corner cupboard; and the brass toasting-fork hanging in its usual nook and spreading its four idle fingers out, as if it wanted to be measured for a glove; there remained no other visible tokens of the meal just finished, than such as purred and washed their whiskers in the person of the basking cat, and glistened in the gracious, not to say the greasy, faces of her patrons.

This cosy couple (married, evidently) had made a fair division of the fire between them, and sat looking at the glowing sparks that dropped into the grate; now nodding off into a doze; now waking up again when some hot fragment, larger than the rest, came rattling down, as if the fire were coming with it.

It was in no danger of sudden extinction, however; for it gleamed not only in the little room, and on the panes of window-glass in the door, and on the curtain half drawn across them, but in the little shop beyond. A little shop, quite crammed and choked with the abundance of its stock; a perfectly voracious little shop, with a maw as accommodating and full as any shark's. Cheese, butter, firewood, soap, pickles, matches, bacon, table-beer, peg-tops, sweetmeats, boys' kites, bird-seed, cold ham, birch brooms, hearth-stones, salt, vinegar, blacking, red-herrings, stationery, lard, mushroom-ketchup, staylaces, loaves of bread, shuttlecocks, eggs, and slate-pencil: everything was fish that came to the net of this greedy little shop, and all these articles were in its net. How many other kinds of petty merchandise were there, it would be difficult to say; but balls of packthread, ropes of onions, pounds of candles, cabbage-nets, and brushes, hung in bunches from the ceiling, like extraordinary fruit; while various odd canisters emitting aromatic smells, established the veracity of the inscription over the outer door, which informed the public that the keeper of this little shop was a licensed dealer in tea, coffee, tobacco, pepper, and snuff.

Glancing at such of these items as were visible in the shining of the blaze, and the less cheerful radiance of two smoky lamps which burnt but dimly in the shop itself, as though its plethora sat heavy on their lungs; and glancing, then, at one of the two faces by the parlour-fire; Trotty had small difficulty in recognising in the stout old lady, Mrs. Chickenstalker: always inclined to corpulency, even in the days when he had known her as established in the general line, and having a small balance against him in her books.

The features of her companion were less easy to him. The great broad chin, with creases in it large enough to hide a finger in; the astonished eyes, that seemed to expostulate with themselves for sinking deeper and deeper into the yielding fat of the soft face: the nose afflicted with that disordered action of its functions which is generally termed The Snuffles; the short thick throat and labouring chest, with other beauties of the like description; though calculated to impress the memory, Trotty could at first allot to nobody he had ever known: and yet he had some recollection of them too. At length, in Mrs. Chickenstalker's partner in the general line, and in the crooked and eccentric line of life, he recognised the former porter of Sir Joseph Bowley; an apoplectic innocent, who had connected himself in Trotty's mind with Mrs. Chickenstalker years ago, by giving him admission to the mansion.

The thickening of the misery and suffering of the pair who are frightened out of marriage "by the gentlemen" is exquisitely told in finely blended pathos, relieved by humorous interruption; and the tale, or rather the dream—for such it proves—is wound up with a touching reproof of the old man's (Trotty) "slander of Nature in the breasts of mothers rendered desperate." Soon after which "the Chimes began to ring the joy-peals for a New Year, so lustily, so merrily, so happily, so gaily, that he leapt upon his feet, and broke the spell that bound him."

Trotty has been dreaming—the consequence of a hearty meal of tripe—and how he had been "going on, good gracious!" Meg's suitor, who has been waiting outside the house to hear the Bells, rushes in to claim the first kiss in the New Year, and there is a capital sketch of TROTTY'S JOY.

You never in all your life saw anything like Trotty after this. I don't care where you have lived or what you have seen; you never in your li'e saw anything at all approaching him! He sat down in his chair and beat his knees and cried; he sat down in his chair and beat his knees and laughed; he sat down in his chair and beat his knees and laughed and cried together; he got out of his chair and hugged Meg; he got out of his chair and hugged Richard; he got out of his chair and hugged them both at once; he kept running up to Meg, and squeezing her fresh face between his hands and kissing it, going from her backwards not to lose sight of it, and running up again like a figure in a magic lantern; and whatever he did, he was constantly sitting himself down in this chair, and never stopping in it for one single moment; being—that's the truth—beside himself with joy.

The preparations for the wedding follow, and the volume concludes with this eloquent moral:—

Had Trotty dreamed? Or are his joys and sorrows, and the actors in them, but a dream; himself a dream: the teller of this tale a dreamer, waking but now? If it be so, oh Listener, dear to him in all his visions, try to bear in mind the stern realities from which these shadows come: and in your sphere—none is too wide, and none too limited for such an end—endeavour to correct, improve, and soften them. So may the New Year be a Happy one to You, Happy to many more whose Happiness depends on You! So may each Year be happier than the last, and not the meanest of our brethren or sisterhood debarred their rightful share, in what our Great Creator formed them to enjoy.

The illustrations are an emblematic frontispiece, designed by Maclise, and engraved on steel; and nine wood-cuts, drawn by Leech and Doyle; besides two scenic vignettes by Stanfield. We miss the humour of the pencil of Phiz, so successfully introduced to the public in some of Mr. Dickens's previous works.

THE THEATRES.

COVENT GARDEN.

M. Jullien's bal masqué, which has been for some time advertised, came off on Monday evening—or rather Tuesday morning, for it was midnight before all the company had arrived—with great effect. Not only was the area of the theatre crowded even to discomfort, rendering every kind of dance a process requiring much resolution and bodily strength to accomplish; but every nook of the audience-part of the house had an occupant, literally to the ceiling. To Jullien, certainly, belongs the credit of effecting a reform in this species of entertainment, in London. Nothing could be more dreary or debased than the masquerades hitherto held here: nowhere were such scenes of unmeaning uproar and unmitigated blackguardism to be found. Every arrangement was, however, made on Monday to ensure decorum as far as it was practicable in such a large assembly; and, up to a comparatively late hour, everything was as orderly as could be expected. The band was, as might be supposed, first-rate; and the arrangements for supper far better, and more comfortable than we remember to have seen before. Some of the dresses were really elegant, and all were above the style of tawdry worn-out theatrical costumes, usually met with at these resorts; but they lost much of their effect in the dense crowd. This also militated against the exciting whirl of the "galoppe monstre" which would otherwise have rivalled that of the carnival balls at the Academie Royale A few turbulent spirits might, perhaps, have been conveyed over the way to the Bow-street station house with great advantage to the rest; but, upon the whole, there was not much to complain of, except want of room for those who really went to dance, and this was the primary cause of most of the disturbances that now and then broke forth. A few of the costumes were very effective. There was a Puss in Boots, cleverly made up; and a Thatched Man, taken from a wood-cut which appeared some time ago in 'Punch." Some Chinese and Ojibbeways also deserve mention; and the Debardeurs and Postilions came out especially. There were a Pierrot, a few Brigands, and the usual complement of Greeks and other conventional masquerade foreigners; and, very properly, all the low rabble of Clowns, Pantaloons, Tinkers, &c. were excluded. At one time of the evening the appearance of the house was truly splendid; and having seen this, we did not care to wait for what might possibly have taken place at a more advanced period of the night.

ADELPHI.

He must be an early dramatic author now-a-days who would outstrip his competitors. The rapidity with which the translations of French pieces are brought out in London has lately been so remarkable—and to this style of productions have the labours of these writers been principally confined of late—that we are almost tempted to indulge in a species of Jonathanism, and anticipate the representation of some attractive "adaptation" in London even before it has been written in Paris. Messrs. Lemon and à Beckett have made a step towards this consummation, at least in dramatising a native story, by producing a version of Mr. Dickens's new work, "The Chimes" (which was only given forth to the eager world on Monday), at this theatre on Wednesday evening.

Doubtless long ere this the book itself has been in the hands of thousands of our readers; to those, however, who have not seen it, a few words respecting it, before noticing the piece founded on it, may not be unacceptable. It sets forth, as its title expresses, "A Goblin Story of Some Bells that Rang an Old Year Out and a New Year In." This is accomplished in a vision, dreamed by one Toby Veck, a simple-hearted ticket-porter, after eating too heartily of tripe. In this dream he is called to the belfry of the church beside whose walls he is accustomed to have his stand, and with whose chimes he has formed a species of acquaintanceship. Certain scenes are then represented to him by the spirits of the bells, tending to correct an opinion he has formed—that, as a poor man, he has no business upon earth, and, in fact, is only an intruder. The grievances of the agricultural labourers form, perhaps, the chief subject of these visions. At last he awakes, on the morning of the New Year, having learned "that we must trust and hope, and neither doubt ourselves, nor doubt the good in one another."

On the present occasion the labour of the dramatists has been a light one, the scenes being transferred, nearly word for word, from the book, the four quarters of whose Chimes form the four acts. But as a whole—although possibly a deeper object was aimed at than in the last year's Christmas offering—it is certainly inferior to the "Carol," in pathos, humour, and interest. There were none of those touches of nature which went home to the hearts of all with such force: we missed all the characters that we looked forward to for engrossing all our sympathies, as honest Bob Cratchit, good-hearted Mr. and Mrs. Fezzewig, and poor Tiny Tim, had done twelve months since.

The dialogue was forcible, but there appeared to us to be less kindliness in its intent than we have been accustomed to admire in Mr. Dickens's works: and however admirable it may be to read, there was much of it which "hung" considerably in its dramatic form. This might be from the absence of all sustaining interest, no one appearing to feel particularly concerned about the fate of any of the characters; and it might also have proceeded from its length. A good half hour may be saved out of the piece, by judicious curtailment, with advantage; and this was evidently the opinion of everybody near us.

The acting was, in every respect, excellent. Mr. O. Smith, as Toby Veck, entirely carried out the intentions of the author. His performance was marked with the greatest care, and an eye to the most artistic effect in every word and action. Mr. Hudson, as Will Fern, an English labourer, was also fully entitled to the applause he received; and Mr. Selby played the young blacksmith, Richard, very truthfully. There were characters for nearly all the other members of the company, but they were not of sufficient consequence to call for any particular remark, beyond that of being generally well sustained. Miss Fortescue enacted Meggy Veck, Toby's daughter, in a graceful and natural manner, the part being exactly suited to her; and a young lady who played Lilian, but whose name we did not see in the bill, deserves more than ordinary commendation. Her performance in the third scene of the third act—the garret of the sempstress—was one of the best bits of acting in the drama.

The piece has been brought out with great attention. The title-page in the book, drawn by Mr. Maclise, forms an appropriate drop-scene; and, whenever the opportunity was given, the tableaux have been followed. We would suggest, however, that another background be found for the fête scene at Bowley Hall. Trees are not accustomed to be in full leafy summer luxuriance upon New Year's Day, nor are tables laid in the open air at such a season. The applause at the fall of the curtain was loud and general, and the actors were called for to appear again and receive the renewed approbation of the audience. The drama was announced for repetition every evening without a dissentient voice, and may be considered as completely successful. We may mention a prologue, spoken carefully by Miss Ellen Chaplin, as a Spirit of the Chimes.

MUSIC.

CROSBY HALL CONCERTS.

On Wednesday evening last the second concert of Sacred Music was given at Crosby Hall. The attendance was numerous and highly respectable, as might have been expected from the attractive and well-selected programme, which included pieces from the works of Purcell, Spohr, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Crotch, Mozart, Hummel, Bach, Neukomm, and Handel. The solos were sung by Madame Caradori Allan, Miss Steele, and Mr. Hobbes, supported by an able and efficient chorus. The "Gratias Agimus" was beautifully given by Madame Caradori Allan, who was also encored in "Angels ever bright and fair." A carol by Sebastian Bach, "The Hymn of the Angels" was given with a feeling and effect we have rarely heard equalled; but the grandest piece for the evening was the chorus from "Israel in Egypt," with which the concert concluded—"Sing ye to the Lord for he hath triumphed gloriously." From the taste that rules the selections, and the skill and proficiency exhibited in the performance of the music of these sacred concerts, they may be pronounced among the best of the kind in London.

MADAME GRADINI'S SOIREE MUSICALE.

On Tuesday evening a concert was given at the Concert Room of the Princess' Theatre, by Madame Gradini, a lady better known to the musical and theatrical circles by her former name, Miss Graddon, who made a favourable impression on the public some years ago both by her talents as an actress, and her voice as a singer. On the present occasion she gave Rossini's "Di Piazer," and "Una Voce Poco Fa," with great ease and execution. The room was well attended, and several efficient vocalists rendered their assistance. Mr. Machin sung "O Ruddier than the Cherry" in excellent style; and Mr. J. Parry was encored in Albert Smith's "Fayre Rosamonde," and the "Polka Explained," as enthusiastically as if they had not been the favourites of almost every concert of the London season. Madame Gradini will be an acquisition to the list of our concert singers.

EPITOME OF NEWS—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

A well-known actor in the Reign of Terror, died at Paris a few days ago aged 79. His name was Perruchon, but he had been nicknamed La Lanterne. This appellation he received from having been, during the first Revolution, one of the public executioners, who summarily hanged such persons as incurred suspicion to the first lamp-post. He latterly followed the occupation of a chiffonnier or "picker up of unconsidered trifles." Whenever he had money he got drunk, and yet he was never sick. He wore a long white beard, and was very tall. He scarcely ever spoke, and if by chance any one addressed him, he looked as if he could stab him.

A letter from Sigmaringen, of the 5th instant, announces the marriage there, on that day, of the Marquis Joachim Napoleon Pepoli, grandson of Murat, with her Serene Highness Princess Frida de Hohenzollern Sigmaringen, youngest daughter of the reigning Prince.

A vacancy occurs in the Customs Board by the decease of the Hon. Heneage Legge, one of the Commissioners, who died near Richmond last week.

The Presse states that there has been discovered near Bonn the carcass of an enormous crocodile, which, by the nature and the conformation of its scales, differs entirely from all species of that animal hitherto known. These animals are divided into different species, according to the countries they inhabit. It would appear by the recent discovery, that before the Deluge the Rhine possessed a peculiar species of crocodile.

According to a letter from Warsaw of the 27th ult., a section of the railroad, which is to run from that capital to Cracow, is opened as far as Pruszkou, a distance of about five French leagues. The train that conveyed Prince Paskewitsch, the Governor-general of Poland, who honoured the opening with his presence, together with 25 members of the railroad committee, and several high military and civil functionaries, made the passage in 26 minutes.

On Friday week, a boat containing five individuals, proceeding to the Dædalus, lying in Plymouth Sound, was accidentally upset, and all were drowned.

Letters from the Cape of Good Hope announce the loss of an East Indian trader the Saint Mungo, on the 20th of Sept. on the point of Cape L'Agullus, on her passage from Calcutta to Newcastle-upon Tyne. Unhappily ten of the crew were drowned. The ship was built at Glasgow in the year 1839, and, with the cargo, was valued at £60,000.

The celebrated Prussian fabulist Kriloff died lately at Saint Petersburg at the age of 77. His funeral was attended by the Emperor Nicholas in person, a rare mark of honour, which naturally attracted a multitudinous assemblage.

A pauper in the Liverpool workhouse, named Robert Bickersteth, aged 85, died suddenly on Monday afternoon. The cause of death arose from excessive eating. [It must be a rare if not an unprecedented case for a man to die in a workhouse from excessive eating. There must be some mistake.]

A fire broke out on the 17th ult., at Balikessa, in Asia Minor, which consumed about 100 houses, including shops and buildings; and another fire occurred at Constantinople, which reduced to ashes about 100 houses.

An alarming fire broke out at Ehingen (Wurtemberg) on the night of the 8th inst., which destroyed forty eight houses.

The Sud of Marseilles states that on the 8th there was the heaviest fall of snow in that city that has been recorded for a hundred years. The snow was nearly 50 centimètres (about 20 inches English) in depth.

We are glad to find, from letters received from Trebizond of the 16th of November, that Dr. Woolff has arrived in safety at Teheran, on his way to Tabreez and Erzeroum, for England.

The new Opera House at Berlin was opened with great splendour on the 7th instant, the old one having been burnt down about a year and a half ago. There were present, on the invitation of the King of Prussia, the Dukes of Saxe-Weimar, Mecklenburg-Schwerin, Mecklenburg-Strelitz, Brunswick, and Anhalt-Dessau, and their families, besides the diplomatic corps, the ministers of state, and many other distinguished persons.

A letter from Berlin, dated Dec. 11, says it was reported on 'Change to-day, on the authority of a traveller who came from Hamburgh, that Mr. Solomon Heine was dead. It was likewise said that one of the bank notes lately stolen in London had made its appearance in Hamburgh, and that the person, in attempting to pass it, had been immediately arrested by the police of that city.

A letter from Constantinople, of the 27th ult., speaks of the severe cold which has been felt in Turkey. The north wind had set in, and cold and rain had succeeded the mild temperature enjoyed at Constantinople until the middle of November. The most frightful weather prevailed in the Black Sea, and the last Turkish steamer from Trebizond had had two men frozen on board.

At the quarterly meeting of the Court of Proprietors, held at the India House, on Wednesday, Captain Sheppard, the chairman, stated that the vote which had been come to by the general court for granting an annuity of £1000 per annum to Major-General Sir W. Nott, had received the approval of the Board of Control.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE (Friday).—The supply of English wheat here to-day was very limited, owing to which, and the fair attendance of dealers, the demand for that article was steady, at fully Monday's quotations. Foreign wheat, free of duty, was in good request, and previous rates were steadily supported. The quantity of English barley was not large, yet the trade was dull, without any variation in price. Foreign barley was plentiful, and the distillers supplied themselves with the best sorts at previous rates. The best tender malt was in request, but other qualities were dull. The Seed Market.—Linseed and rape-cakes continue in good request, at fully the late improved value. Other kinds of seeds are rather dull.

The following are the present rates:—Linseed cakes, English, £12 to £13; ditto, foreign, £7 12s to £8 10s, per 1000.

Tea.—Since our last, the demand for all kinds of tea has ruled very steady, and previous rates are freely supported. Common sound Congou is quoted at 10½d to 11d; and yellow leaf Twankay 1s 2½d to 1s 3d per lb cash.

Sugar.—Notwithstanding the present period of the year, most kinds of raw sugar are in fair request, at full currencies; indeed, in some instances, the best kinds of Barbadoes have sold at rather more money. The refined market is also firm, at 72s 6d to 73s for standard lumps.

Coffee.—The market having been abundantly supplied with Ceylon coffee, that article must be quoted quite 1s per cwt. lower—good ordinary having sold at 51s to 51s 6d per cwt. Nearly the whole of the parcels offered at auction have been withdrawn.

Cocoa.—West India is in good request, and full prices are paid.

Fruit.—As most of the grocers are well supplied, the fruit market has become inactive, and in some cases rather lower rates have been accepted by the holders.

Rice.—This article continues in fair request, at last week's quotations.

Indigo.—The market has a dull appearance. About 300 chests have sold at a decline on the last sale's rates of 3d to 4d per lb

Oils.—For most kinds of oils we have a fair demand at late rates.

Provisions.—Dutch butter is still selling freely at more money—116s to 120s having been paid for the best Friesland, 106s to 114s for Kiel, and 104s to 112s for Holstein. Irish butter has supported the late advance: sales of Carlow, landed, 92s to 104s; Cork, 94s to 100s; Limerick, 97s to 98s; Waterford, 90s to 96s; Carrick, 95s to 100s per cwt. The arrivals of bacon having been very small, that article is in request at 1s per cwt. more money. For forward delivery there is more disposition to purchase. Lard and all other kinds of provisions are quite as dear.

Tallow.—P. Y. C. has met a better demand. Several parcels on the spot have sold at 40s 3d to 40s 9d; and to arrive, 41s to 41s 3d per cwt. The stock is still good.

Wool.—Both English and foreign qualities are commanding a steady inquiry, and prices are well supported.

Potatoes.—The supplies of potatoes having fallen off, the demand for them is active, at higher rates: they were ruling from £3 to £4 per ton.

Coals (Friday.)—Scarcely a single cargo of coals has appeared on offer this week, hence we have no prices to report.

Hops (Friday).—The supply of hops on offer in this market is but limited, yet the demand is in a sluggish state, at last week's quotations. Holders generally are looking forward to higher rates. Sussex pockets, £7 to £8 5s; Wealds, £6 18s to £8 0s; Mid Kent, £8 0s to £10 15s; East Kent, £7 7s to £8 0s; Choice ditto, £10 0s to £12 0s; Farnhams, £10 0s to £10 10s.

Smithfield (Friday).—For the time of year, we had a fair average supply of beasts on sale this morning, both as respects number and quality, while the beef trade was firm, and Monday's prices were steadily supported. Scarcely a single head of foreign stock was offering, while the receipts from Scotland were small. Sheep—the supply of which was good—met a sluggish demand, yet we can notice no alteration in prices. In calves very little was doing, yet the rates remained stationary. Pigs were a dull sale, but not cheaper. Milch cows sold heavily, at from £16 to £19 each.

Per 8lbs to sink the offal:—Coarse and inferior beasts, 2s 10d to 3s 0d; second quality do., 3s 2d to 3s 6d; prime large oxen, 3s 8d to 4s 2d; prime Scots, &c., 4s 4d to 4s 6d; coarse and inferior sheep, 2s 10d to 3s 2d; second quality ditto, 3s 4d to 3s 8d; prime coarse woolled sheep, 3s 10d to 4s 0d; prime Southdown ditto, 4s 2d to 4s 4d; large coarse calves, 3s 4d to 4s 0d; prime small ditto, 4s 2d to 4s 4d; large hogs, 3s 0d to 3s 6d; small porkers, 3s 8d to 4s 0d; sucking calves, 18s to 30s; and quarter old store pigs, 16s to 20s each. MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

There has been little worthy of recording occur in the English market during the week. Consols opened on Monday at 100½ to ¼ for the account, after the dividends, and at the close of the week remain at the same quotation. New Three-and-a-Quarter per Cents, which had previously been below the relative value of Consols, advanced on Wednesday to 103½, and have since rather improved on the quotation. It has been for some time past a matter of surprise that there should exist so striking a difference in the value of Consols and New Three-and-a-Quarter per Cents. By many it has been attributed, and with some reason, to the fact that the stock paying the lowest dividend is usually chosen for investment by trustees and executors, with the known approval of the Court of Chancery. This of course creates a daily demand for Consols and Reduced, while the great proportion of those who invest in the New Three-and-a-Quarter per Cents are private individuals. The latter changing their stock comparatively rarely, leaves the quotation for some time nominal, until a large purchase or sale places it at its true market value. The closing price of New Three-and-a-Quarter per Cents is 103½ to ¼. Bank Stock has ranged and continues to quote 208 to 209. Exchequer Bills are flat at 57 to 59. India Stock closes at 286; the India Bonds about 73 to 75 premium; and Consols are 100¼ to ⅛ for the opening, with rather a flat market.

The Foreign Market has been rather more animated during the week, and some variation in prices has been the result. A failure on Tuesday, the half-monthly settling-day, caused a momentary alarm when it first became known, but it was ultimately found to be of much less importance than was supposed. Money, however, fetched from 5 to 7 per cent., according to the character of the borrower. Mexican receded on Monday to 36 to ½, from a belief that, including the last arrival of dollars, the funds in hand applicable to the October dividend are still very small. It closes at 36¼ to ½, having rallied a point on Thursday. Spanish has remained since Monday at 25½ for the Actives, but the Three per Cents. have advanced from 37½ to ⅝ to 37⅞ to ⅝, at which price they close. Portuguese has maintained its price at 57½ to 58½. French Scrip, on the contrary, has declined since last week, quoting only 1½ premium; and Belgian has also receded to ⅞ premium. Dutch Stock was rather flatter towards the close of the week, quoting 97⅞ ⅝ for the Four per Cent. Certificates, and the Two-and-a-Half per Cents. 61¼. Belgian closes at 102 to ½; Brazilian, 85; Chilian, 99 to 100; ditto Deferred, 53; Venezuela Two per Cents., 44.

The Share Market has been rather dull since Tuesday, on which day the settlement took place. It was unusually heavy, and one defaulter was declared. The extensive fluctuation in Dover Railway shares is understood to be the cause. The account generally was, however, settled tolerably well, money being easy, at moderate prices. The closing quotations of the lines most in request are—Bristol and Exeter, 36½: Cambridge and Lincoln, 2⅞; London and Birmingham Stock, 227; Eastern Counties, 14⅞; Brighton, 51½; South Western, 76½; Midland, 113; Birmingham and Derby, 83½; Newcastle and Darlington, 61½; Newcastle and Berwick, 7½; Richmond and West-end Junction, 2½; Trent Valley, 8⅞; Orleans and Bordeaux, 7⅞; Strasbourg and Bale, 12½; York and North Midland (Extension), 12; Rouen and Havre, 22⅞; Sheffield and Lincoln, 18s.

SATURDAY MORNING.—No fluctuations of importance occurred in either the English or Foreign House yesterday, and prices remained at previous quotations. In the Share Market some activity prevailed: the closing price of Edinburgh and Glasgow is 61½ ex new; Sheffield and Manchester, 97½; Sheffield and Lincoln Junction, 30s.; Glasgow and Dumfries, 18s. 6d.

SMITHFIELD CATTLE MARKET, AT CHRISTMAS.

THE CHRISTMAS CATTLE AT SMITHFIELD.

The "Christmas Cattle Market" at Smithfield has this year excited considerable attention. As might be expected from the fine frosts experienced for some time past, and the consequent favourable state of the weather for slaughtering, the graziers were tolerably certain of realising more remunerating prices for the stock, especially the beasts, than we have reported for a lengthened period. In this expectation they were, however, in a great measure disappointed; for the atmosphere having suddenly become mild, many of the butchers in attendance, the number of which was exceedingly great, refused to purchase at anything like the asking quotations, some of which were high in the extreme. Hence the beef trade was, the time of year considered, in a very sluggish state, with the exception of a few of the finest animals producing high rates. The highest general figure did not exceed 4s. 6d. per 8lb.

In noticing the "prodigies" of the show of beasts, we have to refer to the thirteen most wonderful Durhams and short horns sent by Sir C. Knightley, which for symmetry and weight were never excelled by any stock brought together for competition in any cattle yard in England. These extraordinary beasts, the whole of which were under five years old, were the admiration of all beholders, while there was only one of them under 200 stones (8lb.)

The next in importance, as to quality, were the thirty Herefords and Sussex beasts, the property of Mr. Senior, of Broughton House, near Aylesbury. Many of them weighed upwards of 250 stones, and were sold at from £50 to £60 per head. Mr. Senior was a successful exhibitor at the club's show.

We have also to mention the 43 Herefords offered by Mr. Rowland, of Crislow. This stock, considering the number shown by one gentleman as his own property, was decidedly the best in the market, though we consider that one of the Herefords sold by Mr. Senior was superior to anything we almost ever saw. Mr. Rowland exhibited an animal which carried off one of the prizes at a local show a few weeks since.

Mr. Guerrier had the celebrated short-horn which carried off the £30 prize, as awarded by the Smithfield Club. This, and three others—viz., a short-horn and two Herefords—were greatly and deservedly admired.

Mr. Morgan had the largest, and perhaps the most astonishing show of beasts of any salesman in the market, consisting of shorthorns, Devons, Herefords, &c.

Mr. Vorley's stand was filled with many extremely good animals, which were sold at high prices.

On the whole, the Herefords stood at the top of the poll, both in weight and semmetry. The next in importance in these particulars, were the Devons, the next the Durhams, the next the short horns, and the next the Scots. In speaking of the latter breed, it is placed beyond a doubt, that the show was the very best ever noticed.

In the Sheep, a very great improvement was noticed, indeed scarcely so fine a collection of half-breds was ever known on such an occasion as the present. Mr. Wesll had on offer forty wonderful Downs and ten Gloucesters, the property of E. F. Wittingstall, Esq., of Langley Bury, Herts; the former, which weighed on an average about 20 stones (8lbs.), and produced £5 per head, were almost unrivalled; while the latter exceeded in weight 30 stones (8lbs.), and found buyers at £6 each.

Very few foreign beasts or sheep were on sale, and there was scarcely any inquiry for them. The imports for the United Kingdom, since the previous Monday, amounted to 180 oxen and cows, and 200 sheep, in, for the most part, good condition.

The comparative supplies for this and last year were as follow:—

	Dec. 11, 1843.	Dec. 16, 1844.
Beasts	4,510	5,713
Sheep and Lambs	26,560	36,970
Calves	93	111
Pigs	421	362

At the close of the market nearly the whole of the stock was disposed of.

ELECTION OF THE COURT OF COMMON COUNCIL.

St. Thomas's Day (Dec. 21), although the shortest day in the year, is, as regards the business of the Civic Government of the Metropolis, the longest, or, at least, the most important; for, upon this day, takes place, annually, the election of the members of the Court of Common Council. The wits and wags, who have sport of the citizens since the boon days of Charles II., have termed this council "the City Parliament:" it is, however, the great legislative body of the Corporation; and a more appropriate opportunity of introducing its constitution to our readers, could not be chosen than this day, the anniversary of the election.

"The fluctuations in the constitution of the Common Council," say the Corporation Commissioners, "are not always to be accurately traced. In the earliest times, the words Commune Concilium, appear to have been applied sometimes to the whole body of citizens, sometimes to the magistracy (that is, the Lord Mayor and Aldermen), or the magistracy and sheriffs. In the reign of Henry III. a folkenote seems to have been summoned to meet the magiatracy three or four times in the year, and on special occasions. In the Saxon time, the folkenote, as the meeting of the entire body of people in the open air was called, or the husting or common hall, when within doors, exercised the most important functions of local government; and, although these rights were placed in abeyance during the first shock of the Conquest, they were again claimed, and made the subject of frequent struggles, as reviving peace and prosperity afforded opportunities.

In the time of Edward I. and Edward II., a body analogous to the Common Council was formed by representatives from the different Wards of the City. From thence to the time of Richard II., the Companies or Mysteries returned representatives.

In the Mayoralty of Nicolas Prembre (7 and 8 Rich. II.), ordinances were made, establishing the election by Wardmotes.

The Common Council has increased its own number, and has altered the disposition of the different numbers among the several Wards, under the power which it claims of internal legislation. In the great Quo Warranto case, in the reign of Charles II., the City pleaded the custom as follows:—"That within the said City there has been, time out of mind, a Common Council assembled as often as necessary, consisting of the Mayor, Aldermen, and certain of the Citizens, not exceeding 250 persons thereunto annually elected, called the Commons of the City."

The number has never exceeded 240; but the real state of the custom is the subject of much doubt among those best acquainted with the Corporation.

We find the numbers to have been as follow:—In 1384 (7 Rich. II.), 96 members; July 31, 1384, 207; 1549, 197; Stowe's Survey, 1717, 231; Stowe, 1736 and 1755, 214; 1837, 240; reduced in 1840 to 206.

From 1660 to 1676, several attempts were made by the Aldermen to limit the choice of the Wardmote to citizens of the higher classes; but no permanent regulation was the result.

In 1831, a Committee reported that persons convictedof defrauding in weights and measures, or having compounded with their creditors, or of having been bankrupt without paying 20s. in the pound, were ineligible as Common Councilmen, according to a supposed analogy to a standing order excluding them from Committees of that body.

The Court of Common Council consists, first, of the Aldermen (including the Lord Mayor), and secondly, of the Commons, or Common Councilmen, in all 206. They are elected by the 26 wards, excluding Bridge Without. The election, as we have already intimated, takes place every year, on St. Thomas's Day, 21st of December; the candidate must be a householder of the ward for which he declares; he must also be a freeman. The Alderman of the ward is the presiding officer at the election; and the return of the persons elected is made on Monday next after the Epiphany, i. e., Plough Monday.

Of the functions of the Council, it will be only necessary to observe, that it is the legislative body of the corporation, and in that capacity enjoys an unusual degree of power, such as that of making important alterations in the constitution of the latter; that it dispenses the funds, manages the landed property, has the care of the bridges, and of the Thames navigation, with many other powers and trusts.

The Court also elects the Common Sergeant, the City Solicitor, the Town Clerk, the Remembrancer, the Judges of the Sheriffs' Court, the City Tradesmen, about one-half the Commissioners of Sewers; and several subordinate officers, as the Sergeant-Carver, Sergeants of the Channel, Yeomen of the Waterside, Sword-bearer, and Sword-bearer's Young Man.

A great defect in the constitution of the Court is the inequality of the wards, and the number of representatives returned for each ward bearing no just and uniform relation to the property of the ward, the number of inhabitants, or even of resident freemen. The Ward of Bridge, for example, returns eight Common Councilmen (formerly sixteen), while the large Ward of Farringdon Without, with a population fifteen times as numerous, returns only twice the number; so that one householder in the Ward of Bridge has the same influence as nearly eight householders in the Ward of Farringdon Without; and the same disproportion prevails in many other wards.

Each Common Councilman wears a robe of Mazarine blue, trimmed with badger's fur—a costume, probably, of the reign of Edward VI. The chamber in which the meetings of the Court are held, with the presentation of a petition at the bar, is shown in our engraving. The Council-chamber is a very tasteful room, erected by the late George Dance, Esq., R. A., and is approached from the northern side of the Guildhall (i.e., the Great or Common Hall), by an elegant corridor. Within the chamber are assembled some of the chief artistical treasures of the Corporation. In a marble niche, at the west end, behind the President's chair, is a marble statue of King George III., executed by Chantrey, for the Corporation, at an expense of £3089 9s. 5d.: on the pedestal is an inscription written by Mr. Alderman Birch, who, in the year of its erection, 1815, was Lord Mayor. Here, too, are busts of Admiral Lord Nelson, the Duke of Wellington, Granville Sharp, and Thomas Clarkson. The walls are hung with pictures, among which are a portrait of her present Majesty: portraits of Queen Caroline and the Princess Charlotte, by Lonsdale; of Lords Rodney, Nelson, Duncan, St. Vincent, Howe, Hood, Cornwallis, &c.: and some pictures of battles, civic ceremonies, &c.; the collection being, altogether, a very interesting one. Among the latest additions is Mrs. Carpenter's excellent portrait of Lord Denman.

The office of Common Councilman may be regarded as the stepping-stone to the highest civic honour. Generally speaking, the Aldermen consist of Common Councilmen, who have won the good opinions of their fellow-citizens, and who are presumed to be fitted for the higher offices to which, as Aldermen, they are liable—the Shrievalty and the Mayoralty.

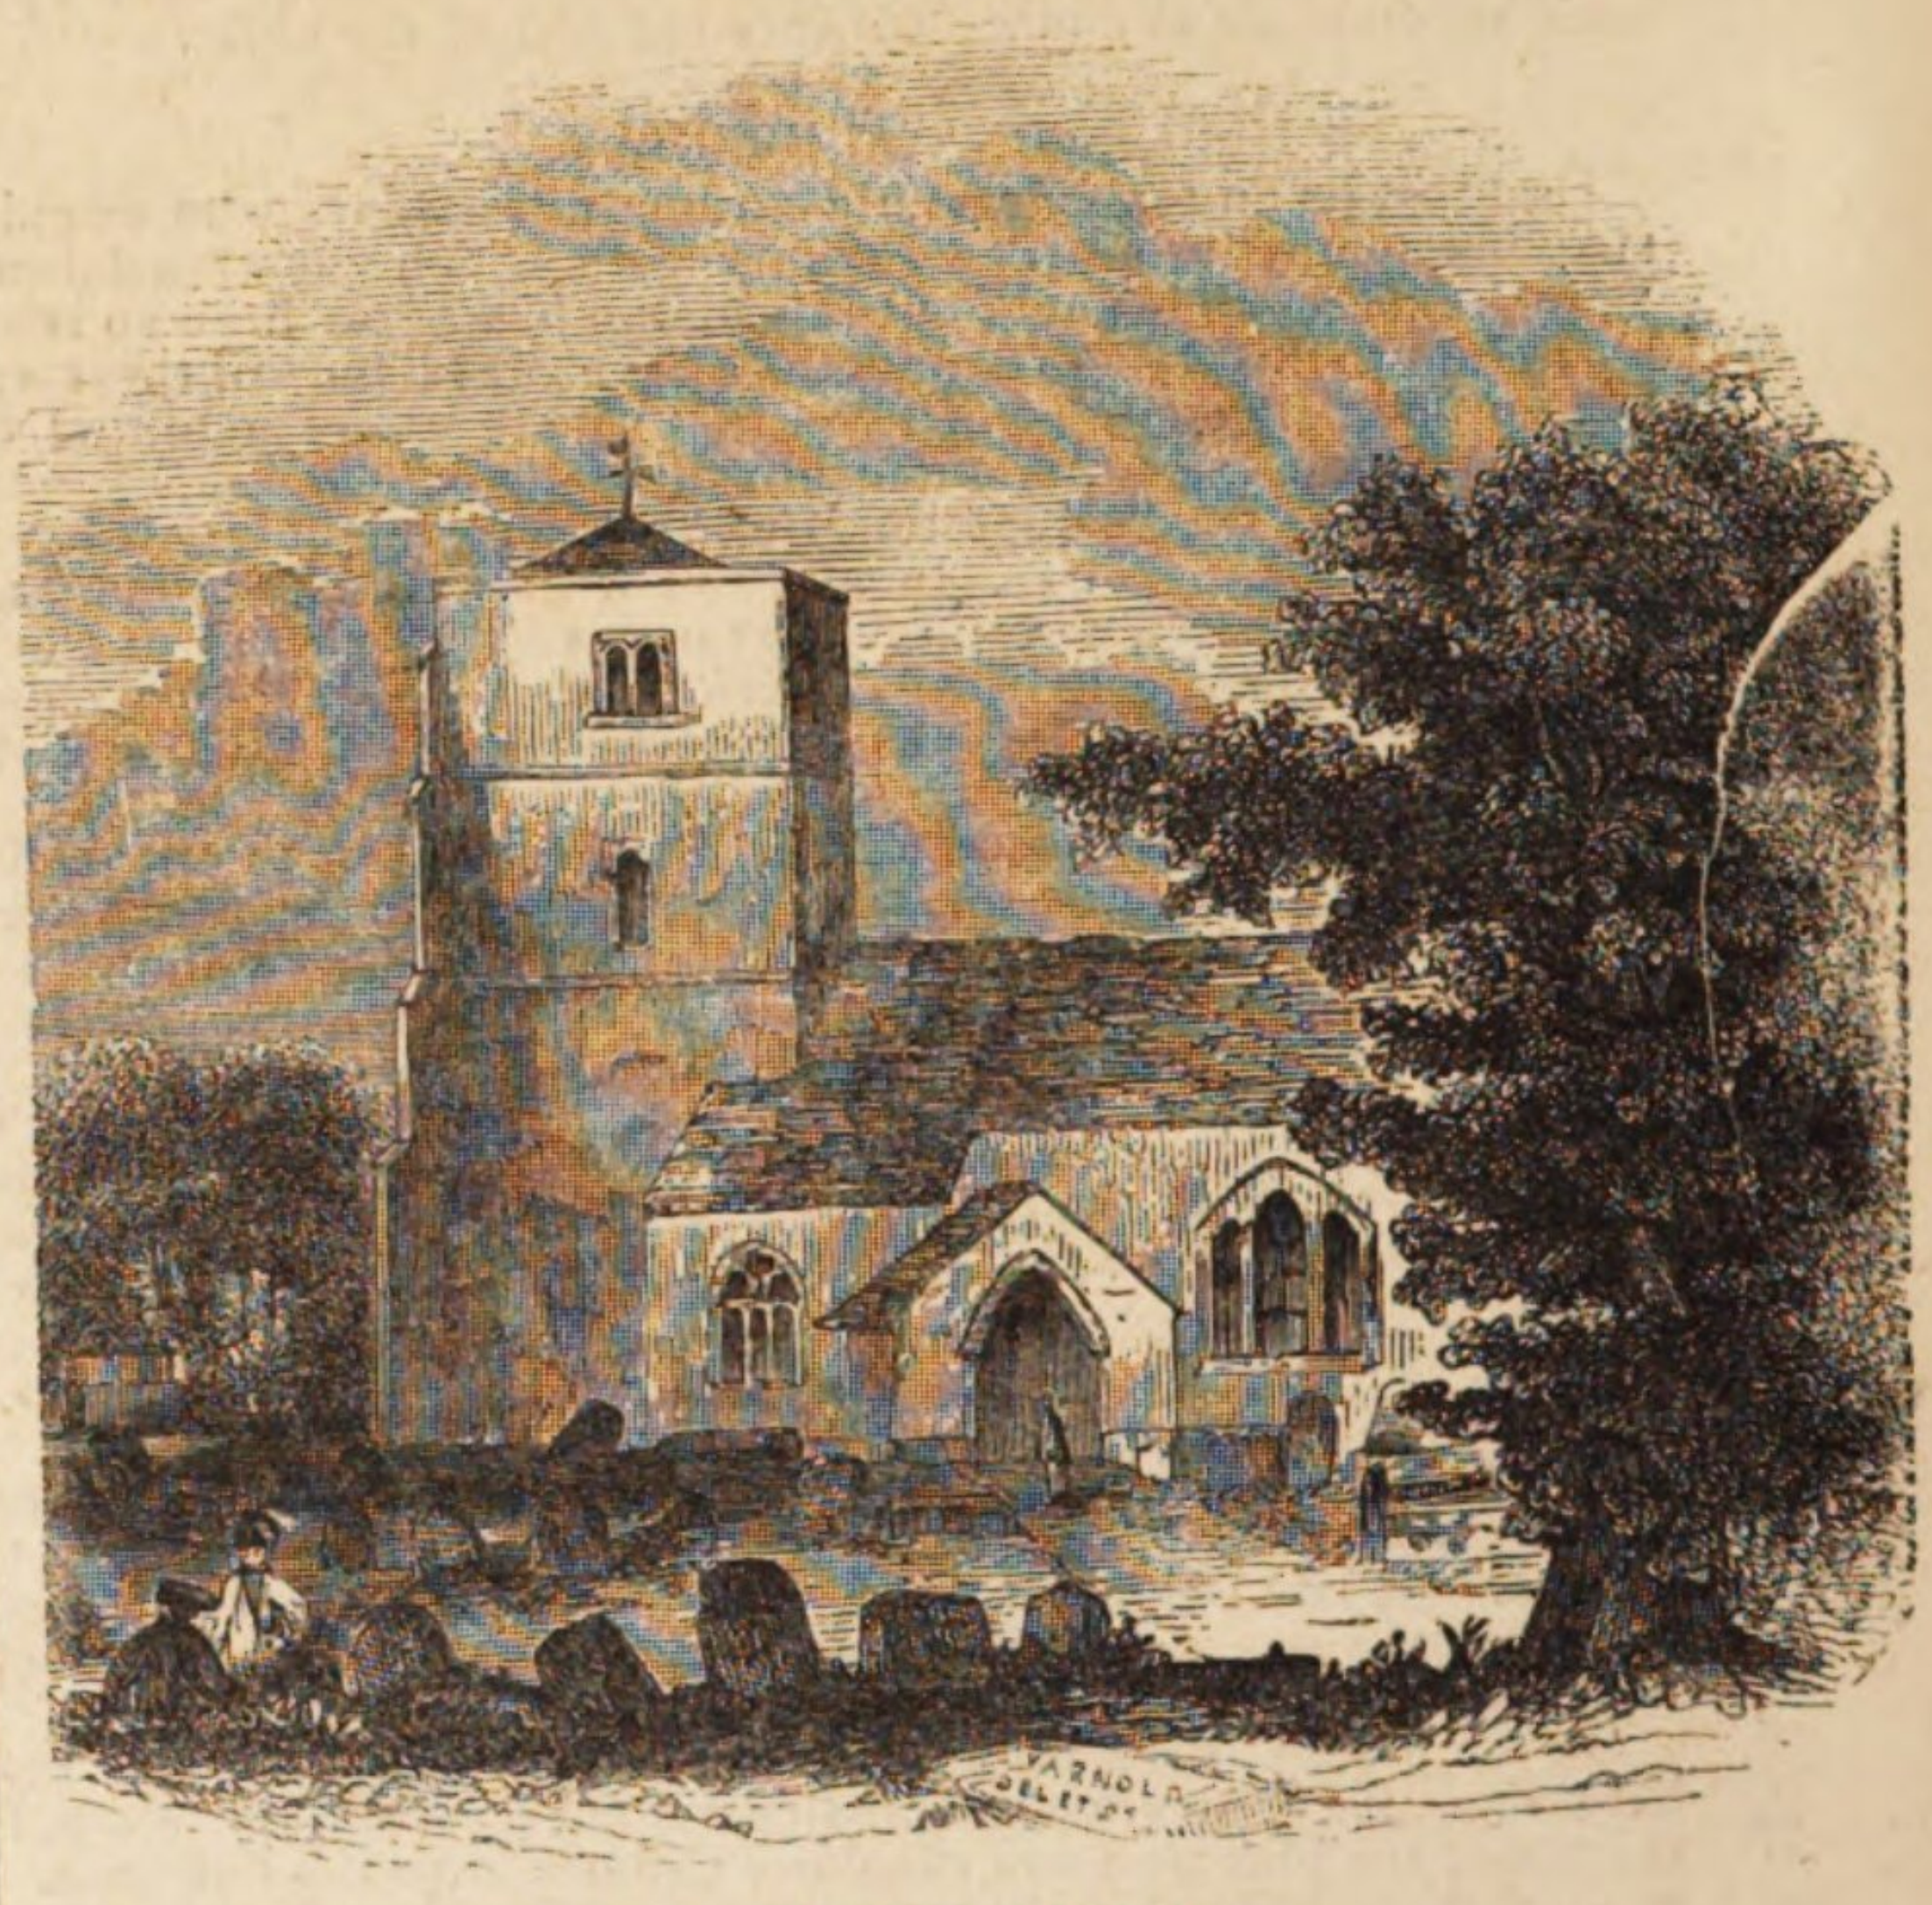
CHURCHES OF THE METROPOLIS.—No. L.

BEDDINGTON CHURCH.

The reader is aware that this series of illustrations occasionally extends beyond the metropolis; and on this occasion, we must crave the same license.

Beddington is one of the most rural villages in the picturesque environs o London. It lies in the hundred of Wellington, in Surrey, adjoining the parishes of Mitcham, Croydon, and Carshalton. The village is rich in Roman remains and the ancient Stane-street, in all probability, crossed the parish.



BEDDINGTON CHURCH.

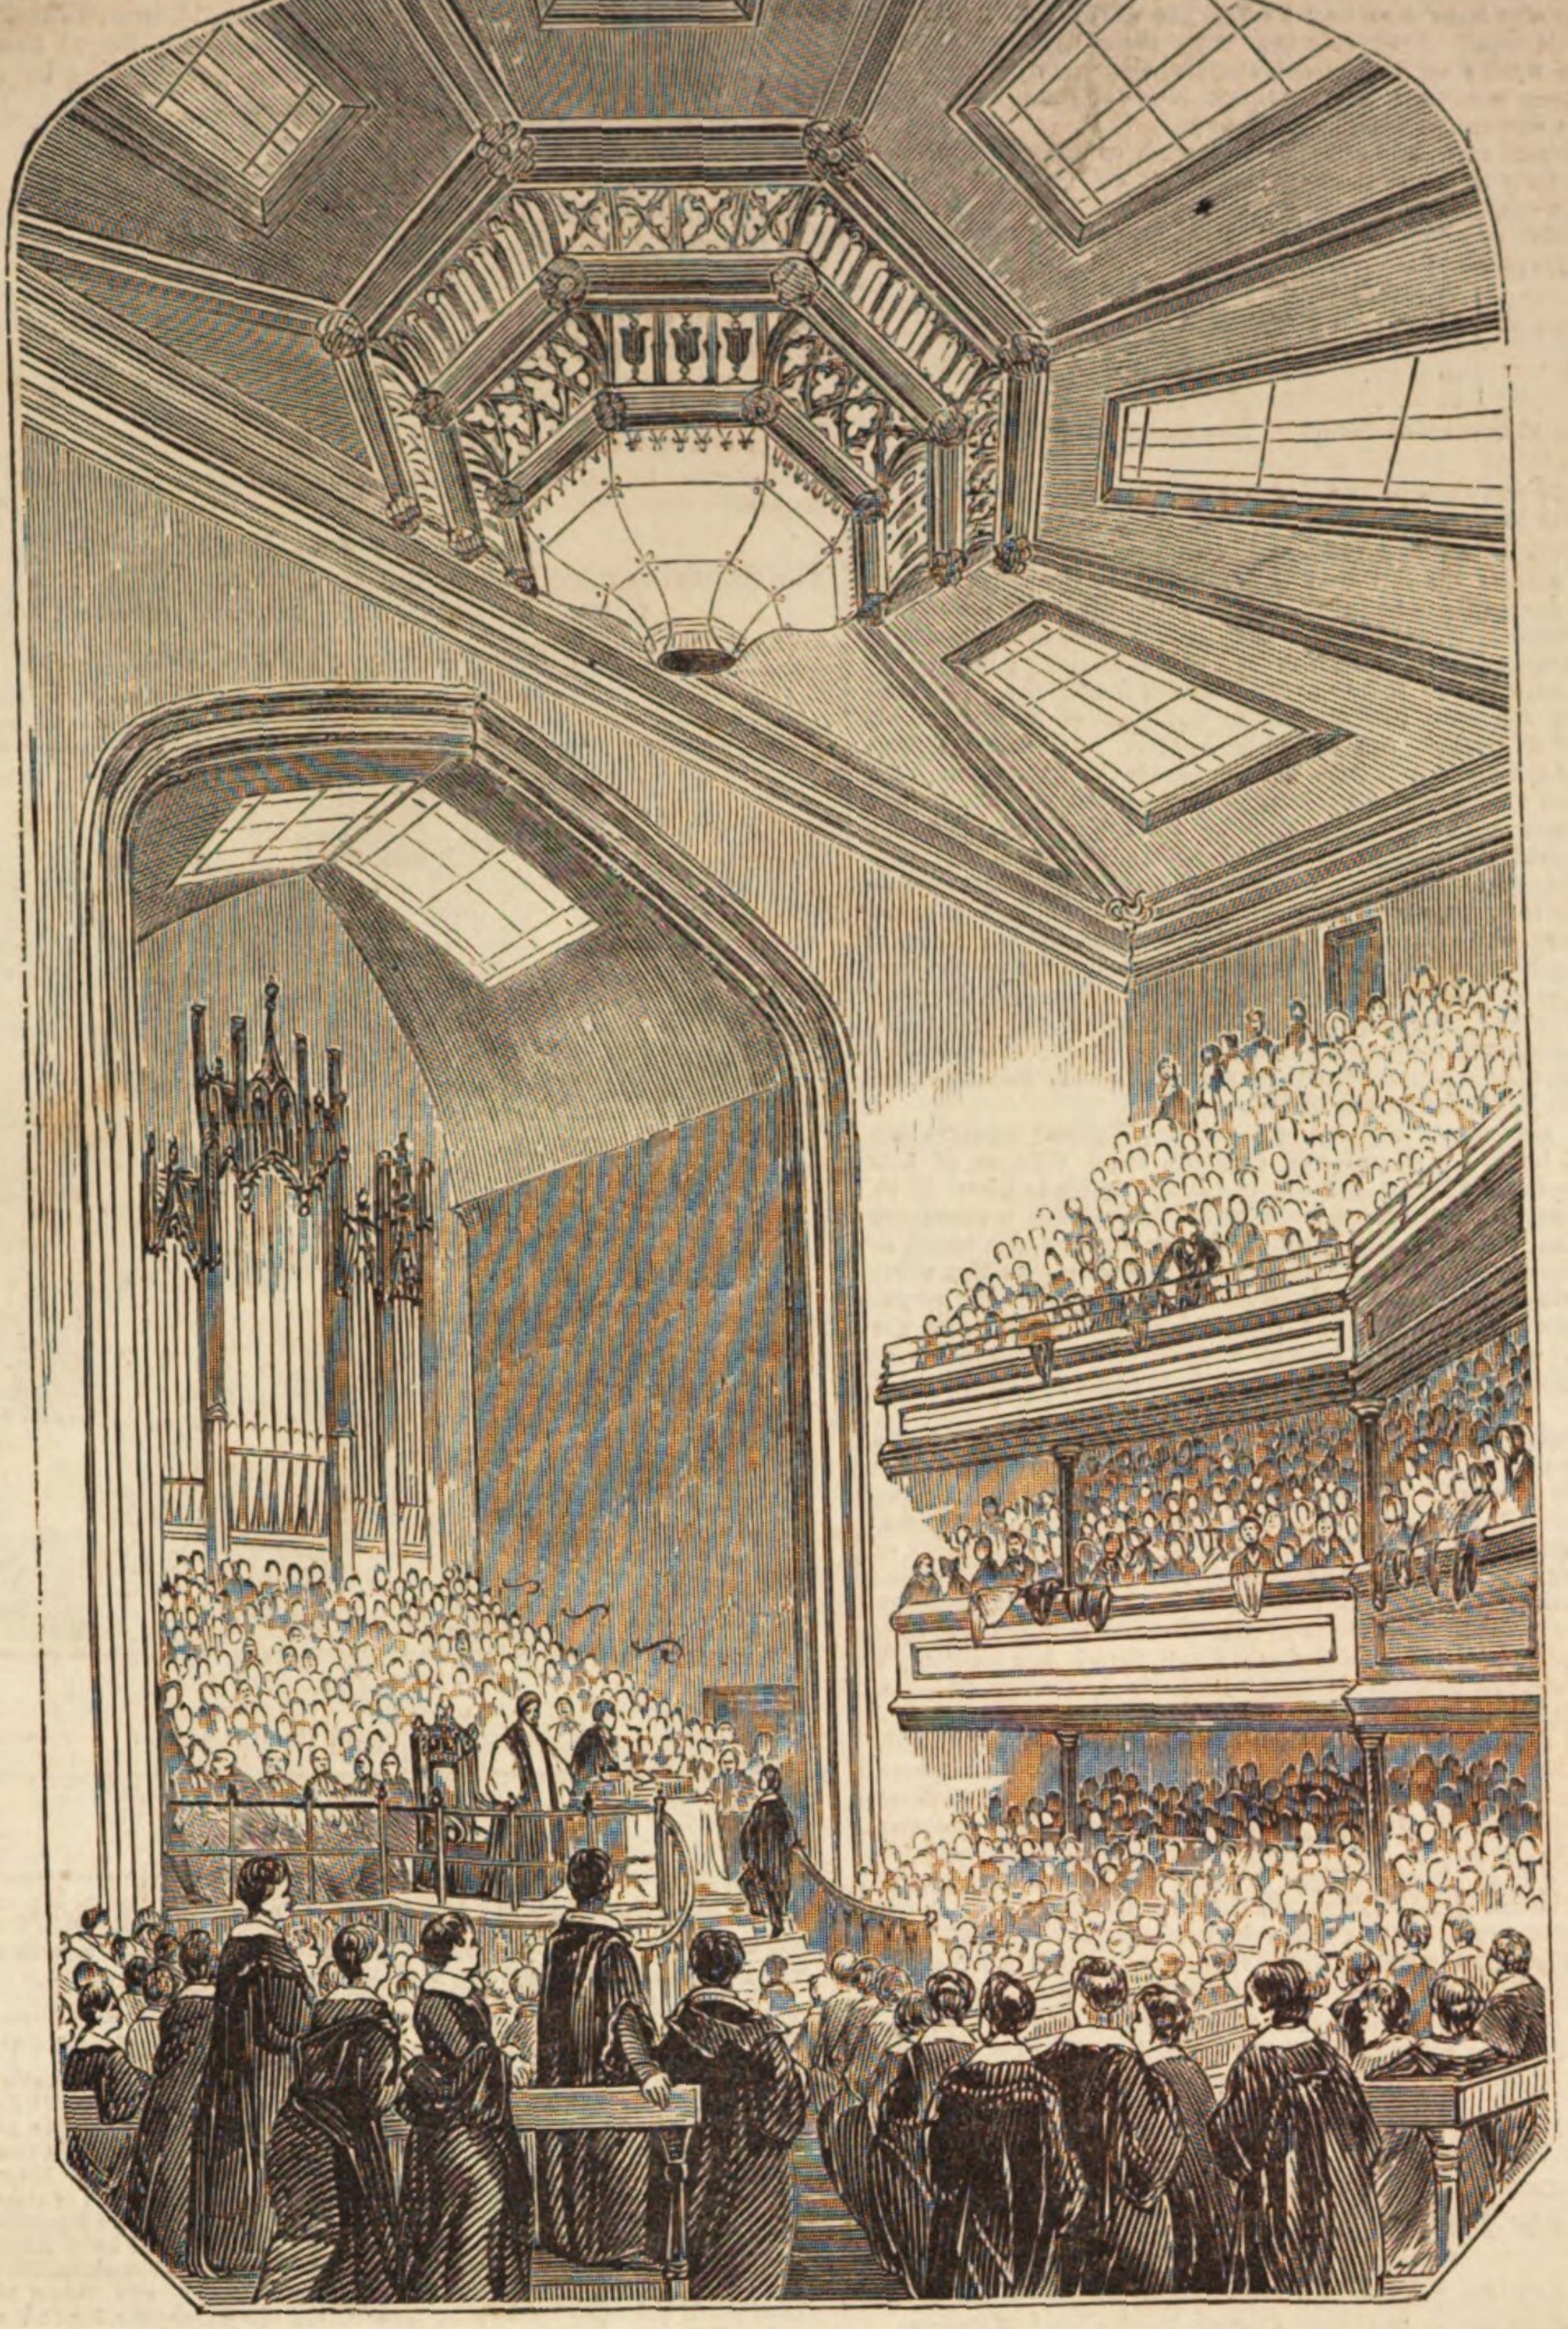
The church of Beddington, we gather from Brayley's laboriously compiled "History of Surrey," is mentioned in the Domesday Book; but no part of the present structure can be referred to the remote era of that record. It would seem, indeed, from the style of the architecture, to have been erected during the reign of Richard II.; a surmise receiving corroboration from a bequest made by Nicolas de Carreu, in 1390, of £20 "to the building of the church." The edifice is dedicated to St. Mary, and consists of a nave and aisles, a chancel, and, at the west end, a massive tower; together with a large south porch, and a monumental chapel for the Carew family attached to the chancel. The tower, which is supported by strong buttresses at the angles, was partly rebuilt on the old plan, about the year 1829.

The entrance doorway to the tower is formed by a high-pointed arch, over which is a very large and handsome window, comprising three tiers of trefoiled lights, progressively rising to the apex. The entrance from the porch is by a pointed arch, with deep cavettos in the mouldings, and quatrefoils in the spandrils.

The interior fittings are mostly modern: there is an ancient dipping-font; and in the singers' gallery, are four wooden stalls, or miseries, ornamented with foliage shields, a female head in a reticulated head-dress, and other carvings; these stalls having been, in all probability, provided for the "four fit chaplains" which Sir Nicolas de Carreu, in his will, dated 1387, directed "should be found, one of them for ever, and the others for five years, to pray for his soul, and all Christian souls, in the church of Beddington." The church abounds with costly monuments of the Carew family; besides mural tablets, brasses, and other sepulchral memorials of persons of distinction; all which are elaborately detailed in Mr. Brayley's work.

The churchyard, too, abounds with these mementos of mortality: the aisles the church are partly shrouded with ivy; and some noble elms, and a wide-spreading yew-tree, overshadow the graves in the inclosure.

EXTENSION OF THE SOUTH-WESTERN RAILWAY.—The South-Western Railway proprietors, at their meeting on Saturday last, empowered the directors to proceed with the usual forms necessary for extending the line from the present Nine Elms terminus to the vicinity of Hungerford and Waterloo bridges, and to the Thames; and from Wimbledon to Epsom; from Weybridge to Staines and Windsor; from Woking-common, by Guildford, Godalming, and Chichester, to Portsmouth and Farnham, including the purchase of the Guildford Junction Railway; from Hook-pit, for a main line of railway to Mottisfont, on the Salisbury branch; and from Salisbury to Sherborne; and Yeovil to Dorchester and Weymouth; and from Basingstoke to the Great Western at Didcot and Swindon.



CHRISTMAS DISTRIBUTION OF PRIZES AT THE LIVERPOOL COLLEGIATE INSTITUTION.

CHRISTMAS DISTRIBUTION OF PRIZES AT THE LIVERPOOL COLLEGIATE INSTITUTION.

The half-yearly Distribution of Prizes, at this well-conducted establishment, took place on Friday, the 13th inst., in the Lecture Hall of the College. The middle and upper galleries, which were appropriated to the parents and other relatives of the pupils, were crowded with ladies and gentlemen, comprising many of the first families in Liverpool. The body of the hall was devoted to the students, and the music-gallery, or stage, was completely filled. The whole number present must have considerably exceeded 3000. Our engraving, from a sketch by a clever Liverpool artist, represents this interesting scene. Before the proceedings of the day commenced, the vast assembly were gratified and entertained by an admirable selection of sacred music, performed by Mr Browne, professor of music to the institution, upon the powerful and fine-toned organ belonging to the Philharmonic Society.

Shortly after eleven o'clock, the Right Rev. the Lord Bishop of Chester appeared on the platform, and took the chair, amidst loud acclamations. On the right of his lordship were James Lawrence, Esq., Mayor of Liverpool, the Rev. Rector Brooks, the Rev. H. M'Neale, the Rev. Dr. Tattershall, Thomas Sands, Esq., the Rev. T. Nolan, the Rev. W. Hampton, G. Kendall, Esq., the Rev. J. H. Stewart, &c. On his lordship's left were the Rev. W. J. Conybeare, M.A., principal of the institution, the Rev. Dr. Booth and the Rev. J. H. Brown, M.A., vice principals, the Masters of the different classes in the institution, Rd. Harbord, Esq., A. Tinne, Esq., Lords Bangor and Molyneux, Josiah Booker, Esq., &c. &c. The proceedings were opened by the scholars raising the chant, "Jam lucis orto sidere."

The Lord Bishop then came forward, and addressed the meeting on the principles of the Institution, and concluded in these emphatic words:—"One of the advantages of the present generation is, that religion is now made an essential part of education—that young people are not now taught everything but that which it behoves them most to know, as their fathers and grandfathers too often were. You, my young friends, may not understand this now; but you may believe that which the experience of your older friends will tell you, that the principles of religion in which you are instructed in your youth will become of more and more value to you as the value of everything else becomes less and less, and that they will stand you in stead when the time comes that everything else shall be of no value at all." (Applause).

The distribution of the prizes was then proceeded with, by the Reverend Principal introducing the Prizemen, the Lord Bishop presenting the prizes, and addressing the recipients.

The Lord Bishop expressed the great satisfaction he felt in giving the prizes. The prizemen were greeted with loud applause on leaving the platform; and the Principal then directed the scholars to sing "Jubilate Deo," which was accordingly done—the whole assembly joining in the psalm.

The Right Reverend Prelate having addressed the scholars, they sang, in beautiful style, the National Anthem, the company joining in chorus.

The Rev. Rector Brooks, Chairman of the Board of Directors, then proposed a vote of thanks to the Lord Bishop, which was seconded by his Worship the Mayor; and the Right Rev. Prelate having thanked the company, left the chair amidst loud applause, and the meeting separated.

Of the Liverpool Collegiate Institution, an Engraving and Description, with the details of the opening of the Establishment, will be found in No. 37 of our Journal. There are already upwards of 1000 pupils on its books, and, judging from the enthusiasm manifested on Friday, there is no reason to suppose that it has attained its maximum of success. We regret that we have not room for a list of the Prizes, which fill more than half of a column of the Liverpool Mail.

The Lecture-hall, in which the Prizes were delivered on Friday, is a handsome, well-ventilated apartment, 50 feet high, from the floor to the ceiling, with two Galleries, containing accommodation for 2700 persons; a spacious Music-room, with rising seats for 300 persons, opens from the Lecturer's Platform, through a lofty arch, the whole width of the wall of the Lecture-hall, in which a powerful organ is erected.

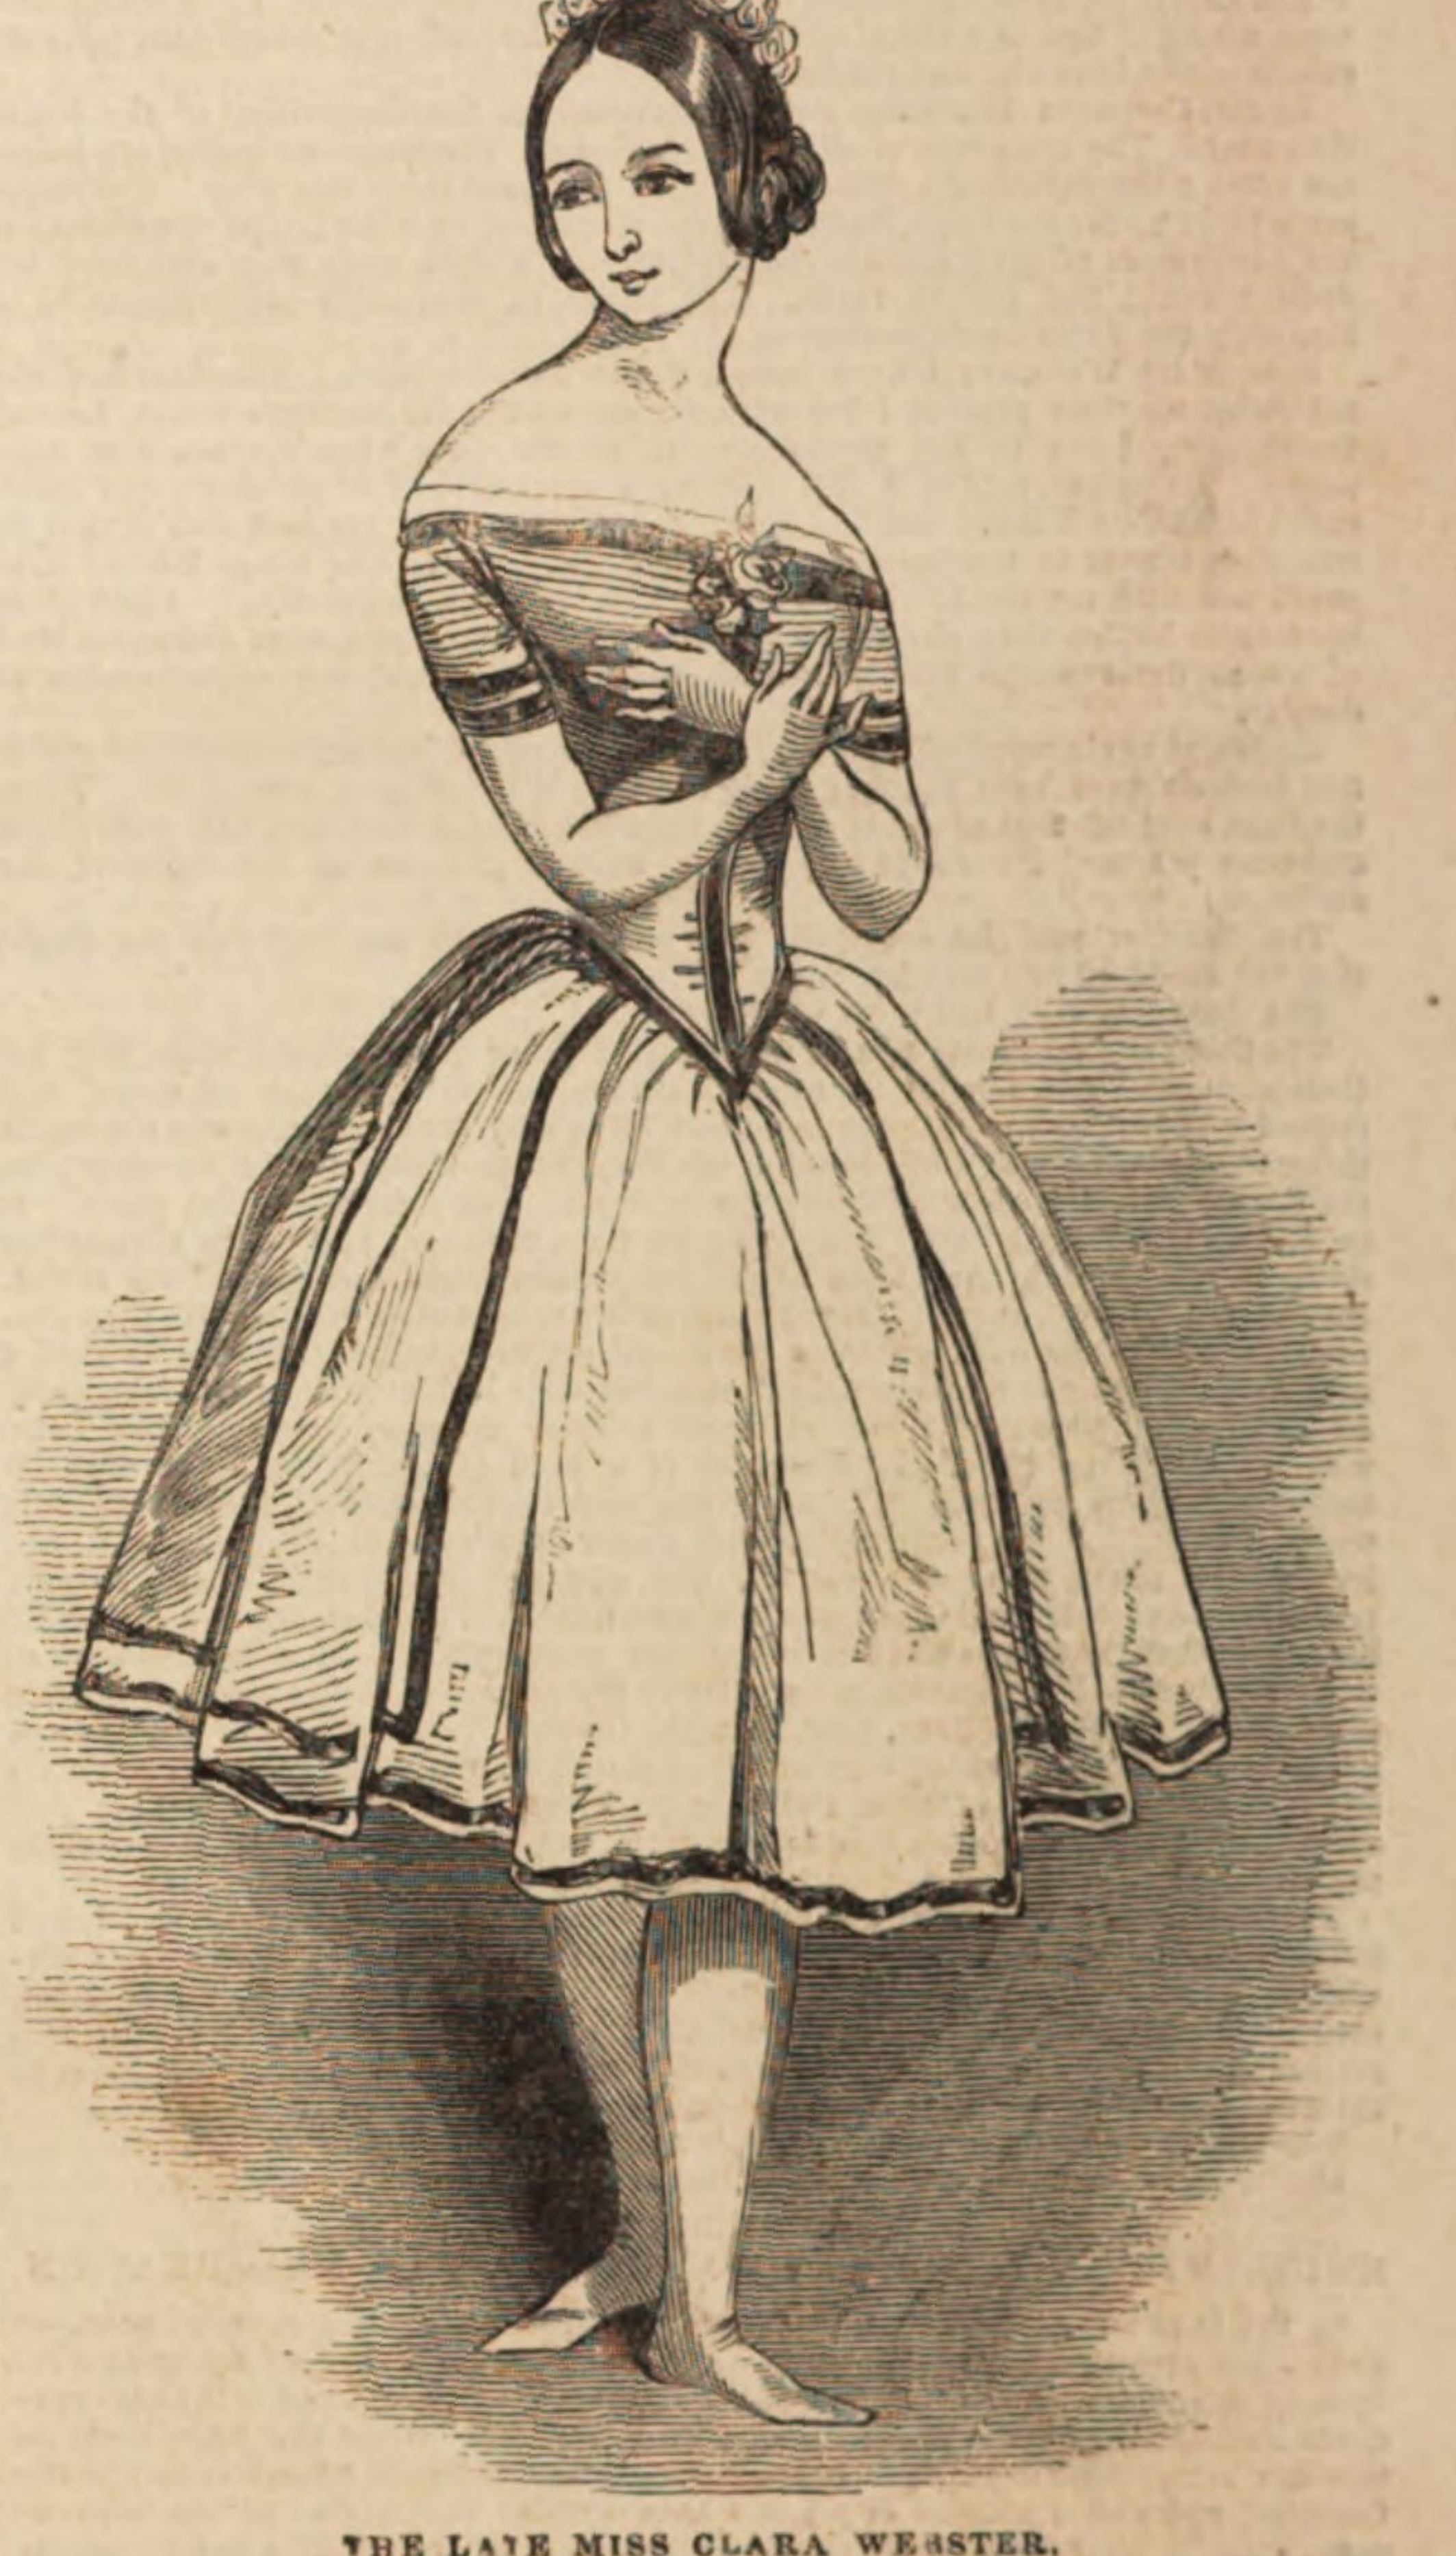
The Lecture Hall is a fine structure, comprising five sides of an octagon. It is lighted from the roof by a large octagonal window, richly groined, gracefully dropping from the centre; and by five lozenge shaped flat lights placed around it. The body and galleries are so constructed that all can distinctly see and hear the speakers. In this hall lectures are delivered on Tuesday and Friday evenings, to the members of the Institution. Mr. Charles Kemble has delivered his readings in it during the past season, and this gentleman, with Sir H. Bishop, Dr. Reinbault, Professors Taylor and Cowper, and other eminent lecturers, are announced to appear during the ensuing season. The Lecture Hall is illuminated in the evening by a powerful concentrated light, of a novel design, placed in the centre pendant, as well as by lights placed beneath each gallery, which were lighted on the occasion of the prize delivery.

FATAL AND DISTRESSING ACCIDENT TO MISS CLARA WEBSTER.

Last Saturday night a very lamentable accident took place at Drury-lane Theatre, during the performance of "The Revolt of the Harem," which has proved fatal to Miss Clara Webster, the dancer. In the second act of the ballet, the ladies of the Harem are discovered bathing, among whom Zulica, the royal slave (Miss Webster), is one. During the scene, the gas placed at the bottom of the stage, or under the sunken portion of it, where the water pieces, or waves, are placed, caught the light drapery of Miss Webster's dress, and in an instant her whole person was enveloped in flames.

This frightful event, taking place on the stage, in sight of the audience, the whole house was in a state of consternation, and screams issued from the ladies in front of the boxes and pit, who were the first to perceive the appalling accident.

The whole corps de ballet, who were on the stage with her, closed round her, to extinguish the flames, but, terrified at the appearance which presented itself, they retreated, and she rushed forward alone towards the front of the stage. Mrs. Plunkett alone endeavoured to extinguish the flames, and in so doing was herself nearly falling a victim to her intrepidity and good feelings. At this moment a carpenter belonging to the theatre sprang from the wing of the stage, and throwing himself upon the young lady, extinguished the fire by rolling upon her. In doing so, however, he severely cut her upper lip, and received some slight injury himself from the burning clothes. Miss Webster was immediately taken into the green-room, and placed upon a sofa. Her clothes were nearly all consumed, at least all her external garments. Fortunately, Dr. Marsden was in the theatre, and his assistance was rendered without delay. The usual applications of spirits of wine and water, flour, &c., were had recourse to, and every assistance was rendered. Miss Webster's face was much blistered, and in some parts scorched, the eye-lashes and eye brows burnt off; but the hair of the head was untouched. The lower extremities were much scorched, and the flesh of the hips was also much burnt. The hands also suffered dreadfully. Miss Webster never lost her recollection, but exhibited, notwithstanding the dreadful agony under which she laboured, great physical power, and extraordinary moral fortitude. She was conveyed to her home, in Upper Norton-street, in a carriage, attended by Dr. Marsden, who administered fresh applications, and who was afterwards unceasing in his attendance. Mr. Liston, the eminent surgeon, and other medical gentlemen, were called in, but they concurred in all that Dr. Marsden had done, and his mode of treatment was adhered to.



THE LATE MISS CLARA WEBSTER.

On Monday there were some favourable symptoms, and it was hoped the unfortunate young lady would recover. We sincerely regret to state, however, that Miss Webster died at half-past three o'clock on Tuesday morning, from the effects of the injuries she received. Her medical attendant, Dr. Marsden, was with her from ten to twelve on Monday night, at which time she was much worse than in the early part of the day, and symptoms of the most alarming nature continued to show themselves—namely, frequent vomitings and occasional faintings. Having communicated to her family and friends that nothing more could be done, and that there were no hopes of saving the patient's life, Dr. Marsden took his departure, and returned again at four o'clock on Tuesday morning, when he found that she had breathed her last about half an hour previously. She died very tranquilly; indeed, she went off as if merely sinking into a gentle slumber. She bore her sufferings with great fortitude, and did not appear to shrink from the prospect of death, which, it was intimated during the evening, awaited her.

Mr. Liston was present when she died. He had not been in the room more than a few minutes when Miss Webster ceased to breathe. Miss Webster's mother had but a short time left the room, for the purpose of taking a little rest, and when the melancholy intelligence of her daughter's death was made known to her she became almost distracted.

It is stated that even up to six o'clock on Monday evening every symptom appeared favourable, that shortly before that period she drank some tea, and partook of a small portion of roll, expressing herself thankful that she could enjoy that repast.

Miss Webster was in the 21st year of her age. Mr. Webster, of the Haymarket Theatre, is a brother, by a former marriage, of the late Mr. Webster, the father, who, we understand, was married three times, and had families by each wife. The deceased was the issue of the last marriage.

We perceive that a benefit is to take place at Drury-lane Theatre on Monday next for the benefit of Miss Webster's family, and we direct attention to it in the hope of being instrumental in affording some slight alleviation under the painful circumstances.

THE CORONER'S INQUEST.

An inquest was held on the body of the unfortunate young lady on Thursday morning, at the Green Man public-house, New-road.

The jury, having been sworn, proceeded to view the body at the house where she died, 54, Upper Norton-street. It lay in the back bed-room on the first floor, and had been placed in a shell. The face, neck, and arms, were discoloured and blistered, from the effects of the burning. The face wore a calm, but sorrowful expression; it was bedecked with artificial flowers.

The first witness called was

Mrs. A. B. Taylor, the landlady of the house in which deceased lodged. She stated: I knew deceased, who, I believe, was 21 years of age. She died in my house, at 54, Upper Norton-street, at ten minutes past three o'clock on Tuesday morning, in the presence of Mr. Liston, the surgeon, and the nurse. Mr. Liston first told me she was dead. I was at home when she was brought home in a coach, accompanied by Mr. Marsden and another gentleman, after the accident; she had received some severe injuries from the burning, but was quite sensible. She was immediately put to bed, and Dr. Marsden dressed her wounds with flour and wadding, and afterwards washed them with spirits of wine and water. The first application of spirits of wine was made at the theatre. Mr. Liston arrived shortly afterwards. Had continued to attend her until the nurse came. Had thought her better on Monday morning, but towards evening she became worse. I was with her on Monday evening till the time of her death, with the exception of a short interval.

The Coroner: Had she any difficulty in breathing?

Witness: Yes; she had great difficulty in breathing, which I first noticed about seven o'clock. I think she was insensible from that time until her death. She became delirious about that time, and gradually sunk until she died.

The Coroner: Did she make any complaint against any one, or blame any person for what had happened?

Witness: No, Sir; none whatever.

The Coroner: Do you blame any one, Mrs. Webster?

Mrs. Webster (sorrowfully): No, indeed, Sir.

The Coroner: You have no complaint to make against any person in authority at the theatre?

Mrs. Webster: No, Sir.

Mr. Robert Liston, the surgeon, of Clifford-street, Bond-street, was next called. He stated—At twelve o'clock on Saturday night I first commenced my attendance on the deceased; found her very severely injured, more especially about the upper parts of the body—the face, neck, and arms. I saw her within an hour after the accident had happened. The whole of the back and shoulders were also much injured. I found that flour and wadding had been applied. I heard that spirits of wine and water had also been applied. No alteration in treatment was made by me. Saline medicines were given, and wine, as a stimulus. She was not so much in pain as depressed in spirits. I saw her again on Sunday and Monday, and on Tuesday morning I entered the room just as she was expiring.

By the Coroner: She died from the injuries she received by the burning. She was washed with spirits of wine and water, in the proportion of two spoonfuls of spirits of wine to a pint of water. There was never any hope of her recovery from the effects of the injuries she received. I have no hesitation in saying that these injuries were the cause of death.

Daniel Coyle was next called. He said: I am a stone-mason, residing at 29, Crown-street, St. James's, but am regularly employed at Drury-lane Theatre as a carpenter. It was a bath scene in which she was performing, and her clothes caught fire in the bath, but I believe no person saw them ignite.

Mrs. Webster said she did not believe that any person saw them catch fire.

Daniel Coyle (resumed): The bottom part of her dress was on fire when I first perceived her. She ran along out of the bath and up the steps leading on to the stage. The more she ran the more her clothes burnt. I ran after her, caught her in my arms, threw her down, and rolled over her.

The Coroner: Did that extinguish the flames?

Witness: Not quite; but some of the other men then came up and helped. I had nearly brushed the flames out with my arms and hands. [The poor fellow wore his right arm in a sling, and appeared to be suffering severe pain from the effects of the burns he had received.]

By the Coroner: There was nothing unusual in the disposition of the lamps that night. The lamps are of oil, and with glasses. There are two baths, one before the other; the performers stand in an opening about three feet wide. The lamps are a little under the stage, but under the stage and over the lamps the dresses of the performers might insinuate themselves. If a wire work were over these the dresses could not get to them. The ladies in that scene are supposed to be throwing the water over themselves.

Mrs. Mary Webster: I have been a widow for nine years. The deceased was my daughter. At present I live with my son at 32, St. Martin's-street, Leicester-square. I was in the dressing-room at the time when the accident happened. I was not told of it, but hearing a screaming, I came down and found that she had been taken into the green-room. I said to her how was it that no one came sooner to your assistance? If I had been in the wings I could have saved you with my cloak. She replied "Yes, mamma, you could." I had often been there before when she performed in the same part, and wore the same kind of gauze dress which she then had on. I never had any apprehension of danger.

Coyle was again recalled, and said there was a pump just underneath the stairs, and buckets were kept hanging along the side of the stage in case of fire. From the time he had first seen her to the time he caught her, she had run about eighteen yards. He caught her just as she got out of the sight of the audience.

The Coroner said he supposed the gentlemen of the jury had no doubt that the deceased had met her death accidentally.

The Jury said they had none whatever.

The Coroner said it was a most unfortunate thing that persons when they set their clothes on fire, almost in every instance lost all presence of mind, and rushed into passages or into the open air. The very act of moving was the worst thing they could do, and by standing up they made themselves a burning pile, the flames of which came up round the head and neck—the most vital parts. If in such cases people could but deliberate for a moment, and throw themselves down on the ground, the flames might be extinguished and their lives saved. But by standing up, or running, the most fatal consequences ensued. He then proceeded to make some observations on a process of preparing dresses in such a manner as to prevent their being inflammable. He had written to Dr. Gardener, an eminent chemist, and had received a letter in reply, stating that there was an invention by a Mr. Hodgson of a kind of starch prepared with an infusion of alum, or muriate of ammonia, and that muslins stiffened with this would not ignite. He produced several pieces of muslin so prepared and subjected them to the flame of a candle, but although the texture would become perfectly red hot, it would not produce any flame. The Coroner also expressed his regret that the lamps alluded to had not been guarded by a lattice-work of wire, which would prevent the possibility of the dresses of the performers coming in contact with them. (Hear, hear, from the jurors.) The number of deaths from burning and scalding which continually occurred in the metropolis was perfectly surprising; and most of them resulting from the want of the commonest precautions. He had one such case the previous day at the Royal Free Hospital, in the Gray's Inn-road, and another in the parish of Kensington.

Mr. Wall, the foreman of the jury, concurred in the observations which had fallen from the Coroner, and expressed the opinion of the jury that greater precautions than those at present adopted were necessary at our public theatres, considering the dangers to which the female artistes were exposed. In this melancholy case there was not a bucket of water at hand, or an asbestos dress to throw over the burning clothes of the deceased.

The jury then recorded a verdict of "Accidental death."

Mr. Wakley condoled with Mrs. Webster on the distressing calamity.

EMIGRANTS ON THEIR WAY TO THE PLACE OF EMBARKATION.

In the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, of April 13, in the present year, we gave a full account, with picturesque views, of the embarkation of Emigrants for Sydney, together with an engraving of the ship St. Vincent, a scene in the between-decks, and plans of the accommodations on board, &c. Since that time Emigration has been progressively going on, not only to the South Seas, but also to the Canadas, and vast numbers of persons have availed themselves of the Government grant to quit their native shores for the purpose of seeking a better subsistence in the land of the stranger; and when we look at the existing condition of a considerable portion of our agricultural and manufacturing population, it excites but little wonder that a feverish restlessness should arise for change, though, unfortunately, it but too frequently happens, that a removal from one locality causes very trifling improvement, if any at all, in another. Like disease, we may change the place of our abode, but still keep the pain.

By a vote of the House of Commons a large sum was appropriated to enable families, and single men and women, to emigrate, free of expense—the men to consist of agricultural labourers, shepherds, bricklayers, and masons, wheelwrights, smiths, carpenters, &c.; and the single women and single men not to be less than eighteen years of age, and under thirty. A form of application is sent up to the agents, stating the place to which the applicant wishes to emigrate, their name written by themselves (if they can write), whether in the receipt of parish relief, and if so, for how long? their present place of residence, and other minor particulars, together with the trade or calling of each, age at the last birth day, and certificate of baptism. The applicants are likewise required to make a declaration that they have read the regulations for the selection of emigrants; have neither by themselves nor any other person paid, or authorized to be paid, any sum of money beyond the Government bounty, excepting £1 for bedding, box, and utensils, and they must pledge themselves to conform to the rules for the management and welfare of all on board, and not leave the ship until she reaches her destination. With these documents must be forwarded certificates, signed by two respectable householders, not being publicans, or dealers in beer or spirits (why this latter exclusion should be made we really cannot see), that they have known the applicants (for the time mentioned) working at their occupation, and that they believe them to be honest, industrious, sober—of general good character, and not likely to become a burthen to the Colony. The next requisites are the certificates of a physician or a surgeon, as to bodily health; of a magistrate, Protestant Clergyman, or Catholic Priest, that the signatures to the other certificates are genuine. These forms are invariably used in all cases of unmarried men and women, and those for married people with families are much the same, except that the plural is used instead of the singular.

It has been generally supposed that the free emigrants are all paupers, glad to escape from the thraldom and confinement of a union workhouse; but this is a great mistake. There may be, and no doubt are, many of this character, but the chief portion are cottagers, most of whom have never received parish relief—families struggling with numerous difficulties to gain a precarious livelihood, and enduring severe privations and hardships in the inclement season of winter; and some few are persons who have been better off in the world, but, reduced by unforeseen events, are desirous of speculating with their little remnant of property, under a hope of retrieving their circumstances, and amongst these may be found individuals whose wounded pride cannot bear the thoughts of their old associates and friends witnessing their descent to poverty.

The general age of married men and women who wish to take advantage of the grant must be under forty at the time of embarkation, and parents who are still hale and capable of work, between forty and fifty years old, with grown-up children, are taken, provided some of the latter are above ten years of age, according to the following proportions:—

If the age of the father or mother, or both, be above.....	40	and under	42	they must have	1 child	above 10
	42	..	44	..	2 children	..
	44	..	46	..	3	..	..
	46	..	48	..	4	..	..
	48	..	50	..	5	..	..

and there have been, even at this latter period of life, many who have braved the perils of the ocean—

> "Hope and enterprise filling the sails
> With their eager breath"—

in order to locate themselves in an Eldorado of the imagination—unmindful of "Home, sweet Home," amidst the soil that is sanctified by the ashes of their forefathers; and, let the descendants be in what part of the habitable globe they may, they will still look towards England, and give no other place the name of "HOME." It is no difficult matter to quit the land of our nativity; but whilst the pulses of existence continue to throb in the human frame, the link which binds us to the spot where our eyes first opened to the light of Heaven, as we hung upon the bosom of a mother, can never be broken. We have known settlers in various parts of the world who have been residents there thirty, ay, even forty years, and though on the verge of eternity, still their hearts best, dearest affections, have been bound up with England, Ireland, or Scotland, and they have longed to lay their perishing remains by the side of kindred dust.

Beside the free emigrants, are what are denominated steerage passengers—that is, those who pay for their voyage out according to a fixed scale, and generally consist of young men willing to push their fortunes, or having colonial appointments—eccentric talent and genius, longing to rifle the treasures of a new world—cautious speculators in human wants and human miseries—debtors who have lived too freely in England, and consequently wish to cut the acquaintance of their creditors with a long list of etceteras. Some have prospered exceedingly: more have returned back, much worse than they set out, whilst in numerical superiority the greater part lie buried in the silent grave.

Yet all this is going on apparently without exciting the slightest observation from those who remain behind. Thousands quit the rural villages of this country to embark for far distant lands, and yet but little notice is taken of it. The political quack doctors of the times assert, that as phlebotomy is necessary to allow of an unrestrained action of the heart, so is running off the blood of kindred requisite to preserve a healthy state of society; otherwise, as the veins get clogged with the overflux of the stream of life, so is a superabundant population calculated to produce an unnatural and diseased condition amongst the community in general. It perhaps would be well if these empirics, with those who manufacture the nostrums, were shipped in bulk to experience the effects of their own prescriptions.

It has hitherto proved manifest that emigrants have not been lacking. Hundreds go out every month, and, from what we have seen of the men, women, and children, they are certainly some of the finest specimens of the sons and daughters of Old England. We had frequently remarked this on former occasions, whilst witnessing their embarkation, and last week we had an opportunity of seeing an intermediate stage, between their acceptance as emigrants and departure from the endearing haunts of childhood, and the arrival at the depôt near the Royal Dockyard at Deptford—which, to do the agents justice, is fitted up very comfortably for their reception. This intermediate stage forms the subject of our illustration. There were two covered or tilted farmer's hay-waggons—one from a parish in Buckinghamshire, and the other (we believe) from the neighbourhood of Northampton: they had joined company on the road. The women and children, with but few exceptions, occupied the conveyances, which were loaded with packages, bundles, and boxes; a few of the more elderly females walked on the pathway by the side of their husbands and sons; the younger men trudging it with seeming glee, and carrying various articles we conjecture for immediate use. It was indeed a most picturesque spectacle, and well worthy the pencil of the artist. The leafless trees and hedges—the miry road, with its long serpentine wheel tracks; the yellow waggons, with their inanimate and living freight, covered with light canvass; the women habited in blue or red cloaks; the men in their frocks blending in colour with the many hues of the bundles; and, above all, the object of their journey was well calculated to excite human sympathy. Yet no one appeared sad or sorrowful—on the contrary, all seemed to be cheerful; and their clean and decent appearance bore witness to the propriety o their general habits: the whole looked remarkably healthy, especially the children. By this time they are on their way to other regions: may prosperity and happiness attend them!

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

COMMISSION OF LUNACY.—On Tuesday a commission of lunacy was opened before Mr. Commissioner Winslow, at the Swan Tavern, Bridge-road, Battersea, to investigate as to the state of mind of Mr. John Smith, aged 69, formerly a wine merchant, described in the commission as "late of King-street, Golden-square, but now of Culmstock-place, Bridge-road, Battersea." Among other evidence of lunacy the following facts were stated:—About three years since he went out, and on being met by his second son in Red Lion-square, and asked where he was going? he said he was going to Newgate for the purpose of being hung, as he had robbed the country, and was also a murderer. On a subsequent occasion the son followed him when he went out. On this occasion Mr. Smith went to Newgate, and rang the bell at Mr. Cope's (the governor's) door, and was answered by a female. On being asked what he wanted, he said he wanted to see Mr. Cope, as he wished to be hung for having robbed the country. The jury returned a verdict, "That Mr. John Smith was of unsound mind, and had been so since the 1st of January, 1840."

THE LORD MAYOR AND ST. STEPHEN'S, WALBROOK.—In the Court of Common Pleas on Thursday, the case of Gibbs and another v. Flight and another, which involved the most vexed questions respecting the accounts of the parish of St. Stephen, Walbrook, was brought forward and excited much interest in court. It was an action of trover brought by Mr. Ald. Gibbs (the present Lord Mayor) as perpetual churchwarden of the parish of St. Stephen's, Walbrook, nominally to recover possession of certain parish books, now in the possession of the defendant, but actually to try the legality of the select vestry existing in the parish. After a mass of documentary evidence had been read, counsel on both sides agreed that a nominal verdict for the plaintiff should be entered, subject to a special case for the consideration of the court above. Verdict entered for the plaintiff accordingly.

Mr. Edward King, residing at 2, Kensington-gardens, Brighton, died a few days ago in his 100th year. Mr. King was a clerk in the Middle-street Brewery before the time even of the late Mr. William Wigney, and continued in the counting-house till he was nearly 80 years old.

There is to be an investiture of the Knights of St. Patrick on the 4th of January. It is said that the Marquis of Waterford and the Earl of Rosse are to be the new Knights, in the place of the late Marquis of Donegal and Earl Talbot, who has just received the Order of the Garter.

On the 20th ult., about mid-day, a fire broke out at Constantinople, in the quarter called Aladjia Haman, a short distance from the port, and consumed about fifty houses, and a great number of shops.

Upwards of 3000 persons were assembled at Paris on Sunday in the Halleaux Draps, to witness the ceremony of the distribution of prizes, by the Prefect of the Seine, to the journeymen who have attended with the best success the lectures of the Professors at the Association Polytechnique. The scene was striking. The Prefect delivered an impressive address, and several musical compositions were sung by the pupils of the Association.

CHESS.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—"B. S. J."—In the problem alluded to, the difficulty is to mate with a Pawn and not with the Queen. In the stratagems of chess, those problems employing, what are termed capt Pawns, are the most ingenious. To his second question: Yes.

"A. M."—Yes.

"Velocipede."—It is not stalemate if B has any pieces to move. If the King cannot move, A can oblige him to move his pieces. Stalemate is now recognized as a drawn game. The third question is unintelligible.

"A. B.," Pocklington.—Try to find it out: it is so very easy.

Communications are thankfully acknowledged from "S. R. C.," and "E. Burbidge" (whose problem is too simple).

"T. P."—Under the circumstances, the King can castle. The second question is answered above. 50 moves are allowed to mate your adversary's King at the end of the game; if you cannot checkmate after trying so long, you do not deserve to win. It must be then dismissed as a drawn game.

"R. H. B."—When the King castles on his Queen's side, he moves only two squares, the Rook occupying the Queen's square.

"D. D."—Two Queens are allowable.

There has been no time within our recollection, and we are old sinners at chess, so replete with excitement to the lovers of this noble game as this present period. No fewer than five or six matches by correspondence are in progress—chess dinners—fêtes &c., are continually being given. That excellent periodical "The Chess Player's Chronicle," promises an increased fund of amusement during the ensuing year; and the "Palamede" for November, just come to hand, presents us with a chess vaudeville. What next. Eight pages too of correspondence relative to the forthcoming match between England and France. When will this said match commence? The unfortunate check given to Mr. Staunton by that malicious player fever has made him castle whether he would or no; this, together with the difficulty of deciding the number of games to each defi, and the mode of opening several of the games, places this interesting fight in a peculiarly perplexing predicament. We hope, for the sake of our readers, the games will shortly begin; if they do not, we shall feel obliged to challenge the "Palamede" or "Chess Player's Chronicle" to play a match with our illustrious selves. Sorry should we be, to be driven to so dreadful an alternative, as exciting to ourselves as it would be, we fear, tedious to our readers.

Solution to our last.

The solution sent by J. C. is correct and good. We however, prefer the following:—

WHITE.	BLACK.
1. Bp to Q R's sq	King takes Bishop (best)
2. Rook to Q Kt 4th	King moves
3. King moves anywhere	King to adv. R sq
4. Kt to Q B 3d	Pawn moves
5. Rook mates at Q Kt sq

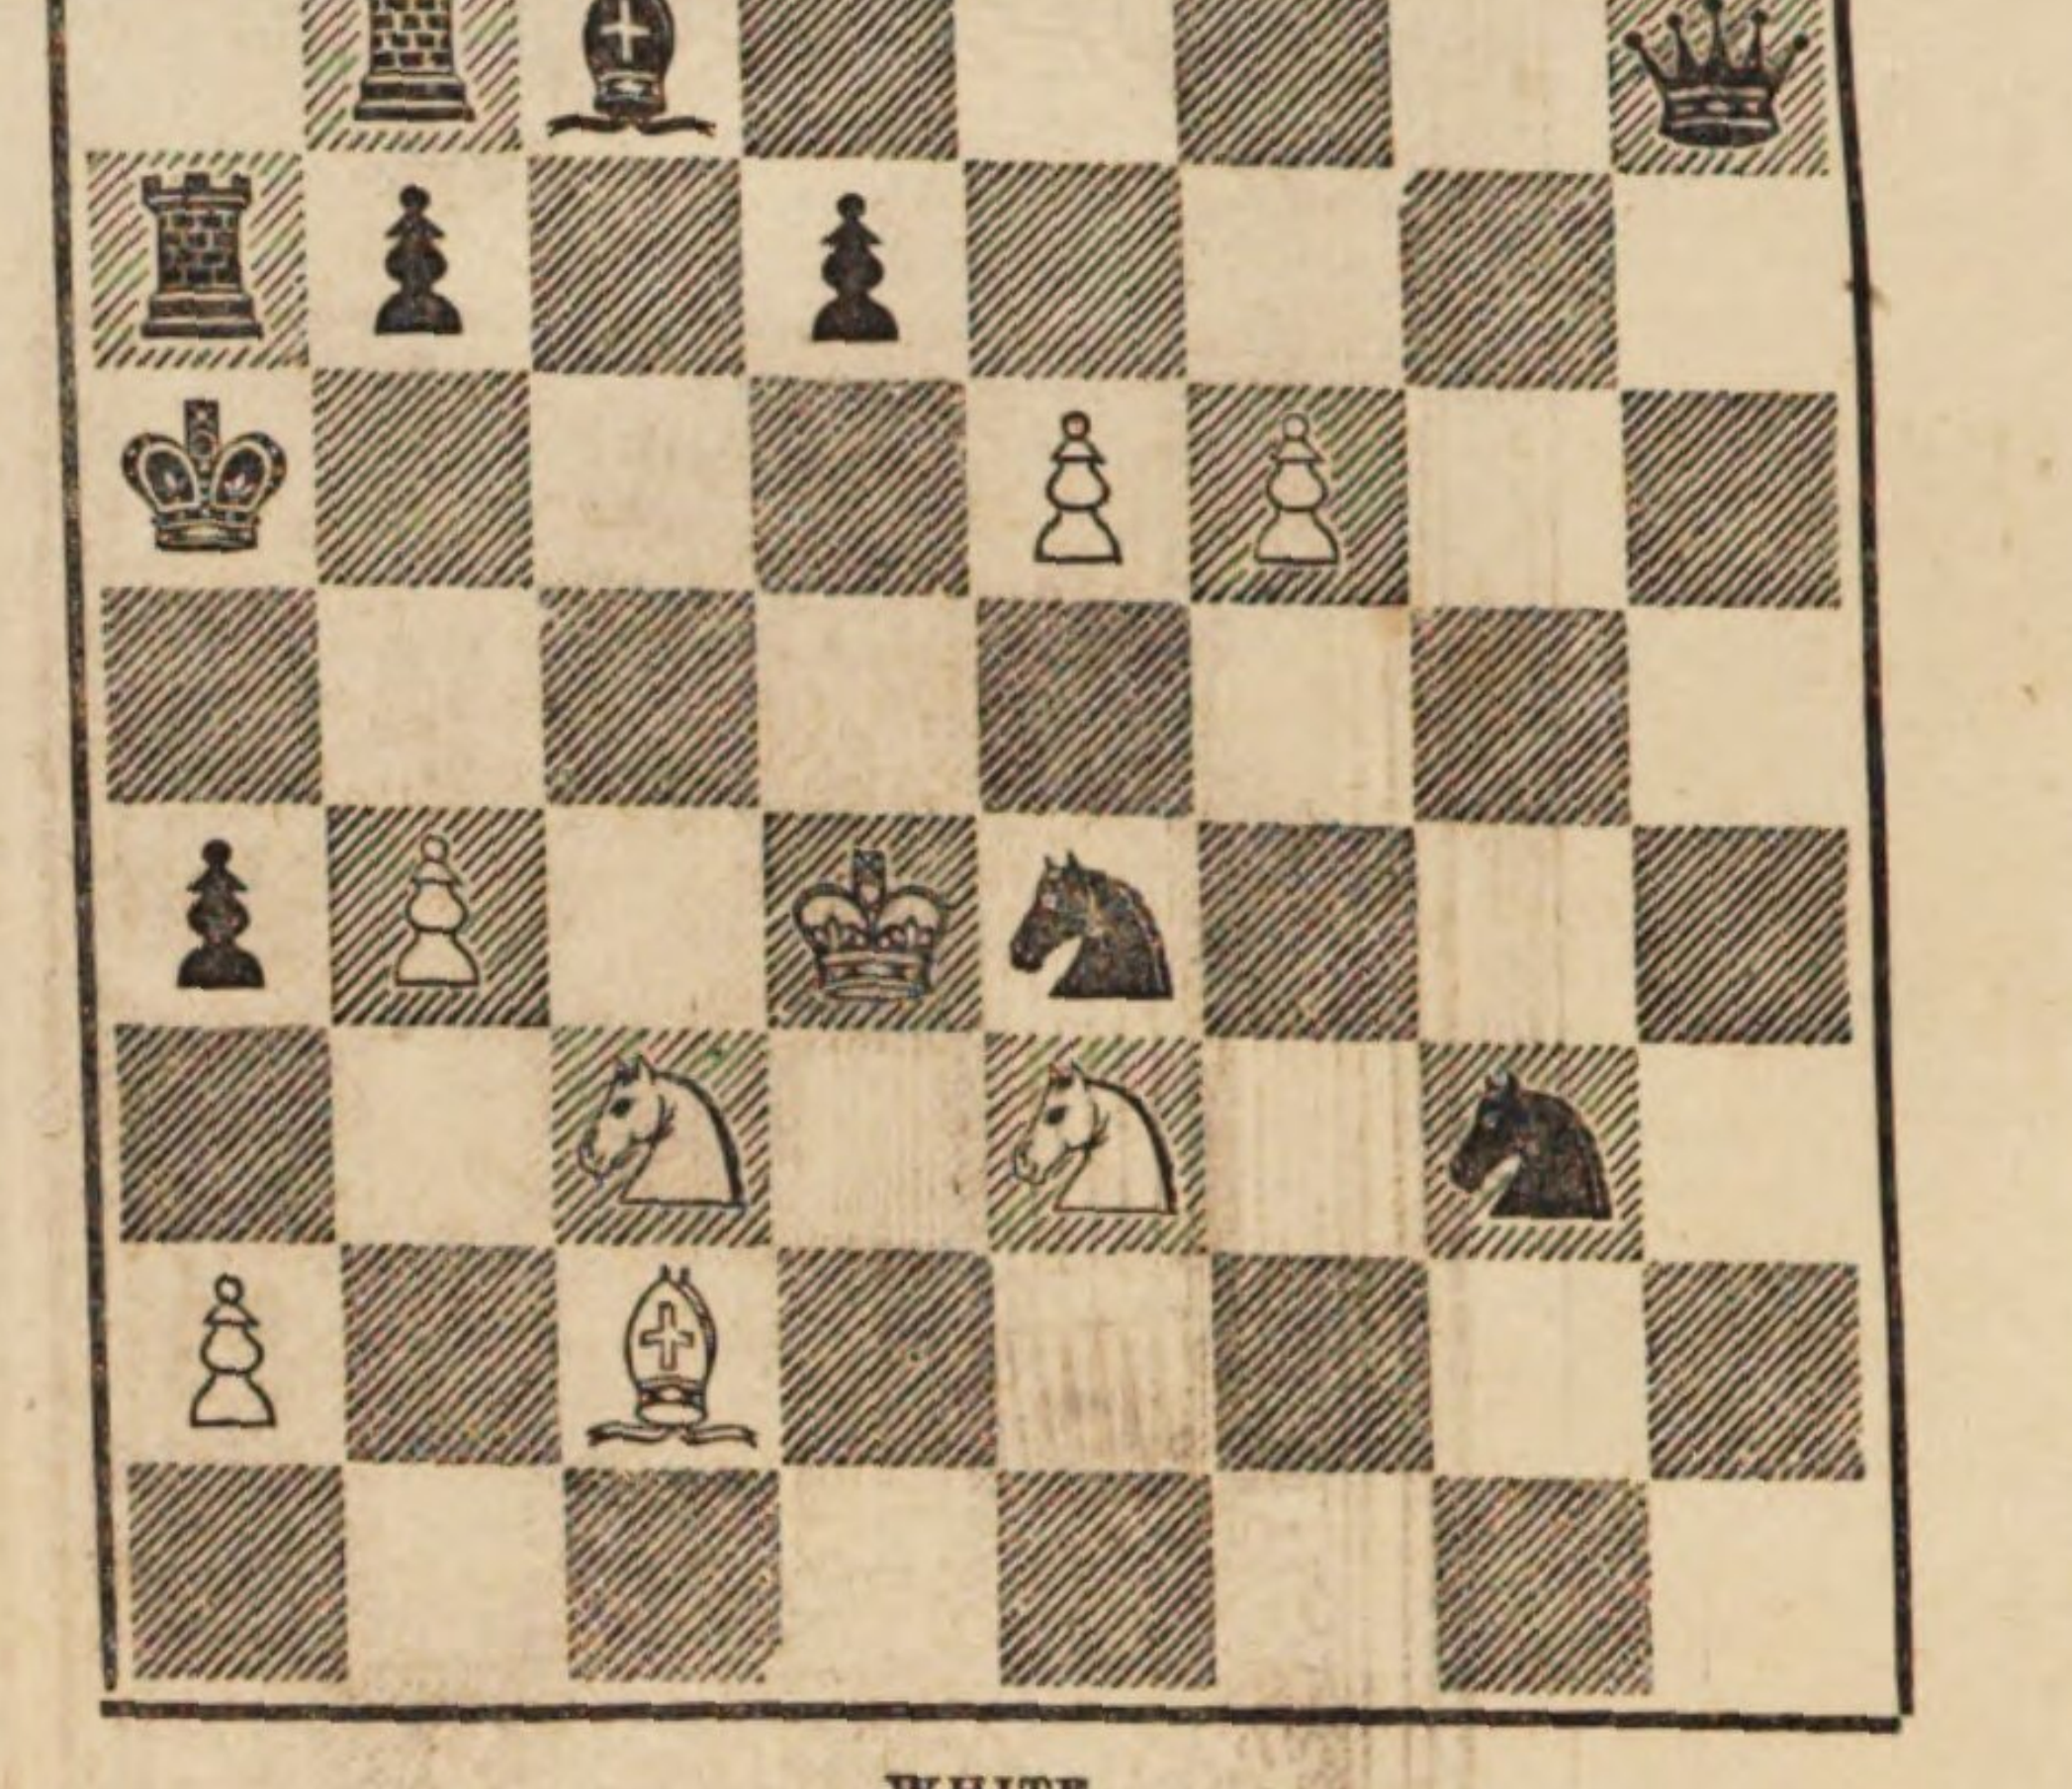
Erratum. In our last Solution, for B checks at Q Kt 2nd, read B checks at his square.

PROBLEM. No. 53.

The following excellent example of a conclusion of a game, is taken from "La Palamede," Nov. 15, just received

White to move and mate in seven moves.

BLACK.



WHITE.

The Solution in our next.

THE NAVAL AND MILITARY SKETCH BOOK.
On the 4th of January will be published, a New Work of intense interest, entitled the NAVAL and MILITARY SKETCH BOOK, and History of Adventure by Flood and Field. Elaborately Illustrated by J. GILBERT and E. LANDELLS.—It has long been a matter of astonishment that, in other countries a spirit of admiration for great and glorious achievements, by the publication of Historical and Biographical Works, has ever been encouraged—whilst, in England, celebrated for its Naval and Military deeds—the country of Nelson, the invincible son of Neptune; of Wellington, the conqueror of the great Napoleon—no authentic records, graphically embellished, have been produced in a cheap and popular form. To remedy this neglect, the projectors of the Naval and Military Sketch Book have made arrangements with gentlemen of acknowledged literary talents, some of whom were participators in these soul-stirring events, and have also secured the services of J. Gilbert and E. Landells, assisted by the most celebrated artists of the day—thus combining a correct and vivid portraiture by pen and pencil. The Work will comprise:—An Authentic History of every British Regiment; Narratives; Personal Adventures; Battles; the Military and Naval Systems of Nations generally; Ancient and Modern Warfare; Scientific Improvements; Projectiles; Steam Ships; Walks through Barracks, Arsenals, and Dock Yards; Tales of Flood and Field, &c., &c.

As a marked feature of the work, a Biography will be given of those distinguished personages who are daily passing away from the scene of their triumphs, accompanied with a Portrait, executed in the highest style of art. It will be the endeavour of the Proprietors to render this work a complete organ for watching over the interests and developing the views of the United Services; and also to make it a source of great and continuous entertainment, as well as an instructive record.

The Work will be issued in Weekly Numbers, price Twopence; and in Monthly Parts, price Tenpence.

The Naval and Military Sketch Book, embellished with numerous engravings, will be printed on beautiful paper. Each Weekly Number will contain 16 pages of demy 8vo.

CHRISTMAS FESTIVITIES.—At this peculiar season of festivity and mirth, when friends and lovers assemble at the social board, or whirl in the giddy mazes of the dance, both sexes are more than usually desirous of shining in personal attraction, and devote a greater share of attention to the toilet; it is, at this particular season, that the Virtues and Singularly Happy Properties of those Auxiliaries of Personal Beauty, ROWLAND'S UNIQUE PREPARATIONS shine pre-eminent in their power; while the rich luxuriant tress, the white and swan-like neck, and the pearly set of teeth, form admirable trophies of their Inestimable Qualities! The August Patronage conceded by our Gracious Queen, and the several Sovereigns of Europe, together with the Beauties which adorn the circles of Princely and Regal magnificence; and the confirmation by experience of the infallible efficacy of these creative renovating Specifics, have characterized them with perfection, and given them a celebrity unparalleled. They have proved the theme of the poet; they are celebrated in the periodical literature of the whole civilized world; the lays of Byron; and the voice of the universal press, have proclaimed the incomparable virtues of the "Oil Macassar," and of its accompanying preparations. As presents for both sexes, none can be more recommendatory, or more now in general use.

ROWLAND'S MACASSAR OIL, is a Delightfully Fragrant and Transparent Preparation for the Hair! and as an invigorator and beautifier, is beyond all precedent: it bestows the most brilliant gloss, together with a strong tendency to curl.—Price, 3s. 6d.; 7s.; Family Bottles (equal to four small), 10s. 6d.; and double that size, 21s. per bottle.

ROWLAND'S KALYDOR, is an Odoriferous Creamy Liquid—the only safe and efficacious preparation for dissipating every Imperfection of the Skin:—the radiant bloom it imparts to the Cheek, and the softness and delicacy it induces on the Hands, Arms, and Neck, render it indispensable to every toilet.—Price, 4s. 6d. and 8s. 6d. per bottle, duty included.

ROWLAND'S ODONTO, or PEARL DENTIFRICE, a White Powder, compounded of the rarest and most fragrant exotics.—It bestows on the Teeth a Pearl-like Whiteness, frees them from Tartar, and imparts to the Gums a healthy firmness, and to the Breath a grateful sweetness and perfume.—Price, 2s. 9d. per box, duty included.

CAUTION.—Unprincipled Shopkeepers, for the sake of gaining a trifle more profit, vend the most Spurious Compounds under the same names (some under the implied sanction of Royalty). It is therefore imperative on purchasers to see that the word "ROWLAND'S" is on the wrapper of each Article. For the protection of the public from fraud and imposition, the Hon. Commissioners of her Majesty's Stamps have authorized the Proprietors' Signature to be engraved on the Government Stamp, thus—

"A. ROWLAND and SON, 20, HATTON-GARDEN," which is affixed on the KALYDOR and ODONTO.—Sold by them and by Chemists and Perfumers.— All others are FRAUDULENT IMITATIONS!!!

THE LEADING MEDICAL JOURNAL.

On January 4th, 1845, will be published the First Number (for the New Year) of

THE MEDICAL TIMES, offering an eligible opportunity for New Subscribers.—To those who know the MEDICAL TIMES no word is necessary to explain the causes which, in so short a time, have placed it at the head of British Medical Periodicals, and involved in such extraordinary mutations journals at one time thought the most securely established. The conductors (a Physician, a General Practitioner, and a Barrister), when rescuing it from the management of its former proprietors and editors, determined at once, careless of expense, to make it such a journal as the Profession in no part of Europe, had yet seen, a journal pari passu with the present advanced state of Medical Science. Dissevering it forthwith from from the controul or influence of booksellers and publishers, they gave it a distinct office of its own (that occupied by the "Lancet" before its retirement to bookseller's care), and rested their whole success, not on the old aids of individual influence or patronage, but on an independent, upright, and fearless discharge of their duties as journalists. Personally identified with no clique or party in the Profession, and wedded to no opinions which time has made a crotchet, or experience proved a folly, they claim to look at the Profession with the eye of unprejudiced censors, and while speaking out frankly and fearlessly their judgment of what concerns the general good, never to lose sight of the great aim of the true Medical Journalist—upholding in the public eye, and on solid grounds, the honour and dignity of the Profession. In one word, the MEDICAL TIMES is a gentlemanly, but just censor of men and manners,—an honourable arbiter in medico-political strifes,—a faithful exponent of professional improvements, and secure aid in the difficulties of Medical Practice.

For the Year 1845, the MEDICAL TIMES will contain:—

1. About TWENTY LECTURES, by the celebrated PINEL, on "The Phenomena Connected with Mental Hallucinations," &c., translated, with Notes, by Dr. Costello, Editor of the "Cyclopædia of Surgery," &c.

 These Lectures contain views on the Functions of the Brain never before published, and of a scientific interest that cannot be too highly spoken of.

2. A SERIES of LECTURES, by G. J. GUTHRIE, Esq., F.R.S. (late President of the Royal College of Surgeons of England), on "Some Extremely Interesting Points of Surgery."

3. TWENTY PRACTICAL LECTURES, by Dr. C. J. B. WILLIAMS, F.R.S., Professor of Medicine to University College, Physician to the North London Hospital, on "The Treatment of Some Important Diseases"

4. SIXTEEN LECTURES, by Dr. CORRIGAN, of Dublin, on "Some Select Points of Medical Practice."

The Proprietors also pledge themselves, that no Fact of Consequence in any of the Continental, American, or British journals, shall escape, during the year, full mention in the MEDICAL TIMES. To this end, every arrangement is now complete. A German Physician, Dr. Sutro (pupil of the first Professors at Heidelburg and Munich), gives weekly Reports of German Scientific Progress; Dr. de Beaumont (Physician to the Spanish Embassy, Paris), furnishes a complete weekly Summary of the Sayings and Doings of French Medical Men; and an English Medical Practitioner, Mr. John Foote, M.R.C.S., Hon. Secretary to the Royal Medico-Botanical Society, &c., has the exclusive duty of abridging every communication of value appearing in all the English Medical journals.

During the present year, a vast number of select from some of the most distinguished Physicians and Surgeons, at home and abroad, will be published. Among others (by Dr. Hodgkin, Mr. Fergusson, Mr. B. Phillips, &c.), a series of papers of eminent scientific value, and great practical importance, will be given, on the Diseases of Women, by Dr. Rigby; a Series by Dr. Wright, on the Pathology and Physiology of Expectoration; a Series by Dr. Jobert de Lamballe; a Series by Mr. Braid, of Manchester, on Physiological Explanations of Mesmeric Phenomena; a Series by Dr. Costello, on Lithotrity and Lithotomy; a Series by Dr. Clay, on Midwifery, &c. &c.; and, as an indication of what may be expected in this department, the Proprietors have the honour of announcing that among a vast number of eminent contributors during the present year will be found:—G. J. Guthrie, F.R.S.; Professor Tiedemann, Dr. Copland, Dr. Rigby, Dr. Hodgkin, G. W. Tuson, Esq., F.R.S.; Dr. Guy, of King's College; Robert Rigg, F.R.S.; Professor Cruveilhier, &c &c.

There will also be given a Fortnightly List of all Books Published in England, adding the names of every scientific book published on the Continent or in America. This feature, it is presumed, will be of especial interest to all Subscribers, Reading Rooms, and Literary Institutions.

ILLUSTRATED LONDON ALMANACK
and PICTURESQUE CALENDAR FOR 1845.

It contains a greater variety of Information and seasonable entertainment than is to be found in any other Almanack. The Wrapper is beautifully printed in colours; and the artistical execution of the entire Almanack entitles it to a place upon every drawing-room table in the empire.

The Press is universal in praise of this beautiful Alamanack.

EXTRACTS FROM OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

"This is certainly one of the cheapest shilling's-worth that we have seen, even in this age of cheap publication. It contains some of the best Illustrations, for any common observer, of astronomical phenomena that have appeared for some years. From past recollections, we are satisfied that a few years ago a similar publication to this would not have remunerated its producers, even if sold at ten times its price."—Morning Chronicle.

"One of its features is an accurate representation of the principal astronomical phenomena of each month, accompanied with an intelligible description. The pages of the calendar are illustrated with highly fanciful designs of the signs of the zodiac, by Mr. Kenny Meadows; there are also scenes of the sports of each month, birds, and other illustrations. The literary matter is quite as good as the pictorial, and the quarto pages on which the Almanack is printed afford more room for explanation than can be obtained in the ordinary forms. One shilling for such a mass of information and amusement is wonderfully cheap."—Morning Post, Nov. 20.

"This is a new annual, the purpose of which is to blend illustrations with the customary information contained in an almanack. Its letter-press contents are as copious and varied as any of its contemporaries, and the illustrations, which are from the rich fancy of Mr. Kenny Meadows's pencil, comprise allegorical compositions applicable to each month, scenes of the sports of the month, &c. It is, upon the whole, not only a useful, but a most pleasing work."—Morning Advertiser, Nov. 15.

"A cheap year-book of astronomical phenomena and natural history, country sports and town amusements, chronology, and legislation. Of the numerous engravings those representing the telescopic appearances of the planets as they will be visible in the ensuing year are the most interesting, and are peculiar to this almanack."—Examiner.

"Is exceedingly well done, and full of information and good wood-cut adornments and illustrations. Its intrinsic merits, as well as its extrinsic attractions, are sufficient to insure for it a very general demand."—Literary Gazette, Nov. 17.

"It unites with calendarial information, astronomical observations, and recreations incident to each month, embracing as well, notes on natural history, and a mass of miscellanies as useful as it is entertaining. We repeat that this 'Illustrated Almanack' is a happy idea, beautifully executed, and preferring its claims to purchase even by a modern 'Elwes' in economy."—Era, Nov. 24.

"This is one of the many attempts to substitute something rational for the foolish almanacks of times that are passing away—and, we may add, one of the most successful. It is filled with illustrations, some of which, representing the signs of the Zodiac, are executed with considerable artistical taste. As it is chiefly devoted to the natural history of the months, it is just what the readers of the 'Gardeners' Chronicle' are most likely to find useful. It is difficult to imagine anything cheaper."—Gardeners' Chronicle.

"This is, beyond all doubt, the most extraordinary production of the British press. The illustrations are very beautiful. Kenny Meadows revels in the exuberance of his rich fancy, and Linton has done him ample justice in the engraving."—Lloyd's Weekly Newspaper.

Extract from Dr. Ure's testimonial, June 6, 1840:—"I find Mr. G. Nelson's Patent Opaque Gelatine to be at least equal in strength and purity, if not superior, to the best isinglass, for every culinary purpose; it is entirely free from any impregnation of acid, such as I have found to exist in other kinds of Gelatine in the London market." The Opaque Gelatine is an article well adapted for hotels, taverns, cabin use and ship stores, and a safe and profitable commodity for exportation.—Emscote Mills, Warwick; and 14, Bucklersbury.

COD LIVER OIL.—Every day brings fresh testimony of the extraordinary value of this NATURAL REMEDY in the CURE of GOUT, RHEUMATISM, SCROFULA, DISEASED JOINTS, SPINAL and GLANDULAR AFFECTIONS, LUMBAGO, SCROFULOUS ULCERS, and other external diseases. READ THE FOLLOWING CURES.

RECENT CURE OF GOUT.—Henry W. Pitman, Moore's Picture Gallery, St. Martin's-lane, London. Cured after a few applications of the Oil.

CURE OF DISEASED LEGS.—Ann Midgley, 331, Strand. Cured with only one bottle, after leaving St. Thomas's Hospital as incurable.

RESTORATION TO HEALTH.—After confinement for several years without the power of using a limb. Mrs. Mearman, aged 30, restored to perfect health, under the attention of Dr. Brefeld, who prescribed the Oil in this truly miraculous case.

WEAKNESS OF THE LIMBS AND DISEASED JOINTS. Dr. Percival, of the Manchester Infirmary, says, "I have contrasted by experiment the value of Cod Liver Oil with other remedies; these trials always terminated in favour of the Oil, and patients under other treatment, by conferring with their fellow sufferers, were so sensible of making a slower progress towards recovery as to require a change of one remedy for the other."

Prospectuses, containing additional evidence of the value of Cod Liver Oil in other diseases, with general remarks on its Natural and Commercial History, its Physical and Chemical Properties, Action on the Human Economy, &c.; also particular directions for its proper application, are given with each genuine bottle of the remedy, and bear the signature of the only MERCANTILE AGENTS, JONES & CO., 201, Strand. Sold in bottles, at 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., and 11s. each, by all respectable Medicine Vendors.

OPENING OF THE FRENCH CHAMBERS.

THE opening of the French Chambers, which took place on Thursday last, gives the first impulse to that revival of activity in political affairs which is followed up by the commencement of our own Session. The policy pursued by the Cabinets of England and France is of the utmost importance to the whole of Europe; they are the active powers of the western world; their Governments are, to a certain extent, the creations of the will of the people, and the popular opinion has a powerful influence over them. The state of parties in either of them has, therefore, a continual interest to the people of both.

The necessity—or rather the custom—of making Royal speeches to elective assemblies as vague and general as possible, renders the address of the King of the French, which is no exception to the practice, of less value than it might be, as an indication of the probable course of affairs. But if what it does say is rather indistinct, something may still be inferred from what it does not say; the omission of certain topics and allusions is frequently as expressive as any words could be. First of all, then, we may gather from his Majesty's address, the certainty that the war fever has abated, and that there is a return, on the part of the French journals and their readers, to the condition of reason and common sense. The King speaks of peace, and sincerely do we rejoice that he does so; but he can do more than this; he can venture to make a distinct allusion to the satisfactory relations between the two countries, and the removal of all pretext for a misunderstanding between them. This is the result to which time and events have long been tending. Such a dispute as that which sprung out of the Protectorate of Otaheite, never could be permitted by so astute a monarch as Louis Philippe, and two such clear-headed Ministers as Peel and Guizot, to come to hostilities. The French themselves have found out, what the English press long ago told them, that a petty island in a distant sea could not be worth taking by either power. Poor Queen Pomare's "cocoa-nut empire" could afford nothing to a conqueror—not even the empty vanity of glory. To fancy that they were striking a blow at England by the occupation of such a place, was one of the wildest notions that could enter the rather flighty head of "Young France." The public has awakened to the true state of the case at last; the "Protectorate" is disavowed; Dupetit Thouars has returned home; and the war party, instead of finding him indignant at seeing his work undone, hear him agreeing that his Government have a perfect right to do as it pleases—that, in fact, he rather approves their censure of him; and finally, that all the "Haters of Albion" and "Friends of Liberty," who subscribed their half francs, and sous, and centimes to purchase him a "sword of honour," might as well have kept their money, for the sword he positively will not accept. The Admiral is not going to make himself a martyr to a popular delusion, and has too much good sense to indulge his vanity by an acceptance of a gift which would be followed by the certain loss of his commission. Thus M. Thiers and the French Opposition are made bankrupt of all the "political capital" which they had hoped to find in the Tahiti question. It is worn threadbare; it is old, which in France is fatal to its efficacy; and, more fatal still, it has been turned into ridicule. Queen Pomare and Mr. Pritchard succeeded the parasol of the Emperor of Morocco. Tahiti is no longer so much a grievance as a jest.

Another topic introduced into the speech of the King has an especial interest for us; he refers to the reception he met with from the Queen of England, and the hospitality of which he was the object. He expresses the gratification he feels not only on his own account but on that of France also; considering that to draw closer the relations between the two countries is the best guarantee for a general peace. The open and frank allusion made to this visit is another proof that the ravings of the war party have been utterly futile. Its organs asserted that the visit was a humiliation to France, a triumph to England, a weakness in Louis Philippe, and that its consequences would shake the Orleans dynasty. Had it but one-tenth of the importance they attributed to it, the Ministry would never have ventured to put it into the King's speech. There never was, perhaps, an instance of a party making so much noise with so little reason for it. The result is the very natural one of its not finding any real sympathy from those who are the real strength of the nation. We long hope to see a good understanding between the Tuileries and Windsor; not that the personal intercourse between the monarchs of England and France could create the same friendly feeling between the respective people, but because it may be taken as a certain indication that this mutual good feeling exists.

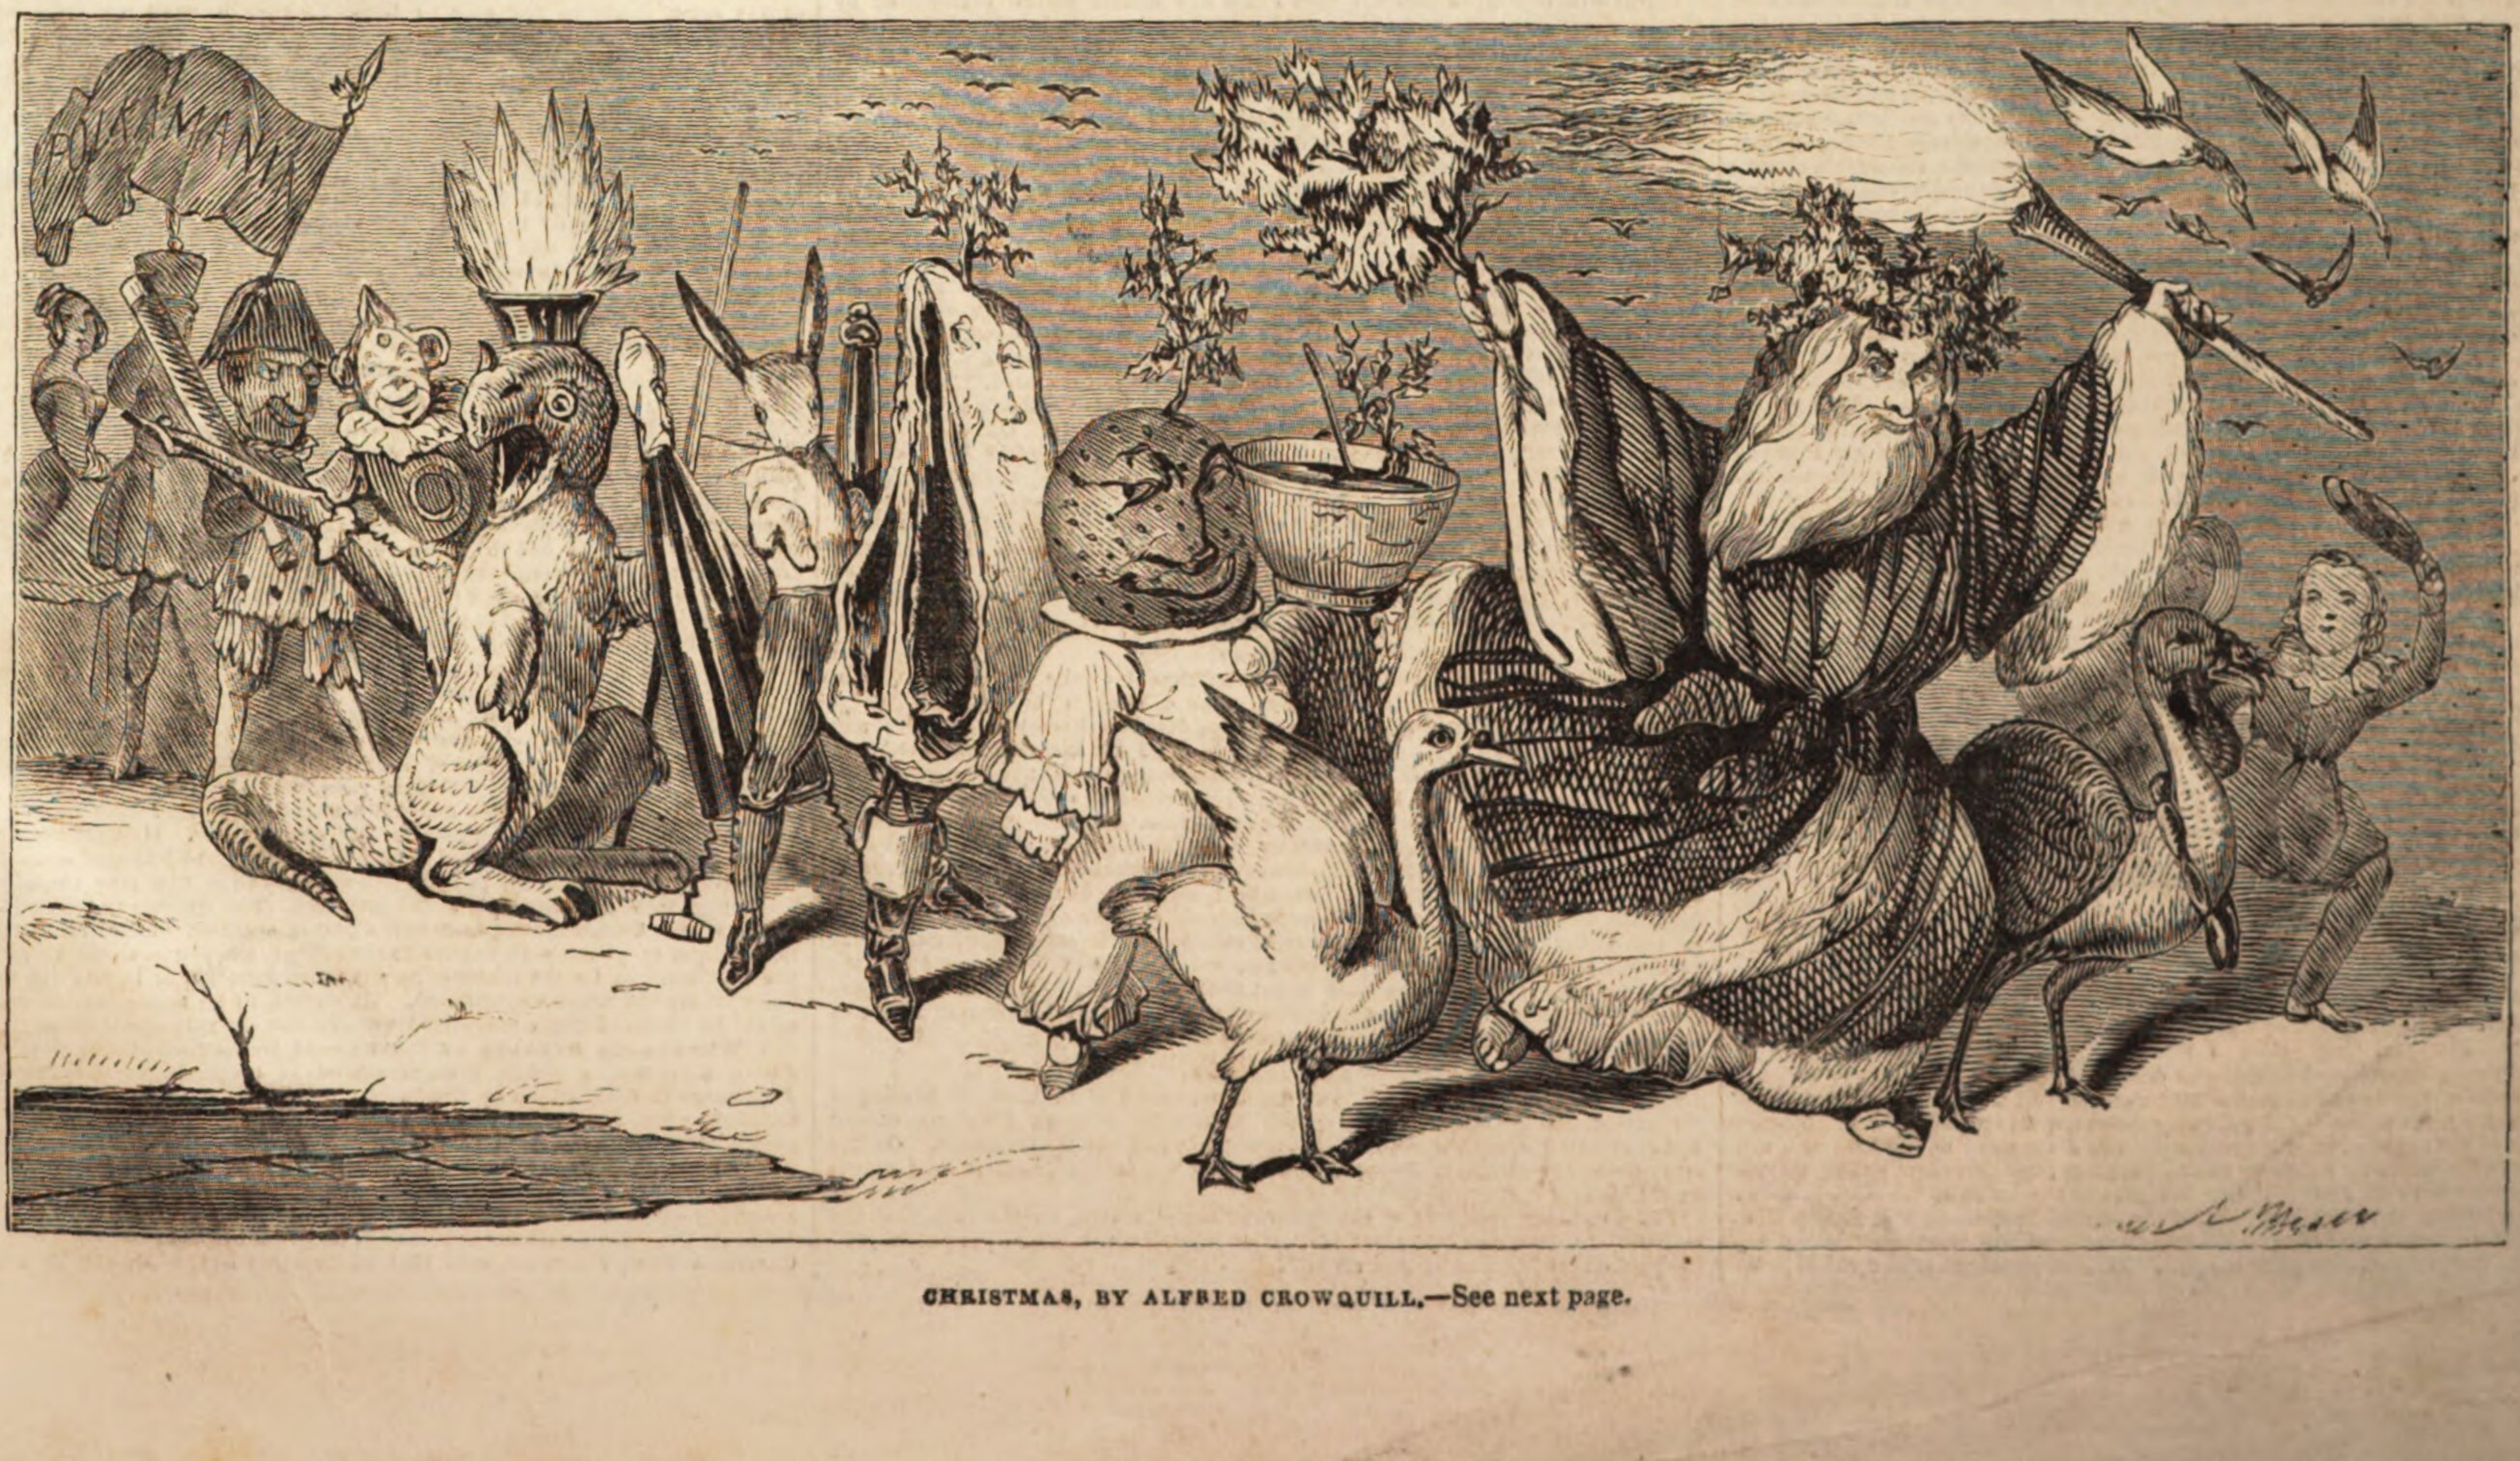
On the part of the speech relating to the "triumphs of the French arms in Africa," we shall not dwell. In Algiers the French have created for themselves a great difficulty; it is a conquest with no gain and but little glory. The victors of Austerlitz and Jena needed not the only laurels they could gather on such a field as that of Islay; and the little military renown that has been won is more than outweighed by the folly and absurdity that has made the civil government of the colony a curse to it. The last accounts state the blunders and mismanagement of the civil officers to have been so outrageous, that "there is not a French proprietor in Algeria who does not wish that the English would come and change places with their French masters." It is to cover all this, and give the people something in return for the enormous sums Algiers costs them, that the flourish about the triumphs of the French arms is made. If the French will take phrases for facts, and be content with empty glory, and scarcely that, as the return for wasted means and squandered wealth, it is their own concern, not ours.

Having thus run over the chief topics of the King's speech, we may briefly allude to its omissions, which, too, are not without their significance.

The part that France has taken in the affairs of Spain, and the disastrous issue of that interference, might have been mentioned, and would have been so, had not the subject been inconvenient. More than two hundred persons shot without trial in the course of twelve months for political opinions, a Constitution destroyed, and all power lodged in the hands of a bloody-minded soldier and a profligate Queen, could hardly be presented to any people in any manner that would not cause disgust and abhorrence. Spain is the blot on the Ministry of M. Guizot. It is one of those things on which silence is prudence.

The Right of Search question is not alluded to, so it may be taken for granted that nothing has been concluded upon it. And his Majesty does not press on the Chambers his demand for an allowance to the Duke of Nemours as future Regent. The demand would give a dangerous weapon to the Opposition; it is therefore postponed, but not, we fancy, abandoned.

The opening of the Chambers finds the present French Ministry strong enough to defy the attacks of an Opposition not well united and not furnished by events with facts that would enable them to prove the incapacity of the Government. The war-cry has failed, the Tahiti question is worn out, the Right of Search is pending, the Revenue is in a tolerably sound condition, and as far as peace is secured by the continuance of M. Guizot in power, we may congratulate both nations that his position at present seems so well secured.



CHRISTMAS, BY ALFRED CROWQUILL.—See next page.

A SONG TO CHRISTMAS.

Hail to thee, Father Christmas! a blessing on your brow!
These sixty years you never seemed so worshipful as now.
Of late I've felt dying, and wearisome and low,
I joy to see your reverend face, once more before I go.
Aye! you are come right welcome to brighten up my soul,
And to spice the last sweet drop that clings to life's enchanting bowl.
When you appear again, this hand will be in the cold ground,
And other ears than mine will hear the bells' rejoicing sound.

You come to tap old barrels, and to spread the dainty cheer,
To sing old Christian Carols to the sad declining year;
And with ivy and with holly, your wand is bright and green,
And like a sheet of moonlight stars your whitened beard is seen:
The trees have lost their lively birds, the earth is wild below,
And the dark-eyed robin redbreast sings its ditty in the snow;
But a blessing from the "manger-side" dispels the winter storm,
And in spite of wind and icicles, the human heart grows warm.

How linked with goodness are the songs that hum from door to door,
As blessed are the tripping chimes that sweetly rang of yore
Above the tombs of saintly men whose charity was pure,
And who feasted with their bondsmen and frolicked with the poor.
We read the Holy Word of God, and hold its precepts dear,
But Christmas always teaches us to practise what we hear,
To overflow with kindliness, to emulate the "child"
Who was so poor in Bethlehem—and hold us pure and mild.

Oh! what delight it is to think of childhood's generous days!
The banquet of our parents dear, the "youl log's" flick'ring blaze;
Our brothers and our sisters—the laugh, the dance, the song,
And brave old servants, clustering near all in a faithful throng,
With little lively children, the darlings of the scene,
Like faries frisking to the sound of harp and tambourine;
The wassail bowl, parading round, also the silver cup
That ended with the kitchen folks that all might have their sup!

Right Reverend Father Christmas! my heart beats proud and high,
I'll drain the sole remaining flask, and wish the world good-bye!
We will say a prayer together, we will sing an ancient rhyme,
For the greatest good I ever did, was done at Christmas-time!
And we'll send a purse of charity to neighbours all around,
The honest and deserving, who destitute are found,
That I may have remembrance and blessings right sincere,
When I am underneath the snow, and you return next year.

I had five brothers goodly—a sister kind, as well,
We always met together, just as the season fell;
We made our parents happy upon the Holy Tide,
And trimmed their chairs with ivy leaves and mistletoe beside.
I am the only one of all—the last leaf in the year,
Yet Christmas always comforts me—I seldom shed a tear.
Their Christmas is a better one, with angels in the skies,
In my bright bubbling wine I trace their watchful loving eyes.

In my bright youth I travelled, and I traversed o'er the sea,
The billow and the avalanche, were cheerful things to me;
The firm array of battles—the conflict rude and wild—
Were just like playthings in my path, for I was but a child:
A charmed word like magic changed, my strong desire to roam;
A letter from my mother, and the darling ones at home.
It was dated from a festival; this was the mournful strain:
"From England—upon Christmas Day!" I soon returned again.

Let us assemble all our friends, the greatest and the least,
And bring to us good merriment—a gathering and a feast.
We'll hold fast hands together, and we'll send the goblet round,
For all the cream of earthly joys at Christmas time is found!
And we will trip it cheerfully before the ancient fire,
Which, just like us, gives out the flame, before it doth expire.
I feel as youthful as a boy, my silly head turns round,
God bless you! Father Christmas! and may your joys abound.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

PARISIANA.

(From our own Correspondent.)

PARIS, Wednesday.

Since the Restoration, all Parisian fashions have taken an English tournure. Now, however, we seem to have gone still further north to seek for novelties of outward form. The Champs Elysées, this week, have presented a curious spectacle, and the beholders were irresistibly tempted to fancy themselves in the environs of St. Petersburg or of Moscow. A smooth, unbroken surface of snow was covered by a multitude of sledges; and, to complete the resemblance, both the coachmen and their masters were enveloped in immense mantles of fur, in true Russian fashion. Amongst the number of fashionables, we distinguished Prince Obreskoff, who, with several others of the most gallant of his countrymen at present visitors to our capital, must have fancied themselves again on the banks of the Neva. Most unluckily, the thaw has suddenly put a stop to all this agreeable excitement, and the Parisians are again condemned to the common-place of their ordinary equipages. This fashion, however, though enjoyed with all the zest of novelty, dates from before the Revolution; and the sledger that are seen to-day in Paris can bear but little comparison with the splendour of those in which the aristocratic élégans of that period—Count of Artois, the Duke de Chartres, the Marquis de Conflans, and the Duke de Lauzun—promenaded through Paris. Queen Marie Antoinette herself delighted in this amusement; often might she be seen in the avenues of Versailles, conducting herself her sledge, which was, as may be imagined, of peculiar elegance in form and decoration. Alas! it has undergone strange vicissitudes; the body of the sledge of Marie Antoinette is the identical carriage in which, in Auber's opera of "The Philtre," at the Grand Opera, Levasseur, as Doctor Dulcamara, arrives on the stage, and from which he dispenses his quack medicines to the villagers. What a falling off was there!

The Paris police, so admirably organised for the tracing and detection of crime or the punishment of political offenders, offers but little immediate protection to individuals. The streets are often the scenes of midnight robberies, or even murders; the cry of "Au Voleur!" creates far less attention than "Vive la République!" and men, whom business or pleasure calls into the more unfrequented parts of the town, no longer find the protection of a guard-stick and a fleet pair of legs sufficient The number of persons attacked, many murdered, some thrown into the canal or the river when despatched, and never again heard of—all these circumstances have spread general alarm in Paris The circumstance of their attempting to murder a young élégant, M. Le Hon, at the very moment he had parted with his carriage, at the door of an hotel filled by the votaries of pleasure, has brought these fears to their climax.

A somewhat ludicrous adventure happened to a young beau the other night. On leaving a house situated in one of the most retired faubourgs, he perceived at a short distance a man, who followed him from one street to another, most pertinaceously dogging his footsteps. The young man, considerably annoyed, and feeling no doubt that this suspicious individual only waited a favourable opportunity to attack him, at last turned round upon him, in an angry tone demanding his business. His anger was soon however changed into amusement. The other, in a trembling tone, exclaimed, "A thousand pardons, Sir, I am so afraid of being attacked, and I thought you would defend me!"

The diplomatic réunions continue to be the only parties given at this moment. Two brilliant routs at the Austrian Embassy, and the charming balls given by the Countess de Luxbourg, have alone enlivened the season. The Embassy of Bavaria, and our minister, M. Guizot, are disputing for the privilege of Wednesday, as a day of reception. One of the brightest stars of our fashionable world is the beautiful Lady D——, the granddaughter of Sheridan. Each winter some foreign land has yielded us a reigning star to preside over Parisian society —I need only mention Lady H. D'Orsay, the Marquise Pallavicini, the Princess Galitzin. The sceptre has now returned to one of your fair countrywomen. The English Ambassadress, Lady Cowley, had planned numerous fêtes for this winter; amongst others, a splendid fancy ball, and even British dramatic réunions. Magnificent dresses had been ordered, professors of English secured to understand the theatricals. All these projects of pleasure are, however, overthrown by the tidings of the death of Lady Anne Culling Smith, sister of Lady Cowley.

The enthusiasm excited here by the English actors has reached its climax. No part of their performance is passed unnoticed; even the costume of Miss Faucit as Desdemona, has not only escaped the usual artillery of raillerie bestowed by the Parisiennes on their fair foreign neighbours, but is pronounced a model of taste, splendour and historical accuracy. The white satin dress embroidered in gold, with square boddice, and venetian sleeves—even to the pink and silver scarf surrounding the waist, are made the subjects of the highest encomium.

A sad event, illustrating the mercantile and money-loving spirit of the times, which reached even the domains of art, has lately occurred. You have heard of M. Jesi, the celebrated Florentine engraver. This gentleman a short time since finished a splendid engraving from Raphael's portrait of Leo X. This chef d'œuvre had engaged the artist's whole attention for several years, and was an object of the deepest interest to him. On the strength of its merits he had been named member of the Legion of Honour, and corresponding member of the institute. There was but one opinion amongst all the connoisseurs, assembled to pronounce upon it, as to the excellence of the performance: it was instantly adjudged by them as one of the highest efforts of the art. M. Jesi had been for some time in correspondence with a well-known print-seller of Liege, who desired to purchase the greater number of the proofs of this beautiful production, and held out to the artist a prospect of most advantageous terms. The publisher, however, on arriving at Paris in order to conclude the negotiation advantageously, was desirous of cheapening as much as possible the terms on which he was to purchase; he therefore began on his first interview with M. Jesi, to depreciate greatly the value of his performance: according to him, the work had been totally spoiled in drawing the proofs. M. Jesi made no answer to these unfeeling remarks, and the publisher retired, rejoicing in the prospect of a good bargain. M. Jesi remained shut up in his own room the whole day, and the next morning he was found by his friends in a state of complete mental alienation; he had even during the night attempted suicide, by dashing his head against a marble table. The unfortunate artist is now in a maison de santé; but hopes are entertained that if they succeed in making him comprehend the object of the Liegois publisher's detraction, he may recover his faculties: he may then indeed exclaim with his countryman, Metastasio:—

"O, mente Umana, Cieca e superba!"

FRANCE.

OPENING OF THE FRENCH CHAMBERS.

The King of the French opened the Session of the two Chambers on Thursday. At one o'clock his Majesty left the Tuileries, and, upon arriving at the Chamber of Deputies, ascended the throne, accompanied by their Royal Highnesses the Duc de Nemours, Prince de Joinville, Duc d'Aumale, and Duc de Montpensier. The Queen and Princesses occupied the usual places. His Majesty having taken his seat, delivered the following speech:—

"Messieurs the Peers and Deputies,

"At the close of last session, complications, which might have become grave, were the objects of my solicitude. The necessity of securing our possessions in Africa against hostile and repeated incursions obliged us to carry war into the empire of Morocco. Our brave armies of land and sea, worthily commanded, attained with glory, and in a short time, the object marked out to their valour. Peace promptly followed victory, and Algiers, where three of my sons had this year the honour to serve their country, has recorded a double pledge of security, for we have proved at once our power and our moderation.

"My Government was engaged with that of the Queen of Great Britain in discussions which might have given reason to fear that the relations of the two States might have been affected; a spirit of goodwill and equity has maintained between France and England this happy accord, which guarantees the peace of the world.

"During the visit which I paid the Queen of Great Britain to testify to her the price that I attach to the amity which unites us, and to that reciprocal friendship of which she has given me so many marks, I have been surrounded by manifestations the most satisfactory for France and for myself. I have gathered, in the sentiments that have been expressed to me, additional guarantees for the long duration of that generous peace, which assures to our country abroad a dignified and strong position, and at home an eternally increasing prosperity, with the enjoyment of her constitutional liberties.

"My relations with all foreign powers continue to be friendly and amicable.

"You are, Messieurs, yourselves witnesses of the prosperous state of France. You see manifested upon all parts of our territory our national activity, protected by wise laws, and reaping in the bosom of order the fruits of its labours. The rise of public credit, and the equilibrium established between our annual receipts and expenditure, attest the happy influence of this situation upon the general affairs of the State for the well-being of all.

"Financial laws will be immediately presented to you. Projects of laws for the amelioration of our roads, of our ports, and of our internal navigation, for the completion of our railways, and for different objects of general utility, will be equally submitted to your deliberation.

"In the midst of the general prosperity of the country, Heaven has blessed my family. It has increased the number of my children; and the marriage of one of my well-beloved sons, the Duc d'Aumale, with a Princess, who already was related to us by so many ties, has been for me and mine a lively satisfaction.

"Messieurs, Providence has imposed upon me many labours, and painful trials. I have accepted the burden. I have devoted myself—I have devoted my family to the service of my country. To lay a lasting foundation of union and happiness has for fourteen years been the object of our constant efforts. I feel confident that with your loyal aid you will enable me to attain it, and that the gratitude of France, free and happy, will be the reward of our common devotedness, and be, too, the honour of my reign."

Cries of "Vive le Roi!" interrupted some of the foregoing speech, and were renewed at the close. A heavy fog enveloped Paris all the morning.

The French Opposition press, ever ready to catch at straws, and to magnify events trifling in themselves into circumstances of importance, have seized with avidity upon a circumstance, which, we admit, is likely to cause some embarrassment to the Ministry; we allude to the expected return of Admiral Dupetit Thouars from Tahiti to France. The Admiral is expected at Cherbourg, where the restless spirits connected with republicanism and anarchy propose to receive him with great honours, as a reward for his supposed enmity towards the English. It is said that the National Guards are to be drawn up on his landing, and that they intend to present him with a wreath of laurels, by way of preparation for the sword of honour with which he was invested. We believe that the French Government, with the same prudence as it evinced on a former occasion, will not permit this incentive to anarchy. According to the regulations of the French service, no officer can accept of any decoration or other mark of distinction, unless he chooses to give up his commission.

The banquets given to Sir Henry Pottinger have excited considerable attention among the journalists of Paris. His explanations respecting the treaty with China have completely falsified the insinuations which they some time since made respecting a supposed surreptitious introduction made in that treaty, and some of the journals are exceedingly displeased at the upright and truly statesmanlike tone assumed by our Representative, and they affect to think that the letters expected from M. Lagrenée the French Minister, will give a different account of the feelings of the Chinese towards the English.

SPAIN.

We learn from Madrid that the Committee of the Senate appointed to report on the Reform Bill had communicated to both Chambers the result of its labour, and recommended its adoption.

The letters of the 18th inst. from Madrid say the Chamber of Deputies commenced on that day the discussion on the bill to authorise the conversion of the debt proceeding from contracts into Three per Cent. Stock.

Some sensation had been excited at Madrid by the resignation of M. Donozo Cortes, the Queen's Secretary. There were various reports upon the subject, but the general opinion was that it arose out of a praiseworthy determination to compel Narvaez to exercise clemency in the case of Colonel Rengifo and his co-accused. It appears that Narvaez was fully determined to have the unfortunate men executed forthwith, when M. Donozo Cortes remonstrated strongly, and pointed out the immense injury the execution of a sentence, declared by two superior courts to be illegal, would have throughout Europe. Narvaez replied in such insulting terms, that M. Donozo Cortes thought it becoming to tender his resignation immediately, which he did accordingly. This unexpected proceeding alarmed Narvaez, and he gave way. Colonel Rengifo's punishment was commuted to banishment for life, and all possible means are now being used to induce M. Donozo Cortes to withdraw his resignation.

Accounts from Vittoria mention the death of General Jauregui (El Pastor) in that town. El Pastor rendered essential service to the national cause during the war of independence.

PORTUGAL.

Our letters from Lisbon of the 17th inst. contain an account of the ceremonies which took place upon the closing of the Cortes. The Queen was present and dismissed the assembly with a brief speech in these terms:—

"Illustrious Peers of the realm, and Deputies of the Portuguese nation,

"It is with unfeigned pleasure that I this day behold myself surrounded by the representatives of the nation. I congratulate you, conjointly with myself, on the fruitful result of your parliamentary labours. The measures resorted to by the legislative body, for the purpose of establishing upon a solid basis the public tranquillity, which has been unfortunately interrupted in various parts of the kingdom, have produced the desired effect; and those which have since been approved of, present the well founded hope that the throne and constitutional institutions will not be offended anew. The plans which have been adopted by you for the improvement of the public revenue finances will most powerfully tend to the attainment of that so generally desired object, viz., the complete organization of this important point. Public confidence, so generally manifested, together with the progressive augmentation of the general credit, furnish an undeniable testimony to the importance and utility of those measures. The affairs which have been submitted to your deliberation have been of the most weighty nature, and it behoves me to say that the views taken of the same, and resolutions adopted by you, have proved you to be worthy of the nation's confidence as well as of my most especial benevolence. The session is closed."

There was no political news of interest. There had been some very tempestuous weather on the coast for several days previously. On Saturday the 14th inst., during a heavy gale from south-west, the Portuguese brig Liberal, from Rio Janeiro, on attempting to enter the port of Lisbon, was driven on the bar, where she soon went to pieces. The master and seven seamen were drowned; the mate and three others were saved. In the course of the same day a Spanish schooner went on shore nearly at the same place. All the crew escaped, but four passengers perished.

Mr. Tozer, the British subject who was arrested in April last at Coimbra, on charges of a political nature, was tried at Oporto on the 11th inst., and acquitted.

GERMANY.

The Journal des Débats states that the interment of the mortal remains of the illustrious Carl Maria von Weber took place at Dresden, on the 14th instant. The coffin, covered with black velvet, embroidered with crowns of silver and green silk, arrived at Dresden from Magdeburgh by the railroad. At eight o'clock in the evening it was transported in a boat to the right bank of the Elbe, where 500 infantry of the Royal Guard, with torches in their hands, were waiting to receive it. In the interior of a circle formed by the troops were placed the members of the King's musical band, those of the two theatres, and several other amateurs, by whom the coffin was removed from the boat. A funeral hymn, composed by Wagener, a pupil of Meyerbeer, was then chanted by 450 singers, with the necessary instrumental accompaniment. The coffin was then carried to the Catholic chapel of the principal cemetery of Dresden, and, after a funeral service was celebrated in that temple, the remains of Weber were interred beside those of his son, who died about five years since. All the houses in the streets through which the funeral procession passed were illuminated with wax candles, placed in the windows. An immense crowd followed.

SWITZERLAND.

The news from Switzerland is that the Government of Lucerne, on hearing of the resolutions adopted by the popular assemblies held at Fraubrunnen and Zofingue had ordered the military commission to call out the landwehr. On the other hand, the canton of Schwytz marched troops to the frontiers of Lucerne on the 16th.

The Swiss correspondent of the Constitutionnel writes, on the 19th, that the events of Lucerne were the mere prelude of a crisis which might yet put in peril the present constitution of Switzerland.

TURKEY.

Accounts from Constantinople to the 4th instant state that Sir Stratford Canning has returned, from his excursion to the Dardanelles, to his country house at Bujukdere.

It was said that Abdallah, late Pacha of Trebisond, alarmed by the order of the Porte to justify himself, had offered a large pecuniary indemnification to the ill-used Greek. The Pacha is said to be also threatened with an address of the chief Turks of Trebisond to the Porte, representing the tyranny which makes him hated by all classes, and earnestly desires that he may be removed. Dr. J. Wolff writes from Teheran that he is chiefly indebted to the support of the Persian Ambassador for his deliverance from the claws of the rapacious and murderous Bocharists; it was under his protection that he succeeded in returning safe to Teheran.

Several Turkish passengers were frozen to death in the last steam boat for Trebisond. The thermometer was at zero (Reaumur) and the roofs were covered with snow.

The apprehensions of a breach between Sir S. Canning and the Turkish Ministry are happily not confirmed. Sir Stratford acts with great moderation, and seems to be quite confident that all his demands will be granted. In his late excursion he visited the coast of Troy.

WEST INDIES.

The Thames has arrived at Southampton with the West India mails. She left Jamaica on the 23rd of November, Carthagena the 18th, Demerara the 18th, Trinidad the 20th, Barbadoes the 25th, Grenada the 26th, St. Thomas Dec. 1, and Fayal the 14th.

The papers state that the whole of the West India Islands were generally in a very healthy condition. The Governors of the Trinidad and the Windward Islands were about to proceed to Jamaica, to consult with Lord Elgin on the expediency of forming a final settlement for the West India colonies. There is every prospect of good crops throughout the islands generally. The weather has not been so propitious for many years.

The House of Assembly was sitting at Jamaica, but no business of importance has been under consideration.

SOUTH AMERICA.

IMPORTANT NEWS FROM PERU.—Accounts have arrived from Arica, stating that an outrage had been committed on the British Consul there by the authorities of the town. The outrage is mentioned as being of the grossest description. The British squadron engaged in the blockade of Islay had information of the outrage communicated by Mr. Wilson, the insulted consul, and her Majesty's ship Talbot was immediately despatched to Arica. It is said that water was refused this vessel. Our Peruvian Minister, Mr. Adams, happened to be on board the Talbot, and considered the circumstances of the case so flagrant as to demand an immediate apology, which was required in the name of the British Government by the commander of the Talbot. The apology being refused, the Talbot opened fire on the governor's residence; several shells were thrown in, and this was represented as being only a beginning, and that the town would be bombarded. This prompt mode of dealing brought the authorities to better behaviour—an ample apology was given, and tranquillity at once restored.

VALPARAISO, Aug 5.—You will, perhaps, have heard of a schooner, the O. C. Raymand, having left China with a large amount of silver on board: she was supposed to have been lost, but she arrived here in September last, and the captain consigned himself to a most respectable firm in this place, stating that he had been, for two years past, trading amongst the islands in the Indian seas, and on the coast of China; that he originally sailed from the Sag harbour, with an assorted cargo, valued at 31,000 dollars; and that the vessel and cargo were the joint concern of himself, the mate, and parties in the United States. He brought a quantity of sycee silver, which he caused to be melted into bars, that produced him in gold ounces 48,000 dollars. He then transferred his vessel before the American Consul to the mate, and left this place for the coast. Since his departure, we have heard that he had received the specie on board as freight from one port of China to another. The last heard of the captain was, that he had, with two bags of gold ounces, taken his passage from Chagres in a vessel for New York. The mate also left this place in a vessel bound for New York. It is, therefore, probable that both the captain and mate may be secured.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

REFUSAL OF PROTECTION TO AN INSOLVENT UNDER THE NEW ACT.—In the Court of Bankruptcy, on Monday, the case of J. Mynde Cooke was decided upon. The particulars of it have been mentioned several times. The insolvent is an attorney, and was stated to have been deeply engaged in gambling transactions with persons well known in the play world. He now came up in custody from the Queen's Prison, his further examination having been adjourned, upon application for his final order.—After a good deal of argument, and the hearing of some evidence, the learned Commissioner said that this application was made to the Court under the 28th section of the act, which prayed that the insolvent might obtain his protection. The opposition to the insolvent he considered to be perfectly legitimate, although no trade creditors, as such, were now said to oppose him. There were three charges made against the insolvent—first, his obtaining money from Mr. Flight upon bills, by means of false representations; second, his retaining £1200 out of £3800 in an improper manner; and third, his reckless expenditure. Now, as to the discount of the bills by Mr. Flight, he (the learned commissioner) believed the statement of Eicke and of Cox, who both said that the money was to be raised for Stratford, who had considerable expectations, and was then about to marry the daughter of a baronet, with a considerable fortune. Besides, the insolvent was all that time acting in the character of Stratford's solicitor, and no doubt it was only from the expectation of large gains that Flight discounted the bills. The transactions with Page were certainly left in doubt, for Evans, the wine-merchant, had not been called; but yet, taking the whole of the evidence upon that point, it was most decidedly against the insolvent. As to the transactions between him and his broker, they appeared to be a complete juggle; and, under all the circumstances of this case, which was full of fraud and culpable neglect, he (the learned commissioner) had no hesitation in saying that the Insolvent Act was not intended to protect such persons as the insolvent, but only honest debtors, who by misfortune were unable to pay their debts. The application is discharged altogether.—Mr. Cooke: By the act, the insolvent must be protected after twelve months.—His Honour: I have nothing to do with that, it must go before another tribunal.—The insolvent was removed in custody.

ADVERSE DECISIONS AGAINST INSOLVENTS.—In the Court of Bankruptcy on Tuesday, the Rev. Dr. Kenny, Rector of St. Saviour's, Southwark, appeared before Mr. Commissioner Evans for his final order. His debts and liabilities amounted to about £12,000, and the insolvent had offered to set aside £350 out of his income of £650 per annum for the benefit of his creditors. Mr. Sturgeon opposed the granting of the final order on behalf of several creditors, upon the ground that the insolvent had contracted debts without any reasonable prospect of being able to pay them. Mr. Commissioner Evans: From the beginning I could see that there was no reasonable ground for his coming here, and I shall dismiss his petition. A solicitor, who appeared for the insolvent, said that he thought the terms offered would be advantageous to the creditors, and he expected they would have accepted them. Mr. Commissioner Evans: I can listen to no such proposition. I am sworn to do justice, and my decided opinion is, that the insolvent had not the slightest means of meeting the bills which he accepted, or paying the debts which he has contracted.—A decision was also given in the same Court in the case of Lewis Jackson Randall, which shows, that in spite of the obloquy heaped on those who desire to extend a little mercy towards honest debtors, there are ample means of punishing dishonest ones. The insolvent, a furniture broker, in Bethnal-green, was opposed by Mr. Cooke for a creditor named Riches, and supported by Mr. Woodruffe. The complaint was a breach of trust. The parties had been connected in business together, the creditor advancing money and receiving his capital on the sale of furniture, as also one-third of the profits. In July, 1843, the insolvent claimed the furniture as his own, and Mr. Riches brought an action for £100, but only recovered £50. The law costs amounted to £93. The insolvent contradicted the opposing creditor. The furniture was his own. He vouched his books to corroborate his statement. Some books were now exhibited, and the opposing creditor pointed out a number of items which had been falsified. The Chief Commissioner, after remarking on the conduct of the insolvent, remanded him for fourteen calendar months for falsifying and concealing his books.

POLICE.

CHARGE OF HOUSEBREAKING.—At Union Hall on Monday, Joseph Astelford, a man dressed as a mechanic, was charged with breaking into the dwelling-house of Mr. Court, at Meeting-house-lane, Peckham, and stealing three suits of clothes and other apparel.—A brother of the prosecutor stated that at eight on Saturday morning he left the property safe in the bedroom of a small house attached to his father's residence in Meeting-house-lane, where he and his brother slept. The front door was left on the latch and could be opened with a common latch key. At the rear of the premises, which had connection with his father's house, a large dog was kept, which would not only make a noise but attack a stranger. At eight in the evening he entered by the back door, and proceeded into the bedroom, when he found that the drawers had been broken open and robbed of their contents. He also found the front door ajar, and he had every reason to think that the entrance was effected by that door, as it was seldom opened by any one.—Constable 47 M stated that about ten minutes past eight o'clock he was on duty in the Kent-road, when he saw the prisoner with a bundle under each arm. He asked where he got them? He replied he was employed to carry them by a man he never saw before. He afterwards contradicted himself by saying he had found them. After he had said so he dropped the bundles and ran away, but he pursued and took him into custody.—The prosecutor identified the whole of the property. The drawers and desk had been forced with some brass compasses and a pair of snuffers, which were lying about and broken to pieces.—In answer to the charge, the prisoner said he picked up the bundles. As for the robbery, he was quite innocent of it, and did not even know where the house was situated. He wished to be remanded, as some clue might be obtained of the real offenders. To this the magistrate assented.

A WHOLESALE STEALER OF BOOKS.—At Bow-street on Monday, Ebezier Paron Kingston, a young man employed as prosector to the Professor of Physiology in King's College, Somerset House, was brought up for re-examination before Mr. Jardine, charged with stealing a coat, a pocket book, a cigar-case, several letters, an ink-stand, and a key, value £4 and upwards, the property of Mr. John Farmer, a medical student.—Several coffee-shop keepers, who had known the prisoner for a considerable time, were in attendance to identify a number of books that had been stolen from their premises, and which were found by the officer, with other property, on searching the prisoner's lodgings.—Constable West, F division, said that on Saturday last, while searching the prisoner's lodgings, 25, Harwood-street, Hampstead-road, he found in a front room, occupied by the prisoner, three diagrams produced, which were used in anatomical lectures, "Jones's Animal Kingdom," "Owen's Odentography," a pocket compass, a small vice, a spirit measure, and part of a dog's skull.—John Forrest, curator at the museum, King's College, identified the diagrams as belonging to the corporation of the College. The "Animal Kingdom" was stolen from the library, and the other book, which belonged to Professor Thomas Rymer Jones, was taken from a drawer. The compass and measure were also stolen from the College. The vice was the property of witness.—The proprietor of the Star coffee-house, in Long-acre, said that ten books which were found in the lodgings of the prisoner had been stolen from his rooms, which the prisoner was in the habit of frequenting.—The prisoner was remanded.

A MAN CHARGED WITH FORGERY UPON HIS BROTHER.—At Clerkenwell Police-court, on Tuesday, Mr. James Carr was charged with a forgery upon his brother. It appeared from the evidence that about fourteen years ago the prosecutor, James William Carr, the prisoner's brother, was transported for seven years. He was entitled to the reversionary interest of freehold property in houses and lands in Sharp's-alley, Cow-cross, worth £500. The property not having been forfeited to the Crown, he, upon his return to this country, about four months ago, negociated with a Mr. Venables for the sale of his reversionary interest in it. The negociation was near its conclusion, when it was discovered that the prisoner had made a deed of assignment, conveying the property to a man named Price, who had been since transported, and the very day after the above instrument was executed was a party to a mortgage deed, in which Price was the mortgagor, and a flannel-merchant, named Williams, residing in Llanidloes, in Wales, the mortgagee. The consideration in the deed of assignment, which was dated 12th August, 1842, was £250. In another, which was dated the 13th of the same month and year, £220.—The prosecutor deposed that his name signed to both instruments was in the prisoner's handwriting, and that he had never authorised the prisoner to execute them. The reversionary interest in the property was his and his only.—Mr. Combe asked if Mr. Williams had paid over the £220.—Mr. Kearns, an attorney, residing in Red-lion-square, in whose office both deeds were executed, said that Mr. Williams had, through his agent, paid over about £50 of the mortgage money.—Police-constable 40 M said the prisoner had, when apprehended, confessed his guilt.—Prisoner: I put my brother's name to it, but I never received a farthing. Price received about £30. I thought the prosecutor was dead.—Mr. Combe: That would not make the forgery of his name the less culpable.—Mr. Combe decided upon committing the prisoner for trial to the Old Bailey, but, as some further evidence was necessary, he remanded the prisoner.

EXTRAORDINARY RESISTANCE BY A COINER AND HIS CHILD.—On Tuesday, at Worship-street Police-office, James Green, a well-dressed middle-aged man, of most determined aspect, and Anne Green, his daughter, a little girl eleven years of age, were charged with having been found engaged in the manufacture of a large quantity of spurious money; and also with having committed a murderous assault upon two of the officers of the G division of police.—It appeared from the evidence of Sergeant Brannan, who was in such a state of suffering as to be scarcely capable of giving his evidence, that having received information the prisoner was closely connected with an extensive gang of coiners who had recently put into circulation a large amount of spurious money, he proceeded, between nine and ten o'clock on the previous evening, accompanied by Cole, a constable on the same division, to the house of the prisoner in Bath-court, City-road. On knocking, the door was opened by the younger prisoner, who, the instant she saw the officers, called loudly to her father; on which the male prisoner suddenly made his appearance at the top of a flight of stairs communicating with a room into which the street-door opened. Witness rushed up the stairs in the hope of seizing the man, and had reached within three steps of the landing, when the prisoner exclaimed, "You've not got me yet, Brannan, you thief," and, springing at him, struck him such a violent blow in the chest with his feet, that he was instantly hurled from the top of the stairs to the room below, where his spine came in contact with the edge of a chair, and the prisoner, who was unable to check his own impetus, fell with his whole weight upon the officer. Cole then seized the prisoner, and a severe struggle ensued between them, in the course of which, the witness, who had partially recovered from the shock of his fall, saw the younger prisoner in the act of concealing something in her bosom; this he forced from her, and found to be a parcel containing twenty-two counterfeit half-crowns, finished for circulation. The girl, a determined little vixen, then broke from his grasp, and hastened up stairs, followed by the witness, who found her engaged in picking up a great number of base coins which were strewn about the table. While the witness was securing this spurious money the male prisoner, followed by Cole, burst into the room, and, seizing a large glass bottle filled with vitriol, dashed it at the officers, and a large quantity of the burning liquid was in consequence flung over their hands, faces, and the upper parts of their persons. While the officers were in this condition, the male prisoner pulled from under his apron a bag filled with counterfeit coin and handed it to the girl, desiring her to get rid of it: but the witness Brannan succeeded in getting it from her and securing the other false coin on the table, the whole together amounting to more than a hundred shillings and half-crown pieces. The witness and Cole then searched the room, which was fitted up like a regular workshop, with work-bench and every description of tools, among which were two very curiously-manufactured implements, consisting each of a bright double metal plate, 6 inches by 3, and furnished with screws and nuts, for the purpose of securing the coin tightly during the application to it of plating liquids and acids, several bottles of which were also found in the apartment. The prisoner, it appeared, never cast the coins himself, but received them in a roughly-manufactured state from other members of the gang, by whom he was employed in finishing and completing them for circulation. Brannan said, that the injuries he had received in his struggle with the prisoner were of such a nature that he was apprehensive he should feel the effects of them as long as he lived. Cole, the other officer, whose hands and wrists appeared severely scorched and swollen, corroborated the sergeant's evidence, and stated, that while he was engaged in the struggle with the prisoner, the latter set a bull-dog upon him, which bit and clung to him with such pertinacity that he had the greatest difficulty in beating it off. Both the officers described the resistance offered by the male prisoner as being the most desperate they ever encountered, and said that he was most actively aided in it by his daughter, who exhibited a degree of violence scarcely credible for a child of such tender years.—The male prisoner, in defence, declared that the whole of the articles found by the police had been left at his house only an hour previously by a man who had promised to call for them in a short time afterwards, and that he was wholly innocent of any guilty use of them.—Sergeant Brannan intimated to the magistrate that he was satisfied the prisoner had been carrying on this system of fraud for a long time past, and that about a year ago the prisoner's youngest child, a little girl about two years old, had lost its life in consequence of drinking some of the burning liquids used by the prisoner in the process of manufacturing the base coin, the prisoner at the coroner's inquest accounting for the little creature's death by a statement precisely similar to that he now made.—Mr. Bingham expressed great regret at the injuries the officers had sustained, and ordered both prisoners to be remanded for a week, that the Solicitor to the Mint might attend and prosecute the case against them.

COMMITTAL OF A POSTMASTER FOR EMBEZZLEMENT.—On Tuesday, at Bow-street, Robert Hobson, the Post-office keeper of Walthamstow, who had been before examined on a charge of embezzling 1s. 10d., the postage of a letter addressed to Calcutta, was again placed at the bar to answer further charges of detaining newspapers.—Mr. Peacock attended for the prosecution, and Mr. J. C. Evans, a barrister, conducted the defence. Peake, a constable, having produced several numbers of the Times, of recent dates, which he had found with other newspapers in the prisoner's house when searching it, under the direction of Mr. W. R. Sculthorpe, on Tuesday week.—Mr. R. Lloyd Pinching, a surgeon, residing in Walthamstow, identified five copies of the Times, dated October 29, November 4, November 5, December 3, and December 12, the direction on each of which was in his own handwriting. They were addressed to his sister, to Dr. Ross, and other parties resident in Ireland, to whom he was in the habit of sending his papers. Some of them had been posted by himself, but a lad in his service generally took them to the post-office, at the prisoner's shop. To the best of his (witness's) belief, the papers produced were directed and sent at different periods.—William East, a servant to Mr. Pinching, deposed to having posted the Times newspaper, by his master's directions, at the prisoner's shop. He had generally put them in the letter-box, but had, on some occasions, a few months back, taken them into the shop when they had been too bulky to go through the aperture outside. They were always at those times delivered to the prisoner or one of his sons or daughters.—The constable said, that when the prisoner was requested to account for the possession of the papers, he replied, that he had lately purchased a quantity of waste paper, and supposed they must have come with it.—Another case of a similar nature was proved by the evidence of a young woman named Eliza Antony, a servant at Walthamstow, who identified a paper which she had directed to a sister in Monmouthshire, and the envelope of which was found in the prisoner's bed-room.—Mr. Jardine, after hearing the prisoner's counsel, determined on committing him for trial, both for the embezzlement and the misdemeanour.—Mr. J. C. Evans hoped that bail would be taken, in consideration of the respectability of the prisoner, whose wife and large family were dependent on his exertions in business.—The Rev. J. Freeman, of Walthamstow, with other parties of equal respectability, would, he said, be his sureties to any reasonable extent.—Mr. Jardine said he could not make any distinction in the case, and must therefore refuse the application so far as it related to the embezzlement.—The prisoner was then removed from the bar.—[We think the magistrate exercised a sound discretion in not allowing the respectability of the prisoner to have any weight in inducing him to take bail. The sooner the distinctions made in regard to offenders are done away with the better. While they continue, people will not believe that rich and poor are governed by the same law.]

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

THE COLLISION BETWEEN THE SYLPH AND ORWELL STEAMERS.

The inquiry into the circumstances attending the late fatal collision between the Orwell and Sylph steam-boats was resumed on Monday, before Mr. Carttar, at the Eight Bells, Greenwich. The first witness called was

Dr. Mitchell, of Greenwich, who proved, from a post mortem examination, that Sullivan died from suffocation in the water, and Sheppard from the severe injuries he had sustained about the head and body.

Commander Henry Smith, of her Majesty's steam-frigate Rattler, said:—I was a passenger on board the Sylph, on the afternoon of Tuesday week, and was standing abaft the engine-room when that vessel left the Greenwich pier on her way towards Blackwall. The weather was so thick at that time that I was induced to remain on deck. There was a man in the bows looking out forward. After proceeding a short distance, I heard the noise of a steamer approaching us. I looked out forward, but saw nothing. Immediately afterwards the man on the look out said something to the captain, when he called out, "Stop her, go astern." I then saw a large steamer bearing down upon us, at about twenty-five yards distance. At that time a collision was inevitable, and when the captain saw the large vessel so close to him, he folded his arms and said, "By G—d, it is all over with us!" I could not see the shore on either side at that time. When the collision took place, the motion of the Sylph was quite stopped, and if a boat had been under her bows we should not have injured her. I am of opinion that the speed was on the Orwell when the collision occurred. She must have been going at a good speed, because she cut quite through the deck of the Sylph; and, from the position in which the latter was, it was impossible that she could have contributed much force to the collision. I am decidedly of opinion that the Sylph was motionless when the collision took place. Had the Orwell put her helm a-starboard as the Sylph did, no accident would have occurred. I think the Sylph was going down the river much quicker than a prudent captain would have brought her, considering the fog which prevailed; and I am of the same opinion as to the speed at which the Orwell was coming up. In such a state of the weather there should be some regulation to prevent vessels from proceeding at more than half speed. My impression was, that we were travelling much quicker than we ought to have been, and I kept on deck in consequence, fearing the possibility of an accident. After the collision I remained on the quarter-deck of the Sylph until all the deck passengers were got off, when I went on board the Orwell. I then called out to the man in charge to back astern, and get the two vessels clear, as I saw that the people were prevented from getting out of the cabin of the Sylph while the vessels hung together.

By Mr. Wilkinson: The engines of the Sylph were eased before I saw the Orwell. It was the fact of her being eased that attracted my attention, and I then looked out forward and saw the Orwell's bows close upon us. I judge of the speed of the Orwell by the nature of the injuries inflicted on the Sylph. I think she must have been going eight miles an hour at least.

Mr. George Edwards, of Sutton, Suffolk, said: I am a mariner, and was on board the Orwell when the accident occurred. I was standing near the paddle-box on the starboard side, when I saw a steam-boat ahead about one hundred yards. This vessel appeared to be across the river, with her bow a little downwards. I heard Captain Wrackham give the order to stop her, and back her astern. The collision took place directly after. I do not know what speed either vessel had upon her when the accident occurred, but the Sylph, when I first saw her, seemed to have headway. Captain Wrackham was forward at the time.

Robert Fuller, mariner of Ipswich, said: I am a seaman on board the Orwell, and was upon the look-out in the larboard bow on the afternoon of Thursday week. I first saw the Sylph when she was within fifty yards of the Orwell. I called out, "Stop her—go astern;" but in less than a minute she struck us. I think when I first saw her she was going at full speed. The paddles were going a-head just before she struck. The Orwell had very little speed on her, and as soon as those on the look-out called out, the master in charge (Wiggins) stopped the engines. He called out, "Stop her—go astern." The Orwell had been eased previously, and was going "quite easily" at the time. She had been eased all the way from Woolwich, and had come that distance about five or six miles an hour. We were about twenty yards from the north shore, and could see the edge of the bank very plainly. I do not think it was possible to have avoided the collision, owing to the speed at which the Sylph was proceeding.

William Pullifer, another of the crew of the Orwell, gave similar evidence.

William Linney, of Ipswich, another seaman on board the Orwell, said: I think that if the Sylph's helm had been ported instead of being put a starboard, the collision might have been avoided. Very few seconds elapsed between our first seeing her and the collision taking place.

Henry Rogers (the call-boy on board the Orwell) proved having given the engineer orders to go "Quite easy," after leaving Blackwall, and to "Stop," just before the collision took plaae.

Joseph Sutcliffe, the engineer in charge, deposed that on the passage up from Blackwall the engine had made about seven revolutions per minute, her full speed being from twenty-eight to thirty. He was standing by, as usual in foggy weather, between the engines when he heard the order given to "Stop her," and "Go astern." He did so, and after the engines had made two revolutions astern the collision took place, and he then shut the steam off and came on deck. It occupied about fifteen seconds to stop the engine and make the two revolutions astern.

James Wiggins, a brother of the master in charge, and supercargo on board the Orwell, was next examined. He was at the wheel when the collision took place, and his evidence differed in no respect from that of the other parties on board the Orwell.

The Coroner commenced summing up, and the jury after an absence of half an hour, returned the following unanimous verdict—"We consider that the deceased met his death accidentally; but we are of opinion that the captain of the Sylph was highly to blame for the speed at which he had previously been going; we believe the Orwell to have been the moving power to the death of the deceased, but consider that the parties on board that vessel used due caution, and did all they could to avoid the accident, and the jury are unanimously of opinion that Captain Sweisland should be severely reprimanded by the Coroner.

The verdict appeared to give general satisfaction, and Captain Sweisland was suitably admonished by Mr. Carttar.

An inquest on the body of the man Sheppard was then opened pro forma, and after the examination of a single witness, the same verdict was recorded.

ANOTHER COLLIERY EXPLOSION.—Soon after the workmen entered the Pentrefelin Colliery, the property of the Swansea Coal Company, situated near Morriston, on Monday week, they were alarmed by an explosion of foul air in one of the headings, ignited by a collier named Thomas James, who was most severely burnt. The workmen immediately proceeded from all parts of the pit to the scene of the lamentable occurrence, where they found the three lifeless bodies of John Hopkins, aged twenty, Matthew Fisher, aged twenty, both of whom were unmarried, and Thomas Morgan, a boy, ten years of age, who had been most shockingly disfigured—his head having been detached from the body by the violent concussion of air consequent on the explosion. In the course of the inquiry it was proved that the fan for ventilating the mines had not been worked either on Sunday night, Monday, or Monday night. The jury returned a verdict of "Accidental death," with an opinion, "that had the fan been worked during Sunday night, or early on Monday morning, the explosion would not have occurred—that there is blame attached to the overman for not having seen that the pit was properly cleared, and for not having employed a person sufficiently strong to work at the fan."

ATTEMPTED SUICIDE IN ST. JAMES'S PARK.—On Monday afternoon, a young female (whose name could not be ascertained) made an attempt to commit suicide by throwing herself into the ornamental water in St. James's Park. Several persons who had observed her loitering about, directed the attention of one of the park-keepers, but before he could reach the place she plunged into the water. An alarm was instantly raised, when a crowd of persons rushed to the spot, and succeeded in rescuing her from a watery grave. She was conveyed, in an insensible state, to the nearest lodge, where she partly recovered, after considerable difficulty. She was subsequently removed to her residence in Princes-street, Queen-square, followed by a crowd of persons. She was very respectably attired, and seemed to be convulsed with grief.

LAMENTABLE AFFAIR.—On Wednesday, the 11th instant, Thomas Pritchard, a mason, in the employ of C, H. Leigh, Esq., was working upon the roof of the forge called the Glynu, at Blaenaxon, Herefordshire, when, by some mishap, he lost his balance, and fell through the roof, directly upon the fly-wheel, which turns round with a resistless velocity. The work of death was soon completed; he was so mangled, crushed, and torn, that an endeavour to recognise him would have been vain, had not his dress been identified. The day after the funeral his jaw bone was found. An inquest was held upon the body, and a verdict of "Accidental death" returned. The poor fellow has left behind him a wife and two children.

SUICIDE OF A LADY AT BROMPTON.—On Monday, Mr. Wakley, M.P., held an inquest at the Fulham-bridge Tavern, on the body of Mrs. Mary Bingley, about 50 years of age, the widow of a solicitor residing at No. 2, Queen's-buildings, Brompton, who committed suicide by cutting her throat on Friday morning. In the course of the evidence it appeared that the husband of the deceased lady died in August, 1843. For some time after his death she had been much disturbed in mind, and imagined that she was going to be sent to prison and that she would come to be hung, and on that account became in quite a despondng state. Within the last six months, however, she had been much better, and appeared to perfectly sane until the present occurrence. Her husband died owing considerable debts, and the property was in Chancery, but only for the purpose of the affairs being settled, and not on any disputed point, as, after settling all claims, there will be a handsome property for the family, which consists of five children; the eldest (a girl) is 17 years of age.—Verdict, "Temporary insanity."

ACCIDENT TO THE SON OF CAPTAIN ROWLEY.—A melancholy accident happened last week on board the St. Vincent, at Portsmouth, to a son of Captain R. F. Rowley, a youth about twelve years of age, who fell from the lower deck of that ship into the hold, a depth of nearly eighteen feet. The unfortunate youth was taken up almost insensible, and remains in a very precarious state.

FATAL GUN ACCIDENT.—An inquest was held on Saturday before Mr. Higgs, at Enfield-highway, on Richard Moses, aged 18, who died from the effects of a gun shot wound. The deceased was in the service of Mrs. Bergen, a market-gardener. On Tuesday week he was shooting snipes. A witness looked at his gun, which was a very good one, and returned it. Witness said here comes your mistress, and deceased hid the gun amongst some rubbish, consisting of twigs, stopping up a gap in the hedge. Mrs. Bergen did not come towards them. As soon as she was out of sight deceased took hold of the muzzle of the gun, and drew it towards him, when it went off. Witness saw smoke come from the trousers of deceased, who exclaimed he was shot. He was then taken to a surgeon's, and subsequently removed to his father's at Enfield. He went on favourably at first, but erysipelas supervened. On Wednesday lock-jaw came on, which caused his death the same night. Verdict, "Died from lock-jaw, produced by a gun shot wound accidentally received."

MELANCHOLY FIRE AT THE EARL OF HARRINGTON'S.—On Monday some alarm was caused at the mansion of the Earl of Harrington, in Whitehall Gardens, by the discovery of a fire which appears to have been smouldering for a considerable time, and had broken out in the drawing-room of his lordship on the second floor. The fire originated under the hearth of the dressing-room, passed along by the joists of the flooring, which at that time were all on fire. An immediate attempt to extinguish the flames was made by the servants; but finding they were unable to do so, a messenger was despatched to the stations of the fire brigade, engines from which speedily arrived. A plug in the garden was drawn, but the supply of water was scanty, and buckets filled from the cisterns around the edifice were used in staying the flames; but the fire was burning in so large a body under the flooring that it was found necessary to cut away the floor quite into the ball-room beneath, a considerable portion of the ceiling of which is destroyed. In the dressing-room also much damage is done. The recess is nearly burned out; the couch is destroyed; a great number of classical figures, beautifully overlaid with gold, are broken, and a variety of articles of vertu are spoiled, as is much of the furniture and elaborate appointments, both by fire, water, and removal. The ball-room is a beautiful specimen of modern architectural finish. It is elegantly fitted up, and has a deep medallion pattern cornice around the summit of the side wall.

EXTENSIVE BURGLARY IN THE CITY.—An extensive robbery of plate and jewellery took place at the house of Mr. Muddell, No 6, Little St. Thomas Apostle, Queen-street, Cheapside, a few nights ago, the house having been broken into during the absence of the family. A reward of £30 is offered for the apprehension of the thieves.

FIRE IN GUILDFORD-STREET, AND LOSS OF FOUR LIVES.—In our late impression, last week, we gave an account of a fire, attended with the loss of four lives, which took place last Saturday morning, at the residence of Mr. John Fayrer, civil engineer, No. 67, Guildford-street, Russell-square. The police effected an entrance at the stables in rear of the house, in Colonnade Mews, and succeeded in assisting the escape of the coachman, William Dillon, his wife, and two children. Several constables, headed by Mr. Grimwood and Inspector Dudley, obtained access to the roof of Mr. Fayrer's house by entering Mrs. Auste's residence, which is adjoining. They here found that the cook, Mary Hall; Sarah Wall, the parlour maid; Maria Tanner, the housemaid; and Wm. Hall, the son of the cook; who slept in the back room of the third floor and in the attics, had escaped in their night-dresses, by a door leading on to the leads. They were immediately assisted into Mrs. Auste's house. As the flames were much increased by the wind, great fear was entertained that Mr. John Fayrer and his wife, who slept in the second floor, and Mr. Edward Fayrer, their son, who slept in the front room third floor, would perish. In a few minutes, however, before the whole of the upper floorings gave way, they succeeded in gaining the door on the leads, and were conducted by the police to Mrs. Auste's; and, after dressing themselves, were taken to a friend of the family, Mrs. Martineau, who resides at No. 55, opposite. By seven o'clock the fire was subdued, the houses on each side not being much damaged. Shortly afterwards the body of police-constable E 132 (named Birkmyre), was taken out; the poor fellow groaned once or twice, but died immediately afterwards. A second police-constable E 128 (named Wright), also perished in the ruins. Both the constables, it would appear, lost their lives in endeavouring to assist Jenkins, the groom, in the removal of the servants' property from the lower part of the house. The other inmates of the house were William Robinson, a lad aged 15, employed in Mr. Fayrer's office, and Charles Jenkins, the groom. The former slept with young Hall in the attic, who returned no less than three times into the room, after having been aroused, to awake his bed-fellow, but he failed to make him sensible of the danger to which he was exposed, and the poor fellow was buried beneath the ruins. The other victim, Jenkins, resided in the immediate neighbourhood. On hearing of the fire he got up to render what assistance he could. He went in and out several times, and at length fell a victim to his intrepidity—for he had scarcely entered the last time when the house fell in upon him. Like most other fires, the origin of it cannot be distinctly ascertained, but it is supposed to have been quite accidental. On Tuesday afternoon an inquest was held on the remains of the sufferers at the Angel Inn, High-street, St. Giles's, before Mr. Wakley. The jury having been sworn, proceeded to view the bodies, all of which are lying at St. Giles's Workhouse. The names of the sufferers as above stated are—William Robinson, aged 15, assistant-clerk to Mr. Fayrer, the occupier of the house destroyed; he was burnt to death in the attic, and his body presented a shocking spectacle, being burnt almost to a cinder. Robert Birkmyre, aged 20, policeman, who was crushed by the falling timber, but taken out alive, on the morning of the fire. Charles Jenkins, the groom, aged 29; and John Wright, policeman, aged 29, recovered from the ruins on Tuesday, crushed to death. On the return of the jury, the Coroner inquired if anything was known as to the cause of the fire?—Mr. Fayrer, who was present, and appeared very ill, said that nothing was known of it. The conjecture was that the fire came out of the chimney flue.—Some further conversation took place; and, at the request of the jury, the inquest was adjourned till Monday next, in order that the premises might be examined and the cause of the calamity, if possible, discovered.

SUDDEN DEATH IN A CAB.—On Tuesday afternoon an inquest was held at the Crown Tavern, Westminster-road, before Mr. W. Carter, on the body of an elderly man named Woods, a retired newsvender, who died suddenly in a cab. The deceased had resided near the Temple, and was on his way to the house of his daughter, who lived in Belvidere-road, Lambeth, on Friday night, when the cabman, on opening the door, found him quite dead. Medical assistance was procured by the daughter, but of course was of no avail. Verdict, "Died by the visitation of God."

DEATH FROM A TRIFLING CUT.—On Tuesday a young man of the name of Dawson, living in Church-street, Millbank, died in Westminster Hospital under very singular and melancholy circumstances. It appeared that a few days before he was chopping a piece of meat, in doing which he slightly cut his thumb; he took no notice of it at the time, but finding it afterwards got worse, he had some application made to it, which had no effect. He was then admitted into the hospital, but mortification quickly ensued, from the effects of which he died. He was a young man in the prime of life.

THE WEATHER AT HOME AND ABROAD.

ENGLAND.

The weather during the first part of the week was exceedingly cold, and there was a cutting easterly wind. The thermometer at the Receiving-house, Hyde-park, was during Monday night down to 31 degrees, but at seven o'clock on Tuesday morning the mercury had risen to 33½ degrees, and by twelve o'clock (noon) to 34 degrees. In the early part of the morning the wind shifted N.E. to nearly S., but in the course of the afternoon, it veered back again to E. At seven o'clock in the evening the thermometer had again fallen to 32½ degrees; and the time of the full moon (29 minutes past seven, P.M.), there was a sleet driving with the wind, which was still East. The lovers of skating disported themselves in considerable numbers in the various parks during the day. No accidents occurred, except in the Regent's-park, where two or three gentlemen got into the water, but were speedily released by the officers of the Humane Society.

On Tuesday the surface of the Thames at flood and ebb tide was partially covered with floating ice, but not such as to cause any material obstruction to the navigation. The docks are still clear of ice, but the canals are partly frozen. Owing to the prevailing easterly winds, which have now lasted upwards of three weeks, there are no fewer than 120 sail of vessels, outward bound, detained in various parts of the river.

On Wednesday morning, the thermometer was at 37 degrees, but towards evening it fell to 33 degrees. The wind during the day blew chiefly from the east, and was occasionally very cold and piercing. The atmosphere, however, was rather hazy, and apparently humid, giving indication of a thaw. It being a holiday, and the weather rather fine and dry for the season, a considerable number of persons from an early hour congregated in the vicinity of the ornamental waters of the parks. On the round pond and long water in Kensington-gardens there were during the day between 3,000 and 4,000 skaters and sliders. In the Regent's-park there were about 5,000, though the ice was only about two-and-a-half inches thick, and in a very dangerous condition. On Thursday night the tendency was to a thaw, but it was still very cold.

FRANCE.

The late severe weather had the effect of forcing the wolves in several parts of France to leave their lurking-places, and come nearer than usual to human habitations in search of food. Close to Marseilles, two persons who lived at La Plaine found their passage barred by an enormous wolf. They at once fled towards the Boulevard Chave, and escaped. The animal remained all night in the neighbourhood, prowling about a stable of cows and goats, but without being able to commit any depredation. It was fired at twice in the morning without effect. Near Crepy the postman was followed for some time by four or five wolves, who seemed half afraid to approach nearer. At last, when they appeared emboldened to form a more intimate acquaintance with him, he thought it best to throw down before them a little dog which he was carrying under his arm. He by that means got safe away. In the wood of Mountpinson (Calvados) Marshal de Grouchy's gamekeeper killed not less than three wolves in two days. The number which he saw during that period amounted to eight.

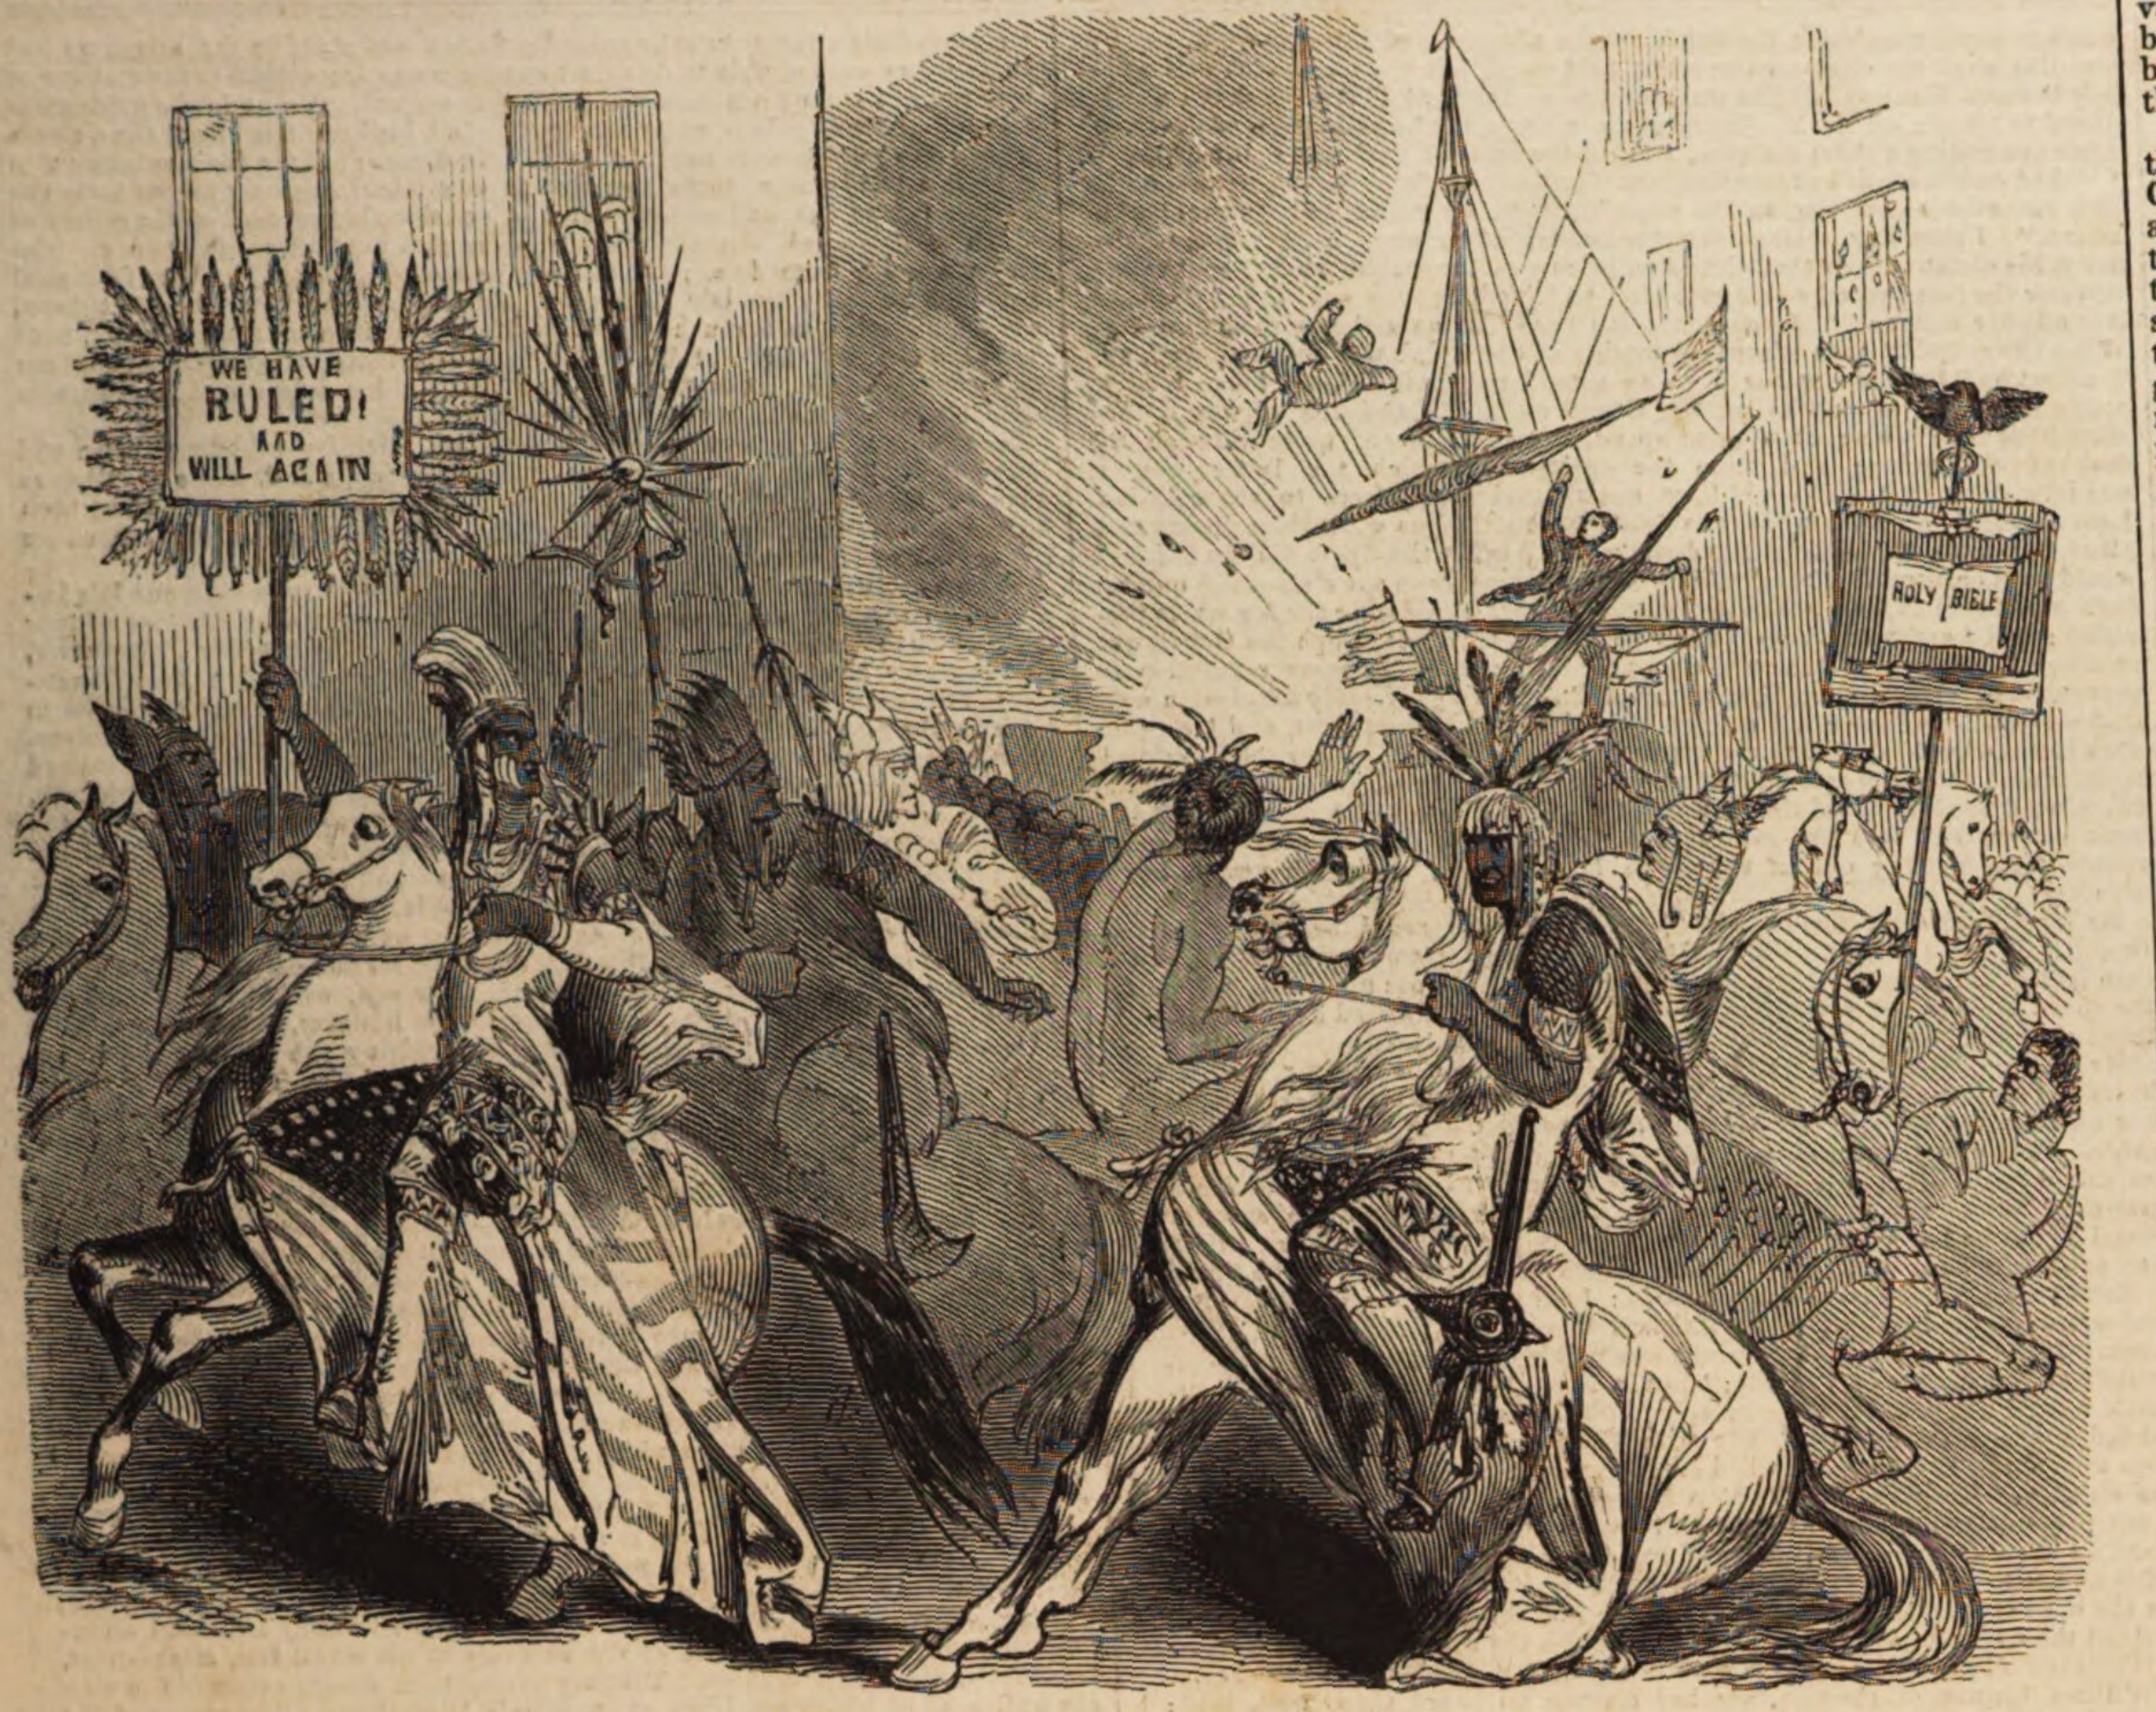
The Journal du Var states that during the early part of last week a greater quantity of snow had fallen in the department than was remembered by any one living. All communications were intercepted for several days. The mail from Aix to Draguignan, which generally is taken in ten hours by three horses, was twenty-eight hours in passing over the same distance with eight horses. Several travellers were obliged to leave their vehicles on the open road near Escragnoles and take refuge in the nearest houses. At Carcassonne, the cold was so intense that one man was frozen to death in the Montagne Noire, and the body of another was found buried in the snow on the road between Quillan and Narbonne. In the mountains of the Upper Lozere, at a place called the Palais du Roi, the lifeless body of a priest was found wrapped in his cloak.

ITALY.

A letter from Piedmont, of the 16th, states that a great quantity of snow at that date covered the valley of the Po. At Turin, it fell to the depth of three feet, and so great a weight of it covered the roofs of the houses, that men were employed to shove it off, fear being entertained of the wood-work giving way. At Alexandria, Asti, and some other parts of Piedmont, the snow was nearly four feet deep, and when the last accounts left everything foreboded a most severe winter.

HOLLAND.

On the 19th, at eleven, P.M., the barometer at Amsterdam stood at 767, and the thermometer at 28 deg.; on the 20th, at seven, P.M., at 771 and 26 deg.; and on the 21st, at one, P.M., 773 and 27 deg. During the 20th and 21st the wind was north-east. On the 19th the ice on the river at Zwolle was strong enough for foot passengers, but carriages were conveyed across by the ferry boat. On the 20th the ice at Nimmegen began to drift, an event which was announced to the inhabitants by the firing of cannon. The latest accounts state that the ice before the town and the immediate neighbourhood had completely broken up. Passengers and carriages, with the exception of diligences, were conveyed across the Old Rhine, at Utrecht, by the ferry boats. A few days previously the ice was crossed on foot.



GREAT NATIVE PROCESSION, IN NEW YORK.

EXPLOSION OF A MAGAZINE IN A NATIVE PROCESSION AT NEW YORK.

We have just received from our artist at New York, the sketch of the annexed spirited representation of a procession of the the Native American Party, at New York, on Friday, the 16th ult. The muster took place at half past one o'clock; and at about ten minutes before two o'clock, the head of the column en route passed by the City Hall, up Broadway. It was preceded by a respectable number of marshals with cocked hats, badges, and devices of their party. Immediately after them rode six or eight men attired fantastically as Indian warriors, all mounted. Then came their banners and some flags, which were somewhat remarkable. The Bible appeared in some fifty different shapes and flags in the whole line, thus—"The Bible—it was bequeathed by our pilgrim fathers, we will protect and defend it." Again, "The Bible, without note or comment; it must be used in our public schools, William H. Seward and Bishop Hughes to the contrary notwithstanding." Again, a large flag, with "No Union of Church and State." Some of the wards had large cars drawn by six and eight horses, filled with children, all alluding to the Bible or public schools—such as thus: The cars were covered with flags with the following mottos: "Our public schools, with the Bible as the natives will have them." Again, "Our schools must be governed by Americans and not foreigners." "Beware of foreign influence." One large car had a flag with, "Beware of Popery and foreign influence; it has deprived 33 of our public schools of the Bible." And a number with, "Americans must rule America," appeared in nearly every ward association. A large flag, with the inscription, "History and experience show the baneful effects of foreign influence;" and under this were some dozen flags with smaller devices. The watchmen figured largely with their flags and devices; among them there were several flags, such as "We watch for all;" "The Bible, the basis of education; those who burn it, would burn us if they had the power." One car from the twelfth ward was highly decorated with flags, &c. On one was, "American Republicans, up, pure spirit, up." On another, "Our American Archer."

Some dozen of flags had the inscription, "Beware of Foreign Influence;" but among the most notable were two having an eagle flying with a dead coon and a cock in his talons, with the inscription, "Ah! my lads, I have ye both."

The seventh ward had a large and conspicuous banner, with, "21 Years' Residence—The Ballot Box, a Rich Legacy, Americans Defend It;" another, "Oppression to None, Justice to Ourselves." In a word, nearly all the banners, flags, and devices had some allusion to the public schools, the Bible, resistance to foreign influence, and twenty-one years' residence as a qualification for citizenship.

The procession was orderly and decorous in their march; but when the procession had reached Second-street, near avenue A, and the gunner was in the act of firing a salute from the Miniature Ship, carried among the banners, &c., the powder-magazine exploded, carried away a large piece out of the side of the vessel, and shattered several windows in the vicinity. We regret to learn that two or three boys were severely hurt by the catastrophe.

The weather being fine, the procession extended their march as far as was contemplated, through the principal streets of our city, and the different associations were dismissed about thirty minutes past four, P.M.

We are of opinion that the entire force of the procession may have been about 4000.

WRECK OF THE VANGUARD STEAM-SHIP.

We are indebted to a correspondent for the annexed sketch of the wreck of the Vanguard steam-ship, as she lay, a few days since, on the rocks inside the entrance to Cork harbour. We gather from the Cork Reporter of the 14th inst., the following particulars of the accident from a passenger:—

"On Thursday, at eleven o'clock, the Vanguard, iron-built steamer, the property of the Dublin and Glasgow Steam Company, left Dublin, with about 40 passengers, and a large cargo, the wind at the time blowing desperately hard, accompanied with rain and sleet. The vessel, however, made a splendid run to the Light-house, near Cove, when the accident took place, at about half-past three A.M. When the Vanguard was nearing the above place, the captain was standing at the wheel, this being about half-past three o'clock this morning. The moment the captain saw he was abreast of the light, he moved forward to get on the paddle-box, but three or four minutes elapsed before he made his way. He then called to the man at the helm to put the helm a-starboard, and before he had time to repeat his commands, the vessel struck upon a rock, a little inside the Light-house, and almost opposite the Water-guard Station. At this moment, the most awful consternation prevailed on board, while the vessel itself was wrapped in a mist, which made it almost impossible to discern the light, though the vessel was abreast of it. There was a tremendous swell rolling at the time, which was drifting the vessel furiously up the rock. The captain endeavoured to back the vessel off, but in vain. Two guns were then fired, and lights were shown on the shore, but no person attempted to come off. Within a few hours the cabin began to fill with water, and all the passengers came on deck, where the furniture of the vessel had been also removed.

"At seven o'clock a boat of the Water-guards came alongside, when the writer, at the request of the captain, came off with two men into Cove, where he made known the occurrence to the different agents, and got all the large boats in the place to go out to the assistance of the steamer, and by this means all the persons on board, between thirty and forty in number, were conveyed ashore in the Ocean steamer. No blame whatever is to be attached to the captain, who, to do him justice, left nothing undone to save the vessel and passengers, not only by his own presence of mind, but by the prompt and ready directions which he issued from time to time. The captain reported that the situation of the vessel was most critical; the after-hold was full of water. There were several horses and carriages on board, which did not suffer, and the passengers' luggage was saved."

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD ENGLAND.

THE SYDNEY OAK, AT PENSHURST.

About six miles north of Tunbridge Wells, lies Penshurst Place, an embattled mansion of the time of Edward II., and the seat of the Sydneys from the time of Edward VI. The passenger by the South Eastern Railway may be reminded of the association of the Sydneys and Penshurst, upon his arrival at the Tunbridge station, though he will have little time for retrospection upon the glories of this olden place. It may be sufficient, however, to remind him, that at Penshurst, was born, on Nov. 29, 1554, Sir Philip Sydney, "whose spirit was too high for the court, and his integrity too stubborn for the cabinet." To commemorate the event of Sir Philip's birth, the oak represented in the engraving, is said to have been planted. Its bole measures about 28 feet in circumference. Waller thus refers to the planting of the tree:—

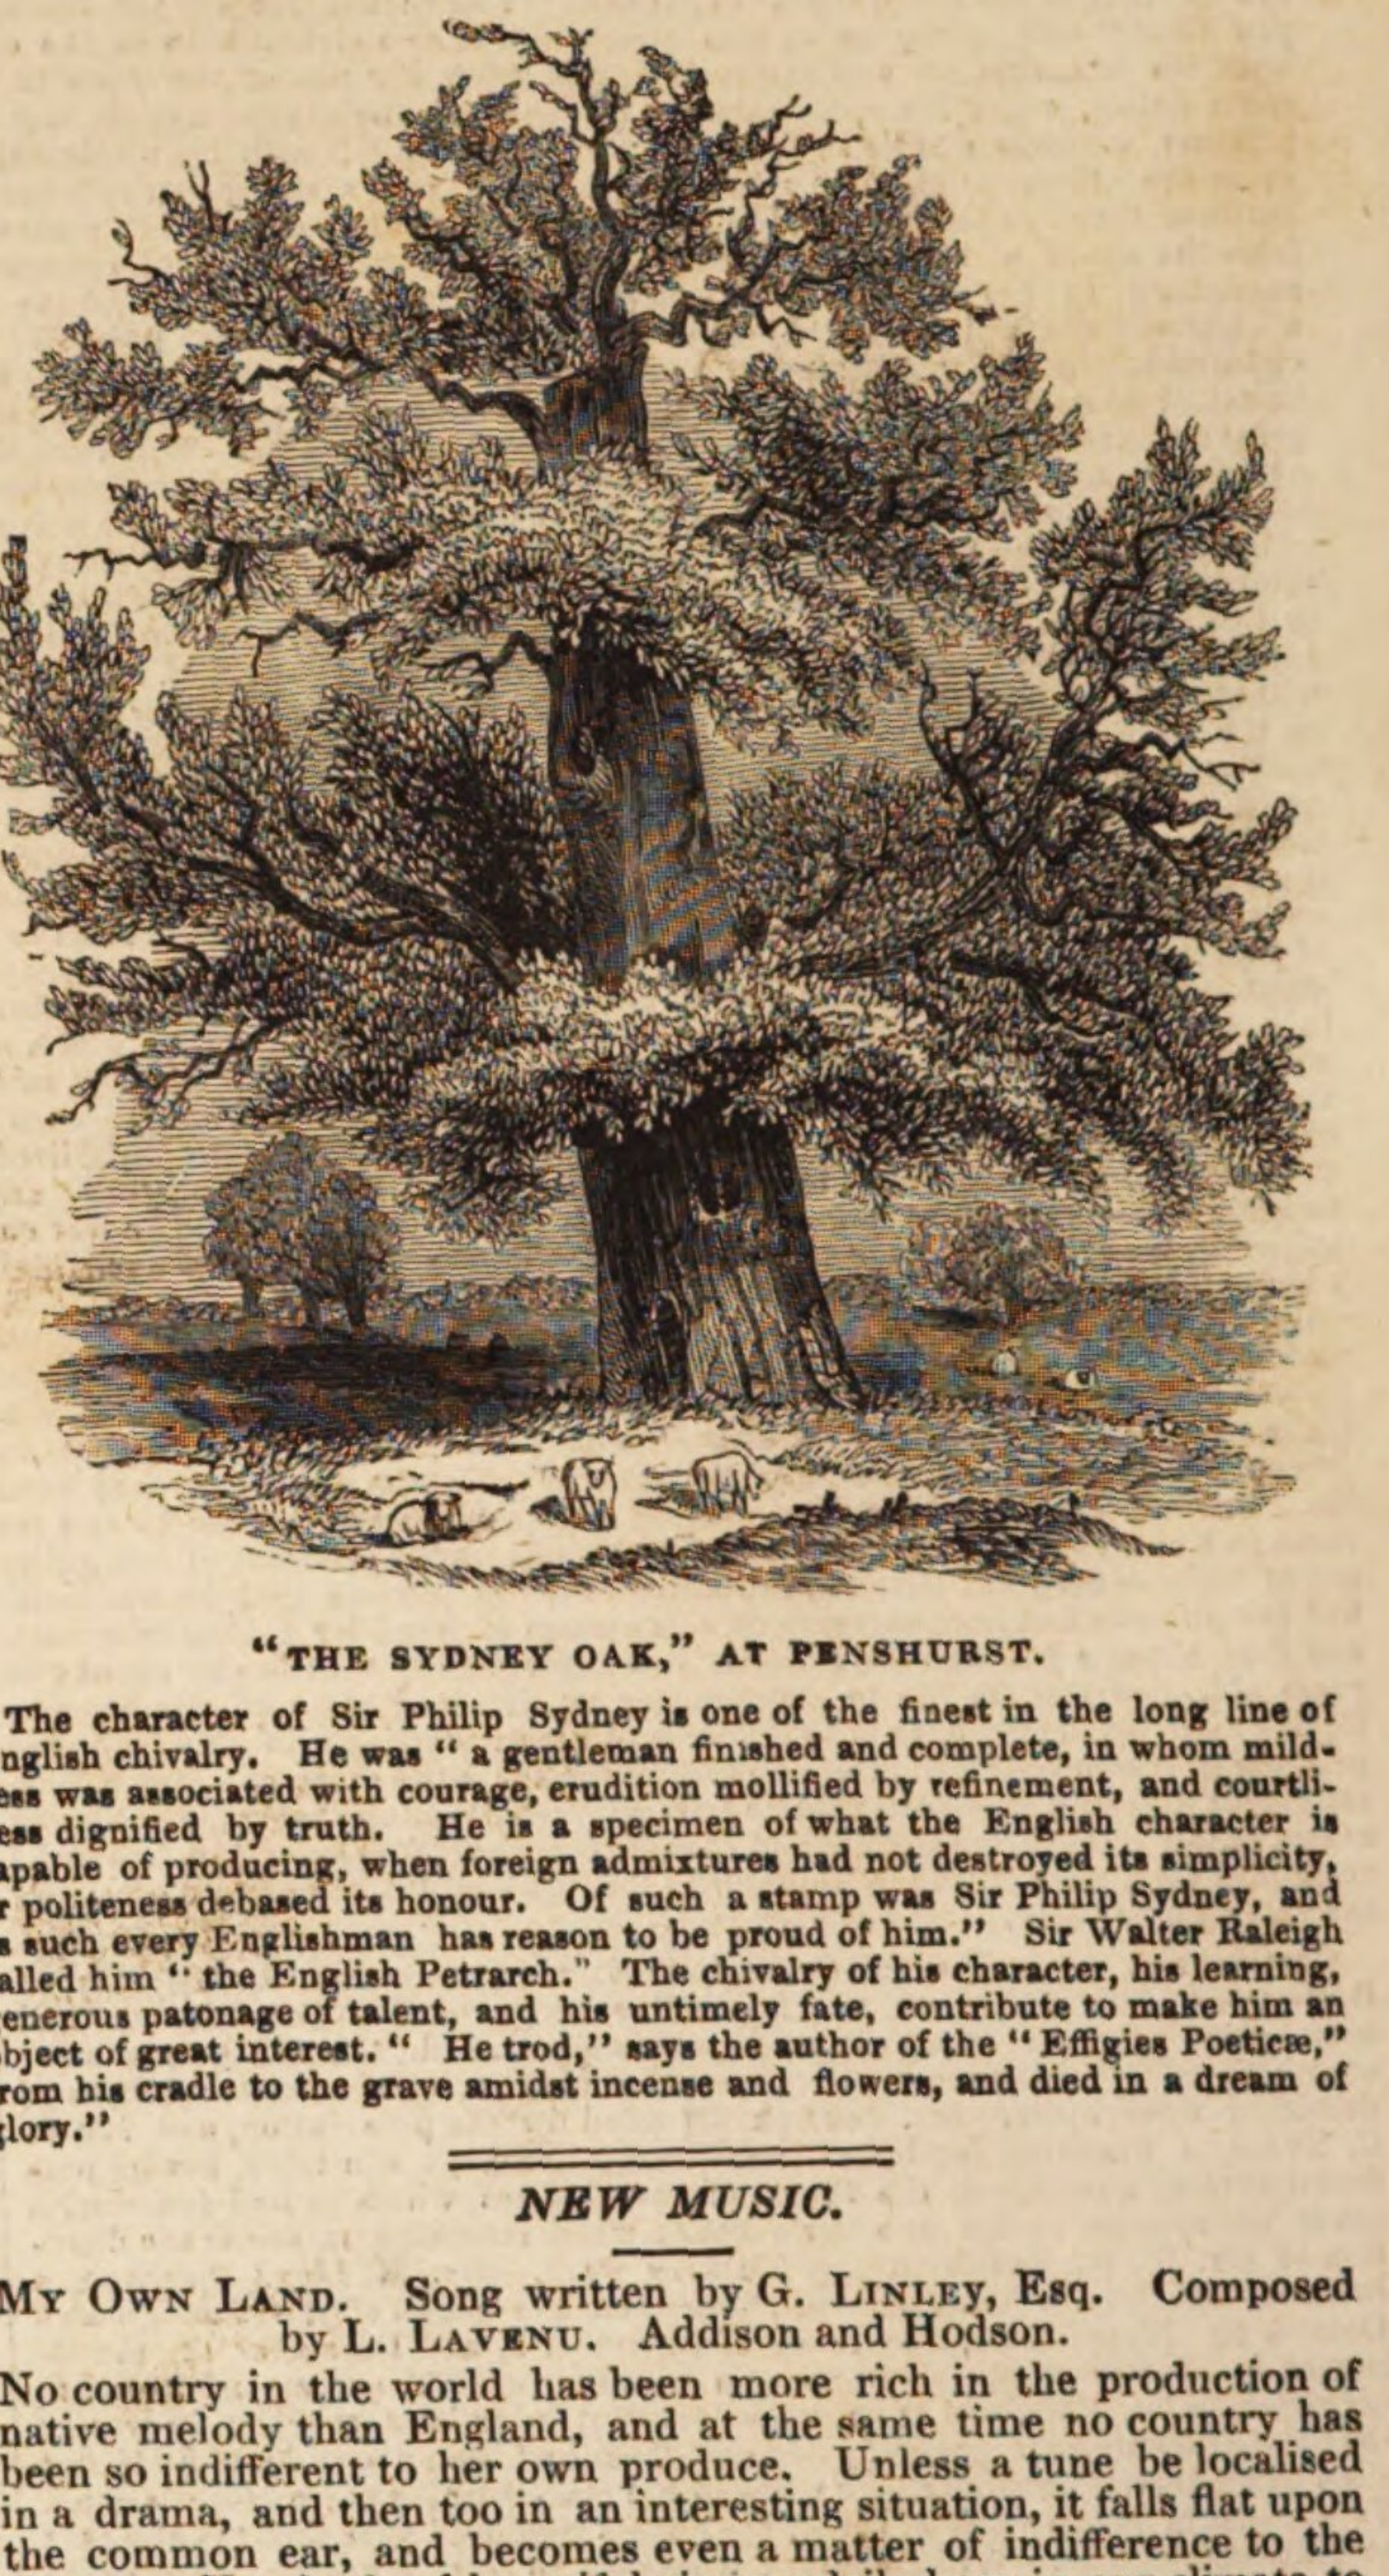
"Go, boy, and carve this passion on the bark
Of yonder tree, which stands the sacred mark
Of noble Sydney's birth; when such benign—
Such more than mortal-making stars did shine,
That there it cannot but for ever prove
The monument and pledge of humble love."

Ben Jonson thus alludes to this tree, in his "Forest:"—

"Thou hast thy walks for health as well as sport,
Thy mount to which the Driads do resort,
When Pan and Bacchus their high feasts have made
Beneath the broad beech and the chestnut shade.
That tall tree, too, which of a nut was set,
At his great birth, where all the Muses met."

In a poem, by E. Coventry, are these lines:—

"What genius points to yonder oak!
What raptures does thy soul invoke!
There let me hang a garland high,
There let my muse her accents try:
Be there my earliest homage paid,
Be there my latest vigils made;
For thou wast planted in the earth
The day that shone on Sydney's birth."



"THE SYDNEY OAK," AT PENSHURST.

The character of Sir Philip Sydney is one of the finest in the long line of English chivalry. He was "a gentleman finished and complete, in whom mildness was associated with courage, erudition mollified by refinement, and courtliness dignified by truth. He is a specimen of what the English character is capable of producing, when foreign admixtures had not destroyed its simplicity, or politeness debased its honour. Of such a stamp was Sir Philip Sydney, and as such every Englishman has reason to be proud of him." Sir Walter Raleigh called him "the English Petrarch." The chivalry of his character, his learning, generous patonage of talent, and his untimely fate, contribute to make him an object of great interest. "He trod," says the author of the "Effigies Poeticæ," from his cradle to the grave amidst incense and flowers, and died in a dream of glory."

NEW MUSIC.

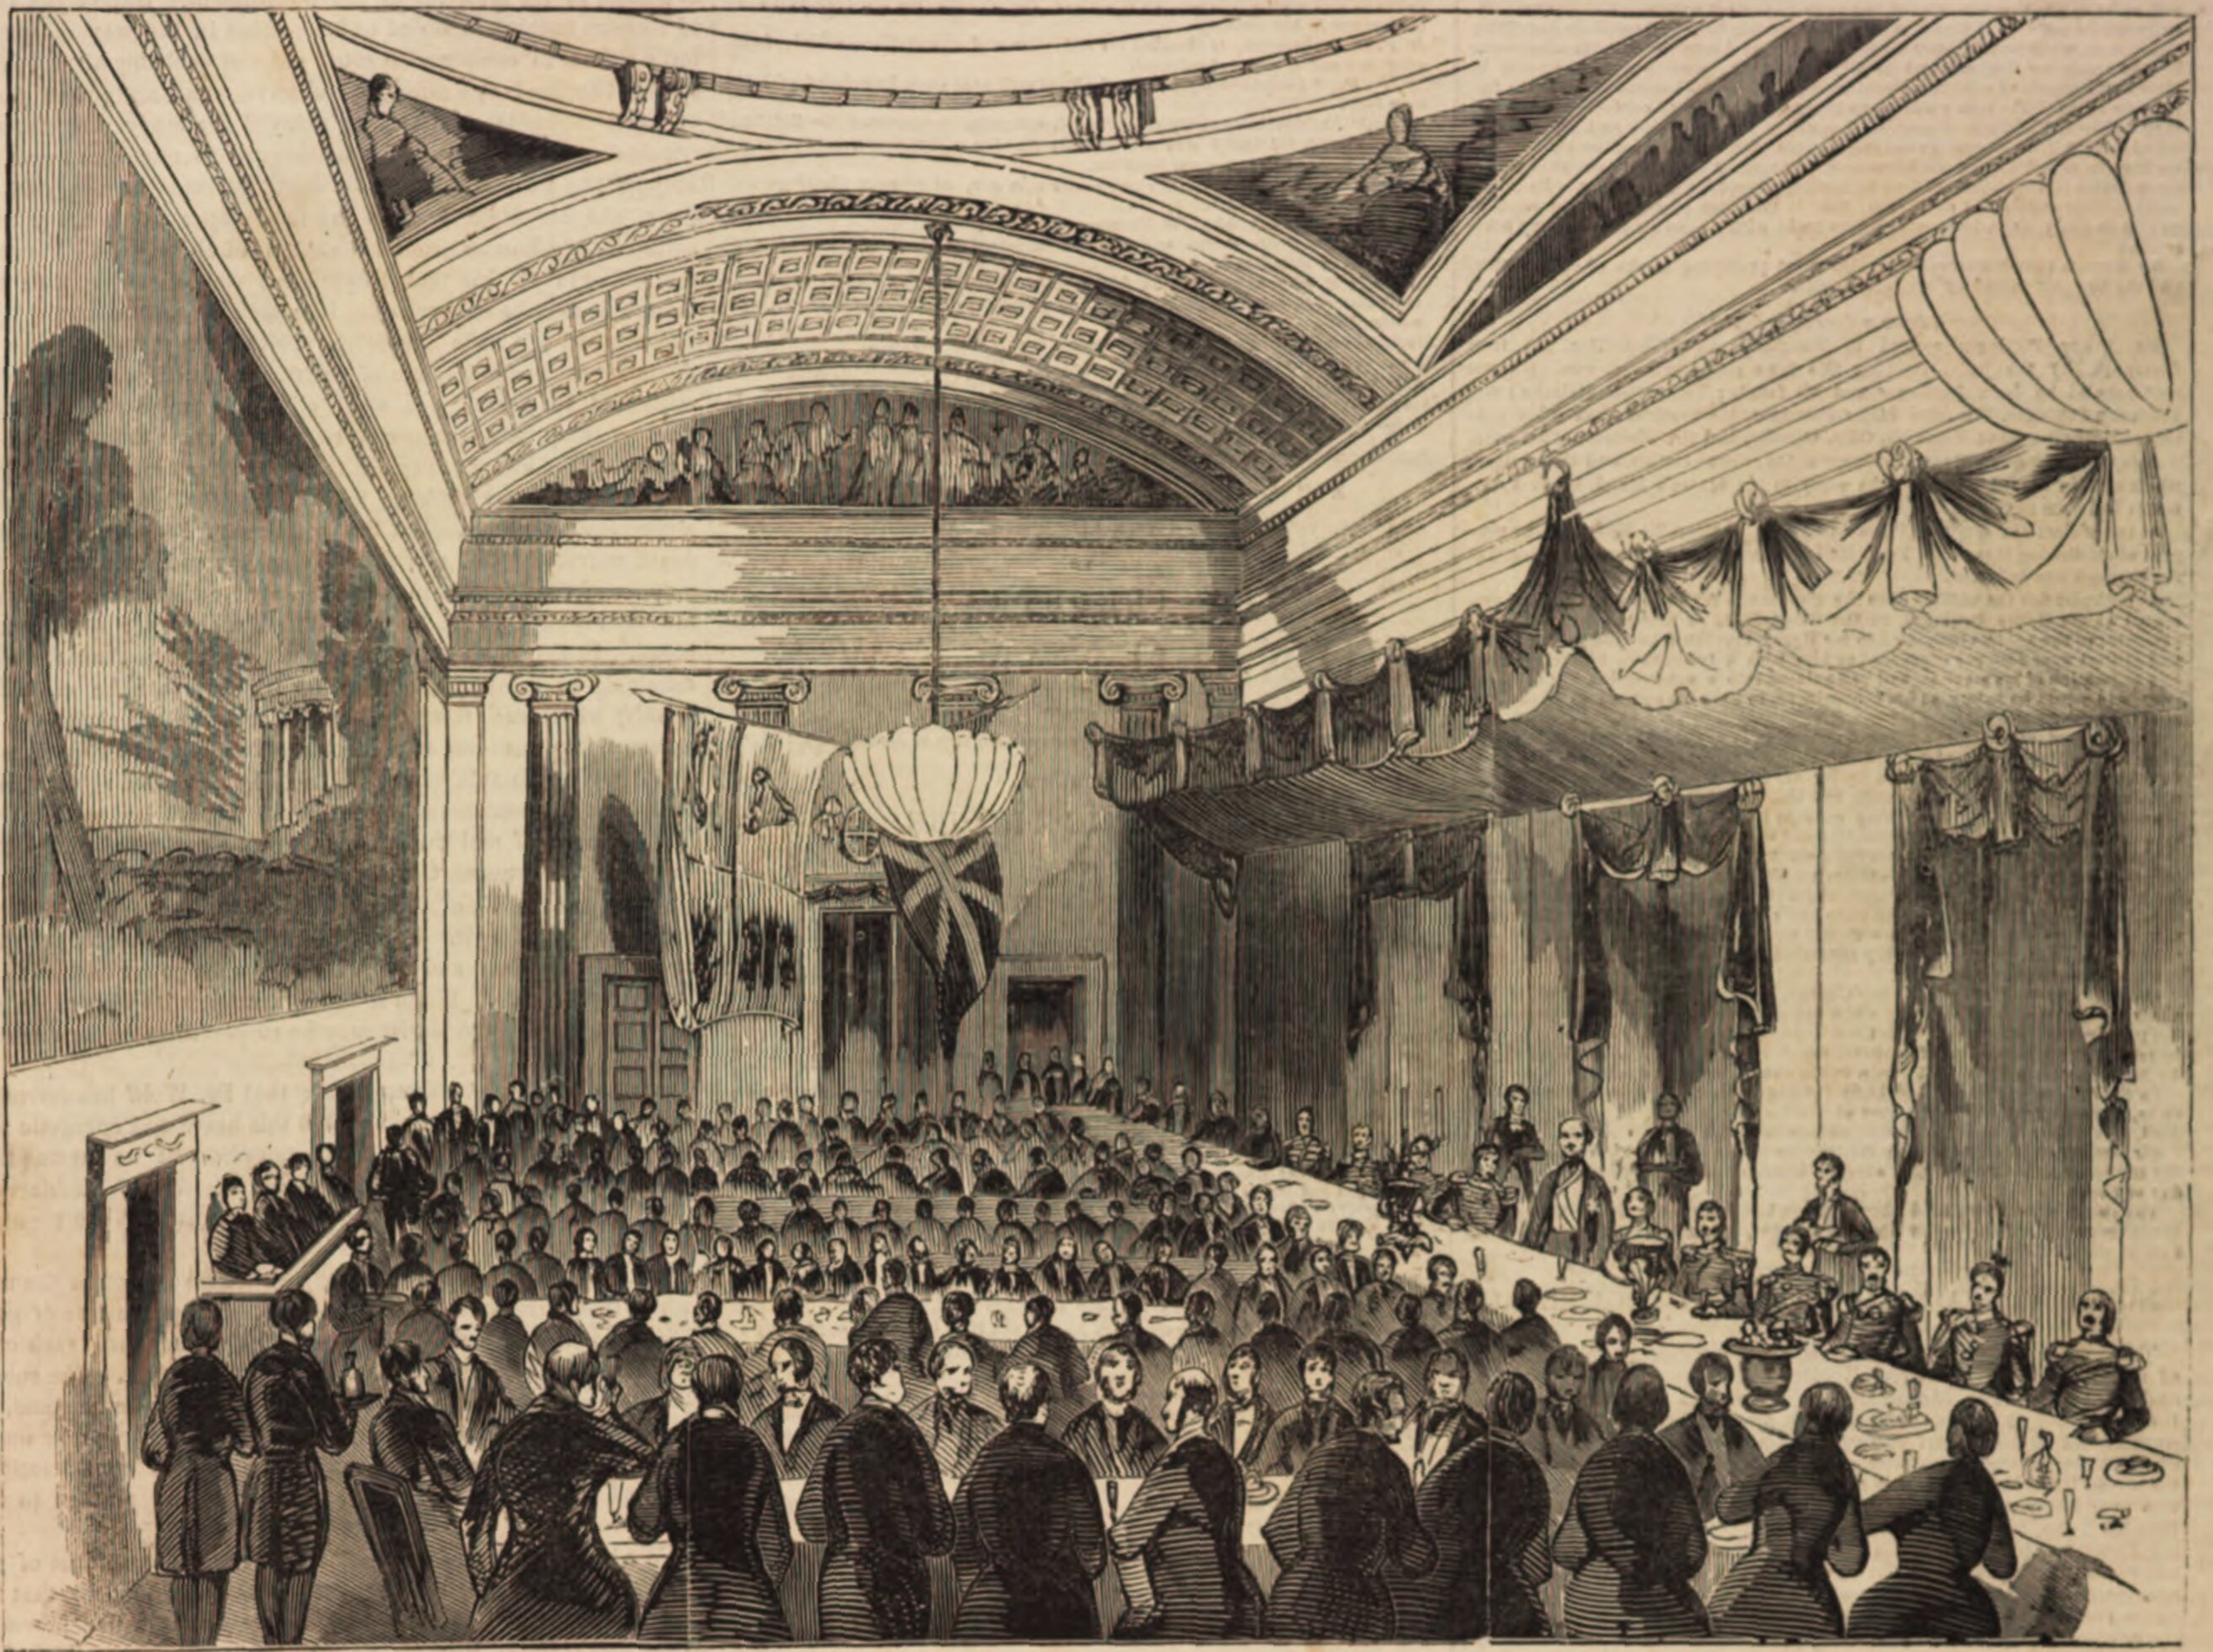
My Own Land. Song written by G. Linley, Esq. Composed by L. Lavenu. Addison and Hodson.

No country in the world has been more rich in the production of native melody than England, and at the same time no country has been so indifferent to her own produce. Unless a tune be localised in a drama, and then too in an interesting situation, it falls flat upon the common ear, and becomes even a matter of indifference to the elegant. Hundreds of beautiful airs are daily born in our climate to an ephemeral existence, while their inferiors, imported from the continent, manage to live for more than a season or two. Mr. Lavenu is a young composer; no fault, for Mozart was so once, and is possessed of considerable inventive faculty, skill, and taste. The composition before us is replete with beauty—full of simple and graceful melody floating upon quaint and original harmonies. It is a most charming ballad, and though it can speak for itself, yet heard through the eloquent interpretation of Miss E. Lucombe, it cannot fail to delight all auditors.

The Daughter of St. Mark. Opera. The music by M. W. Balfe. Chappell, New Bond-street.

Of the general merit of this music we have already given an opinion in our notice on its first production. We shall now enter into a few details. "The Gondolier" (ballad sung by Miss Rainforth) is a pretty melody, easy of performance, and effective even in mediocre hands. The song, "When all around our Path is Dreary," is as dolorous a composition as could be written for Borrani's style of lugubrious chant. The canon (which should have been termed canone or round), "If True his Tale," wants the ars celandi artem—its construction is too apparent from the commencement. Moreover, the stuttering subdivisions of the verbal as well as vocal phrases and syllables, are intolerable. The ballad, "We may be Happy Yet," is pretty, and further deponent sayeth not. The trombone symphony is quite preposterous. Mr. Burrowes' arrangements, in four books of the airs, &c., for the pianoforte, with an ad libitum accompaniment for the flute, are in his usual correct and graceful manner.

Miss Clara Webster.—Unfortunately, the death of this accomplished dancer has not been the only evil attendant upon the late sad accident at Drury-lane Theatre. A nurse of the name of Hudd, supplied on the urgency of the case from the Middlesex Hospital to attend upon Miss Webster, fell down the stairs, and upon being conveyed back to the hospital was found to have sustained a serious fracture of the knee. She is now lying in the accident ward, whilst a sickly husband and three young children are deprived of the support they obtained from her labour.



GRAND BANQUET TO SIR H. POTTINGER, AT MANCHESTER.

BANQUET TO SIR HENRY POTTINGER AT MANCHESTER.

Yesterday (Friday) week a banquet was given at Manchester to Sir Henry Pottinger, at which the distinguished guest was received with as much enthusiasm as at Liverpool.

The entertainment was of a most sumptuous description, nothing being wanted that could contribute to the comfort of the guests.

The banquet took place in the Town Hall, which was magnificently fitted up for the occasion. Above 200 gentlemen sat down to dinner. The chair was occupied by the Mayor. On his right sat the Right Hon. Sir Henry Pottinger, Major General Sir Thomas Arbuthnot, Sir George Larpent (chairman of the London East India and China Association), J. W. Patten, Esq., M.P., Samuel Gregory, Esq., Colonel Malcolm, D. L. Burn, Esq., Dr. Woosnam, J. Macvicar, Esq., Archibald Hastie, Esq., M.P., Major Pottinger, R. Burgess, Esq., the Rev. Canon Parkinson, and Captain Eastwick. On the left were William Entwisle, Esq., M.P., J. M. M'Gregor, Esq., James Loch, Esq., M.P., Lieutenant-Colonel White, F. Pottinger, Esq., Colonel Brooke, W. Stewart, Esq., J. A. Turner, Esq., the Rev. C. D. Wray (sub-dean), Major Foster, Major Westenra, Dr. Bowring, M.P., Robertson Gladstone, Esq., &c. The principal vice-president was John Macvicar, Esq.

After the usual toasts, the Mayor proposed the health of Sir Henry Pottinger, eulogising in the strongest language his character, and his great services in bringing about the treaty with China, which promised to be of such immense benefit to Great Britain.

Sir Henry Pottinger, in his reply, went over some of the topics introduced into his speech at Liverpool, but in the course of his remarks he gave some very interesting information relative to China. Sir Henry said, "When I was first appointed to go to China, it was, I am proud to say, totally unsolicited. I had been in India from the time that I was a boy of thirteen years of age. I came home to England; and I had very little intercourse with any of the leading men in both or either parties; in fact, I hardly knew any of them personally when I received an intimation from her Majesty's Ministers at the time, to the purpose that I should go out to China. Although my health was not quite established, I was ready and forward to do any service to my country, and I embarked for China with the full intention of doing all that I could, in a full and anxious exertion to carry out the instructions that I had received. Upon my arrival in China, gentlemen, I need hardly tell you, things were in a very unpleasant and awkward state; but through the valour of her Majesty's arms, and the distinguished services of her Majesty's navy, they soon came to have a better appearance. And as soon as that sort of persuasion induced the Chinese Government to listen to our terms, they were then more than ready to meet them more than half-way, and to show that moderation, which I am sure was best worthy of England, and which I am quite ceetain every person in this room would highly applaud.—(Hear, hear). With that feeling, gentlemen, I undertook and I commenced that negociation; and I had the happiness to meet, as already I have in another public situation stated, in consultation, my esteemed friend, the High Commissioner Ke-hing. The treaty was made as you have seen it, though afterwards there remained what were to me difficulties, and most important matters to be settled, in the commercial negociations. There, however, I met with assistance which I could hardly have promised myself. Some of the gentlemen attached to the former mission were quite competent to give me every information, and they did so. One of them, alas! now no more, was peculiarly a person likely to be of use to me upon the occasion: I speak of Mr. Morrison, gentlemen. The other is a gentleman with whom, I dare say, some of you are acquainted—if not from the first—Mr. Thom, a gentleman from Glasgow. (Hear.) To these two gentlemen I am glad to have this public opportunity of saying I was greatly indebted for all the information upon which the tariff and the commercial part of the negotiations were regulated. For you will all readily understand that my habits and pursuits were not of that nature perfectly to give me a sufficient insight into this question myself. I, however, did not shrink from the responsibility; and I need not say that it rejoices and delights me to feel that I have not only your approbation, but I rejoice to see that I have the approbation, as it were, of all England. I say 'all England,' for when I see her Majesty's present and late Ministers each combining to say that they approve of what I have done—when I see the City of London, the great town of Liverpool, and the still greater town of Manchester—what am I to believe? I cannot believe that any of you have thought it necessary to meet, and come forward, and to speak wholly without cause for an humble individual like myself. I am not, however, the less thankful and grateful for your kindness. Believe me, that your good opinion and your approbation (and when I say yours I mean, that of all my fellow-countrymen) is the most cheering—the most heart-cheerin—reward that I can possibly have. I believe that the treaty combines all the advantages that a treaty with China ought to do. I have studied, I did study, in making it, to prevent any feeling of jealousy upon the part of the Chinese; they met me more than half way, and I thought it was my duty, and I felt that it accorded with the greatness and the feelings of England not to make it exclusive. I was therefore happy to recommend to the Chinese Government, with a full experience, to throw open the treaty with all the nations in the world.

My own opinion of the treaty was, that it would take some time, at all events, to mature itself; and there are one or two questions as to what returns China will make to us, that are to us of the most important nature. But if that difficulty can be got over, I trust, as England can only benefit herself by benefiting China, and it will be in a great measure—I believe I may say that the advantages of the treaty to England and to all other manufacturing countries, will be almost unlimited. I calculate, from my own personal observation, that the immediate effect of the treaty will be to bring us into direct contact with not less than 120 to 150 millions of people. I speak of the seaboard; and my own firm belief is, that if we do not go too fast for the Chinese—if we allow them to see we have no object beyond kindness and commercial intercourse—that we have no exclusive feelings—do not look to anything beyond a mere mercantile settlement in their country—I do believe, that in the lapse of a very few years, they will be as ready, or perhaps more so, to trade with us, as we are with any other country."

Sir Henry's speech was received with most gratifying marks of approbation, and the banquet passed off with great éclat.

(From a Correspondent.)

Sir Henry Pottinger arrived in Manchester on Friday (Dec. 20), from Liverpool, by the train, reaching this town about half-past one. He was accompanied by Lady Pottinger and his family; Lieut.-Col. Malcolm; and Frederick Pottinger, Esq., and Major Pottinger, his brothers; and other gentlemen, including Capt. Eastwick, Capt. Ormsby, and Dr. Woolsen, of his suite.

A deputation met Sir Henry Pottinger at the railway station, and the carriages which were in waiting conveyed the party to the Queen's Hotel, where apartments had been engaged for them.

At two o'clock the Mayor and Town Clerk waited upon Sir Henry for the purpose of conducting him to the Town Hall, where the address from the Council of the borough was delivered.

At half-past five the address from the merchants, &c., of Manchester was presented to Sir Henry Pottinger, in the Town Hall, as above; after which the presenter of the address intimated to Sir Henry that the inhabitants of the town and district were desirous of presenting him with a testimonial of their esteem and estimation of his services, and had entered into a subscription for that purpose, and would be happy, at his convenience, to have his opinion as to the best mode of appropriating it.

The banquet, of which the annexed engraving is a faithful representation, took place in the large room of the Town Hall the same evening, which was most tastefully fitted up for the occasion by Mr. G. Doreston, of this town. The dinner was provided by Messrs. Maurigy and Co., of the Palatine Hotel, and was of the most récherché character, being quite in the Continental style; and all the arrangements were of the most complete and excellent description.

The Mayor presided; and at his right sat the distinguished guest of the evening, Sir Henry Pottinger. The officers of his suite, Major-General Sir T. Arbuthnot, K.C.B., Sir George Larpent, and a large number of distinguished individuals were also present, in addition to the merchants, &c., of Manchester and the neighbourhood, by whom the dinner was given. The whole went off with the greatest éclat, and the company separated, after a very agreeable evening, a few minutes after twelve o'clock.

On Saturday Sir Henry went on 'Change, where he was received with loud cheers by the assembled merchants and manufacturers. He also visited some of the principal manufactories of the town. About four o'clock the same afternoon he received an address from the operatives of this town, which had been signed by no less than 10,438 working men in the short space of 14 hours.

In the evening Sir Henry and Lady Pottinger, their family, and the general's suite, were present for a short time at Half-holiday Soirée, in the Free Trade Hall, where they were received most enthusiastically.

Sir Henry had intended leaving Manchester on Monday, but in consequence of the indisposition of his youngest son, the General's stay may be prolonged for a day or two.

The subscription mentioned above, which had been entered into towards the Manchester testimonial to Sir Henry Pottinger, amounted on Saturday to the sum of about £3000.

NOVEL ARRIVALS AT THE SURREY ZOOLOGICAL GARDENS.

Two very interesting additions have been made to the collection of rare animals in the Surrey Zoological Gardens—a living Toucan, and a female Elk, or Moose Deer. The bird is the most singular of the two, and it has, in consequence, already been visited by vast numbers of our eminent zoologists; but it is with the public it will become the greatest favourite. It is one of a class—the Ramphastidoe—so little known in this country, that only one living specimen was ever imported. Our bird is known to zoologists as the Ramphastos Toco, but by the marvel-loving sailor, he is called the Preaching Toucan, from the incessant "palaver" with which he cheers his native solitude—the virgin forest of South America. In his present confinement he has shown himself to be a docile, contented, and, in some respects, humorous, fellow—playing very strange pranks for the accommodation of his enormous bill, and using the most extraordinary care for the conservation of his stumpy tail. His plumage is of the gaudy and striking character which so strongly marks the region of his nativity, being made up of blue and white patches, edged here and there with yellow and little iridescent spots of lustrous beauty. In his instincts he is a very gluttonous bird, and longs to be chopping up large butterflys and humming-birds by the dozens. But, despite this unsocial peculiarity, we commend him to general notice, as a fine example of those extraordinary adaptations of structure, by which the exigencies of a creature's life are satisfied.

The Elk, Alces Americanus, is not less interesting than the Toucan, and likely, some think, to prove a more useful acquisition. It is a female, and of course destitute of horns. The male of the species has, we believe, been domesticated in some part of the extreme northern part of North America; and we are not without hopes that the present animal, being a female, may show the practibility of its naturalization here. During its residence in the gardens it has shown itself to be extremely timid, flying the face of strangers, and seeking the most undisturbed quietude. The cold of our extreme winter has apparently refreshed its hardy nature.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 28, 1844.

From the foreign intelligence of the week some occurrences of interest may be gathered; but at home, politics are entirely suspended by the festive influence of the season.

The maniac—for he seems to have been little else—who attempted to take, and so nearly succeeded in taking, the life of the King of Prussia, has been executed. At the time the sentence was passed on him, some disgust was felt in England at the horrible nature of it. It seemed too bloody and too cruel for any nation calling itself Christian. A law or a punishment long unused becomes forgotten, and, when some accident revives it, it is impossible to inflict it—the age will not tolerate its barbarity. We are ourselves open to the same reproach then made against Prussia; Frost and his companions in crime were sentenced to the old punishment for high treason, in all its disgusting and horrid details, fully as repulsive as that which, according to the Prussian law, was passed upon Tschech. It is said that the King made every effort to save the man's life, proposing that the execution of the sentence should remain suspended till after his own death, the task of enforcing judgment to be left to his son. He would have adopted any means to avoid the necessity of putting the criminal to death, could the law and constitution have allowed him. We can hardly understand how, in a monarchy of which the executive is all powerful, like Prussia, the power of pardoning should not be possessed by the Crown to the fullest extent. We know that the King can punish almost without check, and does and has consigned hundreds to long and wasting imprisonments, as bad as death itself and frequently producing it. Is it meant to be implied that the King of Prussia cannot pardon? It is said that had Tschech expressed the smallest compunction for his crime, had he made the slightest application for mercy, he would have had his life spared. But must the Royal prerogative be made dependent on what the delusions of a madman or an enthusiast may prompt him to do, or make him obstinately refuse to do? We can conceive cases in which a stern state necessity may make it impossible for the Monarch to pardon a criminal, though averse, as a man, to the infliction of the punishment. But in the case of Tschech nothing is stated to have stood in the way of mercy but a refusal to comply with some old and probably absurd form required by the law, a refusal to observe some antiquated piece of legal etiquette. The King delayed for many months; the criminal was urged, prayed, and begged to relent, and save his Majesty the pain of signing his death warrant; he doggedly refuses, and his Majesty signs the fatal paper, faints away with agitation, and hurries from his capital till all is over. There is something in all this that Englishmen cannot understand; and though it may be uncharitable, it is difficult not to suspect the Government of a little hypocrisy. Nothing is more common in the most cruel and despotic of rulers. In Russia no man is ever sentenced to death; yet what criminals are to die is always known; they are sentenced to receive more than a hundred strokes of the knout; they are then dispatched after a few blows, by the executioner striking them on a vital part, death being almost instantaneous. But the Emperor of Russia never signs a death warrant! Oh, no; he is all mercy and clemency, in the manner of the Inquisition when it delivered over its victims to the civil power to be burned; the Church never shed human blood. In Russia, too, nothing is more common than for state criminals to disappear, and as no inquiries can be made in a country where such things cannot even be talked about, the occurrence happens and is forgotten. The King of Prussia is no doubt a very amiable man, and may have a great reluctance to inflict capital punishment. But much cannot be inferred from this in favour of real humanity—Nero wept when signing a warrant. If the Prussian Government really had such an intense desire to spare the life of this wretched man, it would have found the means of doing it. Forms and technicalities never yet stood between despotism and its will, and what power desires to do that power can do. When it loudly trumpets its wish to do, and does not, the avowed desire may be suspected as to its sincerity.

Letters from Constantinople state that Dr. Wolff has arrived at Tehran; every one will rejoice that this brave and energetic man has escaped uninjured from Bokhara, where it was at one time doubtful whether he would not share the fate of Stoddart and Conolly, the certainty of whose doom he has been the means of ascertaining.

It is pleasing to see nations borrow from each other the measures that have, where first originated, been productive of good. It is far better than the emulation by which they force each other to be cunning and skilful in the art of destruction. The success that has attended the low uniform rate of postage in England, has awakened attention to the subject in France, and it is now understood that the French Government have under consideration a general plan for lowering the rate of its inland postage to four sous.

We have so often had occasion to censure the conduct of part of the American people with regard to their public debt, that it is a pleasure to find an instance of honesty and justice prevailing over that "smart" dealing, so prevalent on the other side of the Atlantic. It is furnished by a statement of a case recently tried in the Circuit Court of the United States:—

> A person named Daniel Carpenter had, for some time past, manufactured and sold a certain description of cotton thread, which was marked as, and represented to be, the "Persian thread" manufactured at Leicester, in this country. The article manufactured by Messrs. T. and W. Taylor, of the town just mentioned, is of very superior quality; that of the defendant was not only inferior but deficient in quantity, so that the reputation and business of Messrs. Taylor had suffered injury. One of the pleas set up by the defendant was, that he was not accountable to an alien and foreigner for using in America the trade marks of such alien. The proceedings had been greatly protracted, but now the case was fully submitted for judgment. The Court granted to the complainants a perpetual injunction against the defendants, with costs. The result of this judgment is to show, that in the United States foreigners are fully protected against this species of injury.

The controversy that has been carried on about the practice of preaching in the surplice, has been this week brought to a sort of crisis. The Bishop of Exeter, yielding to the display of public feeling, called forth by his recent letter on the subject, has withdrawn his order for ensuring "uniformity," at least as far as the practice complained of is concerned; other points are reserved. The Bishop of Worcester has also given a reproof to the portion of the Clergy who have adopted this observance; these two events following so close on each, combined with the proceedings now pending at Oxford, on the book of Mr. Ward, will tend to check the manifestation of that spirit which has caused so much regret and concern in a large body of the Protestant laity.

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

On Saturday last the Queen, accompanied by the Princess Royal, walked on the terrace and in the grounds adjacent to the Castle in the morning. In the afternoon, her Majesty and Prince Albert promenaded in the walks in the park and the grounds around the Castle for some time. His Royal Highness Prince Albert went to shoot in the royal preserves in the morning, attended by Mr. Anson, and returned early in the afternoon.

Windsor, Sunday.—This morning the Queen and Prince Albert walked out for some time. Her Majesty and Prince Albert, the ladies and gentlemen of the court, and the domestic household, attended divine service in the afternoon in the private chapel of the Castle.

Monday. The Queen and Prince Albert went out for their early morning walk. On the return of her Majesty and his Royal Highness, the Prince left the Castle, to shoot in the royal preserves, attended by Mr. Anson and Sir Edward Bowater. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, Lady Fanny Howard, and the Countess Wratislaw, joined the royal circle at dinner. The Queen honoured Mr. Thorburn with a sitting to-day for her portrait.

Tuesday.—The Queen and Prince Albert walked early this morning in the grounds adjacent to the Castle, and visited the Duchess of Kent at Frogmore House. In the afternoon, her Majesty and Prince Albert, attended by the Countess of Charlemont, Lady Caroline Cocks, Hon. Miss Devereux, Viscount Hawarden, Lord Charles Wellesley, and Sir Edward Bowater, went to the small lake in Frogmore grounds. Some of the Royal party partook of the diversion of skating, the skaters being Prince Albert, Lord Charles Wellesley, Sir Edward Bowater, Mr. G. E. Anson, Captain Francis Seymour, and Dr. Prætorius.

Wednesday.—The Queen, Prince Albert, the Duchess of Kent, the Ladies and Gentlemen of the Court, and the domestic household, attended divine service this morning, in the private chapel of the Castle. The holy communion was afterwards administered. The Hon. and Rev. Charles Leslie Courtenay officiated. Her Majesty and Prince Albert took their accustomed exercise in the course of the day.

Windsor, Thursday Evening.—(From our own Correspondent.)—In consequence of the fog which prevailed during a great portion of the morning, her Majesty did not take her usual early promenade in the vicinity of the Castle. The infant Royal Family were taken out for an airing in the private grounds, in the Home Park. This morning, at ten o'clock, his Royal Highness Prince Albert, attended by Mr. G. E. Anson, left the Castle in an open carriage and four, and proceeded to the preserves in the Royal domains, to enjoy the sport of shooting. The Prince Consort returned to the Castle at two o'clock to luncheon with her Majesty. The Royal dinner party, this evening, will include her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, the Countess of Wratislaw, and Lady Fanny Howard. Preparations are making for the departure of the Court, on the 7th proximo, for Stowe, to honour, with a visit, the Duke and Duchess of Buckingham. It is expected that the Queen and the Prince will proceed to Strathfieldsaye, about the 20th of next month.

HER MAJESTY'S AND THE PRINCE CONSORT'S NEW YEAR'S GIFTS TO THE POOR OF WINDSOR.—The distribution of the Queen's and his Royal Highness Prince Albert's annual gifts to the poor and needy families of Windsor, and of that part of the parish of Clewer, which is within the borough, which will be dispensed through the medium of the Lord Steward of her Majesty's Household, assisted by the Hon. and Rev. C. L. Courtenay (the Queen's domestic chaplain), agreeably to the recommendation of Mr. John Clode, jun., and the other churchwardens of the parish, will take place on New Year's-eve, in the Riding School, at the new Royal Mews, in the Home-park. It is expected that her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert, attended by the Royal Household, will be present to be witnesses of the gratifying scene. One hundred and eighty pairs of 10-quarter blankets will be given to that number of families, agreeably to the recommendation of the parochial authorities. Nearly two hundred families, averaging five children in each, will also be supplied (the quantity being regulated according to the number of children) at the same time, with beef, plum pudding, bread, potatoes, and ale; and also one hundred weight of coals to each family. The provisions only which will be presented to the recipients of the Royal bounty, will weigh upwards of three tons! Her Majesty's Domestic Chaplain, who takes the greatest interest in promoting the charitable and benevolent objects of her Majesty and the Prince Consort has been very actively engaged during the past few days, in superintending the necessary arrangements for the proper distribution.

THE STATE APARTMENTS AT WINDSOR CASTLE.—A portion of these apartments, which had been closed since the death of her late Royal Highness the Princess Sophia of Gloucester, are now open to the public, by command of her Majesty. This portion includes the Vandyck Room, the Audience Chamber, the Presence Chamber, the Guard Chamber, St. George's Hall, the Ball Room, and the Waterloo Gallery. The following State Rooms still remain closed:—The Throne Room, the small Vestibule, the Reubens Room, the Council Chamber, the King's Closet, the Queen's Closet, and the Zuccharelli Room. It is to be regretted that the most celebrated paintings and works of art are contained in those portions of the State Rooms which are not open to the public. While the Court is at Windsor the apartments will be closed on Tuesdays and Fridays.

THE LATE PRINCESS SOPHIA.—The establishment of the Princess Sophia Matilda at Blackheath, and also at her residence in Curzon-street, are to be broken up on the 6th of the ensuing month, until after which period the vacancy in the Rangership of Greenwich Park will, it is undersood, not be filled up. Lady Alicia Gordon and Miss Cotes, Ladies in Waiting on the late Princess, are still at Blackheath.

CHRISTMAS PARTIES AMONG THE ARISTOCRACY.—The Queen Dowager is surrounded by a select party at Witley Court, Worcestershire. Their Serene Highnesses Prince Ernest of Hesse Phillipsthal and Prince Edward of Saxe Weimar have arrived there to pass the Christmas with their illustrious relative. The Duke of Rutland has a numerous circle assembled at Belvoir Castle, Leicestershire, participating in the pleasures of Christmas. The Archbishop of York is at Bishopsthorpe, near York, surrounded by a select family circle. The Marquis of Anglesey has a select family party met at Beaudesert; the Earl and Countess of Saudwich, Viscount and Viscountess Sydney, Earl and Countess Cadogan, and Ladies Augusta and Honoria Cadogan; the Earl of Uxbridge and Ladies Paget; Lord Alfred Paget, Lord George Paget, &c. &c., have arrived there for the Christmas holidays. Viscount and Viscountess Palmerston's party, at Broadlands, assembled on Monday and Tuesday last. Lord and Lady Ashley have arrived there from the Earl of Shaftesbury's seat in Dorsetshire, and the Marquis and Marchioness of Normanby, Lady Holland, &c., have arrived from town. Sir Robert and Lady Peel have a select party at Drayton Manor. The circle is confined to the different connexions of their family. The Marquis and Marchioness of Westminster have the Earl and Countess of Grosvenor and family &c., passing the Christmas at Eaton Hall, Cheshire, that holiday being kept up at that splendid seat in the true old English style.

DEATH OF LADY BOWYER.—Lady Bowyer died on the 13th of December at Genoa. She was the daughter of the late Sir Andrew S. Douglas, Bart., a distinguished naval officer, who was captain of Earl Howe's ship in the glorious battle of the 1st of June, 1794. She was married in 1808 to Sir George Bowyer, Bart., of Radley Hall.

FUNERAL OF LADY CULLING SMITH.—The mortal remains of Lady Anne Culling Smith were, on Monday last, removed from Hampton Court Palace to Egham Church, to be deposited in the family vault. This mournful ceremony was attended by her afflicted husband, Mr. Culling Smith, as chief mourner; and also by his Grace the Duke of Beaufort, Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington, the Marquis of Worcester, and Lord Robert Grosvenor.

THE PROJECTED ROYAL VISIT TO STRATHFIELDSAYE.—We believe that her Majesty's contemplated visit to the Duke of Wellington, at Strathfieldsaye, will be deferred for the present, owing to the death of his grace's sister, Lady Anne Culling Smith.

VISIT OF HER MAJESTY TO STOWE.—Soon after Christmas her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert will honour their Graces the Duke and Duchess of Buckingham with a visit at Stowe. The Court is expected to leave Windsor for Stowe on Tuesday, the 7th proximo, where the most extensive preparations are in progress for the reception of the Sovereign and her illustrious Consort. It has been arranged for the Court to proceed to the Wolverton station, on the Birmingham line of railway, en route to the seat of the Duke of Buckingham. At that station her Majesty will be received by the Bucks Yeomanry and Hussars, under the command of the Marquis of Chandos, which will form the military escort thence to the princely residence of the Duke. Her Majesty will likewise be met at the Wolverton station by the whole of his Grace's tenantry on horseback, bearing white wands, by whom her Majesty will also be escorted to Stowe.

NEW YEAR'S DAY IN ENGLAND AND FRANCE.—A singular, and, perhaps, unprecedented event, will take place on New Year's-day. The royal table at the Tuileries, and the royal table at Windsor Castle, will both be supplied with portions of the same prize ox, the first of the class at the late cattle show. Mr. Minton, purveyor to her Majesty, having become the purchaser, politely offered, through the French embassy, to present his Majesty Louis Philippe with a sirloin, a rump, and an aitch bone, for his festival on New Year's-day. The offer was graciously accepted, and the immense joint, or rather combination of joints, for it is in one piece, weighing 44 stone, or upwards of 350lbs., is to be sent to Paris, and it will form part of the dinner at the Tuileries on the jour de l'an, which is a great day in France.

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

CHRIST CHAPEL, ST. JOHN'S WOOD.—The incumbency of this chapel, vacant by the preferment of the Rev. Daniel Moore, M.A., to the ministry of Camden Chapel, Camberwell, has been conferred on the Rev. George Fisk, LL.B., vicar of Walsall. This benefice the Rev. gentleman will resign.

The Rev. J. B. Smith, D.D., Head Master of Horncastle Grammar School, has been appointed by the Duke of Newcastle, one of his grace's domestic chaplains.

PRESENTATION.—The Rev. Edward Johnston, M.A., has been presented by the Lord Chancellor to the Royal parish of Hampton, in the patronage of the Crown, void by the cession of the Rev. J. S. Goodenough, M.A.

THE DIFFERENCES IN THE CHURCH.—The Bishop of Exeter has published the following letter, with a view of putting an end to the differences of opinion lately prevailing in his diocese:—

"TO THE CLERGY OF THE DIOCESE OF EXETER.

"Bishopstowe, Dec. 23, 1844.

"Dear and Rev. Brethren,—It has been represented to me by many of you, in different parts of the diocese, that the use of the surplice in preaching is more repugnant to the feelings of the people than could have been reasonably anticipated. To those feelings, however erroneous, I deem it my duty to surrender what may be abandoned without the sacrifice of any principle. I therefore withdraw my order, as respects the surplice. That order was avowedly issued by me, not for the sake of enforcing an express rule of the Church, but in execution of the power given to me to 'appease a diversity,' in Divine worship, and so to remove a symbol of disunion amongst ourselves. If my object cannot be obtained in the way which I had pointed out, without leading to other evils of as grave a kind, let me, however, hope and entreat that in using your own discretion in this particular, you will so use it as shall least expose you to the reproach of cherishing party spirit. Wherever, therefore, the surplice is now used without offence, there, I hope, it will be continued in use. The enforcement of the rubrics rests on different ground. In them the Church has spoken clearly; and to the voice of the Church, when it gives not an uncertain sound, every true Churchman, and especially every faithful minister, will hearken with reverence and submission.—I am, reverend and dear brethren, your faithful friend and brother,

"H. EXETER.

ORDINATION AT WELLS.—At the ordination of the Bishop of Salisbury, held at Wells, on Sunday last, his lordship expressly charged the candidates to make no deviation whatever from the accustomed mode of performing Divine service in their respective churches, without first consulting with their diocesan.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

Those marked thus * are new candidates.

OPENING OF LLOYD'S, AT THE NEW ROYAL EXCHANGE.—The business of the underwriting department of this establishment commenced at the New Royal Exchange for the first time on Thursday morning. The area for the transaction of public business is expected to be opened to merchants on the 1st of January.

VICTORIA PARK.—On Monday a sale by auction took place, by order of the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, of the ancient residence formerly belonging to Bishop Bonner, called Bonner Hall, which is situated on a part of the site of Victoria Park. The portion remaining, which is stated to have been a part of one of the wings of the original palace, is about 120 feet long, and about 20 feet in width, the external walls being the same that were first erected. This building has, for several years past, been separated into five houses, one of which was a public-house.

THE IMPROVEMENTS IN WESTMINSTER.—The long-talked of improvements which are to be effected from Westminster Abbey to Buckingham Palace have been commenced, several men being employed to pull down the houses on one side of Little Tothill-street. It is intended to remove the Almonry, Orchard-street, Duck-lane—and to form one wide and spacious street from the west door of Westminster Abbey to the Buckingham Palace end of Pimlico. Orchard-street contains the remains of some of the oldest houses in Westminster, and a part of one of Oliver Cromwell's palaces still stands there.

THE METROPOLITAN PRISONS FOR DEBT.—The metropolitan prisons for debt presented a very different appearance on Christmas day last year to what they do on the present occasion. In Whitecross-street Prison there were this time last year upwards of 300 debtors, and now they do not exceed 130, notwithstanding a great influx within the last fortnight—no fewer than 70 persons having taken up their abode there in that period. The prisoners each received a piece of beef and some bread, and on New Year's-day a similar supply. In the Queen's Prison there are but comparatively few to the number of last year, and they were furnished with an allowance of food, besides other assistance. The Marshalsea prisoners are confined in the same prison, and in the act consolidating the prisoners, passed two years ago, provision was made in regard to the contributions to those particular prisoners. In Horsemonger-lane there are only twenty-seven debtors. The whole number of debtors confined in the three metropolitan prisons is at the present period under 300, which is about a third of the inmates of last year. The act of last session, abolishing execution on debts not exceeding £20, has certainly been the cause of the present appearance of debtors' prisons, both in London and the country—in the latter, the prisons are nearly deserted by debtors. Creditors complain that the act of last session regarded the convenience of debtors, and neglected the interest of creditors; the latter being left to the honesty of the former, and compelled to ask in "bondsman's key" for their money. By a return of last session it appears that there were in March last between 3000 and 4000 debtors, of which more than 1500 were confined for debt, exclusive of costs, under £10.

FUNERAL OF THE LATE CLARA WEBSTER.—The interment of the remains of this lamented young lady took place on Tuesday, in the catacombs beneath the chapel of the General Cemetery, Kensal-green. The funeral procession left the late residence of the deceased, in Upper Norton-street, Fitzroy-square, shortly after one o'clock. It consisted of a hearse, drawn by four horses, containing the body of the deceased, preceded by the usual mournful panoply, and in its turn succeeded by two mourning coaches, containing the chief mourners and other relatives of the family—two private carriages closing the cavalcade. The chief mourners were Mrs. Webster, the mother of the deceased; and Mr. Webster, jun., her son. There were also other members of Mrs. Webster's family among those who followed, and some gentlemen whose names did not transpire. The whole of the funeral equipments were white. The funeral reached Kensal-green about half-past two o'clock, and upon arriving at the chapel, the body was conveyed within that edifice, where the customary service for the burial of the dead was read in a very impressive manner by the Rev. Mr. Twigger, the chaplain in attendance. Among a group of some thirty persons previously assembled to pay the last tribute of respect to the memory of the deceased, there were several of her late professional companions. Mrs. Cooper (the wife of the stage manager of Drury-lane Theatre) and Mrs. Charles Mathews (Madame Vestris) joined the procession at the entrance to the Cemetery, and were present at the service in the chapel. The body was contained in a leaden shell, encased in an outer coffin, which was covered with black cloth, and studded with silver plated nails, but otherwise nearly devoid of ornament. On the centre of the lid was a plate, bearing the following inscription:—"Clara Vestris Webster, obiit December 17, 1844, ætat 21." The ceremony, as may readily be imagined, was altogether of a peculiarly affecting character.

FIRE AT MILLBANK PENITENTIARY.—On Monday evening, at about half-past eleven, a fire broke out in the steward's room of the Millbank prison; by the prompt and judicious measures of the governor it was, however, extinguished before one o'clock in the morning.

A MATRIMONIAL CHRISTMAS.—On Christmas Day no less than thirty-six couple were united in the bonds of matrimony at St. John's Church, Waterloo-road. The happy couples were married in batches, and the ceremony occupied some time. Some laughter was created among some persons outside, on the arrival of a couple in a close cab. The bridegroom appeared to be about sixty years of age, and the bride not half his age; the former was assisted by the latter into the church.

CAPTURE OF A BURGLAR.—On Tuesday evening, about six o'clook, an attempt was made at No. 21, Walcot-square, Lambeth, which fortunately terminated in the capture of the burglar just as he had effected an entrance into the house. A gentleman residing next door was in the act of entering his house, when he perceived a man in the door-way of No. 21. He crossed the road unperceived, and watched the fellow's actions, when he saw the latter open the door, and just as the burglar was in the act of entering he ran over and pounced upon him. They had a most desperate struggle, in which the fellow beat his captor in a dreadful manner, but he did not, however, let him go until the arrival of the police, who secured him, and conveyed him to the station-house.

SINGULAR PRESENTIMENT OF DEATH.—On Monday an inquest was held before Mr. Baker, at the Ship Tavern, St. George's-in-the-East, on the body of John Smith, aged sixty-five years. It appeared by the evidence that on Sunday afternoon last deceased was walking along Whitechapel High-street with a friend, when he took notice of the number of deaths which were daily occurring, and of the several funerals which were then passing. He was then in perfect health, and observed that there were many at that moment who were as well in health as he was who would not be alive on Christmas Day, adding, that he thought he should be one of the number. On his return home he sat down by the fire to warm himself. A few minutes only had elapsed ere he suddenly fell from his chair insensible. Mr. Bingham, a surgeon, was sent for, who promptly attended, but his services were unavailing, life being quite extinct. Mr. Bingham said he could not speak positively as to the cause of death, but attributed it to natural causes. Verdict in accordance with the medical testimony.

IRELAND.

SIR HENRY POTTINGER.—This distinguished individual has accepted an invitation to dine with the merchants of Belfast, but the period has not yet been fixed.

THE CHARITABLE BEQUESTS ACT.—Archbishop Murray has issued a "Pastoral address to the Roman Catholic clergy and laity of Dublin," the object of which is to defend his acceptance of the commissionership under the Charitable Bequests Act. He says that conscience told him it "would be in him a gross dereliction of pastoral duty to fling away, through any human respect, the opportunity which this act, imperfect as it is, places within his reach of guarding in safety the treasury of the poor, and of securing for the services of the Church whatever property benevolent individuals may choose in the new board, to be permanently dedicated to that purpose." The Rev. Doctor then proceeds to review the Act, and, after going through this branch of the case, says—"Thus have you obtained, by this abused Act, important benefits, compared with which its defects are of little moment." This letter of Dr. Murray has excited considerable sensation and discussion in Ireland.

THE REPEAL ASSOCIATION.—Mr. O'Connell was not present at the meeting of the Repeal Association on Monday, and the chief feature was the return of Mr. Smith O'Brien, who made a very long speech on many topics. He spoke very much and very confidently about Repeal. "If," he said, "the Irish people were now to draw back, after all the aspirations they had uttered—all the pledges they had given—they would be recorded as the most weak and inconstant of all people, and deserving of the contempt of every age; but if they persevered and used the means necessary to success, his conviction was that success would be ultimately attained. Circumstances might occur to retard it. Every removal of our causes of complaint—every grievance redressed diminishes our power by so much; but he was bound to proclaim to the English nation that the wounds inflicted on this country were too deep to be healed. (Hear, hear.) The '30th of May, 1844,' would never, never be forgotten. (Great cheering.) England, when in danger, may tender us a redress of grievances; but we will trust alone to ourselves, and in our own national institution." Mr. O'Brien proceeded to say, that "the Repealers did not want to change their Sovereign. They were perfectly satisfied with their Queen, but determined to have a domestic legislature. They sought no rebellion; they would have no more unsuccessful rebellions. He was not one of those, however, who thought that a people were not justifiable in resisting their Government in certain cases." He next advised that all the boards of Poor Law guardians should record their opinion in favour of Repeal. (Hear, hear, hear.) They should record that it would be for the interest of the poor to have a domestic legislature in Ireland. All our institutions should be thoroughly nationalised. Our literature and our music required it; even science itself might be intimately imbued with nationality—witness the scientific labours of Professor Kane. (Hear, hear, hear.) Poetry also should be called to the aid of Repeal. He was proud to say that in this respect much had been done, for the "Songs of the Nation" might vie with the noblest productions of human genius. (Cheers.) The fine arts also should be brought to their aid, and music and reading-rooms should all go hand in hand. To all these instrumentalities he would add the moral conduct of Repealers. Every Repealer ought to be a well-conducted moral man—respectable in his station of life, whatever it might be. (Hear, hear.) If any collision, after all this, should take place with England, the fault would be England's, and not that of Ireland. (Cheers.) Their course was now to wait for events and bide their time—to prepare themselves for freedom, and show themselves worthy of it. (Hear, hear.) The rent for the week was only £178 11s. 2d.

OUTRAGE TO THE MEMORY OF LORD LIMERICK.—The Limerick Chronicle alludes to a disgusting outrage which took place in that town. It states that when the remains of the late Earl passed that office, on Monday last, such disgraceful conduct took place as was never witnessed in a civilized country. The yelling of the mob was terrific, and the tenantry who attended to pay the last tribute of respect to their landlord were assaulted, and their scarfs torn to atoms. The relatives of the deceased, in their carriages, received similar treatment, having been pelted with stones, and compelled to take refuge in the houses adjoining the cathedral. Lord Monteagle and Sir A. De Vere were amongst those who were so treated. Lord Monteagle is son-in-law of the late Earl; Sir A. De Vere, nephew. The late Earl of Limerick, by his last will, bequeathed a sum of £500 to be distributed amongst the poor of Limerick, a fact which renders the outrage still more infamous.

POSTSCRIPT.

DARTMOUTH ELECTION.—The nomination took place on Thursday. Sir Henry Seale, Bart., son of the lately deceased member, proposed, and Mr. John Teage seconded the nomination of Mr. Moffat, the Whig candidate; the proposer and seconder of Mr. Somes, the Conservative, were Mr. Codner and Mr. Cutler. A notice of disqualification was served upon the mayor, stating that Mr. Somes was a government contractor within the meaning of the 22nd Geo. III., c. 45, and that the votes given for him would be lost. Mr. Somes denied that he was a government contractor in any sense of the word. On the show of hands being taken, about three-fourths of the meeting held up their hands in favour of Mr. Somes. A poll was then demanded on behalf of Mr. Moffatt by Sir Henry Seale; and the meeting separated. The polling was to commence to-day (Saturday).

MORTALITY OF LONDON.—The total number of deaths which took place in the metropolis during the week ending last Saturday as showm by the Registrar-General's returns is 1393, showing a very considerable increase of mortality, as compared with the numbers of several past weeks, and an excess over the weekly average for the past five years of no less than 447. This increase is attributable partly to the severity of the weather, and partly to an increased prevalence of epidemic, endemic, and contagious diseases. The deaths from diseases of the brain, nerves, and senses in the past week, number 200; the weekly average of this class, for the past five years, is 157; old age 125, weekly average for the past five years, 71; diseases of the lungs and other organs of respiration, 511; weekly average for the past five years, 286.

THE RIOT AT THE FUNERAL OF THE EARL OF LIMERICK.—Some further particulars have been received of the riot at the funeral of the Earl of Limerick of which a notice is given under the head of Ireland. It appears that, it having, been rumoured throughout Limerick that the funeral would take place at twelve o'clock on Monday, the populace were on the qui vive from an early hour in the morning. The funeral left the palace at twelve o'clock, and moved on through George-street, Patrick-street, and Rutland-street. The carriages of the nobility and gentry of the surrounding district were in attendance. Among them were Earl Dunraven's, Lord Clarina's, Lord Monteagle's, Sir Aubrey De Vere's, Mr. William Monsell's, &c. About one thousand of the tenantry of his late lordship were dressed in scarfs and hatbands. Many gentlemen of the county and city wore crape bands and weepers. The crowds of idle persons in the streets and thoroughfares were very great, and as the procession moved along there was a good deal of shouting and groaning. When it arrived at the New Bridge it was completely stopped, and then a scene of indescribable confusion ensued. The tenantry were hustled and pulled about, and the linen was torn from their hats and shoulders. The crowd was so great on the Bridge and up Quay-lane, that there was no proceeding. A most disgraceful assault was made on the carriage of Lord Monteagle, who, on being recognised, was fiercely groaned and hooted. His lordship with much difficulty escaped, after some very rough treatment. Some say he was knocked down and trampled on—others that he was merely hustled. Mr. Samuel Dickson, likewise the mayor, and Mr. O'Neill, who interfered to protect him, received some ill usage. At length the excitement and violence became so great that it was feared the immense crowd would overturn the hearse and carriages and throw his lordship's remains into the river. A speedy order was given for the military, and two companies of the 15th Foot, and a troop of the 5th Dragoon Guards were almost immediately on the spot. In the meantime, Lord Monteagle, Sir Aubrey De Vere, and others, remained in durance till the military came to their rescue. The populace then slowly retired, laughing and jeering at the parade of soldiery, whose presence could have been well dispensed with were the police at hand, as they should have been, to do their duty.

SERIOUS AFFRAY.—On Thursday night, about twelve o'clock, a serious encounter took place between a party of Irishmen and Englishmen, in Sussex-street, Tottenham-court-road. It appeared that the quarrel originated in a dispute about some game they were playing in the British Queen public-house, in the above-named street. The Irishmen challenged their opponents to fight, and several of them immediately commenced an attack, armed with bludgeons. One of the parties, whose name is William Tomlinson, residing in Chenies-mews, Tottenham-court-road, received such injuries on the head as to cause him to be immediately taken to the London University Hospital, where he now lies without any hope of recovery. Several of the offending parties were immediately taken into custody.

SUICIDE BY STARVATION IN A LUNATIC ASYLUM.—On Tuesday afternoon, Mr. Baker held a lengthened investigation at the Five Bells Inn, Old Ford, Middlesex, respecting the death of Frances Wilson, aged 45, an inmate of Byle's private lunatic asylum, in the above parish, who died from voluntary starvation in that establishment. Ann Williams, a nurse in the asylum, deposed that the deceased was a married woman, and had been an inmate of the establishment since the 10th of last month. The deceased was a decided lunatic. The deceased had a disposition to abstain from food, and could not be persuaded to eat proper nourishment. What could be administered to her was generally done by some persons holding her head back whilst witness put the food into her mouth. She used to fancy that she was going to be poisoned. On Tuesday forenoon witness, assisted by a nurse named Jones, was engaged in feeding her with wine and arrow-root, and as the last teaspoonful was about being poured down her throat, her eyes became fixed as if death were coming upon her. She was instantly laid down on the bed, gave a deep gasp, and expired. Mr. Edward Palmer, resident surgeon at the asylum, said the deceased laboured under violent mania, raving almost constantly. Her delusions were various. She refused food, believing it was poison. He was in attendance upon her when she died. He thought that her death was caused by the weakened state of her system, arising from the circumstance of her having no disposition to take food. The jury returned a verdict "That the deceasee had died in consequence of her abstaining from proper nourishment to sustain life.

A WOMAN BURNED TO DEATH.—On Thursday morning, soon after three o'clock, a police-constable, named Ayliffe, No. 270 K, was on his beat in Green Man-lane, Poplar, when he heard the screams of a woman, and cries of "Murder, fire," proceed from the house No. 3, inhabited by a female named Ellen Walsh. He endeavoured to obtain admission, but was unable to do so until he broke open the door, when the poor unfortunate creature Walsh fell into his arms with her garments blazing around her. Ayliffe, with great presence of mind, threw his great coat about her, flung her on the ground, and rolled her over until he extinguished the flames. She was burnt in a most dreadful manner, and Ayliffe immediately called upon the assistant of Mr. Baillie, the divisional surgeon, to attend her. After the usual remedies had been applied, she was removed to the London Hospital. Her case appeared hopeless from the first, and death has since relieved her. The woman went home intoxicated on Christmas night at twelve o'clock, and left a candle burning on a chair by her bedside, and the light communicated to her clothes after she had laid down. In extinguishing the fire, the constable's hands were severely burned.

MORE DEATHS BY FIRE.—Mr. Baker on Thursday held no fewer than three inquests on the bodies of as many children, who had died from the effects of severe injuries from fire. The first took place at Poplar. A fine little Irish child, named Benjamin Hart, four years old, having, in his mother's absence, attempted to light a candle with a lucifer; in doing which one of the sparks from the match fell upon his dress and fired it. He was much burnt before the flames could be extinguished, and died on Tuesday night. The next case related to Bridget M'Gragh, aged ten years, the daughter of a poor Irish labourer. It happened on Tuesday night, her clothes having caught light by going too near the grate. She was most frightfully burnt, and expired shortly after her admission into the London Hospital. The third was a child of the name of Bamford, aged eighteen months, its parents living at Blackwall. The accident was caused by her brother, four years old, who, in lifting her out of a chair, let her fall against the spout of a kettle, whereby she was much scalded on her left side. The verdict in all the cases was "Accidental death."

DREADFUL MINING ACCIDENT.—On Monday morning a frightful accident, which caused the loss of eight lives, took place at the colliery of Messrs. Matthews and Dudley, at Bromley, near Kingswinford, (Worcestershire) in consequence of the breaking of some part of the machinery, by which means eight persons were precipitated down the pit, a distance of 200 yards, and were dashed nearly to atoms.

RESPITE OF WILLIAM POTTER.—On Wednesday morning, Mr. Noble, the governor of York Castle, received a respite from the sentence of death, in the case of Wm. Potter, convicted at the late Yorkshire assizes of arson, at Wistow, near Selby, "until the further signification of her Majesty's pleasure."

FOREIGN.

BUENOS AYRES AND MONTE VIDEO.—Extract of a letter dated Buenos Ayres, Oct. 2:—"Circumstances of an extraordinary nature took place at the Mount (Monte Video) on Sunday last, the 29th ult., being nothing less than the seizure by the American Commodore commanding the United States frigate Congress of the whole of the Argentine squadron. We recall to your recollection the fact, that since the departure of Commodore Purvis, the fishing-boats of Monte Video are seized by the Argentines whenever they can catch them. On Sunday one of these boats was pursued by an armed schooner bearing the Buenos Ayrean flag, and the latter having the best of the chase, the boat ran under the lee of an American bark for security, upon which the armed schooner, without hailing or other usual notice, fired shotted guns into the American bark, doing some damage, being at that time too, within range of the Congress's guns. The American commodore then sent an armed boat to take possession of the aggressive schooner, and then of the whole Argentine squadron in detail, lowering the flags of each vessel in succession. Commodore Grenfell, commanding the Brazilian naval force at Monte Video, sent a message to Captain Phippen, of the Argentine squadron, stating he considered the blockade to be void, as the blockading naval power had ceased to exist. Her Britannic Majesty's brig Philomel arrived here to-day, despatched by Mr. Turner, with letters to Mr. Mandeville; and there the affair stands for the present. We have detailed this affair to you because the consequences are likely to be serious."

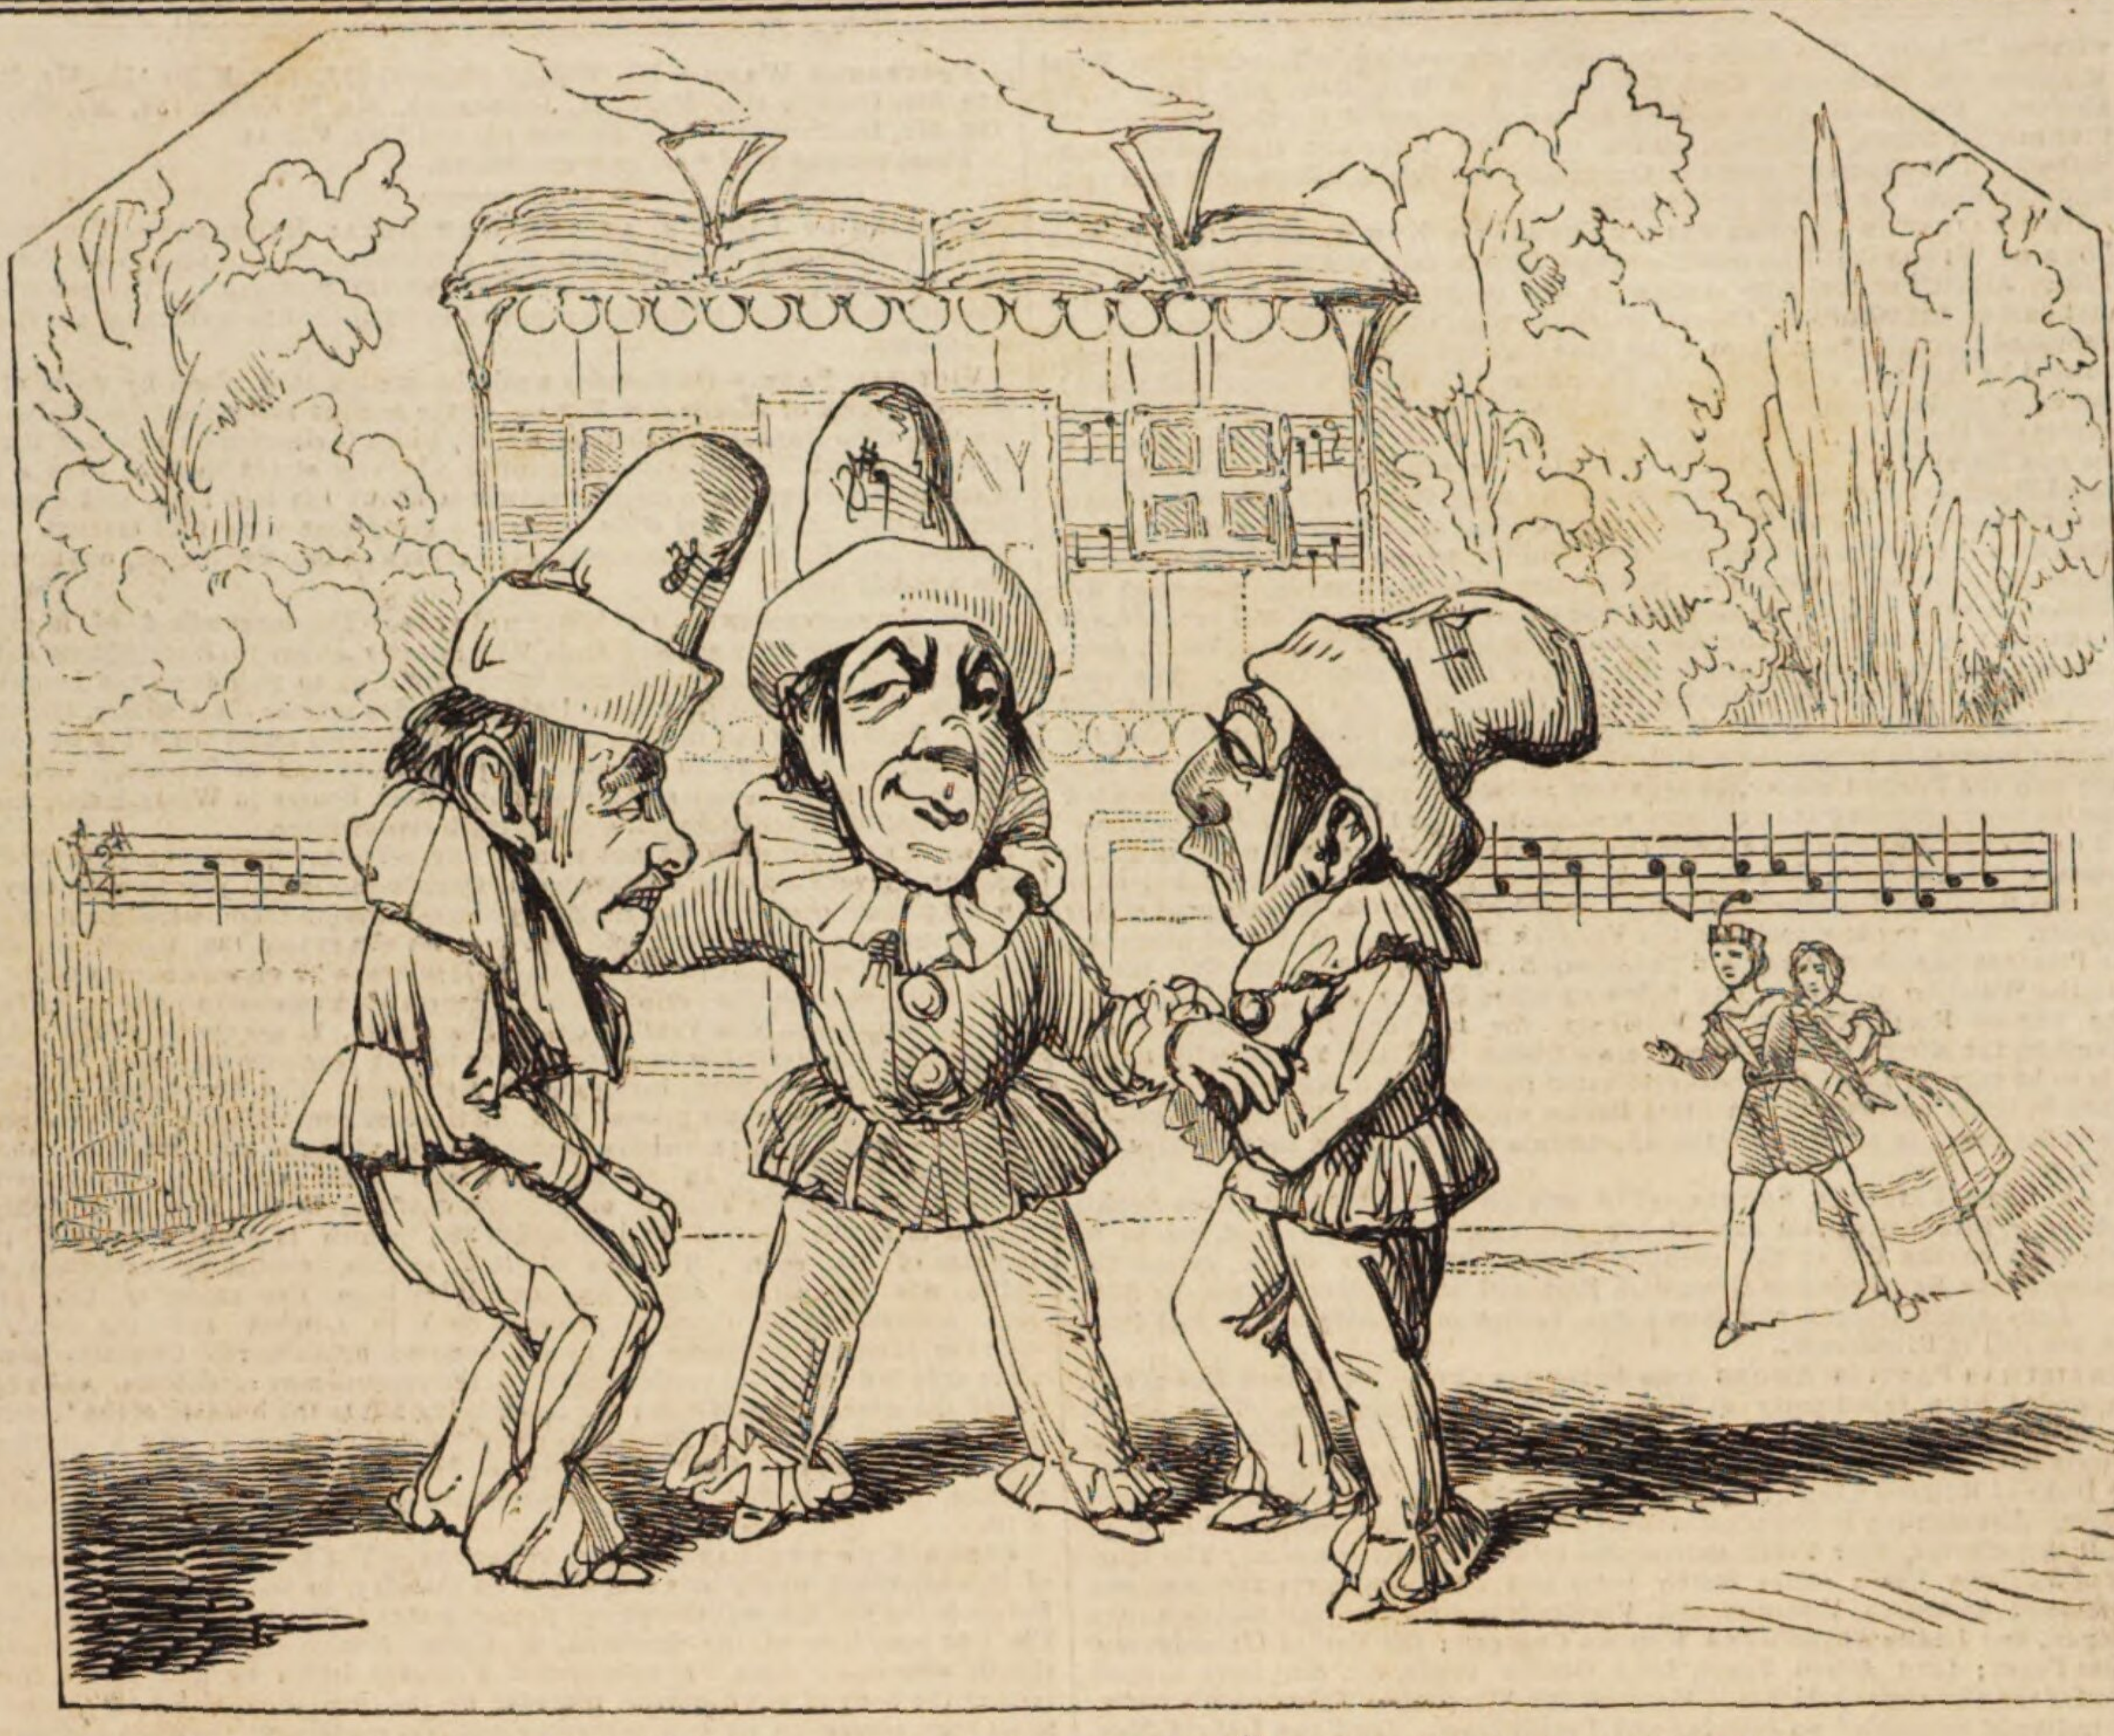
PANTOMIMES AND CHRISTMAS PIECES.

T FEW periods have the theatres displayed such general activity in preparing entertainments for the Christmas holiday-keepers as at the present time. There has also been a marked improvement in the style and nature of the pieces produced: there is a certain degree of meaning or allusion in every effect represented. Formerly, a rustic ballet-kind of opening to the pantomimes, with certain mechanical changes when the harlequinade commenced, was thought sufficient; but now the opening is in itself an elaborate story—the drollest whimsicalities are therein introduced, and it forms perhaps the most important part of the production: whilst in the pantomime, properly so called, all sorts of sly shafts are aimed at passing or past follies and events. The burlesque extravaganzas too, are productions increasing in popularity, and more and more adapted to the general taste, bid fair to supplant legitimate comedy in wit and satire. In fact, the present, the burlesque, and the introductory portion of a pantomime, are closely assimilated.

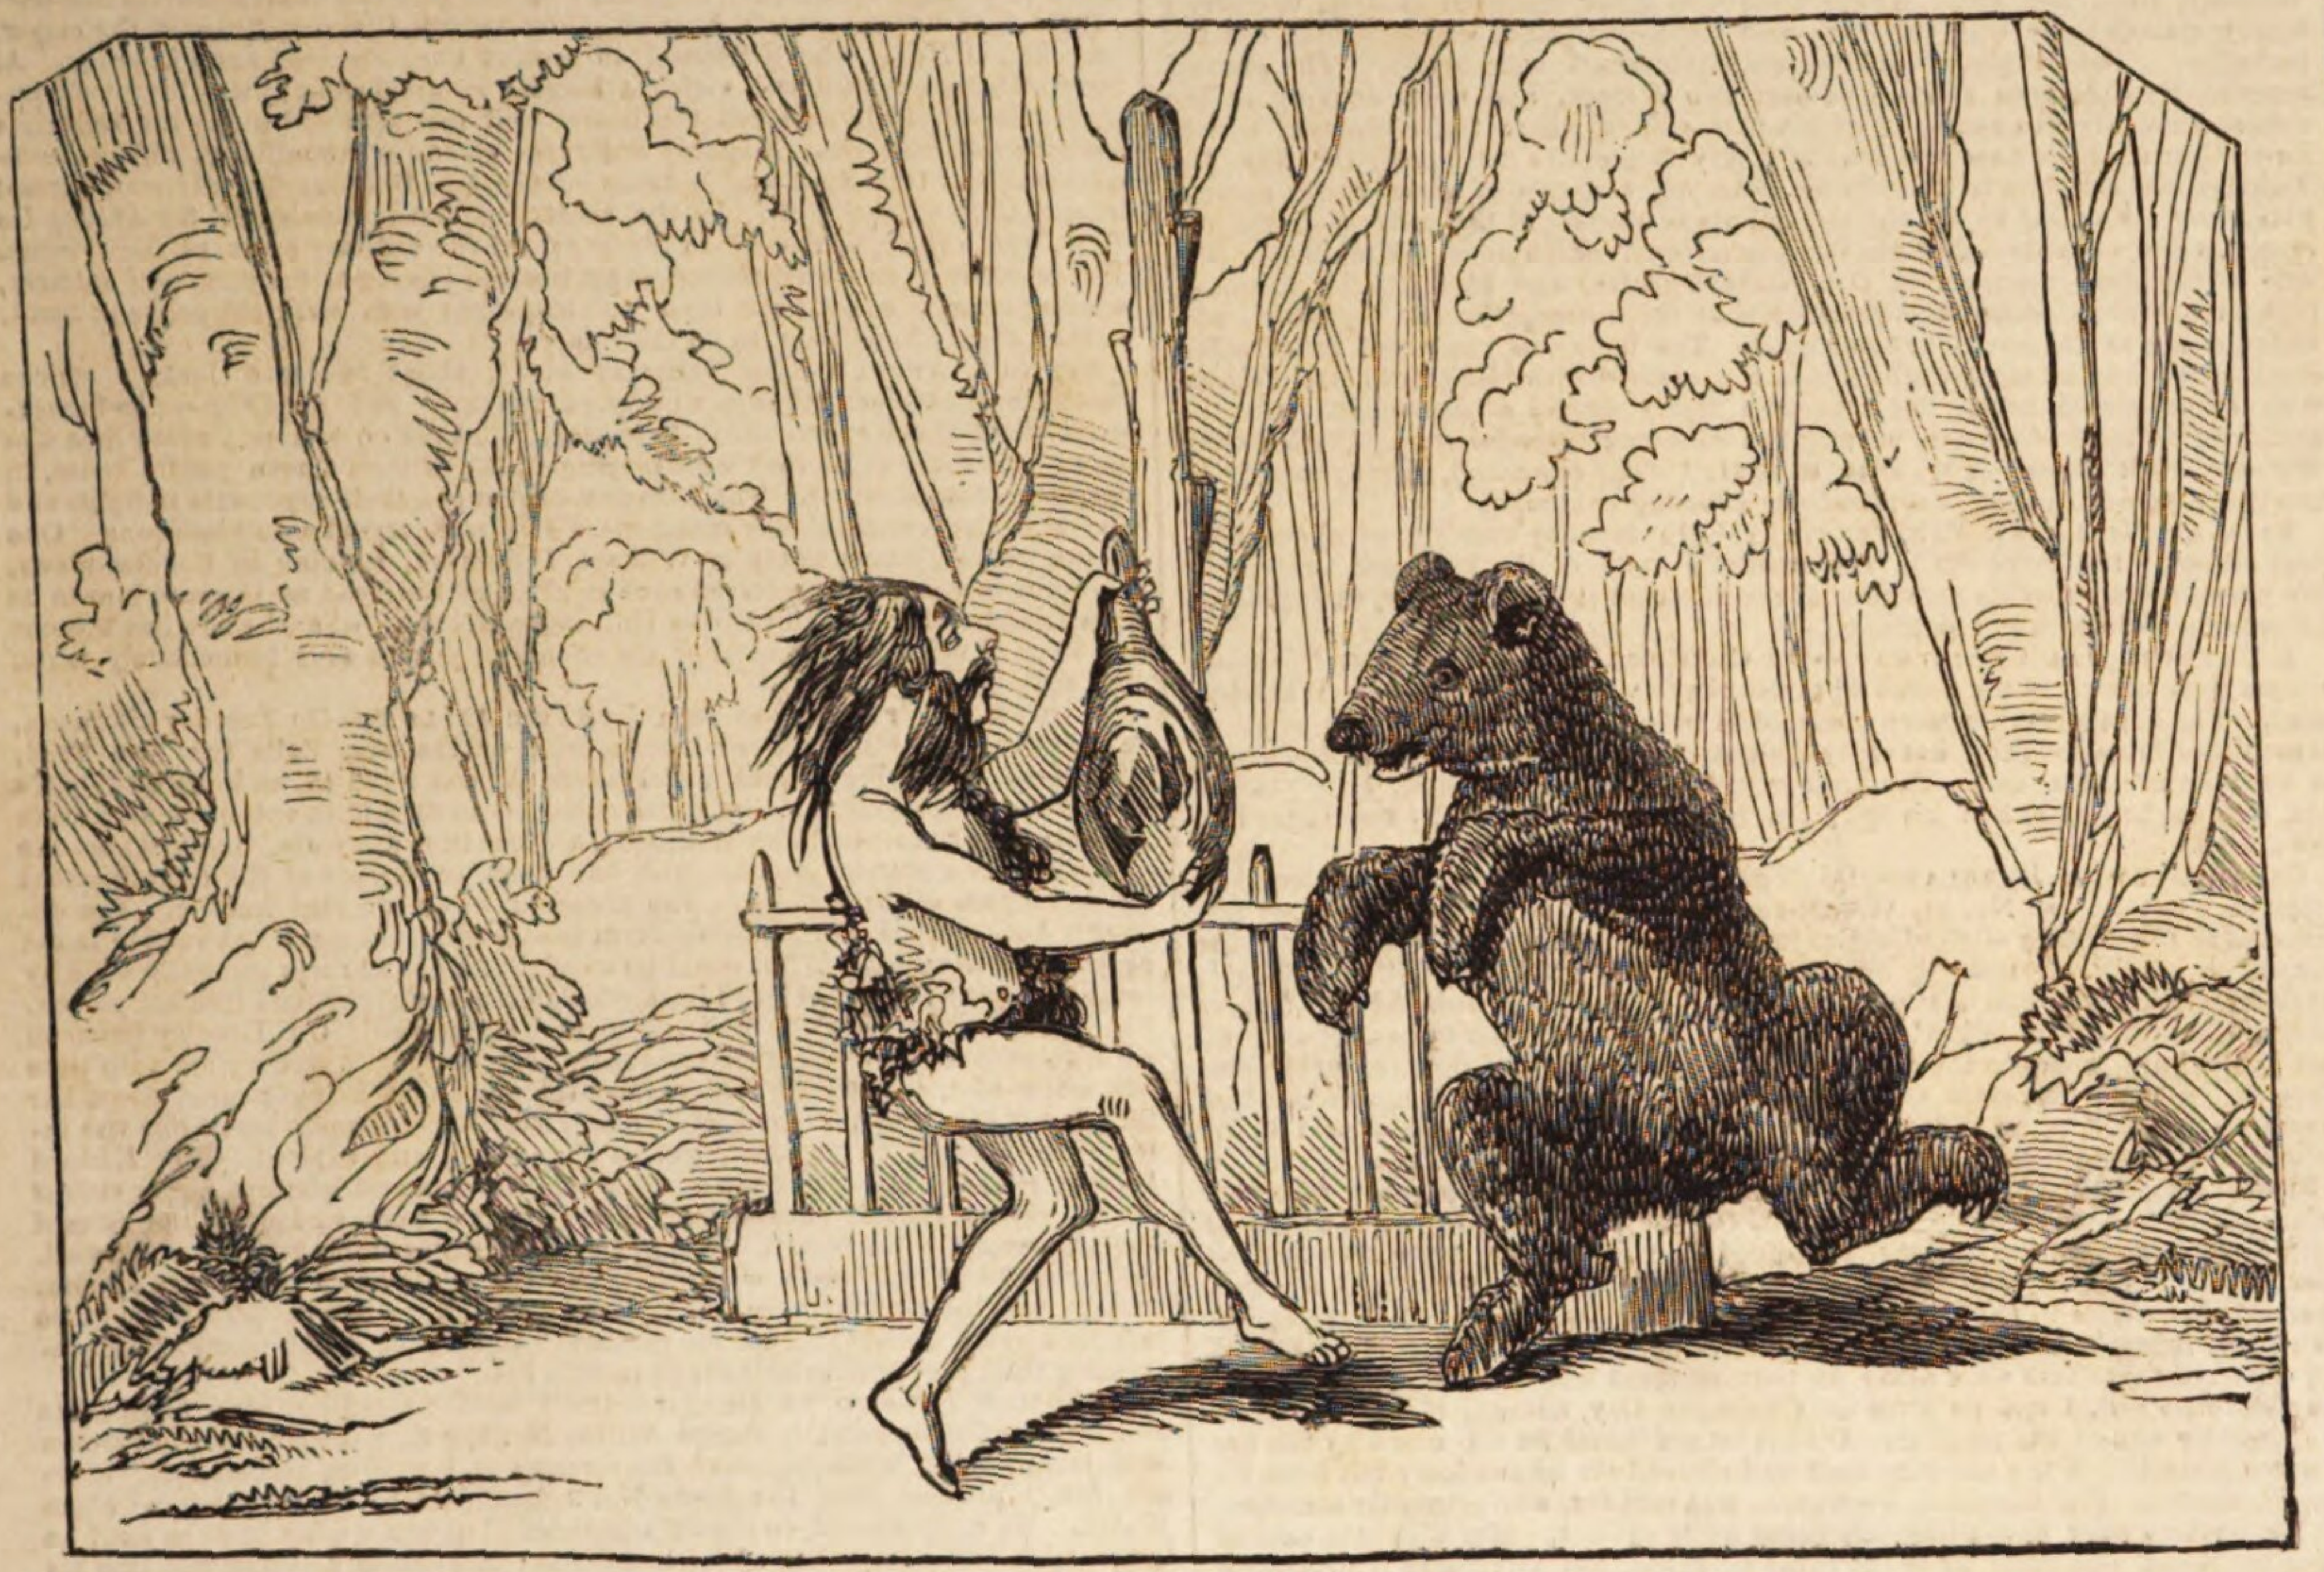
DRURY LANE.

To the industrious and successful pen of Mr. Madison Morton, we are indebted for the pantomime produced at this house, which is called "Puck's Pantomime; or, Harlequin and Robinson Crusoe." The subject has been before treated in various ways but this ought not to militate against the representation of a popular legend in another form, since every author takes a fresh view of its method of treatment.

In the first scene we are introduced to "An Attic Story," the abode of an author (Mr. Hance), who adopts the pen for his profession, and is consequently in distress. But he is in the greatest trouble, because he cannot find a subject for a pantomime. Hereat, Puck (Miss A. Payne)—a very clever little girl, by the way—comes to his aid, and after introducing a variety of well known friends of all, both old and young, at last produces "Robinson Crusoe," on which they decide. A view of the island is then shown, with the ship high and dry, the ocean slumbering in the back ground, and the crabs wide awake in the fore ground. Here Crusoe (Mr. W. H. Payne) is paying a visit to the wreck, and shows "his private opinion of the useful and the useless," by pitching overboard a chest containing "the legitimate drama." He is somewhat put out by a visit from the Carribee islanders, and determined to avenge himself. The next scene is the interior of the island, and we here make acquaintance with Princess Tooraloora (Mr. Johnson) and her ten graduated brothers, who comes to implore Crusoe's aid to rescue her lover, Prince Paramatta (Mr. Wieland), who has been confined by his rival and elder brother, King Pariboo (Mr. T. Mathews), a passionate monarch, in a cage, and is about to be boiled alive. Crusoe promises to assist her; and speedily after this the savages appear bearing the hapless Paramatta, who is so soon to find himself in hot water. The preparations are being made for this Carribee pic-nic, when Crusoe fires an infernal machine at them. The savages fly. Pariboo and his club-bearer, Hankipanki, (Mr. Howell) jump into the sea, and are swallowed by the celebrated shark, San Domingo Billy, rendered otherwise so famous by Mr. T. P. Cooke, in "Black Eyed Susan." Crusoe now adopts Paramatta, under the name of Friday, and they go fishing, when upon landing the aforesaid shark, he disgorges his "two insides," who again show fight, but are beaten by Crusoe, and "the Princess' little brothers." In the following scene, Crusoe is represented with his guests, in the happiness of domestic life, with his goat, his parrot, and all our old acquaintances of the story book about him, as well as the Princess and her relations. Here again the restless Carribees attack them, and an awful skirmish is about to take place, when Puck once more appears: the "house that Crusoe built" turns to a view of the sea shore, and his sea-chest into a steamer, which is to convey him to England. The characters are now changed. Paramatta becomes Harlequin (Mr. Wieland); Pariboo is changed to Clown (Mr. T. Mathews); Hankipanki "assumes the form" of Pantaloon (Mr. Howell); and the Princess is turned to Columbine (Miss Carson); and the harlequinade commences. The various topics of the by-gone year—the Morocco war, the Act for Insolvent Debtors; the baths and washhouses of the labouring classes—are introduced, and the pantomime concludes with a grand tableau of her Majesty christening the new Royal Exchange.



SCENE FROM "HARLEQUIN CROTCHET AND QUAVER," AT COVENT GARDEN THEATRE.



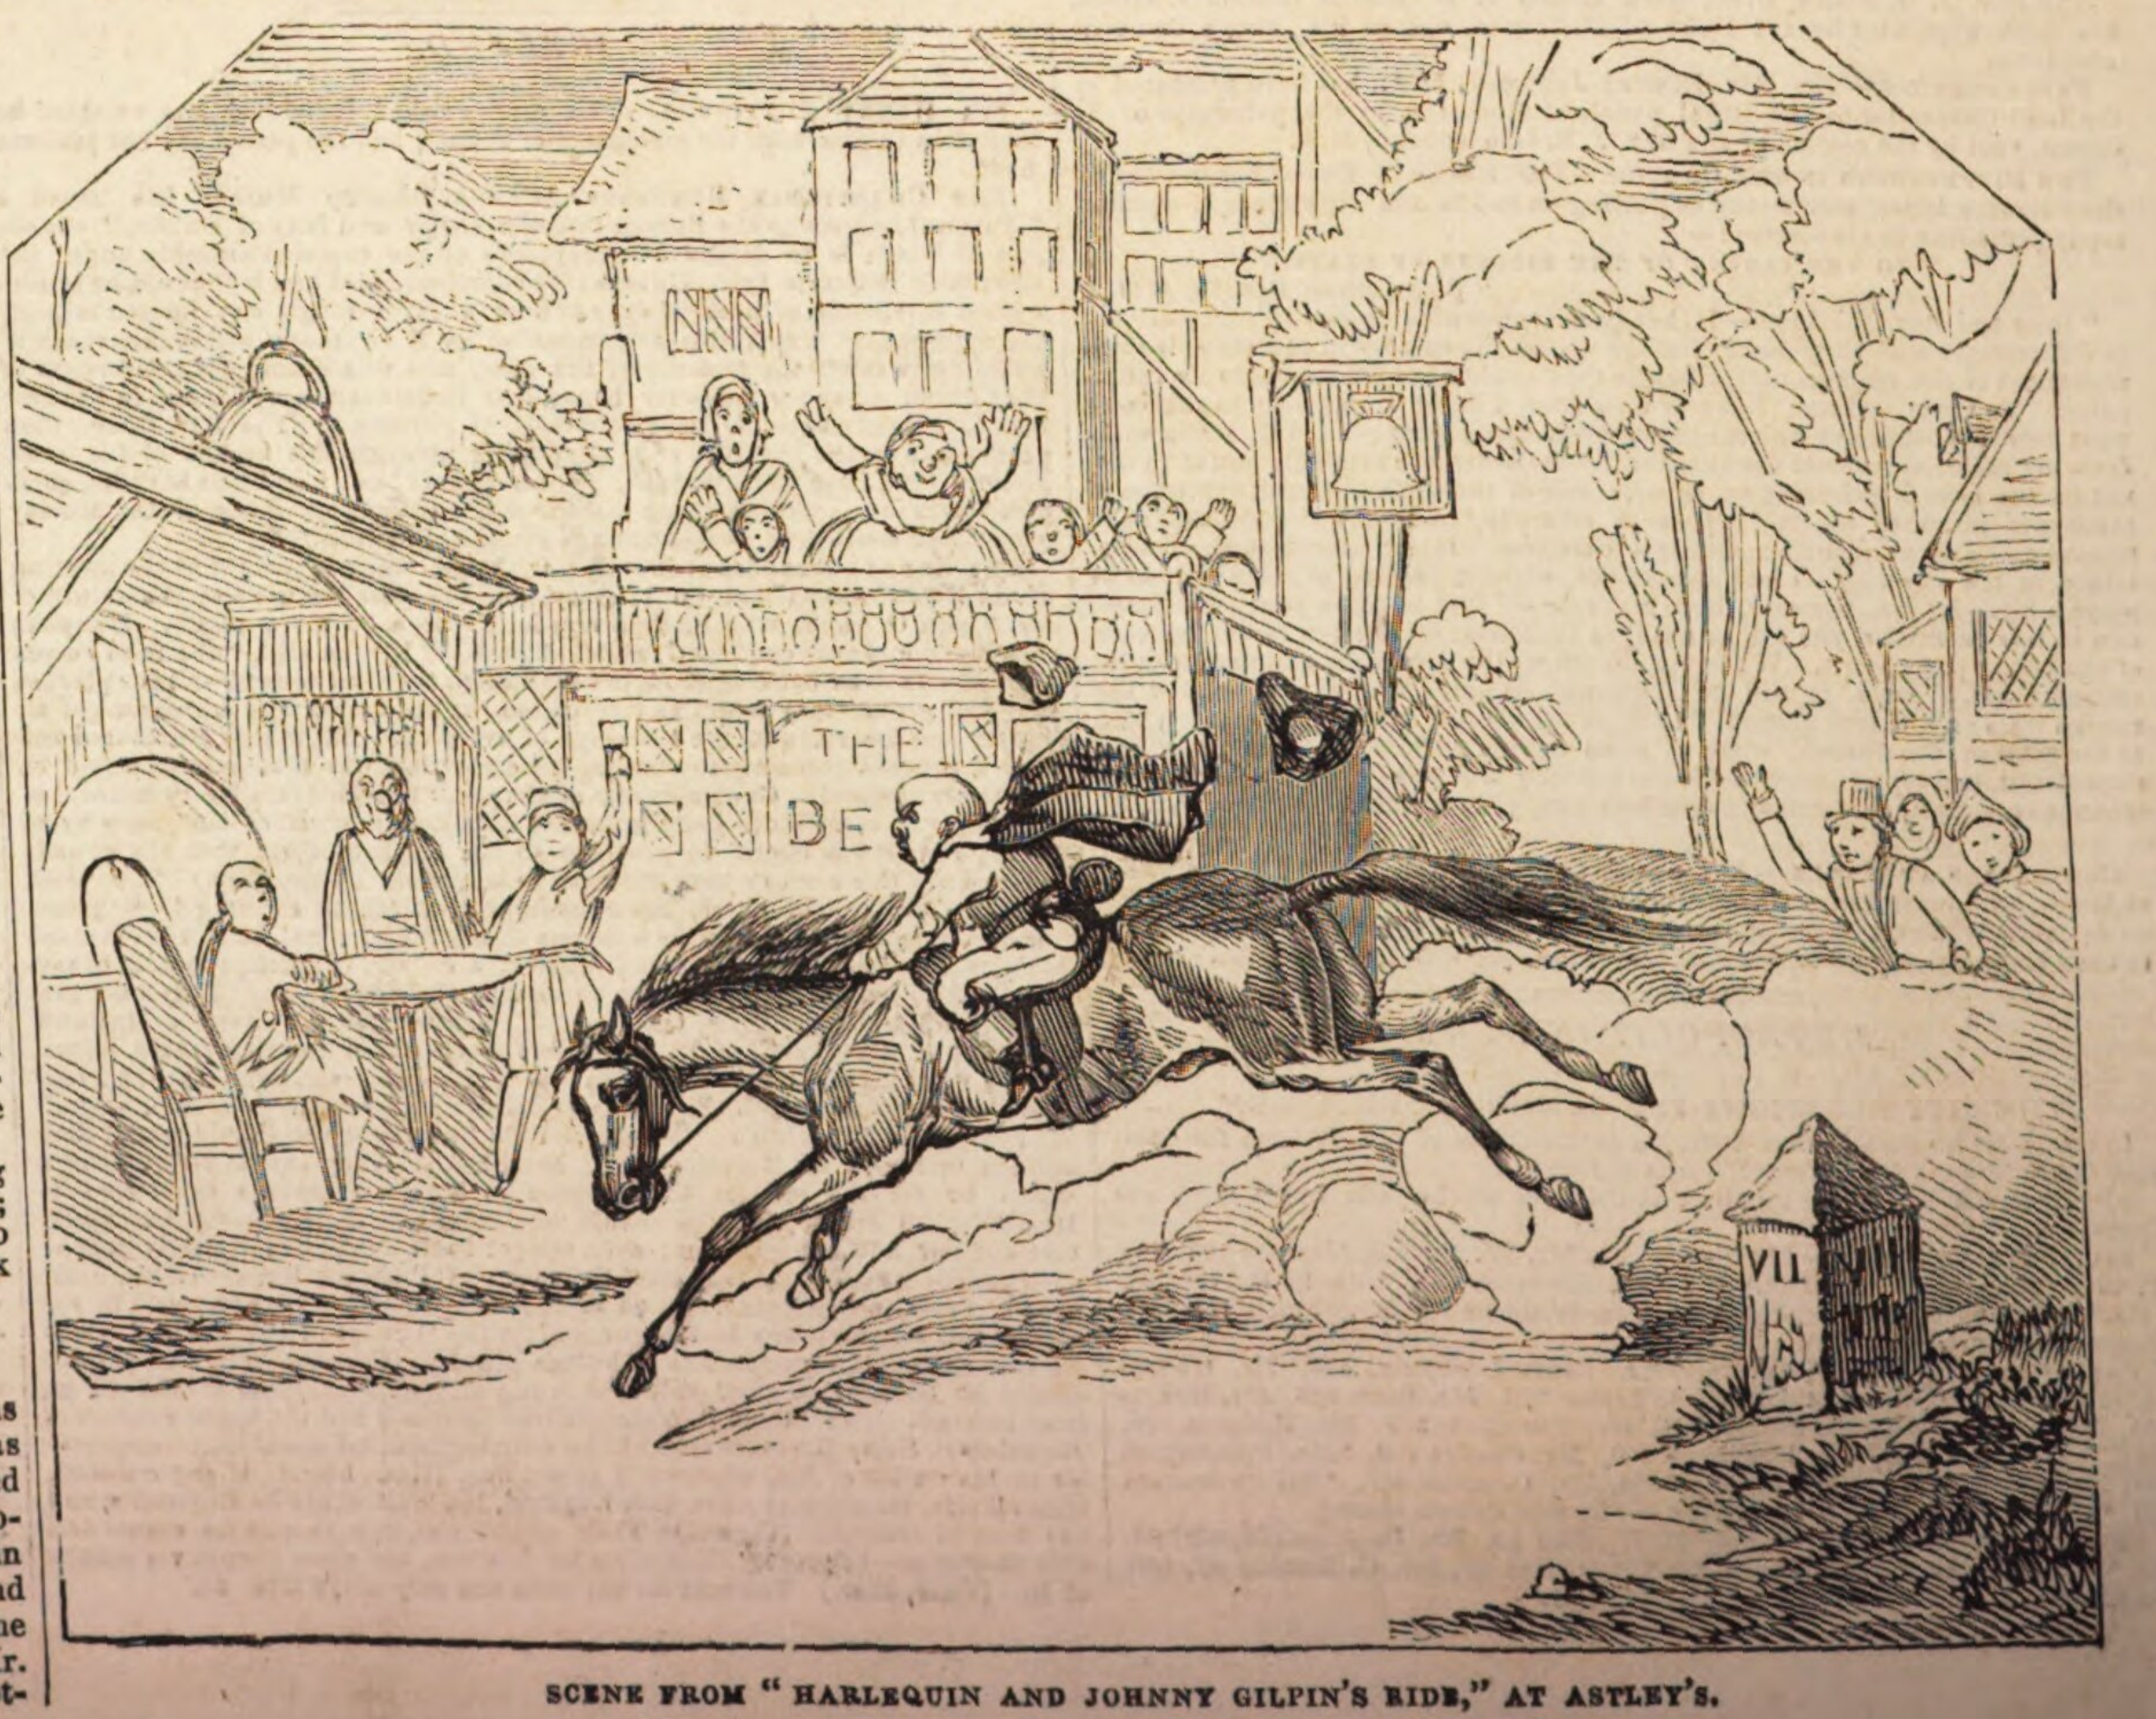
SCENE FROM "VALENTINE AND ORSON," AT THE LYCEUM THEATRE.

Notwithstanding this attractive story, and a very good opening scene, the whole affair moved heavily from the first to the last scene; nor was the flagging of that description which repetition is likely to improve. Payne, as Crusoe, obtained the most applause: his attack on the ship was cleverly acted.

COVENT GARDEN.

The arrangements for the promenade concerts, and the decorations of the Bal Masqué having been cleared away by a transformation as wonderful as any in the Christmas piece, after the time-honoured "boxing-night" tragedy of "George Barnwell," a new comic pantomime by Mr. Nelson Lee was produced, called "Harlequin Crotchet and Quaver, or Music for the Million." The characters and plot are to the fullest extent musical. Semiquaver (Miss Massall) the music-seller to the Fairy Court is beloved by Young Crotchet (Mr. Smithers) and Discord (Mr. Charles Marsh) whilst residing in a cottage with her father, Old Demisemiquaver (Mr. Gouriet). Crotchet is favoured by Melody (Miss L. Lyons) whilst Discord is backed by his band, who rejoice in such names as Noise, Racket, Crash, Screech, &c. &c. These latter personages, resolved to stop the progress of music, determine to carry off the lovers, and having done so, Discord solicits Semiquaver's hand of her father, and tempting his avarice by a display of unbounded wealth, gains his consent. In "stave the fourth," the prisoners are seen chained to a bar and unable to frame a tune. The old man finding his daughter has already been carried off, is much enraged, and demands her restoration. The demon Discord, in a towering passion, orders them to be removed instantly to his Cave of Noise and Racket, when Melody changes the scene to the "Halls of Light in the Temple of Apollo." Apollo appears in the Star of Concord, and crushes the power of the guards of Discord, Flat, Sharp, and Natural (Messrs. Hann, Rogers, and Henry), represented in a pictorial manner on the play-bill, with the names very properly put beside them to show which is which, as without this guide it might be difficult to determine. Discord and her crew are defeated, and Harmony then causes to appear Two Harlequins (Messrs. Smithers and Spenser Forde); Two Columbines (Miss Massall and Miss Ryalls). Discord becomes Clown (Mr. Charles Marsh); Demisemiquaver with another, turn to a Pair of Pantaloons (Messrs Gouriet and T. Blanchard). A great deal is made in the pantomime of the late civic excitements, even to "A Full Moon" and "The Man in Brass." The baths and wash-houses also figure; and in the physical portion of the attractions there are feats upon the corde volante; the Mazourka by two clever dancers from the Lyceum, Mesdemoiselles Adele and Louise; a Nigger Polka by Messrs. Marshall and Forest; an Irish Tilt by Mr. Forest and Miss Frampton, together with several athletic exhibitions. Every thing is at last brought to a satisfactory wind-up in "Melody's Home, filled with Harmony, Unison, and Love," and the piece concludes with the triumph of Melody over the powers of Discord.

After "George Barnwell," the Pantomime went off capitally, but had the fault of being too long. It wants cutting sadly, which will no doubt be attended to; and there were not many of those jokes and allusions which the public are now accustomed to expect in a piece of this kind. The scenery "hitched" several times, but this is excusable on a first representation. The Clown, Mr. Charles Marsh, wants activity. Mr. T. Blanchard was very good; and Miss Massall is an attractive young lady, with a nice figure, and an excellent dancer. The scenery is beautifully painted; and a mazurka, which must become very popular, composed by M. Jules de Glimes, was played with great spirit and effect by the band.



SCENE FROM "HARLEQUIN AND JOHNNY GILPIN'S RIDE," AT ASTLEY'S.

HAYMARKET.

Mr. Planché, the originator of the elegant school of burlesque, which has since become so popular, and to whom we are indebted for such pleasant reminiscences of "Fortunio," "The Fair One with the Golden Locks," and all the costly extravaganzas during the Vestris dynasty at Covent Garden, has again drawn from the graceful stories of the Countess d'Anois, and produced a new dramatic nursery tale, entitled "Gracioso and Percinet." At the commencement, we have Mr. James Bland, the king of burlesque potentates, as King Uxorious, a widower unexpectedly bewitched, who, in consequence of his ceaseless weeping over the decease of his first wife, is recommended to go a hunting for another, under the care of his chief huntsman, Lord Nimroddy (Mr. Caulfield). In pursuing the sport, himself and train arrive at a castle, inhabited by a wicked fairy, disguised as the Duchess Grognon (Mrs. Stanley). The duchess has a capital cellar, and at last prevails upon the King, who is somewhat of a grasping disposition, to marry her. On her arriving at the palace she finds the King's daughter, Gracioso (Miss Julia Bennett), so beautiful and so popular, that she immediately conceives a violent hatred for her, and imposes a variety of strange tasks upon her, which it seems impossible that she can accomplish. Percinet, however, "a fairy prince, and the perfection of lovers," comes to her assistance, and aids her in getting through her labours; and in the end the pair are both made happy.

The dialogue is smart, and abounds with happy turns and allusions, and the mise-en-scene is unexceptionable, not perhaps presented with the brilliant effect which distinguished that of "The Fair One with the Golden Locks," and one or two others of the Christmas fairy productions of the same author, but still excellent and complete in its way. Several favourite arias, among them—"When other lips," from the "Bohemian Girl," were introduced, and those sung by Miss Horton drew forth repeated applause. The whole piece passed off most successfully, the curtain having fallen amidst enthusiastic plaudits.

LYCEUM.

The well-known story of "Valentine and Orson"—the foundling of the forest of Orleans—has been taken as the groundwork for a burlesque at this house. The construction of the melo-dramatic spectacle on the same subject played some years back, has been closely followed, with the exception of the opening scene: but the whole of the dialogue is filled with whimsical point and allusions, and written in burlesque verse. The first scene represents the annual dinner of the "Fairy Foundling Hospital," in the Field of the Forty Fungi, wherein Oberon (Mrs. Wigan) appoints Pacolet (Miss Turner) to look after the foundlings at Orleans. In the second scene, we find their mother, Belisanta (Mrs. Woolridge), formerly the Empress or Greece, reduced to keep a school. She explains her history to her writing-master, Blandiman (Mr. Turner), and then prepares to take her young ladies to see the Royal visit to the City. The next scene is a view of Orleans, wherein King Pippin (Mr. F. Matthews) receives Valentine (Mrs. Keeley) returning from the wars, with a brilliant cortège and trophies. Henry and Haufrey (Messrs. Wigan and Scotres) are jealous of Valentine's popularity; and knowing that there is a wild man ravaging the forests near the city, they persuade Valen- tine to try and capture him, hoping it will terminate in his death.
Valentine departs, carrying with him the love of the Princess Eglan- tine (Miss Farebrother), and arrives at the forest with his squire, Hugo (Mr. Meadows). Here he encounters Orson (Mr. Keeley) and his nurse the bear, Bruina (Mr. Collier), who lives at the bottom of a bear-pit, like those at the Zoological Gardens. The bear gets tipsy, and ultimately dies: and Valentine leads Orson in triumph to Orleans, in spite of the efforts made by an evil spirit, Agramant, to oppose him. The second act commences with the arrival of the brothers at the palace, where a grand banquet is given, at which the wild man conducts himself in a most unseemly manner. The Duke of Aquitania sends to request King Pippin's aid to rescue his daughter, Florimonda (Miss L. Howard), who is kept in captivity by the Green Knight (Mr. Emery). Valentine offers to release her, and the jealousy of Eglantine being roused, she determines to follow him, and for this purpose she arms the whole of her maids of honour. Henry and Haufrey, his old enemies, waylay him on the way, and try to kill him; but Orson comes to his brothers' assistance, and they proceed together to the camp of Agramant, where Florimonda is working a Turk in Berlin wool, to beguile her captivity. Eglantine also arrives, and a general combat ensues, when, during the melée, Pacolet appears and the sorcerer is vanquished. The scene then changes to the Hall of the Brazen Head, wherein the oracle gives out its replies, in the style of the "answers to correspondents" in the Sunday newspapers, &c. The relationship of the brothers is made known; Valentine marries Eglantine, Orson takes the hand of Florimonda, the fairies are called to the weddings, and all ends happily.
After an adaptation of "The Chimes," on Boxing Night, the burlesque was produced, and was completely successful. Our limits, and the late period of the week, will not allow us to do more than mention the great splendour with which it has been produced, and the general excellence of the performance. Mr. Keeley's Orson was the acme of burlesque acting, and his talented little wife made an admirable Valentine; whilst Mr. Wigan, by his singular imitation of a leading tragedian, brought down loud applause. Miss Arden was encored in a parody on "The Ivy Green;" and Miss Farebrother came off with great eclat as the leader of the Amazons, whose evolutions were loudly cheered. Mr. F. Mathews and Mr. Meadows were also very droll in their respective parts. It is in every respect as successful as "Aladdin." The house was densely crowded, and the audience tolerably quiet.

ADELPHI.

The Pantomime at this house is from the pen of Mr. Buckstone, and is called "Cats' Castle; or, Harlequin and the King of the Rats," and purports to be "founded upon a categorical and doggrel poem, written by a Laureate, who invoked the Mews of the middle ages." We can well remember an old lottery print upon the same subject, which was published by Messrs. Bowles and Carver, who formerly kept such an endless repository of entertaining pictures in St. Paul's Churchyard. The whole of the opening of this piece is taken up by the warlike preparations and battles of the contending parties. We find Whiskers, King of the Rats (Mr. C. J. Smith), and the Princess Molrow (Miss Lonsdale); there is also Prince Tortoiseshell Tom (Mr. T. Ireland), and Kill Cat, Generalissimo of the Rat Army (Mr. Sanders); while amongst the officers are such names, in the feline army, as Marshal Pantiler, Colonel Purwell, and Major Fitz-spit. The siege and blowing up of Cat's Castle is the signal for the appearance of the Fairy Honeysuckle, in a radiant star, who transforms Tortoiseshell and Molrow to Harlequin and Columbine, and Whiskers and Kill Cat to Clown and Pantaloon. A number of allusions to passing events are introduced in the Pantomime, as well as the topics of the past year. Hungerford Suspension Bridge and the Invisible Shell; the Running Rein Fraud and the Insolvent Debtors' Court; the Washhouses for the Million; General Tom Thumb—all leading up to a succession of dioramic tableaux associated with events retrospective of the year 1844, painted by Mr. Charles Marshall.

The business after the transformations proved somewhat dull; and even making allowance for a first representation, the machinery was very much at fault. The tricks were old, and scarcely brought a laugh; and the audience appeared as dull as if witnessing a tragedy. The feats of the Infant Lauri Family drew down considerable applause, and were really clever; one or two things here and there were pretty good, as the "Box of American stores," changing to Tom Thumb's carriage, from which a capital likeness of the "General" alighted, and bowed to the audience. There was, also, a cleverly painted scene of Dioramic Tableaux of the most attractive events of the past year.

PRINCESS'.

The old melodrama of the "Miller and his Men" has been entirely rewritten into a burlesque, by Mr. Gilbert à Beckett, whose "Open Sesame," "Wonderful Lamp in a New Light," &c., are fresh in our readers' recollections. It is here called "Joe Miller and his Men," and, as may be supposed, is crammed with jokes of the quaintest kind. It commences in the Celestial Court of Bankruptcy, and goes on through the scenes of the well-known drama, with a ludicrous spirit of travestie. We have "A Grand Prize Robber Show," and the laying of the train is called "Magazine Day in Bohemia." Whether the audience were disappointed at not being regaled with the luxuries of a pantomime, or whether the fog (which gently insinuated itself into the house) damped their enthusiasm, we could net discover, but unluckily, the numerous hits in which the burlesque abounds, did not produce the effect which could have been desired. Mr. à Beckett might, possibly have selected a better subject for a holiday entertainment, but he could not have written smarter dialogue, or presented better opportunities for scenic display. The illustrious Joe favoured his auditors with a variety of jests, old as well as new; but the former appeared to be the more heartily relished. The piece is interspersed with parodies, not numerous, but humorous, and the performance was enlivened by Mr. and Miss Marshall in the dance of the "Bohemian Tarantella." Grindoff, the hero of this extravaganza, was represented by Mr. Compton, who proved himself a staunch supporter of the rights of authors. Mr. Oxberry, as Lothair, and Miss Emma Stanley as Claudine ("the child of sorrow and of Kelmar,") also did their best to ensure the success of the piece, which concluded in a blaze of triumph; produced by the usual combustibles resorted to on such occasions.

ASTLEY'S.

The harlequinade here consisted of a version of "Johnny Gilpin's Ride; or, the Black Witch of Edmonton," with a sort of necromantic opening, followed by some comic scenes of average merit; the main incident being the celebrated Citizen's ride, the rôle filled by "the popular equestrian, Mr. Wells." Mr. Barry proved as good a Clown upon the stage as in the ring; and Mrs. J. W. Collyer a graceful Columbine. The effect of the pantomime was, probably, somewhat anticipated by the first piece of the evening—"The Royal Fox-Hunt," which is a veritable treat. and a cleverly managed spectacle throughout. Our illustration of Gilpin's Ride tells its own tale.

SADLER'S WELLS.

The "Stranger" was performed at this theatre to an audience exhilarated from the effects of a successful boxing-day, but the piece not being sufficiently exciting for the spirits of the audience, caused it to be pantomimic to those desirous of hearing what the performers had to say. The grand attraction of the evening, the Pantomime, entitled "Harlequin Robin Hood and Little John; or, Merrie England in the Olden Times," commenced to a more attentive audience. The introductory scenes were a somewhat odd mélange of Robin Hood and Old and Young England,

Among the comic business, a scene of Prince Albert's bee-hives, wherein different trades are working at their employments, elicited great applause; as well as the appearance of a black sheep dressed in civic uniform. Prize pigs, and prize paupers, and a few other skits on popular questions, were equally successful. The descent of Young England, with the word "Equality," in large letters, and a scale, above which was "the new balance for the future," with a dustman smoking his pipe in one scale, and a gentleman a cigar in the other, was heartily received. Mr. Stilt, as Sprite, displayed feats of balancing, and was greatly applauded.

SURREY.

This house opened with, as the bill says, a piece founded on Shakspeare's "Seven Ages of Man, or the End of Crime;" and, as far as we were able to judge from the usual confusion of a boxing-night, was tolerably successful; and the great feature of the evening, the pantomime, from the pen of the indefatigable Nelson Lee, who has christened it "£ s. d.," is very good, and will, no doubt, be as remunerating to the lessee as the one of last year.

It commences with the tomb of Queen Anne, in the land of mist. The sprite, Counterfeit, is taking his rest in quiet, when hearing that there is a dreadful commotion on earth with Lawful Coin, he is anxious for his liberty, and Queen Anne, who suddenly makes her appearance, banishes him from the place. On the clouds dispersing, the interior of an "Enchanted Copper Mine" is discovered. Queen Anne and King Fourpenny are delighted to meet each other, and hold a consultation as to the best means of increasing prosperity on the land by aid of Harmless Mirth. A Penny is the coin that is sent with a mission, in order that he may, by his industry, become A Pound. The Sprites, under the superintendence of their superiors, soon coin a charmed penny—"a perfect beauty." The Save-all is opened, which is found to contain four farthings. A bright penny piece appears; Queen Anne takes charge of him, in order to convey him to earth through Fairy Land, to gain the aid of Commerce. We next journey to the exterior of the Golden Palace of King Sovereign. The Princess Five Shillings, heiress to the Crown, is now introduced. The Golden Monarch returns with his captives, he is welcomed by his Queen Half Sovereign, and, on preparing for the Royal banquet, the scene is changed for the Land of Plenty, Commerce is joined by Wealth, a mustering of the Fairy Court takes place, and a festive ballet succeeds. Queen Anne's cavalcade arrives in Fairy Land, where the Penny is changed to silver, and goes to seek his fortune. He falls in love with Princess Five Shillings, and offers her his hand, being aided by Commerce. The offer is accepted and they seek her parents' consent, which leads them to the Golden Palace on the coast of Guinea. Two Half-crowns are in readiness to receive his Majesty, who arrives with his Queen. The loss of The Princess is suddenly discovered, but she at last comes forward, hand-in-hand, with Penny-piece. Royalty looks upon it as a disgrace, and The Queen is fearful of a race of Farthings inhabiting the land. The King orders the Penny to be boiled alive, which catastrophe is prevented by the interposition of the Fairy Queen, who changes Silver Penny into Harlequin, the Princess Five Shillings into Columbine, the Queen Half Sovereign into Pantaloon, and the Golden Monarch into Clown. The hits are happy—Walker's Needles and Moses' Clothes Mart, the Surrey Gardens, &c., are among the changes.

Mr. W. H. Harvey, as Harlequin, Mr. T. Ridgway, as Clown, Mr. H. Corri, as Pantaloon, Miss Slaiter, as Columbine, sustained their parts admirably.

Herr Von Joel considerably added to the evening's amusement, by giving his extraordinary Imitations of Beasts, Birds, &c. The house was literally crammed.

OLYMPIC.

After "George Barnwell," a new comic Pantomime was produced, called "Old Bogie, or Harlequin Lazy Dick of Leadenhall." For the reasons above given, we cannot say much more than it was perfectly successful. Mr. Flexmore was an active and intelligent Clown, and danced two comic dances with effect. Mr. Ellar was an agile Harlequin, and Miss Wright a very graceful Columbine. Mr. Stilt also exhibited some wonderful torsions as a Sprite. Few of the tricks were worth noticing; the chief one being the interior of the Post-office, with Paul Pry reviewing the letter-carriers, and giving the word of command, "heat poker!" "melt wax!" "open letters!" &c. &c. St. Stephen's vestry also came in for a few rubs. The pantomime altogether wants spirit, but may prove attractive to the Christmas folks for some little time.

BURFORD'S NEW PANORAMAS.

By way of holiday attraction, Mr. Burford has just added to his Exhibition in Leicester-square, a finely executed panoramic painting of the City of Naples and its environs, during an eruption of Vesuvius: the time is night, and the stars and misty moonlight are represented with extraordinary accuracy and atmospheric effect; whilst the volcano is just beginning to pale its fires. Indeed, the stars almost twinkle, so forcibly do they shine out from the deep blue sky. The city, with its architectural masses, piled one upon another, borrows some remarkably bright reliefs from the volcanic fire; and points of the picturesque craft in the bay and harbour are, as it were, tipped with vivid light. In short, the whole picture abounds with beautiful and novel effects; and is, altogether, admirably painted.

In the two lower circles, the views of Baden-Baden and Hong-Kong continue to attract hundreds of visitors. The first-named picture has, comparatively, the finish of a cabinet painting; and the scene of our newly-acquired settlement, with its recently built houses, and varied shipping, is a clever performance.

Curious Bequest.—The Publicateur d'Arles states that an old lady, who died lately near that place, and who had always expressed a dread of being interred alive, had left by will a legacy of 600f. to the person who should, immediately on her death being declared, begin to tickle her feet, and continue to do so for the 48 hours which elapse between death and burial, in order that no doubt could be entertained of her being really dead. The maid servant, who had been apprized of this legacy whilst her mistress was still living, began to tickle her feet the moment her death was declared; but after 18 hours of almost incessant application, was obliged to relinquish the task from exhaustion, and was followed by another person, the two agreeing to share the legacy. The time having expired, and the old lady giving no sign of life, she was placed in her coffin and interred.

A HAPPY NEW YEAR.

I.

The New Year comes on his charger bold,
The youngest courser of time;
Oh, may he be laden with hopes and gold
For Christians, in every clime!
But most of bliss may he bring to this,
In the speed of his young career,
That with love in his face and joy in his race,
We may call him a happy year!

II.

A happy year to the family wide,
Of all our human kind;
Galloping on with pleasure before,
And scattering cares behind;
Leaping o'er all the hedges of pain,
That have grown round the human heart,
And striking the light of love again
From every flinty part!

III.

A happy year for wanderers wild
That over the world may roam,
And the happiest year that ever was dear,
Bless every English home!
The city house and the rural farm,
The thronged and lonely spot,
And shed its light from the palace bright,
Into the lowly cot!

IV.

We would not have for the silken rich
One wild woe to deplore,
But happiness, in her gayest dress,
Should call at every door;
Leaving her card at castle yard,
At mansion, and at court,
With a generous glee, and a heart all free,
And a spirit winged for sport.

V.

And then we would have the rich go forth,
Leading her by the hand
To every place of Poverty
In all the pining land.
Oh! 'tis they who are bound, where want is found,
To go with their guest of Mirth,
And beg her to smile a blessed smile
On every poor man's hearth.

VI.

Fire when coals are gone,
Food when money is spent,
A garment stout, with the frost fenced out,
And clothes where the rags are rent!
A sympathy kind for the stricken mind,
Soothing for sorrows long!
A blessing low o'er the poor man's woe,
And a chime with the poor man's song!

VII.

So should Power and Wealth
Be harbingers of cheer,
And Charity's lure be the home of the poor,
At dawn of a Happy Year.
Then let Happiness go
Home at the rich man's call,
Back from relieved and brightened woe,
Into the princely hall!

VIII.

Then let her revel and dance,
Till all the blood flow free,
In every vein of the gorgeous train
That own nobility!
Then in the dazzling whirl,
Then in the maddening cheer,
May holier thoughts come in to calm
The rich man's "Happy Year!"

IX.

A happy year to all,
Old and stern and sage,
Young, and flighty and wild,
Blessings for every age!
Happiness interchanged,
For this let brotherhood strive,
Then men will have smiles for every month
That shall brighten FORTY-FIVE!

X.

The New Year comes on his charger bold,
The youngest courser of time!
Oh, may he be laden with hopes and gold
For Christians, in every clime!
But most of bliss may he bring to this,
In the speed of his young career,
That with love in his face and joy in his race,
We may call him a happy year!

The Act to Simplify the Transfer of Property.—There are fourteen short clauses in this act, which will take effect from Tuesday next, the 31st inst. In future, deeds not to "indented" at the top, as they have been from time immemorial The following is the provision on the subject:—Section 11. "That it shall not be necessary in any case to have a deed indented; and that any person not being a party to any deed, may take an immediate benefit under it, in the same manner as he might under a deed poll." By another clause, it is provided, "That the bona fide payment to and the receipt of any person to whom any money shall be payable upon any express or implied trust, or for any limited purpose, or of the survivors or survivor of two or more mortgagees, or holders, or the executors or administrators of such survivor, or their or his assigns, shall effectually discharge the person paying the same, from seeing to the application, or being answerable for the misapplication thereof, unless the contrary shall be expressly declared by the instrument creating the trust or security."

Christmas Fare in London.—So fine a show of poultry, game, and meat has not been seen at Christmas for many years as was on Monday exhibited in the markets and at the retail dealers. The supply of cattle at Smithfield market on Monday week was larger and finer than the salesmen had had for twenty years, but in consequence of the then "muggy" state of the weather, it was, in every sense, a very dull market. Between that and the next sale day, on Friday, the weather had entirely changed, and the beasts went off at good prices, the butchers being ready buyers for their Christmas stock. The appearance of the frost still continuing, led to a very large supply being sent to the markets on Monday. In Leadenhall market there was an excellent show of poultry, especially turkeys and geese, the former fetching from 7s. 6d. to 30s. for very large ones, and geese averaging 6s. to 8s. There were also a great number of hares. The meat generally appeared of fine quality, and sirloins were sold at 9d. and 10d. per lb. Newgate market was very well supplied, and so was Hungerford, where, perhaps, the prices were a shade lower. In Hungerford the geese were piled up outside some of the shops, and good ones could be bought for 6s. or 7s. Most of the principal butchers at the West-end had very large shows of meat. The coaches were loaded for several days with the good things for Christmas festivity, especially from Norfolk and Suffolk.

EVENING MELODIES.—III.

Hush! 'tis an angel's name,
That word you almost breath'd!
Talk ye of those whom Fame
Hath deathless chaplets wreath'd:
Of the monarch, who hath made
Our love her brightest crown;
Of the conqueror, who hath laid
His sword in triumph down;
Of the statesman, sworn to seek,
In all, his country's bliss;
These were fit things to speak,
In a joyous hour like this!

But not of her laid low,
The fair one past away!
There is ONE name, we know,
We must not lightly say:
And in hours when mirth and song
Are every moment new,
Would it not come of wrong
To name HIS angels too?
They have no ills to lure,
No cares to dim their brow;
Hush! they are far too pure
For us to speak of now!

Yet when there's no one here,
When song and mirth are o'er,
And if Heaven's not more near,
We feel its nearness more;
When humble thoughts subdue,
And earthly hopes are still'd,
And we only wish to do,
And be what HE hath willed;
Ye may name her softly then!
And when your musings cease,
Go ye forth better men,
For that holy hour of peace!

THE COLDEST DAY OF THE WINTER.

Mr. Murphy, the weather prophet, predicts that Wednesday, the 8th January, will be the coldest day of the season. He does not agree with M. Arago as to the probable severity and duration of the winter.

SIR ASTLEY COOPER'S CHILBLAIN LINAMENT.

Take of camphorated spirit of wine one ounce; solution of the subacetate of lead half an ounce. Mix, and apply in the usual way.

STRANGE EFFECTS OF COLD.

A young American, who is travelling in Europe, gravely announces, in a letter, that Professor Van Grusselbach, of Stockholm, has brought to a state of perfection the art of producing a torpor in the system by the application of cold, of degrees of intensity proceeding from less to greater, so as to cause the human body to become perfectly torpid, in which state it may remain for 100 or 1000 years, and then be awakened to a new existence.

A MONSTER ELECTRICAL MACHINE.

A hydro-electric machine of the most extraordinary and unprecedented power is now being constructed for the United States. It will be able to produce a spark of 36 inches, to coat 3500 feet of metallic surface, in a battery of 48 Leyden jars, of two feet high by 10 inches in diameter. This shock would kill 1000 men in an instant, if it were passed through such a chain! The name of this Leviathan machine is to be the "Benjamin Franklin." [Brother Jonathan is not easily alarmed, but such a machine as this seems calculated to give him a shock.]

THE FATTENING OF GEESE.

At the recent sitting of the Paris Academy of Sciences, M. Persoz made a communication upon some various experiments he had made for the fattening of geese. A hundred modes of fattening geese have been conceived, but most of those who have engaged in the speculation have been of opinion that it was necessary the food should contain the elements of fat to be eliminated by the goose in the process of digestion. M. Persoz is of a differrnt opinion. He contends that it is of no consequence whether the food be of the kind alluded to or not, as the goose, he says, forms in the process of the digestion fat from any food, if it contain a certain portion of azote.

PRINCE ALBERT AT COLLEGE.

In a recently published work, which contains some particulars of the college life of Prince Albert, the writer says that while the Prince was at the University of Bonn, he was particularly distinguished from all other students of the same rank for the salutary habit of early rising, one which he had uniformly persevered in from his boyhood. The Prince generally rose about half-past five o'clock in the morning, and never prolonged his repose after six. From that hour up to seven in the evening, he assiduously devoted his whole time to his studies, with the exception of an interval of three hours, which he allowed himself for dinner and recreation. At seven he usually went out, and paid visits to those individuals or families who were honoured with his acquaintance.

ON LIFE, SLEEP, AND DEATH.

M. Raphael de Zetof, of St. Petersburg, lately presented a memoir on this subject, in which he indicates a method to prevent burying a person prematurely. As soon as all hopes are lost, the corpse must be placed in a glass coffin; the cover being fixed on by a substance through which the air can penetrate, an opening must be made at each extremity, so as to permit galvanism to be employed, and it is only some time after doing this that the body ought to be buried

A VOICE FROM THE BAKEHOUSE.

A good baker should grow his own mutton. This is easily done by placing your customers' legs in a row, according to sizes. Having purchased the smallest leg you can find, change it for one of the bakings which is a little larger; that again should take the place of the next bulkier joint, and so on until you arrive at the largest. You can then walk off with your leg. A good crop of baked taters may be got by digging one out of each customer's dish.—Punch.

CHRISTMAS DAY.—THE NATIVITY.

The place of nativity at Bethlehem is many feet below ground, where massy silver lamps are kept constantly illuminated. The precise place where the Son of God appeared in obscurity is marked by a star of marble, encircled with an inscription, and the manger where he was cradled in obscurity is scooped in an adjoining rock, that originally belonged to "an inn."—Dr. Rae Wilson's Travels in the East..

THE CURE OF CONSUMPTION.

A very curious case has been published of an operation for the cure of consumption, by the perforation of the cavity of the lung through the walls of the chest. It consists in making an opening between the ribs into the cavity which forms in the lung during the latter stages of consumption. The immediate effects of the operation (which requires only a few seconds for its performance, and which causes but slight pain) in the case in question was the diminution of the frequency of the patient's pulse, which fell in 24 hours from 120 to 68; freedom of respiration, which had been a very distressing symptom; loss of cough and expectoration, both of which had been very severe. This operation, which has established the possibility of curing this hitherto fatal disease, appears to have been completely successful; the report of the condition of the patient a month after its performance being, that he was rapidly regaining his flesh and strength.

THE KINGDOM OF BOKHARA.

The Baron de Bode has recently translated the Russian work of Khanikoff, in which some interesting particulars are mentioned of Bokhara. The government of Bokhara is absolute, or only limited by the Koran and the commentaries upon it. The administration is in tha hands of the clergy. M. Khanikoff calculates that there are nearly 200 colleges for youth in the Khanat, attended by from 15,000 to 16,000 students. In all of them, however, the education is almost exclusively theological. The number of elementary schools, where children are taught to read and write, is said to be ten times as great, and to be attended by from 150,000 to 160,000 children, or nearly one-sixteenth of the whole population.

EXTRAORDINARY LONGEVITY.

There is at present a man at work on the Hungerford Bridge who, as a boy, witnessed the laying of its first stone. He is in possession of all his faculties.

A ROYAL BARON.

The baron of beef which was served at the Royal table, at Windsor, on Christmas Day, was a portion of an extraordinary Scotch ox, fed by the Archbishop of York, at Nuneham, Oxfordshire. It was of the enormous weight of 179 pounds, and measured 3 feet 6 inches in length, and 2 feet 11 inches in width.

HINT TO LOVERS OF FLOWERS.

A most beautiful and easily-attained show of evergreens in winter may be had by a very simple plan, which has been found to answer remarkably well on a small scale. If geranium leaves (branches?) are taken from healthy and luxuriant trees, just before the winter sets in, cut as for slips, and immersed in soap and water, they will, after drooping for a few days, shed their leaves, put forth fresh ones, and continue in the finest vigour all the winter. By placing a number of bottles thus filled in flower-baskets, with moss to conceal the bottles, a show of evergreens is easily ensured for a whole season. They require no fresh water.

LORD NELSON AS A POLITICAL ECONOMIST.

It will probably be news to some persons to know that Lord Nelson employed his leisure hours in statistics; but it appears from his Despatches and Letters that he once drew up an account of the earnings and expenses of a labourer in Norfolk with a wife and three children, supposing that he is not to be one day kept from labour in the whole year, and he proved that from the wages then paid the earnings were for food not quite twopence a-day for each person, "and to drink nothing but water, for beer our poor labourers never taste, unless they are tempted, which is too often the case, to go to the ale-house." The same kindly consideration for the working man, whether afloat or ashore, is discernible in Nelson's treatment of the Norfolk labourers, which beamed through his pithy warning to a newly-appointed purser—"Now, mind, sir, I will not have my poor fellows stinted."

COUNTRY NEWS.

A London Thief Captured at Aylesbury.—A man named William Evans, alias Charles Hensler, who is supposed to have been concerned in several extensive robberies in London, has been apprehended under singular circumstances by police-constable Cornaby, at Aylesbury. The prisoner, previously to being taken before the sitting magistrates, admitted to the constable that he had been a party to three burglaries in the metropolis, one at a silversmith's shop in Oxford-street, another at a watchmaker's, in Long-acre, and the third at Messrs. Hitchcock and Rogers's, linendrapers, in St. Paul's-churchyard. When taken before the magistrates he made the following statement, to which he affixed his name:—"I broke into a shop at the bottom of Oxford-street, and tied up a quantity of silver teapots, watches, and spoons, in a sheet or table-cloth. After we had tied them up, the police came from behind the screen. One got hold of my companion, and one hold of me. My companion took up a piece of iron, and knocked the policeman down. He then took a knife from a shelf and he swore he would murder him. I saw the policeman put his hand over his throat, and cut his knuckles two or three times. The policeman who had hold of me opened the shop door and called out for assistance. I then had a desperate struggle with him, and I made my escape by running down Oxford-street." The prisoner was remanded, in order that the necessary evidence might be forthcoming. It appeared from the testimony of the Policeman Cornaby, that the prisoner applied to him at the station-house, on the preceding evening, to procure him a lodging for the night at the workhouse; but from some suspicions on the part of the constable as to the real character of the applicant, the man was detained, and he then confessed that he had been engaged in several burglaries in London, and that he was anxious to tell the truth and give himself up to justice.

Lamentable Accident at the Windsor Theatre.—A most unfortunate accident took place at the Windsor Theatre on Monday evening to Mrs. Sarah Hume, 63 years of age, the wife of a journeyman cutler, residing at Eton, who met with her death by falling over the gallery into the pit. At the inquest, which was held on Tuesday at the Crown and Cushion, before John Parton, Esq., the following evidence was given relative to the accident. Mr. William Moss, surgeon, of Windsor, deposed as follows:—About seven o'clock last evening I was sent for to the theatre to see Mrs. Hume, who had fallen out of the gallery into the pit below. I found her on the stage, placed on a stretcher, and quite insensible. At that time she had a small, weak, tremulous pulse, and was barely alive. I ordered her to be conveyed to her home at Eton, whither I accompanied her, and on arriving there she was quite dead. Upon examining the body I found a most severe fracture of the spine; there was an entire separation of the bones of the vertebræ. The left leg was also fractured just above the ancle. The injury to the spine I consider to have been the cause of death. Her back had evidently been broken by the body falling across the benches in the pit. William Hume, husband of the deceased, stated that upon being met on the gallery stairs by his daughter, who told him of the accident, he rushed down into the pit, where he found his wife lying on her back across the benches. A board was brought to him, upon which the body was placed and taken on to the stage. The performances had not then begun. Mr. Moss was almost immediately afterwards in attendance. The deceased was perfectly sober and in good spirits. There was no person in the pit at the time the accident occurred.—Samuel Southgate, leader of the orchestra, stated that on going into the orchestra, to place the music, he heard the sound of somebody stumbling in the gallery, and a cry of "Oh!" and that on looking up he saw a female fall over. In her descent she turned once round, and fell on her back into the pit. Her back rested on one seat and her head and feet on two others. The pit was empty at the time.—The jury returned a verdict of "Accidental death;" and stated that they wished Mr. Reeves, the lessee of the theatre, would cause a rail to be erected in front of the gallery, to prevent, for the future, similar fatal accidents."

Fire at a Cotton Factory near Manchester.—On Monday morning a fire took place at the factory occupied by Messrs. Waterhouse and Co., cotton-spinners, Temple-street, Chorlton-upon-Medlock. The flames were seen issuing from the windows of the second and third stories of a building containing the carding and blowing machinery; the building is four stories high, and runs parallel to a larger erection belonging to the same firm. Appearances for some time were very alarming; but water having been quickly obtained, the flames were in about an hour completely extinguished. The building, which belongs to the firm, is of fire-proof construction, and has not received any considerable damage. The principal damage was to the cotton on the premises, a considerable quantity of which was consumed, and other portions sustained damage from the water used in extinguishing the fire.

The Criminals Condemned at the Suffolk Assizes.—An order for the execution of Mary Sheming, the unfortunate woman who is under sentence of death in the county gaol, Ipswich, for poisoning her grandchild at Martlesham, arrived on Monday morning. It is to take place on Tuesday next, the 31st inst. We understand that an earnest petition was on Monday night forwarded from the competent authorities to Sir James Graham, praying that the execution of Mary Sheming may be stayed until the 25th of January, so that the town may be spared the pain of two executions; and there is, we believe, every reason to hope that the prayer of the petition will be vouchsafed by her most gracious Majesty. The judge, by the same post, sent a respite for William Howell, Walter Howell, and Israel Shipley, who are in the same place under sentence of death for the murder of M'Fadden, until the 25th of January.

Another Double Suicide.—The village of Ashford, a short distance from Staines, has been the scene of another double suicide. A man named William Oliver, and his wife and family, consisting of several children, occupied a miserable cottage by the road side near Ashford. The woman was in the habit of vending lucifer matches, and the children were sent out to beg. The family had been in great distress, and were receiving relief from the parish of Isleworth. On Tuesday morning, William Oliver, one of the sons, came to a neighbour's house in a state of alarm, and said that his father and mother were very ill, and the person to whom he applied immediately went for Mr. Richardson, the overseer, and accompanied him to the miserable hut occupied by the family, where a dreadful scene presented itself—the woman lying upon the bed quite dead, and her husband in the agonies of death by her side. Mr. Curtis, the medical officer of the union, soon attended, and did all that was possible to alleviate the sufferings of the man, but without avail, as he expired almost immediately. The wife was undressed and lying nearly on her face in bed. The man was partly dressed. The room presented an appearance of the most wretched poverty; all the covering for the wretched parents and their children was a few rags. There was not a chair in the apartment, and the only article in the room was an old saucepan that had apparently contained coke to warm the room. The cause of this double death is believed to have been poison. The constable who was called in found a piece of paper which contained some white powder, believed to be arsenic, which has been taken away for medical examination. On a further search, the constable found one penny and a small quantity of bread and bacon, which the little boy William said his father wished him to eat in the night, and awoke him for that purpose, but he would not do so. There is some reason to believe that there was an intention on the part of one or other of the unhappy deceased persons to destroy the whole family, for another child, Eliza, had evidently partaken of some noxious ingredient, as she was very ill when the surgeon was called in, and exhibited all the appearances of having taken poison, although she is now out of danger, and is, with her brother, in the union-house. It is supposed from the position in which the man was found, that he had got up and partly dressed himself, with the intention of leaving the room, but he had sunk down in the attempt. Both the deceased were dreadfully sick.

Burglary in Warwickshire.—A burglary of a very daring character was committed during the night of Tuesday last, in the residence of Miss Chambers, of Radway, near Kingston, on the borders of Warwickshire and Worcestershire. The villians, who were three in number, with blackened faces and armed with pistols, having made a forcible entrance into the house, two of them proceeded to Miss Chambers's apartment, whilst the third kept watch at the stair-foot door leading to the apartments of the servants, who were disturbed, and whose brains he threatened to blow out if they made any noise. The same threat was made to Miss Chambers by the two who entered the room; they then proceeded to rifle the house, and carried off cash, plate, and other property to a considerable amount.

SCOTLAND.

Fearful Accident.—The Kelso Chronicle states that a melancholy accident occurred on Tuesday week at Rowanburn, one of the Duke of Buccleuch's coal-pits, Canonbie. John Scott, hind at Deanburnhaugh, on the estate of Hoscoat, having occasion to go to the coals, he was accompanied, for the first time, by his son, a lad about fifteen years of age. On reaching the pit, a little before daybreak, the young lad leaped from the cart, and being cold, it is supposed he was making for a fire which was blazing a little distance from where the carts halted, and not being aware that the mouth of the pit intervened, he ran headlong into the fearful chasm. Some persons who observed the direction the youth was going, called out to take care, but it was too late, he was already on the verge of the abyss, and his motion was too quick to be suddenly restrained; another instant, and he was a mangled corpse.

The Fog at Glasgow.—Yesterday (Friday) week Glasgow was visited by one of the densest fogs known for many years. During the week the weather was rather broken, till the Thursday night, when the frost set in with great intensity, and on the day following the city was enveloped in a fog so dense that it was scarcely possible to see across some of the streets, and lights had to be used in all places of business. The traffic on the river was entirely suspended—only one steamer, the Invincible, Captain M'Kellar, was able to make way up, after a detention of nearly five hours. We regret to state that three men were drowned at Port Dundas during the fog.

Horrible Occurrence.—On Saturday week the wife of a person named David Monteath, one of the cottars on the farm of Ingleston, in the parish of Irongray, near Dumfries, went to the farm mansion, nearly a quarter of a mile distant, leaving within a child from three to four years of age, and an infant, two months old, in the cradle. During her absence a brood sow entered the dwelling, when the child left with the infant ran out. Its cries soon attracted the notice of the person to whom the sow belonged, who immediately made towards the scene; but she found the sow shaking and tearing the little innocent. No time was lost in rescuing the infant from the savage beast, but before this could be done, its cheeks, neck, and arms were sadly lacerated. A medical gentleman thought the little one would not long survive; but it is still living, though in a very precarious state.

The Debats mentions a report that a M. Turquin has bequeathed to the hospitals of Paris the whole of his property, amounting in value to nine millions of francs.

ABSENTEES.

In our Number of Saturday Nov. 30, we gave a Table, showing the number of Irish resident in the principal towns of Great Britain at the date of the last census; we now give a summary of the respective numbers of Irish, English, Scotch, and Foreigners, who had immigrated to other parts of Great Britain and Ireland, according to the latest official returns:—

Irish resident in England and Wales	289,404

* Of the 8585 persons born in Scotland, but resident in Ireland, 1851 were children, and 2445 of unspecified occupations; 782 were agricultural labourers and 445 domestic servants.

† Of the 21,552 persons born in England and Wales, but resident in Ireland, more than 5000 were children, and 1891 domestic servants, of whom 1273 were females; 800 were agricultural labourers, and 7484 of unspecified occupations. The number having no specified occupation is large, and no doubt consists principally of the children of Irish parents, especially of the independent classes, born during a temporary residence of the latter in England or Scotland, which, if true, goes far to reduce the apparent numbers of English and Scotch living in Ireland.

The Belgian Chamber of Representatives passed the Zollverein treaty, on Saturday last, by a majority of 76 votes to 7, after a stormy debate of eleven days.

The ports of Calais and Boulogne are on the point of coming to a friendly understanding on the subject of the northern railroad. Calais, it says, is ready to concede to Boulogne what it has been demanding for five years, in exchange for the advantage which its competitor, now become its associate, solicits it to accept. Calais assents to the system sustained by Boulogne in 1842—the uniting of all the sea-ports, in consideration of the Amiens and Boulogne Company's continuing that line to Calais, and maintaining the same fares to and from Paris and Calais as to and from Boulogne and Paris.

The Moniteur publishes the returns of the direct trade of France with the Brazils in 1843, the sum total of which amounted to 40,866,000f. In 1842 it had been 38,442,000f. The imports into France, consisting of coffee, hides, cotton, sugars, cocoa, wood, &c., are estimated in those returns at 12,685,000f., and the exports to Brazil at 28,181,000f. The principal articles of export were cotton and silk stuffs, skins, wines, paper, woollen cloth, salt butter, jewellery, mercery, perfumery, linen, &c. The navigation between the two countries employed in 1843, 193 vessels, measuring 4092 tons, 107 of which were French.

A singular circumstance happened a few days ago at Verdun. A soldier of the 64th of the line, having fallen into a lethargy, was taken to the hospital. His death being reported, the adjutant of his company ordered a party of his comrades to go out and attend his funeral, rendering him the usual military honours; but when they arrived at the hospital they found him not only still living, but so far recovered as to be able very shortly to return into their ranks.

We learn by letters from Venice, that the cold there has been intense. The lagoons were frozen, and all communication by water was stopped.

The Berlin and Hamburg railroad, the works on which are already far advanced, will cross Prussia, Mecklenburg, and Denmark. Its great object is to gain for the Zollverein a sea port. Its extent will be about 48 miles English, of which about 33 miles of the embankments are finished.

The Prague Gazette of the 10th inst. contains an official report on the epizootic malady which rages at present in Bohemia, and inspires such lively alarm, not only amongst the agriculturists of Germany, but even of France. The epidemic in question was introduced into Bohemia by some oxen brought from Poland, and destined for the slaughter-house.

Dreadful Accident.—On Monday afternoon, between two and three o'clock, a man, having the appearance of a bricklayer, after ascending a ladder in front of the house No. 26, Chapel-street, Pentonville, for the purpose of doing some repairs upon the roof, and walking a few yards upon the parapet, either suddenly fell, or precipitated himself to the ground. The house is a three-story one. The unfortunate man fell upon his face, and, though not literally killed upon the spot, no hopes can be entertained of his recovery. He was taken up covered with blood, several of his limbs being fractured, and was conveyed to the North London Hospital, Gray's Inn-lane. The name of the man could not be ascertained, but he lived in Howard's-green, City-road. A woman who keeps a fruit stall opposite the house from which he fell, and who says she had her eye fixed upon him at the moment, expresses her firm belief that he threw himself off, but this must be considered doubtful.

Christmas Charity to the Poor.—We are happy to state that the claims of the poor and wretched have not been forgotten during this season. The daily papers contain accounts of the Christmas fare given to the inmates of the workhouses, from which it appears 40,000 persons at least were regaled on Christmas-day with old English fare. Eight hundred families in the neighbourhood of Hampton-court, Hampton, New Hampton, and Teddington, receive, by the kind charity of her Majesty the Queen Dowager, three pounds of beef and two quartern loaves each every Christmas. This welcome gift was distributed on Tuesday. Her Majesty's royal charities of five shillings each to upwards of nine hundred poor and aged persons, were distributed on Monday and Tuesday, under the orders of the Lord High Almoner, the Lord Archbishop of York, and of the Sub-Almoner, the Venerable Archdeacon S. Wilberforce. In consequence of the great severity of the cold, the distributions were extended to a greater number of persons than usual. The Royal-gate alms were distributed at the same time to one hundred and sixty-eight persons, who received thirteen shillings each. On Tuesday, in pursuance of the will of the late Major Wright, of the Tower Hamlets Volunteers, the trustees commenced the distribution of 200 four-pound loaves, and 100 eight-pound pieces of beef, at the parish church of St. George's-in-the-East, to the industrious and deserving poor of the parish, whose characters could bear investigation. Many instances are mentioned of donations to the poor in different parts of the country, by persons in affluence.

Destructive Fire.—On Wednesday (Christmas-day) morning, about half-past three o'clock, a fire was discovered by the police-constable on the beat, raging in the extensive workshops belonging to Mr. Michael Mahoney, cabinet-maker, 31, High-street, Hoxton Old Town. Information of the occurrence was without delay furnished to the several engine stations, and in a very short space of time five brigade engines and the West of England were on the spot. The one from Whitecross-street and another from Jeffery's-square, under the direction of Mr. Crookland, were speedily got to work; and an abundant supply of water from the mains of the New River Company being readily furnished, the fire was confined to the building in which it originated. Before it was extinguished, however, the whole of the workshops, forty feet long by sixteen broad, with the contents and roof, were destroyed. Fortunately, the building was detached, or the damage would have been still more serious, from the great body of fire in the building, and the great heat of the walls during the fire. The premises are insure in the West of England office. The origin of the fire is unknown.

THE MARKETS.

Corn Exchange (Friday).—Owing to the thick weather and contrary winds, we continue to be very scantily supplied with all descriptions of grain, consequently, very little business is doing in any article. To-day scarcely any English wheat was on show, and the few sales effected in it were at prices fully equal to those obtained on Monday. In free foreign wheat a fair business was doing, at late rates. There were a few runs of barley on sale, by land-carriage samples, and which were held at full prices. The trade, however, was by no means brisk. Scarcely any oats at market; these, as well as beans and peas, were unaltered in value.

Arrivals.—English: wheat, 2470; barley, 1920; oats, 1490, quarters. Irish: wheat, ——; barley, ——; oats, —— quarters. Foreign: wheat, ——; barley, ——; oats, ——, quarters. Flour, 2360 sacks. Malt, 3520 quarters.

English.—Wheat, Essex and Kent, red, 39s to 47s; white ditto, 44s to 54s; Norfolk and Suffolk, red, 38s to 43s; ditto, white, 40s to 47s; rye, 37s to 38s; grinding barley, 27s to 32s; distilling, 28s to 32s; malting ditto, 35s to 38s; Lincoln and Norfolk malt, 61s to 62s; brown ditto, 57s to 60s; Kingston and Ware, 63s to 64s; Chevalier, 65s; Yorkshire and Lincolnshire feed oats, 22s to 23s; potatoe ditto, 24s to 25s; Youghal and Cork, black, 21s to 22s; ditto, white, 22s to 23s; tick beans, new, 36s to 37s; ditto, old, 40s to 42s; grey peas 36s to 37s maple, 35s to 37s; white, 36s to 38s; boilers, 38s to 40s, per quarter Town made flour, 45s to —; Suffolk, Stockton, and Yorkshire, 33s to 35s, per 28 lbs Foreign.—Fine wheat, 38s to 54s; Dantzig, red, 40s to 47s; white, 42s to 49s. In Bond.—Barley, 27s to 29s; oats, 17s to 18s; ditto, feed, 15s to 17s; beans, 24s to 29s; peas, 28s to 32s, per quarter. Flour, Canadian, 21s to —; Baltic, 20s to —, per barrel.

The Seed Market.—Linseed cakes have commanded a very active inquiry, at fully the late advance in their quotations. In other kinds of seeds comparatively little has been doing. The following are the present rates:—Linseed cakes, English, £12 to £13; ditto, foreign, £7 12s to £8 10s, per 1000.

Bread.—The prices of wheaten bread, in the metropolis, are from 7d to 7½d; of household ditto, 5½d to 6½d, per 4lbs. loaf.

Imperial Weekly Average.—Wheat, 45s 3d; barley, 34s 2d; oats, 21s 10d; rye, 32s 0d beans, 35s 11d; peas, 35s 4d.

Six Weeks Average that governs Duty.—Wheat, 45s 6d; barley, 34s 11d; oats, 21s 9d; rye, 32s 1d; beans, 37s 6d; peas, 35s 11d.

Duties on Foreign Corn.—Wheat, 20s; barley, 4s; oats, 6s; rye, 10s. 6d; beans, 5s 6d; peas, 7s 6d.

Colonial Produce.—In consequence of the markets being closed for the holidays, we have no transactions to report in Colonial produce, such as tea, sugar, coffee, &c. Prices, therefore, must be considered nominal.

Wool.—The imports of both foreign and Colonial wool continue very trifling. In the absence of public sales, the best combing qualities are in request, and prices are supported in every instance.

Potatoes.—The supplies offering at the water-side are small, owing to which advanced rates have been paid for most qualities—they now range from 65s to 80s per ton.

Oils.—Linseed oil is in good request, at 6d to 9d per cwt. more money. In other kinds of oil comparatively little is doing, without any material alteration in value.

Provisions.—Both Irish and foreign butter, in consequence of the limited state of the arrivals, is in fair request, at full prices. Lard, hams, and bacon, are selling steadily, at late currencies. In other kinds of provisions very little is doing.

Tallow.—The stock of tallow still continues large, yet rather more business is doing in the article, and prices are supported in every instance.

Hay and Straw.—Coarse meadow hay, £3 10s to £4 15s; useful ditto, £4 16s to £5 4s fine upland ditto, £5 5s to £5 10s; clover hay, £4 10s to £6 0s; oat straw, £1 14s to £1 16s; wheat straw, £1 16s to £1 18s, per load.

Hops (Friday).—Notwithstanding the supply of hops on offer is but limited, the demand continues extremely inactive, at almost nominal figures. 1844's: Sussex pockets, £7 to £8 5s; Wealds, £6 18s to £8 0s; Mid Kent, £8 0s to £10 15s; East Kent, £7 7s to £8 0s; Choice ditto, £10 0s to £12 0s; Farnhams, £10 0s to £10 10s.

Coals (Friday.)—Carr's Hartley, 25s; Old Pontop, 21s; West Wylam, 25s; Bewicke and Co., 27s 6d; Eden Main, 26s; Lambton's Primrose, 25s; Caradoc, 26s per ton.

Smithfield (Friday).—This being a holiday market, the supply of beasts offering this morning, was very limited, but fully equal to meet the wants of the butchers. In prices, we have no variation to notice from those obtained on Monday. The numbers of sheep were small, yet the sale for them was in a sluggish state, at unaltered figures. Prime smal calves sold freely, at very full prices; but in other kinds of veal, next to nothing was doing. The pork trade was firm, and the currencies were supported without difficulty. Milch cows sold slowly, at from £16 to £19 each.

Per 8lbs to sink the offal:—Coarse and inferior beasts, 2s 8d to 2s 10d; second quality do., 3s 0d to 3s 6d; prime large oxen, 3s 8d to 3s 10d; prime Scots, &c., 4s 0d to 4s 4d; coarse and inferior sheep, 2s 10d to 3s 4d; second quality ditto, 3s 6d to 3s 8d: prime coarse woolled sheep, 3s 10d to 4s 0d; prime Southdown ditto, 4s 2d to 4s 4d; large coarse calves, 3s 4d to 3s 10d; prime small ditto, 4s 0d to 4s 6d; large hogs, 3s 0d to 3s 6d; small porkers, 3s 8d to 4s 0d; sucking calves, 18s to 30s; and quarter old store pigs, 16s to 20s each. Beasts, 492; cows, 141; sheep, 2100; calves, 54; pigs, 287.

Newgate and Leadenhall (Friday).—The supplies of meat on sale to-day were by no means large, yet the trade was in a very sluggish state, and prices were barely supported:—Per 8lbs by the carcass:—Inferior beef, 2s 6d to 2s 10d; middling ditto, 3s 0d to 3s 2d; prime large ditto, 3s 4d to 3s 6d; ditto small ditto, 3s 6d to 3s 8d; large pork, 2s 8d to 3s 4d; inferior mutton, 2s 8d to 2s 10d; middling ditto, 3s 0d to 3s 4d; prime ditto, 3s 6d to 3s 8d; veal, 3s 4d to 4s 4d; small pork, 3s 6d to 4s 0d. MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

The amount of transactions in the English market, during the week, have been on rather an extensive scale, and the tendency to advance, that was perceptible on Monday, was confirmed as the week progressed. Consols have ranged from 100⅛ to ¼ (the closing price of Monday), to 100⅝ to ½, for the Opening, ex. dividend. Bank Stock also quotes an improvement, closing at 210½. The Exchequer market has again advanced, and the last quotation is 64 to 66; Three per Cent. Reduced, closes at 100⅝ to ⅞; New Three and a quarter per Cents., 103⅝; Long Annuities, 12½; India Bonds, 82.

A correspondence relative to Columbian Bonds has occupied the attention of many of the members of the Foreign House during the week. Mr. G. R. Robinson, the Chairman of the Committee of Spanish American Bondholders, wrote, on the 11th of October last, to the Earl of Aberdeen, relative to certain sums of money, set apart by the Government of New Grenada, and remitted here, from time to time, for the express purpose of paying the foreign debt. M. Mosquira the Chargé d'Affaires for New Grenada having declined to communicate to Mr. Robinson the amount of these sums he has on hand, it was hoped that he might be more communicative to the Earl of Aberdeen, and consequently that nobleman was urged to make the application. M. Mosquira, however, only replies to his lordship as he had replied to the request of the Chairman of the Spanish American bondholders, "refusing the request, because their committee took part with a commercial house in London in disposing arbitrarily of various sums of money which ought to have been handed over to him for the purpose of increasing the funds devoted to the extinction of the debt." To this the Committee rejoin that the affair has been misstated, but the chance of procuring the information appears to be as remote ae ever.

The Market has been unusually active in the course of the week. Spanish has advanced to 27⅞ for the Active. The Three per Cents., 38½. The purchases have, of course, been speculative, but have been generally made by influential principals. The other foreign bonds have been buoyant. Portuguese has, however, slightly yielded to sales for realising, but closes firmly at 60¾ to ½; Peruvian quotes, 29½ to 30, Venezuela Two per Cents. are 44¾; Dutch is a point worse, closing at 64½ for the Two-and-a-Half per Cents. Four per Cent Certificates, 97⅞.

The Share Market has in some measure partaken of the buoyancy of the other markets, and prices have in a few instances improved. Business, however, on the newly proposed lines has somewhat decreased. The closing quotations of the week are:—Birmingham and Gloucester, 97; Bristol and Gloucester, 40; Charnet Valley, 3¾; Edinbrugh and Glassgow, 61½; Great North of England, 130; Great Western, 150; Brightons', 51; Croydon, 17¾; Manchester and Leeds, 122; Manchester and Birmingham, 52¼; Midlands', 114; Dovers', 40; Trent Valley, 10¼; Yarmouth and Norwich, 27; York and North Midland, 103; Boulogne and Amiens, 5; Orleans and Bordeaux, 8; Rouen and Havre, 23; Sheffield and Manchester, 97; Sheffield and Lincoln, 18s.; Paris and Orleans, 43¾; Paris and Rouen, 41½.

Saturday Morning.—The Consols Market was firm yesterday, and the Speech of the King of the French gave a slight impetus to prices. Consols closed at 100½ ⅝ for the Opening Ex-Dividend. The Foreign Market was a shade worse in consequence of sales.—The Share Market was very active yesterday, Blackwall's advancing to 7⅝, and Bristol and Gloucester to 42. The new lines have not been much dealt in.

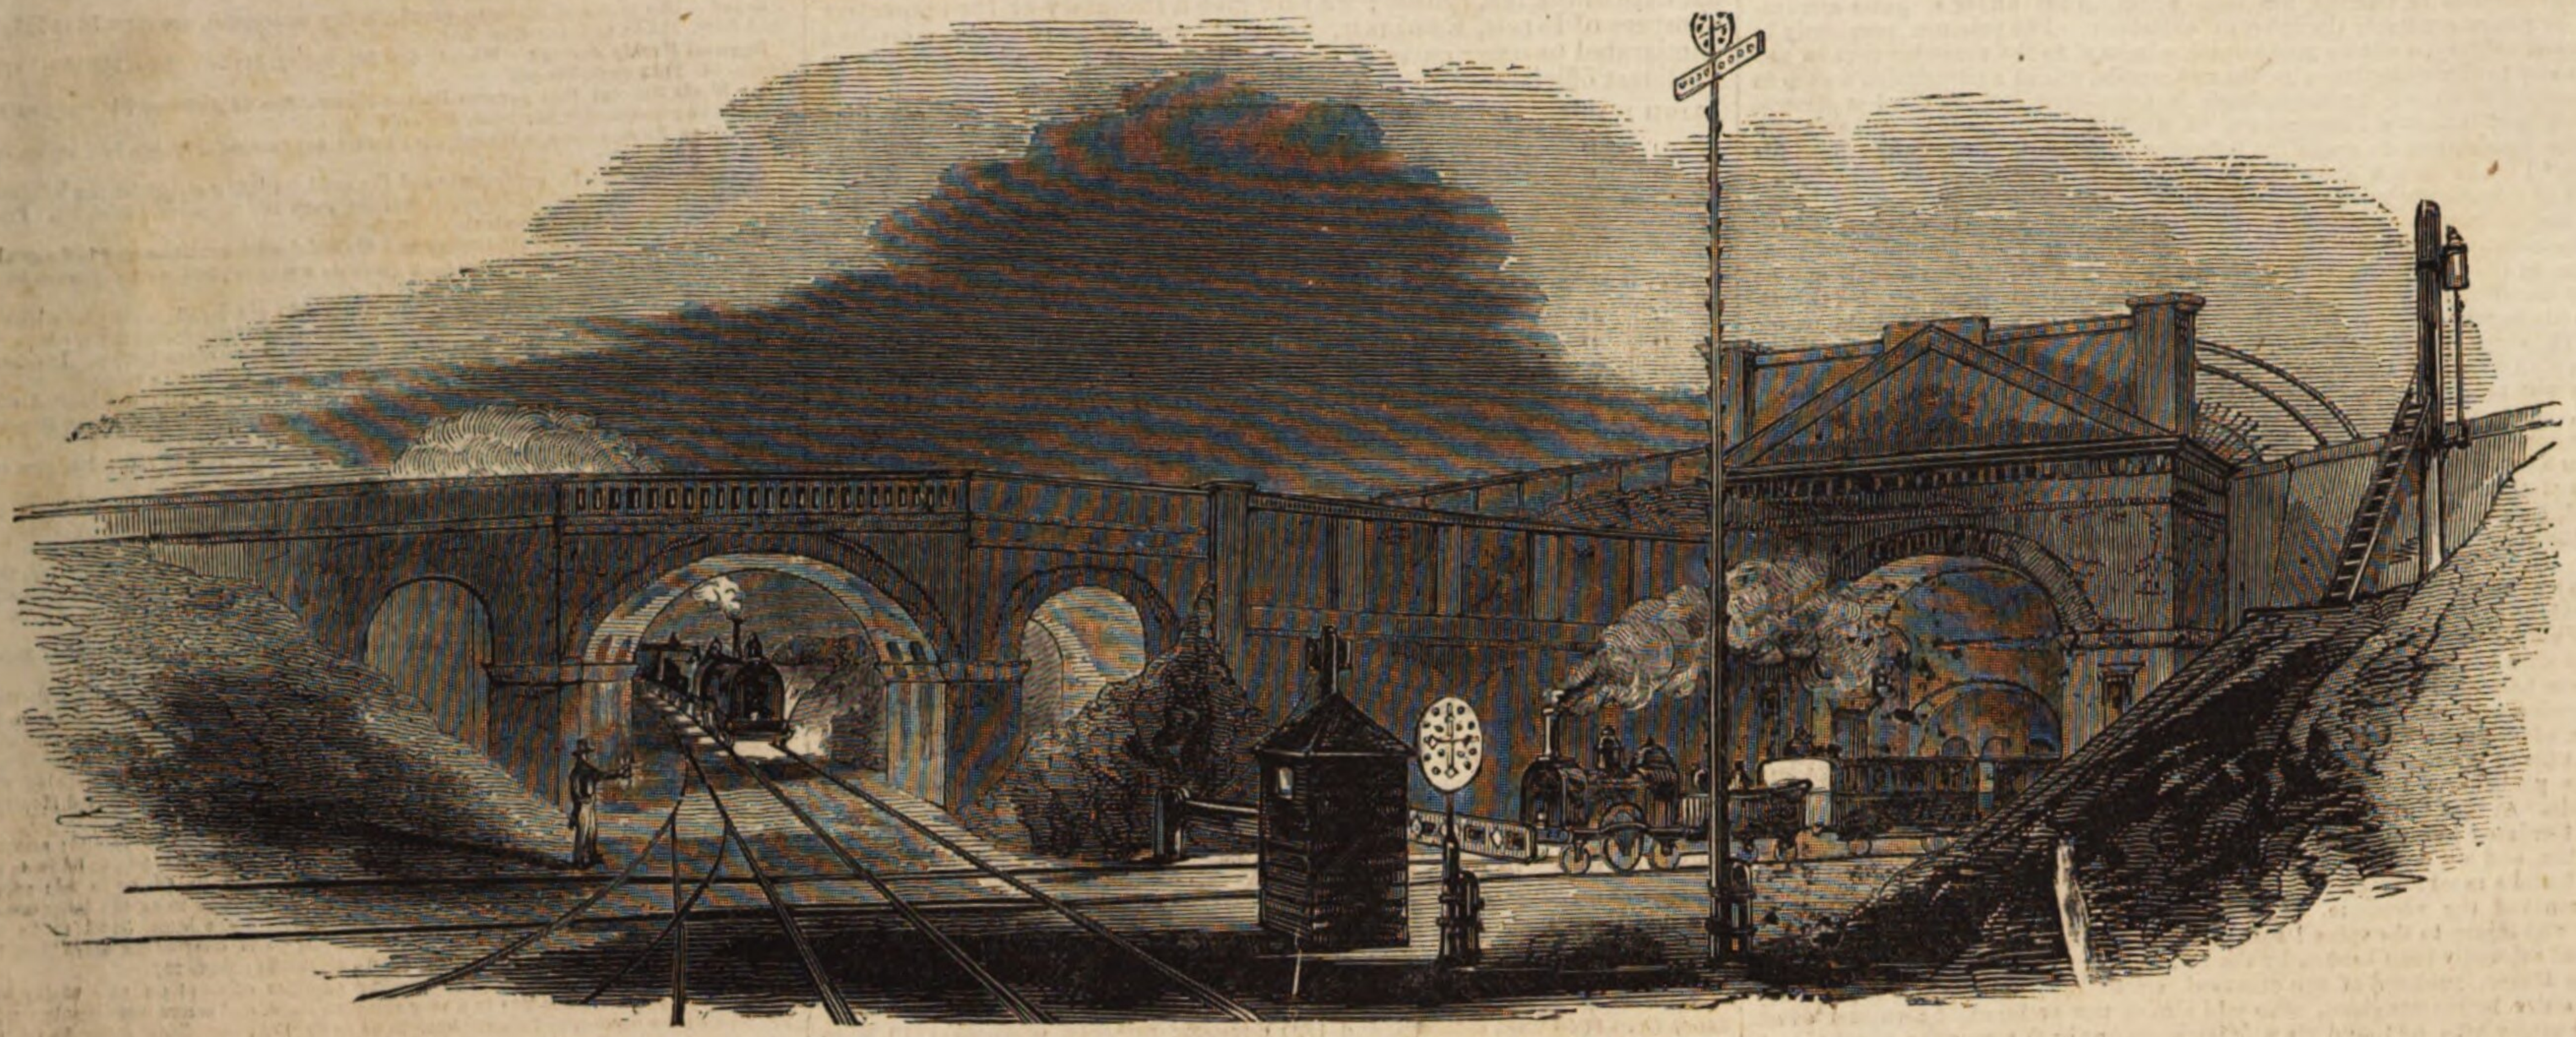
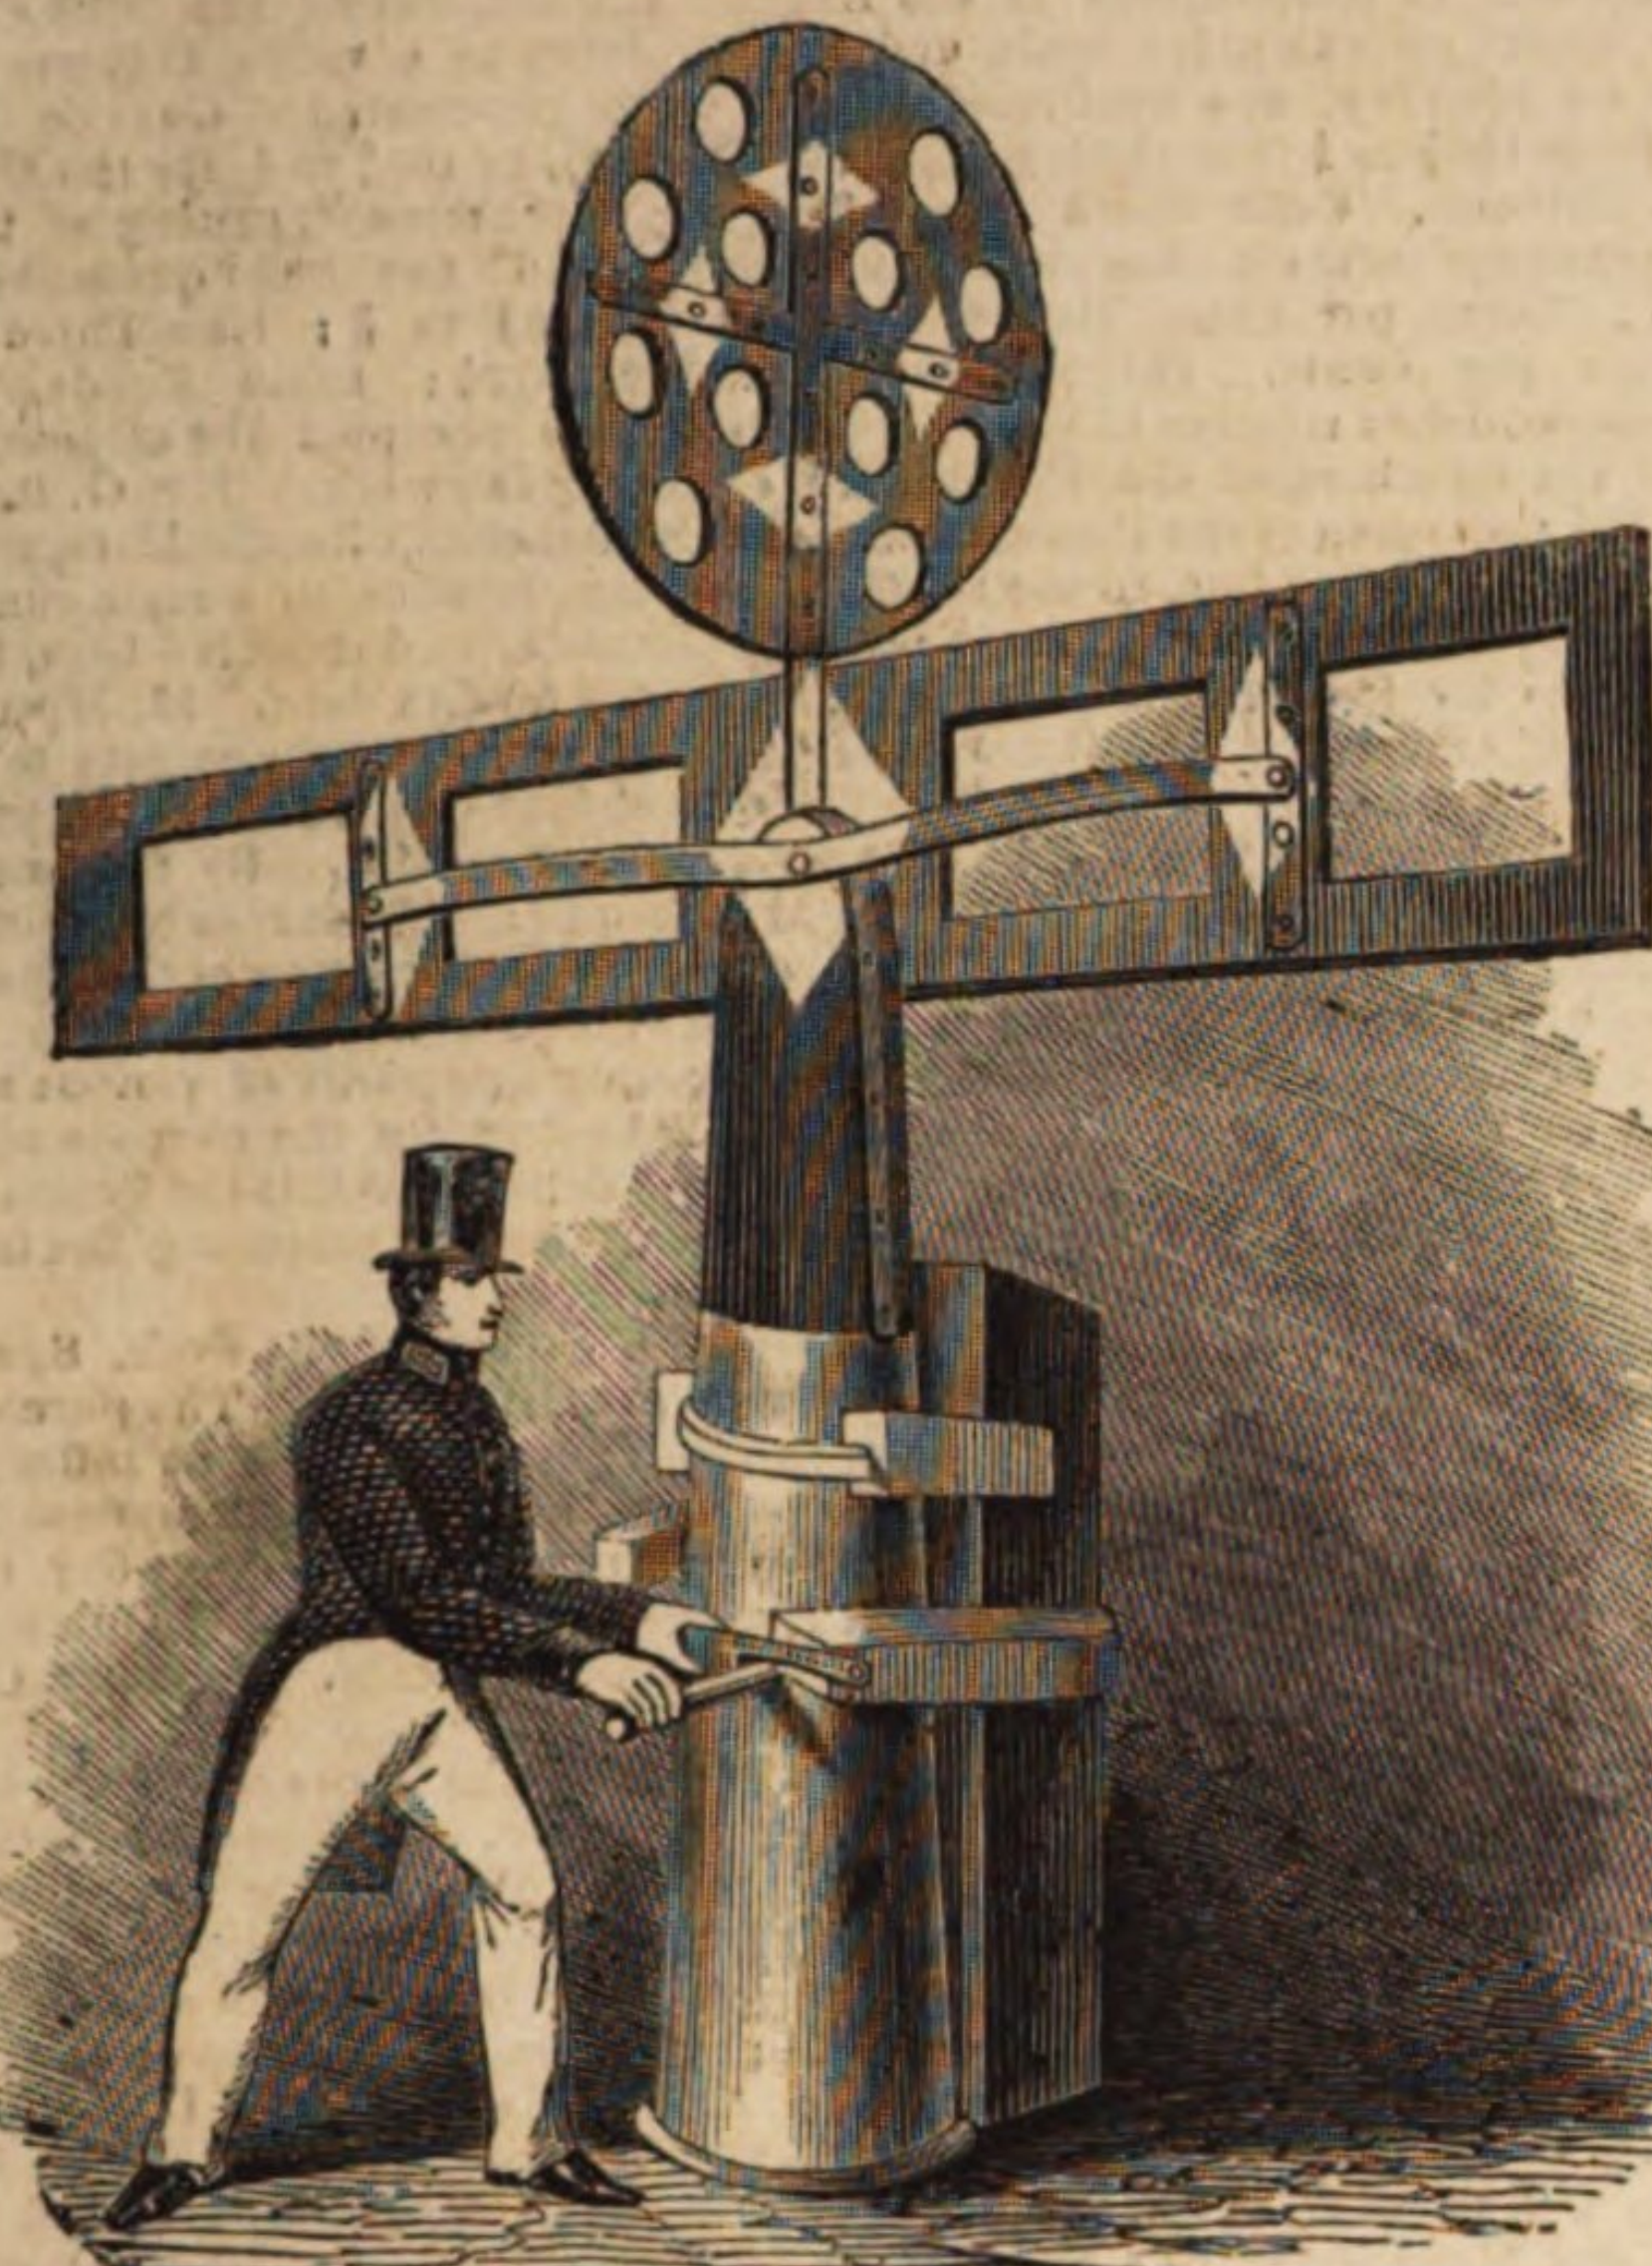
RAILWAY SIGNALS



JUNCTION OF THE GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY WITH THE LONDON

We resume the important subject of Railway Signals, by an exhibition of those in use on the Great Western Railway. They consist of—



JUNCTION SIGNAL POST.

I. Line signals. These are divided into day and night signals.

1. Day: The line signals, during day, are performed by the arms of the policemen or servants in attendance. The signal "All Right" consists in holding the right arm in a horizontal position, pointing across the line of rails on which the train is proceeding. See our engraving. The Caution signal to "Slacken Speed" is shown by the policeman facing the approaching train: one arm being held straight up as high as he can. See cut. The Danger signal "to Stop" is shown by the policeman facing the approaching train, and holding both arms straight up as high as he can.

STATION SIGNAL "ALL RIGHT."

2. Night: The line signals during night are given by means of coloured lights. To make the announcement "All Right" to an approaching train, the white light of a lamp is held steadily facing it, and as it passes by, the lamp is moved round, so that the light may continue to fall upon the engine. Great care is taken to keep the light steady, in order that it may not be mistaken for any other signal. The Caution signal "to Slacken Speed," is indicated in a similar manner, by the green glass of the lamp being turned on and shown as before mentioned. The Danger signal "to Stop," is shown in the same way, by the red glass of the lamp being turned on. In the absence of a red light, the violent waving of a light horizontally indicates danger.

The carriages are provided with red and green lamps; the red ones are placed at the rear of the carriages, and can only be seen by persons standing behind the train. The green ones are placed in front: they consequently denote the approach of a train. Locomotive engines moving without a train show the same lights.

II. STATION, TUNNEL, AND GATE SIGNALS. 1. Day. The signal "All Right" is indicated by a round board, placed on the top of a high mast, and having its face turned to the line. The holes pierced in it are merely for the purpose of making it more clearly distinguishable at a distance. Our small cut, in the first column, shows its form. The "Caution" signal, "to Slacken Speed," is shown by a Green Painted Board, pointing from the rails on the left-hand side of the train. The tall cut, in the second column, shows it in operation. The signal "To Stop" is shown by a cross-bar, placed beneath the round board before mentioned, and at right angles with it, so that in working it, when the cross bar is visible, the round board having only its edge towards the driver, is invisible. The same signal is also made by a red painted board pointing to the rails.

2. Night: The signal "All Right" is shown by a White lamp fixed on a staff in some place sufficiently conspicuous to be easily seen by an approaching train. The "Caution" signal to "Slacken Speed," is indicated by a Green Lamp, shown in the same way. The "Danger" signal "To Stop," is indicated by a Red Lamp shown in the same way.

III. JUNCTION SIGNALS.—These are of immense importance. A moment's inattention to them, on the passage of a couple of trains, might involve them both in common ruin. Perhaps this fearful truth is nowhere more strongly exemplified than at the point on which the West London Branch crosses the Great Western Railway. The cut at the head of this article exhibits the junction of these two lines, and it will be seen that they meet at right angles, and in fact cross each other in "point blank" directions. To prevent collisions, the following signals have been contrived; and up to the present time they have, in spite of their very limited range, answered extremely well. Two signal-posts of great size, and conspicuous for their markings and colour, have been placed on the left of the up line, in the angle formed by the junction of the two lines. One of these posts—a very tall one—is devoted to the use of the Great Western Line; and the other—a short one—to the use of the West London. The mode of giving the signals is the same in principle as those already described, but, in their application, they are so arranged that the one is made to work relatively with the other. Thus, when the full face of the cross bar of the branch post is turned full on the line, giving warning "To Stop," the position of the round board above it gives signal of "All Clear" to the main line, and so on. Meantime the tall post makes its own signal of "All Clear" to the main line, and "Stop" to the branch one. At night these signals are made by lights.

In constructing a signal-post, it is of importance that it should be made of materials strong enough to be beyond the reach of ordinary accidents, and also, that its weight should not be so great as to impede its motion. These conditions are happily combined in the example under consideration. The taller ones are formed of sound pine masts, clamped in some places with iron, and shod with suitable materials to protect them against wet and damp. The turning apparatus consists either of a ball movement, or a swivel, and a simple handle, or compound lever, as the case may require. When a post has been turned to give a signal, it is held in its position by one of a series of hooks which lay hold of it in succession, as the several turns are completed. The notches on the sides of the post enable the policeman on duty to examine it from time to time, with a view to necessary repairs. The smaller posts are formed of slighter materials, but more gaudily painted than the larger ones.

In the management of the signal-men, a strict discipline is observed. On entering the service, they give a bond to "observe and obey" the company's regulations; and in all cases of failure, prompt punishment or dismissal follows. Occasional rewards for extraordinary services might be given with advantage.

It will be seen that this system of signals is very simple, and so far to be commended; but the success which has attended its use we attribute rather to the monotonous character of the hitherto direct and uniform traffic of the Great Western, than to any great excellence in the signals themselves. We are not going to find fault, but we may prove the truth of our opinion by remarking, that the signals apply to the up and down lines simultaneously, and in no respect possess the power of speaking to the trains or engines of a single pair of rails; neither is any caution signal made at the West London Junction—an economy which we deem to be most unwise.

The Magnetic Telegraph at work between the London and Slough stations, although admirably adapted for the entire signal service of the line, is only used for private purposes.

GREAT SKIFF RACE, AT NEWCASTLE-UPON-TYNE.

CHAMPIONSHIP OF THE THAMES AND TYNE.

On Wednesday, the 18th, a grand skiff match for £180, was rowed between Coombes, the celebrated Thames waterman, and Henry Clasper, of Derwent Haugh, who enjoys equal celebrity among the watermen of the Tyne. As might be expected, from the amount of the stakes, and the importance of the race—the championship of the Thames and Tyne depending on it—the contest drew together a great concourse of spectators; and, as the time of starting drew near, every available place was occupied, the bridge and each side of the river as far as the eye could reach being densely crowded. The river, too, was unusually animated; craft of all descriptions rowed leisurely about, while a host of steamers filled with company were prepared to accompany the competitors, so that a portion of the spectators witnessed the race from the beginning to the end. The weather, though fair, was gloomy, and about half-past ten o'clock, Coombes entered his skiff, and soon after Clasper (who had been on board the Laurel steamer, which was engaged by the umpires, referees, &c.,) followed him, and was loudly cheered as he entered his boat.

Both men having made ready, rowed gently down the river and through the bridge, by which their neat and tiny skiffs, though each differing considerably in their structure, were seen to great advantage and excited general admiration: that of Coombes seemed to be of first-rate finish and modelled peculiar to those connected with the Thames; while Clasper's, formed the beau ideal of his four oared gig the Five Brothers. Both boats were built expressly for the occasion—the London one being constructed of white wood by Messrs. Cowndes and Wintzell, of Lambeth and weighed 43lbs.; and that of Newcastle, of mahogany, by Clasper himself, but was 6lb. heavier. The betting at starting was in favour of Coombes, and varied from 6 to 4 to 3 to 1; and in many instances was freely taken.

On the skiffs returning up the river, they kept together; and on passing the bridge, the channel being completely clear, away they went in excellent style, amidst the cheers of the immense multitude: but before they had proceeded many yards, Clasper fouled his oars, by which his opponent gained an advantage, and led by a full boat's length. Clasper, however, having speedily recovered himself, again "bent his oar to the stroke," but unfortunately on reaching the Skinners' Burn he ran foul of a keel, when Coombes, by the accident, shot several yards a head. After Clasper cleared, he again plied his oars, and from this point up to Redheugh seemed to gain upon his adversary until within four boats' length; but it soon became apparent that he could not win, for in making two or three attempts to reach his opponent, he failed, and Coombes ultimately came in a winner by six lengths or more.

After the race, a protest was made against Coombes receiving the stakes, in consequence of one of Coombes's friends crying out to him that he was pulling his skiff on shore, and waving at the same time with his hand to him the proper course to take. A meeting was held on the subject, and several witnesses were examined; after which the referee gave his decision the following morning, which was "that Coombes was entitled to the stakes," upon which they were immediately given up to him.

Throughout the race, Clasper's conduct was worthy of the highest commendation; not only did he produce, by his own skill and industry, a beautiful and well-designed skiff, which would do credit to any professioal boat builder, but throughout the race he contended manfully for the prize. It is stated in the Newcastle Journal (whence these details are abridged), that a match is talked of between Clasper and Newell, another London waterman.

ENGLISH THEATRICALS AT PARIS.—THE SALLE VENTADOR.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The English company has now played "Othello," "Hamlet," and "Virginius." The performers are well known to the London public, and to enter upon a critique of their acting would in this instance be particularly misplaced. Macready's Hamlet, Othello, and Virginius are little altered by the year he has spent in America; and all have been lauded by friends, assailed by foes, and appreciated by true critics, for many years past. Something of the same sort may be said of Miss Faucit's Desdemona and Virginia; her Ophelia is new to the London public as well as to the Parisian. It is a remarkable performance. Miss Faucit does not, of course, sing the music with the finish of a prima donna—Shakspeare never intended that it should be so sung. The snatches of tunes are the components of tragic and of lyric passion, and so Miss Faucit used rather than executed them. But her voice is sweet and plaintive, and fully serves her to do what she requires. For the acting, nothing more true or tender has been given on the stage since the highest triumphs of Miss O'Neill—accordingly, though many heartily applauded, more as heartily wept. A critic in the Charivari gives us the best account of her powers, in saying that it would be impossible to produce effect with less effort; and this is, beyond all doubt, the perfection of art.

A foreign audience in the mass are only judges of the right and wrong, the interest for the good and against the bad characters of a drama. The sufferings therefore which prompt the stern justice of Othello, the conscience which is the indecision of Hamlet, are beyond their appreciation. They take part against the Moor instead of sympathising with him; and they call Hamlet deficient in action, because they perceive the absence of physical events, and are not aware of the presence of mental ones. It is this blunder which makes Victor Hugo think his own melodramas imitations of Shakspeare. In all instances, therefore, in which the pantomimic story could excite them, the French audience responded freely and energetically; in many parts, they fairly took the actors' part in trust, and rewarded them generously. But in "Virginius" all is marked and clear. The right and wrong are there of a ballet, every accent being perfectly visible as well as audible. Here, therefore, the enthusiasm became enforced and spontaneous. The audience applauded to relieve themselves, and to please the actor or satisfy conviction. All was hearty from one end of the house to the other, and it may fairly be said, that every character in the piece earned his share of the respect shown to the performance. Inspirited by the effort, Macready acted in his very first style, and has renewed the remembrance of his former successes, and fixed them in the hearts of many of those best worth winning opinions from. Rachel, Alexandre Dumas, and many others of high rank in the world of art; the Dukes of Nemours and Montpensier, and others lofty in rank; have had pleasure in showing such feelings.

The Salle itself is perhaps the most beautiful in the world. The rich gilding upon a white ground, relieved by the deep crimson velvet, which gives the only colour used in the theatre, places the splendid audience in the richest possible framework, and the boxes receding as they grow higher, and free from all division, so as to show every person as in the section of an amphitheatre. After a coup d'œil of quite unequalled magnificence, nothing can give a greater contrast to the quiet, exclusive, parted-off style of the Italian Opera in London.

The subject of our illustration is the last scene of Gthello.

The public are all anxious for "Macbeth," with the splendid service which will, it is to be hoped, be effectually presented them. This play and "Werner" are the remaining dramas to be offered the subscription of twelve nights, a very little beyond which is likely to be allowed, from the active opposition of the manager of the Academie, M. Leon Pilet.

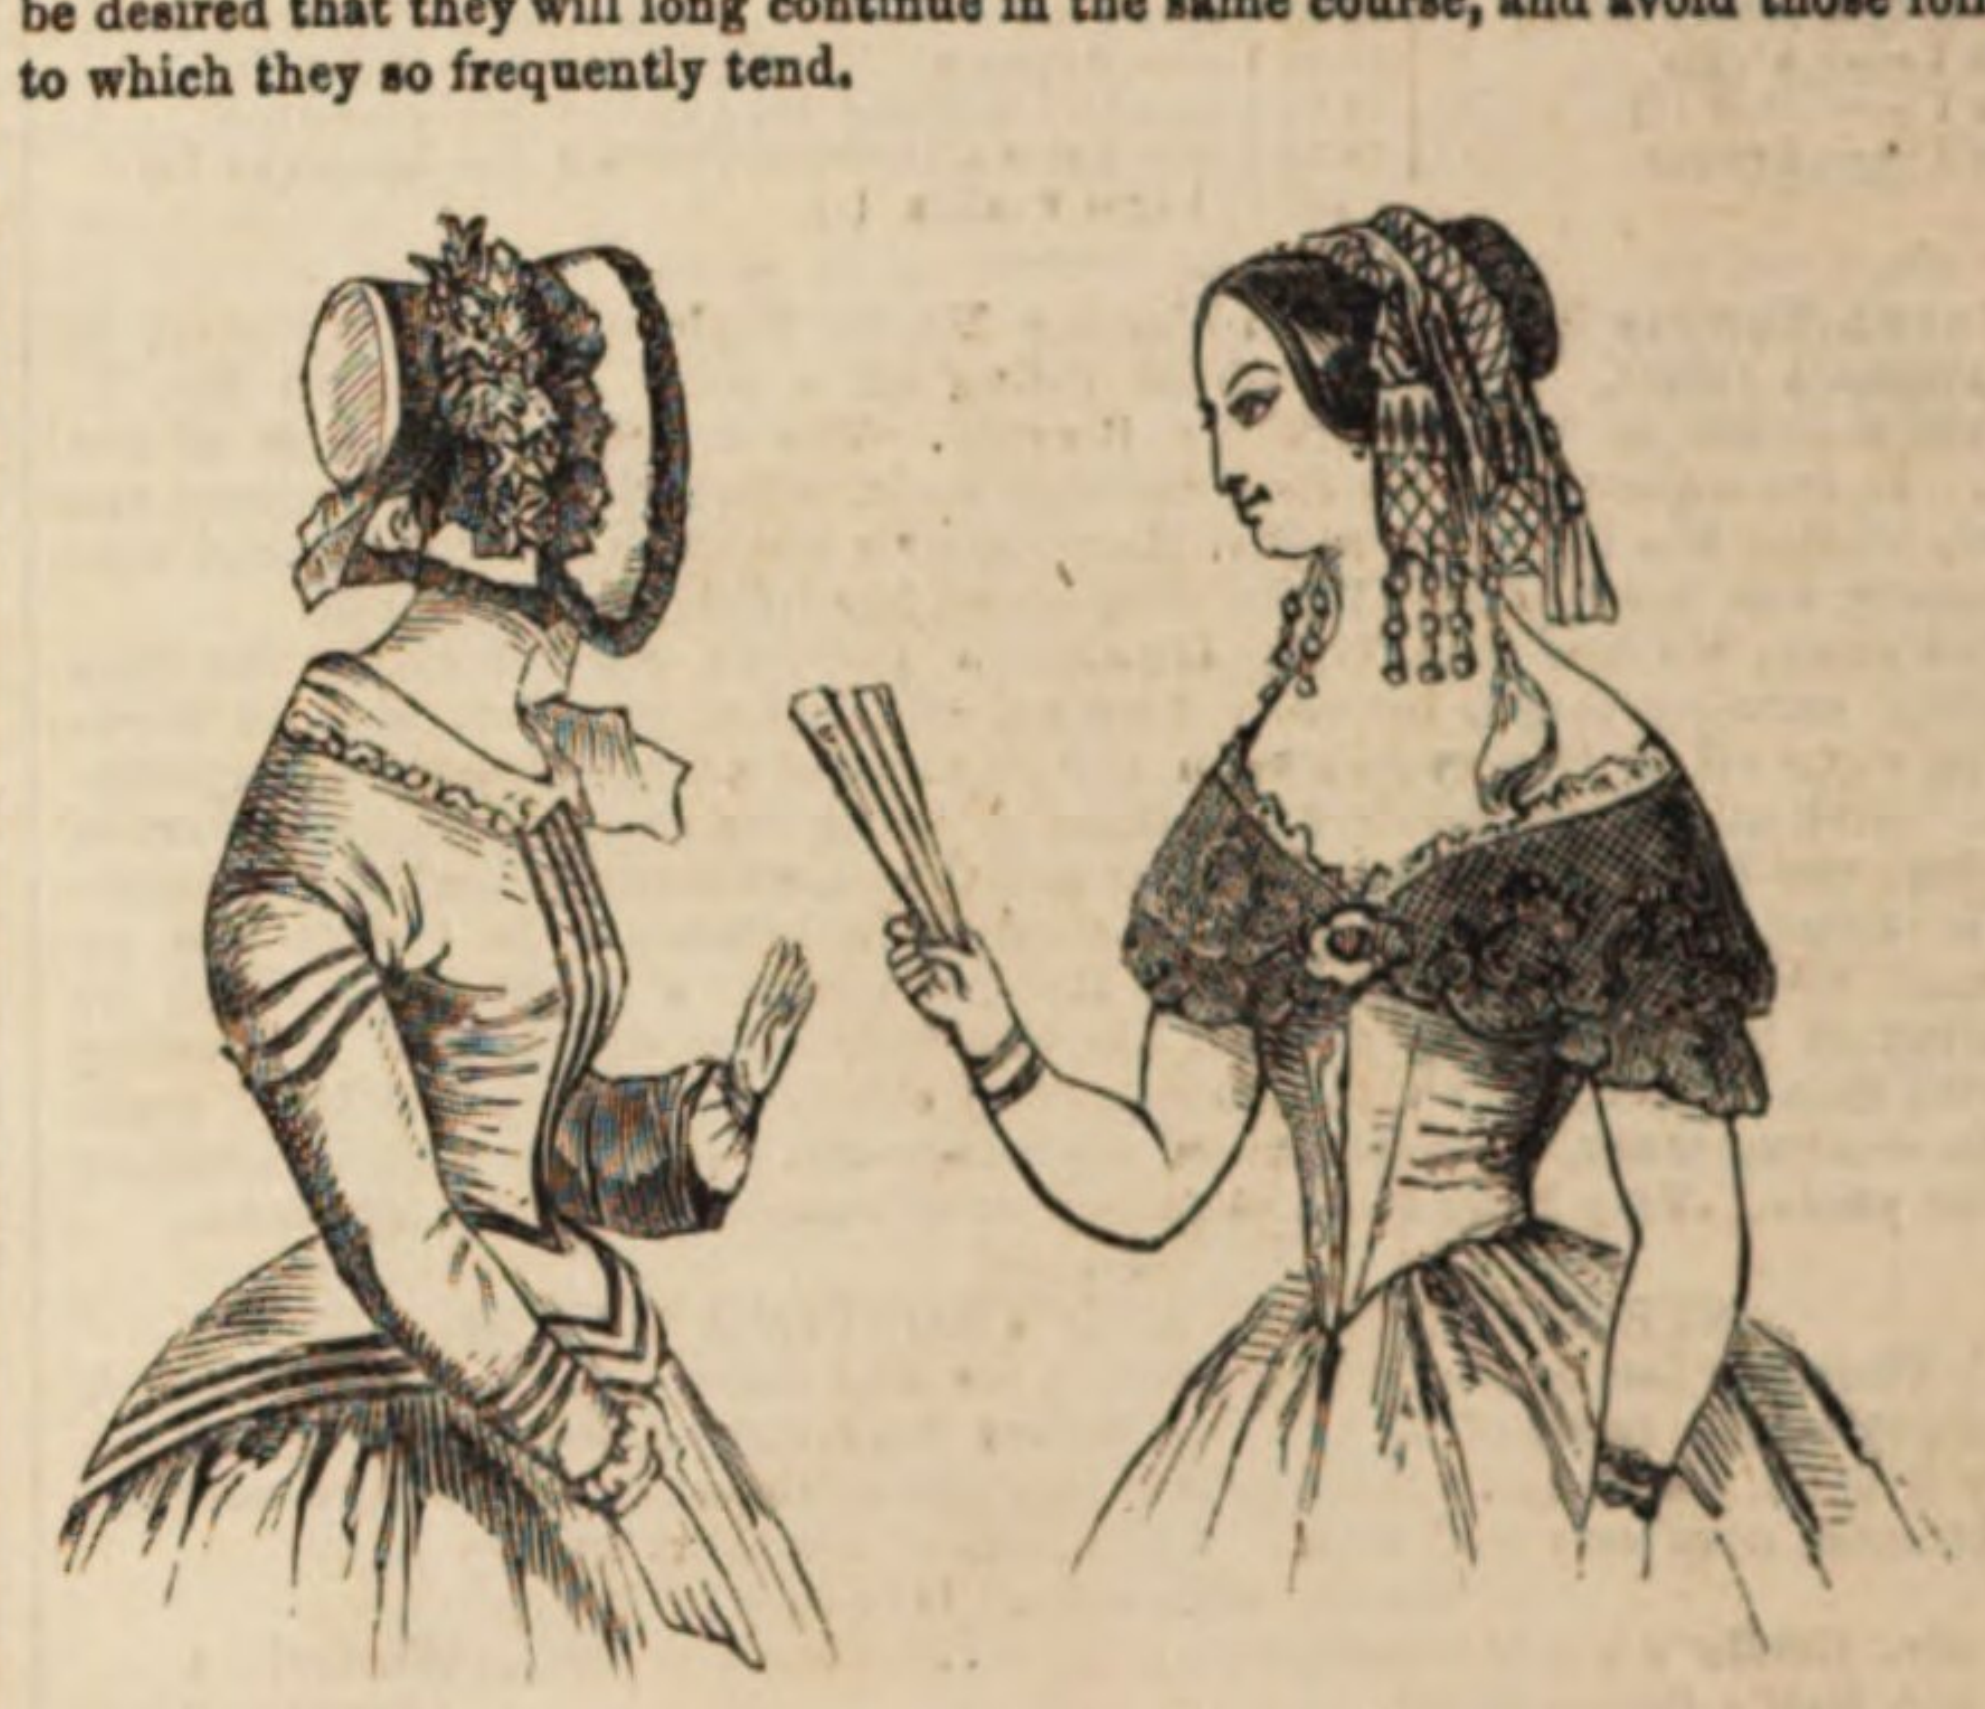
MODES DE PARIS.

At no period have ladies' fashions been more graceful than at present; borrowing from the costumes adopted at the time of Louis XIII., XIV., and XV., whatever was elegant and commodious, and having established general forms, which are varied only by the accessories and ornaments; nothing can be more graceful or rational than the corsages, which display the full length of the bust; or the tight sleeves, that so well show off the arm; or the fulness and length of the skirts, which add to the natural grace of an élégante. It is therefore much to be desired that they will long continue in the same course, and avoid those follies to which they so frequently tend.



FASHIONS FOR THE NEW YEAR.

In acquitting myself of the imposed task of furnishing to the readers of your journal some monthly description of Parisian fashions, I shall have no remarkable changes to point out in essentials, but only those of the accessories and ornaments, which are as changeable as the others are fixed.

Mantelets, Pelisses, Ball Dresses, &c., are remarked for the simplicity of the forms and the elegance of the ornaments.

Velvet is still much used for the ornament of promenade and visiting dresses; it is adapted for the skirts of dresses—three biaises of which are placed round, with a small space between each.

Pelisses are ornamented all down the front, with very narrow velvet ribbon, placed so as to imitate brandebourgs, fastened on each side with buttons, underneath which are concealed hooks and eyes, which serve to fasten the skirt. Pelisse-dresses, ornamented in this style, usually have doublet flaps of velvet, and also facings of velvet to the corsage. It is evident that velvet and passementerie are still the principal materials for the trimmings of dresses; but, as passementerie has of late been so universally introduced, it must be adopted with grea- circumspection.

Fringes are indiscriminately employed, both for morning and evening dresses, with this difference, those for the first are close and heavy, whilst the latter are light, and a little craped.

Some elegant Mantilles for evening wear are made of light coloured satin e they are beautifully embroidered with white roses slightly shaded with the same colour as the Mantille; they are trimmed with a handsome fringe. Deep volan, of black or white lace are considered quite in good taste this year; two thirds and frequently three fourths of the skirts of dresses are occupied with these elegant ornaments.

Ball dresses are still made with double skirts, the upper of crape or tulle, and the under of satin; they are usually looped up with bouquets of delicate flowers.

There is scarcely any alteration in the shape of Hats; they are low and close for negligé, and more open for a toilette more recherché.

Hats for morning wear are frequently made of black velvet covered with black lace; and for carriage, of coloured satin covered with white lace; they are ornamented inside the brims with a bow of ribbon or a flower surrounded with tulle.

Petit-Bords of velvet are very fashionable for full toilette; they are frequently ornamented with a row of white beads on the edge of the brim, and another on the inside next the forehead.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

It is by no means easy to do anything well—but a thousand times more difficult to do nothing in a becoming and convenient manner. Indeed, according to an old maxim of very considerable reputation, when people have nothing to do, they are sure to do mischief; and we are by no means confident we are not about to furnish a proof of the soundness of that doctrine. But, as the Frenchman says, "Que voulez vous?" Practical sporting is defunct for the nonce; all woodcraft is at an end, save the circumventing of a cosmopolite woodcock, or bombarding amphibious wild fowl from a punt. In this dilemma we are forced into theory—and where so likely to find it as on the turf. With the readers' leave, therefore (which is a polite way for an author to say, whether they will or not), we will, as a finale to the year, say something about racing seasons—past and prospective.

There are people who object to the turf, of course—there are people (probably) who don't buy the Illustrated London News, but take the ——— instead. "Every one to his taste," as the man said, who showed how little he had of it by his passage of vaccine gallantry. No doubt there is a great deal that is objectionable done upon race courses, and indirectly by the practice of horse-racing, but we should be glad to learn where is the human institution "whereunto foul things come not?" We must be content to take the evil and the good, and so long as the turf fosters a wholesome democratic spirit in our merry meetings—so long as it shall serve to draw together the classes into which society is too much separated, for one purpose of social enjoyment and good fellowship—so long do we pronounce it worthy the favour and fosterage of every true Englishman. The year—on the threshold of which we stand—will live long in the memory of the modern Olympian. It was stained by some of the foulest blots to be found in the annals of racing, and distinguished by some of the noblest sport to be found in its calendar. The progress that this most national pastime has made of late years is, perhaps, not generally known. Twenty years ago, when Sir John Shelley won the Derby with Cedric, the number of subscribers was 58; last season's nominations amounted to 155; the entrances for 1846 have reached 196! The facilities for enjoying it, too, have equally increased—the list of race meetings for next year contains the names of 129 places of sport in England and Scotland. If we needs must propitiate the utilitarian, let him look at the exports of thorough-bred stock made during the past summer and autumn, and say do they form a contemptible picture in our rural resources? If he tells us that the course has nothing to do with this, we ask him, why is not so valuable a produce cultivated in other countries—in climates far more favourable to its growth than ours? This we put to him, if some rusty old Smellfungus, with no more blood in his veins than the statue at Charing-cross—but if a jolly old gentleman, whose ignorance is his misfortune, and not his fault, we hereby offer him the near side of our buggy for next Epsom races, and pledge ourselves that he shall return to his family circle as convinced there is no human invention so glorious as a Derby—as one of our peculiar lobster salads, and four flasks of champagne can make him. Until we have some open weather, betting will be slack. Race horses are now not allowed to leave the yards, and any exercise they get is, "in the straw," which, indeed, is very characteristic of their being confined. Sweet reader, remember it is the season of jokes, and forgive us our pun—we promise not to offend again—until our next wassail bowl.

TATTERSALL'S.

Monday.—On the whole this was as busy an afternoon as we have seen on the eve of "Boxing Day" for many years, and not by any means without results. We may instance a decline in Anti-Repealer and Young Eclipse, and a strong disposition to back Pam, the Rebecca and Calypso colts, Pantasa, Fitz Allen, and Weatherbit. Repeated inquiries were also made about Cabin Boy and the Minikin colt, and both may be expected to see a better day. The principal favourites kept their places, but were not backed to any amount. Several large bets were laid on the Chester Cup, and a few, in small sums, on the Oaks, at the odds quoted:—

Novel Tennis Match.—On Monday Mr. C. Taylor undertook to play, at Tompkins's Court, Brighton, whilst riding on a pony belonging to Mr. B. Smith, a match at Tennis with Mr. Ricardo. The match was the best of five sets. In consequence of the disadvantage under which Mr. Taylor entered the court, betting was in favour of Mr. Ricardo, who got three sets to one, and consequently won the match. There were about 200 fashionables present.

Running Match for One Hundred Pounds.—On Tuesday the long pending running match betwnen Stewart, of London, and Robinson, of Newcastle, came off at Putney-heath, in the presence of a large concourse of spectators. Both men have acquired the fame of being the most superior runners of the day, and from the amount of stakes and the heavy betting, the greatest interest prevailed. The distance was 160 yards. In betting, 5 to 4 were laid on Stewart, which were readily taken. Robinson took a slight lead, which he maintained for twenty yards, when his opponent came up, and an interesting contest then ensued, both men exerting every effort. When within thirty yards of the winning mark, Stewart passed his adversary, and ran in a gallant winner of four yards. Very large sums of money were transferred on this occasion.

STEEPLE CHASE AND TROTTING MATCH.

On Thursday last a steeple chase match for £50 a-side, and a trotting match for £100 a-side, came off at the East Surrey Race-course, attached to the Rosemary Branch, Peckham. Notwithstanding the extreme coldness of the weather, the grounds were very well filled. The result of the sport was:—

Match, £50 each. One mile.

Mr. Griffin's b g Moonraker .. .. (Winter) 1
Mr. Bell's Robin Hood.. .. .. (Paget) 2

The winner the favourite. There were five leaps, consisting of hurdles, about four feet high. At the second leap Robin Hood's rider fell and was much injured. Moonraker, who cleared all the fences easily, consequently had the race to himself.

Trotting match, £100 a-side. In harness.

Mr. Griffin's pony 1
Mr. Vanderstein's pony 2

Won by half a length after a beautifully contested match. Mr. Burke, of trotting celebrity, steered the winner, and Mr. Monk the loser. Both were driven in very light gigs.

EPITOME OF NEWS—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

We learn by the last arrival from the island of Bourbon that the guillotine had just been used there for the first time, for the execution of three blacks, two for mutiny, and the other for the horrible crime of murdering a person and eating his flesh. It is twenty years since any one has been convicted of this latter offence.

Mr. Kemp, of Kemptown, died suddenly at Paris yesterday week. He was in the 61st year of his age.

The Revue de Paris, alluding to the report lately circulated of the King of Prussia having determined to give a constitution to his subjects, says that the report is perfectly well founded, but that the King has been prevailed on, by the remonstrances of the Russian and Austrian Cabinets, to postpone his intentions for the present.

An earthquake of some violence was felt in Savoy during the night of the 10th inst. At Rumille and Chautagne the furniture in the apartments was so shaken that the glasses and other articles left on tables were thrown down. At Chambery, however, it was so slight, that it was perceived by only a very few persons.

The Vienna journals represent the sport, during the present season, in the woods and forests belonging to the Imperial residences to have been unusually great. In one hunt, in the Park of Lainz, in which the Archdukes Charles and Louis, Prince Wasa, Princes Charles de Lichtenstein, de Schwartzenberg, and de Lobkowitz, and the Count de Hardegg took part, no fewer than 350 wild boars were killed.

The head of a colossal statue, to be called Bavaria, was lately cast at Munich. An idea may be formed of the enormous dimensions of this statue from the fact, that 25 persons were able to place themselves in the head.

A letter from St. Petersburg, of Dec. 4, states that the Emperor, having ordered the Misister of the Interior to urge on the works of the railroad between that city and Moscow, already commenced on the St. Petersburg side, a considerable number of additional workmen have been put on, and measures taken for the commencement of the works at the Moscow end. In all probability the part of this line between St. Petersburg and Novogorod will be completed about the beginning of next autumn.

A few days ago, a Mr. Morris Thurston, died in Guinea-street, Exeter, at the patriarchal age of 108. The deceased, up to the last seven weeks, enjoyed excellent health and spirits. He was a man of great vigour of mind, and eccentricity of character. He lived for upwards of 60 years in the house in which he died. He attributed his long life to his abstemious habits—never making use of intoxicating drinks, being an unpledged water drinker—taking, however, but on very rare occasions, a little cider. It was his pride to boast that he had never had a doctor in his life. [He would not have lived to such an age if the latter part of this account were not true.]

The Hague has recently been lighted by gas for the first time. The journals of that place state that the gas works, although on a very extensive scale, and combining all the most useful improvements which have been introduced into the manufacture of gas, were executed in the almost incredibly short space of five months, including the laying down of twenty-five miles of pipes.

A letter from Berlin states that Tschech, the man who recently made an attempt upon the life of the King of Prussia, was executed at Spandau, on the 14th inst. The execution took place very suddenly, and created much surprise, as it had been understood that the capital sentence would be remitted. The judgment, which condemned him to be drawn on a hurdle and broken on the wheel, had been commuted into simple decapitation. The culprit until the last moment relied upon being pardoned, and when the warrant was read to him, complained of having been deceived with false hopes. Nevertheless he ascended with great courage the mound on which he was to receive the fatal stroke, and himself laid his head upon the block. His last thoughts and words were devoted to the memory of his wife, who has been dead several years, and to his only daughter, nineteen years of age, whom he has left behind him.

The Breslau Gazette says that the Russian Government commission established at Peysem, a town situated on the Prussian frontier, has discovered a new conspiracy among the high Russian nobility, the ramifications of which extend to the Caucasus. A great number of arrests continue to be made, especially among the public functionaries. Several gentlemen have been placed in chains for being found in possession of prohibited books. Most of the prisoners are sent at once to the mines of Ural.

The Journal de Lille relates that, on the 11th inst., a child coming home from school in the evening imprudently applied his tongue and lips to the iron balustrade of the Pont St. Jacques, to which the cold made them adhere so tightly, that the unfortunate child could not disunite them without undergoing the most painful sufferings, and leaving part of the skin of both tongue and lips attached to the rail.

The premises of Messrs. De Vries, Robbe, and Beeke, extensive blacking and ink makers, on the Rustenburgerpad, in the parish of Nieuwer Amstel, Amsterdam, were destroyed by fire last week. This is the second time the above manufactory (which formerly belonged to Messrs. Chanul and Co.) has been destroyed by fire. The origin of the latter conflagration is not yet known.

A Vienna letter of the 12th instant states that the board of directors of the Prague railroad have given orders for 48 locomotives of six and eight wheels, and 39 tenders, showing a decided expectation that this road will be opened in the course of next year.

A letter from Valenciennes states that Prince Gustavus de Croy expired last week, from a cold caught when out shooting, which, being neglected, proved fatal. This young prince (aged only 21) was son of the Duke de Croy, of Dulmen, Germany, who died six years ago.

Letters from Turin state that a strong sensation had been created in that city by the violation of the Sardinian territory by a body of French gensdarmes, douaniers, and other armed soldiers who had been taken prisoners, and conveyed, under circumstances of unnecessary brutality, to Grenoble. The affair seems likely to produce a serious misunderstanding between the French and Sardinian governments.

The Paris journals announce that the Committee on Postal Reform have recommended that an uniform rate of postage of twenty centimes (twopence English) shall be adopted in France. The journals are unanimous in approving of this recommendation of the Committee.

A correspondent writes from Rome, that never before were there so many strangers in that city. There are said to be 4000 English families; but this must be an exaggeration. The rents of houses and apartments are up at an enormous height.

Price One Shilling, the

ILLUSTRATED LONDON ALMANACK
and PICTURESQUE CALENDAR FOR 1845.

It contains a greater variety of Information and seasonable entertainment than is to be found in any other Almanack. The Wrapper is beautifully printed in colours; and the artistical execution of the entire Almanack entitles it to a place upon every drawing-room table in the empire.

The Press is universal in praise of this beautiful Alamanack.

EXTRACTS FROM OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

"This is certainly one of the cheapest shilling's-worth that we have seen, even in this age of cheap publication. It contains some of the best Illustrations, for any common observer, of astronomical phenomena that have appeared for some years. From past recollections, we are satisfied that a few years ago a similar publication to this would not have remunerated its producers, even if sold at ten times its price."—Morning Chronicle.

"One of its features is an accurate representation of the principal astronomical phenomena of each month, accompanied with an intelligible description. The pages of the calendar are illustrated with highly fanciful designs of the signs of the zodiac, by Mr. Kenny Meadows; there are also scenes of the sports of each month, birds, and other illustrations. The literary matter is quite as good as the pictorial, and the quarto pages on which the Almanack is printed afford more room for explanation than can be obtained in the ordinary forms. One shilling for such a mass of information and amusement is wonderfully cheap."—Morning Post, Nov. 20.

"This is a new annual, the purpose of which is to blend illustrations with the customary information contained in an almanack. Its letter-press contents are as copious and varied as any of its contemporaries, and the illustrations, which are from the rich fancy of Mr. Kenny Meadows's pencil, comprise allegorical compositions applicable to each month, scenes of the sports of the month, &c. It is, upon the whole, not only a useful, but a most pleasing work."—Morning Advertiser, Nov. 15.

"A cheap year-book of astronomical phenomena and natural history, country sports and town amusements, chronology, and legislation. Of the numerous engravings those representing the telescopic appearances of the planets as they will be visible in the ensuing year are the most interesting, and are peculiar to this almanack."—Examiner.

"Is exceedingly well done, and full of information and good wood-cut adornments and illustrations. Its intrinsic merits, as well as its extrinsic attractions, are sufficient to insure for it a very general demand."—Literary Gazette, Nov. 17.

"It unites with calendarial information, astronomical observations, and recreations incident to each month, embracing as well, notes on natural history, and a mass of miscellanies as useful as it is entertaining. We repeat that this 'Illustrated Almanack' is a happy idea, beautifully executed, and preferring its claims to purchase even by a modern 'Elwes' in economy."—Era, Nov. 24.

"This is one of the many attempts to substitute something rational for the foolish almanacks of times that are passing away—and, we may add, one of the most successful. It is filled with illustrations, some of which, representing the signs of the Zodiac, are executed with considerable artistical taste. As it is chiefly devoted to the natural history of the months, it is just what the readers of the 'Gardeners' Chronicle' are most likely to find useful. It is difficult to imagine anything cheaper."—Gardeners' Chronicle.

"This is, beyond all doubt, the most extraordinary production of the British press. The illustrations are very beautiful. Kenny Meadows revels in the exuberance of his rich fancy, and Linton has done him ample justice in the engraving."—Lloyd's Weekly Newspaper.

Just Published, Demy 4to., neatly bound in cloth, with Engravings and Diagrams, price 6s.,

THE HAND-BOOK TO THE PIANOFORTE, comprising an easy Rudimental Introduction to the study of that Instrument and Music in General; the Art of Fingering, according to the modes of the best Masters, exemplified in various Exercises, Scales, &c., in all the Major and Minor Keys; and interspersed by Relaxations from Study, consisting of Popular Melodies and Romances, and Selections from Pianoforte compositions of some of the most celebrated Masters. Also, a short and easy Introduction to Harmony or Counterpoint, and a New Vocabulary of Terms. By J. AUGUSTINE WADE, Author of "The Dwellings of Fancy;" "Songs of the Flowers;" "The Two Houses of Grenada," an Opera; "The Prophecy," an Oratorio, &c. &c.

"From the first 'example' to the last 'exercise,' everything is brought before the learner in the clearest manner, and the means of conquering each new difficulty as it arises literally placed at his fingers' ends. Indeed, after carefully digesting some sixty pages, and mastering the 'digital' and other exercises here given, he need not fear the thickest army of semi-demi-semis, or the most whimsically-noted passage of the most gifted manipulator of the key-board. The work comprises, in addition, a brief and excellent treatise on the elements of harmony, developing the laws of composition in a simple and sound manner; and we altogether warmly recommend the book to public favour."—Literary Gazette, October 19.

"The book now before us is the most admirable instance we have ever met with of a man acknowledged as a poet and composer condescending to construct a threshold to harmony. Mr. Wade has written the best first book we ever read."—Sunday Times.

"This is one of the best works of musical instruction which has been brought under our notice; the author unites an earnest love of music with sound knowledge of the art, and has, therefore, given a life and animation to his lessons, which relieve the dry and technical details of teaching."—The League, October 12.

"An ingenious and tasteful work, comprehending a large amount of information in a comparatively small space. The volume seems to us calculated to be very useful; and it is certainly ornamental also, being handsomely printed and bound, and embellished with a striking portrait of the celebrated pianist, Franz Liszt."—Watchman, October 9.

"We regard it, on the whole, as very able and useful, and recommend it to the attention of students of the Pianoforte."—John Bull, October 19.

THE COUNTESS OF BLESSINGTON'S
NEW NOVEL,
"STRATHERN; OR, LIFE AT HOME AND ABROAD.
A STORY OF THE PRESENT DAY.

"'Strathern' is a brilliant series of sketches of fashionable life, and biting satirical attacks levelled at fashionable follies. Lady Blessington hits right and left, unmasking all the petty unworthy arts, the mean vices, the cold hypocrisy, which pervades the most artificial and the most elevated portion of the structure of society. To those who are interested in sketches of fashionable life, drawn by one who well knows what she brilliantly describes—who has brought to the task discrimination, acuteness, and fine literary taste—we can recommend 'Strathern' as a fiction worthy of the reputation of its author, and a delineation of society as acute as it is interesting."—Morning Chronicle.

They have proved the theme of the poet; they are celebrated in the periodical literature of the whole civilized world; the lays of Byron; and the voice of the universal press, have proclaimed the incomparable virtues of the "Oil Macassar," and of its accompanying preparations. READ the following TESTIMONIAL in favour of PARR'S LIFE PILLS, which is sufficient to convince the most prejudiced person that they are all that is required to conquer disease, and consequently, prolong life.

To T. ROBERTS and Co.

Sirs,—I beg to hand you the following testimonial, which I have just received from Mr. Williams, Union-street, Nottingham. Yours, obediently,
G. BATTERS, Chapel-bar, Nottingham.

Sir,—Printing is a great blessing to mankind, for now I am enabled to make known, through you, a perfect Cure, by taking PARR' LIFE PILL, of extremely bad Indigestion, a Bilious disorder, and Sick Headache, which I have been subjected to for years; and money enough has been paid to physicians and surgeons, which now would have been a little fortune to me. I wish every fellow-creature clearly to understand that I was wonderfully relieved by taking one box of PARR'S LIFE PILLS. Accident threw a testimonial in my way of a miraculous cure of a bilious attack and sick headache. The second box enabled me to go about my business with spirit and alacrity; and by taking two or three more boxes, I am happy to add my humble testimony of a perfect cure of that dreadful disorder—bilious and sick headache, which rendered me, before I took PARR'S LIFE PILLS, unfit for business. Considering the loss of time and pain, persons would find that one box of PARR'S LIFE PILLS is worth, instead of 1s. 1½d., as many guineas. May all persons make trial of PARR'S LIFE PILLS, is the sincere wish of Yours, thankfully, M. WILLIAMS, Union-street, Nottingham.
To Mr. G. Batters.

PARR'S LIFE PILLS are sold by all respectable Medicine Vendors. See the words "PARR'S LIFE PILLS," in White Letters on a Red Ground, on the Government Stamp.

A FAREWELL ODE TO 1844.

Farewell to 'Fourty Four! Another year
Has very nearly finish'd its career;
And lo! the term whose sands are well-nigh spent,
Is signaliz'd by many a great event,
Which Father Time, like some historian sage,
Has noted down, to fill another page.

Farewell to 'Fourty Four! With grateful hearts
We bid adieu, while thus the year departs.
To this important era we may date
Success in glorious streams, and triumphs great;
Prosperity has crown'd us more and more—
A memorable year was 'Fourty Four!

Farewell to 'Fourty Four! But not farewell
To that success of which we gladly tell.
For when the present season shall have past
MOSES and SON'S success we trust will last,
And then their mighty mart shall be display'd
The most astounding monument of trade.

Farewell to 'Fourty Four! And many thanks
To public friends who form such numerous ranks.
Moses and Son with heartfelt warmth express
Their inward gratitude for vast success;
And, in return for this, they promise more Than what the public had in 'Fourty Four!

A WELCOME TO 1845.

Welcome to 'Fourty Five! May this be found
The happiest year that ever ran its round!
May young and old throughout the coming year
In glad prosperity alike appear!
May trade and commerce happily revive
And gloriously distinguish 'Fourty Five!

Welcome to Fourty Five! Throughout this term
MOSES and SON will signalize their firm:
Inventions and improvements shall appear,
Such as will rival each preceding year;
And vast advantages shall ALL derive,
Throughout the coming year of 'Fourty Five!

Welcome to 'Fourty Five! May we be crown'd
With brightening prospects, while it hastens round;
May show'rs of patronage incessant pour,
And quite eclipse the trade of 'Fourty Four;
And may the glorious house of MOSES stand
A universal wonder in the land.

Welcome to 'Fourty Five! Let all who hear,
Unite in joyful welcomes to the year:
Let rich and poor combine in one loud chorus
To welcome in the year that smiles before us.
For much it will unfold—and, when it closes
You'll gladly give three hearty cheers for MOSES.

Important Announcement! The public are specially informed, that during the re-erection of E. MOSES and SON'S premises in Aldgate, the entrance to their Establishment is only at 154, Minories.

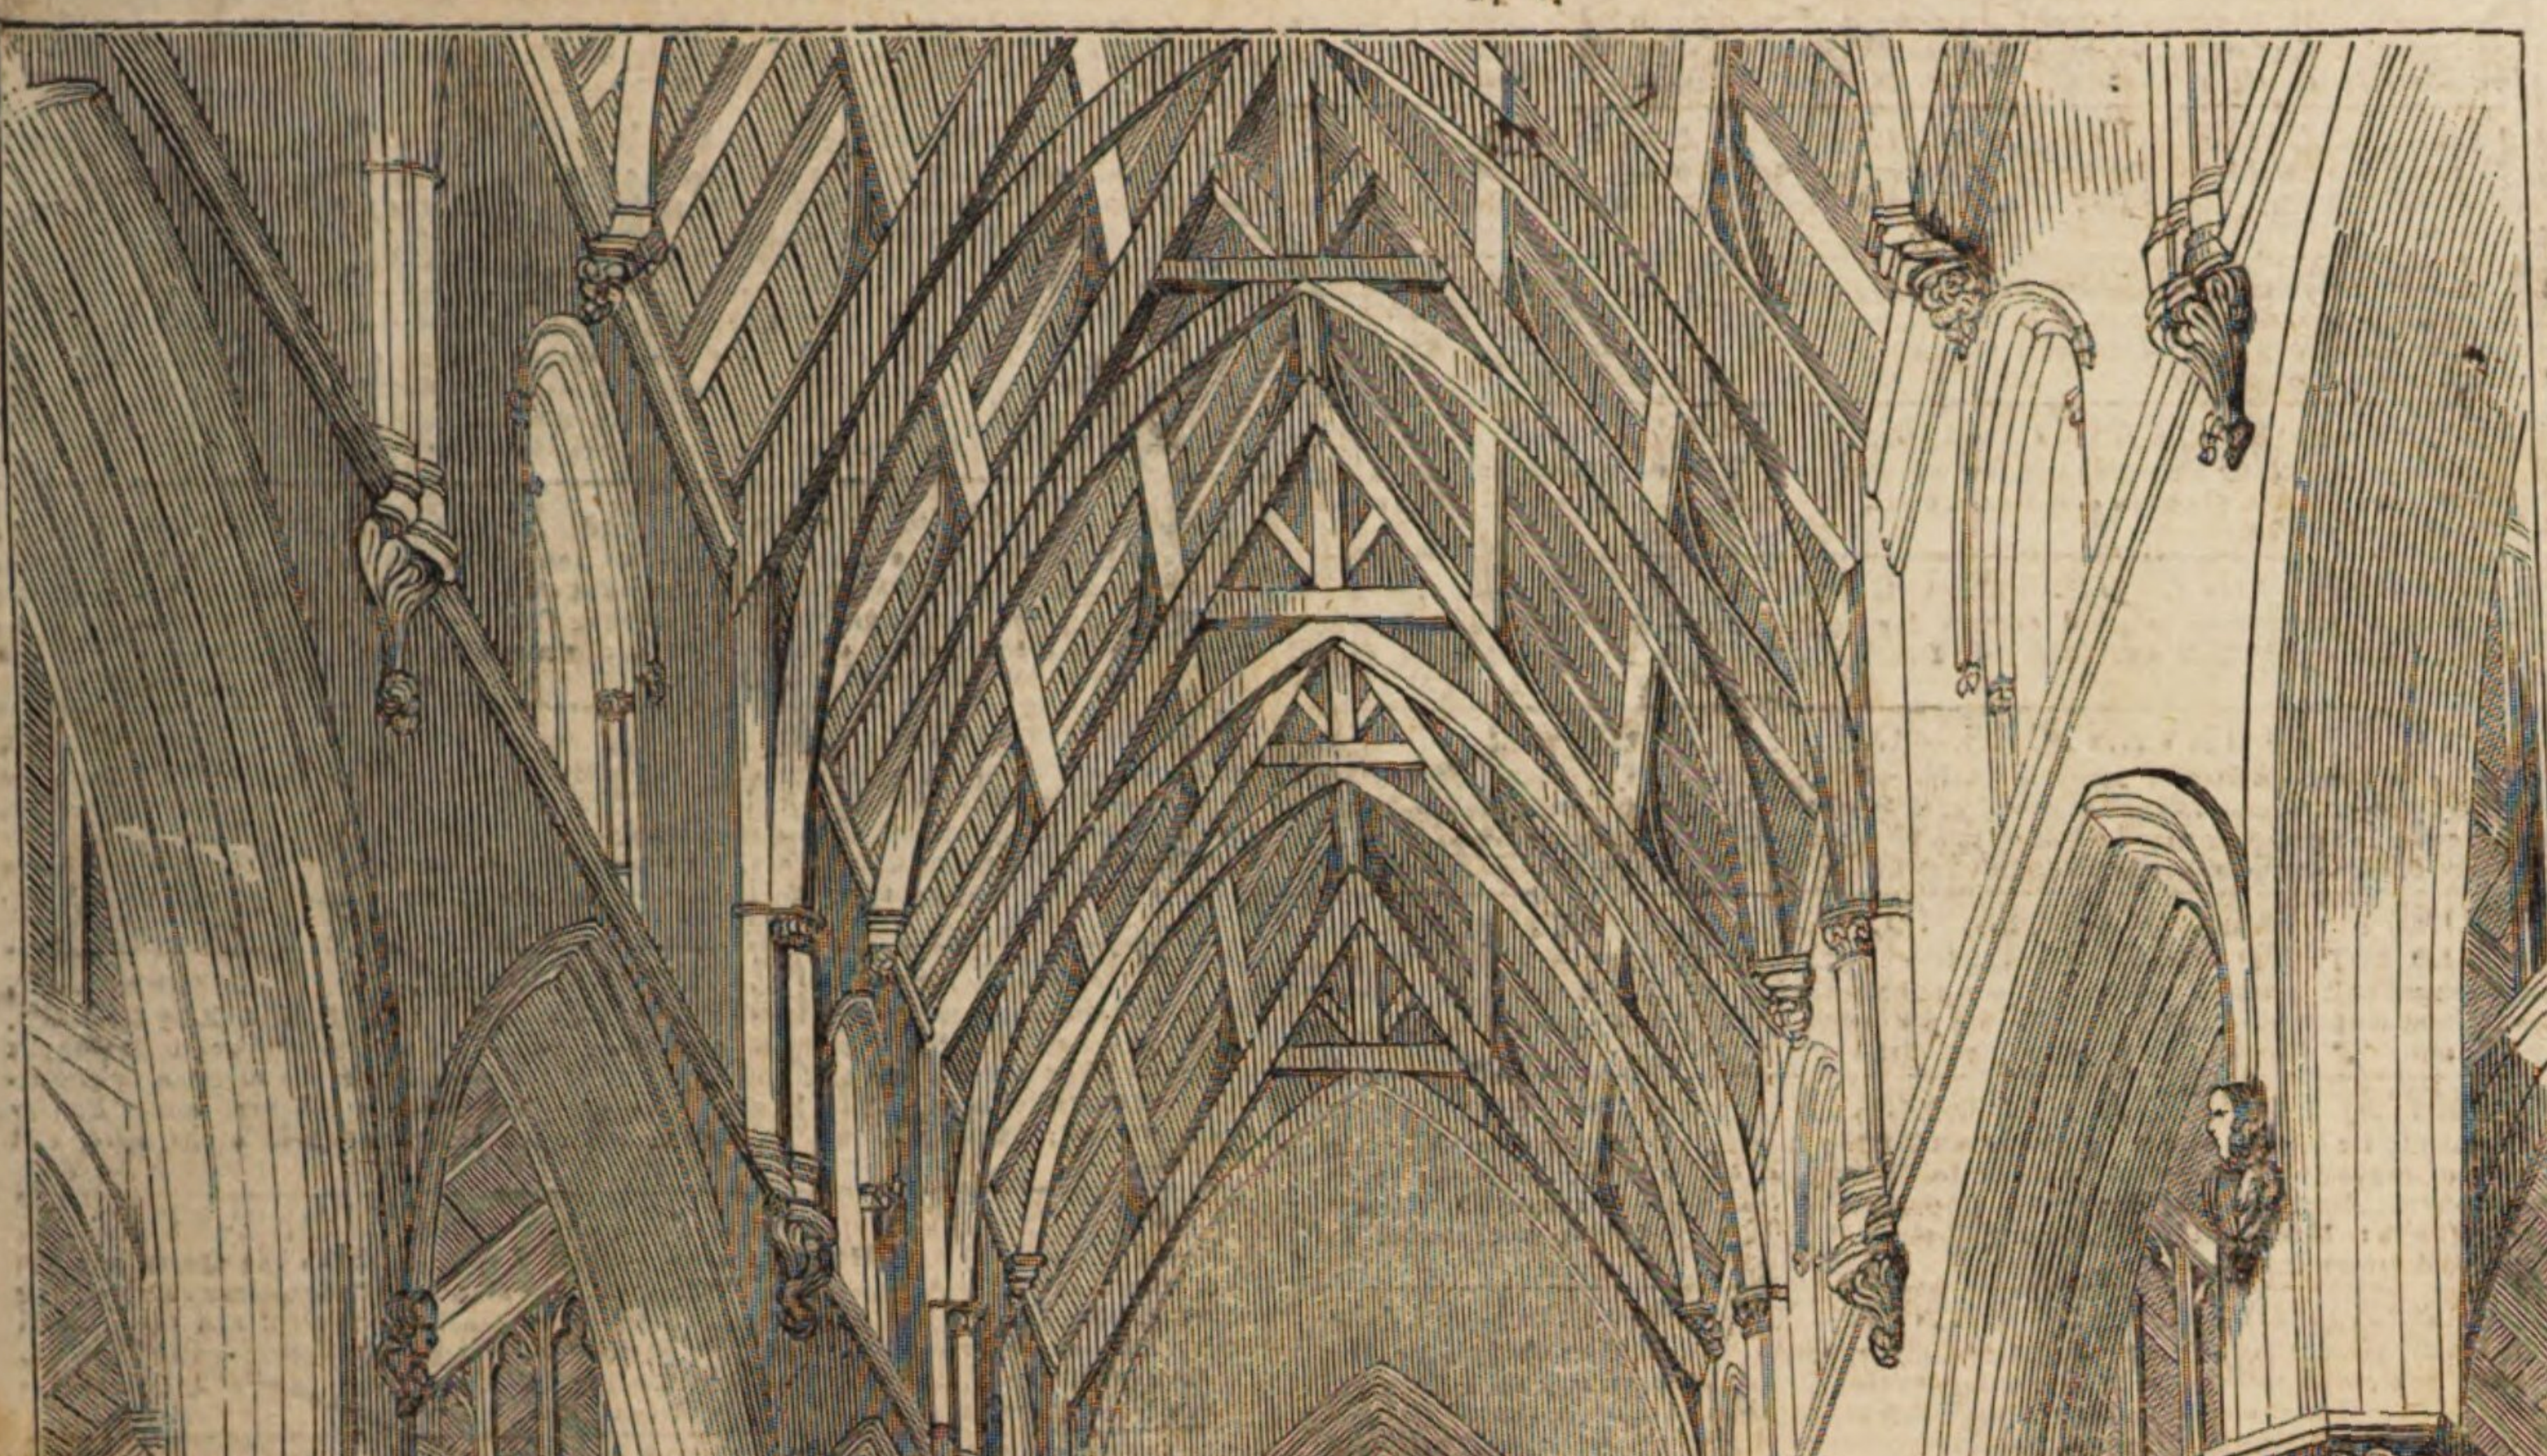
A new work, entitled "The Commercial Phenomenon," with full directions for Self-Measurement, on application, will be forwarded, free of postage.

Important.—Any article purchased or ordered, if not approved of, exchanged, or the money returned.

Observe.—E. MOSES and SON, Tailors, Wholesale and Retail Woollen Drapers, Outfitters, and General Warehousemen, 154, Minories, and 86, Aldgate, City, opposite the Church.

Caution.—E. MOSES and SON are obliged to guard the public against imposition, having learned that the untradesman-like falsehood of being connected with them, or it's the same concern, has been resorted to in many instances, and for obvious reasons. They have no connexion whatever with any other establishment; and those who desire genuine Cheap Clothing, should (to prevent disappointment, &c.) call or send to 154, Minories, or 86, Aldgate, opposite the Church.

N.B.—No business transacted at this Establishment from sunset on Friday till sunset on Saturday, when business is resumed till twelve o'clock.



INTERIOR OF ST. GILES'S CHURCH, CAMBERWELL.

INTERIOR OF ST. GILES'S CHURCH, CAMBERWELL.

We have already illustrated this magnificent specimen of church building, in Numbers 90 and 135 of our journal. In the latter is described the ceremony of the consecration of the church, on the 21st ult., with some details of the interior, more especially of the east end of the structure. The present engraving represents nearly the whole of the interior, from the west end, showing the open timber roof, the general arrangement of the choir, nave, and aisles; the latter disfigured by the introduction of galleries. The sculptural embellishments, as the capitals of the columns, &c., are in strict conformity with the style of the edifice—the Decorated. The octagonal font, in the foreground of our view, is very beautiful; the moulding and emblematic embellishment are much admired.

In the account in No. 135 is an error of description, which we are anxious to rectify. It is there stated that "the carvings" were executed by Mr. Pratt's patent machine; whereas, the work done by this admirable mechanism was the ornamental panelling and fleur-de-lis terminations of the stall ends, boldly delineated by our artist. Mr. Pratt's machine was also used in working the arches, tracery, and other corresponding parts in the organ-case, the pulpit, reading-desk, and altar-rail chairs. Thus far the tracery. The carving was executed by hand; the designs for both being furnished by the architects, Messrs. Scott and Moffatt. In our engraving of the Consecration, the altar-table is shown without the rich velvet embroidered cloth with which it is usually covered, and which hangs as drapery, after the ancient manner. We also omitted to mention that the organ, which is extremely powerful, was built by Bishop.

We have already intimated the remarkably fine execution of the windows, the work of Messrs. Ward and Nixon. They, perhaps, present the finest specimen of glass-painting and scriptural design lately executed in this country, where the art is no longer a "lost" one. The details of these masterly performances may, therefore, be acceptable.

The window occupying the east end of the chancel contains a rich and elaborate specimen of painted glass, presented by the gentlemen of the parish. As its position over the altar has been thought to require that it should be executed in the highest, and therefore most costly, style of art, and as the sums hitherto contributed are inadequate to the completion of the whole in that manner, it has been judged best to confine the undertaking for the present to the tracery lights in the head of the window, and the principal of the five lights below, leaving the four remaining, or lateral lights, filled merely with white glass, until the requisite funds be obtained. Even the principal of the lower lights was unfortunately not finished at the time of the Consecration, though likely, it is hoped, to be completed in a few weeks; and its imperfect and fragmentary appearance detracted considerably from the effect of the whole. It is intended to contain five circles in a perpendicular series, united by a Mosaic ground, and including representations of the Nativity, Temptation, Crucifixion, Resurrection, and Ascension, of Christ, with several minor subjects, partly historical and partly allegorical, in illustration of these principel ones. The Ascension, which is in the highest of the circles, was the only one not then put up. In the head of the window are five cinquefoils, the two lowest of which are respectively appropriated to the two Sacraments, with five subordinate subjects in the foliations around each, typical or otherwise illustrative of them. The three remaining cinquefoils, which are comprised, with three spandrels, in one great circle, contain representations of the Last Judgment, and several of the prophetic visions of the Apocalypse, connected in meaning with that event. The whole is designed in the style of the thirteenth century, (of which the windows of the Temple Church furnish a familiar modern example), and exhibits much of the symbolism which characterises the religious art of that period. From the extreme minuteness, however, of all the subjects, it is almost impossible to distinguish their details, except from the chancel, a part of the church from which the congregation will generally be removed. This peculiarity has been adopted upon principle by the designers, who, we understand, are two unprofessional gentlemen connected with the parish. Their aim has been not to obtrude upon observation a conspicuous glass picture, which might be found by some distracting to the attention during public worship; but, primarily, to cover an important entrance of light with a rich and brilliant coloured screen, thereby soothing the eye, and aiding solemnity of feeling, without disturbing the mind; and then, as a secondary object, to fill each part with elaborate meaning, which, by a closer inspection on a suitable occasion those who desire may unravel and study as a theological composition. The glass has been supplied by Messrs. Ward and Nixon, at a cost of about £200.

The window at the west-end of the nave was presented by the Vicar, and bears his own and his wife's arms blazoned in the three principal lights. It consists chiefly of ancient glass imported from Cologne, with considerable additions by Messrs. Ward and Nixon, who have arranged and fitted up the whole.

The principal window of the south transept, presented by the ladies of the parish, contains two figures of St. Peter and St. Paul, with a few sacred symbols. Both this and the preceding are what the French term "Grisailles," i.e. windows with a white ground relieved by a running decoration pattern in positive colours, as distinguished from "mosaiques" (such as the chancel window) when the ground is of the same quality with the figures.

On the east side of this transept is a window in a later style of art, containing figures of Moses and Christ, under two canopies, with the donor's arms above, and an inscription below, recording its erection by a gentleman of the parish (Augustine Robinson, Esq.), as a monument to one of his family. These two windows in the transept are the original work of Messrs. Ward and Nixon.

The church contains about 1500 sittings, there being no pews. The entire cost of the structure and fittings is stated at £18,000, raised by rate and voluntary subscription. It is altogether a remarkably fine church; and "a fitting place of worship for the inhabitants of a large and enlightened district."

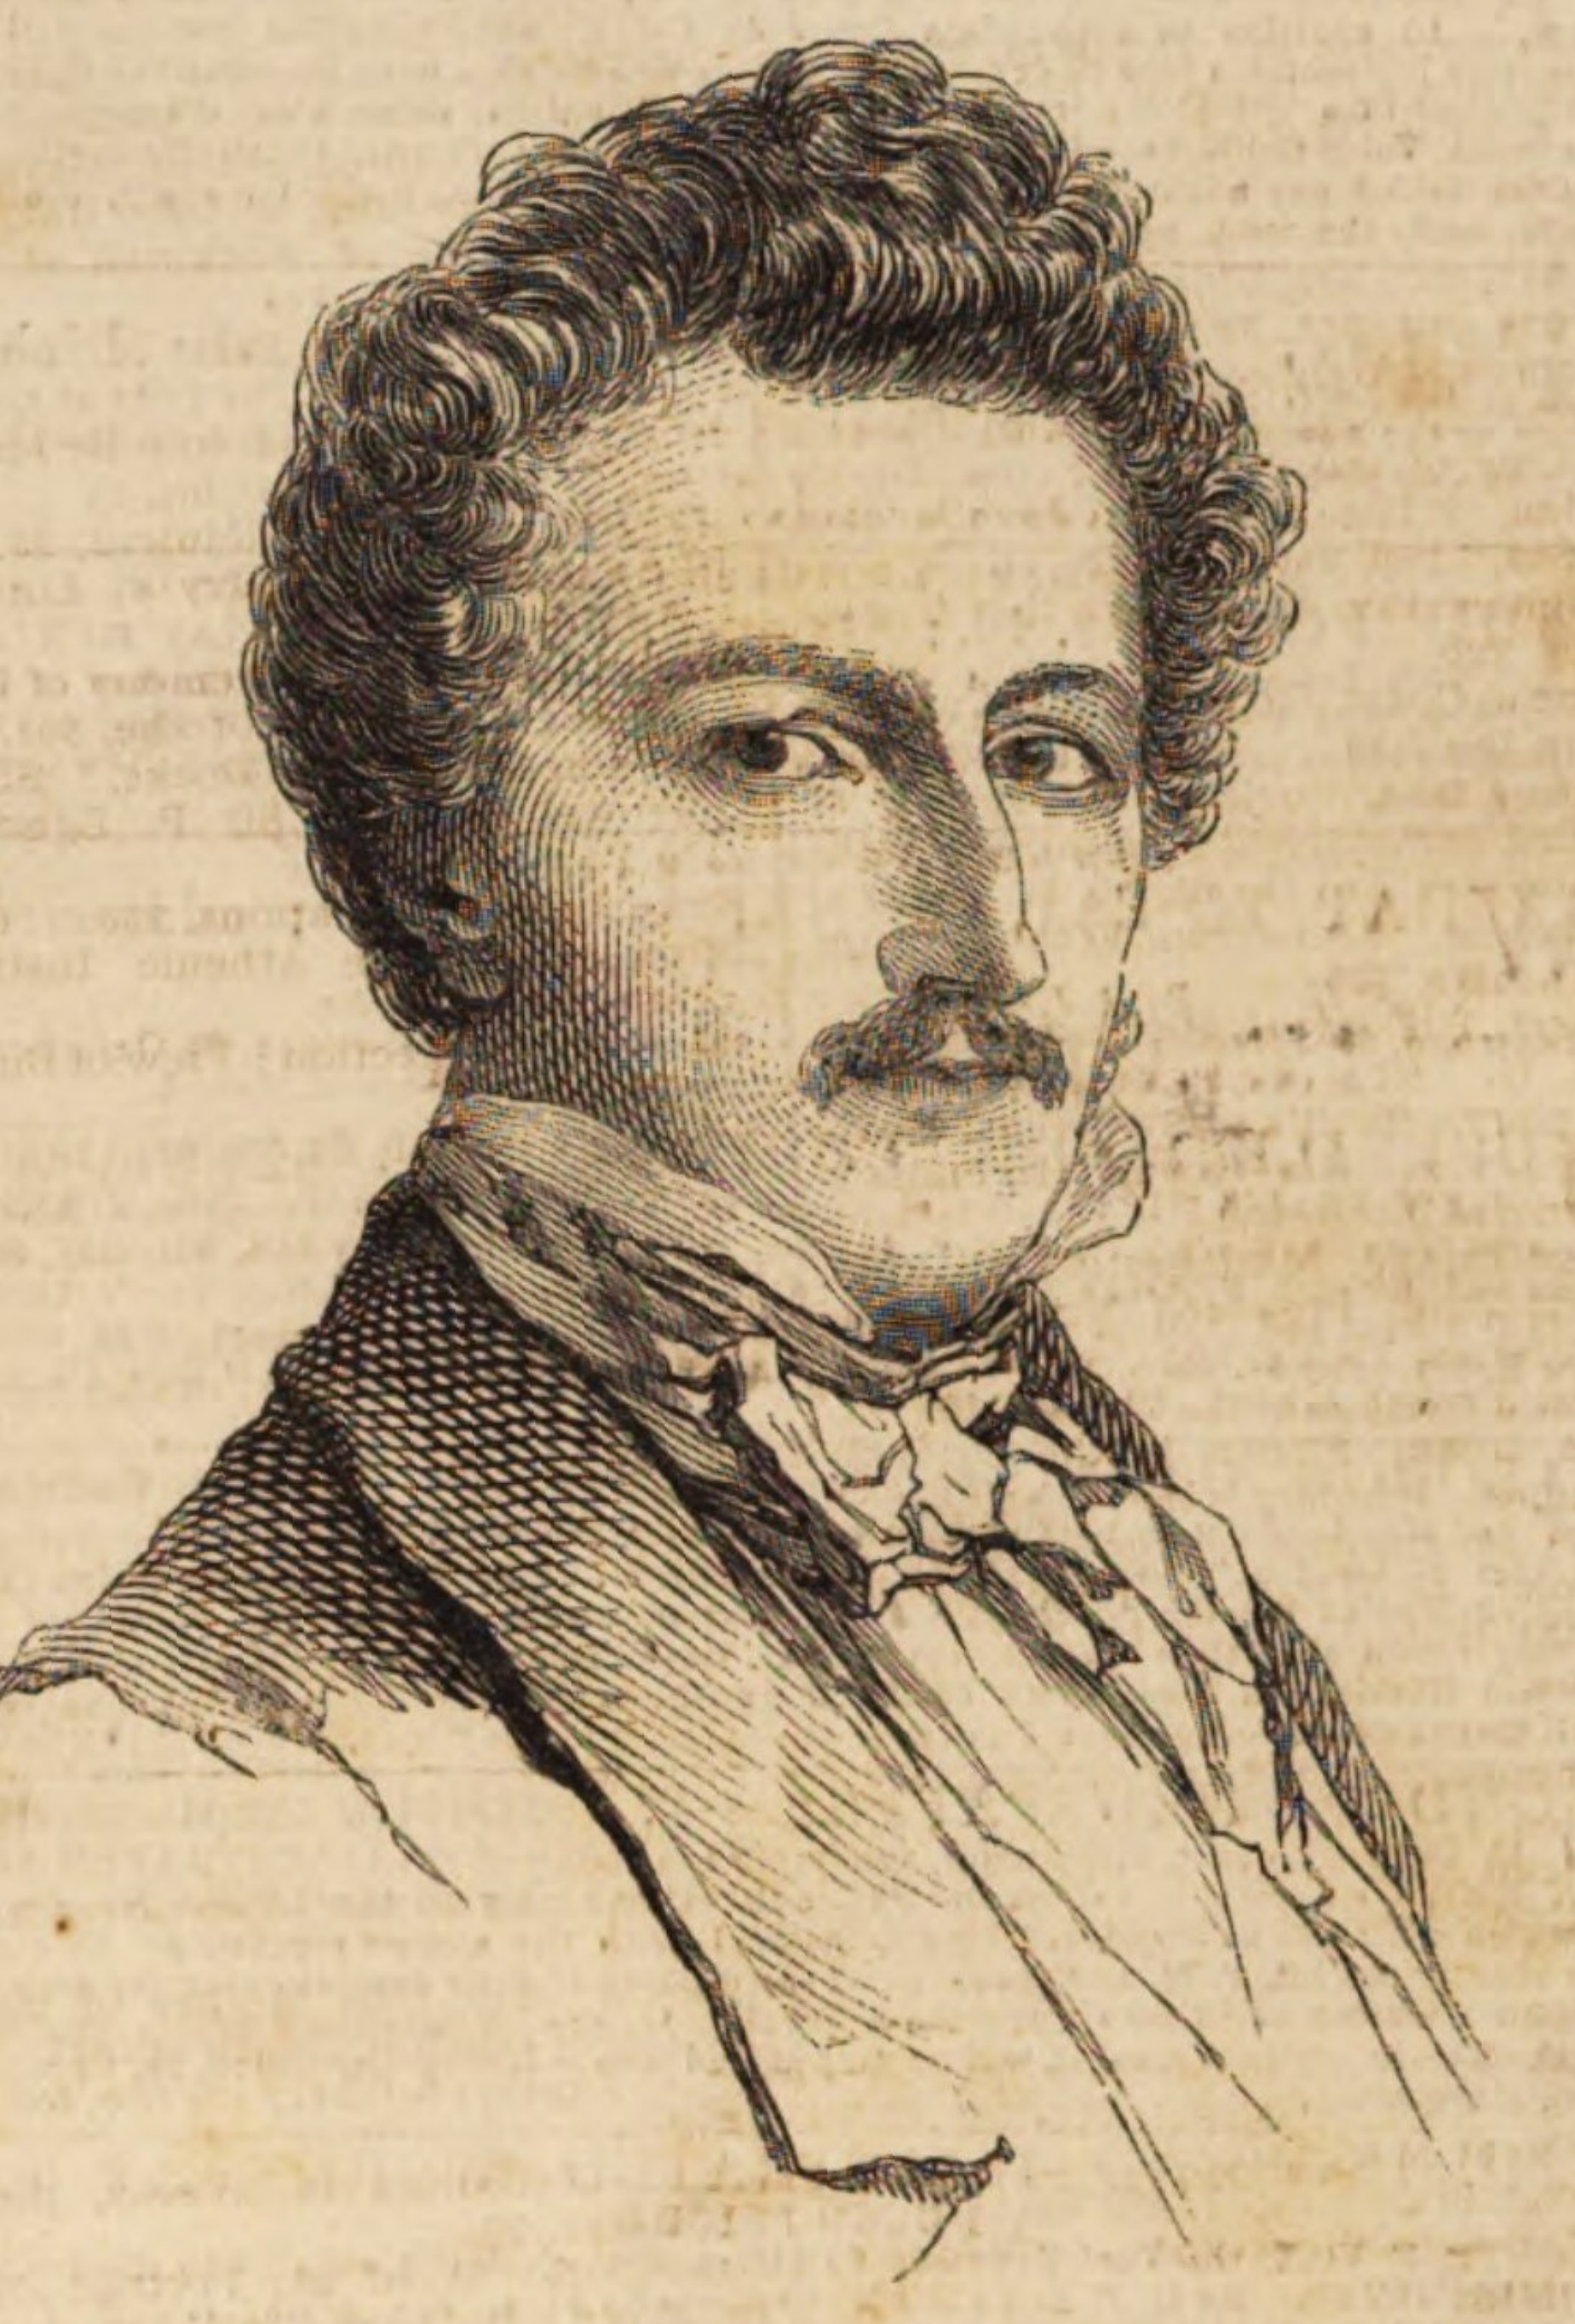
Cost of the Improvements in the Metropolis.—The Commissioners of Woods and Forests, in their 21st report, state, with regard to the improvements in the metropolis, in the several lines of those improvements authorised by the Acts 3 and 4 Victoria, cap. 12, they have, since the dates of those acts, completed purchases to the amount, in the whole, of £457,844 15s. 10d., and have contracted for further purchases to the amount, in the whole, of £121,617 15s. 10d.; and besides these, the purchases now remaining to be made, in order to clear the whole of the ground required for completing the several lines of improvement, it is estimated will cost the further sum of £54,256 5s., or thereabouts, viz.:—In the line from Oxford-street to Holborn they have completed purchases to the amount of £211,684 14s. 10d., and have contracted for further purchases to the amount of £56,969 3s. 4d.; and besides these, there remain to be made purchases estimated to cost the sum of £14,571 15s. Thus this new line of street will have cost, in purchases of property alone, nearly £290,000. Secondly—In the line from Bow-street to Charlotte-street, Bloomsbury, they have completed purchases to the amount of £70,958 18s. 3d., and have contracted for further purchases to the amount of £3009 11s. 9d.; and besides these, there remain to be made purchases estimated to cost the sum of £17,595, or thereabouts. 3rdly—In the line from the London Docks to Spitalfields church, they have completed purchases to the amount of £96,742 16s. 11d., and have contracted for further purchases to the amount of £30,236 8s. 7d.; and besides these there remain to be made purchases estimated to cost the sum of £6740, or thereabouts. Fourthly—In the line from Coventry-street to Long-acre, the Commissioners have completed purchases to the amount of £77,078 5s. 10d., and they have contracted for further purchases to the amount of £89,202 12s. 2d.; and besides these, there remain to be made purchases estimated to cost the sum of £8097 10s., or thereabouts. And fifthly—In the line from East Smithfield to Rosemary lane, they have completed purchases to the amount of £1420, and have contracted for further purchases to the amount of £12,200; and besides these, there remain to be made purchases estimated to cost the sum of £7252, or thereabouts. It appears that of the sum of £500,000 mentioned in the Commissioners' 19th report, to have been borrowed of the Equitable Assurance Company, for the purposes of these improvements, upon the security of certain portions of the land revenue of the Crown in Middlesex, and of moneys arising from interest on Exchequer Bills, and profit on the sale and purchase of those bills, in which part of that loan was temporarily invested—from the sale of old materials, and from rents of property purchased for the purposes of these improvements, there remained a balance of £1420 6s. 6½d. These funds being nearly expended, the Commissioners are taking measures for obtaining a further loan of £250,000, which they find "it will be necessary to raise for the purpose of making the several remaining purchases requisite for the completion of these improvements."

ST. AMANT.

The subject of our engraving—the first of a series of portraits of eminent chess-players—may safely be pronounced the most brilliant player of the present day.

Mons. St. Amant, when young, filled a situation as Clerk to the Colonies, in which he remained a few years. Finding such occupation monotonous, he returned to Paris, joined the theatrical profession, and appeared at the Theatre Français as a comedian. After two or three first appearances he abandoned this line of life, and subsequently became, and is now, a wine-merchant. It was not until after he had fretted his hour on the stage that he applied himself studiously to chess.

It must have been between the years 1834 and 1835 that he first gained celebrity in a match with Mons. Mouret, the gentleman who for some considerable time directed the moves of the Automaton. This match he lost by one or two games only. In a severe contest (in 1837) with that excellent man, Mons. Boncourt, he equally distinguished himself. This match took place at the house of Mons. Alexandre, the founder of the Chess Club in Paris. It was in some of the games then played that St. Amant first used the Evans Gambit. This strong attacking opening, then but little known in Paris, completely paralysed all the efforts of Mons. Boncourt to win a game, for some little time. Mons. St. Amant had, however, lost too many games in the commencement of the match to enable him to regain a sufficient number to claim the victory. His games with all the first players—Le Petit Juif, De la Bourdonnais (who gave him a pawn and two moves), &c. gave promise of his future excellence. In the year 1836, and again we believe, in 1839, St. Amant visited London, played with our best players, and returned to his home crowned with victories. Content with the honours he had so well earned, he discontinued chess for two years, and it was not until he commenced to edit "La Palamede," in 1842, that we find him gathering fresh laurels.



ST. AMANT.

He is at present in the prime of life—aged about forty-five. His play is of the brilliant school: some of the games won by him in the late match, presenting to the chess student, examples of the most imaginative combinations.

His uniform kindness to all members of the Cercle des Echecs has deservedly secured him many friends; and his gentlemanly and hospitable behaviour to all strangers who have the good fortune to visit that celebrated club, entitle him to our greatest respect.
